Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to provide that the members of the women's royal naval services and the South African military nursing service, shall be entitled to the rights, privileges and benefits enjoyed by Canadians serving in His Majesty's forces other than Canadian forces during world war II under the Veterans Land Act, 1942, the Veterans Insurance Act, the Veterans Rehabilitation Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1946, the reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942, the Civil Service Act, the Pension Act and the Income War Tax Act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been informed of the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport) moved:

That a sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government be appointed to consider the accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys; and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time, and that, notwithstanding Standing Order 63, the said committee consist of Messrs: Chevrier, Clark, Coyle, Belzile, Bourget, Emmerson, Gibson (Comox-Alberni), Harkness, Harris (Grey-Bruce), McLure, Hazen, Jackman, LaCroix, Lockhart, Maybank, McCulloch (Pictou), Moore, Mutch, Nicholson, Picard, Pouliot, Reid, Shaw.

He said: This notice of motion seeks the establishment of the committee on railways and shipping. To this committee are referred the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines. Certain items of the estimates are taken from the committee of supply and referred to this committee. It is in the same form on the order paper now as it was last year.

WAR CRIMES

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVES IN TRIALS AT HONG KONG

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) asked me a question yesterday and I said I would give a reply to-day. The question was whether a Canadian representative has been appointed for the trials of Japanese war criminals at Hong Kong which are now proceeding, and when the representative will be dispatched.

In order that hon. members may get a true perspective of the whole matter as it arises out of the question which has been asked by the hon. member, I will give the house a brief review of the arrangements which have been concluded with regard to Canadian participation in the trials of far eastern war criminals generally.

The major war criminals are to be tried by an international tribunal, convened by General MacArthur, to which each state signatory to the Japanese surrender instrument has been invited to name a judge and an associate prosecutor. The Canadian nominee as judge is Mr. Justice E. Stuart McDougall, of the Court of King's Bench, Quebec, and the Canadian nominee as associate prosecutor is Brigadier H. G. Nolan, C.B.E., M.C., Vice-Judge Advocate General at national defence headquarters. Both Brigadier Nolan and Judge McDougall have been in Tokyo since February.

Canadian participation in the trials of the lesser far eastern war criminals has been complicated by the fact that under existing international arrangements military courts for the trial of such war criminals may only be convened by states now in occupation of areas formerly dominated by Japan. Moreover, under the war crimes regulations (Canada), Canadian military courts can only be convened by senior officers in command of "Canadian forces"; since Canada has had no occupation force in the far east, no such courts could be convened in that area.

However, arrangements have been concluded with the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States pursuant to which a group of Canadian officers are proceeding to Hong Kong and Tokyo to exercise the following powers and duties:

(a) to assist in the collection and collation of further evidence of atrocities against Canadians;

(b) to assist in providing the United Kingdom (or United States) authorities with such available evidence from Canadian sources as may be considered of value to them;

(c) to request the United Kingdom (or United States) military authorities to convene military courts under their respective war crimes regulations for the trial of particular persons within their jurisdiction against whom, in the opinion of the appropriate Canadian military representative, a prima facie case of a war crime against a Canadian has been established;

(d) to assist in the prosecution of Canadian cases if so authorized by the appropriate United Kingdom (or United States) military authority;

(e) to act in general liaison with the United Kingdom (or United States) war crimes officers in the far east.

In implementation of these arrangements, four Canadian army officers and four other ranks, with Lieutenant Colonel J. O. H. Orr in charge, are now en route to the far east. These officers will act in both the Hong Kong and Tokyo areas. The officers, all of whom possess legal experience, were drawn largely from the war crimes section at national defence headquarters; two of the other ranks are ex-Hong Kong prisoners of war.

Evidence of far eastern crimes against Canadian citizens and members of the Canadian armed forces has been collected and collated by a war crimes section at national defence headquarters. The section has reported that there is an accumulation of evidence of atrocities against Canadians both in the areas now occupied by the United Kingdom forces (that is, Hong Kong) and in Japan proper.

Lists and descriptions of "wanted" persons have been transmitted to the appropriate United Kingdom and United States authorities with the request that they be apprehended, or held in cusody if already apprehended.

The war crimes officers en route to the far east have with them the evidence above referred to and will keep in close touch with the war crimes section at national defence headquarters.

The United States authorities have requested that an additional officer accompany the officers proceeding to Tokyo and be available to sit as judge on any joint military court convened by General MacArthur for the trial of lesser war criminals whether the victims were Canadians or nationals of other countries. Colonel Thomas Moss, M.C., K.C., of the Judge Advocate General's branch, has been assigned for this purpose and has now left Ottawa en route to Tokyo. It may also be that conversations held by the war crimes officers in Hong Kong will indicate that it would be in order for a judicial officer to be sent to Hong Kong to carry out similar functions.

Mr. FULTON: I should like to put this in the form of a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Before doing so, if I may be permitted, I should thank the hon. gentleman for the long and informative statement he has made in reply to my question. The Prime Minister said that a group of officers had been appointed to proceed to Hong Kong. I believe he mentioned Colonel Orr. This is a restatement of my original question. Will the Prime Minister tell us when those officers will be leaving? I do not think that point was covered.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Perhaps I may be permitted to reply to that question. Colonel Moss, who was referred to in the Prime Minister's statement, left for Washington on April 11, and will travel by air to Tokyo where I am informed the new tribunal is soon to be convened. Colonel Moss will represent Canada on the lesser tribunal, if I may so describe it, referred to by the Prime Minister in his statement. I understand the others left some time ago.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MONTREAL BREWERIES—FINDINGS OF QUEBEC REGIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, notice of which I sent him this morning. I ask it in view of a serious situation at Montreal which requires urgent attention. Were the findings and directives of the regional war labour board for the province of Quebec, made on or about January 3, 1946, in the matter of the employees of certain Montreal breweries, reported to the national war labour board? If so, what action was taken in regard thereto?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Of course decisions of the regional board are reported to the national war labour board, and it is only in cases where the decisions themselves show an error that any action is taken by the national board by way of review. I am informed that in the case in question nothing in the decision received appeared to warrant special review proceedings by the national board. Reviewal procedure should not be confused with the matter of appeal, which is open to either employer or employee; that is to say, any person aggrieved by the decision of a regional board may appeal from that decision to the national board. Appeal proceedings have not yet been taken in any of the cases about which my hon. friend has inquired.

May I say this. There is a good deal of loose talk going on throughout the country—

An hon. MEMBER: There always is.

Mr. MITCHELL: There is a good deal of loose talk among my hon. friends.

Mr. COLDWELL: And by the minister himself, sometimes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Even the minister himself and the leader of the C.C.F. I suggest however that when machinery of this kind is set up, such as the constitution of an employers or employees organization, those in charge being representatives of organized labour and of employers, the best advice that either side can give to their rank and file is to obey the law and not declare that they are going to break the law before they have appeared before the tribunal with respect to the creation of which they were consulted. I think that needs to be said at the moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask a supplementary question? The minister stated quite correctly that there was provision in the national labour code for appeal. I understand that there was an appeal in this instance, but to the regional board which made the first finding and directive. Is there any provision for that in the labour code?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. My hon. friend probably knows as much about the circumstances as I do, and perhaps more. There has been some difficulty in connection with the position of the board arising out of differences of opinion between one of the members of the board and the Canadian Congress of Labour of which he was the nominee. I still maintain, however, that the appeal should have been made to the national board, and I say so in a kindly way without being critical. The proper method of procedure should have been an appeal from the regional board to the national board by the organization concerned.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister has misunderstood the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: The original decision was in favour of the employees,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL:—And the employers appealed to the regional war labour board.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the first decision stand?

Mr. SPEAKER: I would impress upon the hon. member the importance of the rule which requires a member to resume his seat when the Speaker rises and asks for order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry I transgressed, Mr. Speaker, but I just did not see you.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no motion before the house, consequently there can be no debate. A question was asked by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, and the Minister of Labour replied. An answer given by a minister is, under the circumstances, not debatable. I permitted another question, but I cannot permit a debate, because that would be against the rules.

INQUIRY AS TO DIRECTING OF VETERANS TO BREWERY INDUSTRY FOR EMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I did not send him notice of this question, because it arises out of an exchange between the minister and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and a telegram. Has the minister been advised that the Department of Veterans Affairs employment agency in Montreal has been directing veterans to the brewery industry where a dispute is in progress?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): No, I have not yet been so advised.

Mr. GILLIS: Will the minister check on it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: Yes.

Mr. GILLIS: I shall send him the telegram.

REGIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD FOR QUEBEC—J. M. BEDARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On Monday last the Minister of Labour, in reply to a question, said that Mr. Bedard was to be appointed to the regional war labour board for Quebec. Has an order in council been passed to make the appointment effective?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The answer is no, not yet.

AVAILABILITY OF PRISONERS OF WAR TO SUGAR BEET GROWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT McCUBBIN (Middlesex West): Having been interested in the securing of farm labour for western Ontario, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the statement true that we see in our Ontario daily newspapers, that 850 German prisoners of war will be available for sugar beet growers in western Ontario?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In reply to the hon. member for Middlesex West and to inform the hon. member for Provencher, and the hon. member for Lake Centre, who are also interested, may I say at the moment consultations are proceeding with the British government with respect to the retention of a certain number of prisoners of war to take part particularly in the sugar beet harvesting in Alberta, Manitoba and Ontario during the coming season. I hope that when the reply is received I shall be able to tell the house about it, probably in the course of the next few days.

INDIANS

REVISION OF INDIAN ACT—CONSIDERATION BY HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. On October 24 last the minister stated in the house that he hoped it would be possible to introduce at this session a bill to revise the Indian Act, and that it would be sent to a committee of the house for consideration. What are the government's plans in the matter?

Hon. J. A. GLEN (Minister of Mines and Resources): I am glad to be able to inform the hon. member for Athabaska that since I made the statement to which he refers the matter has been considered further by the government and it is proposed to set up a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons to examine and consider the Indian Act and the suggested revision and to investigate and report upon Indian administration in general. It is my intention immediately after the Easter recess to introduce the resolution for the appointment of a committee.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

REMOVAL OR REDUCTION OF TARIFFS TO ACCELERATE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): May I ask a question of the Minister of Finance? For the purpose of accelerating the production of much needed foodstuffs, what steps are being taken by the government to reduce or remove the tariffs on farm machinery, trucks and harvesting machinery, and thus reduce the cost of production?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Tariff changes are not announced until the budget is introduced. It would be impossible for me to make a premature statement.

LOAN TO UNITED KINGDOM

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed on the sixth day of March, 1946.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Speaking in this house on March 22 last on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I reserved my judgment on the subject matter now before the house, namely, the loan to Britain. I think it is my duty to-day to ask the indulgence of the house in giving my personal views on this matter, and the reasons why I approve this piece of legislation and shall vote in favour of it.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I have made a careful compilation of the views expressed both by those who are in favour of the loan and by those who oppose it. I have come to the conclusion that, by reason of the uncontrollable circumstances connected with this loan, we have no alternative but to vote for this financial arrangement.

I noticed that most of those who are against the proposal—I say most of them, because there are noteworthy exceptions—base their argument on a matter of sentiment and revive, in support of their claims, old race squabbles. The government have announced their intention of lending nearly 250 million dollars to France. Have any protests been voiced by nationalists? Not to my knowledge. They have kept silent because they have no other protests to advance about the loan to England than arguments based on race squabbles. This is clearly evidenced by a letter I have received from a Social Credit supporter, and from which I wish to quote some significant excerpts:

March 28, 1946.

Mr. Maurice Lalonde, M.P., for Labelle.

Sir,

I have read the statement you have made about the Social Credit in the province of Quebec. I believe that you are not well informed on this country's economic problems.

Alberta is in favour of the loan to England because the majority in that province is of English descent. Here in the province of Quebec, the people oppose the loan because the majority is French.

J. B. Bureau,
37 St. Bernard Street,
St. Malo, Que.

(Text):

I am giving that for the prime consideration of hon. members across the way.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members not to make so much noise. It is nearly impossible to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): This individual unknowingly puts in concrete form the opinions of nationalists and dissenting Liberals, whose good faith and intent I respect. However, protests always have and always will come from a noisy minority which does not speak for the majority, in my province. The last federal elections have amply proven that the majority of my fellow-citizens can distinguish between constructive Liberal policies and a demagogic and impassioned appeal by a group of Quebec nationalists.

The hon. members for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) and Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) remember their experience of June last, when, after having been elected as Liberals for many years by large majorities, they only succeeded in retaining their seats by very small margins. In his speech to the house, yesterday, the leader of the Bloc Populaire did not give adequate proof in support of his statement to the effect that we were granting interest-free loans to Great Britain, while that country collected interest on her advances to others. But the hon. member thought fit not to say what countries he had in mind, nor did he mention the amounts involved, as we might then have been in a position to say whether he were right or wrong. Indeed it is customary for our nationalists to make such statements without offering any evidence.

I have therefore examined the bill strictly from a business standpoint, leaving to idealists the difficult task of convincing the people that we must build up the future by drinking at the bitter spring of ancient persecutions. It is certainly not without some reluctance that I find myself compelled to approve this policy of assistance, but in view of the irresistible influence of world events and happenings, the inevitable effect of the political evolution of the world, the indisputable interdependence of democratic and free peoples, the universality of economic interests linking all the so-called free nations of the globe, I am compelled to admit that international isolationism will in future be a monstrous utopia, and that the Canadian people who have emerged from the crucible of war bruised but grown in stature, must comply, like any other entity living under the sun, with the unyielding laws that govern the progress towards maturity. The proposal must therefore be examined from the standpoint of national interest. And that is what I have tried to do.

Canadians will enjoy prosperity only if they have an adequate income. Therefore, if the national income is maintained on a high level, our entire nation will be prosperous. The shrinking and freezing of capital are the source of economic depressions. Our experiences from 1930 to 1935 should not be soon forgotten. In order to maintain the national income at a high level, it is necessary that the purchasing power in the hands of the taxpayer be also on a high level to enable him to meet taxation and high prices. In other words, it is essential to have a sound monetary unit in free circulation, creating profits and prosperity. Eisler in his book entitled "Stable Money", pages 16 and 17, reviews the situation as follows:

(Text):

The purchasing power of the consumer is obviously measured by the total amount of cash and credit available to him for spending at any moment on goods and services for immediate consumption. As the monetary unit will buy a varying quantity of goods according to whether the average price of goods—the so-called "general price level"—is high or low, the consumers' real capacity for acquiring goods will be measured by the sum total of their nominal monetary incomings for a given period, minus their savings, multiplied by the reciprocal value of the index of retail prices, i.e., by the purchase power of the monetary unit.

If goods are to flow steadily from the producer to the ultimate consumer, the real purchasing power of the consumer must be equivalent to the total money value of the goods destined for immediate consumption offered by the producers during the same period. And this state of affairs may be described as the ideal or normal equilibrium of the national or world market.

Should the consumers' purchasing power . . . be greater at a given period than the capacity of industry and agriculture to produce directly consumable goods, prices will rise and the owners of capital will be spurred by the prospect of profit to increasing their producing capacity by installing new machinery and by engaging more labour, thereby further increasing the purchasing power of the consumers. If, however, the sum total of money available for spending on commodities is less than the total money value of such goods offered by their producers, prices will fall, production will be reduced and producers will refrain from increasing their plant or staff, thus further restricting the consumers' purchasing power. Consequently the situation on the market for producers' goods is always entirely dependent on the situation on the market for consumers' goods. Both markets must stagnate and employment of every kind must shrink if too little money flows to the second of the two.

(Translation):

Which means that scarcity of capital brings on unemployment, by the fact that it decreases the purchasing power of the consumer.

Now, how is the active circulation of money to be promoted in Canada? How is the worker to be guaranteed a reasonable income? How are we to prevent the stoppage of the trade cycle? By what measures are we to maintain the rotation of the wheel which the artificial prosperity of the war period has caused to turn at a great speed? The answer will be found in the internal economic conditions of our country.

Canada, being a highly productive nation, forced to export 40 per cent of its goods, must enact and apply measures compatible with the inflexible standards dictated by her position as an exporting country. Not a single Nationalist, not even a single pure-bred imperialist, were he prostrate before the Empire's altar, like my friend from Broadview (Mr. Church), could afford to challenge this truism. A brief, prepared by Mr. Gilbert Jackson, states that for each unit of $380 of national revenue, we must export goods to an amount of $100. In other words, if we are to maintain a national revenue of approximately $7,000,000,000 we must export goods worth $1,800,000,000. This expert has gone even further. He has prepared a table of the relative importance of our possible national revenue for the period 1950 to 1961, together with the corresponding imports that would be necessary. I should like to have it placed on the record, with the permission of the house:

Year	Anticipated national income returns on the assumption of an 11 per cent deficiency	Corresponding exports anticipated for our goods and our bullion gold
1951	5,598	1,338
1952	5,712	1,364
1953	5,825	1,390
1954	5,936	1,417
1955	6,049	1,443
1956	6,161	1,469
1957	6,274	1,496
1958	6,388	1,521
1959	6,497	1,547
1960	6,605	1,572
1961	6,711	1,596

We can therefore repeat what we have said time and again: namely, that prosperity in Canada is dependent on our exports. We have to face that fact. Be it to England, China, Russia, Nicaragua or Egypt, it is imperative that we should export our goods. Otherwise, economic strangulation shall be our lot.

Now, such exports will be useful only inasmuch as the purchasing countries are able to pay for them. That is another truth which we should not let the clouds of a narrow nationalism or of an extreme imperialism hide from us.

England has suffered terrible losses during the war, as evidenced by the following excerpts from the monthly letter of the Bank of Commerce (February, 1946):

(Text):

Britain lost about $30,000 million, approximately 25 per cent of her national wealth, during the war. Property damage alone is estimated as nearly $6,000 million, shipping and cargo losses as $3,000 million and internal disinvestment over $3,500 million. The last mentioned amount represents merely accumulated depreciation and obsolescence of business establishments which could not be taken care of under the stress and strain of an all-out war effort. No allowance was made in this particular estimate for enemy destruction, nor for inventory losses. External disinvestment of nearly $17,000 million included in the over-all calculation of the loss in national wealth is made up of increased liabilities abroad incurred for war purposes, as well as the liquidated capital assets previously mentioned, and sundry items.

(Translation):

We must therefore look to a customer to whom we shall have to lend our money so that he may purchase what we must necessarily export. That is a distressing dilemma which we must solve.

We shall soon have, on the one hand, great quantities of goods piled up on our docks, a monetary circulation of over a billion and a half dollars, as compared with $250,000,000 before the war, a production capacity enormously greater than our national consumption, and on the other hand, a customer who has tremendous responsibilities for recovery and rehabilitation but who is only able to pay in pounds sterling, which we cannot use in Canada because they cannot be converted into gold, a customer who has ever been our best one, as evidenced by the official statistics table which, with the permission of the house, I shall place on Hansard.

Shrewd business men have but one answer: we should extend a loan (not an outright gift, as is claimed by some of our opponents) to that customer who is temporarily short of Canadian dollars and we insist that the amount of that loan be entirely spent in Canada for goods or services. That is the essence of the measure which we are called upon to consider and pass. May I refer to section 2 of the bill which reads as follows:

(Text):

The purpose of the credit is to facilitate purchases by the United Kingdom of goods and services in Canada and to assist in making it possible for the United Kingdom to meet transitional post-war deficits in its current balance of payments, to maintain adequate reserves of gold and dollars and to assume the obligations of multilateral trade.

(Translation):

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, Canada has lent money to other countries besides England. The right hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), on March 28 last, has tabled the following figures showing that Canada has made interest-bearing loans to other countries besides England. I shall ask that this table be published in Hansard, with the consent of the house.

Loans under the Export Credits Insurance Act

And have we heard protests from the hon. members who are opposed to the resolution? No, Mr. Speaker. Such silence is sufficient proof of their intentions. You may draw your own conclusions.

I hope that by causing money to circulate a lot more in our country, the loan will create employment to the benefit of all classes. Manufacturing for export will create employment and I wonder if the government's critics on this score can afford to shoulder the tremendous responsibility of refusing their support to a bill which may create more jobs, simply, in some cases, because of political anglophobia? Can they suggest a better way of solving unemployment, which is getting more acute every day? I would gladly hear them put forward some constructive suggestion instead of their destructive criticisms. Public administration in Canada would benefit by such a display of true Canadianism.

Some critics contend that the loan is further proof of our British colonialism. I would not go that far. Our neighbours to the south have lent nearly 5 billions on similar terms, and yet we could hardly accuse them of British colonialism. Our loans to France and Belgium did not mean that we are their colony. I say rather that Canada must pay to reconquer her foreign markets and that Great Britain is one market we cannot afford to lose. Everyone knows that colonial ties still bind Canada to Great Britain; Westminster has not yet accomplished the miracle of granting us complete independence. At least, that is my personal opinion. But to come to the conclusion that any financial transaction between Canada and England constitutes a gesture of colonial dependency seems somewhat radical. We might discuss at great length the methods resorted to by the British to restore their economy. We are all entitled to our own opinions on the matter; however, the fact remains that Canada must have access to the world markets and accept such satisfactory compromises as are required in the gigantic struggle which is actually being waged in our confused world.

Those remarks will explain clearly my stand in regard to the loan to England. I have examined the facts purely from the standpoint of a business transaction leaving sentimentality out of the picture.

I trust that those remarks will not offend anyone; I have made them in good faith and in a spirit of fairness. I am sure that this loan to England will be approved by a great majority of the Canadian people, for the war has taught us a grim lesson and has convinced us that isolationism is out of the question, that the trend of world's public opinion cannot be disregarded and that we, in Canada, must go hand in hand with the great trading nations of the world. This entails obligations, Mr. Speaker, and I am convinced that the house is fully aware of that, but we must not shirk our national obligations and it is the bounden duty of each and everyone of us to endorse proposals which now or later will provide our workers with jobs and with an adequate income.

It is in that spirit, Mr. Speaker, that I will approve the loan unreservedly, leaving it to the government to carry out those proposals and to my constituents to pass judgment upon me at the opportune moment. Indeed, during the last federal election, my constituents were of the opinion that the policy of the present government in such matters is a sound one, for as stated by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Belzile) yesterday, the campaign in the constituency of Labelle as well as in his own riding hinged upon the gifts or loans to England. I had supported such gifts or loans at the time and I support the present loan, for I am convinced that the constituency of Labelle, as all the other constituencies of the country, will derive benefits from this sound legislation.

Mr. PAUL EDMOND GAGNON (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I shall preface my remarks on the bill now under discussion with an excerpt from a speech which the Right Hon. Prime Minister made in the house on March 30, 1939, during the debate on foreign policy. The leader of the Liberal party said:

> We have tremendous tasks to do at home, in housing the people, in caring for the aged and helpless, in relieving drought and unemployment, in building roads, in meeting our heavy burden of debt, in making provision for Canada's defence, and in bringing our standards of living and civilization to the levels our knowledge now makes possible. There is no great margin of realizable wealth for this purpose; we must,

to a greater or less extent, choose between keeping our own house in order, and trying to save Europe and Asia.

To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the government seems determined, as it was in September, 1939, to take very good care of the peace-time interests of our sympathetic friends from overseas and seems mainly if not solely concerned with the speedy rehabilitation of the British empire. Taxes snatched from the pockets of the Canadian people will meet the fantastic cost of this usual policy of serfdom which takes the form of presents, loans and advances never or only partially repaid. Now that the war is over, this policy sounds less attractive than ever before.

Let Great Britain try by every means at her disposal to regain world supremacy in the economic field; to that, we have no objection, but it seems immoral and ridiculous that we should partially finance the attempt.

In this instance, as in every phase of our participation in the world conflict, we overstep the bounds of sound common sense. Our leaders are once again afflicted with a fit of supra-national patriotism which distresses those who think of Canada's greater interests before trying to satisfy the unexpressed ambitions of imperialistic nations. We forget that it is not pretty and rather ominous to become inordinately inflated. Under present circumstances, it is no waste of time to look at things in their right perspective and to beware of misleading prospects and self-seeking propaganda.

The loan submitted to our approval is equal to one-third that asked of the United States, but compared to their national revenue, it is five or six times greater than the amount requested of them. We will pay an annual interest of about $30,000,000 until 1951 and of $12,500,000 afterwards. Canada, the Croesus of the atomic age, will borrow from the banks or elsewhere at 3 per cent and lend at 2 per cent. The least we can say is that we need not have racked our brains to find more radical methods of increasing our wealth.

According to the hon. Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe), "Canada is able to manufacture all that is manufactured elsewhere". Therefore, as has been said over and over again, we need foreign markets to dispose of our surplus production and keep employment at a maximum level. Why then not do what is necessary to take over without delay the places left vacant by Italy, Japan and especially Germany as exporting nations in South America? Considering the financial status of the South American countries, we could trade with them without first giving them money with which to buy our goods; that is the initial but not the least important advantage Canada would derive from such an arrangement.

According to an article which appeared in the Gazette of February 26 last, those South American countries wish to do business with us. I quote:

(Text):

Central and South Americans are eager to do more business with Canada and every effort should be made here to stimulate the exchange of goods with Latin American countries, according to Trade and Commerce Minister James A. MacKinnon, who in a press conference to-day told of the encouraging results of his three weeks air trip to Central America and Jamaica.

(Translation):

Brazil, with a population of 45 million inhabitants in 1939, purchased from Germany, its most important supplier after the United States, coal, iron, steel, pharmaceutical products, vehicles, electrical appliances, raw wool, aluminum, etc. Canada was eleventh on the list of exporters to Brazil.

The Argentine, a country of 14 million people, imported from Germany, before the war, such goods as tin, copper, locomotives, petroleum, textiles, etc. Our exports to that country did not even represent one per cent of its total imports.

Colombia has a population of 10 million and its purchases of manufactured goods represent 90 per cent of its total imports; well in 1939, that country imported from Germany 80·9 per cent of such goods. The list includes chemical products, automobiles, alcoholic beverages, clothing, leather, artificial silk, cement, radios, tobacco, etc. Our exports to Columbia in 1939 made up but 2·3 per cent of the total.

In 1939, Chile, a country with five million inhabitants, imported from Germany, its second most important supplier, metal products, rolling stock, paints and varnishes, etc., while our exports to that country were practically nil.

Germany was also second on the list of exporters to Uruguay and Bolivia, and third among the exporters to Peru.

In the Review of Commercial Conditions, published by His Majesty's Stationery Office, London, Great Britain serves notice of her intention to resume her trade with South America. Why should we not vie for those markets? Of course, if we neglect our own affairs, others won't look after them for us.

Mr. Speaker, the financial transaction proposed in this resolution is mostly favourable to England. None but imperialistic extremists and utopians who dream of an eternal empire in which Canada would remain the eternal doormat, could be led to believe that such agreements are wise and profitable. One has but to stop and think to realize that our resources, however tremendous, do not justify such generosity. They were entrusted to us by Providence for our greater welfare and we have not the right to deprive our fellow-citizens of wealth which is indispensible to their happiness, to the advantage of a still wealthier people. The Right Honourable the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has no illusions as to the economic value to Canada of this new $1,250,000,000 loan. Here is what he had to say, on the 18th of March, 1942, with regard to the billion dollar loan. I quote from page 1421 of Hansard:

I am sure that hon. members can recall the grave international problems and difficulties which arose in the nineteen-twenties and nineteen-thirties from the huge international war debts which had grown up during and immediately following the last great war.

International debts can be settled only by the transfer of goods and services from the debtor country to the creditor country. Such transfers can be made only if and to the extent that the creditor country is prepared to accept goods and services from the debtor country for not only principal repayments but also annual interest charges. In other words, the creditor country must be prepared to see an increase in its imports or a decrease in its exports, or both. Experience has shown that countries will accept these payments in the form of imports only to a limited extent on balance if at all. To do so, of course, exposes their producers to more intense competition from abroad, and the excess of imports serves as a deflationary influence which appears to be unwelcome in normal peace times. On the other hand, the inability of debtor nations to make payment when the creditor nation will not readily accept imported goods and services in payment is bound to lead to international misunderstandings and frictions. Consequently there is a practical limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war.

In an editorial published in Le Devoir of March 31st last, Mr. François-Albert Angers made forceful and accurate comments on those words of the Minister of Finance, the right. hon. Mr. Ilsley; I shall quote the following excerpt:

The value of a loan depends upon its repayment and on what the latter ensures . . . But it will be repaid, said Mr. Ilsley, only to the extent that Canada (the creditor country) is prepared to accept from England (her debtor) goods and services for not only principal repayments but also annual interest charges.

Therefore, by making a loan to England, it is not, as has been contended, Canada which will benefit from England's purchases in the future; it is exactly the opposite: either we remain England's customers in future or we lose our money. Actually England will be our customer for a year or two (until the billion and a quarter has been used up) and without any cost to her at that during that period, and we can only be repaid provided we remain England's customers for fifty years from 1951 on; of course, we must agree also that England's purchases from us will decrease gradually as the amount of interest and annual instalments on principal decrease also.

In future, therefore, the loan will result in a decrease of Canada's exports to England, as stated by Mr. Ilsley when he said: "In other words, Canada (the creditor country) if she wishes to be reimbursed must be prepared to see an increase in her imports or a decrease in her exports, or both.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, economically speaking, it is permissible to contend that this proposal will not bring to Canada the benefits anticipated by the Reform Club speakers. From a humanitarian standpoint, it cannot meet with our approval because it would entail financial sacrifices beyond our means, which we have not the right to make without first consulting all the taxpayers of the country. The borrower will derive the greatest benefits, the most tangible advantages, and this is unfair to us. It is an overwhelming burden which our people will bear for generations, whereas their load is already so heavy and vexatious that it should not inconsiderately be increased.

Again I repeat it is time that the people of Canada derive some benefits from such huge outlays. I am much more concerned with the well-being of my compatriots than with the attempts of a foreign nation to gain supremacy on the markets of the world. We hear a great deal about Canada being endowed with a super-abundance of forests, mines, water powers, etc.; this is quite true. However, we must not forget that the larger number of workers, and settlers, the ordinary and humble citizen, live from hand to mouth, without hope of any improvement in their situation and that they do not look favourably on such splendid gifts. Lack of comfort, privation, unemployment, destitution are as many culture mediums for the virus of subversive doctrines that we must by all means eradicate

I know some good, honest and laborious farmers who are generous beyond their means and who would welcome government assistance or the help of experts free of charge for the draining of their lands, the purchase of farm implements, the improvement of their farming methods. A small part of a billion dollars earmarked for the benefit of our farming class would be more beneficial to the country than the surrender of claims amountaing to a few million dollars.

I know some seasonal workers, such as stevedores, lumbermen, railway employees, who would be pleased to enjoy unemployment benefits, either non-existent or inadequate at the present time; an improvement in the condition of these people who comprise the greatest part of our population would increase the general well-being of Canada in permitting a greater expansion of our wealth and a fairer distribution of our public funds.

Since I have had the privilege of holding a seat in this house, I have heard almost daily, hon. members making various requests: for the building of a railway line or a seaport, for an increase in the old age pension or the pension to the blind. One would request that researches for a cancer cure be not hindered by the lack of necessary funds; another, that a benefit system be inaugurated for the crippled without income or revenue; and there are also the requests for bridges, post offices and other public buildings. Another member would ask air mail for his district. Hardly a speech that does not refer to an old or a new request

Should we not, Mr. Speaker, first grant all reasonable requests, either by lending the amount required or granting the sums asked for, before giving additional millions of dollars to an Empire whose wealth is incredible? What we want for Canada, is a sane legislation and a conservative financial management; this is more important than entering the international race with millions and billions of dollars. All the arguments advanced or to be advanced in favour of the agreement between Canada and Great Britain which is submitted to us at the present time, do not and will not alter the fact that when one has not enough money to meet his obligations, one is ill-advised to make additional debts in order to make a loan to one's neighbour.

"A deep and prevailing national feeling is not a luxury for Canada, it is a necessity", such were the words used in 1939, by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and this is why I am willing to vote billions of dollars for the care, protection and future welfare of my Canadian fellow-citizens, while refusing to support this agreement. As the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay (Mr. Dorion) stated, on March 26 last:

> Before paying millions every year on account of the loan made to another country, our leaders should show the people that they are ready to undertake the public works which are sorely needed.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Mr. RENE HAMEL (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the measure now under consideration. The tax-paying public does not seem to welcome as readily as do some hon. members of this house the idea of lending $1,250 million to England. I should like to indicate some of the reasons why I feel bound to oppose this measure which, to my mind, borders on extravagance.

My opposition comes, in the first place, from the instructions of my constituents. I have received numerous protests from my electors. I have made a personal investigation and I must say that I have not met one person, of whatever political party, to whom such an utter prodigality has not been a cause of deep resentment.

If the hon. members of this house are still the representatives of the people, rather than the tools of a dictatorship, I believe that the opinion of my constituents must influence the stand we have to take on this matter.

I am not against this proposal merely because of the views of my electors, I oppose it on behalf of the 150,000 voters who, in the last election, accepted as their own the Bloc Populaire's motto "Canada for Canadians". Now, so that no one may charge me with being an isolationist, I should like to refer to the views that have been voiced throughout the province by prominent journalists and people who are outstanding in the field of economic and political science in our province. Here is what the brilliant parliamentary correspondent of L'Action Catholique had to say in an outspoken article published on March 9, 1946:

> It is true that our gifts for this week give us a respite of a couple of years and that they will maintain our economic activity during that limited period. This dubious result is obtained by unnatural means, just as the spark of life is sustained in a dying man through the administration of a drug.

The same writer, had this to say in the same paper on March 12, 1946:

> The naked truth is that Greit Britain will in future receive our products and distribute them in order to maintain her trade and her imperial policy, and that the Canadians will have to foot the bill.

I must recall to the house that L'Action Catholique has a circulation of 80,000 to 90,000 in the province of Quebec. The outspoken opinion of that parliamentary correspondent is fully confirmed by experts. I am referring to Mr. Roger Vézina, editor of the financial page in L'Action Catholique, who in the April 2, 1946 issue of that paper expressed the following opinion:

In any case, we believe we are justified to claim that, in its present form and extent, the loan which the Canadian government is about to make to England is not a very sound transaction, but rather a take-in which will keep us dependent on the whims of Britain and will therefore prevent us from securing other external markets and from directing our economy in such a way as to give priority to Canadian needs.

I shall now quote Mr. François Albert Angers, professor at the University of Montreal, whom I consider as an expert in that field. I shall read a few excerpts of an article he published in Le Devoir of March 30:

For the future, the loan may therefore result in a decrease of Canada's exports to England.

Let me refer to the following statement made by the Minister of Finance:

In other words Canada (the creditor nation) must increase her imports in order to be paid.

To cut short, I quote further:

But if things keep in the trend of the past six years, Mr. Ilsley will be proven wrong and history will show that no country, in the experience of the world, has evinced Canada's gullibility in agreeing blindly to sacrifice the interests of her producers to those of another nation, England in this case, for the sole purpose of helping that country to squeeze her out of the international market.

One might think this statement came from government opponents. I would like to add to this compelling evidence the opinion of Le Soleil, Quebec's Liberal organ, which cannot be accused of being in any way opposed to the present government. Here is an editorial from Le Soleil of March 11, 1946:

Any reasons or pretexts brought up in favour of new financial sacrifices to the cause of imperialism will not alter the fact that these sacrifices go beyond what can be expected of Canadian democracy.

This from Le Soleil and not from any member of the Bloc Populaire. The editorial goes on:

We need not hesitate to censure the abuse of power instanced by this advance of $1,250,000,000 to Great Britain without the previous approval of parliament whose great mistake was to give a free hand to the executive.

Such has been the effect of the views I have just quoted on public opinion that the Liberal member for Lotbinière at the Quebec legislative assembly introduced the following motion:

That in the opinion of this house the federal parliament should decline to implement the projected financial agreement between Great Britain and Canada, unless the dominion government establish that this agreement is beneficial from a Canadian point of view.

Mr. LALONDE: Was the motion passed?

Mr. HAMEL: I cannot say. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it has not been shown to the people of this country that the financial agreement before the house is in the best interest of Canada.

The argumentation used by the advocates of the present loan boils down, more or less, to the following pleas:

In the first place, the United Kingdom has been sorely tried by the war and needs our help.

In the second place, the United States have agreed to a loan of some $4 billions without making any sentimental fuss but simply working from a business standpoint.

In the third place, Canada needs foreign markets to dispose of her products and to avoid unemployment.

Conscious of my responsibility as regards our obligations towards humanity on the one hand and our own country on the other, I honestly weighed these arguments.

We are told that the United Kingdom has endured a great deal during the six years of war. I have every sympathy for the suffering of others, whatever country, creed or language happen to be involved. My heart, however, goes out first to my own people, to my fellow-countrymen before I am drawn to the inhabitants of distant lands. The position of the United Kingdom, moreover, is described in Canada in terms far more pessimistic than in Great Britain. We know, for instance, that England has to a great extent relieved the taxpayer's burden. According to English papers, British exports are increasing materially, the British people enjoy better health than before the war and houses are rapidly being built. I even read recently that the Ministry of Social Welfare in Great Britain will supply milk daily to all school children or university students. A Reuters despatch, carried by the Nelson Daily News, gives some rather illuminating information on the matter: the heading is:

Luxury Returns to Bond Street. London, March 20—Almost pre-war luxury has come back to Bond street, London's fashionable and most expensive quarter of a mile, where you now can spend £1,000 ($4,450) within an hour without any difficulty.

And so, Mr. Speaker, our first duty, as I see it, is to relieve distress here in Canada, to raise the standard of living of our own workers, our own citizens, to lower the pensionable age of old people and increase the amount of pension. I am, in addition, particularly impressed by the fact that the interest rate charged by the Government to its borrower is less than that required by British investors, who loan money to their own government at 3 per cent.

The second argument is that of the American loan. But that loan is altogether different from our own. I need not go into the details, for they are quite unlike those of our own. The United States' total income amounts to 198 billions, whereas ours barely amounts to 10 billions. The United States have a population of 137 millions, while ours is less than 12 millions. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of going into particulars. I shall merely recall the different way in which news of both loans was received in London, and that while the British house greeted the Canadian loan with frantic applause, it received the American loan coldly, submissively, and with obvious discontent. Besides, as a compensation for their load, the United States have compelled the United Kingdom to give up imperial preferential tariff, a condition which might have the most serious consequences on our industries by forcing them to compete with American products on the markets of the Commonwealth.

As for the third argument, Mr. Speaker, I shall call it childish at the risk of scandalizing the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde). At a time when we are compelled to ration ourselves; when the world is threatened with starvation; when the demand for agricultural products and raw materials is so superior to the supply as to endanger the very existence of mankind, is it reasonable to claim that such a loan is essential to our exports? If it ensured for the future a protection against unemployment, I would agree. Far from it, the opinion expressed by the two experts I have quoted is the very opposite of that theory and they say that this loan will lead us, within two years, into a period of unemployment. Mr. Speaker, the true reason why England is in such a great need of that advance is to be found in the Gazette of March 20, 1946, and that paper is not an organ of the Bloc Populaire.

Mr. LALONDE: It is not a Liberal paper either.

Mr. HAMEL: Here is what the Gazette has to say:

> Full importance of the United States loan for British foreign policy is not generally realized . . .
> Maintenance of troops in Greece, Indonesia, Egypt and India represents a heavy drain on this country which has emerged seriously impoverished from the war.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to make myself an accomplice of any nation which prevents people from enjoying their independence. For that reason, I shall vote against the motion.

(Text):

Mr. LUDGER DIONNE (Beauce): If I recall the speed with which the resolution concerning the loan to England was carried at its first reading it is easy for me to foresee that this measure will be adopted promptly on second reading.

Not having much experience in international business matters and having no knowledge of international politics and economy, I must necessarily listen to people who know more than I do on these subjects. Competent authorities in whom I have reason to have full confidence tell me that this loan of one billion and a quarter must be made to Great Britain for many reasons—because we must dispose of the surplus of our farm products such as wheat, bacon, cheese, et cetera. Evidently if we cannot sell these commodities the purchasing power of our farmers will decrease and will prevent them from remodeling their farm equipment and buying the necessities of life of which they have been deprived during the last few years. Naturally, if this happens our manufacturing process will take a long time to revive on civilian goods exclusively, thus making it practically impossible to give employment to the numerous people idle at the present time on account of our war activities having been brought to an end. It stands to reason that I must admit this argument. On the other hand, I am at a loss to understand why we cannot dispose of at least a portion of our farm products outside England. The whole world is hungry at the present time. Would it not be a good opportunity to try to find some new channels to dispose of these goods, at least part of them? We might find some people who would not impose such drastic conditions as England does in purchasing our manufactured products.

I was told the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) declared recently that England had permitted some Canadian manufacturers to resume their export to England on a proportion of twenty per cent of their pre-war trade. I am informed that this permit is extended not only to Canada but to all other countries of the world.

It is hard for me to believe that England is in such a really critical financial situation as we are given to understand. Here is a small article from London reproduced in the Montreal Daily Star of April 4:

> It is estimated that by Christmas Britain will have more people engaged in the home and export trade, and a higher total output of goods than ever before.
> Latest figures show there is an all-round labour force of about twenty million men and women. This includes nearly five million who have been switched from the fighting services and war production since June, 1945.
> Despite the rather dislocating changeover from war to peace unemployment has risen from 100,000 to only 300,000, less than two per cent of the total workers covered by the government compulsory insurance scheme.

It is claimed to be the lowest level of unemployment in any peace-time period since 1913.

Exports are being stimulated. Last June the number of people in export manufacturing industries was 408,000. This rose to 944,000 by January and now is estimated at more than 1,000,000—well ahead of the 830,000 workers in these industries in 1939.

Moreover exports have increased faster than had been anticipated and imports are falling.

From a value level of about £30,000,000 ($135,000,000) in November exports rose to £60,000,000 in February and preliminary calculations indicate they will be well above that figure for March.

Imports are going the other way. About £90,000,000 worth of goods were imported in November, but only £75,000,000 were imported in February. These include raw materials and food.

If we compare the unemployed people we have in this country with those in England, Great Britain is in a much better situation than we are.

Frankly I am inclined to think that England is taking advantage of our natural sympathy. During the war every country in the world admired the heroic resistance of the British. Canada was at the head of the parade. The billions that we have given to England are a living token of our national admiration and gratitude. I have a notion that England takes it for granted that Canada has unlimited resources which she is entitled to share with us.

At least if Great Britain was showing her appreciation in some way toward Canada, the gift of $425 millions might be easier to swallow. But when it comes to business transactions England is just as sharp with us as she would be with any other country, and when time to meet her obligation with Canada is matured she declares she cannot pay and the government seem to believe it.

I am led to believe that England will revive its former favourable trade with the outside world much quicker than we are given to understand, especially if I judge by the way she is managing her manufacturing facilities and handling her unemployment problem.

England was responsible to a certain extent for the enormous expansion of our manufacturing activities during the war. We cannot close these shops of ours and send the labour back on the farm. Great Britain seems to favour this idea in prohibiting or restricing our export of finished products and buying from us preferably what she cannot get elsewhere at the same price or cheaper.

I will use wheat as an example, which I understand we sell cheaper to England than she can buy United States wheat; bacon and cheese on which the government has to pay a subsidy to the producers in order that England may buy them. Have any hon. members known of any commodity on which England is paying, or has paid a bonus to her own producers in order to sell it to us at a more favourable price? On the contrary, how many articles imported by our large department stores command a higher ceiling than our own Canadian goods. Some goods produced in England have been subsidized by the Canadian government in order that we may buy them.

I think the time has come for us to face the situation and realize what we are up against. If we do not take any action, England will. Look at what she has done recently; she has reduced the income tax substantially; she has eliminated the excess profits tax. Why? To help her industry to compete more advantageously with the rest of the world, Canada included. If England were in such an acute financial situation do hon. members think she could afford to do this?

Here in Canada we are told that such a breathing spell cannot be enjoyed by our population. Well, if we cannot give our people the same privilege as England, we should not be asked to make gifts of this importance. Why not let England get back on its feet and then consider if such gifts cannot be refunded to us? Then it would be the proper time to consider this matter.

We must take it for granted once and for all that we are no longer dependent on England for our manufactured products. We are a competitor of England and we must therefore treat England exactly as she treats us or any other competing countries. It is late but not too late for the Canadian government to look for trade with other countries, to avoid being at the mercy of England forever, as we have been in the past.

The second reason given to me was to the effect that the loan must be made because we must help England to maintain its prestige and influence in the world. Again I must admit that this reason is worthy of serious consideration. I do not think any hon. member would like to see another country influence Europe to the detriment of England. On the other hand, if we must keep on making such large contributions to England as we have made in the last few years, just for the sake of maintaining her prestige, I imagine it will not be many years before Canada is bankrupt.

I understand I must vote in favour of the loan because I cannot take the responsibility of depriving our farmers of the opportunity to sell their product at decent prices, or of making the unemployment situation more acute than it is at the present time; but I hope I shall not be called upon to take this action again. I note that the government has lent money to different devastated foreign countries in order that they may buy the necessities of life in the Canadian market, and I congratulate them upon this effort. It is a constructive move to provide additional markets, and I hope no effort will be spared on the part of the government to continue this policy of attracting additional customers to Canada.

As for the citizens of Canada who are against the loan and who would use this argument for political purposes, I believe the times are too serious to adopt such an attitude. Rather I would ask these people to suggest practical means of coping with the situation. I am in favour of constructive criticism. No national problem has ever been solved by appealing to the passion of the masses through the medium of destructive criticism.

I imagine some people will not appreciate the ideas I have expressed, but I thought it my duty to submit these remarks for the consideration of the government. I would ask my colleagues to remember that it is a much easier job to watch the flock than to be watched by the flock. By this I mean that I could have let the resolution or motion go through without offering my ideas for the consideration of the people of Canada. But the very first act I was called upon to perform upon my entry to the House of Commons was to swear that I would be loyal and faithful to my country, so that I feel under obligation to join in the debate and express my thoughts, even though some people may not share my views. Even if I am wrong, I hope they will give me credit for being sincere. In other words, if I favour this loan it is because I think it is in the interests of Canada. Even if the failure of England were at stake I would try to help, but not at the expense of Canada. But if England fails and Canada has to follow the same course, then it becomes too serious to take any chance.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped there would be a degree of unanimity on this important bill. It did seem to me that those who are charged with the responsibility of viewing the important features of this loan must have given it a great deal of consideration; and for the psychological effect it would have seemed to be in order for us to accept the report of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and give this loan early approval, since indeed it will have much to do with our future prosperity.

The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Dionne) spoke of Britain driving a hard bargain. Well, there was a time when her bargaining powers were limited; but we who indeed were her debtors morally were willing to accept her decision in the greatest game ever played on an international scale, during the tragic war just concluded. So that for a few moments, if I may, I wish to direct your attention to Britain's position in the days before the war and trace something of the contribution and the tremendous sacrifices she made during that trying period. I do not intend to refer to her bravery or sacrifices on the field of battle, but rather to her economic sacrifices, to her position in world affairs which she was prepared to risk in order to stand forth as the stalwart defender of freedom and civilization.

Annually before the war Britain bought more goods of every kind than any other single country in the world. That is a fact which should not be lost sight of, inasmuch as it indicates the key position she occupied; and I believe world economists recognize to-day that unless she is able to regain some semblance of that position the recovery we are all so anxious to bring about may be hampered. Not only was Britain a large importer of goods; she was also a great exporter. One-fifth of the world's foreign commerce moved through Britain's ports. So that when we think of the position Britain occupied in trading with the whole world, we cannot avoid gaining some conception of how important it will be for us to seek to channel commerce and trade through the same ports which have served the world so well in the past.

What is the position to-day? What is known as the sterling bloc accounts for almost one-third of the world's trade. Britain now is indebted to this sterling bloc for goods received during the war to the extent of $14,000 million. If we try a squeeze play, if I might use that term, we may drive Britain to trade within this sterling bloc, to which she will be bound to export her goods in order to satisfy her creditors; and while this huge volume of trade is going on we in the dollar bloc will suffer most. As a matter of fact, in my opinion it would be nothing short of a tragedy were we to allow a competitive situation to develop between these two great trading blocs. The hon. gentleman who preceded me mentioned the hard bargain that Britain drove. Well, when it comes to surviving the bargain would be harder still, because Britain and the whole sterling bloc would be pitted against the dollar bloc and fighting for survival in the most tragic economic war one could possibly imagine.

During the war Britain cut her exports by more than sixty-six per cent, in her all-out effort to stem the tide. Her whole energy, every fibre and force of her being, was directed in one course. It was to bring about some degree of security to determine that an ideology which had no place among freedom loving people would not gain a dominant position in world affairs.

I come now to the purpose of this loan. As I understand it, this loan has a direct relationship to the loan now pending approval in the United States of America. The best authorities there indicate that the object is to stabilize currency. It is said that with this credit and the credit which will be passed by Washington there will exist a dollar exchange so that this country, whether trading in a sterling area or in a dollar area, will have funds which will be readily convertible into dollars or pounds sterling. It seems to me that this is a move in the right direction which we have sought to make for many long years.

Most people agree that there must be a lowering of tariff barriers, or trade barriers if you will. You are not going to accomplish your purpose if you set up a barrier more difficult to hurdle, a barrier of currency which cannot be exchanged into funds which are acceptable in our own country. I can visualize a tremendous volume of trade from this one and a quarter billion dollar loan which we would otherwise lose. I do not think there is any doubt about that in the minds of those who are present to-day.

We should not charge Britain with being a hard customer to deal with. I think we can adopt a rather selfish attitude with respect to this loan inasmuch as Canada will stand to benefit from it just as much if not more than Great Britain. As a matter of fact, without this loan our agricultural industry and hundreds of our workshops might have to shut down. If you can visualize the situation resulting from a condition of that nature then I think you will agree that the loan means as much to us as it does to Great Britain. When in the days of the war it was necessary to supply Britain with ammunition and implements of warfare, guns, ships and so on, we never hesitated. We furnished those things which were needed solely for destruction.

It has been said that probably Britain will turn around and lend money to other nations in Europe. I would have no objection to that. I do not think we should seek to follow through. If we supply goods to Britain and she in turn can pass them on to others who are in need, having arranged the necessary credits or exchange, that would seem to me to be good business. It would be setting up the scheme which we are seeking so hard to set up, world trade, trade throughout the civilized world.

When we read the press comments on the situation in Europe we realize that Europe is on the verge of starvation. Not many people in this country know what it means to be without food, without the necessary nourishment to keep body and soul together. Food is the one thing that probably will save Europe from anarchy or revolution. If the people there face starvation, if their calorific intake is not sufficient to maintain them, the result will be that disease will run rampant, tuberculosis and other tragedies will wait upon the human race.

If we are to bring about a better world it would seem that this will be achieved through the channels of trade. I have said before that we come to know better the people with whom we do business than we do strangers. This is our opportunity to play our part at an important moment in world history. I doubt if many of us realize just how serious the situation is. Without this loan and the loan now pending approval in the United States we do not know what forces will come into being, seeking in a competitive way, in a hard, cold, clear way, to gain dominance in world trade.

I recall Britain's position after the war. She found herself hopelessly indebted, both in the sterling bloc and in the dollar bloc. The dollar bloc countries have realized already the importance of maintaining Britain's trade position. I think it must be admitted that Britain is the one nation in the world which has been proved in the past to represent the frontier of democratic civilization. We must endeavour to protect our great ally who during the war years was willing to sacrifice all her foreign investments. No sacrifice was too great for her to make, and her foreign investments were sold in order to create credit with which she could purchase the necessary instruments and implements for war.

I hope we do not delay too long in coming to a decision, in making up our minds that this is possibly one of the most important bills to come before the House of Commons. It is our opportunity to indicate, not in a begrudging way but in a wholesome, encouraging way that we still believe in Britain, that we believe she is good credit, that we believe she is the world's best customer, carrying on trade, as she does, with so many other countries.

I leave my hon. friends who will follow me with this thought: This is our opportunity to endorse what has been said by others who have viewed critically the precise position of Great Britain and who believe that this is necessary for her survival. Without her survival there will be nothing but chaos. The result of that will be that we in Canada will suffer hardships which we do not anticipate at the present time. Together with Britain and the United States we can march forward and bring about that world of to-morrow which has been held up to those who have fought so hard for existence. I am sure the result will justify the action we take at this time.

Mr. H. R. ARGUE (Wood Mountain): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to the principle of this bill I think I shall take my cue from the last member who spoke and make my remarks brief so that we can expedite the business of the house. I expected that this debate would take two or three weeks, but I heard over the grapevine that it would be wound up before the recess at Easter. For that reason I have to get in on the debate quite early.

The bill we have before us contains more than one principle. One principle is that a large sum of money owed by Great Britain to Canada shall be cancelled. Some hon. members have referred to that as a gift. To me a gift is something that we give now or in the future, whereas this is a debt that was incurred in the past and we are now cancelling it. I am glad that we are cancelling it.

However, when I think of the amount of this cancellation that we are making to the people of Great Britain I also think of some of the debts and hardships facing certain people of Canada. I have in mind our old age pensioners. It would be a fine gesture on our part if we could see to it that the caveats are removed from the homes and properties of people who receive old age pensions. There are people in Canada, home owners and farmers, who have secured debts against their properties. Some of those debts have been attached to those properties for twenty or thirty years, and I think this government would be supported in any measure they would bring forward, to cancel those particular debts, and as well the $17,000,000 odd which the soldier settlers of the first great war owe under the Soldier Settlement Act. At this time when we are cancelling $425,000,000 of a debt that is owed to us by Great Britain this government should certainly be able to cancel the $17,000,000 that is owed by the soldier settlers.

Another principle in this bill is that for a number of years the loan shall be interest-free, and after that the rate of interest shall be low. That, too, I think is a very good principle. It is a principle that we have seen developing in Canada over the past twenty years. The government bonds floated in the first great war paid five per cent interest. Most of the bonds floated by the government in this war paid three per cent interest. The banks used to charge eight and nine per cent interest on loans; they now charge six per cent. I think that is a good thing. I am opposed to interest at any time on anything beyond the amount of interest that is necessary to cover the charges of making the transaction and carrying the debt. It was a revelation in irony to see on the same order paper on which the resolution appeared for cancelling the debt to Great Britain another resolution reducing the rate of interest which the soldier settlers of the first great war have to pay on their debt to three and a half per cent. We are at this time making a loan to Britain that will carry two per cent interest. Yet at the same time we are asking that the Canadian veterans of the first great war pay three and a half per cent interest, or 150 per cent more interest than we are asking the people of Great Britain to pay. Surely we do not love the people of Great Britain more than we love our own veterans. I suggest that the veterans of both wars be given interest rates not greater in any event than two per cent. I think also that the interest rate charged by the farm loan board might be reduced from five to two per cent and that bank loan interest should be reduced to two per cent. We should take our action on this loan to Great Britain as a criterion of the amount of interest that shall be charged on loans to Canadians. I am opposed to Canadian workers, farmers and small business men paying more than two per cent interest on any type of debt.

We, in this group should examine this proposition, if possible from the point of view of orthodox financial policy. I regret very much that I have not with me a statement to which I can refer closely as did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in the address that he delivered yeserday, and I shall have to attempt to get along by referring to a few heads.

In the past the people of Canada believed and to-day they are being told by people in many quarters that for Canada to prosper we must have large amounts of exports; more than that, that we must have an excess of exports over imports, and to the extent that we have that excess of export over imports we shall have prosperity at home. The argument is a fallacy, but in some ways it worked pretty well in practice under the present economic set-up. If we have an excess of exports over imports the Canadian producers of those exports are not getting pound sterling or United States dollars for what they produce, but are getting Canadian dollars and deposits in Canadian banks, and because they have those deposits they are able to purchase the things they need. If we are to follow the argument, which I do not agree with, that prosperity in Canada depends on a large export trade over our imports, the government would have been wise in the interests of this system to make this whole loan a gift, because then they would not have to be faced, as they surely will be faced, with the difficulty of having imports come to Canada in large quantities to pay for the loan.

I believe that Britain will pay back or will be prepared to pay back the amount of this loan. We shall be making from now until 1951 a loan to Great Britain of $1,250,000,000, which is a capital export. After 1951 Great Britain will start to pay back that loan and then there will be an import of capital into Canada, which will accompany the import of goods.

From 1919 to 1928 Canada on the average exported annually capital amounts of from $500,000,000 to $700,000,000 and we had prosperity. We were exporting more than we were importing. We were exporting goods much of which no doubt we could have consumed, but we had prosperity. The years 1929, 1930 and 1931 saw capital exports and capital imports almost balance, and then we had a severe depression on our hands. If, when Great Britain is paying back this loan, we are not able to find other investments for Canadian money, we shall not have a large export of capital and we shall again, I am certain, be faced with a depression.

This loan is different from other investments in that it is made to a government. I believe that the day is past when financial interests in Canada or the United States could invest their money in the natural resources of any country to exploit the people of that country, and the government of every nation in the world is going to watch very carefully in future the amount of foreign capital that is being sent into the country. So that if we want to export our capital we shall have to do so through government bodies. I do not think governments of other nations will be prepared after a few years to accept our capital exports, and I do not think the people of Canada will be prepared to give them. Therefore, if we are to accept payment for this loan we shall have to import more goods than we are exporting. If we attempt to import more goods than we export I can foresee that a great howl will be set up in Canada by all the financial interests, monopolies and cartels, and they no doubt will have an even greater effect in the future than they have had in the past in influencing the budget such as was brought before the house at the last session. If the financial interests are successful in preventing from coming into Canada the imports that are necessary to pay for the British loan—and judging from experience I think under our present system they will be successful—Great Britain will face an adverse balance of payments. Britain, facing an adverse balance of payments, will find the shortage of United States dollars and Canadian dollars very difficult. She will try to increase her exports by any means possible, and there will be a long time of disequilibrium in the balance of payments.

In order to increase her exports Britain will be forced to depreciate her currency. This depreciation will encourage British exports to Canada; it will at the same time discourage Canadian exports to Britain. We saw in September, 1931, the conditions which faced Canada that year, and they faced her also the next year, after Great Britain had devaluated her currency. We saw that the products of Canada, sent to the markets of Great Britain and turned into pounds, brought fewer Canadian dollars to the producers of those products. In November, 1932, we saw the price of wheat on the Winnipeg grain exchange hit an all-time low of forty cents a bushel, basis No. 1 northern, Fort William, and the depression was certainly on. We saw few jobs in Canada. There was no effective demand for goods. Canadian boys by the thousand rode the rods. If we are not to have those conditions return we must take full cognizance of the situation which will face us after 1951. There is only one way whereby we can accept more British imports, and that is by having full employment in Canada, having everybody here who is willing and able to work, working and obtaining a decent wage or salary. They will then have the money to buy from Great Britain the imports which will add materially to the welfare of all our people.

There is another thing we shall be forced to do. I believe that never again in the future should the people of Canada acquiesce in the idea that the price they obtain for their products in Canadian dollars shall be governed entirely by the price paid for those products on the world market. Canadian farmers at this time need, shall we say, $1.55 a bushel for their wheat. At this time there is no real relation between any so-called world market price and the price the farmers receive for their products. But our farmers are enjoying more prosperity than they did in 1932 when their prices were hooked up with world prices. The price the farmer receives for his products should be such that out of an economy of full employment in Canada he shall receive his fair share of the national income; the same with the worker; the same with all classes of people. Surely never again do we want to hook our whole economy to a fluctuating world market price. If anything important is going on in the world to-day in the changes which all governments are making in their outlook respecting the industrial and financial life of their nations, it is that almost everywhere governments are deciding that they must have complete ownership and control of the banking system. If we are to have the full production and full employment which will be necessary to permit Canadians to use the goods which Britain will have to export, we must of necessity socialize the banks so that the government will have available to them at the cost of banking, which is very little, the Canadian dollars that are necessary to pay to the people of Canada as a reward for their labour.

I believe this measure which is before the house will serve a useful purpose to all the people of Canada. We see the government at this time cancelling a $425 million debt of Great Britain, at the same time that we are lending to Great Britain on favourable terms $1,250 million. Surely we shall never again hear in this house what a minister told us the other day, in talking about payments for social security for people who are unable to earn their living, that $100 million is a very large amount. Surely, if we can get $1,250 million to loan to Great Britain we can get $100 million to provide security to these people in Canada who through no fault of their own are disabled and cannot obtain jobs. Surely we shall not again have an answer from the government—or a talking out of a motion, which is even worse—that there is not available $100 million for irrigation in all of the area of western Canada. If the government intends to make the present system work at all, this loan makes it more imperative than ever that we shall have full production, full employment, adequate social security; and these measures, I submit, can be brought about only by socializing the banks, whereby we can make the currency available which is necessary to run the economy of Canada as it is best suited to the needs of the people of Canada.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Speaking upon this bill, I wish to say in the first place that I regard the credit of $1,250 million to Britain simply as an assurance of employment in this country. It is neither more nor less than that. Without extending the credit we shall be poor, because our people will not be employed; if we extend the credit the reverse can be true.

Reference has been made in the debate, both on the resolution and on this motion for second reading, to what has been called good commercial practice. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) spoke of the need a merchant sometimes found of extending credit in his own interest. In respect of this credit I think we can very well liken ourselves to a man of business who has had customers over a number of years who gave him a great deal of business, well-to-do customers who made up about forty per cent of his business, and then these customers became temporarily embarrassed and could not deal with him any longer on a cash basis. Faced with that prospect, any merchant if he were wise would know what to answer. He would certainly say to such customers that they could continue to obtain their needs from him without cash. He would know that if he could hold the business by granting credit he could carry on as before; he could keep his employees employed as before; he could, as they say, maintain his organization, and perhaps he could even expand it. Eventually he would be repaid in full; and altogether he could regard the situation as one which held for him a good future. Incidentally—but only incidentally in the business view—he would be helping toward a less austere life the people who had been his good customers.

That is exactly our position at the present time; at least it is as near to an exact comparison as we can get in likening an individual's business to a nation's business. Such a comparison can never be quite exact, but I believe it is close enough in this case for us to begin to see clearly the nature of this proposition.

I wish to comment further on the employment and unemployment features which present themselves to me in the consideration of this bill; but before I do so I should like to deal with some of the criticisms that have been made. I noted the objections of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). He thinks this loan is for the grandeur and prestige of England. He looks on it as a prop for the central structure of an empire. This, to him, seems to be colonialism. I regard his approach as a grave mistake. The motives underlying the loan are purely economic and purely Canadian. I am not denying that there is altruism in the country, but the compelling motives are economic and Canadian.

What strikes me in listening to charges of subservience to England is that these excessive warnings tend to become ludicrous. I believe if that sort of thing is continued, then, when some real danger does arise, of a kind about which the hon. gentleman, as an elder statesman, might wish to warn us, his vibrant voice will be without authority at all owing to the fact that he has continually and for a long time been trying to make our flesh creep with scare talk about a bogey-man that does not really exist.

As a matter of fact, it seems to me that if we had been warned about being imperialistic it would have been better.

I have always understood that the imperialist lent money in order to bring a nation into thraldom or to keep it in thraldom. Here, we are the lender; not the borrower. It is the borrower that becomes a colonial. If he had warned us against striving to become imperialists by this measure the warning might have been more apt. He ought to warn England, as being in great danger, according to the doctrine usually put forth, of becoming a mere colonial spot in an empire of which this nation is to be the centre. That is the sort of warning that would have been more logical.

I wish to deal also with criticisms of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Just as I have great respect and, indeed, affection for the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères and would be sorry to make him angry with me over any criticism that I might offer of his remarks, so, too, I think the friendliness, the wit and the good humour of the hon. member for Temiscouata are an asset to this chamber. It would be regrettable if we did not long enjoy those attributes. But such feelings are not a sufficient reason for refraining from a critical analysis of the proposals that he puts forward in connection with this bill.

Mr. POULIOT: That is what I am asking for.

Mr. MAYBANK: Very good, and that is what the hon. member is getting. Certainly I am sharply critical over the idea of endeavouring to acquire colonies such as Jamaica and Bermuda—

Mr. POULIOT: And the United Kingdom.

Mr. MAYBANK: —yes, and the United Kingdom, in return for any loan we may make. After all, what benefit would it be if some piece of territory could be granted to Canada in return for this loan? We could not exchange a slice of those islands for employment in this country. There would not be any person in Rivière du Loup who would be employed by reason of our owning Jamaica. You would not even get your rum any cheaper there when you were unemployed.

Something else occurs to me when I think about that. We have gone through this war the one nation in the world of which there was no criticism or suspicion of any sort—never any fear that we were trying to get any advantage. Other nations also may have had no ulterior designs, but there was probably no nation except Canada respecting which there was not suspicion. It was believed by some nations that England wanted eventually to get certain additional territory. Such was the belief in some quarters about the United States, about Australia, and of course, about Russia. Canada alone among all the nations was never criticized or under suspicion in that respect. We alone were accorded the unique motive of desiring only to win the war against diabolical doctrines about which we all know so much by now. It is the hon. member for Temiscouata who is the first to suggest that we should change, and that we should get "on the make". I prefer the reputation we have had, and would not trade it for any new territory that might be granted in return for any of our loans. Our reputation is far superior to any material gain that we can get.

I should like to say a few words more about this "colonialism" charge, and I do not now refer particularly to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères or to the hon. member for Temiscouata. But there do come from time to time innuendoes and hints, charges and statements from some hon. members that a great number of us who do not live in the lower province are not Canadians. We hear it every once in a while, or we hear suggestions of it.

Of course I realize how false the charge is. Speaking as I do with other Canadians across the country and with their representatives in this House of Commons, I see how wrong it is. I know that, so far as I am concerned, I am never moved by any considerations that are not purely Canadian. Although I see the incongruity of the charge, it does appear that some people are of the opinion that we who have not that great advantage of the two languages are not Canadians, that we look at all propositions first with the eyes of English and, second, with the eyes of Canadians. I tell the house, frankly, I get very tired of what it seems to me is a sort of frenzy of Canadianism. I think some of those hon. gentlemen who put forth that sort of criticism are sometimes very much like the Pharisee who spent a great deal of his time in thanking God that he was not as other men. I remember hearing of a man of whom it was said that he used to go to the rain barrel and yell down into it, declaring his own virtues in order that they might be sounded back by echo into his ears; and to him this was as music. Such is the attitude of some of those who would charge others with being non-Canadian. They smite their breasts extolling their own Canadianism. I submit to you, sir, it is about time that sort of thing stopped. We are all Canadians.

People will approach an economic question of this sort from different directions. Some will be more moved than others over the benefit that may be gained by some place remote from their own country, not because they love their own country less, but because they think that from the point of view of their own country that gain which would help another country will be best in the long run for their own. I have no hesitation in saying that it has always been my view that the best way to help your own country is to help another country. I do not believe there is any doctrine as good in an economic sense as the golden rule. It is a fine rule ethically; but speaking quite coldly, it is a good rule in economics too. We shall do well, whenever we can to help another nation, because we have to deal with other nations. If we deal with them in the strength of economic health we can get the benefit of that health. If they are not in economic health we get the dis-benefit of their unhealthy condition. If I view the problem in this way that is not to say that I do not view it as a Canadian; it is not to be said that I view it as an Englander, or as a foreigner. Mine is a Canadian approach.

I sometimes think people who are inclined to make charges of un-Canadianism or less than 100 per cent Canadianism against some other people are really troubled by an inferiority complex which is unworthy of them. Sometimes it is called a persecution complex. If they have not such a complex there is danger of their being thought to be thus afflicted. One does not have to go around hunting Englishmen to spit in their faces in order to be a 100 per cent Canadian. That is not necessary at all. I am not denying that there may be a few people in the country who do not always view matters from a Canadian angle. There probably are some who still have a colonial mind but they are very few in number by now.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MAYBANK: There are a few, but they are hardly worth noticing. One should not even waste the wind that is necessary to say, "Hear, hear", over such people. For example, with respect to any virtue that a person may have, or with respect to any belief that he may have, it is not necessary to be blatant about it. One does not have to be blatant in order to be well-founded in his beliefs. In order to be sure of maintaining one's virtue one does not have to beat his breast about it all the time, and everlastingly point the accusing finger at someone else. It is an entire misconception of virtue in one who feels it necessary to act in that way.

So far as these few colonial people whom I have mentioned are concerned they are really a pathetic people. One should not upbraid them; one should not condemn them or abuse them in any way. They are negligible; they are sick. They are to be pitied; but no person from any part of Canada has any right to judge the generality of English-speaking Canadians by this handful. No person has any right to do that at all.

This credit to Britain is simply for our own welfare and that is the way we ought to look at it. If we extend it we sell goods. If we do not extend it we do not sell goods. Selling goods means selling our work products. If we do not sell goods, we do not sell our work products and that means unemployment. This is a premium on a policy of insurance against unemployment. As a result of this loan we know Britain will spend a certain amount of money in a year. We can take any figure that we like for purposes of illustration. We can think of Britain spending $500 million in a year. That will do for illustration purposes at this moment, although it is quite probable that the purchases will be greater than that. How many hours of labour that will purchase it is hard to say. If the average rate for labour were fixed at $1 an hour it would mean 500 million hours of labour. It might be fair to say that the expenditure would give half a billion hours of work, because we can think of the rate as being fifty cents an hour. However, we have to remember that some of the labour that is bought has already been expended, and is in our country at the present time in the form of machines and other kinds of works. Anybody pursuing the idea of the value of British purchases upon Canadian employment can get much statistical data of interest. Statistical stories over the years tell us that whenever we have had a high level of employment it immediately followed a high level of export trade. Conversely, whenever we had a low level of employment it was consequent on a low level of export trade. For example, we reached the peak of our export volume pre-war in 1928. It was followed in 1929 by the highest level of employment and the highest level of income. Again in 1932 we had the lowest level of export trade, and it was followed in 1933 by the lowest level of employment and income.

Our export trade is largely British. Our net exports to Britain have been greatest by far in the ten years before the war. We sold to her in that period $1,647 million worth of goods more than we bought. That was the net. Incidentally our dealings with the United States were just the opposite, because we bought a billion dollars worth more than we sold. The excess of exports to the United Kingdom were increasing just before the war. The average in ten pre-war years was $164 million of a net; but in the later years it was averaging $240 million.

The question we have to ask ourselves as Canadians is, do we want the employment that comes from that sort of business? If we do not want that kind of employment, then we should not extend the credit. If we do want that kind of employment we should follow the policy of the sensible merchant, to whom I referred a little while ago and extend the credit.

Let us consider for a moment what happens if $1,000,000 is spent on lumber products, for instance. Let us take as a unit of measurement 1,000 board feet of lumber. In my hand I have a graph which shows the amount of labour involved in the various products coming from a log containing that amount of lumber. Apparently the log itself represents one man's work for one day. In sulphite pulp it represents three days' work or, if it is exported, the measure becomes four days' work. If it is in newsprint it represents three days of labour, but if it is exported that figure becomes four days. If it is in bags or cartons the number shown here is nine days; if those products are exported, it becomes eleven days. So that one can follow upon this graph all the products that may result from the cutting down of a tree in the forest. From this we can get some idea of the exact results from the expenditure of $1,000,000 on lumber. That would represent approximately one million hours. In a 300-day year at eight hours a day a man would work 2,400 hours, so that it would take him 417 years to work enough hours at $1 an hour to use up that $1,000,000 or the same as 417 men for one year.

One can look at the industrial picture in this way, not only with respect to lumbering but with respect to every other industry. We might consider the result of spending such a sum of money in some of our mines, perhaps our copper mines. We might estimate the number of hours that would be required for the extraction and exportation of the copper which would be represented by the expenditure of $1,000,000. Of course, it is not only copper or lumber products that are to be bought; in all probability Britain will buy with these moneys the same sort of things she has bought in the past, when her purchases were very much diversified, and $1,000,000 is only a fraction of what will be spent.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MAYBANK: Mr. Speaker, before the house rose at six o'clock I was giving some figures based upon a certain assumption as to the probable employment given by the expenditure of moneys from this loan by Great Britain in Canada. Varying the assumption somewhat, I have attempted to arrive in another way at an approximation of the employment content of these expenditures, assuming that half the proceeds of the loan will be spent in the purchase of non-agricultural products and not considering the length of time in which those purchases will occur.

In 1944 our national production excluding agriculture and excluding payments to the armed services, was registered at $9,110 million. That production was the result of the work of 3,280,000 people. It will be found that that represents an output of $2,770 per person. If we apply that factor to the expenditure of $625 million, one-half the loan, on non-agricultural goods we find that employment will be given to 200,000 persons for a full year.

As every person must realize, this employment will affect a great variety of people in all walks of life, the lumberjack in British Columbia, the miner in Quebec, the factory worker in Ontario, the dock worker in the maritimes, the manufacturer in Toronto and the wholesaler in Montreal. On the basis of four persons to a family, these expenditures will provide a livelihood for 800,000 people in this country for a full year.

I have said that this might very well be regarded as insurance against unemployment. Conversely, I could have said equally well that it is a subsidy for employment. It is a better sort of subsidy for employment than the subsidies for public works of which we sometimes hear. I am not decrying subsidies for public works when the need arises for them. I hope that never again will relief be necessary, but if it is I hope it will never be given except as payment for work. Public works are necessary at certain times, but a subsidy of this sort is of much greater value in the creation of employment. This sort of expenditure means a diversification of the types of work created. Public works cannot employ such a wide variety of people as this type of expenditure. I think I can say with confidence that this sort of subsidy is the best subsidy we could have.

When an international loan is viewed in the way of creation of hours of employment I think we are justified in using an expression such as I have used, that it is a subsidy for employment or insurance against unemployment. Whether such expressions are apt or not, surely it is clear that such a loan is based firmly upon considerations of Canadian welfare. Some people may look upon this as aid to Britain. They have slight justification for taking that view.

It is certainly not a benevolence. We may not preen ourselves upon any altruism in the making of this loan. One may be tempted to say that it is just hard-boiled business, although I do not like the use of the expression "hard-boiled" with reference to it. We are not taking advantage of anybody. Undoubtedly the loan will be a great help to Britain, undoubtedly she is desperately in need of it and she wants it badly. We can be very glad that it will be of help. Just the same it does not seem to me that altruism alone is sufficient ground for the Canadian parliament making this loan. If it were not in our own interests I do not think it would be possible for it to be made.

But I want to interject and say that I like to think of our actions as having some element of altruism and a consideration of other people's welfare in them, as well as a marked consideration of business principles. I said somewhat earlier that the doctrine of the golden rule not only is sound ethically, but is good economics as well. I cannot help being reminded that the whole cost of a war is not paid during the years of a war—the costs go on. During the last war I think we gave to the utmost of our capacity, or at least we approached the limit of our capacity to give. But unlike other nations, we do not have to pay a great cost of the war at the conclusion of the war. We are not paying like Great Britain is paying. The cost of a war is to be seen in the condition in which a country is left after the war. Unquestionably Britain has been left much poorer in 1946 than she was in 1939, but we cannot say that about ourselves. We are not poorer to-day than we were in 1939; we are better off.

Forgetting for a moment ordinary business principles, it does seem to me that one might with justice favour this loan merely on the ground of fair play in order that we may continue to bear our own costs of the war. There are countries in the world to which we are indebted in a way that we can never repay. We are bound to think of the disaster that would have fallen upon us had Britain succumbed, a disaster from which none of us and none of our children would ever have recovered. We cannot say quite the same about certain other nations, but we are indebted to other nations such as, for example, Greece. I do not wish to make comparisons or to compile a list of those countries to which we are indebted, but there are many countries to which we owe much for the way in which they fought to avert the fate which would otherwise have overtaken the world. It is but fair when considering a measure of this sort to remember that these people are still paying the cost of the war, Great Britain probably in greater measure than any other, and they are all much worse off than they were in 1939. We are not in that position; we are better off. Therefore, while we should look at this loan as a business proposition, we should not overlook these other factors.

Not only is this loan in our own interests as a subsidy to employment; but we should remember that finally it will be paid not by us, but by Britain, so that the end result will be the subsidizing of employment in this country, not by Canadian dollars, for the subsidy will eventually be paid in pounds, shillings and pence.

There is one other thought which gives me a good deal of pleasure, and I wonder if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) may think it is a malicious pleasure. At any rate, may I say that Britain's manner of paying back this loan will be by supplying us with goods. That is the only way in which she can pay it back over the next fifty odd years. She will send us goods and some part of the price of those goods will go into her repayment fund. We have always maintained tariffs and other restrictions against British goods and, generally, they were too high. To permit her to pay us back in goods we cannot allow these impediments to continue. We shall have to make it possible for Britain to repay the loan, and so it comes about that all the sound arguments of the past against trade impediments get a strong reinforcement in the fact that we have to allow Britain to repay her debt to us. The logic of our trade position, and the logic of our position as a creditor nation now combine to make British importations easier. This is an aspect of the matter that we should not overlook. It is an aspect of the matter that, as I say, is pleasing to me, because I have always been a rebel against restrictions of the sort I have mentioned, and maybe if I live long enough the day will come, as it does with lots of rebels, when they are not called rebels any longer but patriots; for, as hon. members know, when the battle is won a rebel is always a patriot. Such may be the attitude some day toward those of us who have constantly fought against trade impediments. It may come about that all others some day will have the same point of view and that these impediments will in large measure be wiped out in order that we may get our due in the way of interest and principal in the repayment of this loan.

Mr. WILLIAM BRYCE (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill because I have seen the people who are going to get this money. I cannot discuss this loan in the same manner as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) or the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) because I have not had the financial training to be able to do so. But looking at this loan from the point of view of an ordinary layman, if it will create work and wages in a country where there are so many idle people, I say that that is one good reason why we should support it.

During the last two debates in this house we have heard a lot of people talking about Canadians and Canadianism. I came here twenty-eight years ago and have tried to be a good Canadian ever since I came here. But still everybody says I am a Scotsman. That may be so. But do not ever think I am not a Canadian. I am a Canadian, and I want to be a good Canadian. I may be right down at the foot of the ladder, but I am going to be the best Canadian that ever was. We talk about building a better world. Well, here is our golden opportunity to show that we really mean what we say, by helping our fellow men and our sister women in those lands across the sea which have suffered so much that we might continue to live in a democracy. I was over there; I have seen the conditions, and they have taken an awful trimming. I am sorry that some ministers on the other side of the house have not taken the time to tell this parliament of the actual conditions over there. Anything we can do for the French or the English or the Scotch people over there will not be nearly enough.

Mr. GRANT: What about the Irish?

Mr. BRYCE: They can generally look after themselves. I did not rise to take up time but simply to make this earnest appeal to hon. members of this house on behalf of those countries and those men and women who fought that we might live here. They did a great job. Their factories have been destroyed; their houses have been destroyed; their flesh and blood have been destroyed, and yet we grudge giving them this money! What is money compared with life? Look at what they have suffered for us. I support this bill wholeheartedly, and I hope that every man in this house will support it wholeheartedly because this loan is really needed over there.

(Translation):

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time that I rise to take part in a discussion in connection with a gift or a loan of a billion dollars to England. Unlike the two hon. members who have just spoken, I have no intention to make a dissertation on Canadianism. I prefer to give expression to my Canadianism through action rather than words. It is based on my confidence in my country's potentialities in natural, human and intellectual resources. Every time I had an opportunity to express it, I did it, as often as possible, through action. Experience has shown that deeds are much more valuable than words.

As I lay no claim on being a financial expert, I intend, after frankly stating what I believe to be perhaps elementary truths, and I shall nevertheless state them, to stand on a very special ground in order to justify the attitude I am now taking. I consider this matter of a billion dollars loan to England from a point of view probably altogether different from the standpoint of the hon. members who spoke before me. I must first state that although I have unlimited faith in the human and intellectual resources of my country, I believe we must be guided by this principle, which is very dear to me as well as to a large number of Canadians. "Charity begins at home." When I say Canadians, I mean members of every racial group in Canada and not only French or English Canadians. When I use that expression, I mean all those who believe that Canada may one day become a sovereign state, enjoying complete autonomy; a really sovereign state, not autonomy on paper only, but one that has proven by the achievements of its public men, that even if our country is not entirely self-sufficient—since absolute national self-sufficiency is unattainable, as proven by the collapse of Hitler's regime—that it is absolutely free to act as it pleases in all internal administrative matters. I cannot venture to say as much in relation to trading with other nations, whatever they may be, for, as I said before, absolute national self-sufficiency is unattainable and no nation can be sufficient unto itself.

To-night I shall discharge a responsibility which I have been forced to assume on another occasion, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will not call me to order even if I spend a few minutes in recalling a rather stormy period which, however, has now spent itself. I wish to revert, to-night, to a day in 1940 when, in this house, we were discussing a measure known as the National Resources Mobilization Act. On that occasion, I very naively requested the house to grant me twenty-four hours for the purpose of consulting a few leaders in my constituency so as to be in a position to give an opinion on a matter which had not come up during the election campaign that had just ended. I would not go so far as to say that my request was considered ridiculous, but, nevertheless, I have noticed that many hon. members were then smiling—

Mr. POULIOT: It was a smile of approbation.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Not altogether. In some cases, yes; in others, it was a condescending smile. I remember that, the day after, I had to assume my own responsibilities. I also recall that, a few days ago, when we were discussing changing the name of Dominion day to that of Canada day, a delay was asked. Public opinion had to be canvassed to a certain extent. I was not of that opinion because I had not forgotten that, on a similar occasion, I had to discharge my own responsibilities, and, of course, I have been elected to this house for that very purpose.

I would not say that experience incites me to take a positive stand on the question of the billion dollar loan. No; my attitude is due to the fact that, after the general election of June, 1945, I came here with a very clear mandate. After having spent two years in the opposition, I returned to the Liberal fold at the request of my electors, but only after I had made my position clear. "You ask me, in this campaign, to support the present leader of the Liberal party," I told them, "and your wish will be much more explicit if you give me a clear majority over all my opponents." They gave me a clear majority over the other two candidates, and therefore, I am here to support the leader of the Liberal party and his policy. However, on nomination day, I had also stated: "Since it is your wish, I shall go to Ottawa to support the leader of the Liberal party, but I intend to keep on defending the ideas which I have heretofore upheld and which I shall uphold for a long time to come, while attempting to have them accepted by the organized party." To-night again I speak in order to fulfil once more the pledge I have given the electors of Portneuf. Just the same, I shall not resume my seat without having stated some of the truths to which I referred in my opening remarks.

We are asked to grant a loan of $1,250,000,000 at a very low rate of interest; in fact, too low to suit me. If Canada is to act as a prop not only for the United Kingdom, but for the British empire, it should be allowed some guarantees, as follows: It should be able to count on trade relations, based on fairness and cooperation; it must count on trade with the United Kingdom and the rest of the empire, trade relations that are frank and straightforward. Now let me at once give my reasons for that statement. One day, while looking over the report of a British empire exhibition, I noted that Canada had entered some samples of very fine honey, the world's best no doubt, which however had been labelled "a British empire product" instead of "Canadian honey." Moreover, while chatting recently with a returned man, I was told that he had always had much trouble in finding the Canadian brand, that is the Canadian "stamp" on goods sent abroad from this country during the war. While I am prepared to support this bill, I want to make it plain to the United Kingdom that we shall expect a fair and open-handed treatment; that when our goods are sent over with the label "Canada," they shall still carry that label overseas. We don't want those goods to be re-exported to other countries under any other name, whether they be branded "products of the empire" or otherwise, as we feel entitled to ask whomever we are helping to grant us the cooperation that is our due.

I now repeat what I have previously said in this house, Mr. Speaker, about imperialism, that without the empire, the United Kingdom cannot survive. It is a fact, on account of the many raw materials which the United Kingdom must seek in Canada. It is a point on which I lay special stress inasmuch as we have been shown that in making this billion and a quarter available to Great Britain, she will be in a position, with Canadian dollars, to purchase our raw materials and to manufacture chiefly in order to rebuild the United Kingdom trade throughout the world.

I am not afraid of using blunt words, and I purposely say "to rebuild the United Kingdom's trade throughout the world". I know by experience that products from the United Kingdom are now on our market while our own supply of some goods is still so short that they cannot be put on the market, biscuits, for instance.

Mr. POULIOT: You could mention scones as an example.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said that I would discuss this matter from a different angle, not because I fear to deal with it from a financial standpoint, although I do not believe I am qualified to discuss this question from a strictly financial angle. Some have said in this house that the British empire had to be maintained at this time. Such a statement has come not only from members who endorse the loan to England but also from others who oppose it to a certain extent. I think they are right, in view of the international situation in Europe today; England, Ireland, Portugal and Spain stand against Russian imperialism. There is a strong communist element in France. Besides, Hungary, Bulgaria, Roumania, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia and the part of Germany that is occupied by the Russians have groups that are considerable and quite strong from the standpoint of communism.

You would say, no doubt, at least some would, that going into this aspect of the question is dangerous. I do not think so. Following the close of the war, we have witnessed the rise of a third imperialistic set-up, possibly more powerful than the other two; in other words, Russian or, I would rather say, Slav imperialism, induces us, at a great cost, to contribute to the maintenance of the British empire, at the present time. I claim that were the British empire to fall, were the nations of the commonwealth to go their separate ways, the American empire would be left alone to face this European and more particularly Asiatic power. I do not think we have the right to run the risk of giving these two empires the opportunity of coming to grips, first in the economic field and eventually in the military field. It behooves us rather to assume our respective responsibilities and endeavour to stabilize the international situation.

I have often given proofs, Mr. Speaker, that I am not an imperialist and that I will never be; I have also demonstrated that I do not flinch at stating hard truths. That is what I have done to-night; I again give expression to my opposition to any tendency originating in Canada, no matter what racial group may be its promoters, to allow the interests of an empire, British or other, to supersede purely Canadian interests.

It is all very well to state that imperialism exists only since the last war, that the British empire might be threatened and that its destruction might be detrimental to the American empire, but we require some proof that will bring out the mentality of those whose extraordinary power is alarming not only for the Anglo-Saxon coalition, as it has been called, but also for the Latin countries.

I shall quote from a book by Henri Massis, a member of the French Academy, to show, Mr. Speaker, that the Slavonic empire is no myth and that it has been wielding its power for quite a long time. Listen to what Lenin had to say:

> It is but a matter of expediency, said Lenin, a few months before the October revolution. I am a pacifist if I can thus injure the capitalist states.

We are the capitalists.

> But if I should come to power in Russia, then I shall be anything but a pacifist. Under a bolshevist regime, we, as Russian patriots, will not hesitate to take up arms against our neighbours should it be necessary in the interest of our country and the revolution! Let us not forget that war is queen of the universe.

Listen now to another communist, Tiochev, who proferred the following words when speaking of the philosophical and historical antagonism between Russia and Europe, I quote:

> Between her and ourselves there can be no negotiations, no armistice. The life of one is the death of the other.

That is clear. Let us listen now to another bolshevist theorist, Zinoviev, whom I have already quoted in this house. Speaking at the Baku Congress in 1920, he said:

> Russia extends her hand to Asia not because she adopts her ideals, not because she shares her social ideas, but because she needs the eight hundred million people of Asia to crush European imperialism and capitalism.

And Lenin had said before him:

> Let us turn towards Asia, we shall vanquish the West with the help of the East.

American experts who went to Russia admitted that the productive capacity of the U.S.S.R. already greatly exceeded that of the best equipped countries of Europe, and that Russia's iron, manganese and even oil production was equal to that of the largest producers of the whole world.

Now let us listen to another bolshevist theorist, Dostoevski, who said:

> Russia's destiny is pan-European. To be real Russians we must stand upon the meeting grounds of all the European enmities.

And Soloviev added:

> Our intellectual and civilizing forces leave much to be desired, whereas our political strength is quite definite, absolutely firm and tremendous.

Let us heed this, Mr. Speaker. This is exactly what has just taken place in Iran.

They had foreseen this move, they had prepared for it. It was their normal march towards the conquest of Asia and Europe.

I quote:

We must destroy Turkey, crush Austria, overwhelm Germany, take Constantinople and, if possible, India.

Imperialism is the thing we have to overcome. In taking my stand to-night in favour of a billion and a quarter loan to Great Britain, I take the view that we cannot afford to risk leaving American imperialism alone to face slavonic imperialism. In 1930, the French ambassador, speaking in Moscow, was saying:

As at the time of religious wars, it is a propaganda which challenges reason and which, from this very fact, derives its variety and its strength.

And he gave instances. Again I quote:

In Germany, it speculates upon the desire for revenge and in France upon the need for peace. It contends against the white race among the blacks of Africa and of the United States, but champions the European outlook among the Mohammedans of central Asia. In Palestine, it has just taken on an Arabian character by declaring itself antisemitic.

Let me now quote Lenin, founder of bolshevism, and father of the revolution of 1917:

Never mind! The wood is being split; let the chips fly. Even if ten million human bodies were required to build up communism, there would still remain enough to people our land.

Such were the words of the leader of communism. As for Stalin, when he was being reproached with spreading sufferings in order forcibly to industrialize Russia, he replied:

We are sometimes asked if we could not slow down the pace, and check our progess. No, the pace cannot be slowed down; on the contrary, it must be speeded up. Compared to progressive countries, we are fifty to a hundred years behind; and we have only ten years to fill the gap. Either we shall succeed, or we shall be crushed.

As you can see, Mr. Speaker, they are firmly determined to keep on the march, a march which started not only with the appearance of bolshevism in Russia, through the revolution of 1917, but a march that was going on at the time of the czars. Czarism has merely taken on another name; to-day it is known as bolshevism. An so, as ever, panslavism marches on.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but are not his remarks on communism a bit too lengthy and his views on the measure before the house too brief?

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): But, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill under review has to do with a loan to Great Britain.

[Mr. P. Gauthier.]

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I was merely proving my statement and pointing out the reason why I endorse the loan to England. Now, if I am not in order, I shall simply resume my seat. However. I believe I owe it to the house to prove what I state and to justify my stand. That is why you find my remarks somewhat protracted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to interrupt the honourable member, but he will admit that a well known rule of this house provides that on the second reading of a bill the discussion must bear only on the principle of the measure. I understand what the honourable member wishes to prove, but I wonder whether I should let him continue to quote many more pages to explain what are the views of the communist party now that we are considering a bill providing for an agreement between the Canadian and the British governments in connection with a loan. Concerning the hon. member for Portneuf I am compelled to take a stand similar to the one I took with respect to other hon. members, when the second reading of other bills was before the house, and I deem it my duty to do so as far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I do not remember what stand you took on other matters, but I shall refrain from discussing that point. However, I believe that a financial principle is involved in this loan to England if, as we have been told, the object is to make work available for our people, for those who produce, and to increase or at least preserve our trade with the British empire.

I believe that there is another principle at stake in this loan; those who do not completely share the bankers' views on this question, even though they may not consider the financial side of the matter, have a right to examine it from the no less important point of view of the ideas and the moral danger involved for the other nations of the commonwealth to which we belong.

Mr. POULIOT: This is high metaphysics.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Possibly. If I must resume my seat, Mr. Speaker, I think that I have said enough to make it known to you and to the house that I am in favour of the loan to England for the reasons I have given, but I repeat...

Some MEMBERS: Continue.

Mr. POULIOT: Continue.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): But I repeat that we have the right to warn the United Kingdom that in return for the sacrifices we are making to help it survive, we expect cooperation and candour in our commercial relations.

Mr. MICHAUD: Quite right!

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): I am sorry I cannot make my point, Mr. Speaker, but I abide by your decision and resume my seat, though I may perhaps expound my thesis again some other time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish the hon. member to think for one moment that I will not allow him to prove the argument he has put forth in the house, but may I say this to him: it is one thing to quote a few pages, one or two for instance, from a work to build up his case; but it is quite another matter to prove one's point by reading to the house quotations from a book on communism in support of his statements. The hon. member is giving to the house the impression that the debate centres on communist policy, a matter which is not under discussion at present, rather than on the bill now before the house.

The hon. member may go on developing arguments without taking up the time of the house by reading a book on communism.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if we agree—

Mr. GAGNON: It does not seem so.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Portneuf): —if we consider the question from the same angle; but I claim that, to prove that Pan-slavism is dangerous, it must first be demonstrated that it exists. Furthermore, if I approve the loan because I feel that we must help the United Kingdom to stabilize the world economy, I must also prove that these people are aiming at universal supremacy. Now, and I do not want to abuse the kindness of the house, and I hope I have said enough to show that these friends of the Slavs are aiming at universal supremacy. Although they have been our allies during the war, they have given away their play and they still are doing it, not only by words but also by deeds.

If any further proof of my claim is expected as to Pan-slavism having been active since the time of the czars, we have but to open the 1945 soviet calendar. It contains two pictures, one of Peter the Great and the other of Catherine of Russia. Now, Peter the Great advocated the same doctrine as the bolshevists are now propounding, namely the necessity of promoting Pan-slavism in Europe.

In conclusion, I may add that if I support the loan to England it is because I am confident that the government will compel those with whom we will trade, either the United Kingdom or other countries, to whom we make loans at a very low interest rate, to respect the word "Canada" so that the goods that we will ship to them are not disguised but will remain Canadian goods overseas, even if they are re-exported from the United Kingdom to be sold and consumed in other countries.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, we are asked to approve an agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, under which we would make both a direct gift and an indirect gift, the latter in the form of an interest-free loan. The Right Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) and others have told us that this was a straight business transaction which, to be fully appreciated, must be studied in the light of our future economic interests, as was done in the United States. I intend looking into the matter from that angle, taking into account all facts, past and present.

The bill calls for an outright gift of $425 million to the United Kingdom. Not much was said, during the last two days, of this outright gift to Great Britain, as hon. members spoke mostly of the interest-free loan, which is really an indirect gift. But we should particularly bring out in their true light the gifts to be made under the agreement reached between Canada and Great Britain. We are giving $425 million to a country that can afford to grant profitable loans to others. At the same time, we settle for $150 million a debt the exact amount of which we do not know, but we have reason to believe that it is much more than $150 million, so that I do not exaggerate when I say that the outright gift to Great Britain represents much more than these $425 millions.

Can anyone seriously suggest that this will be a profitable business transaction? That amount will only be added to the billions we have already given. First, we made an outright gift of one billion; then, we gave a billion and a half by way of mutual aid, which was really a gift in disguise and was finally recognized as such. It is interesting to know how that money was used, because it came out of the pockets of people who are already very heavily taxed. I have before me a clipping taken from the Star of November 27, 1942. I quote:

(Text):

Australians take a shot at Canada and also at Britain for Canada's $1,000,000,000 gift to Britain and how the fund is handled in London.

Canada put up the money to enable Britain to continue to buy Canadian products but, in effect, Britain lends part of it to the other dominions and asks repayment in sterling.

(Translation):

So that the money given to Great Britain was used to do business with Australia; the goods sent to Great Britain were sold to Australia and paid for in sterling.

Now then, what will be achieved by this new gift to Britain? She will lend money to other countries at a fairly high rate of interest. Allow me to quote from the New York Times a few lines reporting a member's question in the British House of Commons, on the subject of a proposed loan to Greece:

(Text):

D. L. Lipson, independent, said it was unfortunate the loan should be made when Britain herself was seeking a loan from the United States, because opponents of the loan to Britain may pick on that as a sign we have money to spare.

(Translation):

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have always been and I am more than ever opposed to making gifts to a country which uses them to extend interest-bearing loans to other countries, as is the case here. Great Britain has also offered a fairly substantial loan to Russia. I read in Le Canada of March 9 last, that Great Britain had offered to lend 30 million pounds, that is $133,500,000 at 2½ per cent interest to Russia while we were making gifts to her and extending to her a loan free of interest. Well, if the object were to help starving countries, I would agree. It would then be a matter of humanity. In the past we have supplied Great Britain with considerable quantities of foodstuffs, although she was not the only nation to suffer from hunger. On the contrary, she suffered less than other nations. In this connection, may I be permitted to quote an excerpt from a speech delivered by Mr. Attlee on February 27 last, with respect to consumption in England:

(Text):

There is a better distribution to-day than there was in 1938. The poorest people in pre-war unemployment areas are certainly consuming more than they did in 1938.

(Translation):

According to the New York Times of last April 6, Mr. Hoover, former president of the United States, who has just toured Europe to size up the food situation in the various countries which are at present suffering from a want of food, is reported to have said:

(Text):

The former president spoke at a press conference of the current efforts of the American people to supply additional bread grains to the hungry peoples of Europe and Asia. He also firmly but definitely told the British people that though their record of subsisting under difficult conditions during the war was good, their food position was not too bad.

"Your health statistics," he said, "do not support the conclusion that Britain is suffering from famine."

He refused to place Britain among the "hungry countries." He also pointed out that the United States' per capita consumption of wheat was lower than the British consumption by nearly one-third—

(Translation):

Let us give to the needy. Since charity begins at home, let us first look after our own and then think of the most unfortunate, since our motive is humanitarian.

I have with me statistics tabled in the house during the last session which show that nearly all the foodstuffs we exported since last June 1 were shipped to Great Britain: wheat, salmon, fish, flour, bacon, cheese were all sent under mutual aid, that is, as a gift. I will say no more on this matter. I maintain, however, that when the people of our country endure hardships and are rationed, and when some are even without a roof, we should think of our own before handing out presents to others.

With respect to the loan, why such a difference between the terms arrived at with Great Britain and the far more exacting conditions imposed by Canada on other countries before granting them an advance? The Right Hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) listed these loans and I noticed that the interest exacted on loans to Belgium, China, Czechoslovakia, France, the Netherlands, the Dutch East Indies, Norway and Russia varied from 2 per cent to 3 per cent and a little over.

Further, refunds are set to begin in 1947. If, as we are told, this is simply a business proposition designed to export our products and keep our workers employed, are France, Belgium, Norway and the other countries not presenting the same advantages as England? Is it not in our interest to lend them money on equally favourable terms? Let us, as some suggest, put aside all sentiment and look into this bill purely from the business angle, but comparing the terms imposed on other countries with the conditions enjoyed by Great Britain I cannot bring myself to believe that economic consideration rather than sentimental considerations prompted the loan to Great Britain.

The Right Hon. Minister of Finance has stated that the loan granted by Canada to Great Britain was on the same basis as that subscribed by the United States to the United Kingdom. The agreement negotiated between Canada and the United Kingdom and the one arrived at between the United States and the United Kingdom display striking differences.

If we compare our national revenue to that of the United States, our neighbours should have lent six times more than Canada because their national income is six times larger than ours. As the Americans are reputed to be far-seeing businessmen, they would surely have lent more if they had looked upon it as a profitable venture. Then, section 6 contains a provision which we do not find in the American agreement, which reads as follows:

Section 6 of the American agreement contains the following provision:

It is agreed that the United Kingdom will use other funds than the credit now granted in order to meet her obligations outstanding in other countries on the date on which this agreement becomes effective.

This means that the United Kingdom will not have the right to use those funds except for purchasing goods from the United States. Such is not the case with the agreement concluded between Canada and the United Kingdom, for section 2 of the financial agreement entered into between Canada and the United Kingdom provides:

Purpose of the Credit. The purpose of the credit is to facilitate purchases by the United Kingdom of goods and services in Canada and to assist in making it possible for the United Kingdom to meet transitional post-war deficits in its current balance of payments, to maintain adequate reserves of gold and dollars and to assume the obligations of multilateral trade.

Nowhere is it stipulated that the United Kingdom agrees to use the proceeds of the loan for the purchase of Canadian goods. Nowhere is this stipulated, whereas the agreement concluded between the United Kingdom and the United States included the special provision that I have quoted.

On March 5, 1946, the Secretary of the Treasury made the following statement in the American senate:

(Text):

The loan was in exchange of American dollars for empire trade preferences.

(Translation):

This means that the United States will enter into negotiations with the United Kingdom in order to obtain certain imperial preferences, and, as it happened in the past, they will be granted at our expense.

We are told that the purpose of the loan is to assist in marketing our products and provide employment for our workers. For the present, this contention does not hold water. We do not produce sufficiently to satisfy the local demand. Rationing had to be resorted to because we do not produce sufficiently to meet the local consumption and at the same time ship foodstuffs and other goods overseas. So it was not necessary to make a gift to England nor to grant her an interest-free loan to stimulate Canadian export trade. Furthermore, the part we ship to England could be sold to other friendly countries, as the minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) stated last January. I quote a dispatch from London, as reported in the Gazette of January 16 last:

Stating that Canada had the firm intention of strongly relying on the economic future of Great Britain, Mr. James MacKinnon, Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, said today, in London, that "Canada is now selling here, at less than world prices and on credit, large quantities of wheat, in spite of the heavy demand for this same product on the part of Latin American countries, who settle their accounts on a cash basis in dollars.

When local markets are not fully supplied, there is no need for exports at the present time, we have shortages in building materials, domestic articles, etc.

Our people are without shelter and clothing, food is rationed and there are scarcities of all kinds of goods. Could it be that the purchasing power is insufficient? No. But we export these things to foreign countries. By this bill we reduce our purchasing power. We lend money to England, without interest, so that she may buy the things we could use. Our best market is still the local market, why not supply it adequately?

How does Great Britain intend to use this loan? According to the Financial Post of March 16, 1946, here is how Great Britain intends to utilize it:

(Text):

The British came to Ottawa February 4, seeking an interest-free loan of $1·25 billions and cancellation of an additional $1·1 billions of outstanding war claims and indebtedness. They based their case on "economic and financial necessity."

As reported elsewhere in this edition, the British have set aside an estimated $30 millions as the amount they will spend in Canada during the next twelve months on "manufactured goods" . . . against $115 to $130 millions of recorded exports of fully manufactured goods from Canada in pre-war years.

(Translation):

The Right Hon. Minister of Justice claims that the loan to England will have the effect of keeping our industry active and ensure work to our people, he is contradicted by the declaration I have just quoted. According to that statement from those who have come here to negotiate the loan, a sum of 30 million dollars only will be used for the importation of manufactured goods, whereas before the war our exports of those goods from Canada represented from 115 to 130 million dollars. Surely it is not by exporting 30 million dollars forth of manufactured goods to England that we are going to ensure work for our people, and prevent unemployment, as is claimed. Our exports will consist mainly of foodstuffs and raw materials, but only of a small quantity of manufactured goods.

I wish to quote the other figures of the Financial Post:

(Text):

Manufactured goods, $30 million; foodstuffs, $600 million; raw materials, lumber, $200 million; freight and transport, $170 million.

(Translation):

Those figures cover the greatest part of the loan. So that the myth which is now being created, namely that the interest-free loan extended to England is likely to secure jobs for our workers and to prevent unemployment is wholly groundless. This loan will merely allow England further to develop her trade in the whole world, to recover the markets she lost during the war and insure her trade supremacy as before.

I wish to call the attention of the house to the opinion of an American economist on the matter of loans, such as the one the government is at present contemplating. Here is an excerpt from the New York Times of March 18, 1946.

(Text):

Some Consequences of Foreign Loans

. . . a great deal of confusion exists even regarding the motives for which these loans are being made. At one moment they are presented as a form of international relief supplementary to UNRRA, and at the next as a hardheaded business transaction designed primarily to increase our own exports. In so far as we make such loans for this second reason, we are in danger of several forms of self-deception.

To the extent to which foreign loans are not repaid they represent a clear national loss to us. We are simply giving goods away without return . . .

But even many foreign loans that would be fully repaid are not wise under present conditions. We are in the midst of an inflationary boom which even OPA rulings and unparalleled strikes have been unable to stop. Our aim should be to halt inflation, not to increase it. Yet increased export trade financed by governmental loans is clearly inflationary. It means directly or indirectly the issuance of new monetary means of payment for American goods; it means that the shortage of goods in America will be increased by the amount shipped abroad (or more strictly speaking, by the excess of exports) . . .

It would be interesting to know just what goods there are in such surplus supply here that foreign markets have to be artificially stimulated to absorb them. . .

It is just as much an error to stimulate foreign trade artificially as to restrict it artificially. If our export industries are expanded unduly by foreign loans, they will either have to be supported by continuous foreign loans or eventually cut down again, with disrupting readjustments in our structure of production . . .

But the volume of exports by itself is irrelevant to employment. If it is offset by an equal voulme of imports, as much American employment is "lost" by the imports as is "gained" by the exports. A continuous excess of exports, on the other hand (with "invisible items" considered), would mean merely that we were giving our goods away.

[Mr. M. Raymond.]

And this, to my mind, is the situation at the present time. As for the future, we may be sure that England, as is her right, shall be guided by her interests. And I do not blame her. But past experience has shown that it is so, and the fact is confirmed by certain statements of British representatives who have been entrusted with the task of negotiating these financial agreements with Canada.

To sum up, what happened before the war? In 1932, Canada entered into trade agreements with the United Kingdom at the time of the imperial economic conference held in Ottawa. In Canada, the depression and unemployment were at their height. What did England do? She bought huge quantities of Russian pulpwood, at the prejudice of Canadian industry; in 1939, British importers bought nearly ten million dollars worth of canned salmon in Japan instead of buying it in Canada; in 1938, Canadian wheat had a preference of six cents per bushel on the London market. In order to comply with the requirements of Anglo-American trade, we were asked to relinquish that preference.

In 1939, England bought 200,000 tons of wheat from Roumania and other foreign countries, at a time when our store-houses were overflowing with wheat and when our wheat was selling at ridiculous prices. What reason would we have to expect that England would to-day disregard her own interests for the benefit of Canada? Please note that I am not blaming England for looking after herself in the first place. It is a logical and natural process. But I would like to see Canada protect her own interests also.

Let us consider the present situation. Allow me to read from the Financial Post of January 6, 1945, a statement made by Lord Keynes during his visit to Canada:

(Text):

When Lord Keynes and other British officials were here recently, they made it clear that United Kingdom is quite prepared to take a very tough attitude toward future relations with "hard" or dollar currency countries like Canada.

Britain said in effect: "Beyond what assistance you give us under free gift or mutual aid, we are determined, in future, to stand on our own commercial feet. We will deny ourselves Canadian goods rather than go into debt or take your surplus products on credit."

(Translation):

England is now establishing trade relations with every European country. I do not find fault with that; she is right in looking after her interests. But when after three years the loan has become exhausted, if it suits her better to buy her bacon from Denmark, she will do so; if it suits her better to get in Sweden the minerals that she needs, she will get them from Sweden; if it suits her better to import her pulpwood from Norway or Finland, she will buy them in Norway or Finland and will not care for Canada.

In December, 1944, I believe England had a contract with the Noranda company whereby she was to buy the whole of its production of copper. What happened? England notified the company that she was cancelling the contract. The directors of Noranda went to England in an endeavour to maintain that agreement but without success. The contract was cancelled because it suited Great Britain better to purchase her copper from Rhodesia. Again, I do not blame her; she was merely looking after her own interests.

To-day Great Britain's main concern is to increase her export trade. On February 27, 1946, Mr. Attlee, speaking in the British House of Commons, stated:

(Text):

We have to create an export trade on a greater scale than ever before.

(Translation):

What are the goods which England is going to export? They are goods which some day will compete with our own. Let us remember that, since the war, Canada has become an industrialized nation, an exporter of manufactured goods. To-day we are manufacturing goods which England also produces; in order to be able to export our goods to England we shall have to buy from her. How shall we be able to do so without harming our industries and depriving our workers of employment?

At the beginning of the war our debt hardly reached three billion dollars; it will soon amount to 16 billion dollars. Can we afford to make such considerable gifts? Can we afford to make interest-free loans, out of money which will have to come from the pockets of Canadian taxpayers, who already have a heavy burden to carry, especially when it comes to lending funds to a country which is able to loan? Why borrow when one is in a position to lend? Here we have Britain lending to Greece, and ready to lend to Russia, as well as to many other countries, in order to restore her foreign trade.

Shall we deprive our people of opportunities, jeopardize our economic reconstruction so that another country may develop even stronger trade relations than before the war and thus become our competitor? We were not elected to deprive our country of such capital as is needed for its economic and financial development and to insure the welfare of our people.

Our farmers would gladly accept interest-free loans for the development of their enterprises; however, at the present time, they cannot borrow from the farm loan board at less than 4½ or 5 per cent. Our workingmen would also be glad to borrow without interest, for the construction of decent houses; but on all such loans from the government, interest must be paid at the rate of 4½ per cent. We are not in a position to increase old age pensions; but we can afford gifts to England.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has already gone beyond the forty minutes he is allowed.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I am not in the habit of taking up too much time in the house, so perhaps I might be granted a few more minutes—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Instead of giving away our money or lending it without interest, let us develop our natural resources, our oil fields, our coal mines and so on. Let us build houses for our people and enhance the beauty of our country.

Before the war, we lacked funds to spend on public works, but we found billions of dollars for destruction. We keep on lending and giving millions to foreigners while depriving the provinces of revenue so sorely needed for social security.

Before resuming my seat, I wish to quote from a statement made by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on March 30, 1938. Those words hold as much truth to-day as they did at that time. Here is what he said:

It is said that Canada's powers are not unlimited and that we are not in a position to sustain indefinitely a great effort. We have a tremendous task to accomplish in our own country; we must build houses for Canadians: care for the aged and the crippled; alleviate the distress caused by unemployment and drought; build highways; shoulder the responsibilities of an enormous national debt—

Our national debt had not even reached three billion dollars.

—prepare for the defence of Canada and raise our standard of living and of civilization in keeping with our present knowledge. Our own resources will hardly suffice; so that we shall have to choose to a certain extent between looking after our own affairs and trying to save Europe and Asia.

(Text):

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that, apart from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), no private member representing a constituency in the maritime provinces has taken part in this debate, I felt that I should briefly express the views which are held in that part of Canada. I certainly consider I can speak for Nova Scotia and say that the people of that province, as well as, I believe, the people of the maritimes generally, together with the great majority of the Canadian people, approve this measure.

I was particularly interested in the definite, plain and comprehensive explanation given by the Minister of Finance when he introduced the resolution. I was also impressed, from a business point of view, with the manner in which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell) presented his views. With the financial background that he has, he was able to sum up the benefits of the agreement in a way which would, I believe, appeal to anyone at all interested in business or who has followed a business career. I was indeed pleased, therefore, to find so high an authority definitely placing himself on record as approving the agreement.

It must have been gratifying to the Minister of Finance, who introduced the resolution, to know that he had the support of His Majesty's Loyal Opposition, of the members of the C.C.F., of the Social Credit party and of the great majority of the members sitting on the government side. It is true that there is a very small representation from one particular quarter of the dominion who apparently are opposed to the measure. From a business point of view, I do not understand why any hon. member should take such an attitude. This measure will bring about what we are all working for, greater employment, greater production and a market for a large amount of our goods. When one considers that we are just following along the course that a good businessman would take if placed in a similar position it is difficult to understand how any hon. member could oppose this bill. We are dealing with Great Britain which has been one of our outstanding customers over a long period of years. Manufacturers to-day and for years have had to face a similar situation in so far as jobbers and wholesalers are concerned. Jobbers and wholesalers have had to deal with retailers in the same way. It is not uncommon for a wholesaler or a manufacturer to find himself in a situation at some time or another during his business career where he needs financial assistance. After a long period of years a manufacturer is able to size up the situation and extend credit over a long period or, if necessary, advance cash in order to put his customer in a position to continue to be a good customer and thus help the employees in that particular manufacturing concern.

I look upon this agreement in very much the same light. As I see it, it is a good business arrangement for both the buyer and the seller. From a sense of loyalty Canada should do what the finance minister proposes. From the point of view of common decency, which has already been mentioned by one hon. member, there is no other course left open for Canada than to grant this credit.

I shall now deal with the export business of Canada. Other hon. members have already mentioned this but I think it will bear repeating. In 1938 our export business amounted to $837 million. In 1939 there was an increase to $924 million. In 1940 there was a further increase to $1,179 million, and in 1941 it amounted to $1,621 million. There was a further increase in 1942 until in 1943 it reached the huge amount of $2,971 million. Of this total the United States took $1,149 million, or 38·7 per cent, and Great Britain took $1,033 million, or 34·8 per cent of the total exports of Canada. Thus it will be seen that the two countries together took a total of 73·5 per cent of our entire export business.

I believe that hon. members and Canada as a whole recognize the fact that we are doing business with one of our largest and best customers. My purpose in rising to take part in this debate was to put these views of mine briefly on the record so that the rest of Canada and the house in particular would know that we in the eastern maritimes approve this measure which I hope will be passed by the house with an overwhelming majority. If we should not do so it would have a bad effect not alone on our own standing in the eyes of the United States but on their decision with respect to the loan that is pending, which I feel sure will have the approval of the people of the United States just as this loan will have the general approval of the citizens of Canada.

Again I come back to the question of production. This measure is bound to create greater production. If it creates greater production, then we must have a market for that production if we are to benefit from it. In our production we are creating a new market or a continuous market for our products. Thus the question of employment enters into the picture in a definite manner because a new market brings about employment. With the employment comes increased spending power, and out of that increased spending power comes a higher standard of living. We are all striving to maintain that high standard of living which we in Canada are so fortunate to enjoy at the present time.

I have briefly outlined the reasons why I support the bill. From an economic point of view I do not see how any hon. member can do other than support this measure. Loans have been made to other countries on a sound business basis. They have already been placed on the record. A total of $642 million has already been lent. The loan under discussion amounts to $1,250 million at an interest rate of two per cent, payable over a period of fifty-five years. To me it is a sound business proposition, and from the point of view of common decency I do not see how we can do other than give our wholehearted support to it.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, after all the fine speeches that have been delivered in the last two weeks each one of us should be entitled to several honorary degrees of universal learning. International finance also reminds me of children who ask for more cake to finish their jam and more jam to finish their cake. There is no end to it.

We are told that some hon. members have been very generous in admonishing the big powers that this is the last time that they will vote for a measure of this kind; nevertheless, they will vote for it. What does England, Russia, France and China care about any admonition from members of the parliament of Canada when the government of Canada pays no attention to it themselves?

I have a certain fear, and it is this. Although everybody is in earnest at the present time no one can tell that no political party will play politics with it in the future. If I start from your left, Mr. Speaker, I find there are several seats that are now empty, but on the other hand there are seats which are occupied by prominent members of the Progressive Conservative party. I wonder which one of the Conservative members had a power of attorney from the party to replace the leader of the party in expressing the views of the party on this great matter. Was it the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. Macdonnell)? Perhaps. Was it the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church)? Perhaps. Was it the hon. member for Grey North (Mr. Case)? Perhaps. Since I have never been in the councils of the Tory party, I cannot say which one it was. However, I am greatly surprised that on this matter, which represents an expenditure of a billion and a quarter and taxation on the Canadian people, the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bracken), the loyal opposition of His Majesty, has not risen in his place to speak with authority as the leader of a great party. Instead of that, he has gone to Montreal to speak of the kingdom of Canada. When it comes to such a huge expenditure he leaves it to others to express the views of his party. I have great respect for my hon. friend personally, but I cannot understand it.

Mr. BRACKEN: If the hon. member really wishes to know where I stand on this matter, I stated my position very clearly in my address on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, I appreciate what my hon. friend has said. He read a pastoral letter at the beginning of the session, and it is good for five years. How is it that other hon. members rise to expound the policy of the party? It is because the policy of the Progressive Conservative party is like the two faces of Janus, and their utterances can be read forward and backward. They can be read like those written in Arabic type and those published in Chinese characters; they are read forward and they are read backward. The hon. members who are here are no minor quantity; they are heavyweights of the party. I start with my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and in a moment I will tell him why he has not yet spoken on this matter. I challenge him to rise and express a definite view on it. He will not, because the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario said as much against the loan as he said for it, and his conclusion is that he must support it. The plates of the scale were even. It was only his last word that decided that the plate in favour of it should become a little heavier and go down.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I trust that the hon. gentleman will go on and explain what he meant by that. I may be a very stupid man, but I thought I had spent some thirty minutes of the time of my hon. friend and others yesterday in making it very clear—at least I tried to make it very clear—that I was in favour of the loan. So that if the hon. gentleman would be good enough to explain what he meant by that I should be grateful.

Mr. POULIOT: I will explain it in a moment. In the first place I do not call my hon. friend stupid; he calls himself stupid and he is wrong. If his explanation was so clear I was the stupid one not to understand it.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I must interrupt my hon. friend again to say there are none so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. POULIOT: I am not only stupid in the opinion of my hon. friend, I am also blind. The next time I shall be deaf and afterwards I shall have one eye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dumb.

Mr. POULIOT: Or I shall be dead. But that is not all. There is the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure), the nearest to your left, Mr. Speaker. He has the gift of speech, but he has not said a word. There is the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), a former minister in Mr. Bennett's cabinet, the only one now in the front row. He has had experience in the cabinet; he is a wise man; he commands the respect of the house. He has not spoken a word. There is my very dear friend the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green).

Mr. GREEN: You talk so much there is no time for anybody else.

Mr. POULIOT: Perhaps so; but if my hon. friend is ready to speak he will have an opportunity later, and his words are always so full of wisdom. He knows that himself; otherwise he would not ask so many questions on the estimates. But he has not said a word. There is my hon. friend the member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who surely would have risen if the refusal of this loan had meant any danger to the empire.

Mr. MacNICOL: But I am for the loan.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is there with his genial smile, but he has not said a word.

Mr. MacNICOL: But I am for the loan.

Mr. POULIOT: That is not enough. You should tell me why, in order to convert me to your views. Then there is the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), a colonel in the army, a man of experience and an old member. He has not said anything. Mum's the word. There is the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). He is neither deaf nor dumb. He can express himself with great fluency, but he has not said a word. I say nothing offensive to him; I pay him a tribute, because I like him personally.

Mr. FRASER: May I say a word?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. FRASER: I am in favour of this loan, and the reason I am in favour of it is that I believe the British government will pay it back. If you look at British Hansard for February 19 you will see that at that date they had 8,897,000 people working on export trade. That means they will be able to pay back the loan.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and it means so many less people in Canada will work. But that is a point of view. I have performed a miracle; I have succeeded in having these hon. gentlemen who have not said a word since the beginning of the debate rise in their places and give what I might call short speeches.

Mr. FRASER: This is the second time the hon. gentleman has spoken. He should give somebody else a chance.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, and this is the second time my hon. friend has spoken, so that I have performed a double miracle.

Mr. FRASER: And you have not said anything yet.

Mr. POULIOT: There is my hon. friend the commander, the member for Trinity (Mr. Skey), who can speak very well also, but the password has been "silence." He has not said a word. There is the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness), a genial gentleman with university training. Not a word. There is the hon. member for High Park (Mr. McMaster), a brilliant lawyer. Not a word. There is the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Bradshaw), a brilliant man. Not a word. I do not want to make any mistakes. There is the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Murphy). Not a word. I see my hon. friend the member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen), who has authority in this house and is respected by all. Not a word. They have abdicated their personalities for this time and have left it to the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, who is one of the most gifted speakers in the house, to give the pros and cons, to endeavour to interest the whole house and yet not compromise the Progressive Conservative party. Well, now, there is something to-night. After a few months the Conservative party, which is more loyal than the king and queen put together, will say, "We have warned the country about what is going on. There is more and more unemployment; there is more and more dissatisfaction, but we warned the government through our spokesman not to be too quick, to be careful about it." That will be good political propaganda, but since it is unnoticed now by the Liberal party I tell them to watch their step because they are on dangerous ground.

Yesterday I expressed a certain opinion regarding this measure. Not so long ago a doctrine was enunciated in this house which makes one think seriously about the future of this country if such financing goes on any longer. This is what was said:

> I am sure that hon. members can recall the grave international problems and difficulties which arose in the nineteen-twenties and nineteen-thirties from the huge international war debts which had grown up during and immediately following the last great war.

And again:

> International debts, on the other hand, can be settled only by the transfer of goods and services from the debtor country to the creditor country.

Such transfers can be made, only if and to the extent that the creditor country is prepared to accept goods and services from the debtor country for not only principal payments but also annual interest charges. In other words, the creditor country must be prepared to see an increase in its imports or a decrease in its exports, or both.

That is horse sense; that is very well said.

Experience has shown that countries will accept these payments in the form of imports only to a limited extent on balance, if at all. To do so, of course, exposes their producers to more intense competition from abroad, and the excess of imports serves as a deflationary influence which appears to be unwelcome in normal peace times. On the other hand, the inability of debtor nations to make payment when the creditor nation will not readily accept imported goods and services in payment, is bound to lead to international misunderstandings and frictions. Consequently, there is a practical limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war. The experiences of the last twenty-five years are too well known for me to labour this point at greater length.

Mr. FRASER: Will the hon. member tell us what he is reading from?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. In the first place, it is not from a speech given by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). It is not from a speech given by any Progressive Conservative member. It is not from a speech given by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). It is not from a speech given by the leader of the Bloc Populaire (Mr. Raymond). It is not from a speech given by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe).

Mr. FRASER: Page Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no. Those words were uttered on March 18, 1942, and we read them on pages 1420 and 1421 of Hansard. Who said it? It was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who was responsible for the commitments made by the Acting Minister of Finance, the then Minister of National Defence, army. Hon. members will find out that what I have said is more prophetic than anything that Keynes has said. Here we are. What is the limit of financing for a country? There are limits for an individual and there must be limits for a country. It was said that there was a limit.

I remember the time when Mr. Bennett was Prime Minister of Canada and he said, "We cannot borrow any more; we have reached our limit; we have only our home markets." At that time there was no rationing. Mr. Bennett was only a child. He was a powerful and rich man but he had not reached the astronomical figures that we have reached to-day. That was said in 1942, four years ago, and it is on record in Hansard. It is because of what was said by the Minister of Finance on March 18, 1942, that I am in duty bound to vote against the second reading of this bill. If the Minister of Finance had not spoken as he did on that occasion I would have had a certain doubt and I would have given the government the benefit of that doubt. But he was explicit, he expressed a profound truth. I do not blame him for that; I cannot congratulate him, but he has my sympathies for many reasons. He said:

Consequently, there is a practical limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war.

I ask him now: What is the demarcation line? Are we within it or without it? Are we outside it? Did we go any farther and, if so, how much? Who established that line?

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask a question? Was I not speaking about international debt there? In this case it is the debt that Great Britain could carry in relation to Canada. Is that not what I was speaking about there?

Mr. POULIOT: Here is the quotation for the minister himself to see.

Mr. ILSLEY: I find that I was right. I said:

Consequently, there is a practical limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war.

That is precisely what I have said in this debate. If this loan were made at a high rate of interest with no waiver of interest in the earlier years, and if we were to insist on trying to collect the full amount owing on the air training plan and so forth, we would be pushing the United Kingdom beyond the limit of her capacity to carry this international debt because, as I said then, there is a limit to the amount of international debt which can be satisfactorily carried and repaid, particularly when such debt arises from the economically wasteful processes of war. Canada and the United States have both considered that question, and it was not because they were foolish that they provided these terms calling for a waiver of interest, but because they took into account and appraised as closely as they could the capacity of the United Kingdom to pay.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister, and I think he is a great sport for admitting that I quoted him accurately. If it had been Arthur Meighen he would have said that I misquoted him.

What is an international debt? A debt of Canada to Great Britain is an international debt, and a debt from Great Britain to Canada is an international debt? If that were not so, it would mean that the government of this country is perfectly non-existent, that we are governed by Great Britain. Our financial relations with Great Britain cannot be otherwise than international. Otherwise we might as well put the padlock on the parliament buildings in Ottawa and say that it is no use trying to do something for the government of this country, that we are all under Westminster.

Who decides about the limit? Precisely those agencies of the Old Lady of Threadneedle street and Wellington street — the experts in robber banks, robber banks of currency. They fix the limit that they want. That is their dictum and it cannot be changed, because it has been decided by those who know—the experts! Things go on like that; these experts have received their training from the small group of international finance leaders, and now they control the destinies of this nation as they want to control the destinies of the world. As a liberal I strongly object to that. I think it is a crime to threaten the humble folk, the underdog, those earning small salaries, putting out the temporary employees and leaving in the service those who bring this country to ruin. The cleaning-up should not be downward to the lower grades but upward, and we should dispense with a lot of useless branches all over the civil service. It will not be done because there are some pets and friends who are in there and they are considered more important that the members of parliament.

But I want to afford my colleagues an opportunity to think of so serious a matter as that of ministerial responsibility. I want them to remember what is their duty and to remember the trust and confidence their electors expressed in them when they honoured them by voting for them. These people deserve some consideration, and we are here to perform a duty which is often unpleasant but which nevertheless has to be done, without fear or favour, not only for those who are now citizens of Canada but for future generations, to prevent this country from being engulfed in the neighbour state, the United States of America. We are going toward it, and we do not know what will happen if this government has not the power that once it had in a free country, the power and the duty to act in accordance with the constitution and in accordance with the old principle of British parliamentary traditions, which are so often forgotten. It is a strange country where everything is known except fundamentals, where everything is remembered except the essentials, where one pays more attention to detail than to vital facts. I am sorry to-night that a larger number of my colleagues have not risen to express their views and those of their constituents on a matter of such magnitude. I have said repeatedly, and I must say it again, that the atmosphere of Ottawa is pernicious to the members of parliament because when they are here they are disposed to forget what are the views of their own people back home.

If one says that the British people deserve sympathy I agree entirely, and if we can help them, all right. I have as much respect for the poor people of Whitechapel as for the rich. But at the present time it is not a question alone of sympathy for Great Britain; it is a question also of sympathy and a question of duty to our own Canadian people. Matters are going from bad to worse. Some members think only of catering to the views of those who have controlled the policy of Canada for so long, since the time of Macdonald; I mean those who have nothing Canadian about them except perhaps the name they give to themselves occasionally as a surname, those who have no Canadian aspirations and who do not think of those who are close to them but only of those who are far away, and the farther away they are the more they must be suffering—that is what I hear all the time.

I respect the views of everybody, but I am not to be lectured by any Right Reverend and hon. gentleman like the member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank). He gave us a combination which was half sermon and half business course. Well, he may call his colleagues "Pharisees"—an expression I never used—or tell us in circumlocution that those who do not think as he does are crazy. It does not make any impression on me. But I will tell him one thing which will astound hon. members; he knows nothing about the demon rum. For instance, we now have to pay $5 for a 26-ounce bottle of third rate rum—is it not a shame?—and it is precisely because we belong to the sterling area. If we were out of it, it would be easy to have rum from the American plantations.

Mr. NICHOLSON: How much is it over there?

Mr. POULIOT: I do not know, but I know it is cheaper. He said something else, and with this I will conclude. He said Canada was the unique country that wanted only to win the war without expecting anything besides winning the war; that Canada desired no material gain; and he gave a special word of honour to our country on account of that disposition. Well, if Canada is alone in doing a thing does that mean that she is right to do it? All other countries are looking for something as a compensation for their losses and sacrifices in the war. Canada is above that. Canada has the spirit of sacrifice for other nations. It does not pay. Who will pay for it? All of us will pay for it. The Canadian people will pay for it, and they will not stand for it very long. At the present time there are various parties which fight each other at election time and discuss in this house matters of national interest. We have relative peace in this country. But there is an underground trend which is dangerous, and very little will be needed to arouse the feelings of the people of this country, as has happened somewhere else. I say that as a warning. It is dangerous to create in the minds of the people a distrust of parliamentary institutions. At the present time parliamentary institutions do not enjoy the respect which they did years ago. It is not a complaint against one member in particular, which would be normal. Sometimes people are dissatisfied with a member of parliament; they complain about him; they vote for another candidate at the following election and the matter is settled.

But now we hear everywhere and at all times discussions about parliament itself, and people are losing confidence in parliament. We have had some examples of this; I will not refer to it any more now, because the hour is late; but I want the government to think of it seriously. The only way to keep the confidence of the people is to take into their confidence those who represent the people and who are in touch with them. Any back-bencher has a superiority in this respect over any minister who sits on the treasury benches. None of these hon. gentlemen has the contact with the people that we private members have when we go home or when, even here in Ottawa, we meet people, listen to them, and try to make them understand that there are difficulties, that it is hard to settle certain things, and that the ministers should be given a chance.

But there is inevitably an end to this. I have tried to be as patient as possible. I have tried to make people understand the difficulties of the government. I have told them that the members of the cabinet meant well, that they had not the opportunities of other members to meet the Canadian people individually. But they are not satisfied with these explanations. This piece of financing will do more to promote communism in this country than all the propaganda of those who have been arrested, put together. It is a serious matter. I wanted to say this to-night; I have said it, and I want hon. members to think about it. I may be wrong, but I have spoken earnestly and with sincerity, and I want hon. members, and I want the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to think of what I have said. This measure is a provocation to all those who are in need and receive no help. It is a provocation to all those who suffer and receive no consideration. It is not an intelligent attitude to require us to wait until the next dominion-provincial conference for an adjustment and for us to be told, "We will see what can be done some time later." The answer is, "If you have enough money to give a billion and a quarter dollars to another country whether she deserves it or not, I want it and I want it right now. If you have enough to give all this to another country, give it to me; I am a Canadian and I want it."

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you.

Mr. J. H. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I always enjoy hearing the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) speaking to this house, because his speeches are informative and inspirational.

I am sorry that my knowledge of the French language is not anything to write home about, but I was trying to follow as closely as I could the remarks of the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) a little while ago. If I caught the trend of his speech it was to this effect, that the people of Great Britain are not nearly as hungry as they make out they are, and that in some insidious way they are trying to put something over on Canada. It brings to my mind a remark we used to hear over the radio some years ago—

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Would the hon. member permit me?

Mr. MATTHEWS: Certainly.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I quoted the words of Mr. Hoover.

Mr. MATTHEWS: We used to hear the remark over the radio, "Vas you there, Sharley?" I happen to be one of those who were fortunate enough to come here from the United Kingdom, forty-one years ago, and with many others here to-night I pride myself on being a good Canadian; but I cannot forget that in the home land I have a mother still living, and by the grace of God she is now enjoying her ninety-third year of life. I want to tell this house to-night that my mother in all her ninety-three years has never known such conditions in Great Britain as exist this night as a result of the war through which they have passed. We have been told repeatedly that the people of Great Britain have had to draw in their belts, and I for one do not think for one minute they are doing that and imposing on themselves certain restrictions in order to put anything over on Canada. I feel proud to-night that Canada is able and willing to step into the breach in this, Great Britain's decisive hour, to the extent of the loan she is now prepared to make.

Certain members have spoken in opposition to the loan. Even so, they must have known how ineffective their opposition would be. I know that when we speak in this house from time to time we are apt to express our own personal convictions and opinions, but I am convinced to-night that in speaking in support of this loan I am voicing the views of the largest percentage of the people of my constituency. I believe they are 100 per cent behind the loan, and I believe that because I know they have been following the trend of events. They know what Great Britain has suffered and they know that we in Canada have been exceedingly fortunate; for we have not been asked to make the sacrifices which the people over there have been called upon to make.

I am therefore heartily in accord with the proposed loan which is now before us. Yet I cannot help having a feeling of regret over the action taken in this house on Wednesday afternoon when we had before us that resolution which sought to give our aged citizens, our old age pensioners, a more adequate income in their old age. That proposal was talked out just because the government is not prepared at this time to do anything for those people. I know that all across this dominion there is a sense of disappointment and frustration in the minds of those old people.

It is not so long ago that, in the first flush of victory, we were expressing our rejoicings and were glad when the boys were coming back from overseas, and on almost every railway station throughout the dominion one could see the sign, "Welcome home, boys; you have done a good job". Canada sought to express her gratitude to the men who had done so nobly overseas. But the time has come when Canada should publicly recognize her indebtedness to those men and women who were the pioneers of this country and who made Canada what she is.

Canada, I believe, is an exceedingly wealthy nation. We are demonstrating that by the very fact that we are willing to lend billions to nations in their need. But, as the hon. member for Temiscouata said a few moments ago, though he may not have used these express words, charity begins at home. I would not say one word against making this loan, but I believe that Canada should exert greater efforts on behalf of our aged citizens in their declining years. Let us try to bring something of comfort, peace and well-being to those people.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): I wish briefly to express my unqualified support of the bill and to say how much I enjoyed the lucid manner in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) presented the subject to the house. I have listened to arguments against and for the bill. I have listened to what I consider rather unusual speeches. I listened to a few members as they spent thirty-nine minutes and forty seconds in pulling the bill to pieces and then telling the house in the last few seconds that they intended to support it.

I have listened also very carefully to the speech of the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and I think he is entirely out of perspective when he talks about dealing with the sufferings of our own people in the terms he did in relation to the people of Europe at the present time. Regardless of the things that have to be done in Canada, the things that require to be done in the near future, I say that with the exception of those who have lost loved ones, and the men who went overseas, there is not a portion of the world to-day that is as fortunate as we are in Canada.

When the hon. member for Temiscouata was speaking, his arguments reminded me of the story of the church janitor who found the parson's notes on Monday morning as he was cleaning the church. He picked them up. The parson had made various notations in his manuscript, and at one point he had, "Argument weak; raise your voice." At another point he had, "Argument very weak; wave your arms"; and at still another point he had, "Argument terribly weak; wave your arms and yell like hell".

I think the arguments in favour of the bill have in some cases over-emphasized the economic advantages. I know we have to consider the matter from that point of view. But I am rising to express my support of the bill on the ground that we have a moral obligation to assist those who have suffered in the defence of democracy. We had to pool our resources to win the war, and I am quite sure that we shall have to pool our resources to win the peace. I look upon the bill, with its period of no interest and with its lower interest rates, as a step in the right direction. Because of that I support the bill unqualifiedly.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I do not expect to take a great deal of time, as the two previous speakers have indicated the importance of this bill, and if there are no other speakers I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we can pass the bill to-night. I do wish, however, to make a few observations because I believe that there are important principles involved in this measure.

I have listened to arguments pro and con and I am not going to say that the argument is all on one side. There are arguments for both sides, although at the outset I wish to say that I support the bill. The bill provides for two separate amounts of money. One part of the bill provides for the cancellation of any debt that the United Kingdom may owe us in respect of the commonwealth air training plan; the other part provides for the extension of credits to the extent of one and a quarter billion dollars in order that Great Britain may purchase goods from Canada. The first item of $425,000,000, which is the United Kingdom's share in the commonwealth air training plan, will constitute, I take it, a direct gift to Great Britain, not from now on, because the gift has already been made.

May I suggest that we must have had to borrow the money in order to pay Great Britain's share in this commonwealth air training plan and our borrowings therefore have been used. They have been spent for the purpose of that plan. In other words, we have borne Britain's share of that plan to the extent of $425,000,000. This money has to be paid back. I cannot tell where this particular money came from because we have been raising billions of dollars throughout the war years by means of victory loans. I imagine that a large part of the $425 million is now owed the chartered banks of Canada. I believe I am right, even though it may be a guess, that a good deal of the $425 million constitutes expanded credit which the banks now hold as a debt against the Canadian people. It can be paid back only by taxation. The people of Canada should realize this. There is one painful cry that goes up from the people of Canada to-day, namely, the cry of the pain of over-burdening taxation.

It is all very well to talk about extending credits and cancelling debt, but the people of Canada should know that every time we cancel a foreign debt there is a corresponding debt here in Canada which has to be paid, and it can be paid only by taxation; of course, as the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka) reminds me, under the present system. That is what we are operating under, the management of this system by the Liberal administration of this country. Suppose, instead of giving the loan to Britain we should ask the people of Canada whether they are ready to foot the bill to the tune of $425 million by taxation. If we did that it would put a little different complexion on this question in the minds of the people of Canada. I will make this observation. The government does not seem much alarmed at the cancellation and the eventual payment of debt to the tune of $425 million. That is strange to me, because a few years ago when we had plenty of goods for everyone in Canada and asked the government for a few paltry dollars they could not supply the money.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I just ask the hon. gentleman a question? How does the cancellation of $425 million of debt add to the taxes of the people of Canada if the debt is beyond the capacity of the debtor to pay?

Mr. POULIOT: That is a good admission.

Mr. HANSELL: I will answer, and I do not propose now to match my economic brains with those of the Minister of Finance; but I think he will agree that any debt that exists is a debt that is caused by the expansion of credits, and any expansion of credit is a debt to the banking institutions of Canada. To that extent it must be paid by the people of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was incurred years ago.

Mr. HANSELL: It might have been incurred years ago, but it is still here and is perhaps a little bigger now by the addition of accrued interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has not answered the question.

Mr. HANSELL: I may not have answered the question to the satisfaction of the Minister of Finance, but that is my answer and it is satisfactory to me.

Let me ask the finance minister a question. Why is it that Canada can now provide $1,250 million of credit to Britain when she could not provide much less than that for the people of Canada a few years ago? I have paused, and the minister has not answered.

There are two ways of approaching the argument in respect of this loan. Many of the speakers in favour of the loan have spoken of it on the basis that it is good business. A second argument is that there is a moral obligation. I wish to ask hon. members if they think the extension of these credits to Britain to the extent of $1,250 million is good business? Let us look at that because a previous speaker said that there would be greater employment, greater production and greater export trade. It is true that for the time being there will be greater employment. But let us remember this, that greater employment here on goods to be exported means greater unemployment to the importing country. I know we are not living in normal times economically to-day. There is a disequilibrium in our economic set-up in these years because of the war and so forth, but I am talking now of whether the loan is good business. Exports mean that you are exporting your unemployment. To the extent that export trade increases employment in one country, generally speaking it means corresponding unemployment in another country. I ask, is that good business? It may be for us and only for a time.

I come now to the matter of greater production. It will mean greater production, but let us remember that the greater production is to go out of the country. What we are really doing is shipping our real wealth out of our own country. We may be provided with a certain amount of money through increased employment, but the real wealth is gone. I ask, is that good business? Perhaps some of the orthodox minds would say that it is. Some person will say that it is good business because it means greater exports. It just so happens that at the present time we need the goods. Is it good business to ship out the goods when we need them here? Let me follow that up. When a credit is paid by the importing country it is paid by that country importing goods. When Great Britain pays the money back she pays us by sending us goods. Therefore the position that we are placed in is that we are shipping out goods now when we need them, but we shall be taking them back when we do not need them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is the hon. member opposed to shipping them out now?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. HANSELL: No. I suppose this is the crucial time, anyway, for Great Britain certainly needs them now. I am not talking against the bill; I do not want my hon. friends to misunderstand me. What I am trying to make clear is that there are two ways of looking at it. One is from the point of view of whether or not it is good business; the other is whether there is a moral obligation. I am not supporting the bill because it is good business. I think it is the business of lunatics. I am supporting the bill because we have a moral obligation toward the people of Great Britain.

While we are talking about whether or not it is good business, let me dwell for a moment on this matter of inflation. Oh, how the cry used to go up some years ago when we wanted a few extra dollars. The same hon. gentlemen now sitting on the treasury benches replied, "Oh, that would be inflation." We dared not talk in terms of $100,000,000 without its being called inflation, but now here is $1,250 million. When we proposed a little extra money there were plenty of goods to correspond with any such increase, but the cry went up that it would be inflation, and we could not have that. Now, however, we can supply a billion and a quarter of money when we have no goods behind it. From the point of view of business it is not good business, because this will aggravate inflation, the very thing we want to prevent. I say, then, that from the point of view of whether or not it is good business, I do not believe it is. We have a shortage of goods here, perhaps more shortages than we know about. I went to buy a pair of socks to-day. Since the Minister of Finance asked me a question I should like to ask him where I can buy a pair of socks. I have darned the ones I have until I cannot darn them any more, darn it, and I should like to know where I can get socks.

The only reason remaining for the loan, as far as I can see, is from the moral aspect. The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Matthews) has expressed it as adequately as anyone could in a few minutes. I too, have an aged mother there, and we feel very much concerned about this thing. The fact is that Great Britain has suffered; she has been in the front line alone throughout the war. Her real wealth is gone. Her machinery is worn out. The present scarcity in the United Kingdom is such that they are almost at the point of starvation; at least they are at the point where the government is now talking of rationing bread. This is so in spite of the fact that a few years ago we reduced our production of wheat and paid our farmers not to grow it. That was the policy of the present government. If hon. members do not think this a lunatic policy I do not know what we can be thinking about. You see, the Lord was so good to us, but we thought he did not know his business. He sent us so much sunshine and so much rain that we had too much, so that the government went the Lord one better; they knew a little more. They said, "Well, we cannot very well reach up into the sky and turn off the rain. We cannot very well reach up and pull down the blind so that the sun will not shine, but we know what we can do. We can take this asinine financial system and pay our men not to produce, when the good Lord gives us the opportunity to do so." I did not like to say this when the legislation was brought down, but I feel like saying it now, that I had to choose between Gardiner and God.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Would my hon. friend permit me to interrupt for a moment? He was kind enough to say he did not think he would be speaking until eleven o'clock, and I imagine that all hon. members are anxious to have this bill go through its present stage to-night. This is Friday night, and it is unusual to see so many hon. members remaining until this hour. If the house would agree I should like to move that standing order 7, which provides that we adjourn at eleven o'clock, be suspended in order that the house may sit after eleven o'clock this evening.

Mr. HANSELL: I shall be through in one minute.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend would allow the motion to be put.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is there no limit of time on this motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I rather gathered it was not likely there would be many more speakers. If my hon. friend would wish a twelve o'clock limit fixed, well and good; I think that should be safe.

Mr. BRACKEN: I take it we shall not be asked to stay here after twelve o'clock?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to.

Mr. HANSELL: I thank the Prime Minister for his motion, but I shall take only a minute or two. I was saying there was a time when we could have produced more, but the policy of the government was to pay people not to produce. Well, now the chickens are coming home to roost, and we have scarcity. That is the result of what I would call the blundering financial and agricultural policy of this administration.

There is one other point, with which the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) dealt just before he sat down. I believe he made the point that this bill would do more than anything else to promote communism in Canada. I believe that was an unfortunate observation. Personally I doubt whether he really meant what he said, but in any event he said it. The fact of the matter is that it is not the loan that will cause any trouble in respect of communism. It will be the financial policy of the country—and I am not talking about loans now but about the policy with respect to debt and taxation—that will do more than anything else to make people in Canada dissatisfied. I would say to the hon. member for Temiscouata and those hon. members from Quebec who have spoken against the loan that I appreciate their position. They are fine men; they have convictions, but if I could leave one message with them to-night it would be that the democracies of the world must stand together. They must reciprocate one with the other in the common interest of all. If they do not do that I am afraid communism will take over. That is something to be considered. We must live together or we shall die separately.

Once again I wish to emphasize—and I think I am speaking for my group, or in any event for some of them—that we support this bill on moral grounds. If we were in power, perhaps we would assist Great Britain even to a greater extent, but our financial policy would not be the one that the present government has. We support the bill because of a moral obligation and we trust, indeed we know that there will always be an England.

Motion agreed to, on division; bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

On section 1—short title.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: With regard to Monday's business we shall continue with bill No. 28, which we have been discussing this evening. If that measure is concluded, we shall continue with bill No. 7, relating to citizenship. Then there is the second reading of bill No. 9 and the second reading of bill No. 10. Probably that will be enough; if it is not, we can fill in the time with estimates.

Motion agreed to, and the house adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

INSTALLATION OF HIS EXCELLENCY FIELD MARSHAL THE RIGHT HONOURABLE VISCOUNT ALEXANDER OF TUNIS, G.C.B., G.C.M.G., C.S.I., D.S.O., M.C., LL.D., A.D.C., GOVERNOR GENERAL OF CANADA

Address of Welcome to His Excellency The Governor General By The Prime Minister of Canada

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister of Canada): It was with great pleasure and no small measure of pride that the people of Canada learned some months ago that the King had appointed Your Excellency to succeed the Earl of Athlone as His Majesty's representative in Canada.

We were all delighted at the word of your safe arrival at Halifax. We rejoice at your presence to-day in Canada's capital.

On behalf of the government and the people of Canada, I have the honour to extend to you and Lady Alexander the warmest of welcomes to our country. We in Canada have sought to make the family and the home the foundation of our national life. In Your Excellencies and your children, we recognize and welcome a happy family.

As Prime Minister it is my privilege to express to Your Excellency the satisfaction felt by members of the government, and by all Canadians that you have now entered upon the duties of your high office.

In welcoming Your Excellencies to Canada, we are reminded of the visit some years ago of the King and Queen. The fortitude and steadfastness displayed by Their Majesties throughout the long and cruel years of war are also much in our thoughts at this time. We should like our first word to Your Excellency to be one of assurance of Canada's fidelity to the crown, and of the devotion and affection of the Canadian people for Their Majesties.

We welcome you to Canada with especial warmth because of your close association with Canada's armed forces, as Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Armies in Italy, and, later, as Supreme Allied Commander in the Mediterranean. The Canadian veterans who served in the Mediterranean theatres, on land, at sea or in the air, are eagerly awaiting the opportunity to express anew the respect and affection you inspired in them.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

It is our hope that, during your sojourn in Canada, Your Excellencies may have many opportunities to visit all parts of our country. You will find, wherever you go, a welcome in the homes, and a place in the hearts, of the Canadian people.

We are all proud to recognize in Your Excellency one of the great military leaders in world history.

It is of interest to recall today that in the war of 1914-18 you gave early signs of the military genius and leadership which in the recent world war you displayed in such exceptional measure. The power to anticipate developments and the capacity to inspire confidence have been outstanding characteristics of your career.

The free nations have reason to be grateful for the manner in which, in the years between the wars, you devoted yourself to preparation and training for high responsibilities. In those years you acquired a wide command of languages and extensive first-hand knowledge of geography. Your varied experiences contributed to that generous understanding of men which enabled you to lead, in the greatest harmony, the forces of many nations. This achievement in itself inspired new hope in the hearts of men and women of many lands.

It has been well said that your career touched both the depths and the peaks of the war. In the chances and changes of war, you have been neither discouraged by defeat nor unduly elated by victory. We recall your resourcefulness and gallantry on the beaches of Dunkirk; your part in rebuilding the British army in the dark days of 1940; the stubborn rearguard action you fought in the jungles of Burma; the calm courage with which, at a moment when Egypt seemed all but lost, you assumed command in the Middle East. From that moment, from El Alamein to Tunis, from Sicily to the Alps, the forces you organized and directed moved forward, steadily and relentlessly, to final victory. Your success in welding together the fighting forces of many nations is evidence of the highest qualities of statesmanship.

During the years of war, Your Excellency commanded the confidence of armies of many nations. As a trusted servant of the crown, you also enjoyed, in full measure, the confidence of their parliaments. That confidence was shared by none more than by the parliament and people of Canada. It is with equal confidence that, today, members of both houses of parliament welcome Your Excellency in your new capacity as the representative, in Canada, of His Majesty The King.

ADDRESS OF HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

I am deeply touched by the warm welcome which you have extended to me and my wife on our arrival in Canada, and I thank you also for the generous tribute which you have paid to me personally.

In honouring me by this splendid welcome, Canada, upholding the traditions of two great races, has shown her feelings of loyalty and devotion to our King, whose personal representative I have the honour to be, and it will be my duty and pleasure to convey to His Majesty your sentiments of attachment to him and his Throne.

It is very moving and inspiring to witness, as I have in two world wars, the way the members of our empire family have rallied together in the cause of freedom. And of all the peoples of the British commonwealth, none have played their part more nobly or given more generously than Canada.

Your contribution to the common effort has been both remarkable and outstanding—worthy of your great position in the world, and typical of the great heart of your people. You have sent the riches of Canada in the form of vast quantities of food and material of all sorts and huge sums of money, and above all you have sent in no small measure your richest asset—your men and women.

During the fighting days it was my privilege to have under my command your magnificent soldiers, sailors and airmen, who took such a distinguished part in our victories in the Mediterranean. Canadian troops were in the van during the capture of Sicily, when the first breach was made in the nazi-held Fortress of Europe. Canadian troops broke the Hitler line at Ponte Corvo, where, as the spearhead of the 8th Army, they opened the way to the capture of Rome, and Canadian troops were again in the forefront of the battle when that great defensive position in the Appenines known as the Gothic line, the last German fortress covering the valley of the Po, was pierced at Rimini on the Adriatic coast.

It was not only a sad occasion for me, but a grievous loss to my armies, when this great Canadian Corps was transferred from Italy to the western front, where they went to join their own countrymen, there to gain fresh laurels for Canadian arms in the last great battles of the war, which led to the collapse of the nazis in Europe.

Canada may well be proud of her sons and and of the magnificent part they have played in final victory.

Can you doubt, then, that I and my wife are proud and happy to come here with our children, to make our home and to live amongst you?

Mr. Prime Minister, in your address of welcome to us, you used a phrase which strikes a very responsive chord in my own heart, when you said that you in Canada have sought to make the family and home the foundation of your national life. I believe as you do that the family and home are the very basis of a healthy, happy and prosperous people.

You have a grand country, but it has been made by the character of its people, who are blessed with enterprise, initiative, imagination and energy—four great qualities which make for success.

To-day we find the world restless and disorganized by six years of war, and consequently we face many grave and difficult problems. This, I think, is inevitable when we consider the magnitude of the struggle we have all been through, so we must not be unduly discouraged. I am convinced that we can surmount all our difficulties as successfully as we did in the fighting days, provided we stand firm in upholding those principles we have fought for and tackle the future with sober optimism and energy.

Although I have now said "Farewell to Arms", this does not mean rest and relaxation; on the contrary, there is lots of splendid constructive work to be done, and it will be my aim and privilege to devote myself wholeheartedly to the duties of my office, which will allow me to watch with sympathy and interest the progress, happiness and growing prosperity of the Canadian people, who have earned for themselves, by their own endeavours, the great position they hold in the world to-day.

Monday, April 15, 1946.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

PRICES AND SUPPLY—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think it desirable to make a statement to the house in regard to the supply and price of farm implements. Throughout the war years, and continuing through to the present, the question of ensuring an adequate supply of farm implements is one which has consistently been given special attention by the government. Towards the end of 1941 when the needs of war caused acute shortages of steel and component parts, hon. members will recall that a rigid control and allocation of all forms of steel and components was found necessary and a far-reaching priority system was set up. When doing so, however, particular attention was given to the needs for farm implements and they were placed in the very special position of receiving a priority as high as essential war production in regard to production programmes agreed upon from time to time. A special international committee was formed comprising representatives from the United States, United Kingdom and Canada to screen the requirements of the allied nations for farm machinery and equipment so as to determine minimum essential needs in relation to agreed food programmes. This committee worked out the allocation of available materials for each country and maintained a fair balance in its distribution. When this had been accomplished it became the responsibility of each country to determine what machines and equipment were produced to meet essential needs.

Through these special measures hon. members will be interested to know that despite the most urgent pressures for direct war equipment the government was successful in providing for Canada a steady flow of farm implements throughout the course of the war.

Notwithstanding this fact, however, it is true that a greatly expanded agricultural production, obtained despite a serious decline in farm labour, has meant that the demand for machinery and equipment continues far in excess of available supply. A significant barometer of the demand in this field has been the fact that in farm auction sales, prices bid for used machinery and equipment have been often far in excess of maximum ceiling prices on new equipment.

[The Governor General.]

Immediately following the cessation of hostilities the question of diverting all possible industrial production facilities towards meeting the demand for farm machinery and equipment was taken energetically in hand. The urgent need for food is so apparent that I need not emphasize it. Suffice it to say that it is the obvious duty of all producing countries to increase agricultural production to a maximum and all practical steps toward this end must be taken.

In studying the measures necessary to secure a maximum production of farm machinery and equipment the wartime prices and trade board, to whose administrative jurisdiction this question is entrusted, has reached the conclusion that some recognition of the uncontrollable war-time increases in the cost of materials, labour and general overhead is simply inevitable if vitally needed machinery and implements are to be secured. This decision was reached after a careful study of cost information submitted by the farm implement industry. Accordingly, on Saturday, April 13, the board announced that maximum retail price ceilings for Canadian-made farm machinery and parts will be increased by twelve and a half per cent. Naturally, this step was taken with considerable reluctance. However, faced with the plain fact that increased costs of materials and component parts produced in Canada, or imported for assembly here, together with increased labour and other overhead costs, could not be absorbed at present price levels, it was obvious that a maximum production of farm machinery and equipment could not take place unless some relief was afforded. I should add that the analysis of costs conducted by the prices board indicated that a price increase of upwards of 30 per cent above 1941 levels would have been required to regain 1941 profit percentage margins for the farm implement industry. Consequently, the price advance of only 12½ per cent means, admittedly, a serious profit squeeze upon the industry, but in this transition period the government believes the prices board approach in the case of farm implements to be fully justified in view of the imperative need for holding down to a minimum, cost adjustments in the important basic industry of agriculture.

With one minor exception of a 5 per cent increase to adjust an anomalous situation on a small volume of implements (principally imported items) at the commencement of the price ceiling in the fall of 1941, prices have been held at or below the ceiling prices of the basic period in 1941. This rather remarkable record was made possible partly by reason of large war contracts which expanded the volume of the industry and partly by insisting that increasing costs be absorbed by the industry instead of being passed on to the farmer consumer. Now that war production has swung over to normal supplies, however, the cost increases, as I have already stated, can no longer be absorbed and a reasonable price adjustment had to be worked out. In their submissions the companies disclosed increased costs since the basic period of 1941 averaging, roughly, materials and components 20 per cent, labour 28½ per cent, and general overhead 23 per cent. Unit costs in the coming year will run higher than this for some time due to premiums on castings, increases on imported components and higher than normal overheads which bring the over-all cost increase close to 30 per cent. In fixing the increase in the ceiling price at not more than 12½ per cent the board has in mind that only through volume production can the Canadian farm implement industry survive, under the present level of costs and selling prices so that the price increase now authorized means that the companies must do their utmost to achieve a maximum volume of production. That I should add is exactly what is needed to meet the chronic shortages of farm implements which exist to-day. It will be of interest to recall also that on July 1, 1944, the exchange tax and all customs duties were removed from imported farm implements so that farmers are now assured that the Canadian price level must be fully competitive with other markets. I am further informed that retail farm implement prices in the North American continent are at least 25 per cent lower than in any other market in the world to-day.

To sum up, I wish to say that with the price adjustment now authorized and with the steps taken to give priority assistance in the securing of raw materials, such as steel, castings and component parts, I believe that the serious shortage in farm implements will begin to be remedied this year. I must warn, however, that with the best will in the world all shortages cannot be overcome immediately and that factors beyond our control, such as, for example, the recent strike in the steel industry in the United States, and the present coal strike, can seriously upset all forecasts or plans. It follows that strong inflationary influences are present in this field, both here and in the United States where about 50 per cent of our supplies of farm machinery and implements are obtained. For example, the United States farm implement industry during the months of January and February, 1946, showed a production decrease of, roughly, 20 per cent over the same months of 1945, or figured in dollars a total of some $110,000,000. Because of the dependence of the Canadian farm implement industry upon the United States for certain essential components, such a sharp decrease there inevitably affects production here.

The squeezed down price increase which has been allowed in the Canadian field of manufacture will, with the cooperation of the farm implement industry, ensure a maximum production in our own field of manufacture to the full extent that materials and labour are available, but there remains a very definite hazard that more serious price advances in import prices, over which we, of course, have no control, may yet be witnessed.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just made a statement with respect to the announced policy of raising the price ceiling on farm machinery by 12½ per cent. He has sought to justify that policy on the grounds of increasing costs to the manufacturers and of the need for human food.

I want to commend the minister for making this statement, because it gives us some idea of the justification the government offers for this proposed increase. When the house adjourned on Friday evening we learned of the forthcoming announcement to be made through the press—and I am sure we are pleased to hear from the minister to-day. But I do not think I should let this opportunity pass without saying two or three things about the matter.

Speaking for those around me on this side, I think the government is going about the process of removing controls in the wrong order. Here is an increase in the price of farm machinery with no corresponding increase in the price of farm products. It is an increase in the price of farm machinery at the time that farmers are starting to seed their crops, and at a time when the world is short of food. As I say, I think the government's policy is to be criticized for the way in which the government is going about it, and for the timing of the announcement. The machinery which the farmers need to-day is already in the shops, and yet the prices to be paid for it are tomorrow's prices and not yesterday's. I welcome the minister's statement, but I am afraid we cannot support the policy or the reasons he has given for it.

It follows an announcement of a few days ago of an increase of $5 a ton in the price of steel, at which time there was no announcement that anything would be done to make possible an increase in the wages of steelworkers. I submit that the plans for the removal of these controls ought to be better correlated than they are, according to the evidence we have.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman. I permitted him to make a few remarks but, as he knows, statements made by ministers at this stage are not debatable. That is a rule of the house.

Mr. ILSLEY: I thought myself that debate was not permissible, but I should certainly like to say something in answer to what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could not an arrangement be made whereby this particular matter might be discussed by the house? There are many of us representing agricultural constituencies and we should like to say a word and incidentally to revise our whole attitude towards the stabilization of agricultural prices. An opportunity should be given before the house adjourns to discuss this subject.

Mr. SPEAKER: As I have already pointed out, statements of this kind made by ministers are not debatable. I understand that hon. members are of the view that it is necessary to debate the question. If they will consult Hansard they will see the information which the leader of the house gave on Friday night when he intimated that the house would probably be called upon to-day to resolve itself into committee of supply. When a motion to that effect is put to the house by the Speaker, hon. members will have an opportunity to discuss this matter. I consider it the duty of the Speaker to point out to hon. members that the minister's statement is not debatable.

Mr. BRACKEN: We accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, whatever it is. I simply wish to point out, however, that the minister has been allowed to make a statement and the house is denied an opportunity of saying anything about it.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Under the rules he is allowed to make the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Again I regret the necessity of interrupting the hon. member, but I think it is my duty to refuse permission to the hon. member to make the remarks which he is submitting to the house. It is a well-known practice in this house, and one which is observed every day, that ministers may be allowed to make statements of the kind under discussion, but such statements are not debatable. That is not a matter of ruling by the present Speaker; it is a practice of the house. As I pointed out a moment ago, however, hon. members will have an opportunity to discuss their grievances to-day when the house is asked to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word with regard—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: Either this is debatable or it is not.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid I cannot give the minister permission to engage in a debate.

Mr. BRACKEN: In view of this announcement to-day, and the fact that we are not allowed to debate the matter, I wish to move the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the government's policy as announced last Saturday of permitting an increase of 12½ per cent in the ceiling price of farm implements, without permitting a corresponding increase in the price of farm products and thus imposing on the farmers extra production costs just at the time when they are preparing maximum production to meet the critical food situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member wishes to avail himself of the privilege afforded by standing order 31 to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a matter which in his opinion is urgent. Before going any further I would call his attention to a ruling given by the Hon. Mr. Rhodes, then Speaker, on April 5, 1918, which will be found at page 744 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition:

> There is one point mentioned by the hon. member to which I would reply, and more especially for the benefit of proper decorum in the house on the matter of urgency. Urgency, within the meaning of the rule, is not a question whether the matter proposed to be discussed is of urgent importance—

And I insist upon these words.

> —it may be of infinitely urgent importance to those affected—the question is whether it is urgent within the meaning of rule 39; in other words, whether it is a matter of that urgency which would cause harm to the public interest if the ordinary opportunities provided by the rules of the house were not able to permit the subject to be brought on early enough.

It is the duty of the Speaker to point out to the house that we have before us now routine proceedings and orders of the day and that preparations have already been made for the consideration of to-day's business. It is my duty to see that these orders of the day are followed. Hon. members have been apprised since Friday last of the business that would come on to-day and have prepared themselves accordingly. I realize that it is the privilege of every member to avail himself of standing order 31 and to move that the business prepared for to-day shall be set aside to enable him to move the adjournment of the house. It is for the Speaker to decide whether the matter which it is proposed to discuss is of sufficient urgency and of sufficient public importance to warrant the suspension of the order of business. On this question the Speaker has not to decide "whether the matter proposed to be discussed is of urgent importance," but to decide whether it is urgent within the meaning of standing order 31. If hon. members will look at Hansard of Friday they will see that the leader of the house stated that probably on Monday the house would be asked to resolve itself into committee of supply. Every hon. member knows that, except on Thursday or Friday, before going into supply the question is put by the Speaker, and any member has then an opportunity to rise and discuss grievances. I would ask the hon. gentleman to wait until there is a motion for supply, when he will have the opportunity to discuss this matter. For that reason, I must rule that there is no urgency sufficient to justify setting aside the orders of the day to enable the hon. member to discuss the matter.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then Your Honour's decision is against me?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, it is.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I have an opportunity of saying a word with respect to the ruling?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might intervene just for a moment. I noticed His Honour the Speaker mentioned that there would be an opportunity to discuss this matter on the house going into committee of supply, and drew attention to the fact that I said we might go into supply to-day. But I preceded that possibility by a statement to the effect that we would go into supply if we concluded the measure dealing with the United Kingdom loan and also the measure on citizenship. I do not believe there is a possibility of concluding either of those measures to-day. In these circumstances, I would direct the attention of the house to what His Honour the Speaker said in the first instance, namely, that leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house when made for the purpose of discussing any definite matter of urgent public importance must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business has been concluded and before notices of motion or orders of the day are entered upon.

My hon. friend has brought forward a perfectly proper motion, but again at the wrong time. If he will wait until the daily routine of business has been concluded and before questions, notices of motion or orders of the day are entered upon, I would submit he might then bring forward his motion.

Mr. BRACKEN: If Mr. Speaker would like me to bring it forward again, I shall be very glad to do so. I thought it was proper to bring it forward after the minister had made the statement. I would point out to Mr. Speaker that there was no undertaking by anybody that we would go into supply to-day. That order stands on the order paper every day throughout the session.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have called the attention of the hon. member to the fact that it was announced Friday by the leader of the house—

Mr. CASSELMAN: The Prime Minister denies it.

Mr. COLDWELL: If Your Honour will read what the leader of the government said on Friday evening it will be seen that there was a full day's business announced. The leader of the house then said, with a smile, as I remember it, "Probably that will be enough; if it is not, we can fill in the time with estimates." We shall certainly have no time to fill in if we follow the government's programme.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member knows that the Speaker's decisions are not debatable.

Mr. COLDWELL: The motion was made at the wrong time; therefore, the Speaker's decision will probably have to be given again.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that I have not to question when the motion for the house to go into committee of supply will be called. But it is my duty to remind the house that the motion is on the order paper of to-day, so whenever it is called, any hon. member will have the opportunity to discuss this urgent matter.

Mr. COLDWELL: With all due respect I am pointing out that the business of the house is so heavy for to-day there is almost no chance, in the Prime Minister's own opinion, to reach estimates. This is a matter of urgent public importance and should not be blocked by such a ruling.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORTS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table the following reports in English and French:

Annual report of the Canadian National Railway system for the year ended December 31, 1945; annual report of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust for the year ended December 31, 1945; report to parliament of George A. Touche & Co., auditors of the Canadian National Railway system, for the year ended December 31, 1945.

Copies of the reports are being distributed to hon. members this afternoon. By leave of the house I move:

That the annual reports for 1945 of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust and the auditors of the Canadian National Railway system, tabled this day, and the annual report for 1945 of Trans-Canada Air Lines which was laid on the table of the house on April 11, 1946, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the following items of estimates for 1946-47:

Vote 422, Maritime Freight Rates Act—Canadian National Railways;

Vote 423, Maritime Freight Rates Act—railways other than Canadian National;

Vote 469, Prince Edward Island Car Ferry and Terminals—deficit 1946.

And that the resolution passed by the house on March 28, 1946, referring certain estimates to the committee of supply, be rescinded in so far as the said resolution relates to votes Nos. 422, 423 and 469.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT ACT, 1942 —REGULATIONS GIVEN STATUTORY EFFECT

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 54, to amend the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942.

Mr. FRASER: Explain.

Mr. MITCHELL: I expected that.

Mr. FRASER: We expected it, too.

Mr. MITCHELL: We are in unanimous agreement. In 1942, parliament passed the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, to provide assurance to members of the armed forces of their right to reinstatement upon discharge, in the employment they were engaged in at the time of acceptance for service. The act provides that such reinstatement shall be on conditions not less favourable than if such persons had continued in the employer's employment without interruption.

In administering the act at earlier stages of the last war, a number of uncertainties arose on matters of interpretation and on the application of the act to circumstances which probably were not contemplated at the time the act was passed. It was, of course, important that reinstatement should not be held up on account of these uncertainties. Therefore regulations under the authority of the War Measures Act were passed in January, 1945, which included not only matters of procedure under the act but also provisions designed to clear up the uncertainties relating to the interpretation and application of the Act. These regulations have now been in effect for some fifteen months and I am advised have been found suitable and effective to carry out the purposes of the act.

Employers and labour organizations have extended the utmost cooperation in reinstatement of veterans and have shown much initiative in working out plans to this end in individual establishments. In consequence, the number of cases requiring the intervention of the officers of the Department of Labour administering the act have been comparatively few to date. The purpose of the bill is to incorporate at this time the regulations approved by the governor in council under the War Measures Act as part of the provisions of the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act and thus give statutory effect to them.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

SENATE BILLS—FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 17, respecting the marking of articles containing gold, silver or platinum—Mr. MacKinnon.

Bill No. 29, to amend the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, 1929—Mr. Claxton.

FARM IMPLEMENTS

INCREASE IN RETAIL PRICE CEILINGS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I made a motion which was declared out of order, possibly on the technical ground raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that it had not been brought in at the proper stage of proceedings. If the motion is out of order I think that should be made clear on its merits, rather than on any technical grounds. I understand this is the proper time to bring it in. I would therefore move the motion again; and if on its merits it is out of order a ruling can be so made and it will be obeyed.

Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely the government's policy as announced last Saturday of permitting an increase of 12½ per cent in the ceiling price of farm implements without permitting a corresponding increase in the price of farm products, and thus imposing on the farmers extra production costs just at the time when they are preparing maximum production to meet the critical food situation.

Mr. SPEAKER: A few moments ago I had the opportunity to give to hon. members the practice followed in this house as far as these matters are concerned. Now, since there is some objection, and since the house is master of its own proceedings, I will put to the house the question whether or not the hon. gentleman shall have leave to proceed.

And leave having been given:

Mr. BRACKEN: There is very little more I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, in addition to what I said a short time ago. Had the house permitted me to make that brief statement we would have let it go at that. I simply wish to point out that the best order was not followed in removing these controls, and that the timing was not well considered in this instance. At the very time the producers are starting to sow their crops they learn that farm machinery is going to cost them twelve and a half per cent more.

One other criticism is this. Last Friday evening we heard of a forthcoming announcement to raise farm machinery prices, which was carried in the newspapers on Saturday morning, and to-day we have the decision of the wartime prices and trade board explained by the minister. He brings it in at the opening of the house, with hon. members given no opportunity to debate it. I took what opportunity there was to say something against it; when I was denied the privilege of saying a word or two more, this motion had to be moved if others were to be allowed to speak.

I simply wish to say that the way these matters are handled—with decisions made outside the house, then explained here by a minister at a time when they are not debatable—it simply makes of this parliament with respect to these matters nothing more or less than a listening post.

I have said all I wish to say. Here is a measure increasing the cost of farm machinery without permitting an increase in the prices of farm products, just as two weeks ago another government decision was made which increased the price of steel by $5 a ton without at the same time making provision for some increase in the wages of steelworkers. That is my criticism. The policy is most unbalanced and inequitable. I could take longer, but this is the protest I wished to make, and those are some of the points I had in mind.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I want to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) in his criticism of the procedure, though I know it is in conformity with the rules of the house. When an announcement of this importance is made I do believe hon. members should be given an opportunity to debate it; and I am pleased indeed, Mr. Speaker, that you have afforded hon. members that opportunity, because of course I realize that it was quite possible for you to deny hon. members the right to discuss this matter under the usual procedure of this house.

May I say to the government through you, sir, that we in this party have been warm supporters of the idea that the government must have certain powers in order to exercise control to stabilize prices generally so that there shall be no runaway inflation, and we have supported that policy both in this house and in the country. But several things that have been done recently by the government have tended to increase the cost of producing agricultural products. Recently in western Canada we had increases in the cost of gasoline, fuels and so on. Now we have an increase of 12½ per cent in the prices of agricultural implements. May I add here that while I rise this afternoon to protest against this increase, we recognize that if the price ceilings are to be removed from one set of commodities, the prices of all other commodities will have to be adjusted as well. There must be no inconsistency in our attitude in that regard. Some of my hon. friends of the official opposition who have been urging the removal of price ceilings are now protesting against the removal of the price ceiling on agricultural implements. We are not in that position of inconsistency.

May I say this, while I am on my feet, that in 1938 this house established a committee, of which I was a member, which went into the question of the high prices of agricultural implements. We found at that time that in many respects the high prices which then existed on agricultural implements could not be justified. We made certain recommendations to the house and to the government with a view to lowering the prices of farm implements in the interests of agricultural producers. So far as I know, up to date at least none of the major recommendations of that committee has been adopted either by the government or by the companies.

I wish to support very strongly the protests made against this increase. At a time when we are trying to maintain a certain measure of stabilization in our economy we have this increase in prices of farm implements. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) has mentioned that we have also had an increase in the price of steel. Again I agree with him that this increase of $5 a ton in the price of steel was exactly the same increase as was made in the United States. But in the United States that $5 increase was granted on the condition that a certain increase should be made to the workers in the steel industry. In our country there has been no conference with the workers and no such condition. But the $5 increase has been handed out, and probably to some extent it is reflected in the announcement made to-day that the prices of agricultural implements are to be allowed to increase by 12½ per cent. That is not the kind of policy we expect from the government, or that the people of this country expect from parliament. If we are to have stabilization, then let us have stabilization. If the farmers are to be compelled to accept stabilized prices for their products—prices well below American levels, as has been pointed out incidentally—then I say that other industries upon which farmers rely for their supplies should also be held at proper levels.

I can see no justification for this—either for the increase in the price of steel, or from my recollection of the results of the inquiry into the high prices of farm implements. We found then that the cost of distributing farm implements was excessive. We found that the costs shown as charged to farmers for service rendered by implement companies were excessive. Now we find ourselves faced with an increase which is indeed very serious. We know that tariff adjustments have been made in the interests of manufacturers; the matter of diesel engines was discussed at the last session. In all these things it is indicated clearly that while workers are being held at certain wage levels, and farmers are being held at certain price levels, some of these large manufacturing concerns are to be allowed to increase their price levels. This house, every side of it—at least those of us who represent constituencies which are agricultural—should protest against the putting into effect of this kind of policy.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) in protesting against this increase in the prices of farm machinery, which comes as the result of an order made last Saturday by the wartime prices and trade board. I had intended to raise this question at the proper time, and to move the adjournment of the house as has already been done by the leader of the opposition. I am pleased to note, sir, that you have been good enough to grant us this time to discuss a most important matter—because I do believe it is important. It is a matter which should receive the earnest and full attention of every hon. member.

My reasons for preparing to ask for the adjournment were as follows. In the first place the order will have no less effect than to increase the cost of the production of farm products. The farmers will simply have to pay higher prices for their machinery. Everyone knows they have been paying too high prices already, owing to the protection afforded farm machinery manufacturing in Canada. The farmers in our country have certainly been at a great disadvantage owing to the high prices they have had to pay.

In the second place, in my judgment the increase in the prices of farm machinery threatens to defeat the all-out food production programme announced by the government just about a month ago. I feel certain, from the reaction of farmers already indicated, that this doubtless will cause widespread consternation among them. They certainly will not be ready to go forward willingly—as I am sure they were ready to go forward at the call of the Prime Minister in his food programme.

In my judgment the board's order intensifies the already serious handicap under which farmers have been operating for some time past, that of having their farm produce prices stabilized at levels lower than world price levels. It has put them at a terrific disadvantage as compared with the position enjoyed by farmers just across the line immediately to the south of us. Not only are our prices stabilized at levels lower than world price levels, but the border is closed to the export of cattle and live stock generally. This makes it difficult for our farmers to carry on in competition with their American neighbours. Unless remedial action is taken at once, this order of the wartime prices and trade board will have the effect of curtailing the production of agricultural goods at a time when every pound of foodstuffs is of the utmost importance in filling the world shortage, the great world need.

This is even more serious, coming as it does at a time when the spring work is about to begin. The farmers have already made up their budgets and plans for the year. It comes also at the end of six years of shortage of farm machinery, and at a time when farmers find it absolutely essential to increase their depleted stocks and to replace that which has been worn out.

The board's order imposes upon the Canadian farmers a burden of cost which they simply cannot bear, particularly so long as the level of taxation remains as it is in Canada, and so long as the farm commodity price stabilization policy continues in effect at present levels. In my judgment the board's order has precipitated a crisis in agriculture in this country. Therefore it does become a matter of grave urgency, and one to which the house should give its closest attention.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has said in his statement, it may be that some revision of prices should be made at this time. I am not fully convinced of that yet. I should like to have further figures to supplement the statement already made by the minister. However, I have always taken the position, in connection with the control of prices, that should it become necessary to revise, let us by all means consider the revision carefully. Let us do it along sane lines, and make certain that any increase in prices is justified. That is why I am certain that hon. members, and particularly farm members throughout Canada, are anxious to take part in this discussion to see to it that these price adjustments are justified. Should it be found that the increase of 12½ per cent is justified then, to ease the minds of farmers, and to make certain that they will feel like continuing an all-out effort to relieve the food shortage throughout the world, I suggest that the government take into immediate consideration the absorption of those price increases by continuing the present prices of farm machinery to farmers, the difference being made up by a subsidy gathered through taxation from all the people of Canada. That is the only justifiable way of handling the situation.

My colleagues and I strongly urge that this action be taken to set at rest the minds of the farmers, to let them understand that we are aware of their problems and that we are attempting to assist them in their all-out effort to produce food in large quantities sufficient to satisfy the need.

I am happy to join in this effort to understand the whole problem, and in the discussion of it. I do not wish to say more at this time.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to speak briefly, Mr. Speaker, because I do not want the house to think that this side is unanimously in favour of this price increase. I do not know whether it was the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) or the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) who said that this increase of 12½ per cent would not materially increase production of machinery so far as this year's output is concerned. The increase is in the retail price, and these implements to a large extent are already in the hands of the retailers, and so I agree with the hon. member that this price increase will not materially increase the production of farm implements this year. I disagree with the leader of the opposition on many things, but I certainly agree with him that the wartime prices and trade board are starting at the wrong end of this thing. They are trying to build the roof on the house before they have laid the foundation. I think it is the duty of the Department of Agriculture once more to run agriculture and not to let it be run by a bunch of clerks down in the wartime prices and trade board.

I am also in accord with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), the leader of the Social Credit party, when he says that if it is necessary to increase the price of farm machinery for these firms to operate, all right, let us do that. But again reverting to the leader of the opposition, let us do it from the proper angle. For instance, how long will the farmers have to wait to get this increase of four cents a pound on butter? That does not go to the farmer immediately. And now, overnight, without any consultation with the representatives of agriculture, this increase of twelve and a half per cent in farm implements is made. As representing a rural riding I definitely protest against this increase under present conditions.

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin): This is a very important question, especially for those who come from agricultural ridings, and I do not want to let the opportunity go by without saying a word.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) characterized this price increase, if I understood him aright, as a squeeze-down price increase. I do not know just what that means, but it seems to me that the minister is busily engaged in pushing down prices in an upward direction, because that is what it amounts to. I am not satisfied with the explanation given by the Minister of Finance. In telling us of price increases in steel and in labour he told us only part of the story, and we are entitled to hear the whole story. He did not tell us, for instance, that the cost of selling farm machinery in the last few years has gone down almost to the vanishing point, and that advertising and salesmanship, if any is done at the present time, is now unnecessary to sell farm implements. It is no longer a job of selling the implements but rather of finding a place where you can buy them. So the cost of selling should not be a factor at all in the price increase. A dealer with any implements on hand does not have to run around among the farmers, burn gasoline and spend time trying to make a sale. All he has to do is to sign the order when it is made out by the applicant.

I think also the house is entitled to know what has been going on behind the scenes, and who are the people applying for this price increase. We should be told to what extent these implement companies are losing money, if they are losing money. We have not been told the whole story, and unless the minister is prepared to give us a much fuller statement than he did to-day, it is up to us as representing the farmers to register our protest in the strongest possible terms against this price increase.

The minister has not told us whether before this decision was taken the members of the party which supports the government were taken into the confidence of the government. We have already seen that one evidently, was not consulted, and that he does not care for this decision. I should like to know how many more members of the party are of the same opinion. I should like to know how many members representing western Canada are in agreement with this price increase. Were they consulted, and what is their opinion? This is a matter of great importance, Mr. Speaker, and I do not think the house should let this opportunity go by without squeezing, to use the minister's own word, a great deal more information out of the government than has been so far given.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I should like to add my voice to those who have already protested against this increase in the price of farm implements. I was very much surprised that the government should take action that would be likely to discourage production at a time when increased farm production is urgently needed to help the devastated areas of Europe, and for that matter all countries of the world.

It will be remembered that during the nineteen thirties thousands of our farmers became bankrupt, and a great number of them financially embarrassed, and as a result they were not able to buy the farm machinery which they badly needed. They were also unable to replace buildings that had become dilapidated. During the war the farmers found themselves in a better position, but owing to the lack of supply they still were unable to buy farm machinery. Now that the farmers are in a better position to buy machinery, because in the first place they have the money and because in the second place the machinery will become available, we find that the price is to be increased by 12½ per cent.

I am not satisfied that there will be no increase in the price of machinery that has already been produced. I am afraid that we shall find this increase placed on machines already in transit or in the hands of the dealers. That has been our experience in the past, and I should like to know what guarantee the minister will give that there will be no increase in the price of any farm machinery already produced. The member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) does not think that this increase will add very much to the price of farm implements. But on a tractor, for instance, it means an increase of $235.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Pardon me; I never said that at all.

Mr. QUELCH: The hon. member did not think that the farmers would have to pay this increase on implements already in the hands of the dealers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Pardon me. What I said was that I did not think it would materially affect this year's production. I was following the argument of a previous speaker. I would ask the hon. member not to put words into my mouth that I did not use.

Mr. QUELCH: Certainly not. I understood the hon. member to say that he did not think the price would be increased on machines already in the hands of dealers.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. QUELCH: That is fine.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I say that this price increase relates only to farm implements made in Canada. Tractors are not made in Canada; therefore the instance given by the hon. member does not apply.

Mr. QUELCH: The price of tractors will not be increased?

Mr. ILSLEY: This order does not affect the cost of tractors at all. It applies only to Canadian-made farm implements.

Mr. QUELCH: Does it affect the price of combines?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the list.

Mr. QUELCH: They are produced in this country. It will mean an increase of from $250 to $350 in the price of a combine, which is a very considerable increase.

I want to deal for a moment with the position of the machine companies. We remember that during the depression no substantial reduction was made in the price of farm machinery. There was a substantial reduction in the production of machinery, but not in the price. The reduced production arose out of the reduced demand because the farmers did not have the money to buy the machines. In 1937-38 the price of farm machinery went up 7·8 per cent, and the excuse given at that time was that owing to the lack of sales the overhead had increased and the price must be increased. One may well ask if there was any justification for an increase in price even at that time. I recall that the committee which was set up in 1937 found that the profits earned by the International Harvester company from 1926 to 1935 were 6·5 per cent. That, at any rate in the later years, was a period of low production. Yet in spite of the fact that they earned a profit of 6·5 per cent up to 1935, they increased the price by 7·8 per cent in 1937. Incidentally this increase in price came just after the report of the farm implements committee, which was very critical of the high prices, was tabled in this house and concurred in—the increase showing an utter contempt on the part of machine companies apparently, for the opinions of this house. At that time an interesting report was given to the house on the operations of one of the large machine companies in this country. I hold in my hand a volume of Hansard of 1938 containing the report of a speech made by the chairman of the farm implements committee when moving, on March 11, concurrence in the report. This is what he had to say regarding the operations of the Massey-Harris company, as reported on pages 1238 and 1239:

> We find that the Massey-Harris company does 60 per cent of its business outside of Canada. In 1891, when the Massey and Harris interests were merged, together with some other manufacturers, they had a capital of approximately $3,500,000, of which only $300,000 was put up in cash, the remainder being given in exchange for the assets of the constituent firms that were merged. In that period, 1891 to 1912, the capital remained at $3,500,000 leaving out of consideration for the moment another $1,000,000 that was put in in 1911. What do we find happening during that period? On a capitalization of $3,500,000 this company was able to pay cash dividends amounting to $11,212,349 and stock dividends of $8,500,000, or total dividends of $19,712,349; to create a rest account of $6,500,000; to set up a special contingency account of $1,680,000 and to retain unallocated in surplus account $1,061,000, or a total of $28,959,349. That is a very substantial return on a capital which amounted to $3,500,000 at the inception of the company and which remained at that figure until near the end of that period, when an additional $1,000,000 was put in. I am sure no one would say the prices this company charged its customers during that period were not sufficient to pay them a good rate of interest on the original investment, to give their stockholders sufficient in the way of dividends and still leave a very, very wide margin. Such is the situation with regard to that company, and broadly speaking it may be said to apply to many of the other companies, with perhaps a little less force.

That is from the speech made by the chairman of the committee which had been investigating these companies; I think therefore it bears a fair amount of weight.

I do not suppose there is any doubt that these companies have done pretty well for themselves during the war. It is not likely that they have been producing at a loss. In the earlier stages of the war I read reports in the Financial Post as to their profits, which at that time appeared to be very satisfactory. What is the situation to-day? Unquestionably the volume of business for the machine companies will be very heavy, and the greater the amount of their business the larger the reduction, of course, in their overhead cost. It was brought out in the committee investigation in 1937 that costs of collection and losses incurred through bad debts were quite heavy, representing in the neighbourhood of five per cent. As I understand it, that loss will be entirely eliminated, because as a result of certain legislation passed in this house farmers will be able to pay cash for their machines, as they can go to the banks and borrow the money. Machinery companies will not be selling their machinery on time, so losses such as they suffered in the past as a result of bad debts and heavy collection fees will be wholly eliminated. This should make it possible for the companies to reduce their costs quite considerably. If, however, as the leader of this group pointed out, it should be found that the companies must be allowed to increase their prices in order to carry on, we shall have to do one of two things; either remove the ceiling on the price of agricultural products so that the farmers will not be obliged to sell at a loss, or have the additional cost absorbed by the people as a whole instead of by the farmers alone, as we did during the war. We imported goods which cost more than the price at which they were sold under the price ceiling, and the government subsidized those firms so that they could sell at a discounted price in this country without losing money. If the government feels that the machine companies must increase their prices by 12½ per cent in order to avoid loss, let the government subsidize them to that extent and let the cost be borne by the people of Canada instead of by the farmers alone.

This government has unfortunately contracted the habit of subsidizing the people of this country and the people of the world in respect of agricultural produce and putting the full cost of the subsidy on the farmer alone instead of distributing it among all the people. We have a good instance of that practice in that we are selling wheat to Europe at $1.55 a bushel. Our party do not object to that for a minute, but in view of the fact that the world price is around $1.98—that is the selling price in Chicago—if we are to sell to Britain at $1.55 the farmers should not have to absorb that loss alone; it should be absorbed by the people as a whole. Indeed, the farmers are not even receiving $1.55; they are receiving $1.25, though of course they hope that at some future date the participation certificates will make up the difference.

I should like again to emphasize that we feel the government should do one of two things. If the government is going to take price ceilings off goods which form part of the cost of farm production, it should take the ceiling off agricultural products. You cannot continually increase the cost of the implements of production while keeping a ceiling on the price of the articles produced. If, on the other hand, the government is not prepared to do that, it should, as the leader of this group has pointed out, allow a discount on the price of machinery and subsidize the machine companies to that extent.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): My remarks will be very brief. I assume that the minister will be taking part in this debate before it is concluded, and if so, I shall appreciate it if he will answer at that time one or two questions I want to ask.

To-day I met a delegation of workers from Toronto. The position of those who are working in agricultural implement plants came up, and I asked them whether these plants were increasing or reducing the number of their personnel. Their reply was that the staffs are being reduced. My second question to them was whether wages were being increased or lowered, and the reply to that question was that wages are being lowered.

Those who represent agricultural constituencies have done a very fine job so far. I represent a working man's constituency, and many, perhaps a thousand, of my constituents work in one or other of the agricultural implement plants of Toronto. I should like to know whether the information I got from the delegation is correct. Are the staffs being reduced, and are wages being reduced? If wages are being cut, then I should like to know why the workers cannot be given more if the price of implements is being increased.

Mr. H. G. ARCHIBALD (Skeena): I should like to say a few words on this matter. What I notice especially is that the government has gone to great pains to put up a case for the manufacturer of agricultural implements and to explain the necessity for this increase. When I see the government going to great pains to explain an increase in the workers' wages then I will understand there are some changes being made in this country for the benefit of the people as a whole. In Sydney, Nova Scotia, the workers tried for a period of from two to two and a half years to get an increase, and then they were told to go and renegotiate and they would get it. They got it the other day, but it took them approximately five years to get it. These manufacturers have the friendship of the government and the workers have not. When the workers come to the government and ask for higher wages they get treated to a Dutch-uncle lecture by the Prime Minister. But the manufacturers get favoured treatment.

In the United States there was a $5 increase in steel—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member says that when the workers come to the government they get a Dutch-uncle lecture from the Prime Minister. I hope he does not assume that one organization speaks for all organizations in this country or for labour generally. I have met three or four labour delegations within the past week or two and I may say to my hon. friend that by three of the four my attitude was highly commended.

An hon. MEMBER: "That ain't the way we heerd it."

Mr. ARCHIBALD: I thank the Prime Minister for his contribution, but as my hon. friend says, "That ain't the way we heerd it." In the United States a $5 increase was given in the price of steel, but there was a corresponding increase in wages. In this country the price has been advanced before any increase in wages. Now when the workers go on strike —and it looks as though they will have to— and ask for an increase in wages, they will be told they are encouraging inflation; and the companies will demand a further increase, and this will have a tendency to split the farmer from the worker. But it will not work, and there is one group in this house who will see that it does not. The C.C.F. is that one. This action will have a tendency to affect every home in Canada. We listened to lectures during the war telling us how to keep down inflation, to buy bonds, and all the rest of it, but as soon as the war is over—here we go again. The manufacturers are to get their pound of flesh, and the people of the country have to give it.

Mr. PATRICK H. ASHBY (Edmonton East): Agriculture is big business. I do not know who designed these chairs, Mr. Speaker. Sometimes I wonder if those who erected and furnished these buildings had any imagination. Walking down these corridors I get a smell from the match factory across the river, and I say to myself, "What a Hull of a smell!" I sometimes wonder what imagination, sir, the individual had who gave you the title of Mr. Speaker; for I notice that you do the least speaking in the house, although I must admit you say more when you do not get on your feet than many hon. members do who speak from the floor. Instead of giving you a black gown as a symbol of your high office, had I the opportunity I would give you an old fashioned golden ear trumpet about the size of a fog horn, so that you could hear what is being said in the house.

I said that agriculture was big business, with many branches. There are the primary producers, and there are the farm implement manufacturers, the packing plants, the transportation companies, the wholesalers, the retailers, all serving the consumer. I do not think I can do better than to read from Hansard of December 14 last at page 3491. I may be criticized for agreeing with this, but I believe it was the statement of a great man:

> A member of parliament represents the people of the nation at large—all classes.

That statement was made by the Prime Minister, and I raise my hat to him for those words. If hon. members will appreciate the truth of what he said on that occasion they will realize we are not here to represent the farm machinery companies. We are here to represent the farmers as well—all classes. I do not see how any human being could utter greater words than those, and if the individual members of the Liberal party realize their significance, we would go far. In fact, I honestly believe that we in Canada would accomplish a great deal, if the Prime Minister meant what he said, and I am taking it for granted that he did. I am not listening to what other people tell me. He says that we are here to represent all the people, all classes, and I can assure the house that if we get behind the spirit indicated by those words and fight to represent the people of Canada, all the people, we shall go far. Indeed, I believe we can show the world that we in this great dominion can lead mankind out of chaos and into a period of prosperity and happiness such as has never been known before in human history.

The Prime Minister told my wife and me that he was seventy-two years of age. I believe he has an opportunity to leave his name with us for generations to come as a great man; for he has the opportunity to-day to see that all the people of Canada are represented here. I am not a Liberal. I do not believe in liberalism, conservatism, socialism, communism or any other "ism". I believe in results, and I will join with any individual or group of individuals—I think I can speak for this group when I say this—who will truly represent the will of the people. We will join with any party who will represent the will of the people, and we will give that party our whole-hearted support.

Let me read some more. The Prime Minister said:

> I do not think it is desirable . . . that any man should come here to represent any organization except his own constituency. I do not care whether it is a trade union organization or any other organization, a man ought to be here to represent the general interests of his constituents.

As things are to-day, with this 12½ per cent increase, there is only one way that it can be paid and that is by the farmer, through a lowering of his standard of living. And the farmer, of all people in Canada, is the one who has suffered most during this war. I know that, because I was farming during the war, and so were my wife and children and the wives and children of other farmers throughout Canada. They toiled and sweated, the majority of them without pay or remuneration of any kind. During the war our neighbour's boys were taken out of school to work on a farm, as was many a son, and those boys worked not for a mere eight hours a day but for ten and sixteen hours a day. I remember one night, when it started to rain those boys could not go to bed but had to continue working up until midnight in order to protect their crops and they were working with old worn-out machinery. Three of these boys did not want to bother their mother, who was already too tired from the day's work. They were too tired even to go and wash. They went to sleep in a shack which was filled with the fumes of a motor used for charging batteries, and the next morning the mother found her sons there, cold and dead. This is just an indication of the sacrifices that were made by farm boys, farm women and men during the war. Those who are trying to carry on are now being asked to pay, and pay in hard-earned money, to replace their worn-out machinery.

What results do we desire? We want to live here in Canada, and we can live. The method that we are now using in dealing with this problem is not the only one. There are alternative methods, and I can assure you, sir, that we can reward the farm machinery companies with a 12½ per cent increase, enabling them to continue the service they are rendering to the workers in the factories and at the same time sell the machinery for less than 12½ per cent higher. We can cut the price twenty-five per cent lower than pre-war prices and sell to the farmers without loss to anyone. It is merely a matter of method. There are a dozen methods, devised and known, some good, some bad, which will enable us to do that. What is more, we can cut the price of farm produce to the consumer; for the ultimate object we have in producing is to enable the consumer to enjoy the fruits of the production. Just as we produced war materials to the tune of billions of dollars, shipped them overseas and delivered them to the enemy, absolutely free, so we can produce farm machinery and give it free to the farmers without loss to anyone. It is merely a little different method; that is all.

We can double the production of all farm produce at any time agriculture is free to go ahead. The machinery companies will produce the necessary machinery; I have no doubt whatever of that. They are the experts, and if they are given the opportunity to do so, they can produce machinery which will enable one farmer to produce as much as a hundred farmers did before. I can guarantee to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that if farmers are given their freedom to produce, we can do more than double production; we can produce ten pounds of butter and ten quarts of milk for every pound of butter and quart of milk produced before, without increasing the number of live stock on our farms, without increasing the acreage in production, and at no additional cost to the consumer. In fact we shall be able to sell even cheaper. It is merely a matter of method. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that it is wrong to force the farmer to pay more for his farm machinery. He can be given the finest machinery and pay less for it than he is paying now.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in this case it is quite evident that the ruling was decided upon after the representations were made by the manufacturers of implements. I doubt very much whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) sought the advice of the farmers or any farmers' organization. I should be greatly surprised if they had approved it. There is more to it. I have often complained that members of parliament are not consulted. If we had been consulted we would have informed the government of the difficulty that the farmers endured during the war. They have been striving very hard not only to farm the land but especially to secure machinery. How many times did I write to secure jeeps for the farmers? The answer was no. How many times did I write to secure trucks and trailers for them? The answer was wait, wait. Sometimes I received one permit but there are many farmers who got nothing.

I was shocked the other day when I saw that in spite of the fact that the farmers of our community cannot get not only what they want but what they need, that boxes of trucks were shipped to Finland, for instance, a country with which we do not yet know whether we are still at war. It goes on like that. Everything is good for the outside and our own people are told to wait, to wait, to wait, and that they will be looked after in due course.

The increase in price may affect the farmers only if they can buy the implements. It may look a little strange, but if the farmers are precluded from buying the farm implements that they need the price may go up but it will be a matter of indifference to them. They will have to cultivate with their hands. Well, we have passed that age. I hope that farmers will be given due consideration.

I cannot congratulate the chair, but I shall tell Mr. Speaker of my appreciation of the fact that he has given hon. members of the house an opportunity to give some information to the government about the situation of farmers throughout the country. I complained many times about the dominion Department of Agriculture which serves no purpose in eastern Canada. I want the department to be abolished and the expenditures of the department to be distributed proportionately to the farmers in each province. This may be the view an extremist, but until that is done I hope that the farmers of the east will be given the consideration to which they are entitled. I hope that the department will not insist on putting into force a ruling such as the one we heard read a moment ago.

There is another point that I want to insist upon. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Archibald) said just a word about it. We are told that all the financial machinery of the government is there to prevent inflation. If there is an increase of 12½ per cent for the manufacture of farm implements that 12½ per cent increase should be for all, and then it will be a 12½ per cent step toward inflation. Now I use reasoning to the Minister of Finance and all the experts who surround him. We should not make prices higher because the country will be at a loss in a very short time if we pay more for this and if we pay more for that. If the farmers cannot get more and if labour gets higher wages that will be inflation. If that is not inflation, what is it? I am puzzled about it. I want the minister and the government to give the farmers the same consideration that they give to any other group.

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words on this matter. When I heard the minister announce a twelve and a half per cent increase in the price of farm machinery it seemed to me another example of the patchwork quilt policy of the wartime prices and trade board. They set up a price ceiling scheme shortly after the beginning of the war. Since then they have found it necessary to change that ceiling from time to time, to change something here and change something there, until it has become a fearful and wonderful thing to see, so that at the present time no one knows where they are at.

I am sorry indead that the minister's statement is not yet in print, because I should have liked to study it a little before making up my mind as to whether or not this increase is justified. I am not going to condemn the increase in the price of farm implements until I do know whether or not it is justified. I recall that a few years ago this house set up a committee of which I was member, to investigate the prices of farm implements. I know at that time a real attempt was made to prove that the prices of farm implements were too high, but I was never convinced of this. I thought the companies made out a very good case to show that their profits were fairly reasonable, and that they could not continue to produce if prices were reduced to any considerable extent. I also recall that at about the same time the present government saw fit to allow agricultural implements to come into this country free of duty, stating this was done in order to lower the cost of the implements of production used on the farm. The present increase does not look very much like lowering the cost of these implements of production If I were to make an offhand suggestion I would say that present prices may be legitimate and fully justified, byt I want to point out that once more, in relation to this price increase, the farmer is the forgotten man, because his interests have not been taken into account. I know the minister will say there have been increases in the prices of certain farm products. It is true that we had a recent increase of four cents in the price of butter and $2 in the price of hogs, but that does not begin to establish a balanced economy in this country as far as the farmer is concerned.

To a very great extent the farmer bore the brunt of increased costs of production during the war. Lately he has been getting a lower price for his wheat than is being paid in the United States. He has been getting a lower price for his beef cattle than he would obtain if he were permitted to ship them to the United States. He has been getting a lower price for cheese than he would receive if it were sent to the United States. I could go on down the line showing that the farmer has lost out in a great many ways. Now we are told that there is to be an increase in the cost of his implements of production. I wonder if this twelve and a half per cent increase will guarantee that the farmer will get sufficient implements with which to carry on. During the war the farmer was not able to buy the implements he required, and to day many of his machines are obsolete. Labour is also very scarce. In my own riding an investigation was made which showed that in this dairy county there was an average of only twelve men to every thousand acres. The farmer needs new implements, and unless he can get the money with which to buy them he will not be in a position to carry on. During the war the farmer was loyal enough to work twelve or fifteen hours a day in order to produce foodstuffs, but now the war is over he is inclined to sit back and take things a little more easily. That I think is what he intends to do, unless he is given a better deal.

I do not intend to say anything further, but I do believe that if this increase in the farmers' cost of production has been found necessary, there should have been corresponding increases in the prices of the things the farmers produce.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I was not in the house when the minister gave his explanation for the increase in the cost of farm machinery; possibly if I had been here I would not have found it necessary to speak now. However, since eighty per cent of my constituents are farmers I know this is going to be a heavy burden upon them. In the maritime provinces we have very little manufacturing of farm implements. Years ago we manufactured our own farm equipment, but as everyone knows this industry is now carried on in the central provinces, so with us it is all pay out and nothing coming in, as far as farm machinery is concerned.

It seems to me this twelve and a half per cent represents a very large increase in the prices of farm machinery. We all know that such machinery is very scarce, and we all know that during the war farmers worked with worn out machines. We also know that as a result we must have mass production, for there must be a tremendous need for farm equipment throughout the country, which also should mean mass sales. As some one has pointed out, this in itself should mean that the cost of farm machinery ought not to rise to any great extent. I mentioned that farmers have had to carry on with worn out machinery. We all know that if there is a farm auction anywhere in the district the farmers flock to it by the hundreds in order to purchase whatever machinery may be available.

My main reason for rising, Mr. Speaker, was to point out to the minister that one particular class will be greatly affected by this increase in price. I refer to the soldier settler, the man who has just returned after five years of service overseas; the man who is being encouraged by the Department of Veterans Affairs and by the government in general to take up farming. He is beginning from scratch, as it were. As the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie) knows, we in the veterans committee are trying to make things as easy as possible for these soldier settlers, and I fear this is going to be a direct slap at these men, who have planned on buying their machinery at current prices. Now they will find they must pay twelve and a half per cent more, which I am sure will be a great disappointment to them. I hope that some further arrangements may be made which will be equitable as far as the veterans are concerned.

I might also point out to the minister, as other hon. members have mentioned, that here in Canada we are trying to stem the flow from the farms to the cities. Our cities and towns are greatly overcrowded; we have thousands of men and women in them without homes, while in the country we have hundreds of homes without people living in them. I think everything possible should be done to encourage the trek not from the country to the cities but back from the cities and towns to the country. Otherwise I fear we are going to have a very unbalanced economy, and a very unbalanced situation in this country. Increases such as these are going to make this great problem harder to solve, instead of helping us find a solution.

I do not think I have anything further to say. As I said before, I was not in the house when the minister made his explanation. There may be some good and sufficient reason for this increase; but as the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) said a few moments ago I feel that this burden should not be placed upon the agriculturists of this country alone but that some way should be found of having it borne by all the people. We should encourage our farmers. They are given four cents per pound increase in the price of butter, but the farmers in my constituency—and in that constituency they are chiefly dairy farmers—do not consider that increase was enough. They have tried to produce butter during the war at ceiling prices, with the result that thousands of them went out of butter production and sold their raw milk, or engaged in the production of cheese.

These matters should be carefully considered. I hope it has been well considered, and that it will not react unfavourably—as it seems it might—to the farmers of this country.

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I listened closely when the minister spoke. This was one occasion when he spoke so that I could hear him, and for that reason I believe what he has said is clear to me. His statement indicated his belief that the evidence produced by farm machinery manufacturers was sufficient to justify an increase in the price of farm machinery, as indicated by the wartime prices and trade board.

I have here a brief statement, which I shall read:

> The demand for farm machinery will not be met completely until 1947, according to a statement made by F. M. Morton, vice-president of the International Harvester Company. Mr. Morton says the supply of parts is easing, but there is still a labour shortage. A shortage of man-power in the foundries particularly is preventing full production.

He made that statement some time around September of last year, and made no mention about prices.

There is a widespread opinion in the country that when what we in this corner describe as capitalistic or monopolistic enterprise makes a submission to the Right Hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) they meet a sympathetic judge. I do not impute any ulterior motives either to the minister or to the companies; but I submit that in each case where a person is charged with a crime the judge permits the submission of evidence from both sides. The facts which can be gathered by either side are presented.

The people of this country have not had access to those facts. They have not had an opportunity of hearing the parties to the case. Surely the judges should be those who have always had to pay these high prices. But they have not had an opportunity to bring their side forward, nor have they heard the evidence to which the minister and his advisers have listened so courteously.

As was pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this group, we have supported the government's policy of control, even though there has been some discontent in rural constituencies of the west, as expressed to us in letters. We supported the price ceiling of $1.55 for wheat on the ground of our belief that it was necessary for the reconstruction of the world, for the feeding of its peoples, and to make it possible for Great Britain and other countries to have sufficient agricultural products without suffering too heavily the penalties of war. If the present increase in farm implements is allowed to continue, any support I have given to a programme of that kind will have to be withdrawn, and I shall have to join forces with those who are demanding a substantial increase in the price of farm products.

If we applied the 12½ per cent increase to the price of wheat, it would bring that price to somewhere in the neighbourhood of $1.75. I was deeply impressed by what was said by the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), when he referred particularly to the veterans. Under the Veterans Land Act the veteran is permitted to purchase stock and equipment to a value of $1,200. Those of us who know something about agriculture have known that this amount is utterly inadequate, at present prices, to obtain proper equipment for any young farmer who hopes to operate a prairie farm, and to make a living from it.

This increase of 12½ per cent just makes it that much more difficult, with the result that many young veterans will simply say, "Oh, what is the use?" As the hon. member for Royal pointed out, instead of going on a farm, the veteran will say, "I hope that somehow or another, through some process, I can get a job in one of these factories. Some day the government may allow an increase of one per cent of the wage scale in that factory, when they are allowing 12½ per cent on the sale of the product."

When I said at the outset that I believed all the evidence should be submitted, I was speaking seriously. Not only do I believe that, but I urge that such evidence should be as conclusive as possible. I had a reason for making that statement, because I would point out that, if an opportunity is given, better evidence can be submitted at a later time.

Let me go back a few years, to the thirties, and remind the house through you, sir, that the federal government in the United States, the government in Ottawa, and the Liberal government in Saskatchewan in 1939 each conducted surveys into the cost of farm machinery, and all found that farm machinery prices to farmers were too high.

Let me read now just one paragraph from page 10 of the report of the special committee on farm implement prices and distribution set up by the legislature of Saskatchewan. The report is dated March 27, 1939, and I draw attention to the date in particular, because it was a Liberal government which set up that committee—not a C.C.F. government. In its report the provincial government referred to the Ottawa inquiry. One paragraph, headed "Price structure", is as follows:

> Early in 1936, the companies announced an increase of price in farm implements amounting to 4·4 per cent as found by the Ottawa committee. It was this particular increase, announced after a substantial reduction in the tariff from 25 per cent to 12½ per cent, that gave rise to the Ottawa inquiry. Despite a further reduction in the tariff to 7½ per cent and despite the findings of the Ottawa committee that this increase was not justified and that the prices of farm implements had been, over the years 1913-1936, too high, despite, too, a definite finding that there was an excessive mark-up over cost on cream separators and repair parts, and that the prices of these should be particularly and substantially reduced, this committee finds that none of these findings were given effect to, and that, in addition, further price increases occurred in 1937.

They also occurred at later dates. With that evidence, and as a result of other submissions before this committee of the legislative assembly of Saskatchewan the recommendation came in that the committee did not—and remember that it was a Liberal government—believe that some things should be done concerning which recommendations had been made. That had reference to the recommendation that the government should take over the manufacturing and distribution of farm machinery. But they did recommend, and the government supported the recommendation, that cooperative organizations be set up for the purpose of doing that job.

I wish now to offer some evidence of what could be done in the future, and of what might have been done in the past had it not been for the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: That recommendation was in the Ottawa report, too.

Mr BENTLEY: Yes, it is in the Ottawa report, too. When this report came out the western farmers said, "All right, if the load is on us to do the job, we have already built quite a number of cooperative organizations in the past. We know we have been able to reduce the cost of manufacturing gasoline from crude oil. We have tried that out, and made it stick, despite the fact that the major oil companies submitted that they could not reduce the cost of manufacturing gasoline." I draw that particularly to the attention of the Minister of Finance. Our little cooperative in Regina reduced the cost substantially, almost cutting it in two.

When this recommendation came out the farmers said, "All right, we will try it." It will be remembered that this report came out in March, 1939, just a few months before the outbreak of war. In the following autumn they were ready to begin organizing a cooperative implement company. Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited took out a dominion government charter, and various provincial charters under provincial cooperative laws. The dominion government does not have a cooperative law, and perhaps the legal end of the government can explain why they did it as they did. Anyway, Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited got started. They were to raise capital. The idea was to finance themselves and then make a deal with one or more of the implement manufacturing companies to take a large proportion or all of their output, failing which they would buy or build factories and manufacture for themselves. They raised quite a bit of capital, but let me remind the house that the year 1939 was just about the end of what were known as the hungry thirties. There was no great amount of capital in the farmers' pockets to mobilize the necessary working capital to get Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited going quickly before we found ourselves immersed in a war, and the War Measures Act and war regulations started to take effect. Nobody complained about that, and we do not now, because the war had to take precedence over everything. One of the war orders was to the effect that no new business could be started without permission and that there must be no new outlets for consumer goods. So that Canadian Cooperative Implements Limited never got to functioning until quite recently, and now they are ready to go ahead.

Let me remind the house that in our inquiry as to the cost of making gasoline from crude oil we found that, in spite of what the major oil companies had said, their figures were too high. The cooperative proved that because the major oil companies met the competition of the cooperative, and I have seen no reduction in the price of their stocks as quoted in the daily market reports appearing in the press. In spite of the evidence which the Minister of Finance listens to so sympathetically and then tries to convince the house, I believe that there is no real reason for this increase of 12½ per cent in the price of farm machinery. Let me refer the house to Mr. Morton's statement. He never said, last September, that more machinery would be produced if the price was allowed to go up. He said that labour shortages were the main cause of the scarcity of farm implements and that it would be 1947 before the farmer had a full line of machinery available to him.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) and the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) have said that they do not believe this 12½ per cent increase will have any effect whatsoever on the supply of agricultural implements in the summer of 1946. Mr. Morton said that the demand could be met in 1947, but he did not say that it was necessary to have any increase in price whatsoever. Because of that I think the minister has been too ready to listen sympathetically to profit-hungry capitalistic organizations which have continually made more money than they required and had more economic and other kinds of power in this country than any group of people are entitled to and which have exercised that power over a very large group of extremely productive and important citizens, the farmers of Canada, who need infinitely more sympathy from ministers in charge of departments in this government than these companies need.

I should just like to give some indication of the sharp rise there has been in the price of farm machinery in the few years of which we have been speaking. I quote from the report of the special committee on farm implement prices and distribution adopted by the Saskatchewan legislative assembly on March 27, 1939:

> The Ottawa committee found, as a result of its exhaustive inquiry, that a binder was truly typical in all essentials of "small implements" generally.

On the next page the report shows the increase in the price of a binder from 1936 to 1939. This is the cash price at Regina, and is typical of the increase that has been made in the price of small implements. So that you can add the same percentage increases to the prices of any type of farm machinery, including binders and much larger machinery. A binder at Regina cost in 1936, $281; in 1937, $295; in 1938, $324.75; in 1939, $324.75. Those prices are on top of the reduction that was made in the tariff from 25 to 12½ per cent by the dominion government in 1936, I believe.

In the face of that kind of evidence I urge the minister not to allow this increase in the price of farm machinery until Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited have got going to the point where they are manufacturing and having an influence on the cost of manufacture and distribution of farm machinery. Then, when we have a cooperative concern operating in competition with the combine of private companies—and that is what it is—there will be far better evidence to show whether or not an increase in the price is warranted. I can assure the minister and the government that, while that competition is going on, none of the big implement manufacturing companies in Canada which have made representations to him and the wartime prices and trade board to have this 12½ per cent increase put into effect will give up in despair. On the contrary, they will find some way to get along without this 12½ per cent increase.

I wish to bring one more matter to the attention of the minister. Every time that an increase in price has been granted to the implement manufacturing companies—I could cite many more tables from this little booklet which is good Sunday reading when you come home from church or at any other time—that price never goes down; it always stays there or goes up. If you grant this 12½ per cent increase, there it will remain, not considered by them as a concession on your part to help them over a difficult spot but as something they have a right to; and you will find them coming back again in a few months for a further increase in price. Whatever increase in price is granted to them they hang on to with a fist of iron. Then in a few months they will come back again to the government to sympathetic ministers like the Minister of Finance with evidence to show that their factories are going to tumble down, their homes be destroyed and the whole economic structure go to pieces if they are not granted a further increase.

No evidence has been produced to show that the implement manufacturing companies need this increase which the minister is authorizing at this time.

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few observations on this question because in my riding farm implements are produced and many of my constituents are employed in their production. My observations, therefore, will be particularly directed toward the point of view of workers' wages. Before dealing with that, may I say that I believe it will be only a matter of minutes before some member of the government will rise in his place, look across at this side and say: What are you complaining about? You have been advocating the removal of price ceilings from many products.

I would therefore remind the government at the outset that foremost in our programme for raising ceilings is the raising of the ceiling on workers' wages, and, second, raising the ceiling on the price of farm products. Both of these policies are at complete loggerheads with the present policy of the government. Therefore the government must not be surprised if they find the Progressive Conservative party advocating that the present policy be given further thought. I believe the minister should tell us whether there is a wage increase for the workers in the farm machinery manufacturing companies which is to be discovered, perhaps, by the same means that the steel workers discoverd theirs, or whether this is a direct advance in price and the manufacturer will get the complete benefit. The minister should also tell us whether the wartime prices and trade board have any machinery of coordination with the national labour board, because it seems to me that the government is out of step with itself all the time; that these two boards do not coordinate their work, and that as a result, when the price of a commodity increases the workers must separately seek their share of the price increase.

But my real reason in rising, Mr. Speaker, is to deal with this as a fundamental question and not as one purely of the wages of labour or of an increase of price. In my opinion, there are three possible reasons for this price increase. It may be the result of pressure group action upon the government; it may be, as the minister says, to stimulate full production; or it may be to meet a corresponding rise in prices and costs in the United States. I do not believe that the government would submit to a pressure group at this time; at least I will give them credit for that. I do not think the minister can be convinced that a 12½ per cent increase of the selling price of farm machinery will result in full production or, indeed, increase it. I submit that this price rise is probably caused by the inflation of United States economy which is having its effect on us at the present time and which is being felt all across Canada. The position of this industry is only one instance of the ways in which our country is being influenced by United States prices of accessories and finished parts. The government are not tackling this problem from its fundamental cause; when they permit a rise in the selling price of one group of articles they are not going to the root of the matter. The root of the matter is that our Canadian economy is not so organized that it can protect itself against the economy of the United States of America. Fundamentally, it cannot protect itself because the United States is suffering inflation at the present time, and in my opinion this is only a beginning of its effect on Canada. We are going to meet this problem in connection with many other lines of goods especially in cases where we find ourselves dependent on the United States for either fully manufactured products, semi-finished products, or articles which are assembled in this country. Instead of putting the wartime prices and trade board to work to figure out various price increases, we should put them to work to figure out ways to protect our Canadian economy from these dangers of inflation; and it should be the job of the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) to see that all these products which we have to import, to assemble and to use in the manufacture of this machinery should begin to be produced by ourselves here and now. Then the minister will be protected, and he will not have price rises forced upon him by inflation south of our border.

I rise simply to submit these two points to the house: that no mention has been made of wage increases; that no mention has been made of the fact that the Massey-Harris Company of Canada, which was on war work, has been unable to increase its wages, and actually, at a time of rising prices, workers are receiving less for their money than they were during the war. The minister should also try to find ways of protecting the Canadian economy from the dangers of inflation in the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend is talking about the Massey-Harris company. May I ask him a question?

Mr. SKEY: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Has he any knowledge whatsoever that they have reduced the wages of their employees?

Mr. CASSELMAN: He did not say that.

Mr. MITCHELL: The inference is there.

Mr. SKEY: I have not exact knowledge, except this, that I have been so informed by a number of constituents; and I know one man, whose income over a period of a month was $80. He has approached me and asked if I could find him some other employment. I can give the minister his name if he wishes it.

[Mr. Skey.]

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): I wish to say a few words on this particular question, in spite of the advice of my doctor, who told me not to take part in any debate. However, I can say that my memory is still very good, and I remember what the government has done for the farmers.

I do not wish my words to be taken as an approbation of higher prices for farm implements. On the contrary, I believe the price of those implements should be lowered. But I am surprised at what I have heard and seen this afternoon. Apparently there are quite a number of people whose memory is not very good or whose memory is quite convenient. I notice that the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has stated that the farmer is again the forgotten man. Then hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Ashby) reminded the house of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said at one time, that a member, once elected, was a member for the country at large, and he invited the Liberal members to realize that, once a member is elected, he represented the whole country. I also notice that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) stated that the government was proceeding the wrong way in allowing farm implement companies to raise their prices. If the leader of the opposition had come to the house earlier instead of being a political rover a few years ago, he would have known that the government had thought of the farmers before this proposition came before the house to-day.

Mr. FRASER: They thought of them but they did not do anything for them.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Let my hon. friend have a little patience. It would seem that his memory is failing, because he was here in 1944 when the government passed the following measure; an act for the support of prices of agricultural products.

Mr. STIRLING: What did they do with it?

Mr. BRUNELLE: The act, which was cited as the Agricultural Prices Support Act of 1944, was assented to on the 15th of August of that year.

An hon. MEMBER: What good is it?

Mr. BRUNELLE: Just wait until it becomes necessary for this act to be put into operation. I would remind hon. members that the government did think of the farmers in providing that the prices of agricultural products be stabilized. That act was passed in 1944. I have heard complaints to-day that the government was not thinking of the farmers. I repeat that the government did think of the farmers in 1944, but apparently a great many members who were not then in the house did not know of that act, while other members who were in the house previously had forgotten about it. Let me quote section 3 of the act:

There shall be an agricultural prices support board under the direction of the minister consisting of three members, including a chairman and a vice-chairman, to be appointed by the governor in council and who shall hold office during pleasure.

I quote next from section 9, which deals with the powers of the board. When one farm product does not bring to the farmers a sufficient or adequate or profitable price the board shall have the following powers:

(a) to prescribe from time to time, with the approval of the governor in council, prices at which the board may purchase agricultural products in the market;

(b) to purchase at such prices any agricultural product, if such product, on inspection, meets standards as to grade and quality prescribed by or under any act of the parliament of Canada; provided that any agricultural product, for which dominion government standards have not been established, may be purchased by the board on such basis of quality as the board may prescribe;

(c) to pay to the producers of an agricultural product directly or through such agent as the board may determine the difference between a price prescribed by the board with the approval of the governor in council for such product and the average price, as determined by the board, at which such product is sold in the market during a specified period if such average price is below such prescribed price.

After hearing the remarks that have been made this afternoon, particularly those of the last speaker, who addressed himself to the Minister of Finance, accusing him of siding with the big interests in this country, I thought it was only fair that someone should show that the Minister of Finance and other ministers as well were looking after the interests of farmers before this date.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I am very happy to be able to make a few observations on this particular item, representing as I do, for the most part, an agricultural constituency. When this announcement was made on Friday, through the radio and the press, I could not help thinking that here was another piece of glaring evidence of the result of government by bureaucracy. Over and over again, during my experience in this house, I have had to ask myself why we are here anyway. Particularly during the war years, even though we permitted a certain amount of authoritarianism to exist in government administration, I have wondered just what power parliament itself has really had. Announcements are made from time to time. Nobody seems to know where regulations come from. Ministers seem to reach into the air and suddenly, like a bolt from the blue, an announcement is made. No one is consulted. Parliament may be sitting at the time but parliament is never consulted. Things are done by somebody who sits at a desk behind the scenes and I almost have to ask myself, who on earth is running the country. Do the people's representatives after all have anything to say in the matter?

This particular announcement, involving as it does an increase in the price of farm machinery by 12½ per cent, is no little thing. It means a great deal to the farmer because 12½ per cent is quite a rise, quite a slice. If it had been two or three per cent they would, I am certain, have objected. But 12½ per cent is a lot. I do not believe that the method by which these price increases are made is the right one.

Take, for instance, as a comparison the matter of tariff items. When there is to be a change in the tariff the matter is brought before the tariff board, a body appointed to look into all such questions involving an increase or decrease in tariffs. Very often there comes to our desks a notice that the tariff board will be sitting on a certain date on a certain item, and the matter is known throughout the country. People can appear before the board and make their submissions as to why or why not such a tariff item should be increased or decreased. After that, it is included in the annual budget. It is brought into the house and debated and becomes part of the legislation of the country. That is all right. I do not complain in that event. But in comparison, here is a matter the effect of which is the same as an increase in the tariff structure and yet we have not had an opportunity of discussing it. An announcement is made. It is virtually the law of the land. When the minister is replying I wonder if he would mind telling us what the process is, what procedure is followed when it is decided to raise the price of a particular item. Does the wartime prices and trade board sit behind closed doors? Is the country aware that it is considering such an increase?

Will the minister tell us whether farmers' organizations were invited to make a submission on this particular matter. I should like him to tell the country what the procedure is when the wartime prices and trade board wishes to take certain action. I desire to know why such a matter as important as this—and it certainly is important—is not brought before the house in some way by which the minister can get the sense of the house by a vote. To my mind, a matter of this kind should have some such procedure. A tariff item would. Why not this one? Notwithstanding all the government's technical, financial and economic arguments, I wonder whether they would take a chance on getting the support of the members of this house who are the representatives of agricultural constituencies, by putting this to a vote. I am suggesting to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government dare not do that. I will suggest what the government is doing. I will suggest that it is attempting to hide political party weakness behind bureaucratic authoritarianism. Now is the time when we can see democracy in action. Here is the opportunity for democracy to cut across party lines and I declare to you, sir, that it is my firm opinion that the government dare not take that chance. I challenge it to take it.

One of the minister's arguments for the rise in price—if I heard his announcement correctly—was that secondhand machinery had been selling at auction sales at a good price. I admit that is so. I have attended at some of these auction sales and I must say that I marvelled at the prices some farmers were paying. But that is no argument in this case, because at an auction sale there are some farmers who have a wad of money to spend, but there are others who have not and at an auction sale the small farmer may be at a disadvantage.

An hon. MEMBER: He always is.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes. Action is taken in this matter which affects all farmers, small ones as well as large ones. I protest because of that. I protest because of another matter. I do not know whether the minister will consider this to be important or not, but the increase in the price of farm machinery comes at an unfortunate time. It comes when the farmer is commencing his year's operations. Perhaps he will have to obtain a line of credit at the bank. I do not know what the procedure may be, but perhaps he will have to finance the year's operations. He now finds before he starts that he is likely to have a further burden in the rise in price of his machinery. Let us remember that to-day farming is carried on almost entirely by the machine. I do not know whether I should mention this, but it was not very long ago that this house took action to raise the salaries of certain people in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: In this house.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend reminds me that I should say, "in this house". I was in favour of that. As a matter of fact, we have been fighting for the farmer for a long time and neglecting ourselves. When I went back to my constituency I found a certain reaction to that in some places. I thought I could explain it all right to some of these people. Nevertheless it did leave a bad taste in some of their mouths when our indemnities were raised. My reply to that was that they should have spoken before because the resolution was on the order paper for several months waiting to get the sense of the country. Be that as it may, we took that action, and I believe we did the right thing. But if it left a bad taste in some mouths, what will the taste be now when they realize that parliament can raise their own salaries and also the price of farm machinery? It is not good. I say it is unfortunate that it comes at this time for that reason. Whether the argument is a sound one or not I do not know.

There is another unfortunate thing about the timing. This is the month when the farmers are making out their income tax. They find that they have to fork out their money in payment of their income tax; they also find themselves faced with a 12½ per cent rise in the price of the machinery which they have to buy.

An hon. MEMBER: It is poor political strategy.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says that it is poor political strategy but I have never known the Liberal government to be far behind when it comes to political strategy. Do hon. members not see the strategy? It is not a party matter. That is what I said a moment ago. The party can hide behind some bureaucratic board and say, "Oh, we did not do it; the party did not do it. We have the wartime prices and trade board. They are competent men. Here is Mr. Gordon, a respected gentleman who is paid a large salary. He is deputy governor of the Bank of Canada. These men know their business. They have gone into all this. It was the decision of the board; it was not the government." That is the political strategy, and the government, which in the final analysis must take the responsibility, can now hide behind the bureaucrats.

Mr. PROBE: The government may have in mind reducing the price again by, say six per cent just before the next election.

Mr. HANSELL: That may be the idea. Perhaps they have a long-range policy.

In conclusion, may I say that all these things will happen just so long as the government remains confined to the present financial system. They are going to meet this over and over again. They are going to find they have solved one price problem only to find that another bobs up somewhere else. I have made my observations. I shall repeat what I said a moment ago. Let the government bring in some little measure now whereby this house can vote on this matter and see whether the people, through their elected representatives, want this thing to happen. I challenge them to do so.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Mr. Speaker, the fact that I have risen to my feet some ten times this afternoon should surely be sufficient proof, if there were no other evidence, that this is a matter of public interest and concern.

First of all, I should like to congratulate my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley), who has given an excellent argument in regard to this matter, and also other hon. members from this side of the house. I am sorry I cannot congratulate with equal sincerity hon. gentlemen on the opposite side who have made a rather feeble attempt to defend the action of the government.

I should like to emphasize what was said by the hon. member for Swift Current in regard to cooperation. I believe cooperation has solved many of our problems in the west and, if given a fair chance, I believe it will solve this one also. In precipitating this debate I believe the government—or did they precipitate it?—naturally would expect every hon. member from a rural constituency in this country to be on his feet to speak to an order such as the one now under discussion. I do not represent a strictly rural community, yet I offer no apology for speaking on this matter, as one who represents a city in the centre of a farming area, as one who for some years of my life farmed, as one who has lived among farmers for at least forty years, and as one who knows that there is no question upon which farmers, and perhaps particularly western farmers, because they use more machinery, feel they have suffered more injustice than on this same question of protected farm machinery. I am not much of a politician; this thing is new to me, but somehow there is a feeling to-day of political electricity in the air, if I may put it in that way. Perhaps, sir, it is the beginning of the end; perhaps this is the Charybdis upon which this government will founder. I almost said "flounder," but then they have been doing that right along. So that I wish to protest emphatically against this order which will increase the cost of farm machinery without at the same time increasing to the same extent the price of farm products.

In connection with this situation I should like also to mention labour. I know the cost of labour on a percentage basis has always been a very small component in the selling price of farm machinery, and I am wondering whether labour will look upon this situation with equanimity, particularly after the, shall I say, not very courteous treatment one branch of labour received not long ago. I remember the protestations of this government and of the party it represents. I remember how price stabilization was mentioned to us as a reason for the purchase of victory bonds, particularly in connection with the last loan. I remember we were told that if we purchased victory bonds we would prevent inflation. Well, we bought the bonds; but it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that soon we shall be surrendering our bonds, as we surrendered them the last time, in order to meet the rising costs of living owing to the inflation which will be produced by measures of this kind. I have great sympathy for the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). We have been on a spending spree. Now he thinks we have come to the time when spending will have to be curbed, and that is not an easy thing to do.

In connection with this business of farm implements I remember that when I was farming you sometimes needed an implement for which you did not have the money. They always sent around a nice, plausible young men with curly hair and blue eyes, a very pleasant chap, who wanted to sell you an implement. You asked him in for dinner. You did not even discuss such things as interest; you signed on the dotted line, and you had the use of the machine. But then came the dawn, or I should say then came the following fall or the fall after that. Instead of this fresh-cheeked boy you were faced with a different type of gentleman, a man with a very stern face who came around to see about the note. When you could not pay you discovered you had signed a little clause somewhere down near the bottom which entitled the company to charge twelve per cent on overdue payments. I have signed such a clause, sir, and I have paid the money on the basis of that signature.

Well, the Minister of Finance is finding some difficulty, and he will continue to find difficulty because this process is going to be progressive. He will find it hard to continue to be a Jekyll and a Hyde at the same time. I did mention labour a moment ago, but I want to emphasize that point. Is labour once more to be forgotten, as in the past the industrial worker has received little enough as his share of the cost of this machinery? What is he to receive now, if this measure goes through? The hon. member for Dauphin

(Mr. Zaplitny) threw out the challenge to rural members on the other side of the house. I shall be interested to hear what they have to say. For instance, I shall be interested to hear the opinion of my respected neighbour, the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker), who represents the rural community next to my home city. I shall listen with interest to find out how the other rural members on the government side react to this order, which evidently has come to a great many of them with as much surprise as it has come to us.

As far as the arguments are concerned, Mr. Speaker, I feel that they have been well and sufficiently covered by hon. members on this side, and I shall let it go at that for the time being.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel it necessary to say very much, but I should like to comment briefly on some points that have been overlooked by those who have already spoken. First, I should like to remind the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that on Friday last I asked him what action was being taken by the cabinet to reduce or remove tariffs on farm implements. At that time he told me these announcements were not made until the budget was brought down, and that therefore it would be out of order to make a statement at this time. Perhaps he had me in mind when on Friday evening the announcement was made of this 12½ per cent increase in prices of farm implements manufactured in Canada. Perhaps we shall get a 2½ per cent decrease in some of the tariff items; then in response to that we may have another increase of ten or twelve per cent in the prices of our implements, as has happened since the investigation of 1938.

Dealing with tariffs, I feel that we are forgetting these matters, which is something we should not do. From personal investigation I know that many of the things we are using in Canada can be purchased in the United States for one-half their price here. Why should that be so? At the same time farmers in the United States are being paid much higher prices for their produce than we are receiving in Canada. Perhaps that is what we get for the privilege of living in Canada, paying high interest rates, and taking the skim milk that is handed to us as farmers right along. Some reason or another may be found for not providing us with specific information as to the actual cost of our tariffs. The only information I have been able to get was away back in 1931, when the late Hon. Norman Rogers made an investigation which showed that the tariff cost Manitoba a net amount of $29,185,740, or $13.20 per capita. In the same year it cost Saskatchewan $29,228,285, or $28.16 per capita; it cost Alberta $27,909,396, or $26.93 per capita, and British Columbia, $37,737,247, or $22.33 per capita. I would remind the house that in 1931 we had a very low income because of depressed prices for farm produce. In the same year the province of Quebec had a net gain of $31,685,885, or $11.03 per capita. In the case of Ontario the gain on account of the tariff was $51,989,761, or $15.15 per capita.

To come back to 1938 prices, it will be remembered that there was considerable discussion in the house and in committee on the subject. I regret that I was not a member of the committee in that year. The hon. members for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) and Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) have placed certain figures on record; however, very little notice was taken of those figures, although on two occasions, while the investigation was taking place, the machinery companies increased their prices.

Perhaps the minister is not aware of the fact that one of the large manufacturing companies had a secret reserve of $40 million which was ferreted out by the investigators at that time. But did the minister, or the wartime prices and trade board, take advantage of this opportunity to learn whether the companies which are demanding these increases have secret reserves? Secret reserves seem to be all right for some people, particularly some of the machine companies and the chartered banks.

An appeal has been made by the government for increased production. As on many other occasions, the farmers of Canada have responded and have done their share. What would happen if the farmers at this time went on a sit-down strike, as did industry back in 1939, just a couple of weeks before the outbreak of war? If the farmers took that action it would be said that they are unpatriotic. I am not sure what they are going to do. Certain sections of the farming community are considering sit-down strikes or non-delivery strikes, if present conditions are carried on.

I am not in favour of that course of action, because I do not believe that in a democratic country we should be placed in a position where we have to do that sort of thing, and particularly so at this time, when food is so greatly needed in Europe.

In the speech from the throne we find this:

Every encouragement is being given to increasing production.

On the night of March 17 the nine-point programme was announced. Then on March 18 there was an increase of two cents a gallon in the price of motor fuels. That is sabotage of the agricultural industry, that, and other things which have happened since, have been unjust to agriculture. These things have been the means of helping to starve out still further those people in Europe who need food so badly.

What is the matter with this country, when we find intelligent business men carrying on a programme of that kind? In addition to the two-cent advance, we were also carrying a three-cent war tax which, it had been expected, would be removed when the war was declared to be at an end. The official pronouncement respecting the end of the war was made on January 1, but we still have our three-cent war tax, plus the additional two cents. Then, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Swift Current, cooperative associations have shown that it is not necessary to increase the price of gasoline.

I believe I need not say much more, However, again on behalf of the farmers of Canada I demand a percentage of the national income which will compensate them for their contribution, an amount of that national income to which we are entitled.

I believe there should be an adjustment of our income tax set-up for all the people in Canada, something which has been long overdue, and which might take care of this price increase. First of all, however, the increase should be investigated honestly to find out whether it is necessary. If it is found to be necessary, then the provision offered by the hon. members for Peace River (Mr. Low) and Acadia (Mr. Quelch) should be accepted.

Mr. H. W. HERRIDGE (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make only a few brief remarks, because even now I am fairly well exhausted, having risen thirteen times in an effort to take part in this debate.

May I express my disappointment at this increase in the price of agricultural implements, and at the manner in which this has been done. If labour requires an increase in wages, it has to submit proposals and figures which are made known to the public generally. Everything is done in the open. The press carries the facts concerning arbitration or conciliation boards, and nothing can be hidden. If the farmers want an increase in commodity prices they must come out in the open, give their evidence publicly and attempt to prove that they are entitled to increases in their prices, because of increased production costs. In the present instance, however, through the method of handling price increases by the wartime prices and trade board the increase is presented to us as a fait accompli.

I fully appreciate the difficulty facing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and I believe persons who discuss matters of this type should be constructive in their criticism. It is very easy to make general statements or off-hand remarks. As I said in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne, I believe we are entering into another phase of capitalism. We are developing in Canada a form of state capitalism, and if we are to negotiate the years ahead safely we shall have to use new techniques and develop new methods. This we must do, if we wish to prevent the vicious circle of prices, wages, and inflation.

I suggest that the Minister of Finance and the government consider the possibility of arriving at these decisions in a more democratic way. When it comes to a consideration of prices and wages I suggest that the government, the Department of Labour, the wartime prices and trade board and the ministers involved should call in for consultation representatives of labour, representatives from the farming community and representatives from industry.

I see no way of avoiding economic chaos unless we develop some technique of that type. Then, if we are to reestablish confidence in the country and in one another there must be frankness, and a placing of all the facts on the table. In this way I am sure decisions acceptable to the country at large and receiving its support can be arrived at. The government would still have—and must have—the responsibility for governing the country, but I am sure if we are to negotiate safely the years lying immediately ahead we must develop a technique of that type.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RONALD MOORE (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock we were discussing the proposed increase in the price of farm implements. We have listened to a number of very good addresses on this important subject and I am glad to say that not one member thus far heard has spoken in favour of this increase. As a member representing one of the agricultural constituencies in western Canada I, too, wish to protest strongly against this increase in the price of agricultural machines. I fully realize the great difficulties in which the minister finds himself in dealing with such matters.

These are difficulties which are probably an aftermath of the war and I expect that they will increase in the future.

I was pleased to hear the minister say that the increase will not apply to the cost of farm tractors. The farm tractor is an important machine in agricultural production; but, as most hon. members are aware, it is not the only machine which the farmers use. Farmers have to buy many other implements, and their purchases will be large because within the next three or four years the farm implements in western Canada will practically all have to be renewed. That is one reason why I am opposing this increase in price.

I consider it a breach of contract to increase the price of farm implements at the present time. The agricultural industry of western Canada, indeed of Canada generally, was stabilized at a certain level during the war years. We had fixed prices for agricultural products, fixed prices in the labour market for wages, and fixed prices for agricultural implements.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member speaks of fixed prices in the labour market. Where does he get that idea?

Mr. MOORE: What I meant to say was that it was done through negotiation under P.C. 1003.

Mr. MITCHELL: No; the hon. member is wrong. There has been a measure of negotiation. It is easy for my hon. friend to say these things when he is back home, but he cannot say them here and get away with them.

Mr. MOORE: I will accept the minister's correction, but I understood that labour negotiations took place under P.C. 1003.

Mr. MITCHELL: That deals with labour relations.

Mr. MOORE: It is practically the same thing.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is not.

Mr. MOORE: It looks to me as if we were quibbling, hair-splitting.

Mr. MITCHELL: No. The hon. member was wrong; that is all.

Mr. MOORE: To proceed, Mr. Speaker, I say that the farmers of western Canada will consider this action of the government in raising the prices of agricultural implements a breach of contract, and they would have sound reasons for so thinking. We have set prices for most agricultural products, so that it is practically impossible to-day for these prices to vary except within certain limits.

Now, by reason of this increase in the price of farm machinery, it will be extremely difficult for farmers, especially in western Canada, to produce. That is the position in which they find themselves.

Western economy is largely based on agriculture and on stabilized prices. There was very little objection from Canada last fall when this government proposed a ceiling price on wheat of $1.55 and a floor price of $1 a bushel for a five-year period.

Mr. TUCKER: The price was not set at $1.55.

Mr. MOORE: If the price of farm machinery is now to be increased I think it is only fair that the farmer should be allowed to ask for some change to be made in the price of wheat.

I wish to say a word about the wartime prices and trade board. It seems to me that the board is controlled from above. We seem to have on the board representatives of large industries and financial institutions, people who more or less control the economy of this country; but we have not on the board people who represent the consumers or the farmers or labour, and I think some of the actions of the board during the last few months are a reflection of that. First, the price of gasoline was increased, and now it is farm machinery. Both gasoline and farm machinery have to be bought by farmers at these increased prices; but there are very few increases made in the prices of the products which the farmer has to sell, and I venture to say that one of the reasons for that is that the board is controlled by those who own the means of production. One of the solutions of the problem would be to appoint to the board representatives of labour, representatives of agriculture, representatives of the cooperatives and representatives of the consumers, so that there could be a full discussion from all angles on these subjects that come up for consideration.

With respect to this particular increase in the price of farm machinery, western Canada will use more machinery in the future than she has ever used before. One of the principal machines that will be used by the farmers of the west in the next five or ten years is the combine. I do not know whether this increase will apply to the combine or not; I think we ought to be told. The price of a combine is in the neighbourhood of $3,000, and if there is to be an increase of 12½ per cent in its price it will mean an additional $375. That is a serious increase. I hope that the minister and the government will see fit to rescind this increase in the price of farm machinery.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to say a few words on this motion, I wish to say first that I am neither unmindful nor unappreciative of the difficult task that confronts the government in maintaining a stable price structure at this time. I would not rise at all at this moment were it not for the fact that I wish to draw the attention of this house to this fact. In maintaining prices and wages, which, after all, is the same thing because wages is the price of labour—or, as the Marxians would put it, the price of labour power—labour is the misery one goes through while delivering labour power.

Quite recently the steel manufacturers came to the wartime prices and trade board for an increase in their commodity, steel. That increased price was granted. Now we have the farm implement manufacturers coming to the wartime prices and trade board, and they have had their request for an increase in prices granted.

Mr. ILSLEY: Only about half. Not what they asked for at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: I did not mean to say they got everything they asked for. In fact, no one knows what they asked for.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. I said so.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister knows, but I do not know. I mean that the ordinary rank and file member does not know, but just the men at the top. That is one of the things to which I object. Take the position of organized workers asking for an increase in wages. Generally they first have to take a strike vote. This procedure is to show that they mean business, that if something is not done they will go on strike. But that is a procedure which they have to go through. Then they have to make an application to the regional war labour board. On that board will sit the representatives of employers, representatives of the workers, and a supposedly neutral or impartial chairman or representative of the government. Then that board makes a finding. But that is not the end of it. After that finding is made it must be reported to the national war labour board. Either side, of course, may appeal to the national war labour board against the finding. There again you have the same thing; there will be representatives of labour, representatives of employers, and a representative of the government. But when the employers come for an increase in prices they go into a closed room. There is no representative of labour there. There is no representative of the consumer there. There is nobody there except the officers of the wartime prices and trade board and the people who are asking for the increase. We have one law and one procedure for the workers; we have another law and another procedure for business. And business during the entire war controlled the whole of our economy, and have come out of the war much better than they were when they went into it.

One case which has been brought to my attention is that of the Guelph Stove company, owned exclusively, I believe, by the T. Eaton company. The employees of this company asked for a raise in the basic wage from fifty cents to fifty-five cents. They went to the regional war labour board of Ontario, which granted the increase. The company appealed to the national war labour board. The national war labour board wiped out the increase granted by the regional board; it allowed the employees a few small concessions, something on overtime and perhaps holidays with pay, but denied them the basic increase which had been granted by the regional board. Why do manufacturers and business men, when they want an increase in price, not have to go through the same procedure, a procedure at which the public and labour are represented? If it is proper that employers shall have a voice in decisions on wages, I maintain it is proper that the workers should have a voice when it is a question of prices, because ultimately labour has to pay its share of the increased prices. The case I mentioned, that of the Guelph Stove company, is the first decision, I think, made by the national war labour board since P.C. 9384 was amended to make it easier to get an increase in wages. That just shows how "easy" it has been made. I suggest that if we are to have a reasonable, rational, fair deal in this matter of wages and prices, before any increase of either is granted, both applications should go through the same process.

I believe it was the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) who, in speaking this afternoon, said that in the farm implements investigation during the session of 1937 the committee was not sure whether prices of farm implements were too high or not. I have before me the journals of the house for that session. I wish to quote from page 500, a part of the lengthy report which was made by the committee of the house. There are thirty-six recommendations. I will read just three:

28. That the profits to the farm implement companies on the sale of replacement parts is excessive, and the price of these to the consumer should be materially reduced.

29. That the increases announced by the companies in January, 1936, were not justified by an increase in manufacturing or distribution costs or by the financial results of the companies in so far as these were affected by the price level of farm implements.

30. That over the period 1891 to 1936—

That is, for forty-five years.

—retail prices of farm implements have been maintained at too high a level as shown by the financial returns to the companies engaged in the industry during that period.

With facts like these before us, surely before an increase of price is granted to the farm implement companies there should have been some other investigation than one behind closed doors where no one was present excepting those who were asking for the increase in prices and the members of the wartime prices and trade board. It is time we had a new deal in this matter of prices and wages.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to say only a word or two. I shall not keep the house very long, but I think there are some things which should be said. The hon. member who has just spoken talked—no doubt with the best intentions in the world—about the "supposedly impartial chairman" of the war labour board. He said that it was necessary to have a strike, and that you had to do all these things, which were unfair, right down the line. But let me say this to my hon. friend, in a kindly way—

Mr. COLDWELL: Don't say it in a "kindly way".

Mr. MITCHELL: Well, in a kindly—

Mr. COLDWELL: Don't. You so often say it that we are getting quite used to it.

Mr. MITCHELL: You should get used to it. But it is sometimes as well to meet a jury of your peers here in the house, because so often we have to sit here while the boys are up and down the line making speeches.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are here to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know, but six months in the year you are roaming up and down the country making speeches in the little red schoolhouses.

Mr. COLDWELL: We keep in touch with our people.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not interrupt my hon. friends. We are sitting here trying to administer the affairs of the country, and I think it is admitted on all hands that we are defending the living standards of the working people. You cannot have it both ways. My good Conservative friends say, "Lift the lid and let the thing go to pieces." That is what they say in effect, because they do not admit it outright. Then you get the other point of view, the point of view of people who want us to sit on prices and let wages go up. Well, we are all grown men, and I think we all recognize that, as I have just said, you cannot have it both ways. You cannot eat your cake and still have it.

My hon. friend said something about an impartial chairman, or a supposedly impartial chairman. All human institutions have their weaknesses. There is nothing perfect, though some people seem to think that they are and that others are not. I said once before that I sometimes get sick of people wearing their conscience around their necks as a woman wears a lavaliere—or a halo around their heads, whichever way you like to have it. As one hon. member says, the halo sometimes gets a little worn and we get sick of seeing it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Sometimes it gets tight.

Mr. MITCHELL: This, I think, can be truthfully said, that in a broad way our system of wage stabilization has worked for the protection of the working men and women of the country. We have representatives of organized labour and of employers and a supposedly impartial chairman. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) was a little mixed up in discussing the machinery for appeals to the national board, but we will let that go for the moment.

Something has been said about the freezing of wages. I do not believe that those people who use the phrase believe it themselves. However, since the institution of these boards the total increases granted through their instrumentality have amounted to $222,222,912 a year. That was started on November 15, 1941, and continued up to December 31, 1945, and the number of employees affected was 1,918,892. I should like to know what my hon. friend is saying under his breath. If he will say it aloud I will try to answer it. Of course we had the telescoping of the cost of living bonus into the basic wage, which aggregated $43,682,436, and I believe that of the cases before the different boards 83·5 per cent were granted in full—that is, the applications—9·7 per cent were granted in part, and only 6·8 per cent were denied; which is some indication that these boards have not been as arbitrary as some people would have us believe.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) spoke about steel to-day. Let us look at the record, and I do not say this with any intention of trying to influence the judgment of any board which is sitting on wages in the steel industry. But I received these figures this afternoon from the national war labour board: Dominion Steel and Coal Corporation, percentage of increase since 1939, 36·7 per cent—that is in wages; Algoma Steel Corporation, Sault Ste. Marie, increase, 54·4 per cent; Steel Company of Canada, Hamilton, 38·7 per cent; average for the three plants, 43·6 per cent.

Mr. COLDWELL: What are the basic hourly wages?

Mr. MITCHELL: They are 59½ cents for the Dominion in Sydney, 64½ cents for Algoma, Sault Ste. Marie—that is the low rate—and 64½ cents for Hamilton, Ontario, the average for the three being 62·8 cents.

Let us take another figure which I think is illuminating. The cost of living index in 1939 was 101·5, and wage rates index, taking the base of 100, was 105·7; 1943, 118·4, that is the cost of living index, and wage rates index 139·5; 1944, cost of living index, 118·5, and wage index, 144·7; and I am informed today that, with the 1945 figures not all in the cost of living index is 119·6, while the wage index is slightly higher than in 1944.

I tell hon. members these things because I know they want to be fair, and I believe that statement goes for all parties in the house. We all want to raise the social conditions of the working people and of the farmers, and we want to raise them as high as possible. I do not believe that any party has a first mortgage on the desire to bring about that condition, but if I might use the language of the street—

Mr. COLDWELL: Better not, now.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will. When I read the declarations of my good friends of the Conservative party, who want the lid lifted off everything so that their friends can make the fortunes—

An hon. MEMBER: No!

Mr. MITCHELL: Their friends have a knowledge of markets and prices, and we know that after the last war it was their friends that made the fortunes. But let me say this to the undying credit of this party, taking this war in comparison with the last war, that we have not had the scandals that we had after the last war, nor have we had the war profiteers. If there are any I should like some member to rise in his place in this House of Commons and point the finger of scorn at this war administration. It may be that some got under the barrier, but if they did I have not yet heard of any.

Mr. FRASER: We cannot find out.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course you cannot find out because there are not any. My hon. friend who was elected by that crowd says, "We cannot find out."

Mr. FRASER: No, because the War Assets Corporation is a hush-hush proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not getting mad; my hon. friend need not worry. When it comes to taxation, we may have made our mistakes, but let this be clearly understood. The only people in this country that I know of who make no mistakes are my good friends the Conservatives. But the taxation policy of the government, I submit, has, in the main, been fair. We have been like the Quakers; we have gone where the money could be got. We have gone to the richest people in the country and even to members of the House of Commons and have taken half their salaries in taxation.

An. hon. MEMBER: How about the 85 per cent—

Mr. MITCHELL: If my prairie chicken would just shut up—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: That is nice.

Mr. MITCHELL: I remember the budget of two years ago when my good friend the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) heard the taxation proposals as laid down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I felt like saying, "Brother, can you spare a dime?" Well, I believe that any nation which permits enormous riches at the top and poverty at the bottom is in for trouble. I believe the policy of any government in a democracy, if it is to remain a democracy, must be based upon the fairest distribution of the wealth that it owns. I believe this government has done that. I believe it has done it in a sincere way. I rose to say these few things to put the record straight as I see it.

An hon. MEMBER: In a roundabout way.

Mr. MITCHELL: We talk about putting the record straight. This evening one hon. member spoke about another hon. member who has to do with labour relations. He made those remarks without any knowledge of the other side of the picture which has to do with wage relations. I believe these things should be said. When I take my seat I hope it will not be said that I am a friend of the big interests. In administering legislation you cannot have one law for the rich and another one for the poor on the same subject. You have to try to be fair to both sides. I believe this government is endeavouring to do that in a big way.

Mr. McCUAIG: How about the income tax and the $660 exemption?

Mr. MITCHELL: Nobody likes to pay taxes. I detest it myself. When the motion was before the house giving my hon. friend and all the other hon. members $2,000 a year free of income tax he voted for it. I have no objection to that. I believe the only hon. member who did not vote for it was the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Mr. McCUAIG: It was a government motion.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend cannot get from under by saying it was a government motion; it was not a government motion; it was the decision of the House of Commons and of this parliament of Canada. If my hon. friend does not like what the government did, my advice to him is that he return the $2,000 to the treasury.

I believe that it will take the greatest degree of discipline and cooperation to maintain a stable price structure in this country. We all know that wages have gone up; we all know that prices for agricultural products have gone up right across the board. But we shall need the greatest degree of discipline in the months that lie ahead. While we might talk of powerful employers' organizations and powerful labour organizations, the duty of any government in a democracy is, in my judgment, to protect the weak from the strong. We have endeavoured to do that and we shall continue to endeavour to do it. The attitude adopted by my hon. friends directly opposite reminds me of an old song to the effect that we are only chasing rainbows.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait a moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is "forever blowing bubbles". That is what the minister has in mind. The minister is not blowing bubbles; he is just kidding himself; that is all.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend talks about blowing bubbles. He has been doing that for the last twenty years. I just rose to say these simple things that the working people of this country will understand, notwithstanding my good Conservative friends or my hon. friends to the left of them.

Mr. LEWIS MENARY (Wellington North): I should like to say a few words on the increase in the price of farm implements. This increase has come about when there is a pent-up demand for farm implements. I am opposing the increase. Used tractors are being sold in the vicinity of my home town for $1,200. These tractors are three and four years old. Dealers are buying these tractors and reselling them to farmers. Take binders which have been used for some years. They are becoming dilapidated and will have to be replaced. There is a large pent-up market for farm machinery. This increase comes at a time when an increase in food is needed. Farmers are short of labour. Many farms of 200 acres are being worked by a man and his wife. The wife drives the tractor and the man drives the team on the drill and the harrow. They do the chores at night. I know of a case where a man and his wife are working 200 acres of land. They cannot get help; they could not get it last summer and have not been able to get it for two or three summers. They have given a lot to feed the empire in the last few years.

This increase in price will mean that a binder which sold at $325 will now cost around $44 to $50 more. That is quite an increase in the price of a binder. May I give the house an instance of how scarce farm machinery is. Last fall there was sold in my district a sleigh which was twenty-eight years old. It sold for $65. There is really no machinery for sale at all now. It is pretty nearly all worn out. I should like to ask the minister what effect this increase in price will have on machinery already ordered by the farmer and not taken delivery of. The dealer may not have the machine to deliver but he has the order from the farmer. What effect will this increase have on the purchase price?

Mr. ILSLEY: I will find that out.

Mr. MENARY: Returned soldiers are buying farms. It will now be difficult for them to get machinery to operate these farms. They need the machinery and they have not too much money to spend. Every dollar of an increase in the price of machinery will have an effect on these returned soldiers. It will be harder on the returned soldiers than on other farmers, because the returned soldier is just getting started. He needs all the help he can get. He needs the help of the government and of his neighbours and of all people in the district. I just wish to register my opposition and to ask the minister to answer my question.

Mr. D. S. HARKNESS (Calgary East): Without being quite as verbose as some hon. members who have risen to say a word or two in connection with this matter, and without chasing any rainbows like the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), I should like to register my protest against this increase in the price of farm machinery. Ever since I was a small boy in western Canada I can remember that the farmers of that area looked on the price of farm machinery as a very sore point. I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will bear me out in that. Probably the question which caused more discontent and more anger on the part of farmesr in western Canada than anything else was the excessive price of farm machinery. I can think of nothing at the present time which would cause more anger and a greater loss of morale and more discontent on the part of the farmers of western Canada than an increase in the price of farm machinery without a corresponding increase in the price of farm products. In my opinion a policy of that kind is the surest way to cause a decrease in the production of agricultural products. If the government had racked their brains from now until Christmas they could not have found a policy which would cause more discontent and, as a result, bring about a greater loss of production on the part of the farmers of western Canada than the very policy that has been announced. I am by no means convinced that a price increase of 12½ per cent on farm machinery is necessary to bring about an increase in the production of that machinery. If such an increase is necessary for that purpose, well and good. But in the name of all that is reasonable let the government couple that increase in the price of farm machinery with an increase in prices of farm products. If they do not do so, I personally am absolutely certain they will get a decrease in agricultural production.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I think it is well that the house has had an opportunity to discuss this most important question. I must say, however, that I was disappointed in the hon. gentleman who brought this matter to the attention of the house. After having made a motion that parliament should be adjourned to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, and having been given the opportunity, the hon. gentleman did not discuss it for very long. I presume he was inspired to raise the question by the same reasons which inspire me to speak now; he feels he has an obligation to agriculture, and perhaps particularly to his constituents. I hope it was not a soft feeling in his heart for the manufacturers concerned that influenced him to repress his noble rage.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is hardly fair. Play ball, now.

Mr. IRVINE: Well, I just made a goal. What I meant was that I believe a matter of such importance, raised by the hon. gentleman who occupies the most prominent position to your left in this house, Mr. Speaker, should have been gone into more thoroughly. The whole situation should have been laid bare, and all the facts available should have been brought to the attention of the government and of the house.

An hon. MEMBER: What have you said so far?

Mr. IRVINE: I hope to say something before I am through, if my hon. friend will give me an opportunity; and if I say anything out of the way I am sure he will take the opportunity to chastise me in the proper parliamentary fashion. I hope my hon. friends to my right do not take what I said as an insult, for I had no intention of even questioning the honour of the hon. gentleman to whom I referred.

I wish to say a word now about what was just said by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) before I go on with what I have to say for myself. The minister repeated the old saying that we cannot have our cake and eat it too, which is such an obvious truth that comment is hardly necessary. But I would point out to the hon. gentleman that in this instance the farmers are neither getting the cake nor have they eaten it. I presume the minister's idea was that it is not possible, on the one hand, to raise wages without, on the other hand, raising prices. I do not think that necessarily follows; it all depends upon the relation wages had to prices in the first instance. But assuming his statement to be true, then I take the objection that this is exactly what the government is doing. It has allowed an increase in prices without a corresponding increase in wages and without a corresponding increase in the income of farmers.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct at all. I do not want to interrupt, but that is so far from being correct that I must interrupt.

Mr. IRVINE: If that is not correct I should like to be corrected.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will correct you; certainly.

Mr. IRVINE: But the minister is going to correct me when I have no opportunity to point out the weakness of his correction.

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be no weakness in it.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not presume that the right hon. gentleman is any more infallible in that regard than the rest of us, and it is just possible that I may find a hole in his reasoning as he supposes there is in mine.

I believe, sir, in the government having some control over the national economy and, when the occasion arises, having control over prices. Particularly do I hold that view in a time of crisis. In fact, not so long ago I voted for the extension of such powers to be exercised by the present government. Nor do I think, as was suggested by an hon. member in this debate, that such procedure necessarily means the establishment of a bureaucracy because, as I understand this situation, no board in Canada has absolute authority to do anything, but the minister and the government must accept responsibility for the statement which was made to-day by the minister. That responsibility rests with this government and with this parliament. The same hon. gentleman said that the increase proposed was negotiated by the wartime prices and trade board, and he branded that body as a bureaucracy. It may be a bureaucracy, but I would rather submit to the findings of that board than to the bureaucracy of monopoly capital which, without any board, would be raising prices without any question and without this parliament even having a chance to discuss the matter. It would be very interesting for this house to know whether the trades board gave the advice to the government in this matter or whether the government gave the advice to the trades board. I do not believe the board initiated this increase in prices, and when the minister speaks I hope he will prove my point by taking full responsibility for the statement he made, as I believe he will.

Nevertheless I was amazed at the statement itself, indicating an increase of 12½ per cent in the price of farm machinery, and that this was done without those directly affected being given an opportunity to be heard, either by the board or by the government, or by both. It means, of course, an increase in the production costs of the farmers, without, as has been pointed out by nearly all the speakers preceding me, a corresponding increase in farmers' incomes. Similar increases have already been granted to other companies, without any corresponding increase in the wages of those employed in the plants privileged to raise their prices. So that I desire to protest against this increase. I protest against the principle; I protest against the method by which it was put into effect; I protest against the result it will bring, both to farmers and wage-earners.

For the past few years, during war time we have had what I might call stabilized prices. I suggest that it is unwise to alter any price in a stabilized system unless there is a complete revision touching all industries and all wage scales affected. It is not possible to alter the price of one commodity without adversely affecting all other industries and all other individuals. To do so, therefore, means that we are entering the vicious circle of inflation.

For instance, we had first of all an increase in the price of steel. It follows naturally that industries requiring steel in their production will seek to have an increase in their prices. Then it will follow that working people will ask for corresponding increases in wages; farmers will ask for corresponding increases in their income. When that is done the steel companies will ask for a greater increase to offset the increased costs brought about through increased wages and increased farm incomes, thereby effecting a complete circle. So that the dog of inflation will chase its own tail around the circle of our national economy, but never get a chance to catch it.

If there is to be any alteration in prices, then it should begin with workers and farmers, because they are at the lower end of the system. Their incomes are now and in the past have been relatively much less than those of the manufacturing fraternity. Manufacturers had much the best of it during the war. They made greater profits in that time, in spite of the profits tax, than they did in peace time. They vastly increased their reserves; they increased their capital assets and they decreased their corporation debts. In fact, profits in the war-time period took the form of increased assets and increased reserves. Still they are not satisfied.

In the second place, I am opposed to this increase because of the method by which it has been achieved. It has already been pointed out that there was no real inquiry. If there was, then it was all one-sided. I believe the minister indicated that the evidence warranted the action taken. But the evidence is not all in; it was one-sided. The evidence of agriculture and that of the workers was not there. I believe one hon. member emphasized the fact that when an increase in the tariff was to be made, the tariff board gave notice of an application. Then those who were interested were permitted to appear and to say why such increase should not be effected. In this instance, however, there was no such inquiry. Therefore I am opposed to a method which fails to give an opportunity to the industries directly affected to bring their position to the attention of the board, to point out how they would be affected by the proposed change.

Then I am opposed to the results. One hon. member has said he was out for results, and cared nothing about methods. Well, this is a result. But I submit that anyone who is out for a result cannot afford to ignore the only method by which a desired result can be obtained. I am opposed to this result. The minister may say I am wrong in this, but I still await a refutation of what I say, namely that a 12½ per cent increase in the price of farm machinery will certainly not reduce farmers' costs of production. If the minister can show how that is possible, I shall be greatly in his debt. Not only will it not reduce the cost of farm production, but I insist that if there is an increase in the price of farm machinery it must of necessity increase the cost of farm production.

As an hon. member to my right pointed out a few minutes ago, all our returned soldiers who intend to go farming must buy all their machinery. They have none. For that machinery they must pay the extra 12½ per cent. Without doubt, those seem to be the facts in the case.

For some time there has been what I would call a systematic campaign put on by big business to influence the government, if possible—and probably the board—and to prepare the public mind for acquiescence in a desired rise in prices. They have carried on this campaign to the extent of discouraging, as far as possible, the continuation of price controls by the administration. In this connection, let me mention some of the headlines which have appeared in the Financial Post, and then I would ask hon. members to draw their own conclusions as to what would follow from them. One says this, "Say growing goods famine is caused by price ceiling"—not caused by a shortage of material; not caused by a shortage of labour, but caused by the price ceiling.

Another heading states: "Output of essential goods slow as ceiling 'bonus' luxuries".

And another: "See black market booming if price controls maintained".

Those are headlines which suggest the campaign of industry and of big business to remove from the government all controls whatsoever.

I conclude by asking the minister what the facts are. He has said that the evidence was sufficient to justify the action taken, which was announced this afternoon. But, as I have said, only half of that evidence was heard. What are the facts? Will the minister put on record the actual financial position of the companies which have been permitted to raise their prices? Industries claiming the right to raise prices should be able to make public the facts showing the financial position warranting the increases demanded. If the minister can show such facts I am sure the house will receive his statement with a great deal more grace than it can accept the position as it now stands.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with those who have already spoken in protest against the 12½ per cent increase in the cost of farm machinery.

The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Irvine) said that he would like to see the statement or figures of the machine companies showing their present position. I agree with him, and I should like to see alongside those figures the income of our farmers from 1929 to 1939 and on up to the present time. I am sure that if the incomes of these two groups were to be compared we would find that it is the farmer that needs subsidizing and not the machine companies. It is my view that the government should not allow, should not even think of making this gift to the machine companies at the expense of the farmers, but if the minister still desires to make a gift to the machine companies he should look for another source of revenue from which to do so. It has been pointed out on many occasions by members of this group as well as by other groups in the house that the farmers of this country have been worse off than any other group of our citizens.

Surely after what our farmers had gone through during the depression years we should give them an opportunity now to get on their feet. During the past six years of war the farmers had to struggle along with a shortage of labour; they had to repair their old machinery, and now they are all in the market for new machinery. This is the time apparently when a number of the gentlemen in the farm machine business got together and thought that now is a good time to clean up on the farmers, to skin them alive. If members of this house representing agricultural constituencies do not stop this price increase they will have failed the farmers of this nation. If this is the type of new order that was promised to our agriculturists during the war, who can tell what will happen to them five years from now? I protest as strongly as I can against any increase in the cost of farm machinery I feel that this is the time to be demanding a reduction in the price of farm machinery—not an increase.

I also wish to join with other hon. members in protesting against the method of arriving at this decision. I am going to be frank and say that this is the backdoor method. Why did the government not bring in a measure, place it openly before the representatives of the people in the House of Commons and let the people's representatives debate it? Then it could have been sent to a committee of the house, where witnesses could have been called so that we could have ascertained exactly what the situation was and in the light of the facts adduced arrive at the proper decision. As it is, we are permitting a board to make a decision of this importance, to decide an issue which affects about thirty per cent of our total population. It is about time that we learned that the farmers of this nation are not going to keep on taking it on the chin as they have had to do in the past. It is about time they were consulted. But I understand that the minister consulted no farm organizations, nor did he consult the members of parliament. Not a single farm organization was consulted, although this is a measure that directly affects agriculture. It seems to me that this is not the proper way of handling this problem.

As the leader of this group, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), has pointed out, should conditions warrant an increase in farm machinery it would then be up to the government to find ways and means of subsidizing the increased costs. Surely the farmer should not be expected to bear the whole burden.

Agriculture in this country, as we all know, is a basic industry. If agriculture prospers, Canada prospers. Should agriculture suffer, Canada will suffer. I for one would never like to see agriculture go back to the position in which it found itself between 1929 and 1939.

There has been a campaign carried on in the press and I have heard a number of speakers over the radio stating that Canada should get as many young Canadians as possible to go into agriculture. It is a back-to-the-land campaign. But if the government begins by increasing the price of farm machinery by 12½ per cent it will simply be turning the boys away from the farms. If the government wants to deplete our rural population, this is the best way to do so. It would be a healthy sign if more of our young men were interested in agriculture. But when you put agriculture in the position where farmers have to pay more for their implements, and levy additional costs, you cannot blame the young men for going into the cities.

One further thought. If the government intends to discredit private enterprise, this is the best way of doing so; and if the government continues to pursue this course it will do just that, discredit private enterprise.

For the past number of years our farmers have fed approximately 16,000,000 people. That is no small achievement, and surely this price increase is no small issue to be lightly brushed aside or decided by a board.

[Mr. Hlynka.]

We should review farm income over the past fifteen or twenty years and at the same time review the earnings of the machine companies, so that we can arrive at a satisfactory comparison whether it is the machine companies or the farmers that need to be subsidized. Let us not forget that the farmers have carried on their farming operations during the war with old machinery, and that they are now all in the market to buy new farm implements. This decision of the board is a blow at agriculture which will bring no credit to this government. I am not so much concerned about who is going to clean up on this price increase. I want to see agriculture in Canada placed on a sound basis so that our farmers will get their share of the national income and so that their children will be able to attend schools and live like human beings, instead of being driven from place to place by the mortgage companies. If our farmers have to buy the machinery they need at increased prices and have to go into debt, then when prices of agricultural products fall it will be only another few years before the mortgage and trust companies will again be racing after our farmers up and down the country trying to collect.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that if the representatives of western Canada and the representatives of central Canada and of eastern Canada as well permit this increase to go through they will be failing their constituents; they will be failing our basic industry, and failing our nation at a time when the world is demanding greater production than ever before. At a time, when millions of human beings are starving in Europe, this is the action which the government takes without even giving it much thought.

Mr. T. B. BARRETT (Norfolk): I wish to put myself on record, as a farmer representing an agricultural constituency, in endorsing what has already been said by so many hon. members disapproving these increases in prices of farm machinery. I am absolutely sure that the minister is convinced that this increase is justified in relation to the increased cost to the manufacturers; but in relation to the cost of farm products, farm machinery has been altogether too high for the last twenty-five years. Just because farmers have bought machinery is no indication that the price has not been too high in relation to the prices which they have been receiving for their products, and it is becoming increasingly evident now, since the war, that farm prices are far too low. This is evidenced by the decreased production in certain lines, and by the number of idle farms which anyone can see in driving through the country. Farms containing the very best of agricultural land are lying idle, for the simple reason that farmers cannot afford to work them. This is particularly evident in my own constituency. In one part of my riding the farmers are engaged in tobacco growing, and because of the regional character of this crop and certain circumstances under which tobacco growers work, they have been making money. Nobody denies that. You can go through the tobacco area and you will find no idle farms; in fact the price of farm land in that part of the country has risen over 100 per cent in the last few years. But in the other part of my constituency, not so much in the dairying districts as in the general mixed farming areas, you will find farm after farm lying idle, simply because the farmers are not making money and they simply will not bother to work the land, and cannot get anybody to take over the farms. All through the country farmers are experiencing great difficulty in getting sufficient help to work their farms; and this, in spite of the fact that there is unemployment in all our towns and cities. Plenty of young men who are experienced and quite able to farm refuse to go on the farms because of the reduced remuneration they will receive. If they are fortunate enough to obtain jobs in town they will get far bigger wages, work far less hours and have a much easier time than if they work on the farms. If this added burden of increased prices of machinery is put on the farmers, I am sure it will result in a further decrease of production instead of the increase which is so much desired.

Mr. J. L. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): After listening to the discussion here to-day I should like to offer to the house for their approval my own solution of the question. I believe it would add a great deal to the speed with which we get through this debate and take care of our whole price structure in this instance, if I introduced the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley).

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I understand from what the minister has said that the increase in the price of farm machinery, announced to-day, means in increase of 12½ per cent in the price of farm machinery made in Canada. I hope that the minister in his statement to the house will make it clear how the dealers in selling these articles are to distinguish between machinery which is imported and machinery which is actually manufactured in Canada. A good deal of farm machinery, such as binders and combines, is imported from the United States, but binders and combines are made in Canada as well. Is there to be a distinction of price between one and the other? I hope the minister will make that point clear when he speaks. Furthermore, to what extent is farm machinery to be deemed to be manufactured within Canada? Does the minister mean, manufactured wholly in this country, because a great deal of machinery manufactured in this country has component parts manufactured in the United States, the material being brought over and assembled in Canada? I believe that practically no tractors are manufactured in this country. Am I right, then, in assuming that this does not include farm tractors?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: There will not be an increase in the price of farm tractors?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not as a result of this.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: We are opposed to granting this increase in the price of farm machinery. The fact that it adds to the cost of production to the farmer upsets a great deal of the faith which the Canadian people have had in the government's policy of price control to prevent inflation. The minister, or the cabinet, or whoever advised this step have taken the wrong course, because they set ceilings on prices of farm products when the old prices on machinery were in operation, and now that the cost of production is increased to the farmer, the same ceilings remain on farm products. In all fairness to those concerned in the big business of raising food when the world needs it as it does to-day, this should be accompanied by an announcement on the part of the government that they are permitting an increase in the selling price of farm produce. This measure takes all the security out of agriculture, and without security people will not go into agriculture.

Further, I think the announcement was ill-timed from the point of view of the thousands of young men whom this government is trying to entice back on the land as they return from the war. Hundreds of thousands of young men wishing to take up agriculture as their life pursuit will say, "What security is there in this? What is the use of my undertaking a twenty or a ten-year agreement to pay back borrowed money if overnight it is to be announced that machinery prices will go up 12½ per cent? To-morrow the price may go up another 15 per cent." They will begin to ask, "Where do we fit into this thing?"

The farmer is commencing to wake up to the fact that what has been wrong with him in the past is that, whenever he went to town to buy anything—and in these days he must buy in order to operate—those who had commodities for sale always told him exactly what he must pay; he had to pay it or he went without; because he had to have it he had to pay what was charged, and he accepted the idea that those who were selling should name the price. It is a funny thing, however, that when the farmer took his produce into town to sell it, instead of being able to say what price he should get, he usually had to go around and say, "Please, mister, what price will you pay me?" Until you put a floor under farm prices there can be no security, and there ought to be a guarantee against such increase of production cost as this, or some guarantee of the actual cost of farm machinery, so that the farmer will know over a period of years what his costs will be in this line. What assurance has he that in another three months the price will not again be increased with the government's consent?

The greatest harm which will be done is the loss of faith on the part of the people who are doing the work, and, after all, the people who toil are the people who produce the wealth from the land. Without the production of the men and women in the factory, without the production of the men, women and children on the farms we cannot have any wealth in this country; that is, any real wealth—the food and clothing and the shelter that man requires.

The other circumstance that makes the situation particularly serious is that the greatest need of the world to-day is food. This government has so stated. It is recognized by all, and UNRRA and the united nations organization are emphasizing it. But this policy goes to the very root of production, which is falling off badly. I have here the figures for creamery butter and cheese production. If we take 1946, in January, creamery butter fell off 15·6 per cent and cheese, 27·8 per cent; in February, 1946, there was a drop of 18·3 per cent in creamery butter and 26·5 per cent in cheese. This is in comparison with the same months of 1945, and that has confallen off 19·6 per cent as compared with last year, and cheese, 35·5 per cent.

In these provinces we have the hay and the necessary materials, but the people are not producing. What is the trouble? There are a good many causes. It is time the government realized that the production of farm commodities is not an eight hour day job. If you are raising cattle or milking cows your job starts early in the morning. A good many people are in the barns working at five o'clock in the morning and they work until eight o'clock at night. And it is not a five-day week that they put in, but a seven-day week, 365 days in the year, without any holidays and often without any pay. The government tells us that we are to have another cut in butter rations when we should be producing more than ever before. There are more men to go into production. The boys are returning from overseas. But they are not going on the farms. Why? We find the answer in just such legislation as this.

I wish to criticize the government also on its farm machinery policy in this regard, that they do not put any ceiling on the sale of secondhand machinery by agents. Recently in my own city some ten thousand farmers came from Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta to the city of Yorkton because an enterprising agent there had advertised that he had some sixty-nine reconditioned tractors for sale, and according to the press reports the bids ranged from $200 to $1,000 over and above prices of new tractors. So serious is the need for machinery. Without the labour, men must have the necessary machinery to save them toil, and the machinery companies cannot provide what is required. The farmers need these things, and to permit a 12½ per cent increase is bad enough, but to compel the farmers to get their machinery at 100 per cent increase is something that should not be tolerated. Ceilings are put on secondhand cars; why not on this machinery?

This is the last straw on the camel's back. Many things have been gradually added to the farmers' burden since the end of the war, one thing after another. There is the difficulty in getting labour and the increase in the wages the farmer has to pay. His returns are so small, and he has to pay income tax. I am glad the Minister of National Revenue is in his place. I have seen farmers go out of production in the west overnight in recent months when they found out the manner in which their income tax is to be collected.

A farmer I know came to me in December and said, "Is this what you call justice in this country? I operated this farm in 1942 and by the government regulations I was not permitted to sell my grain because there were quotas on it. My cash operations for 1942, owing to the fact that I could not sell my products, was $150 of a loss and my bins were full of grain. The year 1943 came along and the quotas were lifted slightly so that I sold part of the 1942 crop and part of the 1943 crop. I had to build more bins to keep the stuff, and I was not allowed to sell it in view of government regulations. The result was that once again my bins were full. The year 1944 came along; we had a big crop and the government told us to sell grain and stock and cattle because this was necessary to feed the armies." Well, the farmers went and sold stuff. These people have never known what it was to pay income tax because so many years of their lives have been spent in making losses. They would make $130 cash income for a year's work.

The farmers do not understand the intricacies and the complicated forms of income tax, and as to knowing what an accrual basis is, well, they do not know anything about it. One day this farmer whose case I am stating was ordered to appear and report on his income tax. When he told them what had happened in 1942, they said, "We are not interested in 1942; what about 1943?" They also inquired about 1944. He had kept his records and on the sale of 1942, 1943 and 1944 wheat his income had come up to $3,800 that year. He was taxed on the sale of parts of his crop for 1942, 1943 and 1944, all in one year, and he was charged income tax of about $400.

I do not know what the members of this house would say if they were paying income tax on three years' income in one year. There would be rebellion. I do not know what the big machinery companies would say if you took all their profits for three years, lumped them into one year, and charged excess profits tax on three years' earnings in that one year. But that farmer had toiled long hours, had gone out early in the morning and milked his cows and fed his hogs, raised chickens, sold eggs and worked long hours overtime without pay. When he and other farmers like him thought they were doing something for the welfare of the country they found themselves having to pay income tax in the way I have described.

This man did not raise any hogs last year and is raising none this year. He is not bothering to milk cows except for his own use. The farmers are not producing butter. Why? The results of their overtime work are taken away from them. They may come up to the $1,200 with war prices as they have been if they happen to strike a good year. This man wrote to the income tax office and said, "I understand I can do this on the accrual basis". The only reply he got was a statement to this effect, "We hope you will make arrangements for settlement of the $400 because interest is running at the rate of eight per cent."

The government does not need to have me tell them all this. They can read the report handed to them recently by the Canadian federation of agriculture with regard to income tax. Among the recommendations regarding farm income tax I suggest that the government implement what appears there and that something more be done as is suggested in paragraph 1, which reads:

> That the income of the farmer for income tax purposes be assessed on the basis of average over a period of at least four years. We submit that a moving average plan might be adopted which would assist the taxpayer in meeting payments in years of loss or low returns. We were encouraged by the statement of the finance minister in his budget statement of October 12 last year, that he was prepared "to give the most sympathetic consideration to the inclusion of a provision of this sort in a revised income tax law."

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The question is asked, "When?" I hope he starts operating it very soon. These are the things that break a man down. I continue with the recommendations:

> 3. That the exemption for single persons be raised to $1,000, and that for married persons to $2,000.
> 4. That more adequate allowance be made for the labour of farmers' wives, sons and daughters in connection with production on the farm.
> 7. That payment of arrears of interest and principal on the home farm, due before 1940, be allowed as deductions for income tax purposes.

These are the things that have taken away everything that these farmers have earned, and they are unable to carry on any longer. The hearts are gone out of these people. The young people see it and they do not want to go on the farm.

Until agriculture is put on a firm basis where there is security against the kind of thing that happened in the announcement that was made in the house to-day we shall find the agricultural producers of this country stopping. They are going to quit on us. I would not be surprised if that was what is behind the drop in production we have in Canada to-day. Instead of discouraging production in the country, now is the time we ought to be going on with the same effort which this cabinet did so ably during the war in so far as food production was concerned. We should be in war production to-day in agriculture. We need every encouragement that can be given to increase production. The farmers ask for bread and they are given a stone.

We have supported price controls. We believe in them when they are properly used for proper purposes; but if this type of thing is to be used to promote monopolies of any kind to take the last drop of sweat and work from people who are already overworked, then we are going to oppose it with everything we possess. Monopolies have no right to come in here and get concessions such as these without the cards being placed on the table and the reports and financial statements of all these companies and their actual cost of production placed before parliament. They should be brought before us and proved before this house. I would advise the minister to give sympathetic reconsideration to this demand for an increase until it has been proved to the people of Canada that it is essential, and until the farmers themselves have been given something to offset this terrific increase in their cost of production, without which offset they cannot carry on.

Mr. L. E. CARDIFF (Huron North): I rise to-night to take part in this debate for three reasons. The first is that I am a farmer and believe I should voice my opinion. The second is that I should like to speak for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) because I feel that he would be embarrassed if he spoke for himself.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member is not able to speak for me; I shall speak for myself.

Mr. CARDIFF: The third reason is that I do not agree with the announcement that there should be an increase in the price of farm machinery; not that I do not think the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) can justify his position by quoting figures to show that it is necessary to raise the price of farm machinery. I believe that he can. All through the years the price of farm machinery has been increased so substantially that it is not necessary now to increase it again. Before we can pay more for farm machinery it will be necessary to raise the price of farm produce an equal amount. The price of farm produce has been far too low for far too long. During the war years farmers generally carried on because we were at war. No one in this country will contend that they did not do a good job. A census taken in our community in the county of Huron showed that during those years the average age of farmers was fifty-six years. That will give the house some idea of the age of some of the farmers who were trying to farm. Many men seventy years of age and over were trying to run a 100 acre farm. These men carried on all through the war years because we were at war, not because they were able to do it. They now find their health impaired and they cannot carry on any longer. They have tried to get help but, because farming is not attractive, they could not get help. One has only to look at the number of returned men who have applied for farms to undertake farming to understand. It is true we have had some make application, but they do not amount to a large percentage of the boys who came back and who want to start farming. Many of these boys saved a couple of thousand dollars. They would rather put it into a wartime house costing $6.000 and depend on their monthly pay check to pay the remainder, than put it in a farm. I should like to suggest that the boys who are putting all their savings in wartime housing and are depending on industry to pay the remainder will, in seventy-five per cent of the cases, lose every dollar they have. These boys could take the money they have saved and go to the country, and while prices are not as good as some think they should be, they would at least save that portion of the money they tried to save during the war years.

Labour is demanding more money; the machinery companies are demanding more money and many other people are demanding more money. I should like to know what good money will be if we reach the stage where we cannot buy food. Take the devastated countries of Europe where they are starving. Money is not of any value when you cannot buy anything to eat with it. That is what we shall be faced with here. In almost every farming community in Canada we find house after house and farm after farm vacant. There are at least two or three in every mile and a quarter. Why? Simply because farming is not attractive enough to bring people to the farms. Many farms were made vacant during the first years of the war. People left these farms to go into industry, munition plants and the like. These farms are still vacant. The government should know where these men are. If they are still in industry they should be driven back to the farms to operate them, and the jobs they are occupying should be made available to the returned men.

Farmers in this country have always been the last to get consideration from any legislation, and the first to be penalized. That condition cannot prevail longer. It is the duty of every farm member in this House of Commons to voice his protest against this rise in the price of farm machinery. Every member representing a farming community should voice his protest. If that is done I am not afraid that this increase will be allowed to stand.

Mr. F. W. TOWNLEY-SMITH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my voice to the protest against the proposed increase in prices of farm machinery. The farmers have always believed they were being overcharged for their machinery, and I can well imagine the dismay and consternation that will be felt when particularly the western farmers hear of this price increase. I represent an agricultural district, a constituency said to be the largest in the dominion, and I know exactly how these people feel when they come to discuss machinery prices.

The point has been made that an increase in prices of machinery will bring about an increase in the production of the machines. I doubt very much whether that is so. I made application some time ago for some farm machinery, and I have in my possession letters from the manufacturers stating that they are unable to supply what I require. One of these machines is a drill, and my information is that there will not be any drills in the west until June. Well, one can imagine how useful a drill will be in June! If, because of this increase, should it go through, drills are available before that time, it will simply confirm the suspicion in my mind that the whole thing was prearranged and, on the part of somebody, probably the machinery companies, some form of hold-up. I do not believe that point was well taken; as a matter of fact I do not believe it will increase the production of machines.

While we are talking about drills, I should like to make this point. We are told that there has been an increase of $5 a ton in the price of steel. This drill, with certain equipment that I desired on it, was going to cost me in the neighbourhood of $500; it is a big drill. An increase of 12½ per cent would mean something like $62. The drill itself weighs about 1,600 pounds, representing about $4 extra in the cost of the steel, whereas the additional price I shall have to pay will be be some $62. So that I suggest there is really no justification for an argument of that kind.

It is most unfortunate that almost every time agriculture comes under discussion some form of unpleasantness or unhappiness for the farmers seems to result. When I came here last September one of the first things we talked about in which I was peculiarly interested was the Hudson Bay railway. The improvement of the railroad and the use of the port of Churchill were to be of great advantage to the western farmers, but we completely failed to gain our point. Nothing was done; nothing has been done about the railway or the port. Soon after that, we had an announcement about the price of wheat which, instead of being allowed to follow the world price, was fixed for the time being at $1.55 a bushel. I wonder if hon. members appreciate just what this price of $1.55 means to me, for instance. They may think I get $1.55 for every bushel of wheat. That is not so. I get as an initial price $1.25, f.o.b. Fort William. At my elevator where I deliver wheat that means to me, if it is No. 1, the best wheat that can be grown, $1.05 a bushel, not $1.55. We hope to get $1.55 eventually, less the charges, but at the present time what I get at my shipping point is $1.05. Then, shortly after that, meat rationing was ordained, and immediately the price of hogs on the western market slumped $1.25 a hundred, or roughly $2 a pig. After that, coming into this year, the price of gasoline went up two cents, and now we have a suggested increase in farm machinery prices of 12½ per cent.

You have already heard, Mr. Speaker, what is happening in the production of butter and the production of hogs. I wonder exactly what the government is trying to do. Butter production is down twenty per cent. Last year the production of hogs was down forty-three per cent, and in my opinion, this year it will be down another twenty-five per cent as far as my province of Saskatchewan is concerned. Yet the need for hogs is very great. The farmers are feeling such irritation, aggravation, disappointment and frustration that they are just about ready to let things go. I wonder if we could warn the government as to what is taking place on those western farms, that the situation is serious and should be carefully considered. In my opinion, a step like this, increasing prices of machinery, is entirely wrong. Last year I tried to make the point that those nations which could grow commodities of quality most economically would get the market; in other words, that those countries which could keep down their production costs would eventually get the world markets. All these things I have been mentioning, the failure to make use of the Hudson Bay line, the price of wheat, the price of machines and so on, mean an increase in production costs and greater difficulty in getting and keeping the markets of the world.

All these matters should be taken into consideration and given careful thought. I hope the minister will reconsider this matter of increasing prices of machinery, because it is an important point. When you are dabbling with an industry that grows products to the value of $2,146 million, which are the figures for agriculture for the last year as to which we have available data, it is big business which requires careful handling, for that is a great deal of money. On behalf of my constituency I protest against this increase in prices of machinery. It is a most untimely move and an unwise step under any circumstances.

Mr. W. G. CASE (Grey North): I should like to make my position known with respect to the matter now being presented to this house. I have not had an opportunity to examine the figures which were presented by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) this afternoon, but I have some reason to believe that the increase he has intimated may be justified.

My position is that I am opposed to the increase unless some corresponding offset can be arrived at to protect the farmers who must purchase machinery. The situation is indeed serious. My constituency is about two-thirds rural, and recently I have been receiving letters from many prominent farmers there. Some of them are men between fifty and sixty years of age who toiled very hard during the war. They feel discouraged; they are unable to employ labour. As a matter of fact, the Owen Sound Daily Sun-Times, one of the outstanding newspapers in Canada, reports that we are 4,000 farm hands short in Grey and Bruce counties—and these are large agricultural producing counties. The farmers are unable to obtain help. The story they told me is that they are discouraged to a point where they are inclined not to endeavour to produce those articles so necessary to meet the demands of a starving world, and particularly of Europe.

Therefore I have risen at this time simply to make my position clear on this one point. If this increase of 12½ per cent can be justified—and possibly it can—then I say it is a challenge to the government to indicate to the farmer that he is no longer the forgotten man. In other words, the farmer feels he has had a shabby deal. I shall not labour the point, but shall leave it to the judgment of those who are familiar with the set-up, and the consideration which has been given.

I say, however, that it is a challenge to the government to arrange the 12½ per cent increase by subsidy, so that all the citizens of Canada will carry the burden, not one class alone to whom we look for our livelihood, our food and our living. It should be spread over all the taxpayers, or there should be a corresponding increase or offset in the price of farm produce to provide for the increased cost of the implements of production.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, while I am anxious to go home for the Easter recess, I would not dare do so without offering my protest while this matter is before the house. I suggest that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who represents a large agricultural community, might take advantage of the Easter recess to visit some of his constituents, so as to get their reaction. Rightly or wrongly, the farmers of Canada will not accept his statement that the agricultural implements industry cannot operate longer without this type of increase. Investigations carried on in Ottawa and Saskatchewan a few years ago into the whole farm implements industry gave us some information we cannot easily forget.

This afternoon the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bentley) referred to a report presented by the Saskatchewan government. At page 9 of that report we find a break-down of the factors which enter into the cost of a binder for which a farmer in Regina paid $281. The raw materials cost $71.06; labour, $22.62; freight, $26.08, making a total of $119.76 for materials, labour and freight. The overhead or burden was placed at $33.93; experimental work, $2.55, and commission, $45.50.

There is another break-down respecting the price of a cream separator. This separator was manufactured in Sweden by the De Laval Company, which organization apparently has a plant at Peterborough, Ontario, in the constituency of the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser). The price laid down in Peterborough was $17.65. By the time the separator reached Winnipeg the price was $44.58, or an increase of $25.63. This represents a profit of 135 per cent. But my real reason for taking part in the debate was to protest against the yielding by the Minister of Finance to the pressure to put the skids under the wartime prices and trade board.

I have been following very closely the pressures in the United States which have been prompted by reactionary forces there to get rid of all controls. In the issue of PM for Tuesday, March 12, I find that the landlords have been spending fabulous sums to try to get all restrictions removed. One of their representatives suggests that it was bad business to have controls which were making it impossible for landlords to get the sort of rents they might have. Apparently they were prepared to build apartments which would rent for $2,000 a month and upward. When the question was asked as to who would use these apartments the calm reply was that the people who made money during the war were anxious to move into new quarters. Then they were asked what would happen to the old quarters, and the reply was that they would be quite good enough for the veterans who were having trouble to get settled.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is talking about the United States, not Canada?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know of anyone who is paying that much here.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If the minister had been listening he would have heard what I said.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was the $2,000 that got the minister's attention.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Here the national association of manufacturers has something to say. It would seem that these things all come out in the open in the United States. Apparently lobbying goes on behind the doors here, and I think it would be well to get these things out in the open. The national association of manufacturers are anxious that they should get away from all these controls. The issue of March 19 of PM states that Robert Ross Wason, president of the national association of manufacturers, said:

> We want people to be free of this control. The benefits (of freer prices) will come to 140 million people, not to just 15,000 manufacturers.

Then a representative in congress said:

> If the private enterprise system is to be saved those connected with it will have to fight and fight to the death.

Then PM goes on to explain that if these controls are to be removed in the United States, the ceiling price on five pounds of sugar, now standing at thirty-five cents, would go up to $1.34; a pound of bacon with a present ceiling of forty-one cents would rise to fifty-eight cents; a dozen eggs at the present price of fifty cents would rise to ninety-two cents; Portland cement at seventy-nine cents would increase to $1.42; and a gallon of gasoline from twenty cents to thirty-four cents. Then a man's suit valued at $25 would sell for $75, and an apartment with a present rental of $40 would rent for $60.

The workers are, of course, very much exercised for fear these powerful interests in the United States will have their day, that controls will be abolished, and that only those with large amounts of money will be able to buy.

Philip Murray put in a strong plea for the continuation of controls. According to some of the figures they supplied, 1,743 of the largest industrial firms in the United States have profits 217·7 per cent higher than during the period 1936-39. He argued that it would be disastrous if these firms, which now see a real harvest around the corner, are to have their way and short supplies should be bid up to the ceiling.

The Minister of Finance earned the respect of the citizens of this country for his industry and integrity in maintaining the wartime prices and trade board ceilings during the war. But I wish to warn him that he will be forgotten just as quickly if he yields at this stage. The very short supply of food in Great Britain and the importance of maintaining some sort of control now makes it urgent that the Minister of Finance should see to it, just as emphatically as he did during war time, when pressure groups came saying that they were in favour of these controls, but that their particular industries were the exception and required special consideration.

First came the increase in the price of steel. I believe the steel workers had a reasonable request, namely that before any increase should be granted in the price of steel, the people concerned—the industry, government and the workers—should be taken into conference so as to discuss the merits of the case. If some increase was to be granted, there should have been an understanding as to what would happen to wages.

In this most recent transaction we have a third group which is vitally interested, namely the farmers. The industrial workers who are manufacturing farm implements are also greatly concerned. Surely it is a misfortune that an increase of 12½ per cent can be made without first taking into account the reaction of farmers, or of workers in the plants, or of the public. It is most unfortunate that this decision was taken in that particular way.

I want to plead as eloquently as I can with the minister to continue to deserve the confidence and respect of the great majority of the Canadian people who realize that the danger from inflation is as great now as it was during the war. It is unnecessary for me to remind the house that it was after the last war that inflation was felt with such devastating effects in Europe, and it is quite conceivable that we might suffer the effects of inflation in Canada if this sort of pressure is able to get an increase of 12½ per cent in the price of farm implements. At a time when the farmers all across Canada, rightly or wrongly, feel that they have never, to use the words of hon. gentlemen to my right, had a square deal from any party in Canada, with that feeling so prevalent it is a great pity that this increase should be announced without the government taking the people's representatives into their confidence.

Mr. D. J. McCUAIG (Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I am firmly opposed to this increase in the price of farm machinery. I am at a loss to understand how the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) can justify this increase to the machine companies, particularly in the face of the financial statements of two of our Canadian farm implement companies. I have here the Financial Post, which shows the net profit of the Massey-Harris company. The net profit in 1937 was $1,043,728; 1938, $1,065,639: in 1944 and 1945, after deducting all war taxes, the net profit was, in 1944, $1,413,396, and in 1945, $1,800,000.

Take the Cockshutt Plow company. Its net profit in 1937 was $183,091; in 1944, after all war taxes had been deducted, it had a net profit of $399,244. That was not too bad a war effort. The stock market quotations of the stock of these two companies also show something. The stock of the Massey-Harris company in 1939 was quoted in the daily press at from $3.25 to $3.50. According to the Ottawa Evening Citizen, the closing price of that stock to-day was $29.

The stock of the Cockshutt Plow company in 1939 was quoted at $3.50, and to-day, according to the Evening Citizen, it was quoted at $19. That does not look so bad.

Only recently the price of gasoline which the farmer uses in his tractor was increased by two cents a gallon.

Again in to-night's Citizen I notice that the net income of the Imperial Oil company, after all deductions, was $16,616,583 for 1945. That was not so dusty a war effort.

Let us compare that with the financial position of the farmer. The situation of our farmers from 1937 to 1940 was a crime. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) had a little joke about the $2,000 free of income tax for members. But what I am concerned about is the young boy who is starting up on the farm and has an exemption of only $660. I should like to see it raised to $1,200, and the exemption of the married man and his wife raised from $1,250 up to at least $2,400.

I have heard it stated in the house that eighty-five per cent of the people of Canada work for an income of $1,500 or less. They do all the manual work, all the serving, and they are the salt of the earth, the backbone of the country. I also see in the press that the finance minister collects half of the total income tax from this eigthy-five per cent.

I feel sure that Canada will be on the way out under this kind of national economy. Where lies the strength of the nation? In good homes, in health and in all these things that make for a prosperous countryside. How is the boy who is just starting up going to get anywhere with an income tax exemption of only $660, or the man who is trying to build a home? How can the boys who are coming back buy a farm and pay for farm implements at these increased prices? How are they ever going to get started? Using the simple logic of a simple farmer, I would say that this Canada of ours is on the way out and that it will not take long to get there if you impoverish rural Canada, the source of all supplies. This is a matter of the greatest importance, and I should like to see the government give it its most serious consideration.

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the time has perhaps come when I should answer some of the statements that have been made in the numerous speeches to-day. I do not hope to be able to deal with all the numerous speeches, but I wish to clear up some misconceptions that are in the minds of hon. members and to answer some questions that have been asked.

One aspect of the discussion that is gratifying is the support that now comes from most members of the house for the principle of price control. At least it seems to be popular. We started a general price ceiling in 1941 and at the same time instituted a system of wage stabilization. We had an uphill fight to have the principle of over-all price control accepted by the Canadian people, either by agriculture or by labour. As the years went on, perhaps the wisdom of our policy became more apparent, and when recently it became obvious that if we were to avoid a complete break-down of price control and wage stabilization there must be some yielding in some places, we discovered that when and to the extent that we yielded at all we met with tremendous protest. I have tried on several occasions to explain to this house that it is utterly impossible to maintain indefinitely rigid price control. To begin with, we have to get out of this field constitutionally some time; we have not the power to stay in this field indefinitely, and there must be a certain amount of decontrol. This was explained on numerous occasions.

As I understood the position taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) this afternoon, he said that if this authorization of a raising of the price ceiling on agricultural implements was necessary, it was in the wrong order, that other ceilings should be raised first, the ceilings on agricultural products, or on wages, or on both: I think he mentioned both wages and prices of agricultural products. Other speakers said that we had put the cart before the horse. I want to point out that we have not put the cart before the horse. Both with regard to wages and with regard to farm prices there have been repeated and extensive upward adjustments from 1941 down to the present time.

First, with regard to wages, one of the reasons why there has to be an upward adjustment of the ceiling on farm implements at the present time is the increase in wages in the farm implement industry. I said in my statement this afternoon that wages in this industry had increased by 28½ per cent. I was asked by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) whether it is true that in the agricultural implement industry in Toronto wages had been reduced and some of the men had been laid off. I made inquiries between six and eight o'clock, and I find that the western plant of the Massey-Harris company, which was engaged on war production, has been closed, and that the war workers were given the option of transferring their activities to the agricultural implement plant, where the wages may have been lower than in the war plant, but that there has been no reduction whatever in agricultural implement wages. As a matter of fact, the increase in wages paid by the Massey-Harris company, according to information which I have obtained, is as follows: 1939, 51½ cents an hour; 1941, 59·7 cents an hour; 1945, 79·4 cents an hour; 1946, about 80 cents an hour is the average present wage rate of the employees of that company. This indicates a wage increase of approximately 33⅓ per cent. With regard to wages generally in Canada—and I say this on the point that the government has put the cart before the horse, and in rebuttal of the accusation that the government meets the wishes of big business, or business generally, before it meets the demands of labour and agriculture—I wish to point out that, according to the Department of Labour figures, the average hourly wage rates in all industries in 1944 were forty-four per cent above the average of 1935-39 and eighteen per cent above 1941. I say that because some hon. members have gone rather far in stating that I as Minister of Finance am particularly amenable to the appeals of business, or big business, rather than those of other classes in the community. That is not so, nor is it true of the wartime prices and trade board. The whole record and history of the wartime prices and trade board shows that it is consumer-minded. There is not anybody in Canada who knows anything about the record of the wartime prices and trade board and has followed it through the years who can deny that it is consumer-minded. So much so, that it has been denounced at times by agriculture; it has been denounced at times by labour; it has been accused of being obsessed with the idea that we must have low wages and low prices in this country. I do not think the wartime prices and trade board has gone too far, but it has been accused of going too far along those lines, and certainly nobody can deny that the first and paramount interest of the wartime prices and trade board is the interest of the consumer, which in this case is the farmer consumer.

We have to leave these matters to somebody. The government cannot conduct the exhaustive investigations which are necessary to bring to light every detail in these investigations. The body which has been set up to consider what prices are proper under the circumstances is the wartime prices and trade board. I have faith in that board because I have worked with it over the last five or six years, and there is one thing I know they will not do; I know they will not authorize a price increase unless that price increase is absolutely necessary. The reason that a price increase was authorized in this case was because of the great cost increases.

I said a few minutes ago that there had been repeated upward adjustments in prices of agricultural products. I must, I think, place on record some of the increases which have taken place in prices of agricultural products since 1941, merely by way of reply to the charge that we do not meet other groups but meet the claims of business. I am not saying for one minute that the increases were excessive. I am not saying for one minute that price increases over the level of the fall of 1941 were not desirable, because the price level before the war was low, and while it rose somewhat between 1939 and the fall of 1941 it did not rise as high as it should have. But since 1941—and these are figures given by the bureau of statistics—average prices of farm products, including subsidies, in 1945 as compared with average prices for 1941 showed the following increases: wheat, 67 per cent, or, if an estimated participation of fifteen cents be included, 87 per cent; oats 65 per cent, barley 62 per cent, hogs 51 per cent. The recent adjustments in hog prices would increase this to 70 per cent. Cattle, 40 per cent; fluid milk, 28 per cent; butter, 29 per cent; with the recent price increase, 40 per cent; cheese, 53 per cent; eggs, 28 per cent; potatoes, 135 per cent; all farm prices, 48 per cent, farm machinery, three per cent.

Mr. McCUAIG: Will the minister allow me a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid—

Mr. McCUAIG: I was going to say, with the ridiculous price of farm products in 1941—

Mr. ILSLEY: Please do not interrupt me. I have listened to a lot of speeches to-day and I have not a very long time in which to speak. I am appealing to the house to give this matter fair judgment. I can understand that members from rural constituencies, about to go back to their ridings, wish to place themselves on record as trying to keep down prices of implements which their constituents have to buy. Do not think that the government is insensible to considerations of that kind. I myself represent a rural constituency, and the government would not permit this price increase to take place, at the instance of the wartime prices and trade board, or anybody else, if they did not consider that it was a necessary price increase for the reasons I gave this afternoon. To continue: farm machinery, three per cent; with the recent increase, nine per cent. Taking the period from October, 1941, the basic period of price ceiling, to February, 1946, farm prices have advanced 14 per cent; farm machinery prices have advanced three per cent. The present price increase in farm machinery, which applies to domestically manufactured items only, will mean an increase in all farm machinery prices of about nine per cent, since the price ceiling came into effect, as compared with an advance of 44 per cent in farm product prices.

Listening to the speeches this afternoon and evening, one would think that we had removed the price ceiling from farm machinery and were retaining it on farm products. I should like hon. members to bear this in mind, that far from removing control over prices of farm machinery we are maintaining a most severe and rigid control, so much so that we have protests from the implement companies, who say that this increase is entirely inadequate. I will read two or three of them. Here is one from the Cockshutt Plow company. This is a wire I received to-day:

The recent increase of 12½ per cent in the retail prices of farm implements is completely inadequate to cover increases in material labour and over-all costs since ceiling prices were set. While necessity for controls is appreciated such controls should be fair and equitable. Implement manufacturers should not be forced to accept staggering increases in costs without being allowed to adjust selling prices proportionately. Otherwise the industry will find itself in straitened circumstances and will be unable to carry on necessary production. The increase required by our company to provide sound operation is over 25 per cent as outlined in our submission to the wartime prices and trade board. The increase authorized by them is insufficient and will place our company in an unsound and unsatisfactory position unless augmented by a subsidy. We therefore respectfully request the matter of increases in prices of farm implements be given further consideration. Our company is in no position to manufacture implements on a losing basis.

Cockshutt Plow Company.

I quote another communication from a small company in Orillia:

Minister of Finance, Ottawa, Ontario.

Otaco Limited manufactures the lighter agricultural implements, wagons and sleighs. Before the war costs had eliminated any reasonable margin of profit in our products. Our costs have increased including the latest authorized increases on steel malleables and pigiron to an average of forty per cent on our class of farm implements and fifty per cent on wagons. All these increases are results of government authorization. While we appreciate the help given the twelve and one-half per cent does not cover our increased costs and unless we have sufficient relief to do that we will obviously have to withdraw from the farm implement field. This we will regret because of the approximately four hundred families that depend on us for their livelihood.

Otaco Limited.

The next communication is addressed to myself:

Reference recent ruling farm implement prices. Decision taken wartime prices and trade board most disappointing having in mind we submitted conclusive evidence cost advances justifying our request substantially greater percentage increase. I appreciate your difficulty and recognize that if inflationary tendencies are to be controlled that all must be prepared to make sacrifices. Inescapable fact is however that cumulative cost advances since basic period and impending increases in material and labour costs make further increases selling prices imperative if our company is to continue to operate on sound basis. Recent 12½ per cent adjustment can only be regarded therefore as temporary measure of relief.

James S. Duncan.

That is the kind of thing we get from the implement companies. We are not prepared to have regard to these representations because the wartime prices and trade board have spent a long time in the investigation of the claims of the implement companies that they must have increases in the prices of their implements ranging from 20 per cent to 25 and 30 per cent. The wartime prices and trade board have satisfied themselves that 12½ per cent will be sufficient to enable the companies to carry on; but they are also satisfied that, whatever the profit position may have been during the war on their war business, there is now such a drop in their profits that those profits for the ensuing year are sure to be less than standard profits; that is to say, less than the average profits of the period 1936-1939.

Those who are running the implement companies are much like other people. I have spent a good many years in this house and have heard big interests attacked; I have heard wealth attacked, and so on. Perhaps I have indulged a little bit in the attack myself. The members of this house think it is perfectly natural for a workman not to work overtime if all his earnings are taken in income tax. They think it is perfectly natural for the farmer not to strain himself to produce if he can get nothing out of his additional production. Human beings are pretty much the same everywhere; they want to be assured that they will get something in return for what they do. They will not do business unless they make a little something out of it. The implement companies are like other people in that regard. Members here have said "Why do you not put this before the house? Why do you not let us decide?" I am satisfied that if the members of the house had executive responsibility, if they had the responsibility of deciding, of saying yes or no as to whether a factory should go on or stop, they would say, "Well, we hate to have to defend an increase in prices before our constituents but we must have the machinery." That is what they would say, and that is what the government has to say, although it is far easier to make good fellows of ourselves with the farmers of Canada than it is with a few implement companies who are politically negligible, as everybody in this house knows. We are doing this because we think it is in the interests of the farmers of Canada. We could take another course. We could follow the course which the Progressive Conservative party came near advocating recently, if not completely advocating, to let the controls go and let things find their level. That was tried at the end of the last war. I wish to tell the house what happened to farm implement prices at the end of the last war. I have the records here and I shall give them in a moment. Taking 1914 as the index of 100, in 1915 the price had decreased 5 per cent; in 1916, it was 4 per cent below 1914. In 1917 it was up 11 per cent; in 1918 it was up 44 per cent; in 1919, 54 per cent; in 1920, 64 per cent; in 1921, 96 per cent. That is what happened to farm implement prices during and at the end of the last war.

Mr. McCUAIG: How much did they go down from that price?

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1921 they were 96 per cent above; in 1922 they came down to 61 per cent above 1914. I have not the figures beyond that. I do not know whether they came down below that or went up again or not. Prices were lower at that time than they are to-day. If I remember correctly, and if the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) were here, he would know, steel workers were getting 16 and 18 cents an hour in the 'teens. Workers in the implement industries were getting 22 cents an hour as against 80 cents an hour to-day. In regard to wages they were working twelve hours a day in the steel mills in Nova Scotia and getting 16 and 18 cents an hour. I am speaking from memory, but I think I am right.

Mr. HARKNESS: Farmers were getting $3 for wheat.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, they never got $3 for wheat. That is the situation we would have in this country if we had no controls. There has been no control that has been more rigid, and few controls that have been as rigid, as the farm machinery control. When we were adjusting farm prices upward in 1942 we were keeping farm machinery prices down. When we were adjusting farm prices upwards in 1943 we were getting farm machinery prices down. When we were adjusting farm prices upwards in 1944 we were getting farm machinery prices down, and putting them down below what they were at the time.

An hon. MEMBER: At that time—

Mr. ILSLEY: I listened to twenty-five speeches to-day and I did not interrupt very much. In 1944 we pressed them down below the ceiling at the time we took the duty off. In 1945 we kept them where they were. In 1946 with the rise in the steel price, with these rises in wages, with these rises in overhead costs and so on, we think the time has come for us to be fair, and to get production we think the time has come that we have to allow this moderate increase of 12½ per cent, which over the whole field of agricultural implements amounts to only nine per cent, because about half of the agricultural implements are imported.

In the debate to-day it was pointed out that selling costs were less than they were years ago. I made inquiries about that and I was informed the fact that the selling costs are down was taken into account in fixing the figure of 12½ per cent. I was asked whether the increase in the price ceiling applies to inventories. The answer is that it does for one reason, namely, that when you raise a ceiling it is administratively impossible to select certain machines and say this machine came on the floor before the ceiling was raised, and this machine came on the floor after the ceiling was raised, and put a tag on one machine at one price and on another machine at another price. The important fact in reference to inventories is that there are practically no inventories. The machines are snapped up. The demand is so great that they melt; they go right out into the hands of the public.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the minister sure that they have not been held for this price rise?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they have been held.

Mr. COLDWELL: I heard that.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is one objection to the suggestion that sounded reasonable to-day, and is reasonable in principle, that before you change any ceiling you ought to have a public hearing. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) put that forward very strongly. If we were to have changes in the ceilings taking place all the time—they have been taking place all the time over the last two or three years, and they are taking place more rapidly recently—it would be utterly impossible from the administrative point of view to have public hearings on all these price changes. If we selected some of the more important ones—I was thinking about this as I listened to the hon. member for Vancouver East for whom I need hardly say I have much respect—I do not know where we would stop. Each person who was heard would say: "Well, I am entitled to a public hearing on this matter." It would have to be advertised and so on. But it seems to me there is this big difference between a price hearing and a wage hearing. In the case of a wage hearing the wage increase, if it is eventually granted, may be dated back to the time of the application and very often is. The price increase cannot. If you had a hearing that lasted as long as some of the wage hearings have lasted, and if you had a price hearing on this matter that lasted several months you could not, of course, date the price back. Therefore, if you had a situation where the producer of the article really needed the increase in order to operate you could not do anything effective for him at all. The suggestion that there should be public hearings is impracticable. We have to have faith in the wartime prices and trade board. Their record and their outlook have been such that, however much people desiring higher prices may dislike them—and they have taken a great deal of abuse all through the years from people who desire higher prices—those who desire low prices, prices as low as can be maintained, can trust them.

These were some of the questions that were brought up this afternoon. One other question was asked by the hon. member for Wellington North (Mr. Menary), namely, what happened in the case of an article which was purchased before the effective date of the increase in the price ceiling? I made inquiries and attempted to get the information in that regard. The increase came into effect on April 13. If a man has a contract for delivery the ordinary law of contract applies; but if a sale takes place on or after the 13th day of April the vendor may sell at the new price.

There is one point which perhaps I ought to make clear. After listening to a number of the speeches this afternoon, one would have thought the government was raising these prices. The order of the wartime prices and trade board does not raise the prices; it merely authorizes an increase in prices, raises the ceiling on the prices. The circumstances at the present time are such that the producers can take advantage of that. We removed the duty from agricultural implements; we removed the war exchange tax and so on from agricultural implements, so that no advantage whatever can be taken of the tariff. We get the advantage of the competitive United States market, to the extent that it is an advantage, and I presume it is of some. The tone of some of the speeches was that we were just going in and saying, "You have to pay these increased prices." We are just removing the control of the prices to that extent, raising the ceilings to the extent of 12½ per cent.

I have a great deal more material here, Mr. Speaker, but I do not know that there is very much more I could usefully add.

Mr. PROBE: Might I ask the minister a question which would fit into this discussion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: Very well.

Mr. PROBE: Would the minister inform the house whether or not he is taking steps to see that we are now going to get machinery on the Canadian market, so that these large inventories I see listed here will not be allowed to trickle out of Canada at the same time? What precautions are we taking to keep our Canadian inventories at home, as well as building them up in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to find out just exactly what some other agency of government is doing about that. I think a certain proportion is allocated for export in order to hold our export markets, so that we shall not lose our foothold in those markets. That is a matter which, as I understand it, and I think I am correct, is arranged between the wartime prices and trade board and those agencies of government which are interested in export.

I am reminded that some question has been raised as to whether the wartime prices and trade board advised the government in this matter, or specifically whether they advised me, because I am the responsible minister; or whether the government told the wartime prices and trade board to raise this ceiling by 12½ per cent. I might as well tell the house how these things are done. No implement company has approached me at all. Personally I have not seen any representative of any implement company, nor have they communicated with me except by protesting to-day at what has been done in regard to these increases. However, they have made their representations to the wartime prices and trade board over quite a period of time. Those representations have been analyzed and gone into, with the result the house knows. The wartime prices and trade board advised me last week they were convinced that this was absolutely necessary and should not be further delayed. They then made the announcement themselves. I did not know what time they were going to make the announcement, but I understand it was on the radio on Friday evening and in the newspapers on Saturday morning; but I consented to the increase and take the responsibility for it.

Mr. J. M. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of making one or two brief observations and a suggestion. The suggestion is not wholly new; it is very similar to the one made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). The reason I do that is this. It seems to me that it is important not only to do what is believed to be the right thing but to make people believe it is the right thing. If anything were needed to support the statement made this afternoon by my leader that this matter was not carried out as well as it might have been, it is the debate we have had, when we have seen what, to a new member like myself at any rate, seems an unprecedented spate of protest against what the government is doing.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has made a statement to which we have all listened with respect. Personally I would not presume to disagree with it because I do not know enough about the facts. On the other hand, we have had a great many people here who do disagree with it, and so I come to this. I agree with what has been said that it is in the highest degree unfortunate that a decision of this kind has to be arrived at by methods fair-minded men have to-day described as in camera, secretly, and so on. I fully realize the force of the minister's statement that we cannot have a debate in parliament on every decision that has to be made, but nonetheless I suggest that there are certain basic principles underlying the de-controls which must come within the next few months. So that I submit for the consideration of the minister and the government whether it would not be possible to have some body, I do not know whether it should be the agriculture committee, the banking and commerce committee or a combination of the two if you wish, which would ask to appear before it people who are supposed to have competent opinions on these important questions, which I recognize as very difficult, and to ask also representatives of labour, of the farmers, of the manufacturers and of all the other people interested. The minister may say, "Oh, well, you would just have a kind of debate which would lead to nothing." I am not suggesting that this body could proceed to decide on this and this and this de-control in Gatling-gun fashion, but I suggest that at the present time there is a great deal of misapprehension in the public mind, and that if we are to have merely one announcement after another that this and this and this has been de-controlled, it is not the best way of trying to get across to the public mind what, it seems to me, it is so enormously important that we should get into the public mind.

The thing that has distressed me to-day and harrassed my mind beyond words is the statement we have heard in this house as to farms abandoned, as to people unwilling to leave the cities to go to work on the farms. I heard a figure as to the percentage of men who had come from farms and were now unwilling to go back to them, which was so high I simply could not credit it; nevertheless there is the problem. It seems to me one of enormous importance, and therefore with great respect, not with any desire to complicate this difficult question but because I believe at the present time it is not being really met, I offer this suggestion. I believe the debate we have had to-day shows that the problem is not being met, when once there is this widespread measure of protest. I realize that the protests come from farming constituencies. I represent one myself, though it will be observed that I have not made a protest. Nevertheless I feel there are basic principles here which might well be discussed in open forum, so that the citizens of Canada might have a better understanding than they now have of the problems and the basic principles which are to be followed in dealing with the matter.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it was suggested a few minutes ago that it might be necessary for one of the members of the opposition to speak for the Minister of Agriculture. I think it is pretty well understood, however, that I usually speak for myself.

There are one or two reasons why it would be necessary for me to say something in a debate of this kind. The first is that I do not think that in the ten years I have been here I have allowed a debate on a question involving an increase in the price of farm implements to go by without my saying something. If I were to do so on this occasion it might be misunderstood.

In addition to that, like many other hon. members I intend to go to my constituency during the Easter recess, and I am certain again that if I did not express myself upon this question I might be misunderstood there —and I have seldom allowed myself to be misunderstood in my own constituency.

Another reason for my rising is that one or two of the suggestions made require a little analysis. We have talked a great deal this afternoon and this evening about a 12½ per cent increase in the price of farm implements. I think I am as much opposed as anyone in Canada—and every farmer is opposed—to an increase in the price of farm implements, believing as I do and as most farmers do, as has been stated a number of times this afternoon, that farm implement prices, if anything, have always been a little too high. So that one has to have proven to him the fact that they are as low as they ought to be, in order to be entirely satisfied.

But on this occasion perhaps too great emphasis has been given to the increase of 12½ per cent, and more particularly by my hon. friends directly opposite, in view of the statement I have heard them make on many previous occasions. Each time that I have been attempting to prove that we should have lower prices for farm implements, I have always been told that it does not involve more than from three to six per cent of the farmer's cost of production. I think the report that was read this afternoon on so many occasions bears that out—and probably accepts the higher figure of six per cent. If that is true, what we have been talking about this afternoon is three-quarters of one per cent of the farmer's cost of production, when we speak of a 12½ per cent increase. I wish to make that statement only in order to have the record straight in so far as what we actually do is concerned.

If there were no other considerations I would think that even three-quarters of one per cent of an increase in farm costs of production at the present time would be a most important matter, and that it should be justified on some ground or another. I consider the statement made a few minutes ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) was a very fair statement of the relationship between farmers and the implement industry, and a very fair statement in respect of what has happened since 1941 to the farmers as compared with what has happened to the farm implement companies.

But I wish to emphasize a little more—and he emphasized it—the fact that these increases, so far as the farmers are concerned, began at a very low level, and did advance eventually to a fairly high level. Considered, of course, in terms of percentages, that can be represented in very high figures.

There is another argument which is being used in the country, but which was not used in the house this afternoon. I wish to refer to it because it has been used in the country, and more particularly in some of the financial papers. The suggestion has been made that farmers are very well off. I do not find any more common statement. Indeed I find it quite often in the corridors of this building—the statement to the effect that farmers are well off. Because of that statement being made, we have been arriving at conclusions which are not justified by the facts.

One of the most apparent reasons for making the statement is contained in a table which has been issued, indicating the extent to which farmers have paid off their indebtedness for farm machinery, and on mortgages. I was just reading this evening one statement which indicated that thirty mortgage companies in Canada—and some hon. members opposite know very well the records of some of them—had had the indebtedness of farmers reduced by $102 million. That is, early in the war the indebtedness of those farmers was $168 million, while at the end of the war or last year, it was down to $66 million.

I should just like to make an analysis of what that means. It certainly does not mean that the farmer has $100 million more in cash. It does mean that farmers have worked hard for long days during the years of this war to produce products which have been sold at reasonable prices under arrangements made through the wartime prices and trade board. They have worked long hours and long days, and by doing so have accumulated $100 million which has been paid into the treasuries of thirty loan companies in Canada.

That is a partial job well done. They still owe $66 million. Any man or any group of men which still owes any debt, particularly a group owing $66 million to thirty mortgage companies, is not yet well off. That statement ought to be emphasized. Until that other $66 million is paid off, the farmers who owe that money are not well off. Every farmer in this country, or every farmer who farms in this country, knows that a farmer has only one ambition, if he is ever going to be well off, and that is to have his farm clear of debt. His second ambition is to have his farm implements clear of debt.

If any farmer in this country with an average, family-sized farm, has his farm clear of debt, and his implements and stock clear of debt, then I venture to say on the floor of this house that there is not any nicer way of living than living on the farm. But if the farmer is loaded down with debt, even to the extent of a few thousand dollars, it is hard for him to make a living on the farm, with people chasing after him from morning to night to get him to pay his debts. That farmer will not have a very comfortable time on the farm, nor will he enjoy working there.

So that, I think, while he has taken off $102 million from a debt of $168 million owed to some thirty mortgage companies—and owing a great deal more in some other directions—that we should pay attention to that fact, when considering his present position, rather than pay attention only to the fact that he has paid off that amount of debt.

There is one other point I wish to make, and it is this: As the Minister of Finance pointed out, we have made recently some increases in farm prices. There has been an increase in the price of butter of four cents which, after all, is an increase of ten per cent. It is not three-quarters of one per cent, and it might be fair to compare it with the 12½ per cent increase to implement companies. But to the farmers who produce butter it is an increase of ten per cent. In both cases it is an increase on top of the price at which he was probably at least getting by prior to getting that increase. So that I am sure it is acknowledged in the country as a very helpful increase; at least it is as much as the organized farmers asked for.

The other increase which was made was the six per cent increase on hogs. Many of us are going home to our constituencies during the Easter recess, and many of those constituencies are agricultural. I am speaking as a member of the government because there are only two of us on this side from Saskatchewan and I think any message we have to give out should go to that province, namely, that the prices board cannot make all its adjustments at once unless it is prepared to agree that the position taken by the official opposition is the correct one, that we should make all our decisions at once to close the whole thing up. If that were the case, then, of course, you could make all your adjustments at once. But barring that, there is only one other way, and that is to do it partly, one at a time; then work along with the job until finally you have it completed. I am confident whether other members of the house are or not, and I am going to exercise any ability that I have to spread that confidence, that the adjustments which have been made will be followed up by more adjustments. I am also satisfied and confident that when those adjustments are all made, a good job will have been done and that our farming population can at least during the next few years proceed to pay off the remainder of the debt. When they have that debt paid off I hope we shall be able to say that the farmer is well off. Because for Canada to be well off, the farmer must be well off. When he is well off, others are well off in common with him. Then we shall be able to go back to our constituencies, wherever they may be, and say that we have taken some part in doing a job that will be of some assistance to this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is customary, Mr. Speaker, where a motion has been made such as that moved by my hon. friend, that he ask to withdraw his motion in order to close the proceedings.

Mr. BRACKEN: What is the alternative? We do not want to vote the government out of power. The purpose of the motion has been achieved. A good discussion has been had; protests have been made, and the minister has made his answer. That is a good thing for Canada. The difficulty was, Mr. Speaker, that prior to this time decisions were made outside this house, and then the minister would come in and explain them under conditions where there could not be any debate. That is what I protested chiefly against to-day. Our protests have now been made and the minister has made his answer, and better than he ever did before in any statement he has made. I think the purpose of the motion has been achieved and, as is customary under such conditions, I ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

It being seven minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, April 16, 1946

The house met at three o'clock.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

CANADIAN NATIONAL (WEST INDIES) STEAMSHIPS LIMITED—REFERENCE OF ANNUAL REPORT TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): I desire to lay on the table the annual report of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1945, in English and French. Copies of this report are being distributed to hon. members this afternoon.

By leave of the house I wish to move:

That the annual report for 1945 of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, tabled this day, be referred to the sessional committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Motion agreed to.

FOODS AND DRUGS

PROVISION FOR LABELLING IN FRENCH AS WELL AS IN ENGLISH

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 55, to amend certain acts in respect to the labelling and marking of foods and drugs.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. PICARD: Mr. Speaker, at the moment the Food and Drugs Act provides, under section 3, subsection (b) of chapter 3 of the statutes of 1939, that the department shall have the right to make regulations concerning the labelling and packaging of foods and drugs. The aim of that section as it stands is to prevent the public or the purchaser, according to the text of the subsection, from being "deceived or misled" as to the character, strength, quality or quantity of the article, and so on. Under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act there is a subsection providing that whenever there is any drug marketed there shall be printed on the wrapper or label the following words:

It is unlawful to administer this preparation to a child under two years of age as it contains (insert name of drug) and is dangerous to its life.

The object of the present bill is to provide, for people who understand only the French language, the same protection as is provided for those who speak English, under the Food and Drugs Act and under the Opium and Narcotic Drug Act, by providing that the labelling shall be printed both in English and in French.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Mr. POULIOT: Jan de Kuyper gin should be described as poison.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER ANNUAL REPORT AND REVIEW POLICIES OF CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Hon. J. J. McCANN (Minister of National Revenue) moved:

That a select committee, the members thereof to be later named, be appointed on radio broadcasting to consider the annual report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and to review the policies and aims of the corporation and its regulations, revenues, expenditures and development, with power to examine and inquire into the matters and things herein referred to and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, and to send for persons, papers and records.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I wish to ask the mover of this resolution a question. This committee has been appointed periodically for many years, in fact since the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been in existence, and it seems to me that its meetings have been held to too great an extent in camera. Moreover, the reports presented to the house are never considered by the house. When the committee was appointed last year it was supposed to report on the question whether the $2.50 fee should be abolished, having regard to changed conditions. I would like to find out from the minister whether, when the present committee is appointed, it will meet in Ottawa, whether its proceedings will be open to the public, and whether its reports will be presented for consideration by the house, and presented in time to allow of such consideration.

Mr. McCANN: The committee is being set up at this time for the purpose of expediting the business of parliament, and we invite the cooperation of members of the opposition and of other parties in naming members who will constitute the committee in order that its work may begin immediately after the recess. In answer to the hon. member for Broadview, may I assure him that the sittings of the committee are not held in camera. They are open to the public, and the reports submitted are brought down in sufficient time to be acted upon by parliament if parliament so desires. It is within the province of any member of parliament to move that a report be concurred in, with a view to having discussion. The recommendations and reports of the committee for 1942, 1943 and 1944 have in the main been acted upon, and the government has put into operation as a matter of policy almost all the recommendations which these committees throughout the several years have submitted to parliament.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I do not rise to speak against the motion, because I am in favour of it. I simply wish to point out that the motion is for a select committee, and of course a motion is necessary if the committee is to be set up. But the select committee is to deal only with the annual report, and not "annual reports," in the plural. I am at a loss to know why the committee should be set up to deal with just one report. I presume that is not particularly what is in the minister's mind. What I wish to emphasize is my belief—and I shall present to you, Mr. Speaker, and your committee who are now revising the rules and regulations of the house, a submission in this regard—that a committee of this kind should be a standing committee in order that it may meet every year to consider not only a particular matter but other subjects which should be brought before it. In fact, I believe that all government institutions should come under review of this parliament annually and not merely when something may have arisen to necessitate a special sitting of a committee. I emphasize this at the present time. At a later date I shall discuss matters affecting radio.

Mr. McCANN: It is not the intention of the government to have the committee confine its investigation to one single report. All the policies, the financial operations and the obligations of the organization may be reviewed by the committee when it sits, as has been the practice in former years in respect of the policies and operations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That when the house adjourns on Wednesday, April 17, it stand adjourned until Monday, April 29, 1946, at three o'clock in the afternoon.

He said: Mr. Speaker, since the motion to have the Easter adjournment until Wednesday of next week was carried I have received representations from all sides of the house indicating that the majority of the members would prefer to have the longer rather than the shorter vacation. The adjournment to Wednesday of next week would give only two and a half working days in the house next week. If the adjournment were fixed until the following Monday it would allow hon. members a longer recess of four and a half days. I am putting forward this motion in the belief that the longer recess would better suit the membership of the house. With respect to this longer recess, the government intends to follow the same course it has followed in previous years when there has been a lengthy recess, and allow hon. members their actual travelling expenses. As to the method of transportation, hon. members are free to choose what will best accommodate them.

Mr. BRACKEN: We are agreeable to the passage of the motion.

Motion agreed to.

[Later:]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say I received a note from the leader of the Social Credit group asking me to clarify the last part of the statement I made as to the members being free to choose their method of travel at the Easter recess. My hon. friend asked if that means by plane. It will be for hon. members to decide; they are free so to travel if they wish.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GREAT LAKES SEAMEN—HOURS OF WORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): A matter of some urgency has just come to my attention about which I would like to make an inquiry of the government. I am told that there are seamen employed on vessels operated by the Department of Transport and other owners who are working as long as eighty-four hours a week on the great lakes. What steps if any is the government taking to rectify this matter and thereby avoid a threatened seamen's strike?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I wish to thank the leader of the opposition for giving me notice of this question. In so far as it refers to the operation of vessels controlled by the Department of Transport I think I should leave it to my colleague, the Minister of Transport, to reply.

With respect to the privately owned and controlled companies operating vessels on the great lakes and the dispute with the seamen, my department has been endeavouring to get the parties into collective bargaining negotiations in accordance with the provisions of P.C. 1003. A preliminary conference was arranged for April 8 in Toronto, but the representatives of the Canadian seamen's union did not attend, claiming that it was their understanding that the conference was to be held in Toronto in the office of the Department of Labour, and that an officer of the department was to attend. This was not the understanding of myself or the officers of my department.

At the present time the agreements between certain operators and the union call for a twelve hour day except for firemen, but when the last collective agreement was signed the question of hours of work per day was left open to further negotiations. For the present these negotiations have not yielded any result, and it is the view of the department that the conciliation processes of our legislation should be invoked by the union or the companies. We are informed by the representatives of the companies concerned that a meeting of all operators of great lakes vessels is to be held in Toronto on April 24, and following that the operators will have a concrete proposal to submit to the union executive. It is our hope that the parties will then enter into negotiations looking toward a settlement of the dispute.

Mr. BRACKEN: I did not send a copy of this question to the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether he could add anything to what the Minister of Labour has said.

Hon. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Minister of Transport): Yes. I was advised by the Minister of Labour when we were coming down to the house that the hon. member intended to ask this question. I can say that so far as the Department of Transport is concerned we believe we have the equivalent of an eight hour day on the ships operated by the department, although it is true we do not pay overtime. There are seasons in the year when it is occasionally necessary to send out lighthouse supplies, and where it is deemed advisable for the crew to work more than eight hours. When that is done the men get time off as soon as they reach their home port. In fact there are seasons in the year when officers of these ships are on call. They have to go out at night and do certain work. There are seasons of the year when because of the weather it is impossible to move. When it is impossible to move and the men work only two or three hours, they are paid for eight hours. When they work over eight hours, they get, as I said a moment ago, time off at the home port. Therefore we consider that in effect we have the equivalent of an eight-hour day.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask the minister a supplementary question? When they work only two or three hours a day in bad weather, are they on duty for the rest of the time, and on call?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Yes, they are on duty for the rest of the time.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

ROYAL MILITARY COLLEGE

REFERENCE TO MINISTER'S ADDRESS IN CORNWALL —MILITARY TRAINING REQUIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. KIDD (Kingston City): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister clarify the statement with regard to the Royal Military College, Kingston, which he released to the press in Cornwall yesterday?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): I did not release any statement to the press. I was making a speech in Cornwall yesterday, but I do not suppose the house would care to have me repeat it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ABBOTT: Briefly, what I said with respect to the Royal Military College was this, that contrary to rumours, the military college would not be closed, but the question now under consideration was whether or not the character of the course, the syllabus and so on, would be that conducted before the war or a different one, and that that question had not yet been decided.

Mr. PEARKES: Mr. Speaker, a question arising out of the previous question: Will the Minister of National Defence say whether the Royal Military College will be open for courses this year for young men without previous military training?

Mr. ABBOTT: The answer is, it will not.

PEACE CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE—CONFERENCE ON COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the house rises to-morrow for a lengthy Easter recess, will the Prime Minister be good enough to give the members such information as he has with respect to the probable date of the peace conference in Paris, and when he plans to meet the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom for a conference on commonwealth affairs?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish I were able to inform my hon. friend as to the date of the Paris conference. As hon. members know, it was hoped that the conference might open on May 1; but I think I am correct in saying it is hardly probable that it will open for some weeks after that date.

As the house is aware, I have accepted the invitation of the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom to meet in conference with him and others on matters of mutual interest. I hope that that meeting may be arranged so that the time of it will be approximate to that of the meeting of the Paris conference, possibly a week or two before the conference opens in Paris, but up to the present I have not received exact information.

TIMBER

BRITISH COLUMBIA PRODUCTION—PRAIRIE REQUIREMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. PROBE (Regina City): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Reconstruction or his appropriate colleague. I sent a notice of this question to the minister. Will the Minister of Reconstruction please inform the house whether the 35 per cent of the British Columbia timber production being retained in Canada is being offered by the coast mills locally only, thereby denying the prairie trade a fair share of the British Columbia timber output? What provision has been made by the department—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is what may be called a lengthy question and it should be put on the order paper.

Mr. PROBE: I did not understand your ruling, sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said this question is a lengthy one and should be put on the order paper.

Mr. PROBE: Mr. Speaker, I must suggest that this is an urgent question. The reply need not be longer than any other.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have asked the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

IGOR GOUZENKO

REFERENCE TO PRESS REPORT AS TO STATEMENT FROM RUSSIAN EMBASSY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Cariboo): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the statement appearing in the press, alleged to have come from the Russian embassy, that Mr. Igor Gouzenko had stolen money from the Russian embassy, I should like to ask if the Secretary of State for External Affairs received any communication with regard thereto prior to the establishment of the royal commission?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I assume the statement in the press to which my hon. friend refers is that which was issued by the Russian embassy some days ago. I may say to my hon. friend that a similar statement was received in the Department for External Affairs a day or two after Mr. Gouzenko had left the embassy.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

PART 3—FARMERS AND RESIDENTS OF TOWNS AND VILLAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance, notice of which I sent him the other day. Will he please indicate to the house the arrangements which have been made to enable farmers and residents of towns and villages to take advantage of part 3 of the National Housing Act?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I inadvertently left the answer to that question in my office, and I shall have to give it later. Will to-morrow be all right?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before the Easter adjournment.

CANADIAN FORCES

ALLEGATIONS AS TO TREATMENT OF CANADIAN SOLDIERS AT HEDLEY DOWNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, notice of which I sent him. I would have put the question on the order paper were it not for the fact that there is some degree of urgency in view of the house rising to-morrow. Has the minister received a communication signed by Mr. N. M. Lee Rolfe, president, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Halifax, relating to serious allegations regarding the treatment of Canadian soldiers at Hedley Downs Detention Barracks, England? If so, is an investigation being undertaken, and will the minister make a complete statement to the house?

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence): Yes, I did receive the letter referred to. I have ordered an investigation but I have not yet received a report. When I do I shall make the statement asked for.

ELIGIBILITY OF FORMER R.C.A.F. AIRCREW FOR FLEET AIR ARM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. W. SKEY (Trinity): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence, arising out of newspaper reports of new rates of pay in the armed forces, and shortages that are reported in the Royal Canadian Navy. Will the Royal Canadian Navy consider accepting former R.C.A.F. aircrew for entry into the new fleet air arm? I have particular reference to air force pilots, navigators, gunners and wireless operators already trained in naval cooperation.

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT: (Minister of National Defence): It is very difficult to answer that question offhand. I was given no notice of it. I am sure that they would consider any applicant whose physical category, education and previous training qualify him for entry in the naval forces.

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

The house resumed, from Friday, April 12, consideration in committee of bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed on the 6th day of March, 1946—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, I have done my best to summarize the speech made the other day by the Minister of Finance. I give him credit for his hard-working spirit, but when I read his speech I understood nothing from it, and it took me about two days to try to put his argument in order so as to understand something of it. I shall have to quote part of it before asking the minister a few questions which he may answer later. I have sent him a copy of his speech so that he may correct me if I happen to make an error.

In the first place the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance declared on April 1, 1946, that since September, 1939, Canada had made to the United Kingdom only one loan, of $700,000,000, under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942. The interest rate is nil. The loan is being repaid by proceeds of sales or redemptions of British-owned Canadian securities. It has since been reduced by repayment to $538,000,000 odd.

[Mr. Abbott.]

In the second place temporary loans have been made under the Export Credits Insurance Act to eight countries. The interest rate varied from two per cent to 3·5 per cent, and the time of repayment also varied from 1950 in the case of Russia to 1977 in the case of China. The total commitments are $644,500,000. They include $30,000,000 for Norway and $65,000,000 for the Netherlands East Indies.

This information is not satisfactory. It is too broad, and I hope that the minister will be kind enough to supply information about the first loans that were made to those countries and also in respect to the further loans. In regard to Norway, for instance, I remember that one of the members from Toronto said that he was satisfied with the progress of the Falconbridge Nickel mines in Norway during the war. I have now the company's report to the shareholders, and when I showed it in the house some of my colleagues were surprised. I will tell hon. members where it comes from. It comes from a boy in the navy who has some stock in the company. He was dumbfounded to see that this Canadian concern was boasting of making a huge profit by dealing with Germany in German-occupied territory.

With regard to the Netherlands East Indies it is important to know if it has been supplied only with money, or with some ammunition and arms. With whom did the Canadian government deal, since there was no recognized government over there?

In the third place temporary advances have also been made to fifteen allied countries under section 3 of the War Expenditure and Demobilization Appropriation Act and previous war appropriation acts.

The Minister of Finance said at page 766 of Hansard that the British authorities have estimated that the deficit will be $3,300 million Canadian for 1946, and $2,220 million Canadian for the two years 1947 and 1948; that the deficit in 1948 should be small, and a balance should be achieved by 1950. This is what the British refer to as getting back to equilibrium, the minister said.

I would ask one question of the minister at that point: What about the Canadian equilibrium? If we are so much interested in the equilibrium of the United Kingdom, we should have some information about the equilibrium of Canada.

Again the minister said, at page 766:

> The figures I have given apply to Britain's total position and not her position vis-a-vis Canada alone.

He said at page 765:

The losses incurred in shipping during the war have reduced, at least temporarily, the income from her merchant marine . . . British overseas earnings in respect of insurance and financing services, which also helped to pay for imports—

—have been interfered with by the war. Lloyd's, for instance, a powerful insurance society has never been taxed. I suggested to the minister that he tax them, but it was not done. I do not see how there can be a greater competitor dealing with the Canadian people, but it is not being taxed because it is a society instead of a company. Again the minister said, at page 766:

Britain is confronted with a very serious deficit in her international accounts which she is trying to keep down by the utmost economy in her purchases and expenditures abroad and by the utmost efforts in promoting her exports.

Nothing is said about reducing taxation in the United Kingdom. That is an example for Canada. I quote the minister again:

This deficit, however, must—

The word "must" is used; it must be done.

—must be financed by borrowing in one form or another.

Another question: From whom will Canada borrow to finance her own deficit? Will it be from the United Kingdom later on? I quote the minister again where he says that the British deficit for 1946, 1947 and 1948 will be $5,500,000,000 Canadian. Then he says, at page 789:

The United States loan will provide her with the equivalent of 4,120,000,000 Canadian dollars for future purchases.

Canada will provide her with $1,250,000,000 Canadian which would bring the total up to $5,375,000,000. The remainder, says the minister, $1,250,000,000 Canadian—

—the United Kingdom will need to find elsewhere—

He uses the word "elsewhere".

—together with such amounts as are required to discharge existing indebtedness, which, of course, is not included in the estimate of her deficit on current account.

What is the total amount of that deficit on current account, if it is different from the one reported by the minister? And does "elsewhere" mean all the other dominions and the other countries of the empire?

The minister referred to "a credit of this magnitude". He admits that it is considerable. Then, to quote him again, at page 765, he says with regard to Britain——that her need for credits is huge in comparison with the other countries with which we have dealt.

And again, the same page:

There are special factors in the case of the United Kingdom . . . that necessitate and justify—

These are strong words.

—different terms from those we have offered as a matter of policy in other cases.

And again:

During the five years from 1946 to 1950, the United Kingdom will be going through a period of transition and reconstruction, both in its domestic and in its international economic affairs.

What will be our own period of transition and reconstruction in our international economic affairs? How will we do it? But the minister is concerned only with what will happen in England in the future. Nothing is said about Canada. He has his eyes there, and made the speech that Joe Chamberlain would have made at the beginning of the century.

I quote again, page 765:

It is necessary for Britain to do much more than to regain the pre-war levels, however, if she is to pay her way internationally. She has had to sacrifice many of the overseas investments she had made.

The income she previously had therefrom must be replaced by increased exports to help her pay for imports.

I quote again, where the minister states, page 766, that after 1948—

—she will be financing her deficit in Canada from other sources, for example, by selling us gold or other foreign exchange that we require.

We shall be paid after 1948 only if Great Britain has the gold, or other securities. Why are they not given to us in payment now? Why should we wait until 1948? I quote further, from the same page:

The case of the United Kingdom is unique.

There the situation is——a special one requiring terms and conditions in a financial agreement that are quite different from those in our other loans. "In the financial agreement of December 6, 1945, the British agree to their removal within one year from the effective date of that agreement."

Then, what about our British preference in trade? That is another question. I quote the minister again—page 764:

If we are to be successful in our public finance, we cannot afford to be hesitant and half-hearted in promoting the foreign trade which is the basis of our prosperity.

Foreign trade is not our trade with Great Britain. Our trade with Great Britain is our external trade. The minister will not use the word "foreign" as applying to Great Britain. I remember an incident in the days of Lord Dundonald, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier used the word "foreign" when referring to Great Britain. It was considered a scandal at that time. The minister is a good imperialist, and I do not know how he could use the word "foreign" when describing our trade with Great Britain. Therefore our foreign trade shall be our trade with nations other than the United Kingdom. He said further, page 766:

We expect that the excess of what Britain pays to Canada for supplies and services during 1946 over what she receives from us currently for supplies and services will amount—

And it is not "would",

—will amount to approximately $600 million.

The minister knows what our trade will be with Great Britain this year. He knows that it will be $600 million. And he knows more than that; he knows the amount of our trade with Great Britain next year, although as yet no arrangements are definitely made. He states:

Next year, that is in 1947, the amount of this deficit with Canada will—

And again he uses the word "will".

—be reduced both because of lower expenditures of Britain here—

"Lower expenditures of Britain here" means that Great Britain will import less from us next year than she may this year. There is no other possible construction. I cannot understand why the minister has not bluntly used the word "imports" instead of the word "expenditures". Then, secondly——and because British exports to Canada will be at higher levels.

The situation as pictured by the minister is that next year Great Britain will buy less from us and sell more to us. That is what he said, in very blunt language. The reason I have worked so hard on this speech is that I want to understand the matter, and I hope the page references in Hansard will be shown, so that hon. members will be able to follow it, just as the minister has that opportunity now.

Then—and here it is—

The total may be expected to amount to about $400 or $500 million.

That is next year, in 1947. How can the minister prophesy the amount of our trade in such a definite way for next year? And again:

From that figure, the deficit may decline gradually in subsequent years to some more or less permanent, normal figure which it is difficult to forecast at this time.

And I quote again—page 764:

We must receive payment for our exports—

[Mr. Pouliot.]

The minister said that, and it is perfectly true and sound.

We must be able to use the proceeds of our exports to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe in paying our own bills and debts in the United States, and in making purchases wherever we can best obtain the goods we need.

He is sure that we will get money from this loan and that we will use that money to pay our debt. That is what he says.

There is a question I want to ask the minister now. What payments did the United Kingdom make to Canada since December, 1940? I will tell the minister afterwards why I have mentioned that date specifically. What payments, if any, did she make? Then the minister went on—page 767:

These reasons for regarding the United Kingdom position as a special one requiring special treatment are much more important in relation to Canada even than they are to the United States. They are more important for two reasons:

—and here are the two reasons he gives, and I recall them to the minds of hon. members so that there may be no difficulty about them:

First, because we are so much more vitally interested in the future of international trade as a whole than the United States.

Well, this is incredible. I cannot conceive of the minister, with his intelligence, making a statement of that kind. And—

Second, because such a large proportion of our trade takes place with the United Kingdom and other countries in the sterling area, and we are most concerned to continue this trade and to continue to be able to receive payment for our exports to Britain and other sterling area countries in a form that we can use for expenditures elsewhere.

There we are, with a zollverein of countries in the sterling area, the old German plan of the duchies making arrangements together, circumscribing the sphere of our trade. This I object to. I object to it very strongly. And when the minister said that the United Kingdom was our most important customer and took the figures for 1938, he did not cite the figures for 1939, the year the war started. In 1939 the percentage of our trade was 46.6 with the British empire, including 35.5 with the United Kingdom, and our foreign trade was 53.4, including 41.1 with the United States—which shows that we were doing more trade with foreign nations than imperial business. I again quote the minister, page 767:

The nature of her imports was such that she constituted the chief market for countries such as Canada, Australia, New Zealand, Argentina and Denmark, as well as many smaller countries, all of which were greatly dependent upon exports for their prosperity and their general welfare.

Well, we understand that for small countries, for two of the other dominions, for Argentina, where there are British investments, and for Denmark, the United Kingdom is the chief market, and naturally they go there to sell their products, but they do not deal much with the other countries of the world. Are we to follow their example?

British policies will influence and largely determine the policies of many other countries, including particularly the countries now in the sterling area and probably the countries of western Europe.

What about Canada? Canada is out of the picture. The minister described an international world in which Canada would have very little room, and he is more concerned for the United Kingdom and for the small countries in the sterling area, and even for Indonesia, than he seems to be for Canada.

Britain cannot afford to choose a liberal trade policy—

A liberal trade policy!

—unless she gets loans from the United States and Canada on liberal terms . . . The more desirable policy from our point of view is the type reflected in the Bretton Woods agreements and the proposals for expansion of world trade and employment put forward by the United States government. This type of trade and exchange policy involves a minimum of restrictions on trade, tariff reductions, the elimination of discriminatory import quotas and exchange practices,—

I want hon. members to follow this very closely.

—and the freedom of each country to use any currency that it has obtained through trade with another country in carrying on trade with any third country. This type of policy would make possible not only a high level of trade but freedom in the direction of trade.

Again, what about the British preference? I draw the attention of hon. members to the whole of pages 767 to 770 to make the comparison, and they may read the distinction which the minister makes between liberal trade and the other kind of trade. I cannot understand it. That is perhaps a defect of my intelligence, but he has been splitting hairs to make the distinction. I refer hon. members to Hansard. I cannot analyse it, it is beyond me. Now, the minister again, page 768:

The British are now worse off to the extent of about 20 billion Canadian dollars than they were when the war commenced.

So that if the loans are approved—

—she will end up with her international position worsened by the equivalent of over twenty-five billion Canadian dollars as compared with her position in 1939.

Some hon. members who had spoken and who were reared in England say that we want to improve the condition of England, but the minister himself has said that the financial situation of the United Kingdom will be worsened to twenty-five billion dollars if the United States loan and the Canadian loan are granted to them. Is that an argument to induce those who love the United Kingdom to vote for this proposal? I quote from page 768:

We must realize that Britain is no longer a wealthy country in international terms. She has sacrificed her international financial strength in meeting the costs of the war. Before the war Britain had substantial overseas assets that yielded her, on balance, an income of approximately a billion dollars a year.

We have come to the conclusion—

Says the minister.

—that the British government will be able to meet the terms of this agreement over the next fifty-five years.

Well, there will be water under the mill before we reach that date. Another question in passing is, what is the detail of the settlement of the war claims, which may be discussed, and which should be discussed? We have no information. The government says "We found it all right and we accepted it." What was it? What were the claims of Canada? What were the claims of the United Kingdom? We know nothing about it; and this is why I have insisted on having an expose instead of a mere plea for the ratification of the loan. The minister continues, at page 769:

In fact, as I have already indicated, the British deficit of Canadian dollars will likely be such that the total amount of this credit will be drawn before the end of 1948.

That is most important. The piece of legislation which we are studying now is not the last one, because before we start to receive interest, if any, in 1950 all the money which will be lent to Great Britain by Canada and by the United States will have been spent.

The British representatives made it clear to us that they expected that Britain would need to finance additional purchases in Canada from other cash resources.

This is matter for thought.

She cannot afford to pay interest in this period without making additional credits necessary.

Is anyone who is considered solvent not able to pay at least the interest, if not the capital? What about the gradual and orderly repatriation of Canadian securities owned in the United Kingdom?

Now as to the British commonwealth air training plan, listen to this—page 771:

It was found that the United Kingdom's share of the cost exceeded what she had contributed and paid by $200 million. Similarly, when the details for the second plan, ending at March 31, 1945, were worked out, it was found that the United Kingdom had paid or contributed an amount that fell short of her share of the costs by $225 million.

Instead of saying that the United Kingdom had failed to pay this, we are told that she had "paid or contributed an amount that fell short of her share . . . by $225 million." How well said!

In agreeing to cancel this amount owing by Britain in respect of air training, the government has been motivated by a number of strong reasons . . . We came to the conclusion after much consideration—

Mark you, sir,—"after much consideration".

—that repayment of this $425 million was beyond the United Kingdom's capacity to pay within any reasonable period.

How then can we expect any repayment of the billion and a quarter if the United Kingdom could not pay an indebtedness of $425 million, or about one-third of that amount, representing her debt in connection with the commonwealth air training plan? Again, what about the British preference in trade? What is the detail of the settlement of the war claim? The minister said at page 769:

In fact, as I have already indicated, the British deficit of Canadian dollars will likely be such that the total amount of this credit will be drawn before the end of 1948.

And it goes on like that. Well, sir, there is one thing that is forgotten in all this. It is that, though nations may unite to wage war, as soon as the war is over they become competitors in trade. That is an elementary truth that is known to all and we cannot consider any country our ally in trade. A country is a separate unit and must consider the interests of its inhabitants, and the idea of being under the yoke of the United Kingdom, in the matter of trade, is no better than the idea of being under the yoke of the United States. It is dangerous to consider these matters from a sentimental point of view.

The other night there were two or three members who made jokes at the expense of members of parliament who are not favourable to this measure. That is an old trick. It is not the first time it has been played. It is an effort to impress members, to frighten them and prevent them from expressing their opinions in this country, which is called a democracy. I remember when I was discussing some matters during the war there was a little arrangement of the kind and two Liberal members, one from eastern Ontario and the other from western Ontario, started telling me that I was taking up too much of the time of the house. That was my own business, and it was for my colleagues to decide whether they would listen to what I said or to disregard it. However, I was in no mood to take a calling down from any of those gentlemen and I told them to look at the bull moose over there, a little statue in front of the ladies gallery, and the bull buffalo over here, another statue. I told them to look well at those two statues, to fill their eyes with the bull moose and the bull buffalo, because they would never see them after the election. Well, I was right. One of them lost the convention and the other was defeated at the polls.

At the same time there was one member banging his desk, making a terrific noise in order to impress me, in order to show that I was wrong. He ran again and lost his deposit, thank God. Sometimes, some members have family links with the old country and they say, "We have relatives over there". That is true. But why do they not bring those relatives to Canada? Canada is the country of the future, but Canada will not be the country of the future if we pass this legislation and other measures of the same kind.

I warn my colleagues. Some of them have expressed themselves in favour of the loan. That is their business and I respect their views, but I tell them that every time Canadians ask for something which is denied by the government, every time they fill in their income tax returns, every time something goes wrong, from their own point of view, they will say it is because of this loan that has been voted to Great Britain. They will say it is because of this gift.

A country as poor as this cannot enter into that kind of finance. It is impossible. Think of it, sir. According to the figures of the British experts, at the present time the increase in indebtedness in Great Britain as a result of the war is twenty billions. If our national debt is at the present time sixteen billion dollars, only four billions less than Britain's debt in connection with the last war, how can we expect to lend money—lend, not give? We know very well that when the time comes for the settlement of the loan the Minister of Finance will reason with the government of Great Britain, as he has done with regard to the British commonwealth air training plan, and the Englishmen will only have to come here and say, "We cannot afford to pay" and that will settle the question.

All right. Very good. The Canadian taxpayer will pay for it. That is absurd, and I am sorry to say that to a Liberal government.

How much I would enjoy saying it to a government leading another party in the house. It is a shame to me to have to say that to my party, but I want to try to bring them to their senses, just as we throw a glass of cold water into the face of a fainting man.

But that is not all. There is more to it. There is something that the minister has not told us. How much have we given to Great Britain since the beginning of the war? Our debt now is sixteen billions. Our debt before the war was two and a half billions. That means that our war debt is thirteen and a half billion dollars. If we have not given to Great Britain ten billion dollars already we have not given a cent. We must know what has been done.

Do you know, sir, there are two different periods with regard to war finance? The first one was from September, 1939, to December, 1940, and the second was from December, 1940, until the present time, and perhaps until ten years from now if we go on like this. In the first place, the United Kingdom, for what she was buying from Canada, was sending gold. The business was dealt with normally, but since December, 1940—and the Canadian taxpayers will know about it—all that we have got from Great Britain has ben turned over to the United States to pay the United Kingdom debt. It was said by the minister—and I have it here on record just as I have recorded his speech of April 11—every time that we received something from England it took its way to the United States to pay for her. Nothing was left here. Then the other day I had a question on the order paper about the fulfilment of the United Kingdom obligation with regard to the commonwealth air training plan. The question stood on the order paper for a long time, and then it was passed as an order for return and I have not got it yet. Why did I not get it? It was because it was showing precisely the fact that the United Kingdom had not fulfilled her obligation, that Great Britain had not fulfilled her obligation to Canada during the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not propose to follow the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who has just spoken. I suppose the minister will reply to the series of questions that he has propounded. In all probability some of the things I shall say will have some bearing on the speech that has just been made. May I say, Mr. Chairman, that when the resolution was before the house the other afternoon most of us understood that on that occasion the speeches would be short, and probably at this stage we would be discussing the matter more fully. Consequently I am taking this opportunity of saying some of the things I might have said and did not say the other afternoon.

A great deal of the opposition to the loan in this house and in the country is based upon the idea that we are doing something for Great Britain that we are not prepared to do for other people, and that this is an indication that Canada is still in somewhat of a colonial stage of development. In my opinion and in the opinion of my colleagues, that view is erroneous. As a matter of fact I believe we can discuss this proposition from the point of view of cold economics and cool logic and show that what we are actually doing is something which is beneficial for our own country and for the world. The fact is that the recovery of Europe and, particularly as far as we are concerned, of the United Kingdom as a great trading area is essential to our own recovery, and indeed to the progress and peace of the world in the days to come.

As an exporter of foodstuffs and other raw materials, Canada has a selfish interest in the welfare of the people of the rest of the world, and in particular perhaps in the welfare of the people of the United Kingdom. If we had no political associations with the British commonwealth, our economic interests would compel us to consider this proposal favourably.

Those of us who know the history of this continent know that historically an important factor in the development of North America has been its relationship to the economy and the economic policies of the United Kingdom. Once upon a time the ability to develop this continent was largely dependent upon the export from the United Kingdom to this continent of all kinds of machines and of other materials. That was particularly true in the United States at the beginning of the last century, and toward the end of that century it was true of our own country.

The proposed loan by the United States to Great Britain is not a sign of the colonial association of the United States with Great Britain, but rather a recognition of the fact that the recovery of Europe and of the United Kingdom means, to a very large degree, the economic progress and prosperity of our great neighbour to the south. It is from that point of view rather than from the point of view, which perhaps some of us share, of gratitude for what the British people did in withstanding the fascist and nazi aggression that we should discuss this proposal.

The United States realizes, as members who are supporting this loan do, that year in and year out the United Kingdom has been, as is sometimes said, the world's best customer. The prosperity of the world, and particularly of Canada which relies upon British purchases of our products to enable us to pay for goods we import, not only from Great Britain but from other countries of the world, depends upon her ability to remain the world's best customer. Somehow then she must be enabled to regain an ability to pay for the things that she must buy.

In former days, as has so often been said in the house, and as the Minister of Finance so well said the other afternoon, Great Britain was able to pay for the supplies she needed from abroad, very largely because of her overseas investments—investments, of course, by her nationals; and she received interest in the form of goods, and goods in the repayment of the capital that she had formerly left in these countries. But in the common struggle—and I use the words "common struggle" because it was a common struggle—against Hitlerism she was compelled to sell a substantial part of these securities, not only in order to get food but also to get the necessary supplies of munitions of war to enable her to put up the resistance against the aggressor. She delivered us from a greater evil than we perhaps apprehended at the beginning of the war. Therefore at the present time the position is that Europe, and again particularly Great Britain, must expand her exports in order to pay for the goods that she needs to import. In other words, with her overseas investments depleted she must export in order to get the supplies she needs. Various economists have estimated that the United Kingdom will need to export in the next few years from fifty to seventy-five per cent more than she exported before the war. In addition to this there must be a reconversion of her industries. She must rebuild her destroyed factories and machines; she must replace her obsolete machinery and at the same time provide food, clothing and shelter for her people. Therefore the bald fact is that if she is to regain her standards of living and continue to act not only as our best customer, but as the world's best customer, she must obtain goods either as gifts or on a deferred payment plan. In other words, somebody must give or make loans. We find that the United States, recognizing this, is proposing a large loan to Great Britain at the present time, and we are proposing the loan which is now before us.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

In my opinion this agreement negotiated between the two governments is not an agreement negotiated from the point of view of giving an advantage to the United Kingdom but a mutual advantage to both Canada and the United Kingdom. In the main this is, as has already been said, a loan repayable in the future with interest. We wipe out certain other indebtedness, that on account of the air training plan and so on, which I take it is part of our war contribution and a recognition of our good fortune in escaping the devastation and physical destruction of war which Europe underwent. Again I say I approve of that proposal.

There is just one other thing I want to say in connection with another matter which is not settled by this agreement. Early in the war we did make a loan of $700,000,000, as hon. members who were here at that time will remember, to adjust an accumulated sterling balance. That is to be extended and we understand that it will be settled at some future date. May I suggest that that should be considered apart from what we are now discussing and should be settled on a business basis, as was suggested when the loan was originally made, and when the time comes to settle the loan certain securities now held in Britain might be considered in payment thereof. But I do not want to discuss that this afternoon, as I do not wish to introduce a side issue. I believe that the problem at this moment is a much more important one than the settlement of what remains oustanding of the $700,000,000 loan.

What we have to remember is this, that the economic plight in which this great purchaser of goods finds herself to-day is bound to be reflected in our own economy in the future unless something is done to rehabilitate Great Britain as a great customer. If we fail, and other countries fail, to render the aid that is necessary at this time—we are discussing mainly a loan to Great Britain, although this applies to other European countries and indeed other countries of the world as well—we shall ultimately suffer ourselves because we have not assisted in rehabilitating the world. It is often forgotten when we speak of a loan of this kind that we are not discussing money. We think in terms of money, but here we are not discussing money but goods, the ability of Canada to produce goods, the ability of Canada to ship these goods, and if we fail in this we shall find our own trade in a state of stagnation. I want to emphasize that our welfare depends upon our ability to sell our goods in the markets of the world and therefore upon the ability of the world to consume the goods that we produce. What is true of Canada is true of the world, of course. Canada cannot be prosperous apart from a prosperous world. In a depressed world, in other words, Canada is depressed too.

Now let us look at what this trade between our countries means. In 1938 four nations took 49·8 per cent, roughly 50 per cent, of the total world exports. That is to say, of all the goods placed on the markets of the world, four nations took practically 50 per cent and Britain, with only two per cent of the world's population, took 21 per cent of the exports available on the markets of the world. Germany took 10·9 per cent; the United States, with her great population, took only 10·9 per cent, and France took 7 per cent. It is clear I think to all of us that Germany will not recover her position in the world economy for some time to come. The United States with her rich resources and with the war developments in the production of synthetic materials, such as rubber, to take the place of imported raw materials, will in all probability find it very difficult, and particularly so because of the pressure groups within her own country, to take very much more than her present 10·9 per cent, but unless she does the world is headed for disaster. I think much depends on the ability of the United States to accept from the world a larger share of the exports available on the markets of the world.

There are two nations which remain, Britain and France, and the rehabilitation of both these countries as great purchasers on the world markets is of paramount interest to Canada and to the world. I am very glad indeed to be able to support substantial loans to both these countries in order to enable them to regain the position that they must take once more in the markets of the world.

As has already been said, in the last year of peace, 1938—the hon. member for Temiscouata quoted 1939, when the figure was slightly less, but I am taking 1938 because it was the last year of peace before the war—forty per cent of our total exports went to the United Kingdom, or in round figures, $69,000,000 worth out of total exports of $172,000,000. Is that about right? I think it is. I looked up the figures, and those are the figures I found. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the prosperity of our purchasers is inextricably linked with the recovery not only of Europe but of Canada's own best customer, the United Kingdom. This loan therefore becomes to us a matter of economic interest rather than a matter of sentiment. I know that there is a disposition in some quarters of this house to consider that those who are supporting this loan are supporting it because of a sentimental attachment to Great Britain or from some colonialism or imperialism. But I would point out that considering it purely from the point of view of Canada's selfish economic interest, what we are doing is a good thing for Canada, and it is because it is a good thing for Canada that I am warmly in support of it.

Let us bear in mind that during the war years there has been a very significant change in the exports that we have been making to Great Britain. In addition to being, as we were before the war, a principal supplier of cereals to Great Britain, we became during the war a principal supplier of meat and meat products to Britain. Coming as I do from western Canada I must say that our farmers are very anxious indeed to maintain the market we have built up for our pork and other meat and meat products in Britain, and they are anxious also, of course, to retain our market for cereals such as wheat, flour, and so on.

Again, if I may speak of the capacity of the United Kingdom to absorb meat products, the United Kingdom has always been a large purchaser of meats on the markets of the world, and the greatest purchaser of dairy products. Each year before the war—again I am taking the official figures—the United Kingdom purchased 81 per cent of the total amount of pork and pork products entering the markets of the world. Similarly she took 80 per cent of the beef and 78 per cent of the butter sold on the markets of the world. The United Kingdom before the war was a large importer of foods and raw materials, and she must remain so if the world is to prosper. It is true that during the war she has expanded to some extent her production of wheat and other cereal products. Anyone who knows the British isles knows perfectly well that that has been done very largely under the pressure of war, and that much of the production has been on land which otherwise would not have been cultivated because of its marginal quality.

As an exporter, then, of many of these raw materials and foods we are vitally concerned in anything we can do to assist in the restoration of her economy and in tiding her over a very difficult four or five years which now lie ahead.

I say, then, that if for no other reason than that of our own self-interest we should give support to this bill. What I have endeavoured to say up to now is this, that the prosperity of the world depends upon the ability of the world to exchange goods and that is in reality what we are trying to arrange, so far as we are concerned.

Nations do not pay in currency, they pay in goods. In the old days, of course, deficits of usable goods were often made up by exports or imports of gold. As world trade expanded, and because of developments in recent years, the amount of gold became too little and became inefficient as a medium. Very properly, I think, it has been discarded.

The Bretton Woods agreement, which we discussed last December, the stabilization fund, and the international bank, which were parts of it—these were steps in the direction of providing the world with the necessary credits and currency in order to encourage trade between nations and to develop the more backward areas of the world. That is why we of this party supported the Bretton Woods agreement, recognizing as we did that, like all compromises in this far from perfect world, the Bretton Woods agreements were not by any means perfect.

There are still those, of course, who believe that we can get along as a self-sufficient nation. I do not share that view. Our policy must be one of an exchange of products. Obviously we do not produce all that we require to maintain our economy. We must import. And if we are to import goods in exchange for goods we send out, then they should be used to give our people a progressively higher standard of living than we have known in the past. But, again, that should be discussed on another occasion.

Some people say there is an alternative, and that while Canada cannot live alone the British commonwealth of nations could. I do not believe that, either. If one looks at the goods produced within the commonwealth he will find that the commonwealth is by no means a self-sufficient unit, even if we could get agreement among the component parts and tried to live that way. Our prosperity, I believe, and the prosperity of every unit of the British commonwealth of nations, does not depend upon the relations within the commonwealth, but rather upon the state of the world itself. In other words it is not a commonwealth problem; it is an international problem.

The loan then, in my view, is one contribution of Canada to international action. And to that extent, as I have already said, is an indication of enlightened self-interest on our part. The United Kingdom is our best customer. She is the world's best customer. If we contribute to her rehabilitation as a great consumer for goods, as well as a great exporter of goods, then we make our contribution to the rehabilitation of world economy and to a more prosperous world. But it is not, I repeat, a matter of sentiment. It is a matter of cold economics.

Last week I said, in discussing commonwealth relations, that the Ottawa agreements were restrictive in their effect. I believe they were. True, perhaps they were defensible, in a way, because of the Hawley-Smoot tariff of the United States, which about that time was put into effect. Nevertheless they contributed to the building up of self-sufficient nations in the world; and from that point of view were a detriment to our own country and the world. They increased barriers, rather than helped to remove them. It seems to me an attempt is now being made in the world, through the Bretton Woods agreement, the food and agricultural organization, the social and economic council of the united nations, the American loan and this loan, to break that vicious circle which constricted the world before the outbreak of the last war. Will these attempts be successful? I do not know that they will be; I hope they will be. Indeed, I believe they will be. They are worth trying.

But certainly, as part of the great world, and depending upon world commerce to the extent we depend upon it, our prosperity depends upon the success of the economic experiments now being made in the world. I know there is one other consideration one cannot forget, and that is that if we fail now, and the world enters again upon a period of cut-throat competition—if we force the United Kingdom into cut-throat competition, so that she must buy again in those places where she can drive down the prices to the lowest level, then we shall be the sufferers, indeed. And since this agreement looks toward some measure of stabilization, some intelligent economic policies in the world, I believe it is indeed worthy of our support.

Speaking in Toronto on January 10 Mr. Morrison said this, indicating what the policy was, if they have a chance to follow it:

> To eliminate fluctuation in international prices so that producers can safely plan future production and to reduce unnecessary distribution costs. We believe that the maintenance of a sound nutrition policy will give the great advantage of stability to overseas producers and will also help to earn a long-term market for our exports.

In other words, the advantages are mutual.

I have discussed this matter this afternoon purely from the point of view of Canada's economic advantages, but I would not have anyone think that I am thinking only in terms of economic advantages. None can have a deeper appreciation of the sacrifices made by the people of the United Kingdom during the war than those of us who had the privilege of visiting there during that time. I was over there, as were you, Mr. Chairman and the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) who is in his seat this afternoon, and with the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) whom I also see. That was in the autumn of 1941. We saw the devastation wrought by German bombing. We witnessed the steadfastness and courage of a great people in a great crisis. German troops were at the gates of Moscow. The United States was still a neutral country. The outlook was dark indeed. But the British people were determined that no matter what came, they would resist the German aggressor. One could only admire the courage with which they withstood those dark days in the autumn of 1941. With some other of my colleagues, one of whom was the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), who is in his seat at the moment, I witnessed the flying bombs in the autumn of 1944. Again the devastation; again the courage of the people who withstood those onslaughts of the German aggressor.

Out of the meagre resources she had at hand, during this winter Britain has contributed to the relief of starvation and disease on the continent of Europe. These people have shown a remarkable degree of courage, in trying to do something for themselves and for others in distress. They have accepted the austerity programme with a courage which is the marvel of the world. While I am not speaking from a party standpoint now, merely as an indication of what the British people are thinking let me point out that despite the fact that the Labour government of Great Britain has had to institute even a greater degree of austerity since it was elected in July of last year, by-elections and, more recently, municipal elections, have endorsed that austerity programme at the polls.

So I say that to-day we have an opportunity, even if we put aside all the considerations which I have named in the last few moments, to contribute not only to the welfare of the United Kingdom—because that must not be our first consideration—but also to the welfare of Europe, of the world, and of Canada as a nation. In other words, in my opinion this is an opportunity for us to play our part in the international sphere in order to bring about a greater measure of understanding and of world prosperity.

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to make at this time a few comments and to ask the minister a few questions.

We are supporting this measure on moral grounds. We are not supporting it because we think it is a good thing for Canada, except in so far as it helps to maintain good relations with other nations. We feel that we owe a certain obligation, an obligation which we should meet; on the other hand, we look upon it as a sacrifice, but a sacrifice which should be made. We intend to support the measure because we feel that the situation which exists in the United Kingdom at the present time, which makes this loan necessary, is very largely owing to the fact that the United Kingdom fought the earliest, that she fought the longest, and in many ways I think it may be said that she fought the hardest, of any of the united nations; and she fought not merely for her own benefit but for the benefit of all peace-loving nations throughout the world.

I know it has been argued that we have made a number of contributions to the United Kingdom during the war. But we did not make those contributions in order to raise the standard of living of the people of that country; we made them in order to expand their war effort against the enemy for our own protection and for the protection of all the united nations which were fighting against the enemy. It might very well be argued that, had the United Kingdom thrown up the sponge after Dunkirk, there would not be a free France to-day, and it is quite doubtful whether or not we would be sitting here to-day as the parliament of a free people. Therefore we feel that there is every justification for making this contribution at this time.

It is well to remember that in the United Kingdom over three and a half million homes were destroyed, and that country's shipping tonnage was reduced from 41½ million to 19½ million, and that her foreign investments were practically wiped out. Her whole industrial plant was converted to war purposes; her standard of living was reduced to the bare necessities of life, and as a consequence there will be a long, hard road of reconversion before the United Kingdom will be in a position to meet her obligations.

During the war the united nations to a very large extent pooled their resources for common use against the enemy. Every nation was expected to make its maximum contribution and to reduce its own standard of living to the bare necessities of life. I do not think anyone can argue for one moment that the United Kingdom did not go as far as or farther than any of the other united nations. It is just as well to remember that the cost of war does not cease with the end of hostilities. Heavy expenditures related to the war will continue for many months after the war. Those expenditures will continue until the repatriation and demobilization of troops has been completed and until the reconversion of industry has taken place to the extent that will make it possible for the nations to rebuild their factories and to produce the goods needed to bring in the imports which they require. Therefore, I think, many nations were somewhat shocked at the indecent haste with which the United States of America cancelled their lease-lend help to the United Kingdom, and made further help dependent upon Great Britain becoming a signatory to the Bretton Woods agreement. I do not think it was to the credit of Canada that we joined with the United States in that squeeze play, and I think it is to the credit of Australia, of New Zealand and of Russia that they had not signed that agreement by the end of the year.

So that on moral grounds we are supporting this motion.

However, when the Minister of Finance asks for our support on the ground that we benefit by the trade resulting from this loan I do not think his argument is so soundly based. What does making this loan at this time really mean? It means that we are going to have to make available to the United Kingdom goods which are at the present time, and will be for a number of years, in short supply. Whether or not we make this loan to Britain, there will be no difficulty in getting rid of any surplus goods we may have at that time, because they are actually in short supply throughout the world. What it will mean is that we shall take the repayment of this loan in goods at a time when they will be no longer in short supply, because we do not begin to take repayments until 1951 and we shall continue to accept repayments for the next fifty years; I do not suppose there will be any shortage of goods in this country during that time. Therefore we are making goods available at a time when they are short and accepting payment at a time when there will be surpluses. To that extent, I think, it is unquestionably a sacrifice on our part: but, as I say, it is a sacrifice we should be willing to make.

What is happening as a result of these large loans which we are making abroad? In Canada to-day there are many projects which people are asking to have carried out, but which we cannot attend to because we have not the necessary goods available, and these goods are not available because we are fulfilling certain obligations which we have abroad. To-day there is a great demand for the expansion of social services such as pensions for the aged and the disabled, and many other social reforms, These also are being denied because we are having to make goods available to other nations where they are in short supply to-day, and we cannot satisfy the demand for the expansion of social services in this country until we are able greatly to expand production to take care of these demands. Therefore I say that this loan does represent a sacrifice.

The minister emphasized the fact that this loan was not merely to help the United Kingdom, but to help Canada expand her trade; and the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario gave it the support of his party on this ground. Although he made it quite clear that he would also support it on moral grounds, he based his argument entirely on the economic good of Canada. The minister pointed out that the United Kingdom must do more than merely regain her pre-war levels of exports. He pointed out that they must expand that by a considerable amount beyond pre-war levels in order to pay their debts. I noticed in the speech made by the president of the board of trade of the United Kingdom that it was estimated that they would have to expand their exports by fifty per cent over pre-war levels. Some speakers put it as high as seventy-five per cent. In other words, the United Kingdom will have to maintain a very large favourable balance of trade, and we in accepting payment will have to maintain an unfavourable balance of trade when the time of repayment takes place, in order to accept payment.

I realize that the minister will put forward another argument, which I shall deal with very shortly. I should like to ask the minister: Will Canada be prepared to import more from the United Kingdom than she sells to the United Kingdom? Also, will the United States of America be prepared also to be paid likewise?

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the second one?

Mr. QUELCH: Will the United States of America also be prepared to maintain an unfavourable balance of trade with the United Kingdom in order to make it possible for the United Kingdom to pay the United States? Perhaps the minister will wait until I finish and then he can answer my questions all together. I think the minister made it quite clear in his speech that that was not the intention, and I quote from page 764 of Hansard of April 11, 1946:

To accomplish this purpose we must be able to use the proceeds of our exports to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe in paying our own bills and debts in the United States and in making purchases wherever we can best obtain the goods we need. We have a special interest in being able to use the currency that we receive for our exports, to obtain other currencies that we need for the payments we must make.

If we use the credits accruing to us in the United Kingdom to buy goods in the United States, how will the United Kingdom obtain United States dollars to pay the United States unless the United States is prepared to take it out of goods? I quite realize that under the Bretton Woods agreement currencies are convertible, but if that policy is continued for fifty years the quota of the United Kingdom will quickly be exhausted unless Canada and the United States are prepared to have unfavourable balances of trade with the United Kingdom. Further, the United States will be exporting goods to the United Kingdom and obtaining credits for them. The United Kingdom will not be in position to discriminate against United States imports unless she is prepared to discriminate against all other imports at the same time. The United States will also have credits from the loan that she is making at the present time. In addition, the United States will also have some of our British credits which we will trade to her.

Will the United States be prepared to accept payment in British goods for all those credits? Personally I doubt it very much. If she is not prepared to, if she is not prepared to balance her trade with the United Kingdom, and if we are not prepared to balance our trade with the United Kingdom, then it is bound to be only a question of time before the United Kingdom suffers default. She will exhaust her quota, and if she has not gold to meet her obligations she will have to take a further loan. I should like to ask the minister how long sterling will be convertible into dollars under such a policy. Britain's quota will soon be exhausted and for that reason she will require further loans. If the creditor nations fail to deal squarely with the United Kingdom, it seems to me the United Kingdom will be bound to default.

The minister goes on to say that he thinks the United Kingdom will be able to meet her obligations, and I turn to page 768 of Hansard where he states:

> We have also come to the conclusion that the British government will be able to meet the terms of this agreement over the next fifty-five years.

And again:

> They have been determined from the outset, and indeed they made this determination clear to us as early as 1944, that they would not incur debts which they could not honestly believe they would be able to discharge.

I do not doubt for one minute that the United Kingdom will desire to meet her obligations. Second, I do not doubt that the United Kingdom will be able to meet her obligations in goods if the creditor nations play the game. But the record of the past causes me great misgivings as to whether or not the creditor nations will be prepared to play the game.

I recall at the last session when Mr. Rasminsky appeared before the banking committee. He admitted quite frankly that on the basis of the record of creditor nations in the past there might be some concern with regard to the success of the Bretton Woods agreement. He stated he believed that there had taken place a change of heart on the part of the creditor nations and he hoped that in the future the creditor nations would be prepared to play the game. Mr. Rasminsky, and also the minister in the debates, emphasized the fact that the difficulties that we were referring to would, in his opinion, be a matter to be taken care of under trade agreements rather than under the Bretton Woods agreement.

I have here a copy of the proposals for the expansion of world trade which have been communicated to the United States. I understand that these are to be the basis for discussion when the conference meets. I turn to page 15, where the question of unbalance of trade is dealt with as follows:

> 2. Restrictions to safeguard the balance of payments. Members confronted with an adverse balance of payments should be entitled to impose quantitative import restrictions as an aid to the restoration of equilibrium in the balance of payments. This provision should be operative under conditions and procedures to be agreed upon. These conditions and procedures

Then we go down to (d), which reads:

> (d) should provide for the full application of nondiscrimination in the use of such restrictions after the transitional period.

For example, take a nation that is suffering an unbalance of trade. Suppose the United Kingdom was able to maintain a balance of trade with the majority of the nations but had a serious unbalance of trade with the United States because the United States was not prepared to play the game, was not prepared to take Britain's exports in exchange for her own. Surely, in circumstances such as those, the United Kingdom would be absolutely justified in discriminating against imports from the United States in order to balance her own trade. Yet, according to this agreement, which is to take care of that very thing, we find that one of the great defences of debtor nations is removed and they are even worse off in that regard than they were before the agreement.

I certainly feel that the Bretton Woods agreement, instead of expanding trade, may very easily have the opposite result unless, as Mr. Rasminsky says, the creditor nations have a change of heart and are prepared to be good creditors in the future instead of the bad creditors they have been in the past. If they are not prepared to accept goods in payment for their exports, what is bound to be the result? The result is bound to be that nations suffering unfavourable balances of trade will consider policies of economic nationalism. The Bretton Woods agreement may very easily bring about an intensification of economic nationalism. Apparently that has already taken place in the United Kingdom, and I wish to quote the Prime Minister of that country in that regard. I should like to quote from the British Hansard, page 26, column 25, where a question is asked by Mr. Norman Smith as follows:

> Mr. Norman Smith asked the Prime Minister whether, in view of the difficulties in paying for imports, he will direct scientific research to the substitution of home-produced for imported raw materials used in British factories.
> The Prime Minister (Mr. Attlee): The circumstances of war have already obliged us to do our best to substitute home-produced for imported materials within the limitations imposed by our natural resources. The government consider that these efforts should be continued both by the government and by industry, with the full support of scientific research, in such a way as will contribute effectively to the solution of our balance of payment difficulties.

The greater difficulty Britain has in balancing her trade, the more will that policy be intensified. The minister says that we do not need to use the proceeds of this loan only to buy British goods, that we can spend it in the United States. That is certainly going to aggravate the situation, and that is why I am interested in knowing whether that is to be our policy, and whether the minister can intimate whether or not that will be the policy of the United States.

As I was saying, if the creditor nations fail to deal squarely with Great Britain, then Great Britain will be bound to default on this measure. I noticed when the chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Dalton, praised the Bretton Woods agreement he concluded his remarks with the statement "Thank God there is an exit." That seemed a very funny thing for the chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain to say when praising the Bretton Woods agreement. I think a person would be naive to suggest that you can sign an agreement in order to get certain benefits and, having got the benefits, you can withdraw. I do not think it will be quite so easy to withdraw. Otherwise, we shall have people signing the agreement, coming in one door and going out the other as it suits them, just running around in circles.

Mr. ILSLEY: Did not the chancellor mean that if the United States loan agreement did not go through the United Kingdom would have to get out of the Bretton Woods agreement?

Mr. QUELCH: He was not referring to trade agreements; he was referring to the Bretton Woods agreement. He was discussing the Bretton Woods agreement at that time and saying that if they came under the agreement and got into difficulty, they could always withdraw, that, thank God, there was an exit.

I am suggesting that if we wait until they reach the point where they have exhausted their quota and are not able to meet their obligations, then they are going to be in a far more difficult situation than they would have been in if they had refused to go into it in the first place and adopted measures within the sterling bloc. The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) stated the other day that we should have demanded security from Great Britain. I say to the hon. member that that would be altogether too crude. Public sentiment being what it is, there still being present the fervour of war, the people would not like it if we were to say to the United Kingdom, "We will give you this loan if you give us security, say in the form of some of your colonies or certain islands."

I would point out to the hon. member that that sort of thing is pretty well taken care of in the Bretton Woods agreement, but it is done in a more subtle way. If a nation defaults under the Bretton Woods agreement and cannot meet her obligations and has used up her resources, if she has exhausted her quota and cannot meet her obligations with gold, she will have to get a loan. When a loan is given to that nation security may be taken for the loan. I suggest to the hon. member that that is the time that security will be demanded for the loan. That time would be several years after the war, and probably there would not be quite the same reaction throughout the world that there would be now if a nation demanded security.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be ruinous to Great Britain.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not think the hon. member for Temiscouata was worrying very much about whether it would be ruinous to Great Britain.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am afraid he was not.

Mr. QUELCH: Personally I would be opposed to the giving of security. I have criticized some of the things the Minister of Finance said, but I should like to say now that I agree with him 100 per cent when he says that after this war the people of Canada should have a higher standard of living than they had before the war. The standard of living should be higher than they had or ever dreamed of. We have a much greater plant capacity than we had before the war, and we have far more skilled labour. It is merely a question of applying that skilled labour to our resources in order to give the people of this country the highest standard of living they have ever had. In this regard I should like to refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, and I quote from page 773 of Hansard of April 11, 1946. Speaking on behalf of the Progressive Conservative party and referring to this loan, he said:

> We have become so accustomed to these fabulous and astronomical amounts that we are getting to feel they are just figures in books, and some people tell us that they are just figures in books.

I should like to interject and say that if he had us in mind he was wrong. At no time have the members of this group ever suggested that exports were figures in books. We have always criticized the policy of exporting without taking imports in return, because it means an absolute loss of wealth. We believe that the proper function of trade is the exchange of goods. We are not prepared to support international trade on the basis of making foreign investments in other countries which very often are later repudiated. The net result is that you have made a gift and have lost some of your wealth. To go on with what the hon. member said about the loan:

> Why do we do that? Do we do that just to make ourselves good fellows, because we are generous-hearted? No. Why do we do it? All hon. members know why we do it. I ventured to say last autumn when the exports credits were up that we could not afford not to afford them. I say the same thing about this amount. Why do I say that ? What do I mean when I say it? All hon. members need to do is to look back over the last fifteen years. They do not need to go another step backward to see what foreign trade means in the life of this country. We remember the figures of 1929. Our exports amounted to something like $1,400 million. Then it went down in 1933 to little more than one-third of that amount. I believe it was $534 million.

I think the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario was confusing effects with cause when he made that statement. It is true that our trade was low in that period but prior to that falling off in trade we had a heavy restriction of credit, a deflationary policy was imposed. A statement was made by a former minister of finance, Mr. Cahan, that that restriction was somewhere in the neighbourhood of $900 million between 1929 and 1932. Certainly a deflationary policy was in operation throughout the world. People did not have the money with which to buy goods and therefore imports were not brought into this country. Then the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario went on to deal with the question of conditions in Canada. He apparently did not agree with the Minister of Finance. He had this to say:

> We taxed ourselves to the extent of about two and a half billion dollars, and on top of that we borrowed almost another two and a half billion dollars. In various other ways the minister managed to raise about another $500 million. Altogether we took out of our pockets about $5,500 million. The result was we were all rich. We all had money in our pockets. There is great danger lest we feel somehow or another that these good times with these fabulous amounts can just go on. The truth of the matter is that we are like a man who had an income of $2,500 and then borrowed $2,500 and spent the whole $5,000 in one year and said, "This is grand," and did not bother very much about what is to come afterwards.
> The Minister of Finance smiles.

I certainly do not blame the Minister of Finance for smiling because a statement like that would be enough to make a horse laugh, let alone the Minister of Finance. Why do I say that? I say it for this reason. The condition of a man who borrows an amount equal to his income and then spends the whole amount is not in any way analogous to the position of Canada. For that to be analogous to the position of Canada would mean that this country would have had to borrow the amount of its income of $9,000 million and then spend that in addition to its own income of $9,000 million.

Was that the situation? Not only did Canada not borrow externally; I believe she lent a small amount of money to other nations. But note her borrowings were internal. Therefore, after the war, if other nations repay us what they owe us we shall be able to spend our own income plus the income of those other nations which they pay us on account of their borrowings. I know what the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario had in mind. He was thinking that Canada has borrowed large sums of money. But she has not borrowed externally. For the position of Canada to be analogous to the case cited, Canada would have had to borrow from other nations. What is the situation? Canada borrowed internally, and therefore when those loans are repaid they will be repaid from one individual or one institution to another. The income will still reside in Canada and the income of Canada will be the same. The only case in which it could be argued that the repaying of a debt in Canada after the war might cause a loss of income would be where the payment was made to a banking institution, because money lent from a bank is created, and when you repay that money it is cancelled and that amount of money goes out of existence. But if we repay a debt represented by money that was created in the first instance it can very well be repaid by the creation of money.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario must know that during the war we did not finance purely from money obtained from people's pockets. We had a very heavy expansion of credit. I believe the figure for the chartered banks was around four billions lent to the government, and the government borrowed one billion from the Bank of Canada, or five billions in all, in round figures. If we had depended entirely on money obtained from the taxpayers' pockets we would not have had the war effort that we did have.

There is no doubt that after the war, in order to maintain full employment and the full development of the resources of the country, we shall have to continue to have the creation of credit in Canada. The governor of the Bank of Canada has frankly admitted that. I know the Minister of Finance does not like me to quote individuals, or refer to remarks that they have made without giving the exact text. I had better, therefore, give the exact statement which the governor of the Bank of Canada made. He admitted that we shall have to have an expansion of credit in order to maintain the full development of our resources.

In a broadcast on April 4, 1943, in which I participated with the governor of the Bank of Canada, the subject being post-war finance, I asked the governor this question:

I think you have agreed on other occasions, Mr. Towers, that there are three ways in which governments can, raise money—by taxing, by borrowing from the public and by credit expansion.

Mr. Towers: That is true!

Mr. Quelch: During the war, the emphasis has been on the first two because of the government's desire to curtail private consumption and investment. After the war, the need will be to encourage private spending, heavy taxes and public borrowing will be contrary to the public welfare. Will the government finance all desirable public projects by credit expansion when necessary?

Mr. Callaghan: What do you mean by credit expansion?

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. Quelch: The creation of money.

Mr. Towers: To me, credit expansion simply means more money. That money may take the form of Bank of Canada notes held by the public or public deposits with chartered banks.

Mr. Quelch: I prefer the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Callaghan: To get back to the question of whether the government will be able to finance desirable public projects.

Mr. Towers: In circumstances such as Mr. Quelch describes, I would say that there would be grounds for government not meeting the entire cost of its programmes by taxing and drawing on public savings. The desire would be to encourage private spending and make government investment more of a residual item. If part of the necessary money had to come from credit expansion—and the projects were sound and in the public interest—then I should say, go ahead.

I am heartily in accord with that statement, and I think it is one which the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario should carefully consider, because we heard him advocate the other day that the government should decide upon how much money they could raise and then cut their expenses to fit that amount. We feel that the government should decide what their programme can be, what the physical possibilities are, in the way of men and materials available in order to execute a certain programme, and then find out how much money will be required for that programme. Then to the extent that the money they obtain from taxation fails to meet that obligation they should be prepared to go ahead with credit expansion in order to take care of their undertakings, exactly as they did during the war.

Another thing I would emphasize to the Minister of Finance is this. The present measure is an extremely inflationary one. In the past we have heard much criticism against the idea of issuing money because this process is inflationary. But let me point out that inflation is not merely the result of an increase in money, because you can have inflation as easily by decreasing the amount of goods available; and when you propose to drain $1,200,000,000 of goods from Canada you are introducing an extremely inflationary measure. Not only that, but we are making loans of hundreds of millions elsewhere and in that way introducing an extremely inflationary policy into this country. I hope, therefore, that in the future we shall not hear any talk of inflation when it is suggested that money should be created in order to develop the resources of the country.

I should like to have an assurance from the Minister of Finance that, later on, when this loan starts to work the other way, when Britain starts to repay the loan and we have surplus production in this country, he will not then hesitate to have an expansion of money necessary to create effective demand against the production coming into Canada as a result of this and other loans that we may make.

I have one or two other questions which I should like to ask the minister, but in the meantime I wonder if he would answer the questions I have put to him in the course of my remarks.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. member be good enough to repeat those questions?

Mr. QUELCH: Will Canada be prepared to accept goods from the United Kingdom in repayment of loans? How will the United Kingdom maintain convertibility of the pound if Canada and the United States do not provide the United Kingdom with dollars by purchasing British goods to the extent of the British credit?

Mr. ILSLEY: As the hon. gentleman pointed out, I indicated in my speech that we did not intend that there shall be in the forseeable future an adverse balance of trade, adverse to Canada as between Canada and the United Kingdom; but it is not necessary that there should be adverse balance of payments as between Canada and the United Kingdom in order to enable the United Kingdom to repay the loan. It is the essence of multilateral trade—

Mr. QUELCH: But how will she pay? She will have to obtain dollars from the fund and she can do so only up to a certain quota. If she exceeds the quota, what will she do? The only way in which she can replenish her supply of dollars will be to sell goods to Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: She can pay for Canadian goods by exports to other countries as well as to Canada. Under a multilateral trading system and convertible currencies—

Mr. QUELCH: She has to maintain a favourable balance of trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is true. If Great Britain gets into a heavily indebted position, and she is now, she must expect to expand exports and have a favourable balance of trade, and the creditor countries, as the hon. gentleman has said, must recognize their obligations to take imports on a large scale.

Mr. QUELCH: Yes. Well, when she obtains funds from other sources she can exchange them for United States and Canadian dollars; but if the United States and Canada are not accepting goods from other nations in payment the fund will be short of United States dollars and the United States will have to make loans. That means a further increase of debt. There should be some way whereby nations can liquidate debts without being forced into further debt to do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not follow the hon. gentleman at all. Suppose the creditor countries accept goods from other nations—not necessarily Canada accepting goods from Great Britain in great quantities—if countries like Canada and the Unted States, specifically the United States, which is really a creditor country, accept goods from other countries so as to make United States dollars available to the world, and the United Kingdom has a favourable balance of trade with other countries, the United Kingdom thereby acquires the necessary United States dollars to meet its interest payments to the United States, and the same may apply to Canada. The only point of difference that I can see is that the hon. gentleman seems is be tying it down to one country dealing with another.

Mr. QUELCH: After all, the only way for the countries to obtain United States and Canadian dollars is to have a sufficient quantity in the fund to enable them to replenish their supply of United States or Canadian dollars. If the United States is to continue to maintain a favourable balance of trade, United States dollars are bound to become scarce in that event, and the United Kingdom will not be able to obtain them. When that currency becomes scarce that nation can apply for a loan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the minister really feel that the policy of Canada and the United States in the future is to be as Mr. Razminsky pointed out, one that shows a change of heart? Is the minister prepared to recommend a policy of real trade? Are we to accept goods in payment for goods, or are we more interested in exchanging our goods for foreign securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot answer for other nations; but certainly the United States has been following a very much different policy in recent years, not so much a different policy, as expressing different views, liberal trade views, in recent years, as compared with a number of years ago. That is set out in the speech that Lord Keynes made in the House of Lords. I have not it here but he expressed it very well.

Mr. QUELCH: Let us take Canada alone. Will the minister say that the future policy of Canada would be one of trying to balance trade rather than one of maintaining a favourable balance of trade? I realize we have to maintain a favourable balance of payments for a while in order to meet certain foreign obligations. Will the policy be one of a balanced trade rather than one of maintaining a favourable balance?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have repeatedly said that we must look forward to a policy of increased imports. Of course Canada is still a debtor country. It is not a creditor country yet even if we count these loans. The important fact that puts Canada in that position is the heavy United States investments in Canada, the large amount that our citizens owe United States citizens.

Mr. QUELCH: Does the minister contemplate that Canada will be a creditor nation? On page 8 of the white paper entitled "Employment and Income" I find the following:

In the interest of Canadian and world prosperity and of peaceful collaboration among nations, the government endorses these plans and hopes that parliament will in due course approve the draft agreements. In reaching this view, the government is mindful of the possibility that Canada might, as a member of both institutions, occupy the position of a "creditor" nation.

The minister emphasized the fact last session when he discussed the Bretton Woods agreement that many obstacles which we were bringing up would be corrected by the trade agreements. What is his view regarding that matter? Does he think that when a nation has an unfavourable balance of trade it should have the right to discriminate against imports from nations that refuse to buy from it? The only alternative under the agreement is for it to impose that discrimination against all imports, not just against one nation. Surely it should have the right to discriminate against the nation that is not playing fair with it, rather than have to discriminate against all nations.

Mr. ILSLEY: The scarce currency provision of the Bretton Woods agreement permits such discrimination, if I remember correctly.

Mr. QUELCH: Under this agreement they cannot do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: What agreement is that?

Mr. QUELCH: Proposals for expansion of world trade and employment to be submitted to the international conference. I understand that this is to be the basis of discussion, and on page 15 it states:

Restrictions to safeguard the balance of payments. Members confronted with an adverse balance of payments should be entitled to impose quantitative import restrictions as an aid to the restoration of equilibrium in the balance of payments. This provision should be operative under conditions and procedures to be agreed upon.

These conditions and procedures are as follows:

(d) should provide for the full application of non-discrimination in the use of such restrictions after the transitional period.

It can only discriminate against imports so long as they discriminate against imports of all nations. They must not discriminate against imports of any one single nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that must be read with the provisions of the Bretton Woods agreement. As a matter of fact it is pointed out to me that it expressly must be read with the provisions of the agreement. On the next page of the document from which the hon. gentleman read appears this statement:

Scarce currencies and currencies of territories having a common quota in the monetary fund. Members should not be precluded by this section from applying quantitative restrictions—

Mr. QUELCH: Quantitative. That means imports of all nations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I continue:

—(a) in pursuance of action which they may take under article VII of the international monetary fund agreement, relating to scarce currencies, or (b) in a manner designed to maintain the par value of the currencies of territories having a common quota in the monetary fund, in accordance with article XX, section 4 (g) of that agreement.

Mr. QUELCH: Quantitative restrictions? My contention is that it should read as discrimination against any one nation where that one nation is the nation that refuses to balance trade with another nation. There is a difference. If nations have an unbalance of trade, then they can discriminate against imports coming into the country, but they cannot discriminate or place restrictions against the imports of any one nation, even though it is only one nation that is not playing the game. We believe they should be allowed to place restrictions against the imports of that nation, and that nation alone, but they are not allowed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are, in accordance with the scarce currency provision of the Bretton Woods agreement. The language is so clear I do not see how my hon. friend can persist in the position he is taking. This is the language:

Members should not be precluded by this section from applying quantitative restrictions (a) in pursuance of action which they may take under article VII of the international monetary fund agreement, relating to scarce currencies.

Nothing could be clearer than that. The next thing is to look at the Bretton Woods agreement and consult the scarce currency provision. But my recollection is that discrimination is permitted against the country whose currency becomes scarce.

Mr. QUELCH: But the nation has to wait until the situation has developed before it is allowed to try to protect itself against that situation. Why should it have to wait until that situation has developed? Surely it should be allowed to protect itself against that.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has to be some little provision against wholesale and promiscuous discrimination, and that is what the Bretton Woods agreement provides.

Mr. QUELCH: There should be some way for a debtor nation to have a little control on the actions of a creditor nation. I do not see why a creditor nation should be allowed to have it all its own way. Could the minister tell us now when the conference on international trade that we heard so much about when the Bretton Woods conference was discussed will be held? Could the minister give us any idea how many delegates there will be from Canada, who they will be and whether the agreement will be presented to parliament before it is ratified?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot answer these questions. I do not know when it will be held, or who the delegates will be. It is expected that the final conference will be held within the next twelve months, perhaps much sooner than that, as I said in my speech.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister mentioned liberal trade policies. I presume "liberal" is spelled with a small "l"?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish only to endorse the principle of the bill. The minister gave a very fine and detailed description of the aims and objects of this particular agreement. We are now dealing with the short title. I support the bill because I understood the other evening that the resolution was to be adopted. I hope that this bill will be passed by six o'clock. The main point which appeals to the opposition, although I cannot speak for the opposition, is that this bill is giving aid to the mother country. The hon. member for Temiscouata the other night took occasion to tell the opposition a few things, but he forgot that the opposition has adopted the principle of this loan to the mother country.

I have always had a great deal of sympathy with the Minister of Finance for his sincerity of purpose and his ability for hard work, but I think the finest remark he made was that this loan is not charity but an investment with our best customer with whom we want to trade. In the years to come I think it will redound to the credit of the present Minister of Finance and those associated with him in making this agreement. I cannot go so far with him in what he said about other matters in connection with this bill, about the Bretton Woods agreement, for instance, and the Anglo-American loan. The minister said he hoped that these three together would lead to a better world and all that kind of thing, and that a body would be set up by the United States to deal with international trade balances. I have never been a believer in these new worlds to come after the war and all their blueprints. They were to come also after the last war.

So far as this loan to the United Kingdom is concerned, she is our best customer. She has never defaulted. She has invested, not millions, but billions of dollars in this country before we were able to take care of ourselves. Therefore, apart altogether from any sentimental feeling, this loan is good business. Look at the amount of money which Great Britain invested in public works in this country in days gone by, on the Rideau canal, for instance, right here running past the Chateau Laurier. That is only one of the large public works in which Britain invested millions of dollars in this country. In the same way, after the war between the north and the south in the United States, Great Britain invested millions in the eastern and central states to help them build their state and municipal institutions, their public works, and their railway systems. Consequently this loan is in no sense charity but a good business investment because we are dealing with a country that always meets its obligations.

Something has been said by one of our speakers on this side about Lord Keynes, who was called the greatest economist of our time. He started this Bretton Woods scheme; it was an idea of his, and the Minister of Finance and others here and in London and Washington have told us that this loan is interlocked with Bretton Woods and the Anglo-American loan. But Lord Keynes' idea was not carried out in the final act of Bretton Woods. It was an amendment to his idea. Lord Keynes will not be called a great economist twenty-five years from now, because I remember reading a book that he wrote when I first entered parliament in which he expressed views directly the opposite of those he expressed on the Bretton Woods agreement, the success of which is very doubtful, tied up as it is with the abolition or curtailment of preferences and other impossible conditions. I look on the United States loan to Britain as one of the most unfortuiate things in the history of international finance. It will lead to untold disputes between the United States and Britain and it imposes the harshest terms that I ever heard of. It is worse than the treatment in terms that Germany got after the last war, treatment which she properly deserved.

I should have liked to see the government go further and get all the dominions, Canada, New Zealand and Australia, to shoulder this Anglo-American total loan together. One of the great mistakes that we made in the war was to surrender too much of our political, financial, economic and military power to Washington. That is where we made a great mistake.

But this particular loan dealt with in bill No. 28 stands on its own feet as a good business investment for Canada to make, and will make for employment in Canada. There are, as the Minister of Finance said, other matters interlocked with it. I want to say this of the Bretton Woods agreement and the Anglo-American loan, that they mean the end of preferential trade within the empire. I know one of our hon. members said that nature has placed us on the North American continent, but that is what they said between the two wars. We would hear people asking why we should depend upon Great Britain, upon London and Glasgow for defence, and they wanted to reduce the estimates for defence and have us depend on Washington; but I say that Britain and the dominions are an economic unit and if we developed preferential trade between the empire we should be far superior to Russia and the United States as an economic power. Let us start this brave new world we are talking about by building a strong economic unit within the empire itself. We know from past experience what preferential trade means. It increased Britain's trade with Canada by 42 per cent and Canada's trade with Britain by 44 per cent, and as well increased international trade by leaps and bounds. We have had in the past this new internationalism in the favoured nation treaties with many foreign countries, but we find that over 84 per cent of all our business was done with the mother country and the United States and only 16 per cent with foreign countries. We have tried this international racket and these dreams of a new world to come before. I have no confidence in it; I do not believe in it. We should stick together within the empire as an economic unit. If we do not hang together we shall hang separately, for none of our dominions are able to "go it" alone, and Britain without the dominions will be only a second-class power.

There are many things to consider about the Bretton Woods agreement. It is not a scheme of governments but a scheme of economists. I do not believe that it will do what we are told it will. Under it, economic sanctions, if any of us fail, can be applied against Britain and the other dominions; do not forget that. It is only a half-baked international currency scheme which will lead to trouble between Britain and the United States. It is only a half-baked international currency bill, which can never work.

We want full employment, as far as possible. We want cheap money and stable prices. But we shall never get them under the Bretton Woods, Anglo-American loan. I stand by the Ottawa agreements and empire trade first, but they should be brought up to date, so as to meet changed conditions. United with the other dominions we are strong; divided we shall fall. We are not strong enough for any of us to go alone.

I believe the present government, and those which have preceded it, men who held office in the days of Laurier and Fielding, deserve great credit for their pioneering in the matter of preferential trade, and for giving us the six-cent preference on wheat—which was afterwards revoked in 1938 by the United States treaty. But they were the pioneers.

Do not throw it all to the wolves for the sake of a so-called new thing, this dream of a new world, called internationalism. As I have said, the final word of the Bretton Woods agreement is not found in this plan. The final act has been changed, from first to last. They would have Great Britain throw away the only real assets she has, namely her purchasing power in her own home market. She will have to trade that way, and without these two loans will have to regulate and control her export trade and imports. Through the development of consolidation within the empire, Great Britain can build up an economic unit, pledge full employment, and raise the standard of living. All that will be killed by the Bretton Woods agreement. It brings us back to the laissez-faire doctrine of the twenties and the thirties, to the status quo of 1929 and 1939. I want an economic system which, in the circumstances of 1944, 1945 and 1946 or 1960 can help mankind toward a goal of increasing production. The Bretton Woods scheme and the Anglo-American loan will hand over world economic power, and with it world domination, because of the $28 billion of gold in the world, $23 billion are held by the United States.

Great Britain cannot recover unless she is permitted to assume her place in the trade of the world. This trade is not exclusive. The Bretton Woods agreement and the United States loan do not constitute an exchange of goods and services for an exchange of goods and services. It has to be paid back some time, with interest. The United States loan is an exchange of gools and services for what? It is for debt, or for gold. I believe the conditions of the Anglo-American loan are very harsh and a surrender to the money-lenders who do not consider the money was spent to save their shores from invasion for over two years.

If anyone believes the United States will have lower tariffs, then just let him read the recent records of the senate and house of representatives in Washington. There will always be tariffs, so long as there are countries. There will always be nations, and patriotism is the cement that holds nations together. For us to blind our eyes to all this, and go roaming around the world looking for brave new worlds and international agreements is something beyond belief.

In conclusion. let me refer to the speech made this afternoon by an hon. member who spoke first, and who is not at the moment in his seat. He is a fluent, most informative and interesting speaker. But he has forgotten some of the figures, which are set out in a table issued from Washington which shows the principal international credits or loans, either extended or awaiting approval to France by Canada and the United States. This publication is by the National City Bank of New York, April issue, dealing with the subjects of economic conditions, governmental finance and United States securities. At page 44 there is a review of what was done at Savannah recently regarding Bretton Woods. They found that they will have to mark time, and do something. This is what is stated.

> There is general approval of the apparent trend toward postponing starting the monetary fund until some time after the international bank begins operations. This is what many people have advocated all along, for successful operation of the fund is possible only in a reasonably stable world.

I refer now to the table which shows the credits given or to be sanctioned. The amount extended to Great Britain by the United States is $650 million, while that extended by Canada is given as $1,136 million. The credit extended to France by the United States is $895 million, and by Canada, $220 million. The other figures are given for other countries.

In this connection may I point out to hon. members from the province of Quebec what was said by the new Prime Minister of France, Felix Gouin, who is a socialist. This is what he said when taking over from General de Gaulle:

> France has always reacted with the marvellous power which belongs to her and which is made up of moderation, reason and profound political wisdom.

Everybody hopes that under the loan the minister has made available to France—and it will reflect to his credit in years to come, in the minds of the French-speaking people of Quebec—France will soon thus be able to rebuild accordingly. She is in great need of financial assistance at the present time. Her civil and war expenses are much greater than they should be, and will have to be reduced. However, it is our hope that she will get past this critical time. Canada's loan will help greatly. Everything she needs will be made available to her from the people of this country, under the loan announced by the Minister of Finance. I believe the minister deserves the thanks of the country for this transaction, although I would qualify my remarks by making the references I did to the Bretton Woods agreement and the Anglo-American agreement, and the cause and effect of it. I do this because I am a real believer in the future policy of Great Britain and her dominions for imperial preference as an economic unit along the lines I have suggested. Under an empire system we would have preferential trade; the Ottawa agreements could be brought up to date, to meet changed conditions.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Acadia asked me a question about the chances of the United States and Canada pursuing a liberal trade policy in the future. I said I thought Lord Keynes, in a speech delivered in the House of Lords, had made reference to the prospects of such a policy being followed in the United States. I now have excerpts from that speech which I believe are worthy of a place on the record.

This is what he is reported to have said at page 791 of the debates of the House of Lords for December 18, 1945:

> Questions have been raised—and rightly and reasonably raised—about the willingness of the United States to receive repayment hereafter. This is a large subject to which I have given a great deal of thought, but I shall not have time to develop it fully to-day. I am not, as a result, quite so worried as most people. Indeed, if in the next five or ten years the dollar turns out to be a scarce currency, seldom will so many people have been right. It is a very technical matter, very emphatically within their past experience, but not so easily the subject of future prediction. I am afraid I must content myself with a few headlines. First, it is not a question of our having to pay the United States by direct exports; we could never do that. Our exports are not, and are not likely to be as large as our direct imports from the United States. The object of the multilateral system is to enable us to pay the United States by exporting to any part of the world and it is partly for that very reason that the Americans have felt the multilaterial system was the only sound basis for any arrangement of this kind. Secondly, all the most responsible people in the United States, and particularly in the state department and in the treasury, have entirely departed from the high tariff, export subsidy conception of things, and will do their utmost with, they beileve, the support of public opinion in the opposite direction. That is why this intternational trade convention presents us with such a tremendous opportunity. For the first time in modern history the United States is going to exert its full, powerful influence in the direction of reduction of tariffs, not only of itself but by all others.

Thirdly, this is a problem of which to-day every economist and publicist in the United States is acutely conscious. Books on economics are scarcely written about anything else. They would regard it as their fault and not ours if they fail to solve it. They would acquit us of blame—quite different from the atmosphere of ten or twenty years ago. They will consider it their business to find a way out. Fourthly, if the problem does arise, it will be a problem, for reasons I have just mentioned, of the United States vis-a-vis the rest of the world and not us in particular. It will be the problem of the United States and the whole commercial and financial arrangement of every other country. Fifthly,—and perhaps this is the consideration which is least prominent in peoples' minds—the United States is rapidly becoming a high-living and a high-cost country. Their wages are two and a half times ours. These are the historic, classical methods by which in the long run international equilibrium will be restored.

With regard to the questions put to me by the hon. member for Temiscouata, perhaps I should give them a little more thought and answer them at eight o'clock. I could start on them now, perhaps, but I would like to discuss them. Perhaps I shall have to ask him to repeat some of the questions, as I have not notes of all; but following the notes I have here, perhaps I can deal with them.

There is one point I wish to make clear, which I tried to make clear the other day. I referred to Great Britain getting back into a state of equilibrium, and the hon. member said, "What about Canada getting back into equilibrium?" The point I wanted to make was that when I was talking about deficits and about equilibrium I was not talking about an internal situation at all. When I said the United Kingdom went back, or that the United Kingdom's financial position deteriorated by $20,000 million in Canadian funds up to the time of these loans, I was not talking about the internal debt of the United Kingdom, how much the internal debt was or how much it had increased. The internal debt of the United Kingdom is over $100,000 million, so that we are not comparing likes when we compare an external position with the internal position of the Dominion of Canada. What I meant was that as a result of the war, by loss of foreign assets, by loss of liquid reserves and by debts incurred to foreign countries, the United Kingdom had gone back, had worsened its position by an amount equivalent to $20,000 million in Canadian funds.

The Dominion of Canada did not do that at all. As a result of the war the Dominion of Canada slightly bettered its external position. It incurred a large internal debt, but on balance it lessened its external debt. The same applied to the United States of America; I think the same applied to every other one of our allies. The United Kingdom alone among the victorious allies suffered this terrific deterioration in its external position as far as foreign indebtedness, foreign assets, foreign currencies and liquid reserves were concerned. That is why I said in my speech that the case of the United Kingdom is unique, a special case. That was not an expression of sentiment, or something coming from an imperialist. I was saying simply, and almost in the same words, what was said in the United States of America by the national advisory council, consisting of the secretary of the treasury, the under-secretary of state and so on. They recognized the fact, which cannot be escaped, that the United Kingdom case is different from the case of any other country in the world. The United Kingdom occupies a key position. Either we must write it off and say that it is hopeless, that the place is bankrupt and we might as well forget them; or we have to take the other line and do what we reasonably can, within our resources, to get them into a position where they can carry on as they have in the past, as a great trading nation.

Perhaps I am emphasizing the currency end of this a little more than the trade end of it, but the main reason I desire to see this loan go through is that I want sterling once more to be real money, instead of a currency which is not convertible into other currencies. When I was young, and in fact all during the previous war, when we sold goods to Great Britain for sterling that sterling could be converted into United States dollars; not, as during the last war, simply sold by the Canadian exporter to the government of Canada, which could not do anything more with it unless it made some arrangement with the United Kingdom. So that we must get sterling back to the position of convertibility; and the success of these North American loans, the one from the United States and the one from Canada, is necessary if sterling is to become a stable and convertible currency once more. Unless it is, we cannot carry on ths huge trade that we have carried on with Great Britain and upon which our wheat exporters, our bacon exporters, our cheese exporters, our apple exporters, our metals exporters, and so on, absolutely depend. We shall not be able to carry that on; we shall have to reorient ourselves entirely, change our economy completely, reduce our exports enormously and try to make ourselves over into some kind of self-sufficient nation.

Great Britain can very well take that other line. She has an area there, the sterling area. By living within that area and pursuing very restrictive trade policies, not buying from any country unless that country will buy from it, by making these bilateral trade agreements they can, and in order to live would have to, do these things, being in the position they are in, unless the North American nations show a little imagination and do something to get Great Britain into the position where in future she can carry on the kind of trade policies which are essential to the interests of the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for Temiscouata is entirely wrong when he said my eyes were on Great Britain all the time during my speech. I made the speech from the point of view of the Dominion of Canada. I agree with the approach of the leader of the C.C.F. party and the approach of the financial critic of the the opposition. I disagree with the approach of the Social Credit party, because I do not think the Social Credit party is right in the position it takes that this is purely a moral obligation and not a good business proposition. That is based upon a short-run view.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not suppose the minister would remember when I spoke, but he may recall that I did not follow that line, so that perhaps he should be a little less sweeping in his denunciation.

Mr. POULIOT: Your case was like that of England; it was unique.

Mr. ILSLEY: I accept the statement of the hon. member for Lethbridge. Perhaps the members of the Social Credit party were speaking individually, each expressing his own opinion. But while quite a bit of what the hon. member for Acadia says is true, namely that this has an inflationary influence, that it is taking goods out of the country at a time when they are in short supply here, and that goods may be coming back at a time when they are not in short supply here, nevertheless these disadvantages are all outweighed by the paramount advantage of getting Great Britain in a position, not during the next two or three years but in the next half century, where the United Kingdom will be a trading nation with a stable, convertible currency, taking large quantities of our goods and sending us back goods and currency that we can use to buy goods from the United States and other countries. Therefore, from that point of view, we regard this loan as highly in the interests of the Dominion of Canada.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

JUDGES ACT

JUDGES NOT TO ACT AS COMMISSIONERS OR ARBITRATORS—TO BE BOUND BY DECISION OF COURT OF FINAL APPEAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of bill No. 13, to amend the Judges Act.

He said: I do not wish to delay the minister in getting along with the matter which was under discussion before six o'clock, and I shall speak for only four or five minutes. But I wish to commend this bill to the attention of the house. I have suggested through the acting leader of the house that the minister might consider this bill on his estimates, so as to save time to-night.

The time has come when judges should be paid properly, and no doubt that will be looked after. But, as is generally known, some judges have been absent from their duties for one or two years. That is not in the interests of the administration of justice, because the frequency with which the judges are drafted for all kinds of such work impairs the efficient administration of justice and causes congestion in the law courts. As they are largely only fact-finding commissions when appointed, they duplicate the efficient powers and functions of parliament, of the committees thereof, and of the many outside boards of recent innovation in war work. Furthermore, they are a costly adjunct to good parliamentary government; they cause delays, and interfere with parliament's right to immediate solution of social and economic problems or urgency to good government. Thus a system of "judicial commission government" is slowly being built up in Canada.

While they are appointed by federal authority they are also provincial officers. No doubt on some commissions they have done good work. but I urge on the minister that he should consider this matter in connection with his estimates.

As regards the second section, namely that judges should be bound by the decision of the court of last resort, by the privy council or whatever is the court of final appeal, it reasserts the well known legal doctrine known as stare decisis, namely that decided cases which lay down a rule of law are authoritive and should be followed. Decisions of the privy council should be binding on all courts. In all the provinces, Quebec excepted, they have now what they call divorce courts. In my opinion, this jurisdiction in Ontario should be transferred to the county court judges. There were hundreds upon hundreds of cases standing at the York assizes; the list is nearly as long as the clerk's table; I urge that something should be done.

As hon. members know, there is a divided authority between the federal authority and the provinces. The provinces have certain jurisdiction in respect of the solemnization of marriages, an act which is generally performed by the clergy. In one province decisions of the privy council on the marriage law have been upset, and much trouble has been unnecessarily caused thereby. It is true that the spiritual bodies represented respectively in the Lambeth conference and the canon law of the province of Quebec are unfavourable to the principles of divorce. Nevertheless, it is there, and one must admit that the way divorce has been handled throughout the country indicates the need of a change. When all is said and done, it must be remembered that by Roman law marriage was a contract, and a province can pass an act by which such contract can be registered before a mayor, a sheriff, a warden, or a municipal clerk. I do not raise that point in any controversial spirit; no doubt large numbers of people wish to be married by a Christian minister or a minister of some other faith, but I urge that some remedy should be taken along the lines I suggest. If the minister in his estimates will consent to have these two matters discussed at the proper time, I shall be glad to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

FATAL ACCIDENTS AND INJURIES FROM HIGHWAY TRAFFIC AND LEVEL CROSSINGS

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved the second reading of bill No. 27, to amend the criminal code (motor cars).

He said: Prior to the last war we used to have a day called "motor accident day". In 1938 there was a long debate in the house on a motion I introduced with reference to road accidents caused by motor cars. Nothing has contributed more to the education of the people than the motor car, and the proper use of cars is to be commended. But, as in the case of every other invention, its use is one thing and its abuse is another. In the city I come from there were ninety-eight persons killed last year and 7,000 or 8,000 badly injured in consequence of reckless driving. A return was brought down in this house on April 3 giving the number of people killed or injured in traffic accidents on highways during the period of the war, accidents from drowning, accidents at level crossings and so on. Many persons have been killed as a result of fires in small houses and in other ways. In Ontario a member of the forces murdered a girl and was convicted after two trials, but the province spent nearly $70,000 in connection with those two trials. Here we have a record showing 9,038 persons killed and 149,000 badly injured, and no one knows who will be the next victim. There have been some miraculous escapes from the consequences of wild driving at excessive speed contrary to law, but such driving goes on all the year round and apparently no one can stop it.

I would urge the government, when the minister's estimates are up for consideration, to have this matter discussed. There is a real danger from the hit-and-run driver. In the city I come from not a few people have been killed and no one has ever found out who committed the crime. One of our most prominent citizens was killed by a motor car near the York club some years ago and the perpetrator of this dastardly deed was never discovered. It is a cowardly sort of murder, ten times worse than any other. I have seen the headless body of an infant in my constituency, and the people have appealed to me and to one or two other members to see if something cannot be done about it.

I am going to move the adjournment of this debate, but before doing so I suggest to the government that, now the war is over, proper steps be taken to check or to put an end in part to this sort of thing. It takes two persons to make an accident. Reckless drivers will go past the secondary schools at speeds of from forty to sixty miles an hour in spite of signs warning them to drive slowly. It is the duty of parliament to step in and do something. In New York they have adopted certain modern provisions which I have embodied in this bill. I am suggesting an amendment, the purpose of which is to define the powers of the jury in cases of manslaughter arising out of the operation of motor vehicles, and there is also a section providing that the jury shall decide whether a person charged is guilty or not guilty. It is desirable that the functions of the jury should not be curtailed or abolished. The jury are required to take the law as given by the judge; but, owing to the many cases that are withdrawn by order of the judge, trial by jury in those cases is negatived, and there are at present so many loopholes in our law that many persons guilty of gross negligence get off. The increased number of accidents require that the law with regard to reckless driving should be brought up to date to meet changing conditions, while preserving the liberty of the subject, and there should be a stiffening of the penalties as to drunken and hit-and-run drivers.

I move the adjournment of the debate, and I trust that when the minister's estimates come before the house at the proper time this matter will be disccussed.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

LOAN TO UNITED KINGDOM

APPROVAL OF FINANCIAL AGREEMENT SIGNED MARCH 6, 1946

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley for the second reading of bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom, signed on the sixth day of March, 1946.

Mr. W. R. THATCHER (Moose Jaw): Before this bill is carried there are a number of comments I wish to make on it. With the first feature, the loan of $1,250,000,000 I am heartily in accord. In the light of Britain's extreme and disproportionate war-time sacrifices, most Canadians are pleased and proud to give her a hand with her heavy reconversion and rehabilitation problems. Sentimentally and for humanitarian reasons, I think the proposal has a great deal of merit, and I am inclined to agree with other members who have suggested that the loan would be good business for Canada. I definitely favour this part of the bill.

With regard to the second feature of the bill, however, which proposes to cancel a debt owed to Canada by Great Britain of $425,000,000, I cannot agree. I think that this is tantamount to an outright gift for such an amount. It may be that I am inexperienced in political matters and therefore do not see the problem in the proper light. I am willing to concede that. I come from British stock and am very proud of the fact; but as a Canadian member of parliament, circumstances being what they are in Canada to-day, I do not see how I can vote for a gift of such magnitude to another country, even though that country is Great Britain.

In the first place, as nearly as I can ascertain, we have already given Great Britain in the past three or four years, directly or indirectly, over three billion dollars. Over and above these gifts we have sold farm produce to Great Britain in many cases under market levels, and we are still doing so. For instance, wheat on the world market is selling at about $2 a bushel, and yet England is buying wheat at $1.55 f.o.b. Fort William, which means in a nutshell that every time a farmer in western Canada sells a bushel of wheat to Great Britain he is making the mother country a gift of from thirty-five to forty-five cents.

I do not think there are many who begrudge these past gifts, but there are a great many Canadians who are beginning to wonder how long we can fit such vast commitments into our post-war budgets. The war is over and Canada herself faces tremendous problems of reconversion and rehabilitation. Everyone of these projects will require large sums of money.

Everyone admires the magnificent war effort of Britain and is glad to give a helping hand; nevertheless I do not see how we can give away such a huge sum as $425,000,000 when so many of our own people are in actual need.

Only last week there was before this house a resolution urging decent old age pensions for elderly Canadians. Hon. members from all political parties on both sides of the house spoke in favour of that resolution; yet it was not passed. I suppose the reason it was not passed was that the government felt that funds were not available for such social services at the present time. A few days before that, there was before the house another resolution which eventually would have resulted in large irrigation projects in western Canada. Despite the fact that these projects are vitally needed, we saw that resolution also talked out, though we heard members from all sides of the house speak in favour of it. I believe it was talked out because the government felt that funds were not available for it at the present time. My home city of Moose Jaw has a population of almost 25,000 people, and we have been short of water for about forty years. During the past winter our water supply was cut off about half of every day. If a housewife wanted to cook in the daytime she had to fill the bathtub with water the night before. Industries were closed down and men laid off because there was no water. Sanitary facilities could not be used. The people in my constituency will think it strange that parliament can give hundreds of millions of dollars to Great Britain, and yet cannot find a few million dollars to improve living conditions in the cities of Moose Jaw, Regina and Weyburn in southern Saskatchewan. A few million dollars would give them an adequate water supply.

Mr. ILSLEY: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question? I assume he would like to answer his friends in Moose Jaw who are worried about this. Would he explain how we can use any part of the $425 million for old age pensions or for any water improvements or for irrigation projects?

Mr. THATCHER: I cannot tell the Minister of Finance how he should run his department, but I do say this: Surely, if we can find so much money to give Great Britain we can find a few million dollars for that purpose. Probably that is not the answer he would like, but I shall be glad to listen to the minister in a few minutes if he will give me several more. To-day there are thousands of returned veterans who are looking for work. Why cannot we find a few projects on which to employ them? I cannot see how this parliament can justify, on the one hand, being so generous with Great Britain, and, on the other, being so niggardly in many respects to our own people.

I have received no mandate from my constituents to vote for a gift which amounts to about $1,750,000 for every constituency in Canada. I cannot refrain from objecting to this measure, and if the bill comes to a vote in its present form I shall vote against it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us deal with this matter now, because I see the trend of the speeches that are going to be made by certain members and one of the oppositions against this bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Just a minute; I do not want the minister to misunderstand. The hon. member for Moose Jaw is speaking entirely for himself in this particular, and I dissociate myself completely from the point of view he expressed.

Mr. POULIOT: That is a mistake.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us deal with that, because I think the hon. member for Moose Jaw wants to be fair about this. I have not given this aspect much thought in advance because I am surprised that that line of argument should be used. If any writing-off of this $425 million will enable us to balance our budget or reduce taxes or pay off any of our debts here in Canada or spend any money on anything that we needed in Canada there would be some validity in the argument.

The capacity of the United Kingdom to pay is limited for the reasons that I gave in my speeches to the house. We satisfied ourselves that by the time Great Britain repays the $1,250 million, which will take them until 2000 A.D., it is just nonsense to think about trying to ask them for another $425 million some time in the next century. If we are wrong about our appraisal of the capacity of the United Kingdom to pay, the situation is perhaps a little different; that is, we might get goods of some kind from Great Britain. We could not use the goods to pay old age pensions; nevertheless it would add to the wealth of this country.

The United States made a very careful appraisal of this situation, just as Canada did, and having in mind the fact that the United Kingdom has gone back, as I said this afternoon at six o'clock, by over twenty billion Canadian dollars as a result of this war, and having in mind the fact that we cannot see how Great Britain can meet her deficits—I do not mean her deficits at home, not her budget deficits; I mean her international deficits—how can she pay for the goods that she has to have upon which to live and keep herself going and at the same time even pay interest on the $1,250 million for the first five years, or any more than a low rate of interest for the next half century? What is the use of talking about attempting to collect $425 million? I am taking this in a hard-headed way; I am talking about this as if we had to get it if we could, and I think perhaps that is correct. But bear in mind that this $425 million is a war debt. It was the costs of Great Britain's participation in the air training plan. There is nothing there; it does not represent anything; there is nothing represented by this $425 million which enables the United Kingdom to earn a single dollar with which to pay the Dominion of Canada. The reason that we are lending the money to Great Britain as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar says; perhaps we confuse it by talking money rather than goods—the reason we are sending Great Britain $1,250 million worth of goods or thereabouts during the next three or four years is to get Great Britain on her feet so that she will be a solid, enduring, permanent and expanding market for the Dominion of Canada. This whole deal is an investment in the future of Canadian trade. This deal is for the benefit of these very people about whom the hon. member for Moose Jaw is talking. We are not taking money away from them and giving it to Great Britain. We are now giving money to them as a result of this deal that we are entering into by this United Kingdom loan.

I do not like this arguement that if we can give money to people across the sea, surely we can give more money to people at home. That is not the true nature of the transaction at all. So far as the write-off of the $425 million is concerned, it does not affect one way or the other our ability to do anything along the lines mentioned by the hon. member. I put the question to him a little while ago. I said, if we do not put this loan on the statute books how can we use any part of the $425 million to pay for old age pensions or to pay for Moose Jaw improvements or to pay for irrigation projects in Saskatchewan? How can we do it? There is no answer to that question; there is no way in which we can do it.

Mr. BRACKEN: The bill before us is bill No. 28, respecting the financial agreement between Canada and the United Kingdom signed on the 6th day of March, 1946. This bill has had second reading. Presumably the main principle of it has been approved by a large majority of the house. We are now in committee of the whole. At this stage I do not propose to repeat the arguments that have been used by any hon. members who have spoken in the previous stages of the bill. I take it that our job at the moment is to deal with the details of the measure.

I have just two or three things to say. I shall sum up the main items in the bill, and state briefly where we stand on it,—although it has been stated before—and to ask the minister to answer a few practical questions relating to it. It will help us all to understand better the implications and the cost of the measure we are now considering.

Let me say this in passing. I conceive this measure to be one of the most far-seeing this government has introduced in recent years. It is not a measure for to-day or for to-morrow but for the long distant future. I put it in a class with the lend-lease proposals brought forward by the President of the United States a few years ago, without which the war would not have been won by us. So that I commend the government most highly on the bill. At the same time we must realize that to a considerable degree we are by it making a considerable contribution to an ally in the war.

What is the substance of the bill? It is outlined in sections 2, 3, 4, 5 and 6. We are asked to approve the financial agreement entered into some months ago between this country and Britain. To do what? To advance $1,250 million to Britain by way of loan, to bear interest after five years at the rate of two per cent; second, to continue for five years more the interest free provisions of the loan to the United Kingdom made in 1942, which I understand in the beginning amounted to $700 million and now, I believe, stands at about $500 million. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will tell me if that is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, about.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is, we have about $500 million still owing on an interest-free loan made in 1942. Under the terms of this agreement no interest is to be paid on this loan for the next five years. At the end of that period discussions may be held to decide what shall be done about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be paid off by that time. It is being paid off.

Mr. BRACKEN: In three years some $200 million has been paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Probably you do not expect much in the way of repayment of that loan when you are making another loan of $1,250 million.

The third provision has to do with the cancellation of the amount owing by the United Kingdom to Canada with respect to the British commonwealth air training plan, totalling $425 million. This is an obligation owing to Canada by Britain which is being written off. Then the government is given power to borrow the amounts of money required for this loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act.

We support this bill, Mr. Chairman, chiefly for two reasons. The first is that in our judgment it is essential to the preservation of the Canadian economy as we see it to-day. Ours is an export economy; we are more than any other country dependent upon foreign nations for a market for our products. Three out of every eight people in Canada make their living through enterprises directly or indirectly related to the export business. Our best customer has been Britain. To-day, because of sacrifices made during the war, Britain is unable to pay for the goods she requires from us. As the minister said, this is an investment in trade for the future, to try to keep a good customer going until later on, when she can pay for the imports she will take from us. This measure is essential to the preservation of the Canadian economy. If we lose the British market the farmers will lose a market for a large proportion of what we export. If that should happen we would be in the position of having to let possibly one-third of our Canadian farms be abandoned. We have 30,000 farms abandoned now, and if we have another 250,000 abandoned, we shall have a job on our hands. If the farmers cannot sell their products they cannot buy the products of industry. Business then becomes demoralized, and we find ourselves with mass unemployment. These things follow one after the other: loss of export markets, demoralization of industry, mass unemployment and a low national income. As the Minister of Justice is reported to have said a few days ago, a low national income means inability to maintain social services at their present standards. These consequences follow one another if we lose a major portion of our export trade. I have said, we support the bill because it is essential to the preservation of the Canadian economy as we know it to-day. It would demoralize our whole economy if the one-third of our people making their living in export industries had to find some other employment in Canada. That is not any sentimental reason for supporting this measure; it is a purely logical, economic reason.

Our second reason for supporting the loan is that it is a necessary prerequisite to the accomplishment of world peace. If we lose our export trade with Britain, Britain will be forced into a sterling bloc, and in this western world we shall have two competing economies, each using the devices of the inter-war period, each sowing the seeds of another war. This is an investment in possible durable peace. These are two important reasons for supporting this measure.

I wish now to ask the minister a number of questions bearing directly on the sections of this bill. What is the understanding or undertaking on the part of Britain that any portion or all of this money will be spent in Canada? My understanding is that there is no commitment, but that it is the expectation that an amount equal to the loan will be spent in this country. I should like the minister to make that point clear, for I am sure he would want the Canadian people to be in no duobt about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will do that.

Mr. BRACKEN: Second, what are the circumstances under which payment of the interest on the loan may be waived? Under this agreement no interest is payable for five years, after which interest is payable at two per cent per annum. But in certain years the interest may be waived, and the interest so waived will be written off. I think the house and the country would like to know the circumstances under which interest would not be payable to Canada.

[Mr. Bracken.]

Third, what will the annual payments to Canada be if the interest and principal payments are made in full? The reason I ask that is this: We are making a loan of $1,250 million to Great Britain. The United States has made or is contemplating making a loan three times as large. Great Britain will owe on both of them, according to my calculations, $180 million a year. I would like the house and the Canadian people to understand what the obligation is that Great Britain is taking on her shoulders, when taking these two loans. Perhaps the minister has the figure for the United States as well. The interest rate and the terms are exactly the same; only the amounts are different.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BRACKEN: Perhaps the minister could also give us an estimate on this question. What interest rate will be payable by Canada. on the money raised here to be advanced to Great Britain? We are lending it to Great Britain at an interest rate of two per cent. What interest shall we have to pay our own people for the money they lend us to re-lend to Britain? What is the difference in dollars between our interest payment and the payment we will receive from Great Britain? The difference between what interest the government will pay us and the payments we receive from Great Britain would be our contribution under that particular section of the agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be the taxpayers' contribution—not the country's contribution. It will be the taxpayers' contribution—the contribution of the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. BRACKEN: And what did I say?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman said "our" contribution.

Mr. BRACKEN: Well, I did not confine it to this party or to that party, or to any particular individuals. I thought I was speaking in this instance for Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: But there is a difference. There is a way for the country to lend wealth, as distinguished from the taxpayer paying somebody else in the country. When the government borrows money from the taxpayer, the taxpayer pays money and the bondholder gets money. The country has not borrowed on any of the money. Therefore the contribution works out as a contribution of the taxpayer as distinguished from a contribution of the country.

Mr. BRACKEN: Quite frankly I do not see what the minister is driving at. However, this government borrows money from the people at a certain rate of interest?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Lends it to Great Britain at two per cent interest?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Then the difference between the rate paid the people and the two per cent received is the contribution of somebody in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The taxpayers.

Mr. BRACKEN: In this particular proposal?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BRACKEN: Well, who else is there to pay it but the taxpayers?

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member is taking it for granted that everybody takes part of the loan.

Mr. BRACKEN: I do not see any point in what the minister has said. However, if there is something in it I have not understood, he might develop it later on.

Mr. ILSLEY: There might not be.

Mr. BRACKEN: The point is that the difference comes from the Canadian people.

The other day the minister gave some reasons why there should be different rates of interest and loans of different lengths to different countries. Perhaps he would deal with that briefly also.

Why did the government cancel the British debt to Canada of $425 million owing as a result of the commonwealth air training plan? I believe I know the answer, but I think the minister should place it on record, because it is related to another item which is continuing. If the government cancels one debt of $425 million, why does it continue the 1942 interest-free debt of $500 million? My reason for asking that is this: The United States in its proposed settlement with Great Britain of its lease-lend operations has written off certain amounts which, I believe, approximate $25,000 million, and has asked Britain for payment of only $640 million. We wrote off one debt of $425 million and maintained another of some $500 million. I would suppose the minister's answer will be that he thought Great Britain could pay part of the total, but could not pay all of it.

Those are some of the questions I wished to ask. Speaking for this party, may I state again we are very glad to be able to give the government our unanimous support on this measure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I had better answer these questions now. The first one was: What understanding is there that Great Britain will use the proceeds of this loan for the purpose of purchasing goods in Canada? It is true that it is not provided in this loan that the $1,250 million must be spent in Canada. It was considered that in the case of Great Britain this restriction was neither necessary nor desirable.

It is not necessary because we know that Britain's purchases in Canada, requiring to be financed by some means other than its current receipts from Canada during the period in which they can use this credit, will exceed substantially the amount of credit. If they use the credit for other purchases, they will need to use other funds for purchasing here, funds derived, for example, from selling to Canada gold or foreign exchange that Canada requires.

It is not desirable because in the agreement, through the operation of article V, we require the United Kingdom to provide Canadian dollars to countries in the sterling area and to other countries in return for sterling which these countries acquire from their trade with Britain, in order that these other countries may be able to trade with Canada. If we are imposing this obligation on Britain to provide Canadian dollars to other countries which need them for buying in Canada, then we should make it possible for Britain to use the Canadian dollars we lend her for this purpose.

It should be noted that this will not mean that other countries are getting any special advantage from the credit. but merely that they will be getting the same advantage of convertibility of sterling into Canadian dollars that we wish to obtain by having sterling convertible into United States dollars.

It should also be noted that the credit provided by the United States is not restricted to purchases in the United States and, in fact, it is expected, as Lord Keynes told the House of Lords in England, that only about one-half of the United States credit will be needed to cover Britain's deficit with the United States. We considered that when the United States was prepared to provide Britain with dollars that she can and will transfer to other countries, we should not restrict our credit from being used in this way.

It should be noted that when and if Britain transfers these Canadian dollars we lend her to some other country, the other country in turn will use them in Canada. Our exchange control would prevent these dollars from being converted into foreign exchange and taken out of Canada in this way.

The fact is that we know from the demand for goods during the next three or four years that Great Britain will require more than the amount of this loan for expenditures in Canada. It is different from the United States, because it is not expected in that instance that Great Britain will need the whole amount of the United States loan. Great Britain will need more than the amount of the Canadian loan.

Mr. GRAYDON: What part of the United States loan do you figure she will need?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I have it here somewhere. They would not need the whole amount to meet the deficit with the United States. I do not think I can add much to that explanation.

The second question referred to the circumstances under which interest would be waived. The circumstances are set out in article IV of the agreement. They are a little technical and perhaps I had better read that article:

In any year in which the government of the United Kingdom requests the government of Canada to waive the amount of the interest due in the instalment of that year, the government of Canada will grant the waiver if:

(a) The government of the United Kingdom finds that a waiver is necessary in view of the present and prospective conditions of international exchange and the level of its gold and foreign exchange reserves; and

(b) The international monetary fund certifies that the income of the United Kingdom from home-produced exports plus its net income from invisible current transactions in its balance of payments was on the average over the five preceding calendar years less than the average annual amount of United Kingdom imports during 1936-38, fixed at 866 million pounds as such figure may be adjusted for changes in the price level of these imports. If waiver is requested for an interest payment prior to that due in 1955, the average income shall be computed for the calendar years from 1950 through the year preceding that in which the request is made; and

(c) Interest payments due in that year on any credit made available to the government of the United Kingdom to which a similar provision for waiver of interest applies are also waived.

I just want to put in my own language the substance of that article. To begin with, we can waive when the United States waives; the provision is the same as in the United States agreement. We are not obliged to waive unless the United States also waives under the similar provision in their agreement. The simple way to put it is that unless Great Britain's exports, including balances on invisible transactions, are of a sufficient volume and value to pay for her post-war volume of imports, that is to say, imports from 1936 to 1938, we shall consider that Great Britain has not the capacity to pay and we shall waive payment of the interest. That is the simple way to put it and I tried to put it in that way in my speech.

It means that Great Britain's volume of exports must be very considerably greater than before the war. It was stated in the House of Lords' discussion that they must be sixty per cent greater than they were during those years—perhaps it was 1939—during that period before the war. Therefore the United States and this country and Great Britain look forward to an expansion of Great Britain's export trade. There must be a substantial expansion of Great Britain's trade or Great Britain cannot pay for her imports.

How can she pay for her imports? She has a huge population in a small island without many resources. She has lost so many of her investments and her shipping is down, as I said, by about two-thirds. That great volume of investments which she had and which supplied her with large annual payments which she could turn around and use to pay for imports is gone. The result is that Great Britain has to build up a substantial export trade in order to meet the balance of payments. There is just no other way a country —I do not need to go into elementary principles—can pay. A country cannot by taxing its own people get money with which to pay another nation. In some way or another they have to get reserves; they have to get the currency of other countries with which to pay other people.

Mr. BRACKEN: The minister does not need to sell us on that idea; we are already sold on it. I just wanted to know the circumstances under which England might not be required to pay interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: I knew it was not necessary to argue my hon. friend into that idea, but I thought there were some other hon. members in the house who perhaps would be interested in it. I understand there is not a willingness on the part of some to support this measure and therefore I was talking a little for the benefit of those who are opposed to it.

Mr. QUELCH: Will the amount paid by Great Britain on account of sterling balances accumulated to the credit of overseas governments, banks, et cetera, before the date of this agreement be considered as income under article IV? I think I read in the London Economist that they apparently would not be considered as income.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a sentence in the United States agreement which covers that point. It reads:

> Any amount in excess of 43,750,000 pounds released or paid in any year on account of sterling balances accumulated to the credit of overseas governments, monetary authorities and banks before the effective date of this agreement shall be regarded as a capital transaction and therefore shall not be included in the above calculation of the net income from invisible current transactions for that year.

Mr. QUELCH: Does that apply also to Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: That point was considered very carefully, and it was thought that the provision in the United States agreement completely protected Canada because we do not waive unless the United States waives. That is specifically provided for in our agreement.

The next question was as to the interest rate if there is no waiver. The rate depends upon the rate at which credit is drawn upon. That determines the length of time it is outstanding before 1951. Assuming that credit is drawn in equal quarterly instalments from April 1, 1946, to December 31, 1948, and that no waiver of interest occurs, the effective rate of interest for the whole period would be 1·73 per cent. It is generally considered, I think, that the United States interest rate is 1·62 per cent, although the provisions are exactly the same in the two agreements. The effective rate would depend upon the times when the amount was extended, but the best calculation we can make is that the rate will be 1·73 per cent.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is the rate. The question I asked was the amount Britain would be paying in Canada and approximately the amount Britain would be paying in the United States. I understand the figures are respectively $40 million and $140 million a year, or a total of $180 million.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount payable to Canada is approximately $40 million a year. The exact figures are $39,778,750. To the United States the amount payable is about $140 million in U.S. currency. The exact amount is $140,021,200.

Mr. BRACKEN: An annual payment by Britain to both of $180 million?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

I think there are some other questions I have to answer. The next one was, the average rate of interest on our borrowings, the amount that we expect to be paying our own people. The average rate of interest on our outstanding debt is now 2·7 per cent. On our long-term bonds the yield to-day is only slightly over 2½ per cent. The rate for which the leader of the opposition is asking will depend on the average terms for which we borrow during the next three or four years. If we borrow a good deal of short-term money, or if the average term of our borrowing is, say, not over ten years, the differential between what we pay and what we receive will be very slight.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is, after 1951.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the average; the average was 1·73 over the whole period from now on, and the difference between what we receive from the United Kingdom, assuming there is no waiver, and what we pay, will be very slight under the conditions I mentioned; that is, if there is a fair amount of short-term borrowing or borrowing for periods of less than ten years.

Mr. BRACKEN: Is that as accurate as the minister would care to be?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think I can be any more accurate than that.

Mr. BRACKEN: I just want to be completely fair with our own people. This money will cost us more than we shall get for it from Britain, and I think it is due the people that they should know as nearly as possible what that contribution will be.

Mr. DORION: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ILSLEY: I think there are some other questions.

Mr. FRASER: The minister has not answered all the questions.

Mr. DORION: Yes, but the Chairman gave me the floor.

I would not have risen at this stage of the debate had my absence from the house last Friday not given rise to some misunderstanding. I was called to Quebec to appear before the superior court, and that is the reason why I could not be here. However, as I owe my constituents a clear and definite stand on so important a question I should like to say just a few words.

I must state first that if I had been here last Friday I would certainly have voted against the second reading of the bill. Since this measure was announced by the government, even before the beginning of this session, I have endeavoured to find some sound arguments in favour of this bill. Much has been said for and against the bill. I believe that the only true reason for the passing of this measure is found in the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Kootenay-

West and by the hon. member for Macleod. The hon. member for Kootenay-West. as reported at page 847 of Hansard, said:

> But I am rising to express support of the bill on the ground that we have a moral obligation to assist those who have suffered in the defence of democracy.

And the hon. member for Macleod said, as reported at page 848:

> The only reason remaining for the loan, as far as I can see, is from the moral aspect.

I believe those statements to be true. I believe that there is much more sentiment than anything else in this transaction, and I say that the government should not have once more tried to side-track the question by endeavouring to show the people that this loan was a good businesslike transaction when everybody knows that it is not so. If it were true that this loan will contribute to maintain our export trade, which is supposed to be vital to our country, one thing which is certain is that this transaction will cost the taxpayers of this country $37,500,000 a year. Furthermore, an arrangement was come to between the Canadian government and the French government which provides for a loan of $242 million with interest at three per cent. I cannot see any reason why the same principle should not apply to the present loan and that interest of at least three per cent should not be charged. We must also keep in mind the fact that the gift of $425 million forms part of our national debt, on which we have to pay three per cent interest, that is to say an amount of $12,750,000 a year. There is also the extension of the loan made in 1942 of $700 million, which, according to figures given by the Minister of Finance, has been reduced to $538 million, which costs us in annual interest $16,140,000. These three figures give a result of $66,390,000 which we are called upon to pay each year to be permitted to sell our products to the United Kingdom.

According to statistics, I understand that nearly one-half of this amount will be paid by those who have an income of less than $2,500 a year. I have in my hand a statement which was given by the government in answer to a question I put on the order paper. The question was, what amount was received by the government during the last five fiscal years from taxes on incomes of $2,500 a year or less; and the answer was—I take the year 1944—$308 million. I have here a handbook entitled "Canada, 1946", and I see at page 190 that the total tax on incomes for the year 1944 was $756 million. Therefore one must conclude that, of this $66,390,000 already mentioned, those who have an income of $2,500 a year or less will pay, as their share of this interest, about $30 million a year. I should like to quote from an article written by Mr. P.. M. Richards in Saturday Night of March 23, entitled, "The Cost of the British Loan". This is what he says:

> What it's going to cost us—if we dont produce a good deal more efficiently and abundantly than we ever have before—is a part of our "normal" standard of living. Because Britain is not in a position to pay cash for either goods or loan interest at the present time, Canada will pay about $30,000,000 a year in carrying charges on the loan until 1951 and about $12,000,000 a year thereafter the latter being the estimated difference between the two per cent Britain will then pay and the three per cent the loan is expected to cost Canada.
> This we may reasonably regard as being by no means an excessive price for the benefits in prospect—the maintenance of British economic health as well as the British market for our products. But, clearly, it does impose a new burden on us, particularly over the next five years when we ourselves will be feeling the strains of social-economic readjustment. We shall bear this burden, now added to all the other burdens (such as family allowances) we have taken upon ourselves, best if we recognize it for what it is and do not make the error of supposing that the cost of carrying it comes from anywhere but our own pockets.

Those are the reasons why I oppose the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to continue to answer the questions asked by the leader of the opposition. He wanted to know why different rates of interest were charged to different countries and on what principle those rates were fixed. Different rates of interest are charged to different countries under the Export Credits Insurance Act because of the different lengths of the various loans. Our policy is to base the rate on the rate payable by the Canadian government on loans for a period equal to the average period of the credit and to add a very slight margin to cover overhead costs of our borrowing. Of course, this British loan, for the reasons already given, is treated as a special case, and the interest rate has been determined on other grounds. But if the hon. gentleman will look at the rates of interest charged to other countries and the average length of loan to other countries, he will find that they are completely consistent and are based on the rate that the Canadian government pays for money it borrows here.

I have already answered the question as to why we thought it desirable to cancel the $425 million debt. The supplementary question was why we made any distinction between the $425 million debt and the balance of the $700 million 1942 loan. It is just a matter of adjustment. The question is how far a country ought to go. The $700 million loan was a settled matter covered by an agreement back in 1942 and being slowly but steadily liquidated as securities were sold in Canada; and we thought it desirable to allow that transaction to proceed just as it was doing. We did not begin to charge interest because it did not seem sensible to be asking for interest in the next five years when no interest was being charged on the main loan when capacity to pay was so slight. A similar loan was made in the United States which was not disturbed at the time the loan agreement was made. That is, this loan was secured by what was called a negative pledge of securities. The United States loan was secured by a positive pledge of securities, and that loan is being liquidated by disposition of securities there, while this loan is being liquidated by disposition of securities here. As they did not disturb their pre-existing transaction we did not disturb ours.

Mr. HACKETT: The United States loan bore interest?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: Ours did not?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BRACKEN: Two related questions and I am through. Can the minister say what the United States government wrote off in its lend-lease advances to Britain in its adjustment with Britain? The figure I have in mind is $25 billion.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be over $20 billion after reciprocal lend-lease is allowed for. It may be $25 billion, but it would be over $20 billion at any rate.

Mr. BRACKEN: I am glad to have that confirmation from the minister because in this country there is occasionally criticism of the United States for advancing only three and three-quarter billions to Britain at this time and for charging two per cent interest on it. Such criticism does not show a full appreciation of what the United States has so generously done in the past in its contribution through lend-lease. On other question: What undertaking or undestanding, if any, is asked of Britain with respect to future trade as a result of this loan to her at this time?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only provision is found in article V:

> The government of the United Kingdom and the government of Canada agree that in respect of (a) the operation of exchange controls and arrangements, and (b) quantitative import restrictions, each will grant to the residents and products of the other, treatment not less favourable than that provided for in any instrument of agreement with the government of any other country signed prior to the date of this agreement.

That brings into our agreement the undertakings given to the United States in their agreement, and if it would be of any interest I could put them on the record.

Mr. BRACKEN: All I was interested in was this, whether as a result of this loan to Britain Canada will be placed in any more favourable position with respect to future trade with Britain than we otherwise would have been.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, very much so, definitely. On can hardly talk about the Canadian loan apart from the United States loan, but I dealt with that in the speech I made. I put it as concisely as I could in the speech in which I introduced the resolution. The United States gets certain important stipulations. The most important is this provision for the convertibility of sterling within about a year or fifteen months, and non-discrimination in exchange arrangements and non-discrimination in quotas. These are the most important provisions. It may be said that we would have got these provisions whether we had entered into this loan or not, but we got certain others as a result of entering into the loan, and they are set out in the speech I made to the house.

Mr. PICARD: Before I go on with the remarks which I propose to make, I wish to note one of the arguments brought forward by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay against the measure. He says that we shall have to pay about $30 million a year in taxes if this goes through. Those who believe that the measure will enable Britain to get a better stabilization of the pound and allow us to exchange our credits in England to balance our debits in the United States, think it would be worth while even to pay the $30 million we might have to pay, because it is better to give part of what we shall earn than earn nothing and return to an era of scarcity, which would be the consequence if we lost our British markets. It reminds me of the men who before the war were penniless or unemployed. They received a high salary during the war and were called upon to pay a certain amount in income tax. Some complained bitterly, but others realized that it was better to give part of it than have nothing and be in the position they were before the war. Whether this measure will mean in the end a gift or a loan is quite immaterial. It is the purposes and the results that will count. In some ways it can be considered as a shot in the arm to invigorate Britain and stimulate her world trade, help her to take her place in the industrial life of the world. The purpose is to strengthen the pound and promote a healthy basis of exchange between the dollar area and the sterling area.

The reaction upon Canada is expected to be the balancing of our external trade, which is of vital importance to us. If the British pound becomes exchangeable for dollars we can cover our unfavourable United States balances by our surplus of British pounds; therefore the loan is a necessity to us more than it is to the United States which is granting $3,750 million. The argument has been used before, and I think it is well to repeat it, that we cannot compare the $3,750 million which is the United States share with their wealth on one hand and the $1,250 million and our wealth on the other hand. We should integrate this with the importance attached to our country's export trade. The United States are relying on export trade for between seven and ten per cent of their production, while Canada's economy is counting on an export trade of about fifty per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: About twenty per cent.

An hon. MEMBER: Forty-two per cent.

Mr. PICARD: If it is forty-two per cent, then I am not very far off. This loan will permit us to maintain a productive economy instead of a curtailment economy. To the people of my province as well as to the people of all Canada I sincerely believe it will mean a market for their agricultural products for a good many years to come. It will help to maintain decent prices for the fruits of their labour. Therefore I cannot do other than support the measure even though there are aspects to it which may not be all that we may hope for. I believe this is a necessity. We cannot afford not to make the loan unless we consider the possibilities that remain open to us. As I said a moment ago, unless we grant the loan we shall have a scarcity era, which means that we can produce only for ourselves and our small market outside Britain, or we must take a chance now on building a different type of external trade in the years after the war by diversifying our clients. If we do that, we might dispose during a few years of all our surpluses and keep the wheels of industry turning by accepting the trade of certain other countries that are clamouring for our goods to-day and are able to pay for them in a way that would enable us to equilibrate our trade deficit with the United States. Can we take that chance of establishing long-term contracts with such countries and maintain enough of these markets afterwards to replace the loss of the British market? Although I personally think it would be a much saner position for Canada to put herself in, to have a much more diversified external trade, I cannot authoritatively say that it can be easily done.

Our position at present is such a false one in a way that we should try to enlarge considerably our world markets on long-term contracts or by treaties so as not to be permanently in the ridiculous, I might say unsanitary, condition of depending on one client. Any store depending for its success on one client is doomed to failure because it is at the mercy of that client and must accept his terms. That is the position we are in now because of our trade policies, which were to a certain extent unavoidable at one time. Had we not had the British market we might not have had the onward advance of our Canadian economy. But is it a sanitary condition to be in permanently? I do not think so. I have not given enough study to the possibilities of our building a peace-time market among a number of clients to share with Britain our surplus production in order that we may not be entirely dependent upon one client, to give a definite opinion on the matter. I imagine, however, that the position can be greatly improved. However, it may be that in normal times many of the countries willing to trade with us now may be self- sufficient in most of our sources of export. England has a population of nearly forty-eight millions and cannot feed probably more than ten millions. We have an outright market there. The fact that we have only one client remains unsanitary. But how can we replace that market? Can we find another market for the products that compose our exports? How can we find any place to replace that market? I think we should endeavour to find new markets. Our department of external trade should endeavour to find new markets. However, I believe it would be dangerous to rely on that at the moment unless we have financial arrangements or engagements with these countries over a long period to come. It would be unwise to turn down the British loan which is our hope—and I sincerely believe it—of balancing our external trade under the same method as we did before the war.

I am sure that, concurrently with maintaining our British market which calls mainly for food products, we should have a more aggressive trade policy with countries that are apt to maintain their payments to us in goods and services or in notes exchangeable on the United States market. Therefore we should meet the present emergency by the loan and try to correct our false position by extending and diversifying our foreign markets. Our industrial production should compete with that of the United States and the United Kingdom in many countries with which we have an interest to trade.

Let us not have a back-seat to the United Kingdom and the United States in a search for new markets. We have done enough in the last war to deserve to be given now a share of the world markets in order to be able to maintain employment and production at a high peak, but we must go and search for them.

We are in a favoured position compared with formerly industrialized countries like Germany. Let us make the best of it while we can. Another aspect of the British loan is that it is intended to try to restore Britain to its former position in world trade. There are two sentimental reasons to this question. Probably there are other reasons that may be invoked. There are two sentimental reasons for Canada giving this loan. British solidarity appeals to the sympathy of some people because of the sacrifices made in England during the war. I do not think that is a reason sufficient to warrant the loan. We should think of our own interest. Our own interests are enough to warrant it, but I think this is a reason that can be considered. It does enter into the minds of many who support it. I shall not undertake to describe to the committee the conditions I saw when I was over there. I admit I was greatly impressed by what the British people suffered during the war, the ordeal that they have gone through. I saw something of the destruction that has taken place. I learnt something of the sacrifices they made and are still making. That is certainly in the minds of many Canadians at the moment, as probably it was in the minds of those who had to consider this matter. Regardless of how great that sacrifice may have been, I do not think that would be sufficient reason for us to endanger our own economy; but it is a reason that exists just the same.

There is also the necessity of helping Britain to maintain on the continent of Europe the prestige of a democratic nation. I do not want to enter upon a speech on the necessity of counterbalancing the nefarious influences of totalitarian states; far from it. Yet, if we want to show the people of Europe in a certain way that our system of government is good we must make sure that the one country in Europe with a democratic government which stood throughout the war can yet regain its place in international trade, and can still be of great support and great help to many nations on the continent. Mind you, Mr. Chairman, ninety per cent of the population of Europe are underfed or starving. All these people are subjected to subversive propaganda of one sort or another. The only help they can look for is from Britain, the United States and ourselves. We can help in only a small way, but it is worth while to try because it is my personal belief that you cannot fight the propaganda which is being spread among those people who have nothing to eat just with nice words and empty hands. I believe we have to give them something; we have to give them confidence, and start them on their way to trade. I think Britain, with the help the United States and Canada are giving, is bound to regain, to at least some extent, the position she occupied before the last war in connection with trade on the continent of Europe.

One argument brought forward by sympathizers with Britain, in favour of the measure, is that it will certainly help Britain to regain her lost supremacy in world trade. Personally I think this is an illusion. Britain gained her industrial supremacy during the eighteenth century, when the invention of the steam engine gave her a chance to use her vast coal resources. Britain thus got an advance as well as an advantage over other nations. With the advent of electrical power and the needs of modern industry for oil, Britain had lost her industrial lead before the first great war. She remained the money market of the world up to the beginning of the second war, but the drain on her financial resources has been such as to change Britain from a creditor to a debtor nation. She came out of the war with a debit balance, we are told, of $13,000 million; not counting the $3,000 million of Canadian aid and the $29,000 million of United States lend-lease. Is it possible that these present advances of $5,000 million can permit her, as we hope, to regain her balance and get on the way to recovery? I sincerely hope so, but without being a prophet of doom I think it will be just a shot in the arm. I may be wrong; I hope I am, but even after having reached that conclusion it is not sufficient to deter me from supporting the bill, because I think we must take the chance that it will have the expected result. That is my first reason for supporting the bill.

In the second place, no matter how wrong I think it is to depend upon one client, I think we must face the facts as they are and must help Britain stabilize the pound sterling in order that we may equilibrate our world trade balances by using, to pay for our excess imports from the United States, the payments received for our excess exports to Britain.

In the third place I think it is better to lose the yearly interest on our money for five years and then the difference between the borrowing rate and the rate paid by Britain, than to reduce our industrial activities and curtail our production. It is better to have ahead of us what I might call a period of artificial prosperity than a period of depression; and even if this should prove to be a gift, as some people have said, because of the possibility of Britain's inability to meet her obligations, I think it is better for our economy in the next few years to go ahead with the measure just the same. I repeat, however, that it is high time we considered means to restore to Canada saner methods of external trade than that of the one client system. We should now gain new markets for our industrial production. In the past we have been exporters of raw materials and wheat. During the war we became a highly industrialized country, turning out ships, planes, tanks and heavy equipment. Let us carry our industrial recovery into the peace era and better equilibrate our external trade by seizing new markets for our industrial products. It is imperative that we do so unless we want our industrial and economic fate to be tied indefinitely to that of Britain. Canada is a young nation. She must look ahead for new fields to conquer. Let us not be limited by sentimentalism or a false method of world trade.

I am far from being enthusiastic about burdening the Canadian people with more charges, and I would not consider sentimental reasons only as sufficient to warrant this measure. It is not with pleasure that I see this provision for the cancellation of the British debt to our country, which is estimated in the present bill at $425 million. But if we consider the aim and purpose desirable; if we consider that it is imperative for the benefit of our Canadian economy to see Britain resuming her capacity to trade with the world, and if we consider it desirable to strengthen and support her currency in relation to the United States dollar, then we have no recourse but to cancel the debt, and I think the minister made the point quite clear a moment ago.

In short, I think in our present position we cannot act differently from the United States at the present time, and we must try to help British recovery, not only or not even because she deserves it on account of her contribution to the freedom of the world, but because in our present position a measure of British recovery is an economic necessity for the welfare of our own country.

[Mr. Picard.]

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman with your permission I should like to read one of the numerous protests I have received from our young people against the bill now under consideration:

Val D'Or Junior Board of Trade
April 15, 1946.

Mr. Ligouri Lacombe, M.P.,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—

We are enclosing herewith copy of a protest which our organization feels bound to submit in good faith, for the public weal and in the best interests of our country.

We hope that it may be possible for you to use it, thereby proving that the young people of this country can still find the time to deal with matters that directly concern them.

Trusting that you will kindly let us know your personal views on the matter, we remain,

Yours truly,
The Val D'Or Junior Board of Trade,
By Camille Deschênes,
Secretary

Here is the text of the resolution:

Copy of a resolution unanimously agreed to by the Val D'Or Junior Board of Trade, at its monthly meeting held on April 12:

Whereas the dominion government intends to lend to England a further sum, which in our opinion is enormous;

Whereas this loan will be at a rate of 2 per cent . . .

After 1951.

. . . while the dominion will have to borrow money at a rate not lower than 3 per cent in order to make that loan;

Whereas the country to which we lend money is itself making loans to other countries at a rate much higher than the one at which we would extend that loan;

Whereas it is recognized that by that loan England in no way undertakes to spend the money in our country;

Whereas the exchange is against us every time we borrow funds outside this country;

Whereas that loan is extended under conditions that are very little to the advantage of our country, as is being shown by some newspapers, which have been seriously discussing the matter during the last few days;

Whereas that loan will be extended at the expense of Canadian taxpayers;

Whereas the country to which we shall make that loan available has already decided to eliminate or considerably reduce the income tax, and to lighten materially the burden which the people in the lower salary brackets have to bear;

Whereas our government meanwhile takes no efficient action with a view to lightening our immediate burden;

Whereas the young people of this country are the ones who sooner or later will have to bear the burden of all such loans;

Whereas small wage-earners already consider themselves too heavily taxed;

Be it therefore resolved unanimously that our board should ask the authorities of this country and the members who will discuss the proposal not to pledge our financial resources unduly in a loan that would mortgage our future far too much.

An hon. MEMBER: Thank you.

Mr. RINFRET: Have they read the bill?

Mr. LACOMBE: It is all very well to claim that this loan will increase employment and stimulate industry in Canada. By whom has this statement been substantiated? Experience has taught us that nations, whichever they may be, are interested in one another only in so far as it serves their own interests. Self-interest is the motive behind the actions of individuals and peoples. This state of mind has existed since the beginning of time, and will ever remain the primary motive of any actions. It scorns conventions and statistics. The self-interest of individuals or nations overshadows the object of a loan. The purposes of a loan, its very object vanish before the interest of an individual or a nation because nothing will stop them if they think that that loan is going to prove a sound business proposition.

The principle of a free loan is wrong in itself, and more so when it is combined with an outright gift of $425,000,000 to England. It is a ridiculous policy, an essentially colonial policy. Some may be pleased thereby; it is their right. Self-interest is the motive behind all actions. One seizes an opportunity when it offers. Why worry? Let us help ourselves; it is the people who will foot the bill. Such seems to be the thought which gave rise to this bill, as shown by section 7 of the agreement which reads as follows:

> The government of Canada agrees to cancel the amount owing by the government of the United Kingdom to the government of Canada with respect to the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan, which amount the two governments agree is $425,000,000.

Why this agreement? The amount is or is not $425,000,000. This is a further compromise.

In another part of the bill, reference is made to the multilateral trade of the United Kingdom. Why not call a spade a spade? Have we got anything to hide? This multilateral trade of England which we are called upon to boost at the tune of $1,250,000,000 is what I would call financial imperialism. How costly it is for us! Canada is indeed an inexhaustible milch-cow. The British colossus owns one-fifth of the total area of the world. I do not know why fatality drags us into every military and financial venture of the United Kingdom. Just take cognizance of this surrender of a so-called sovereign state, as recorded in section 3 of the bill:

> For the purpose of carrying out the obligation of the government of Canada under article one of the said agreement, the Minister of Finance, out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund, may, from time to time, prior to the thirty-first day of December, nineteen hundred and fifty-one, pay to or pursuant to the order of the government of the United Kingdom at its request amounts not exceeding in the aggregate one thousand two hundred and fifty million dollars ($1,250,000,000).

And, finally, section 5:

> The indebtedness of the government of the United Kingdom to the government of Canada with respect to the British commonwealth air training plan, as agreed upon in article seven of the said agreement, is extinguished and the Minister of Finance may take such action as may be necessary to write off in the public accounts of Canada the indebtedness so extinguished.

If this is not unadulterated colonialism, words must have lost their meaning. What has become of the statute of Westminster, this electioneering hoax? What about our constitutional evolution? By this financial agreement, the government is surrendering Canada in a strait-jacket to the United Kingdom authorities. At one stroke, they mortgage our national economy for over two thousand million dollars, if all the clauses of the agreement are taken into account. They make lavish gifts to the mother country, because they refuse to consider Canada as a major nation. This constitutes a set-back of over a hundred years in the evolution of our prerogatives. Do you not hear the sighs of relief from our contented imperialists and colonials at the realization that this loan will go through? Just imagine Canada, the child, makes its small annual gift to its mother. How unworthy of a sovereign nation all this seems! We must revert to the time before the Union to find a similar surrender of our prerogatives. Never have Lafontaine and Baldwin, Macdonald and Cartier, Laurier or Borden so bound Canada's future or so shamelessly flouted our sovereignty. The foundations laid by those statesmen are now crumbling under the weight of the commitments of a government which, since 1939, has increased the national debt by more than twenty billions. While young men by the thousands go begging for employment, the Government is handling out gifts at their expense. I know of veterans who are homeless and jobless through the very fault of a government which refuses to launch large-scale programmes of public works. Thousands upon thousands of those veterans are vainly seeking jobs worthy of the secrifices they made. But what is the Government doing to help them out? It gives and loans to others the funds required for their civil re-establishment. But, you will say, the United Kingdom will be a customer for our goods. You make me laugh. England will buy where she wishes and to suit her own convenience. Just read section three of the agreement. She is the one in command here.

Mr. LANGLOIS: It is section two.

Mr. LACOMBE: The original document of our constitution is in London. In fact, when the federal government, some years ago, wished to take the Alberta legislation to the supreme court, and had to produce a copy at the court's own request, they had to go to 10 Downing street to make a copy of the original document.

I remember the good constitutional joke of 1926 about Lord Byng's alleged interference. I was then a member of the House of Commons. Memory brings back this tempest in a tea-pot. Elections had to be won. If the constitutional joke had not existed then, it would have been made up. Then came the statute of Westminster, a pretty bubble which has pricked the fancy of many public men since 1931. This mock golden age has started Canada on the way back to colonialism. The government has sanctioned this climb-down by authorizing this new tribute of the colony to the mother country. If there is a vote, I shall oppose this financial agreement by voting against it, as a protest against any infringement of our sovereignty.

During the debate on the address, I explained my stand on this loan of $1,250 millions to England. I would have refrained from taking part in the debate, had not some hon. members, particularly the amazing member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde), credited me with feelings and designs I have never held. The hon. member should gain neither dignity nor prestige from such unfounded assumptions. I have preceded my hon. friend in the house by a decade. Never have I, directly or indirectly, allowed discussions to sink to the level of race quarrels. When the hon. member, without any reason or justification, launched an attack against nationalist and dissident or independent Liberal members, on April 12, he made statements he knew to be false. If he is a man of honour, as I still believe him to be, he will withdraw the following words spoken in the house on April 12, 1946. I quote the statement of the hon. member for Labelle—

Mr. LANGLOIS: Fortunately he is not here.

Mr. LACOMBE:—as reported on page 812 of Hansard of April 12, 1946. My hon. friend says that fortunately the party concerned is not here! The absent are always in the wrong.

Mr. LANGLOIS: You were not present when he spoke.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Mr. LACOMBE: I was absent Friday; might is right, but I will not allow myself to be fleeced. I quote the hon. member for Labelle:

I noticed that most of those who are against the proposal—I say most of them, because there are noteworthy exceptions—base their argument on a matter of sentiment and revive, in support of their claims, old race squabbles. The government have announced their intention of lending nearly 250 million dollars to France. Have any protests been voiced by nationalists? Not to my knowledge. They have kept silent because they have no other protests to advance about the loan to England than arguments based on race squabbles. This is clearly evidenced by a letter I have received from a Social Credit supporter, and from which I wish to quote some significant excerpts:

This is still the hon. member for Labelle speaking.

March 28, 1946.

You will note, Mr. Chairman, that he did not read the whole letter, but only the main extracts.

Mr. Maurice Lalonde, M.P., for Labelle.
Sir,

I have read the statement you have made about the Social Credit in the province of Quebec. I believe that your are not well informed on this country's economic problems.

Alberta is in favour of the loan to England because the majority in that province is of English descent. Here in the province of Quebec, the people oppose the loan because the majority is French.

J. B. Bureau,
37 St. Bernard Street,
St. Malo, Que.

According to the rules of the house, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) should produce that letter and table it instead of merely quoting the main passages, in all justice to the writer, to himself and to us. The hon. member went on:

I am giving that for the prime consideration of hon. members across the way.

This individual unknowingly puts in concrete form the opinions of nationalists and dissenting Liberals, whose good faith and intent I respect.

He hugs them the better to smother them.

However, protests always have and always will come from a noisy minority which does not speak for the majority, in my province. The last federal elections have amply proven that the majority of my fellow-citizens can distinguish between constructive Liberal policies and a demagogic and impassioned appeal by a group of Quebec nationalists.

I do not fear to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have always supported constructive policies.

The hon. members for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) and Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) remember their experience of June last, when, after having been elected as Liberals for many years by large majorities, they only succeeded in retaining their seats by very small margins.

That statement contains two untruths. In the first place I have been elected not by a small margin, but with a majority of 300.

In the second place, I have been elected not as a Liberal candidate, but despite the opposition of the Liberal party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: As the leader of the Canadian party.

Mr. LACOMBE: The hon. member for Labelle was himself elected in 1935 despite the opposition of the Liberal party. I remember quite well that the hon. the Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, had then sent a letter to the electors of the constituency of Labelle, asking them to elect Mr. Henri Bourassa as their representative, when the hon. member for Labelle was running against him.

Does my hon. friend want me to remind him that his leader, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not barely escape defeat, but actually suffered it in his own constituency of Prince Albert. The hon. member for Labelle always renders such valuable services to his party and the government that he places the right hon. the Prime Minister in an exceedingly awkward and humiliating position.

For my part, I oppose this loan and this financial agreement, because our economic condition forbids us such generosity. I shall not repeat all the arguments I expounded to the house in opposing this loan in the debate on the address. However, certain hon. members, only a very few indeed, feeling as the representative from Labelle, have for too long a time tortured our texts, misrepresented the facts and our true attitude in this house. It is about time that things be put to right.

Only his boldness allows my hon. friend to compare the loan granted to France at 3 per cent interest to the interest-free loan offered England. I certainly commend the loan to France, amounting to slightly more than two hundred million dollars. I would likewise have supported a 1,250 million dollar loan to England had the government only demanded a reasonable rate of interest. Let us at least keep the sense of proportions and the proper appreciation of facts. We want to see all countries that have been weakened by the war recover from that disaster. However, we are strongly opposed to bleeding the Canadian taxpayer white so as to allow England or any other country, for that matter, to lower taxes at a time when our fellow-citizens are carrying on under a heavy burden of taxes of every kind.

(Text):

Mr. MacINNIS: I hesitate to take part in this debate, but I have been so appalled at the lack of understanding of world affairs on the part of some who have opposed this loan that I thought I should say something.

We should approach consideration of this loan having in mind what happened to ourselves and others during the years of the war, the purposes for which the war was fought, and how we are to achieve those purposes. In my opinion, this loan is a step in achieving the purposes for which we fought the war. I am not supporting the loan because Britain is the borrower. I have favoured and have given my support to the various loans and credits which have been made by this government during the past few years. I am not supporting the loan on the ground that we have a moral obligation to help the people of Britain. I am supporting it, as I have said, because I believe that it is a part of the process of building the new world for which we fought the war.

We were together in the war. I have heard it stated in this house that we were in the war to help Britain. I have always objected to that because I felt that the war was Canada's war as well as Britain's. Canada had as much at stake as Britain had. Fascism was as much a danger to Canada as it was to Britain. Consequently we were in the war because the factors associated with the war were such that we could not be true to ourselves and keep out of it.

The Minister of Finance pointed out, I believe this afternoon, that Britain came out of this war much poorer than she went into it. I have before me the monthly letter of the Canadian Bank of Commerce for February, and I note there the statement that Britain lost about $30,000 million of her national wealth during the war. As the minister said, Canada has come out of the war richer than she went into it; at least our real and potential capacity for the production of wealth is somewhat greater than it was when the war began. This is not only indicated but proven by our war production. So that I think we should be glad that we have this opportunity of helping an ally and of restoring peace in the world. If the loan did not have any other purpose than that, even if we felt that the amount could never be repaid, if it can accomplish something for the building of a peaceful world the loan is worth while.

It seems to me that those who oppose the loan must fundamentally oppose it for at least two or three reasons: First, that Britain does not need it, that she is what might be called panhandling in asking for the loan at all. I do not think anybody in his senses would believe that.

A second reason may be that they believe that Britain can survive and continue to play the part in world affairs that she is playing to-day without any economic or financial assistance from us. I do not think she can.

There may be another reason. The opponents of the loan may consider that it does not matter whether Britain can survive as a great power or not. I am convinced that no greater calamity could befall this world to-day than that Britain should fall from the position she now holds. In my opinion, she holds a key position, and if she is not able to maintain that position the possibility of an enduring world peace is, by that very fact, so much the less. It is because I feel that for Great Britain not to be able to hold the position she is now in would be a loss to Canada as well as to the world that I am in favour of this loan. I favour it not only because it is a good business proposition; I am quite willing to leave that part of it to the Minister of Finance; I favour it because it is as much our duty to help to build the peace as it was our duty to help to fight the war. In my opinion, that is the way in which we must approach this bill.

I was amazed to hear, I think it was on Thursday last, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres say that Canada could go it alone.

Mr. MacNICOL: He would not understand a thing like that.

Mr. MacINNIS: I believe I met the hon. member for the first time in 1928. I had known him by repute a long time before that; and I have always heard him spoken of as an astute politician. I know that the word "politician" sometimes has an unsavoury connotation, but as one politician to another I do not mean anything sinister when I use it. The hon. member, however, did make this statement:

> I am not afraid of the future of my country, even if my country is left alone. Even if my country is left between the sterling bloc and the United States I have enough confidence in Canada to feel that Canada is capable of coming through her difficulties and achieving a prominent place among the important nations of the world, even though she is not assisted by the one side or the other.

That, I maintain, is not quite the position to-day. I maintain that there are only two countries in the world to-day that perhaps can stand alone. One is the United States and the other is the U.S.S.R., and God forbid that we should come to the day when either of these nations will say that they are going to "go it alone." That is the reason why we should support everything that will help to restore the economy of the world and keep the world as a whole so that we can carry on as one world.

We could, I suppose, impoverish ourselves as a country by being over-generous in giving away our wealth, but here again I am not afraid of that as long as the present Minister of Finance is head of that department. I doubt, however, if there is any danger whatsoever there. Great Britain will buy from us with this loan goods and services, or perhaps primarily goods. These will come out of the soil, out of the forests, out of the mines, out of the waters of our country, and out of the labour of our people. If we are careful, if we know how to conserve these things, we can, with the exception of our mineral wealth, restore to the soil and the sea the wealth we take out, and the country can be kept productive. That is the way nature operates. But if we lose this opportunity that we now have to help to build an orderly world it may be a long time before we have that opportunity again.

Let us not try to live in the past; let us not even attempt to return to the years before 1939. The world has altogether changed in the last six years. We are living in a new world in which I am quite satisfied very few nations can stand alone. Let us support this loan. As has been said, it is a good business proposition; but it is also an opportunity for Canada and Canadians to give of our riches, which were maintained intact when other nations suffered grievously, and which were, moreover, enhanced. Let us do that, and we can do it without impoverishing our country but, instead, greatly benefit ourselves and help others on to a better world.

(Translation):

Mr. MARQUIS: The question before the committee gives rise to different opinions. I wish to say at once that several hon. members do agree on some facts and reasons brought forward in the House. The difference is mainly one of conclusions. I do not in the least agree with the hon. member for Laval Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) who claims that the stand taken by more than two hundred members is ridiculous because they do not happen to think as he does. As far as I am concerned, I respect his opinion and that of those who spoke on this measure. This matter is sufficiently controversial to allow expression of various opinions. Like earnest, sincere and enlightened men, we must come to a conclusion, after serious consideration.

If I rise to-night to take part in this debate, it is because I would consider myself remiss in my duty if I refrained from expressing my views on so vital an issue. Certain reasons have been brought forward against this loan. For my part, I must admit, at the outset, that I have not been, at first, favourably impressed. However impressions always proceed from feelings. I have had to look into every aspect of the problem and to trace information back to its source. If I come to the conclusion that I must approve this loan, it is because, in all conscience, I believe it in the best interest of the Canadian nation and not of the British Empire; it is because after laying aside my personal feelings and having considered only the immediate and remote future of my country I deemed it proper to endorse this measure.

It is as useless to stir up passions against the loan in any part of our province as it is to appeal to prejudice in other parts of the country in its favour. We must judge it on its merits.

I wish to commend all the speakers who have discussed the matter from an objective point of view, and all newspapermen who have dealt with it as a business proposition based on figures, whether they approved of it or not.

It seems to me that we should consider this important problem in the light of the extraordinary conditions of the post-war period. We should not view it from a provincial angle or from the standpoint of a close economy, but in relation to existing world conditions. There is no use repeating, Mr. Chairman, that part of Europe, and part of the Orient now lie destroyed and in ruins; that millions of soldiers and civilians have fallen victims of murderous gunfire; there is no point in recalling that the natural resources of those countries were damaged as were also their lands, their oil wells, their coal mines which cannot now be put into production because all such property has been utterly destroyed by repeated bombardments. Need we mention too that these countries' production and economy have been completely disrupted? Need we add that business is at a standstill?

More than ever, we are now living in "one world" and when part of the world trade is paralysed, the effects of this stoppage are bound to be felt here indirectly; we are bound to feel them ourselves and our business will feel the consequences. Am I wrong in thinking so? I don't believe I am. Such is the opinion of many enlightened economists and such the teachings of past experience.

Fortunately, under such conditions, our country is perhaps in a better position than others. Our farms and factories are producing mightily. Production has increased and we have good reasons to think that, in the current year, it will remain at a very high level. Agriculture has taken a special impetus. Canada is to-day the storehouse of part of this famished world, the storehouse of part of devastated countries. It was ordained by the Almighty that Canada, which escaped bombings and destruction should occupy a strategic position in the western hemisphere, so that she could help in the recovery of overseas countries. I am considering that matter from that sole standpoint, and that is the only position that we Canadians can take.

Our objective is to maintain our production, to ensure continuous employment in this country and to guarantee to our farmers a substantial income as well as a high standard from the moral, religious, physical and economic standpoints. That is our objective; therein lies our ideal.

If we remain confined within our own borders, if we refuse to trade with other nations, I sincerely fear that Canada, instead of forging ahead will undergo a decline and that the countless efforts we put forth during the recent war will be of no avail whatever.

Mr. Chairman, should we not ask ourselves whether in refusing to support an agreement like this which was first concluded between the United States and the United Kingdom, if by refusing to ratify that agreement, we would not jeopardize our commercial and economic relations with our powerful neighbour. We are now facing a risk involving some 30 million dollars per year for five years and approximately 10 million dollars yearly for fifty additional years. But if we were deprived of economic relations with our neighbours, the United States, we would stand to lose much more than 30 millions for five years and ten millions for the remaining years; indeed we might be affected in our economic relations to the extent of billions within a few years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Mr. MARQUIS: We are told that the interest rate has been set at 2 per cent, while it could have been set at 3 per cent. I quite realize, like all the other hon. members, that this interest rate has not been set by Canada. This rate was arrived at by the two nations who concluded the first agreement, which provided that in the event that we refused the same interest rate no agreement could be entered into. Is it necessary to add that the United States has agreed to make that loan even though they were not very interested in the agreement? They agreed to make that loan and they have accepted that interest rate believing that it was the only way to re-establishing international trade. I would not be prepared to accept the responsibility of sabotaging the agreement concluded between the governments of the United States and of Great Britain, and thus cause an economic upheaval which might be much more detrimental to us than the agreement now under consideration.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I have for Great Britain and the United Kingdom that sympathy which we feel for another country with which we deal on an equal footing, and nothing more. I do not agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) when he claims that this agreement is practically valueless but that morally we must assume this obligation; but I agree with the government when they say that it is a matter of national interest, a purely Canadian matter. I may be mistaken, but I take the facts as I see them; however I respect the views of others and I ask those who rise to speak in this house to respect the views of all hon. members, especially when those views are based on sound reasons.

It has been stated over and over again that the British market is our most important outlet. We have made heavy sacrifices to develop this market and it is the only large outlet which will be able to absorb our surplus production of the next few years.

I understand quite well that France and other countries need some of our products. I feel that we must ship some of our products to other countries but that we cannot and must not send them solely to those other countries. In fact, within a few years, France will be producing enough foodstuffs to be self-sufficient in that respect. The same may be said of Belgium. Then, Mr. Chairman, what will happen to us, in Canada, if we have no export markets for our surplus goods?

During the transition period, we must create good outlets in other countries if we are to distribute our surplus production to the four corners of the earth. But, for the present, we must not drop the substance for the shadow, because a bird in the hand is better than two in the bush.

The United Kingdom can feed but a quarter of its population; and it is from Canada that that country buys the greatest quantities of foodstuffs and which will always find a steady market there.

Were France to enjoy the same advantages, as the beneficiary of this loan rather than the United Kingdom, I wonder if the same arguments would prevail in certain quarters.

Mr. HAMEL: Surely.

[Mr. Marquis]

Mr. MARQUIS: To draw a fair and just conclusion, it is our duty to consider the problem as if France were involved rather than the United Kingdom. Such is my attitude Mr. Chairman, and I think it is logical.

This year, we shall export to the United Kingdom $764,000,000 worth of goods, while our exports to other sterling countries will amount to $255,000,000. A moment ago, I heard the hon. member for Laval-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Lacombe) say: "But we are going to pay $30,000,000 this year". Maybe so, and then, maybe not. I shall come to that later on. I must say, however, that if all this costs us $30,000,000 this year and if we vote to send one billion dollars worth of goods to the United Kingdom and the other sterling countries, we must take into account the profit to be made on that billion. We shall make a profit of at least $300,000,000 and the farmer will be the chief beneficiary, because that revenue will be produced by his work; consequently, his profits will be a net. If he does not sell his goods, he will lose them. I understand that, between a payment of $30,000,000 we shall have to make and the profit of $300,000,000 that will accrue to us, there is a surplus of $270,000,000 which calls for thought and the realization that the stakes are worth going after.

I also support this measure because I believe we must endeavour to maintain our exports at a high level and develop our international trade. We are now going through the most difficult period. War has swept over the world, leaving a trail of destruction, woe and ruins everywhere. Canada is a prosperous country, having a good income, a thriving agricultural set-up, factories to be converted from a war-time to a peacetime footing. Our country needs trade expansion, and it has the duty of contributing to the re-establishment of this hemisphere's economic life and the right to work for the restoration of Christianity and freedom in the world. If we get a billion dollars, if, through our sales of goods we put this amount in circulation to encourage production in our factories—we shall be promoting employment and fighting unemployment, at the same time. We will help to keep our young men on the farm and to set up veterans in the same calling so as to further the development of agriculture.

As I represent a farming community, to my mind the agricultural viewpoint matters more than any other. We must remember that agriculture is the cornerstone of our national economy. Nowadays, farmers enjoy profitable prices which accounts for an almost 50 per cent increase in farm production and they must therefore find outlets for the marketing of their goods. Many are now welcoming back from overseas their sons who will contribute to the expansion of our national heritage in the field of agriculture. Thus, in spite of the apparent drawbacks apparently involved in the plan, I believe that in the final analysis, setting aside any electioneering prejudices and considering the interest of our country, we are in duty bound to approve the bill now before the house.

May I be allowed a further remark, Mr. Chairman, in the matter of national income and taxation? We are told in certain quarters: "If you're going to make a loan, how can you cut down taxes?" My reply to this, sir, is that, if national income is reduced fifty per cent, how can taxes be cut down? Unless our national income remains at the present level, namely 8 or 10 billions, and unless we keep on exporting at the rate of about 3 billions a year how can we raise the money required to meet government commitments and reduce the taxpayers' burden? I shall not attempt to argue, paradoxically, that the more we lend, the more we shall borrow, the more we spend, the more we shall cut down taxes. No, it is my belief that, because of peculiarly post-war conditions, because of conditions which compel us to step up industrial production and keep agricultural production at a very high level, we must develop our world trade as much as is practicable to preserve the national prestige so dearly bought during the last war at the price of so much effort and money.

To-day, there is no other solution for expanding our trade and securing a market for our goods. This is one more reason for approving the plan. I do not claim, Mr. Chairman, that we will consolidate our position by perpetually granting money and advances and by launching a loan program reaching into astronomical figures. We are told of our wartime contribution, but the cost of the war is a different matter. I cannot discuss the attitude of those who felt it necessary to take such a part in the last war. The allied nations the world over agreed to put all their strength, their funds and efforts in order to ensure the defeat of nazism and barbarism. Now, all that pertains to the war, all the expenses incurred to conquer the enemy no longer stand for capital; we are left as an aftermath of the war with nothing but a promise of survival and of safeguarding our freedom.

Mr. Chairman, thanks to our past expenditures, we have the right to carry our heads high, to face the world squarely and not to be considered as anything but slaves. I do not think we take into account those former expenses, which are totally different from the disbursements now proposed. Those expenses resulted from the war. We had to choose between slavery and freedom, between Christianity and atheism. We fought for Christianity, we fought for freedom. The cost was enormous, even fabulous, but it was the burden of war.

And now, Mr. Chairman, we have no other duty, no other aim but to go through life with our debts, our burden, our difficulties. It is our duty to face our responsibilities, as it is our duty to expand our trade, develop our agriculture, ward off unemployment, fight and work to restore our economy in the years ahead. If there are drawbacks to this measure, there are also certain advantages. We, Canadians, cannot avoid the unfortunate and terrible consequences of war. After the trials we went through with the rest of the world, we cannot say that it is all over, that we wish to go on our own and resume our advance towards progress as if we had never had a war. We must carry our share of the burden. Since world economy is completely upset and practically on the rocks, how could we expect to get a share in the benefits that could be derived from it, without contributing sacrifices and money, such is the situation. If I were to take stock of certain facts and opinions expounded by those in a small group around me, I might think that this transaction is bad; but we take the longer view, if we cast a glance on the future of Canada, and particularly the necessity for us, at the present time, of trading with the whole world, no one in this house could believe for a moment that our country may now remain aloof while a powerful nation like the United States has found it impossible to resort to isolationism. To-day, the interdependency of nations is a well-recognized fact.

There is another question we must ask ourselves. Were this measure to be set aside by the house, were we to sabotage the Anglo-American agreement, what would be the result? If the United States who have laboured for a period of two months toward the implementation of a plan for restoring the economy of the western hemisphere, if the United States thought that we did not want to make an efficient contribution to the re-establishment of the world economy, do you not think that this would not entail for this country the loss of a trade involving an amount ten or twenty times larger than the amount ventured in this measure? The interest of 3 per cent, as an honourable member said a few moments ago, might cost us a sum of about 30 million dollars during five years and 10 million dollars during the fifty additional years. This represents $3 per capita during five years and 75 cents later on. But this calculation serves only as a basis of my argument, taking for granted that we are going to make up the difference ourselves.

Before I resume my seat, Mr. Chairman, may I make a suggestion which might soothe the conscience of many and also throw a ray of hope and gladden the hearts. If it should be possible for the government to obtain that money from the banking or credit institutions at the rate of interest provided for in the agreement, I think it would be a splendid arrangement and that such an operation would be welcome by all. I would not think, Mr. Chairman, of opposing the views of people more experienced than I am, who do not share my opinion. The fact is that every one of us is free to express his own point of view. It is impossible for me to discuss every aspect of this question but I have endeavoured to indicate briefly a few points.

After the recent war we must all help in the economic restoration not only of Canada but of the whole world. Canada has waged war in all parts of the world and must trade with all parts of the world. We have invested tremendous amounts of money in war, I am now prepared to support the investment of a much smaller amount to ensure our country's continued freedom and happiness and to safeguard its opportunities and future prosperity.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 inclusive agreed to on division.

On section 4—Continuation of interest-free provision of act of 1942.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 4 carry?

Mr. POULIOT: No. I want an answer to my questions. The minister answered only one of them. Besides that, I want the story of our transactions with Great Britain. I want to know what has been given by Canada to Great Britain and what has been given in return by Great Britain to Canada, during the war.

If it is a question of business, then let us have the information. The minister has said that he took some notes while I was speaking. I thank him for that. He has those notes, but he has answered partly only one of my questions, when I had asked many of them. They were serious questions. The leader of the C.C.F. party has acknowledged them, although he does not share my views. We are not going to railroad this piece of legislation through to-night; and if there is only one member who will oppose it, I will. And I am not going to receive any lecture from anyone.

I listened to the hon. members who spoke to-day, and noted that they adopted a much better tone than some who spoke the other day. We are in a democracy, and yet all we hear is "carried," "carried," "carried". It is scandalous to think that an amount like this is passing, without any questions being answered by the Minister of Finance. As a member of parliament I have a right to expect answers from the minister—and complete answers.

The whole story he has told us is a story of lamentations. The parliament of Canada has become the wailing wall of the Department of Finance. Isaiah, Jeremiah—all the prophets, major and minor, were not so eloquent as the Minister of Finance. This afternoon I compared him with Joe Chamberlain, but to-night I compare him with Jeremiah and all those other major and minor prophets. I was surprised that tears were not flowing from his eyes. I thought he was dreaming, because he told us something that he could have said only in a dream—"I am not an imperialist". If the minister had been awake he would never have said anything like that. If he is not an imperialist, then the word "imperialist" does not exist.

I have been against Arthur Meighen from the beginning of my political career—since I was a little boy, and when the hon. member for Bellechasse was still at college. I was going with Ernest Lapointe and with all the other Liberals, denouncing the Tory party and denouncing the union government because they were imperialists. It was the success of the Liberal party. The Liberal party has pitted itself against Toryism, not only in the province of Quebec but in other provinces. Quebec was the pioneer and banner province of Canada. It was because the Liberal party was preaching the same doctrine east and west; it was because the Liberal party was denouncing imperialism that Mackenzie King came back to power in 1921 after defeating the Union government. That was due to the preaching of that same doctrine of liberalism and liberty, the same doctrine of patriotism that had been preached by the Liberal party from coast to coast. The answer of the Canadian people was, "We believe in you; we are fed up with those who have two doctrines, who have one doctrine for the imperialists of the province of Ontario and another doctrine for the people who have followed another line of thought in the province of Quebec; we are fed up with the duplicity, we want earnestness, we want sincerity and we want patriotism—we will try the Liberal party."

The Liberal party was elected on that very ground and on that particular policy. No one else would have thought that we would have such a policy as this enunciated by the Liberal party. If I denounce it to-day I do not denounce it as a French Canadian, I do not denounce it as a man who has been elected by a constituency in the province of Quebec. I denounce it as an old time Liberal; I denounce it as a supporter of Sir Wilfrid Laurier; I denounce it as a supporter and very close friend of the late Ernest Lapointe. Hon. members who were here when Mr. Lapointe was in this house will remember that.

Do you think a man who had made the campaigns I have made when the Liberal party was suffering defeat could stand for treatment like that? Some members may find it extraordinary that I speak with a little animation, but I am being careful about the words that I use at the present time. It is inconceivable. I ask the leader of the opposition, who was siding with the Liberal party at the time, if what I have said is not true. I will ask the Minister of Finance, who was not in politics at the time. The Minister of Veterans Affairs was probably not in Canada at that time in 1917. He was in the army; he has a fine record and I congratulate him upon it. Then there is the Minister of Agriculture who was in politics at the time. He must remember that. Then there is my old friend, the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin) who was insulted the other day by a new member to this house.

Mr. BEAUDOIN: I do not think the hon. member who is speaking has a right to say that I insulted the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres just because I said to him a few things which I think he deserved to be told under the circumstances. I ask the hon. member to withdraw what he has said.

Mr. POULIOT: If the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres had not made the speeches that he made throughout the province the Liberal party would not have been strong enough to elect the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

Mr. CARDIN: He would not be here.

Mr. POULIOT: He would never have been here. The Liberal party would have fallen to pieces before.

Mr. GARIEPY: What section are we on now?

Mr. DORION: Liberal section.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on section 4.

Mr. POULIOT: When I spoke at three o'clock—

The CHAIRMAN: I believe the hon. member for Three Rivers has raised a good point of order. I would refer the hon. member to standing order 58 which provides:

> Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

I would ask all hon. members to observe that rule.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree perfectly with you. Is it section 4 or section 5?

The CHAIRMAN: Section 4.

Mr. POULIOT: This reminds me of the man who had never been on a train before, who was making his first trip. He was surprised when the train stopped at a station because he thought the train had enough speed to go two stations further along. What is section 4? It reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of section four of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, no interest shall be payable in respect of any period prior to the first day of January, nineteen hundred and fifty-one, under any obligation of the government of the United Kingdom delivered to the government of Canada under that section.

When did this United Kingdom financing start? The minister told us the story on March 18, 1942, when he asked us to look at the record of the past. At that time he said:

> When we are proposing to open a new chapter in our financial relations (with Great Britain and United States), the record regarding the past should be made quite clear.

That is the statement which was made by the Minister of Finance on March 18, 1942, when the house was considering for the first time the billion dollar gift—United Kingdom financing. The minister continued:

> To the United Kingdom alone our shipments increased from $331 million in 1939 to $532 million in 1940 and $702 million in 1941. To the rest of the British empire, including Egypt, our shipments rose from $104 million in 1939 to $157 million in 1940 and $300 million in 1941. But notwithstanding some increase in our imports, the empire as a whole had an aggregate merchandise deficit with Canada of $445 million in 1940 and $723 million in 1941.

He did not mention the amount of our imports. I worked it out myself in pencil and I sent him the result of my work in order to verify my calculation.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 17, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

THE EARL OF ATHLONE

REPLY TO FAREWELL ADDRESS FROM BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that the Clerk has laid on the table to-day the reply of the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone to the joint address of farewell presented to him by the Senate and the House of Commons, as follows:

Honourable members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

I thank you most sincerely for the kind address of farewell which you have presented to me on the occasion of my approaching retirement as governor general of the Dominion of Canada.

It is with feelings of regret that I am concluding my official relationship as the representative of His Majesty the King in this country. It has been an honour and a great privilege to have served as governor general during the most eventful and calamitous years in the history of our time. The period of the war was fraught with innumerable difficulties many of which appeared at the time to be insurmountable. But parliament and the Canadian people, by their unselfish and untiring devotion to the cause of freedom, played a major part in the victorious struggle of the united nations against the implacable enemies of democracy.

My numerous tours of this vast country have enabled me to see almost every section of Canada.

I have been a witness of the efficiency, perseverance and courage displayed by the men and women of Canada, whether they served in the armed forces or were engaged in factories or in one of the numerous societies which performed such miracles of organization and effectiveness. This ready response to the call of duty was an evidence of the loyalty of the Canadian people to His Majesty the King and to the British commonwealth of nations, of which Canada is so important a part.

I am very much pleased to record that my relations with the members of both houses have been of the happiest.

I shall not fail, on my return to England, to convey to Their Majesties the King and Queen the loyal sentiments so admirably expressed in your address. It will be my pleasure also to convey to Queen Mary your kind remembrances. Her Majesty the Queen Mother has the warmest interest in the people of this country.

I join with you in expressing the hope that Their Royal Highnesses the Princess Elizabeth and the Princess Margaret may pay a visit to Canada in the near future.

On behalf of Princess Alice I wish to convey to you Her Royal Highness' appreciation for the very kind references you have made to her in your address. These have touched us both very deeply.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

We shall never forget what Canada has contributed during the past six difficult and testing years. She earned the admiration and true gratitude of all free peoples for her magnificent and munificent contribution to the victorious prosecution of the war and to the welfare and rehabilitation of the suffering peoples of the world.

In bidding you farewell, Princess Alice and I wish to assure you of our deep and abiding affection and at the same time to express our complete confidence in the continued prosperity of Canada and the maintenance of her proud position as the senior dominion of the British commonwealth of nations.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GREAT LAKES SEAMEN—HOURS OF WORK

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I should like to supplement the statement I made in reply to the question asked yesterday by the leader of the opposition with reference to a threatened stoppage of work on ships operating on the great lakes, by reading a letter addressed by myself to Mr. Sullivan on April 11. The letter reads as follows:

I have your letter of April 9 and there is a necessity in my opinion to record the facts up to date as we understand them.

You met with me on March 25 and in addition to your committee, you will recall that Messrs. MacNamara and Maclean were present. The statement of myself and officials is that it was agreed that a telegram would be sent to the parties urging that a meeting take place on April 8 which was the earliest date convenient to you.

It was further stated that the meeting could be held in the Department of Labour office at Toronto if the parties so desired and also that a conciliation officer would be available if the parties asked for him.

In accordance with this understanding telegrams were dispatched to both parties and copies of same are attached.

It does seem to me that there is no room in the wording of the telegrams for any misunderstanding.

I am still of the opinion that it would have been advisable to meet with the operators. However, your committee decided otherwise.

You, of course, will at once agree that I could not, under the circumstances, say to the operators that they had refused to meet you.

It is noted that your executive has decided to take a strike vote beginning April 15 and I suggest to you that inasmuch as the process of collective bargaining between yourselves and the ship operators has not yet been concluded, a strike vote at the moment seems to be unnecessary and cannot be said to be in accordance with the provisions of the wartime labour relations regulations, P.C. 1003, which requires the parties to a dispute to bargain in good faith one with the other.

You may be assured that the department will do its utmost to bring about a mutually satisfactory agreement between the operators and the employees. However, the department is still convinced that the most satisfactory solution would be one brought about by collective bargaining rather than by the passing of legislation providing for an eight-hour day.

I further wish to inform you that the labour department has requested the Department of Justice to review the relative authority as between the dominion and provincial governments and, in addition, the department has arranged for the submission of an independent legal opinion on this question.

Yours sincerely,
(sgd) Humphrey Mitchell

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the minister considered calling these groups together in order to try to iron out this matter?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have already done that. The operators are meeting on April 24 and I understand that a submission is to be made to the men's organization. It can be fairly stated that I have had some experience in labour negotiations, not only as chairman of boards of concilation but also as a negotiator for trade unions. I have never yet felt that anything is lost by negotiation. Sometimes when settlement of a dispute seems hopeless and a strike is inevitable the interested parties meet and in many instances an agreement is arrived at and work goes on unimpeded notwithstanding the difficult situation that existed.

May I give a word of advice to both sides? We have set up machinery for the settlement of disputes of this kind, and anybody who has a good case should never be afraid to come before an impartial tribunal. The machinery of the labour relations board—and I speak now from memory—has dealt with about 3,200 disputes. In only eight cases has there been a strike. I believe that is a fair average, and compared with other countries it gives an indication of the soundness of the legislation that this parliament has adopted for the settlement of disputes of this kind. I hope that good sense will be shown by both sides; that they will obey the law and use the machinery that most other organizations have used since the establishment of the code in this country.

BUTTER

REFERENCE IN DEBATE TO QUESTION OF PRICES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): As a matter of privilege I should like to clarify a statement which was made the other evening and upon which there have been some reports that are creating some difficulties. Most of us find it rather difficult to get any butter in these days. Following my remarks the other evening the suggestion was made that I had said there might be a further increase in the price of butter. Naturally that would cause persons who have butter to hold it for the higher price. I just wish to state that I had no intention of making any such suggestion either to this house or to the country, and I want to emphasize that fact. What I did was suggest that already there had been an increase in the price of butter and that there might be other products in connection with which increases might be necessary, but there was no reference to butter in the latter part of the statement.

NAVAL SERVICE ACT

PROVISION FOR SEA CADET CORPS

Hon. DOUGLAS ABBOTT (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services) moved the first reading of bill No. 56 (from the senate) to amend the Naval Service Act, 1944.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. ABBOTT: The purpose of this bill is to insert in the Naval Service Act a section similar to one contained in the Militia Act, by which the sea cadet corps, the naval cadets, will be authorized in the same way that the cadet corps for the army are now authorized under the Militia Act. During the war the sea cadet corps were authorized by order in council under the War Measures Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE ACT

PROVISION FOR AIR CADET SQUADRONS

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air) moved the first reading of bill No. 57 (from the senate) to amend the Royal Canadian Air Force Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GIBSON (Hamilton West): This bill is to amend the Royal Canadian Air Force Act to make provision for the formation and establishment of Royal Air Force cadet squadrons. These squadrons were formed during the war under the provisions of the War Measures Act, and this bill is being made in order to provide for their retention.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

INCOME TAX—PROSECUTIONS

Mr. JAENICKE:

In each of the provinces during the years of 1944 and 1945: 1. How many prosecutions were taken under section 77 of the Income War Tax Act, chapter 97 R.S.C. 1927?

2. How many persons were convicted?

3. What were the total fines in respect of such convictions?

4. In respect of how many convictions do the fines remain unpaid?

5. How many of the convicted persons have made their return and have paid their income tax?

6. How many actions or proceedings have recently been taken under sections 70, 71, 72, 73 and 74 of the said act?

7. How many persons having been assessed for income tax have been relieved from payment of such tax and on what grounds were they so relieved from payment?

Mr. McCANN:

1. The sections referred to do not provide for prosecutions or convictions. Therefore, there have been none.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Answered by No. 1.

4. Answered by No. 1.

5. Answered by No. 1.

6. Answered by No. 1.

7. None, unless insolvent estates, bankruptcies and compositions with creditors under bankruptcy proceedings may be regarded as such and if so the information is not available.

ATOMIC ENERGY—COST OF DISCOVERY AND PRODUCTION

Mr. FRASER:

What share did Canada have in the cost of discovering and producing atomic energy?

Mr. McILRAITH: Although Canada had membership on the combined policy committee which was responsible for the over-all general policy relating to experiment and production of atomic energy, it is impossible to give Canada's share of the total cost because the cost to other nations is not known. Canada, however, has spent a sum of approximately 27 million dollars on research and development in the field of atomic energy.

WAR ASSETS—MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. WEBB:

1. Are priorities required to purchase jeeps, station wagons, automobiles and trucks held for sale by War Assets Corporation?

2. If so, to whom are they issued?

3. If not, what is the proper procedure to buy one?

4. What are the names of individuals or municipalities in the county of Leeds who have purchased vehicles or materials of any kind from War Assets Corporation?

5. Is there a local office of War Assets Corporation in Leeds county?

6. If so, where is it located?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1, 2 and 3. The policy of War Assets Corporation in the disposal of vehicles is to meet, in the first instance, the priority requests of federal government departments, provincial government departments and municipalities. The remaining vehicles are then disposed of through the normal channels of business i.e. dealers, subject to a veteran's preference.

4. The county of Leeds has made no application to purchase equipment or material from War Assets Corporation; the municipality of the town of Brockville applied for an ambulance which was offered to them on December 17, 1945. No reply was received from the municipality. The Brockville police department applied for a motorcycle which was offered to them on January 7, 1946, and no reply has been received. The municipality of Gananoque applied for a floor polisher, fire hose, ladder trucks and steel fencing with posts. This equipment is not available.

It is not possible to give the names of individuals.

5. No.

6. Answered by 5.

WHEAT BOARD—1945 SALES

Mr. McKAY:

1. How many bushels of wheat were sold by the Canadian Wheat Board in 1945 at (a) $1.25 and (b) $1.55 per bushel basis number one northern, Fort William?

2. What number of bushels of wheat was used for such domestic purposes as flour and feed in 1945?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. Wheat sold basis No. 1 Northern, Fort William/Port Arthur or Vancouver:

Basis $1.25 per bushel	131,775,015
Basis $1.43 per bushel	92,917,711
Basis $1.43 to $1.54 per bushel ..	37,382,159
Basis $1.55 per bushel	175,126,270
	437,201,156

2. Used for domestic purposes—76,920,218 bushels (subject to revision).

VETERANS LAND ACT—FARMS PURCHASED IN LEEDS COUNTY

Mr. WEBB:

1. How many farms have been purchased in Leeds county under the Veterans Land Act?

2. Where are these farms located and from whom purchased?

3. What acreage in each farm and what price was paid for each?

4. What is the name of the inspector who recommended these purchases?

5. How many applications are now pending awaiting inspection?

6. Who is the district officer in charge of the D.P.A. Veterans Land Act in Leeds county?

Mr. TUCKER: With regard to paragraph 3 of this question, it is considered that the public disclosure of details as to prices paid for various lands being purchased by the Veterans Land Act administration would be detrimental to the administration and operation of the act, and not in the best interests of the veterans for whom the land has been purchased. Subject to that, the question is answered.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that not new procedure?

Mr. TUCKER: If the hon. member is interested in any particular parcel of land and wishes to ascertain what has been paid for it, there is no objection to giving him the information. But the public disclosure of the amount paid for each parcel of land of course will operate to the detriment of the administration of the act, because it may cause others to ask far more for their land than otherwise would be the case.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not a matter of the detriment to the administration; it is the detriment to the public, is it not?

Mr. TUCKER: It is felt that it would work to the detriment of the veterans who have to pay for the land.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not sure that is so. It might mean that the veterans would get the land for less.

Mr. TUCKER: The answer to the remainder of the question is as follows:

1, 2 and 3.

RADIO BROADCASTING—SACKVILLE STATION

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Is the Department of Trade and Commerce utilizing the facilities of the short wave radio broadcasting station?

2. If so, to what extent?

3. What payments are being made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the service?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. The Department of Trade and Commerce, in cooperation with other government departments, does make use of the short wave radio station for broadcasting trade information, bureau of statistics reports, etc. This department does not purchase time nor sponsor any particular programme.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. No payments whatever are made by this department.

BUTTER PRICES

Mr. HATFIELD:

When the regulation was made increasing the price of butter 4 cents did it include butterfat and dairy butter? If not, why not?

Mr. ILSLEY: When the price of butter was raised April 1, the increase applied to creamery butter only. The price of dairy butter has been correspondingly increased effective April 15. This has resulted in an increase in the price of butterfat used in the manufacture of creamery and dairy butter.

CANADIAN ARMY—PERSONNEL STATIONED NEAR COURTENAY, B.C.

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. How many army personnel are presently stationed at the Iron River Timber Company's camp near Courtenay, British Columbia?

2. Are these soldiers doing work for a private logging company?

3. If so, what is (a) the name of the company; (b) the nature of the work?

4. By whom are the said soldiers paid?

5. If by the company (a) what is the hourly or daily wage; (b) is there any deduction for board or other expenses?

6. If the said soldiers are paid by the Department of National Defence, what payment, if any, is made to the department by the company for work done by the soldiers?

7. Is there a written contract between the Department of National Defence and the company regarding the employment of said soldiers?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Two officers and 77 other ranks.

2. Yes—reforestation for the provincial forestry service. The men are provided for this work at the request of the British Columbia forest service and British Columbia loggers association. It is expected the work will be completed by 15 April, 1946.

3. (a) Comox Logging and Railway Company.

(b) Reforestation.

4. The soldiers are paid Army rates by the Army.

5. Answered by No. 4 above—see also answer to question 6.

6. The logging company pays to the receiver-general, through the Department of National Defence, 60 cents per hour plus a bonus of 20 the job until it is completed. A deduction is made for board, the amount of which is not cents per day for Army men who remain on available at present.

7. No. Arrangements made through D.O.C., M.D. 11 to provide personnel for urgent national work in isolated camps for which civilian labour could not be found.

SUGAR CONTROLLER—ACADIA SUGAR REFINERY

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Was the Acadia Sugar Refinery, at Woodside, Nova Scotia, closed by order of the sugar controller of Canada?
2. If so, has application for reopening of plant since been made by owners?
3. What answer was given?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.

REMOVAL OF RIPPLE ROCK AT SEYMOUR NARROWS

Mr. MATTHEWS (Kootenay East):

1. What is the total amount expended by the federal government to date, in the attempted removal of Ripple Rock at Seymour Narrows?
2. What steps have been taken by the government to proceed with this project?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. $802,825.47.

2. (a) Methods of improving navigation are being given consideration. (b) Other methods of removing the rock are being studied.

SASKATOON AIRPORT—EXTENSION OF RUNWAYS

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Does the contract for extension of runways at the Saskatoon airport specify an approximate date for completion?
2. If so, what is that date?
3. Does progress up to the present indicate that the work will be completed by that date?

Mr. McILRAITH: In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned—

1. Grading of E/W runway 75 per cent completed last fall. Tenders are being called for the construction of two complete runways and are due April 29. The completion date specified is November 30, 1946.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes.

HOGS FOR DOMESTIC CONSUMPTION

Mr. KNOWLES:

1. What is the quota of hogs granted for domestic consumption only in each of the following centres: Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Edmonton, Vancouver?

2. On what basis are the above hog quotas established?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The total quota of hogs granted for domestic consumption is as follows: Halifax, no quotas imposed; Montreal, 6,853 per week; Toronto, 7,217 per week; Winnipeg, 4,963 per week; Regina, 324 per week; Edmonton, 2,827 per week; Vancouver, 3,394 per week.

Note.—These are the numbers that may be slaughtered per week in these cities but it must be remembered an important percentage of the resultant pork is shipped to areas outside of these cities.

2. The general policy followed by the wartime prices and trade board in establishing hog quotas for domestic consumption is to permit an operator to slaughter at the rate of 75 per cent of a basic period.

Exceptions to the general policy have been made in the case of deficiency production areas, and in the case of domestic processors who normally secured their pork by purchase from slaughterers.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—CARPENTERS

Mr. LaCROIX:

What is the hourly salary paid to carpenters working for the national harbours board in (a) the Toronto harbour; (b) the Montreal harbour; (c) the Quebec harbour?

Mr. CHEVRIER: Furnished by the national harbours board. (a) The Toronto harbour is not under the administration of the national harbours board; (b) Carpenter, 95 cents; timberman (rough carpenter), 80 cents; (c) carpenter, 80 cents; timberman (rough carpenter), 70 cents.

CANADIAN FORCES—PERSONNEL IN SERVICE OUTSIDE OF CANADA

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. How many Canadian soldiers are still in service outside of Canada?
2. How many of that number are in the army or armies of occupation and how many are not?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. 36,300 all ranks (as of 31 March, 1946).

2. Canadian army occupation force, 16,900; others, 19,400.

Note: Above figures do not include 3,000 soldiers in transit to Canada.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—SASKATOON MILITARY HOSPITAL

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Does the Department of Veterans Affairs operate a military hospital at the former No. 4 Service Flying Training School at Saskatoon?
2. If so, does this hospital provide only care for convalescents?
3. Is other medical or surgical care provided?
4. How many beds are in use?
5. What is the number of patients?
6. Has any physiotherapeutic equipment been provided for this hospital from (a) war assets equipment declared surplus; (b) any other source?

[Mr. Chevrier.]

Mr. TUCKER:

1. The Department of Veterans Affairs operates a veterans' hospital at said premises.
2. No.
3. Yes.
4. Bed capacity at April 6, 1946: 148.
5. At April 6, 1946: 93.
6. (a) yes; (b) yes.

AIR TRANSPORT BOARD

Mr. CASE:

1. Who are the members of the air transport board?
2. Through which member of the board is the postmaster general's department represented, or in what other manner is that department represented?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. Robert Alexander Cecil Henry, chairman; Alan Ferrier, member; Joseph Pierre Romeo Vachon, member.

2. Not represented through any member nor in any other manner. The Postmaster General's department is, however, advised of any matters of direct concern to it.

STEEL PRICES—AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS

Mr. SENN:

1. Are agricultural implements included in the list of basic iron and steel products on which the ceiling price is raised as announced by the finance minister on Tuesday, April 2?
2. If so, what increase is being allowed?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No increase was allowed as of April 1st, the date on which the prices of other iron and steel products were permitted to increase.

2. An increase of 12½ per cent in the retail price of farm implements was permitted effective April 13, 1946.

NATIONAL REGISTRATION

Mr. THATCHER:

1. Are Canadians still compelled by law to carry registration cards?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. Have any prosecutions been made since January 1, 1946, because of failure to produce a registration card, and if so, how many?
4. How many people are still employed in the administration of national registration?
5. What is the total monthly cost to the government of employing these people?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes; all Canadians, sixteen years or age and over, are still required by law to carry national registration certificates when residing in Canada, except

(a) Cloistered nuns;

(b) Members of the naval, military and air forces of Canada on active service;

(c) Persons confined in asylums for the insane or feeble-minded, or in penitentiaries or prisons;

(d) Inmates of institutions excepted by the chief registrar for Canada upon the recommendation of the registrar for the electoral district in which the institution is situated.

2. The principal reasons are:

(1) To assist the authorities in the rehabilitation of the large number of adults displaced by the exigencies of war.

(2) To assist the authorities in clearing up unfinished cases and investigations of desertions from the armed forces, defaults and delinquencies under the national resources mobilization regulations, the defence of Canada regulations and other wartime controls.

(3) So that the national registration records from which much information is still being supplied may be kept as up to date as possible.

3. Very few prosecutions have been made or instituted since January 1, 1946 for failure to produce a registration certificate. The exact total of such cases is not available as the provincial and municipal law enforcement authorities do not report all cases to the dominion authorities.

4. At March 31, 1946, there were 232 persons employed in the national registration branch, Department of Labour.

5. The total monthly cost to the government at present is approximately $30,000.

UNITED NATIONS ORGANIZATION—PERMANENT SITE

Mr. LOCKHART:

1. Have any representations been made to the government or to any Canadian delegation to the united nations organization in connection with the choice of Navy island as a permanent site for the headquarters of the united nations organization?

2. If so, when and by whom were such representations made?

3. What steps were taken by the government or the Canadian delegation as aforesaid to ensure that the permanent site of the united nations headquarters would be in Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Yes.

2. A number of representations were made at different times. Some of these were verbal. Those of which there is a record include the following:

By Mr. J. E. Lawson, on July 31;

By Mr. Davis Duff and Mr. Arthur A. Schmon, October 4, 1945;

By Senator J. J. Bench, December 31;

By Mr. Chauncey J. Hamblin and Mr. John A. Williamson, December 18.

In addition Mr. E. J. Anderson, Mr. Roy H. Davis and Mr. Louis Blake Duff brought this matter to the attention of the Canadian government and the Canadian delegation in London on a number of occasions.

3. Action on the part of the Canadian government or any Canadian delegation to the united nations could not ensure that the permanent site for the headquarters of the united nations would be in Canada.

However, everything that could appropriately be done was done to ensure that the united nations should be aware of possible Canadian sites when giving consideration to the location of the permanent headquarters of the united nations. Representations concerning Navy island and other Canadian cities and localities were brought to the attention of the preparatory commission of the united nations. The preparatory commission circulated a list to delegations of possible sites, which included Navy island and other sites in Canada.

The preparatory commission decided that the permanent headquarters of the united nations should be located in the eastern part of the United States of America. A committee to make recommendations on the permanent site of the united nations was set up by the preparatory commission, and this committee sent an inspection group to the United States, with its terms of reference limited to specified areas around New York and Boston. The Canadian government made representations both in London and Washington with a view to having the united nations inspection group examine sites on the international boundary of the Niagara river.

The attitude of the Canadian government, like that of other member governments of the united nations, including the United States government, was that the choice of a permanent site was a matter for collective decision in the broad interests of the united nations.

*RAILWAY GRADE SEPARATION

Mr. CHURCH:

For the period of the war, by years, what sums of money have been spent by each of the provinces on railway grade separation in Canada?

Mr. CHEVRIER: In this question the hon. member for Broadview asks what sums of money have been spent by each of the provinces on railway grade separation in Canada during the war years. The only jurisdiction over this subject matter is that of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, and they do not keep separate accounts for the provinces. They have an accurate account of the moneys spent by the dominion, and I could put that on the record. But as the question stands I have no way of answering it, and I would suggest that if the hon. member were to communicate with the provinces he would get from them information as to the moneys they have spent on grade separations.

Question dropped.

VETERANS LAND ACT—QUEENS COUNTY, P.E.I.

Mr. McLURE:

1. How many farms have been purchased in Queen's county, Prince Edward Island, under the Veterans Land Act?
2. Where are these farms located and from whom purchased?
3. What acreage in each farm and what price was paid for each?
4. How many veterans are now established on farms in Queen's county?
5. Who are the officers in charge of Veterans Land Act in Queen's county, Prince Edward Island?

Mr. TUCKER: The same observations would apply in regard to this question as in regard to the question of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Webb). I have spoken to the hon. member who asks this question, and he is satisfied that the third part should not be answered. Subject to that, the question is answered as follows:

1, 2, and 3.

ARTHRITIS AND RHEUMATIC DISEASES

Mr. BENTLEY:

1. Has the Department of National Health and Welfare investigated the method of treatment for arthritis and rheumatic diseases used by Dr. I. J. K. Golden of Chicago?

2. If so, what were the results of such investigation?

Mr. CLAXTON: 1 and 2. No.

INCOME TAX—PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many (a) inspectors; (b) investigators; (c) other officials, are now engaged in connection with the collection of income tax in each of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

2. Is any portion of the salary and expenses of the above named officers payable in whole or in part by way of bonus on a commission basis?

Mr. McCANN:

1.		Manitoba	Saskatchewan	Alberta
Inspectors	(a)	1	2	2
Assessing tax returns	(b)	133	83	127
Other employees	(c)	250	220	262
Total employees		384	305	391

2. No.

WAR ASSETS—CROWN PROPERTIES

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Has the Department of Reconstruction sold any crown properties direct to purchasers?

2. If so, why were these not sold through War Assets Corporation?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. No.

2. Answered by No. 1.

CENSUS COMMISSIONERS

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. What are the names and addresses of the census commissioners appointed this year in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta?

2. Which of these are veterans of first or second world war?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. See list below.

2. Information not available. We can procure this.

[Mr. Chevrier.]

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. When were conscientious objectors accorded permission to volunteer as such for active service?
2. How many enlisted as such?
3. Are conscientious objectors who enlisted required to conform to-day to the regimentation of the Department of Labour under National Selective Service regulations?
4. Is any class of Canadian citizens other than conscientious objectors required by the Department of Labour to submit to regimentation at this time? If so, who?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. September 16, 1943.
2. 768.
3. No.
4. No persons in civil occupations are subject to labour controls at this time other than conscientious objectors who are performing alternative service in view of having been postponed from service in the armed forces. Many men called or enlisting for service in the armed forces have not yet been demobilized.

Mr. WINKLER:

1. How many conscientious objectors were registered at the first registration following the outbreak of war?
2. How many are registered to-day?
3. When was the last one registered?
4. Are any conscientious objectors working in government camps (in national parks) at the present, under government supervision?

Mr. MITCHELL: To get the information asked for in the first part of this question would mean going through tens of thousands of files. There were millions of people registered at that time, and it would be wellnigh impossible to get the information. The third part of the question is in the same category. We should have to go through all those files. Then, who would decide when the last one was registered?—I do not know. I suggest that the question be dropped and resubmitted on the basis of the second and fourth parts of it.

Question dropped.

JUDGES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

How many (a) county and district court judges (b) supreme and appeal court judges in Canada are (1) over 90 years of age; (2) between 80 and 90; (3) between 70 and 80; (4) between 60 and 70; (5) between 50 and 60; (6) under 50?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: (a) (1) None, (2) None, (3) 19, (4) 39, (5) 53, (6) 16; (b) (1) None, (2) 6, (3) 31, (4) 49, (5) 36, (6) 14.

UNRRA—SEED POTATOES

Mr. DOUGLAS:

1. Has the Canadian government offered UNRRA a gift of Canadian seed potatoes?

2. If so, what steps have been taken to see that seed potatoes from Prince Edward Island are included?

Mr. CHEVRIER:

1. No. The usual procedure in UNRRA procurement is for UNRRA to requisition the necessary supplies. The Canadian Export Board then procures these. So far there has been no requests from UNRRA for seed potatoes.

2. Answered by No. 1.

POSTMASTERS—REVENUE OFFICES

Mr. SHAW:

1. What is the present policy with respect to the discharge or retirement, due to age, of postmasters now in charge of revenue post offices?

2. Are postmasters now in charge of revenue post offices eligible for pension if and when discharged due to age? If not, on what basis are they retired?

3. Are all postmasters now in charge of revenue post offices paid regular salaries? If not, how is their remuneration computed?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier):

1. Postmasters of offices with not more than $3,000 post office revenue are not released on account of age. Postmasters of offices with more than $3,000 post office renvue will be released on reaching 70 years of age commencing 1st January, 1948.

2. No. They are not under the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

3. No. This remuneration is based on the post office revenue of their offices plus other allowances for specific service for work performed.

PARCEL POST—HUNGARY

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Is the rate of parcel post to Hungary higher than the rates to Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia?

2. What is the greatest weight of food that will be accepted by the post office for transmission to Hungary by parcel post?

3. How often may such a parcel be sent by one individual in Canada?

4. Is Hungary on an equal basis as compared with other countries in regard to (a) weight of parcels allowed to be sent; (b) the frequency with which they may be sent?

5. If not, what is the reason for the difference?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): The mail from Canada to Hungary operates via the United Kingdom, and as the United Kingdom have not yet resumed their parcel post service to Hungary the Canadian post office cannot accept parcels so addressed.

There is, however, a letter packet service operating from Canada via the United Kingdom to Hungary, and gift food packets weighing up to 4 pounds 6 ounces may be forwarded prepaid at the letter rate of postage.

These packages may be sent by any one sender to two different addressees each week and the regulations as regards Hungary are the same for similar letter packets forwarded to other countries to which the letter packet service has been restored.

The restoration of the parcel post service to Hungary is at present before this department, and it will be placed in operation as soon as the necessary facilities are available.

UNITED NATIONS—EDUCATIONAL, SCIENTIFIC AND CULTURAL ORGANIZATION—CANADIAN TEACHERS

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. Did the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization recommend that a national committee or commission be set up in each signatory country?

2. If so, is the government presently in communication with the Canadian teachers' federation with regard to the appointment of (a) members of such national committee; (b) delegates to the main conference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. Article VII, section 1, of the draft constitution of the united nations educational, scientific and cultural organization drawn up at the conference held in London, England, last November and submitted to the participating governments for acceptance, reads as follows:

"Each member state shall make such arrangements as suit its particular conditions for the purpose of associating its principal bodies interested in educational, scientific and cultural matters with the work of the organization, preferably by the formation of a national commission broadly representative of the government and such bodies."

2. The Canadian teachers' federation has written expressing the hope that the government will appoint a national commission and suggesting the names of persons who might be appointed to such a commission and as Canadian representatives to meetings of the organization.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT—RESEARCH AND PLANNING

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many houses were completed during (a) 1944; (b) 1945, under the National Housing Act?

2. How many houses now under construction under the supervision of N.H.A. when completed will cost (a) less than $3,000; (b) from $3,000 to $3,999; (c) from $4,000 to $4,999; (d) from $5,000 to $5,999; (e) from $6,000 to $6,999; (f) from $7,000 to $7,999; (g) over $8,000?

3. (a) How many limited dividend housing corporations have been established as provided by section 9 of the Housing Act; (b) how many housing units have been completed by such limited dividend housing corporations?

4. (a) How many rural houses have been completed as provided in part 3 of the National Housing Act? (b) how many rural houses are now under construction as provided by part 3 of the National Housing Act?

5. (a) How much money has been spent on housing research and community planning as provided by part 5 of the National Housing Act; (b) how many persons are presently employed exclusively on housing research and community planning?

CIVILIAN CORPS OF CANADIAN FIRE FIGHTERS—INCOME TAX

Mr. WEBB:

1. How many Canadians served overseas in the civilian corps of Canadian fire fighters?

2. Is the pay and allowances received by these men while serving overseas subject to income tax?

3. If so, what steps, if any, have been taken to exempt such pay and allowances from income tax?

Mr. McCANN: Return tabled.

SUPPLY OF FOODSTUFFS TO INDIA

Mr. THATCHER:

What specific steps have been taken by the government to supply foodstuffs to India, since January 1, 1946?

REPRESENTATION—PROVINCES AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. TOWNLEY-SMITH:

1. What is the estimated present population of the Mackenize district of the Northwest Territories?

2. What federal representation has the territory been granted?

3. What were the populations of each of the provinces upon the entry to confederation?

Mr. MARTIN: I tabled that this afternoon.

BRITISH COLUMBIA AERODROME SITES

Mr. PEARKES:

1. How many aerodrome sites have been developed in the Vancouver-New Westminster southwest mainland area of British Columbia?

2. Are there any other sites which could be developed?

3. If so, is Boundary bay one of the above?

4. Is it being retained?

CREAMERY BUTTER

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. What was production of creamery butter in Canada during March, 1946?

2. How much less was production of creamery butter in March, 1946, compared to March, 1945; quantity; percentage?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

3. What is the estimate of production of creamery butter from May 1, 1946 to April 30, 1947?

4. What caused the present shortage of creamery butter in Canada since January?

5. Was the present shortage of creamery butter caused by a heavy decline in production of butter in the prairie provinces?

6. Are returns to farmers from cheese making higher than from butter making?

7. Could butter production be rapidly increased if less cheese was produced for export to United Kingdom?

POSTAL SERVICE—URBAN DELIVERIES

Mr. HAMEL:

1. What is, by provinces, the total expenditure of the post office department?

2. What Canadian cities, towns or municipalities have home delivery of mail by postmen?

3. In what year was such service inaugurated for each of the above?

4. At what time, what was the population, number of householders and revenue for each post office?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the first paragraph, because the records of expenditures are not kept by provinces and it is impossible to give them in that way. The other three questions will be accepted as an order for return, which will be filed in due course.

Mr. SPEAKER: Paragraph 1 dropped; paragraphs 2, 3 and 4, order for return.

IMPORTS OF OIL INTO PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. HARKNESS:

1. What were the sources of supply of oil imported into the prairie provinces in 1946?

2. What was the amount from each source?

3. What was the delivery point for the oil from each source?

4. What were the companies to which this oil was delivered and the amount to each?

5. What was the subsidy per barrel in each case?

6. What was the cost per barrel at source?

7. What was the freight rate in each case?

8. What was the gravity of the oil at source in each case?

WAR ASSETS—MOTOR VEHICLES

Mr. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough):

1. How many trucks, station wagons, and passenger cars have been delivered to (a) army; (b) navy; (c) air force, since (1) V-E day; (2) V-J day?

2. How many of these vehicles have been declared surplus?

COST OF INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCES

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What was the total cost involved in Canada's part in the (a) Dumbarton Oaks conference; (b) Bretton Woods conference; (c) San Francisco conference?

WAR CASUALTIES

Mr. CHURCH:

What is the estimated number of casualties in killed, wounded and missing in the Great War from 1939 to the end of 1945?

WARTIME HOUSING—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many houses have been erected in (a) Regina; (b) Saskatoon; (c) Moose Jaw, by government authority under Wartime Housing and/or other government agencies or plans?
2. What is the total contract price for each type?
3. Have any been sold? If so, what is the price for each type which has been sold?
4. If rented, what is the rental asked for the various types?

RED DEER, ALTA., CUSTOMS OFFICE

Mr. SHAW:

1. What volume of business was done through the customs office at Red Deer, Alberta, during each of the years 1935 to 1945?
2. How many employees were there in this office during each of the said years?
3. What was the total amount paid to such employees in each of the above-mentioned years?

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—SASKATCHEWAN—SUPERVISORS AND INSPECTORS

Mr. McCUAIG:

1. What are the names of the P.F.R.A. supervisors and inspectors working in the province of Saskatchewan in 1945?
2. How long was each employed in 1945?
3. What amount of salary did each receive in that period?
4. What amount of travelling expenses was paid to each in the same period?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

SIX NATIONS INDIANS—BRANT LEASES

Mr. CAMPBELL:

For a copy of the report made by the three trustees appointed by Sir John Colborne, Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada, in 1830, on behalf of the Six Nations Indians to investigate and report on the claims under the Brant leases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should say a word about this motion. It asks for a report made over a hundred years ago. I believe it is a rule that where information is available either in the library of parliament, a public library or in other public institutions members of parliament, like everyone else, are expected to go to those sources for information. In other words it is not to be expected that the public service will be used as a means of obtaining information on questions concerning which they may wish to obtain such information, where the information is public and obtainable from recognized sources.

Hon. members will see in a moment that if one were writing a book, and wished to have the research work done by the public service, this would be the way to have it done. I suggest the document requested will be as available to others, as to the government and should be obtained from recognized sources.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the Prime Minister assure me that the information is in the library?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot assure the hon. member of that but I will assure him that if he cannot find it in some generally recognized source the government is not likely to be more successful.

Motion dropped.

MINERAL RESOURCES

PROPOSED GOVERNMENT CONTROL AND OPERATION

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South) moved:

Whereas private enterprise in the development of the mineral resources of Canada has not operated in the best interests of all of the people of Canada either in time of peace or in time of war;

Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of bringing the developed and undeveloped mineral resources of Canada under government control and operation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have been waiting to discuss this resolution for the past five years. I am sorry that this afternoon, on the eve of a house adjournment, and perhaps at a time when a great deal of government business remains to be done, I have to initiate a discussion which I believe deals with a matter of urgent importance to the people of Canada.

The resolution suggests that I should be free to discuss all mineral resources in Canada. I can assure hon. members that a discussion as broad as that would require some considerable time. Therefore in the time at my disposal this afternoon I shall confine my remarks chiefly to the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia. I assume that hon. members from other parts of Canada who represent constituencies in which coal mining operations are carried on will take advantage of this opportunity to place the position of the industry on record in the house.

I believe I am safe in saying that the remarks I shall make with reference to the industry in Nova Scotia will be applicable to the whole of industry across the country. The coal mining industry is a very sick one at the present time. It has been indicated in the house on many occasions that employment conditions generally in Nova Scotia leave much to be desired. The whole economy of that province is based upon coal mining, and when that industry is in bad condition the whole economy suffers as a result.

For the past thirty years at least it has been the practice of the federal government to subsidize very heavily the mining operations in Nova Scotia. For the past five years the federal government has supplied practically all the funds required to keep the industry in operation. Any industry which has to draw on the public treasury to the extent to which that is done by Nova Scotia coal mining operations certainly should have some degree of public supervision.

I am not going to leave the impression that the remarks I shall make respecting the condition of coal mining in Nova Scotia are only my personal opinions. The Minister of Industry and Publicity in the Nova Scotia legislature, Hon. Harold Connolly—and that is a Liberal government—

Mr. MARTIN: A good minister.

Mr. GILLIS:—made some pertinent remarks in the legislature within the last couple of weeks. I notice that the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) has said that he is a good minister. I hope, then, that my hon. friend will support what the Minister of Industry and Publicity in the Nova Scotia government had to say respecting the mining industry of that province.

Mr. MARTIN: I will support every good cause.

Mr. GILLIS: Federal action is necessary for the rehabilitation of this industry. If subsidizing the coal industry of this country was any solution under the system of free enterprise the Nova Scotia mining industry should be a very prosperous industry to-day because it has been heavily subsidized. However, the fact of the matter is that that industry is in a worse position to-day than at any time in its history. The minister of industry acting for the Nova Scotia government, tabled a report in the legislature for the year ending November 30, 1945. At that time he said that too much emphasis could not be placed upon the deplorable position of the coal industry of that province. He stated further that the total production for the last fiscal year was only 5,170,400 short tons, a decrease of 637,710 tons from the production of 1944. This was the lowest figure since 1902. The production per man fell to 1·58 tons.

These figures take on an even more alarming aspect when considered against the background of the 1944 report. In the 1944 report the minister referred to the lamentable decrease in the total production from the previous year. The production per man shift in 1944 was 1·66 short tons, the lowest rate since 1900 and the lowest rate for which statistics are available.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is 1944?

Mr. GILLIS: 1944. He was comparing the 1945 report with the 1944. The total production and man-shift production in 1945 dropped below the 1944 figure. Despite the fact, as the Minister of Reconstruction well knows, that the federal government came to the rescue of private enterprise in the operation of this industry, and has been practically carrying the financial load of the continued operation, the industry continues to go down. This suggests to my mind that the time has come when the federal government, in the interests of the taxpayers of Canada, should accept some responsibility in the operation of this industry. In his report the minister went on to outline some of the disabilities under which the industry operates. He stated that all signs pointed to the fact that the loss in production was attributable not so much to the physical conditions in the industry as to human relations. He said a great change must take place in the attitude of all concerned if the industry was to retain its former place in the provincial economy.

That is the opinion of the minister of industry in the Nova Scotia government. The question is one which should concern not only the people of Nova Scotia but hon. members of this house, particularly the Nova Scotia members. It would be difficult to exaggerate the gravity of the situation as revealed in the formal language and hard statistics of the official report.

I do not raise this question in spirit of fault-finding or recrimination. I do it more to focus the attention of the government on the problem in order that they may take some constructive action to see that this industry is not blotted out. It is the responsibility of the governments, provincial and federal, who are the custodians of the natural resources of the country and who have been providing funds, for the last five years at least, in order that this industry may continue to function.

As I said at the beginning, if private enterprise and the system of subsidizing industry were any solution, the problem would not be as acute as it is to-day. They have had a fair trial in the mining industry and in my opinion that industry has failed completely to meet the needs of this country, both in times of war and in times of peace. To-day the government is underwriting the losses of this industry and is acting as their sales agents. In my opinion it is the duty and responsibility of the government to take over the industry, reorganize it and operate it as a government enterprise. The government is paying the bills anyway.

As hon. members know—and this is particularly within the knowledge of the Minister of Reconstruction—there is a royal commission now probing the whole mining industry across the country. This commission will cost the taxpayers of Canada a considerable amount of money, but in my opinion it will be money well spent. I know some of the personnel of that commission, and I am reasonably sure that when its report is made we shall have for the first time a realistic picture of the coal mining industry across Canada.

Regardless of what this commission may find, or what its recommendations to the minister may be, I am convinced that there is no solution for the problems facing the coal industry unless the federal government take it over and operate it in the interests of the people of Canada. I believe the mining industry of Nova Scotia is in much the same position to-day as was the mining industry of Great Britain up to the time the British government took it over and operated it. The workers in the industry in Nova Scotia have lost confidence in those who operate the industry. In Great Britain there were many independent operators, whereas in Nova Scotia it is a straight monopoly. This makes it all the more necessary for the federal government to step in and reexamine the whole set-up on the basis of the commission's findings.

The government should consider the advisability of nationalizing the coal industry of Canada, particularly that of Nova Scotia. This government should follow the mechanics employed by the British government. The matter was studied in that country for a long time and discussed on many occasions in the British House of Commons. The men who laid down the mechanics of taking over the industry in Great Britain had long experience, and we should do well to study what was done over there. I believe the time is not far distant when the government will have to take this step.

A national board should be set up consisting of men with the necessary experience and qualifications. It should function under a separate minister who would be responsible to parliament for the operation of the industry. In addition there should be two regional boards in Nova Scotia, one on the mainland and one on the island of Cape Breton. While the national board would consist of experts working under the direction of the minister, in order to get the active cooperation of the workers the regional boards should consist of equal representation of management and the workers, so that they could work out the basic problems that exist underground and enable the national board to get a complete picture of the operation.

In addition to the two boards which would manage the industry under the minister's direction there should be set up, as was done in Great Britain, an industrial coal consumers' council. This council is responsible for processing and marketing, and for making contacts with the industry and acting as sales agent in the marketing of coal; it also fixes prices in conjunction with the national board.

In addition there is what is known as a domestic coal consumers' council, which acts as sales agent in the domestic field in the processing and marketing of coal, all under the direction of the national board.

In my opinion, if these simple steps were taken in this country under the direction of a minister like the Minister of Reconstruction, who in matters of this kind is very realistic, who is an engineer and likes to get things done, much could be done. I should like to see him in charge of that kind of set-up, and I am certain that the steps that I have mentioned will have to be taken if the province of Nova Scotia is to survive. Either that or an emigration policy from Nova Scotia to other parts of Canada will be necessary.

One of the government's officials, the Hon. Michael Dwyer, who is maritime director of selective service, addressing a commercial club in Halifax not so long ago, stated that on the average for many years fifteen hundred young people had left the province of Nova Scotia every year to go to the United States or other parts of Canada to seek employment. The war has brought us no relief from that situation. Indeed, the employment situation in Nova Scotia to-day is fifty per cent worse than it was in 1939. On the island of Cape Breton alone there are over 4,500 registered unemployed, of whom 1,500 are ex-service men who never did a day's work in their lives, who went from the street into the army and through the war and are now back on the street. Many other service personnel in that part of the country are not registered, because so long as they are receiving their out-of-work benefits they do not go through that channel. The consequence is that a serious unemployment situation is developing in Nova Scotia which will have to be dealt with very soon. The basis of it all is the coal-mining industry, and there can be no relief under your system of free enterprise, because to rehabilitate that industry will require a large amount of capital expenditure. As hon. members who sat on the reconstruction committee with myself in 1942, 1943 and 1944, will remember, the heads of the Dominion Steel and Coal company, when questioned as to their plans for the future, the making of new openings and further mechanization of the mines already developed, stated frankly that it would cost a lot of money and that they were not going to spend the money to make those developments; but if the federal government would make the capital available, yes, they would go to work. If the federal government would do that, I am sure that there are some profits to be made in that industry. If a proper valuation of the industry were made it would be found that perhaps fifty per cent of the stock is watered. Let the minister take that industry over and squeeze the water out of the stock, fix wage rates and the selling price of coal on the basis of the costs involved, and then I am sure the coal can be marketed economically and that new openings can be made for employment in Nova Scotia. This step must be taken if the industry is to survive.

Every government in Canada is responsible for the situation in the coal mining industry to-day because they have been the custodian of that resource in every part of Canada. All our minerals were placed in the ground by the Lord, and they belong to the people. No one has any right to exploit mineral resources for private gain. Those who have operated those resources for private gain in the past have taken out the coal that was easiest to get out of the ground and got as much out of it as they could in the way of profits. Shack communities were built around the mines where the miners had to live under deplorable conditions, in every section of the mining industry all across Canada. Go to Minto, New Brunswick, and see how the miners live and work in that area. The conditions there are not peculiar to New Brunswick; the same is true of Nova Scotia. Towns which a few years ago were prosperous communities are now nothing but ghost towns. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were invested in the building of churches and schools and halls in these communities, and to-day they are falling down. Those who were operating the mines extracted as much profit as they could out of the industry, faulty mining practices were carried on, the resources were destroyed, and now these communities, in which hundreds of thousands of dollars were invested by the people who lived here, are falling down, while those who drew most of the money out of the industry live up in Westmount, Montreal, in beautiful mansions. They never saw that industry and know nothing about it. They were merely interested in getting what they could out of it. In the meantime the workers were left to slave underground and live under the conditions I have described, conditions which no one here would tolerate. The smokeless smoke-stacks in these ghost towns in Nova Scotia and other parts of Canada are a grim monument to those who have been sent here for the last twenty-five years to make our laws. They are an indictment against us.

In my opinion the time has come for the federal government, recognizing the fact that the provincial governments have fallen down on the job of managing that particular industry, to step in and take it over and put it on its feet. If the mechanics as set up in Britain to-day for the nationalization of the coal industry were adopted here, under a realistic minister who wants to get things done, I am sure that the industry in Nova Scotia could be put back on its feet and occupy its proper place in the economy of the province.

There is another thought that I would leave with the house. We must consider the coal resources of this country as a potential supply of fuel oil requirements in the future. I read an article just a few days ago, written by a Toronto university professor, who pointed out that the fuel oil supplies on this North American continent were running out and that with the terrific developments in air transport we would have to turn to the coal resources of this country to meet the requirements of air transportation in the future. That is a long story and a technical one and I shall not go into it this afternoon. I just leave the thought with the members of the government who will be examining the report of the royal commission when it is brought down.

There has been criticism that the commission has taken too long in making its inquiry and report. Personally I am not concerned as to the length of time it takes. I want it to take all the time that is necessary to do a real job. When the commission brings down its report it will be the duty of the members of this house, particularly those from coal-mining areas, to study it closely and to press the federal government for action as soon as possible to preserve and develop our coal resources.

The minister of industry in Nova Scotia pointed out that the major disability from which the industry was suffering was labour relations. I know something about that, and there is a lot in what he says. This labour relations question goes back forty years, when there was terrific opposition to unions in Nova Scotia. Miners were thrown out one hundred per cent from the company houses and lived for nine or ten months in the basements of churches, in tents, all over the country, simply because they wanted to form a union. They were gaoled by the hundreds. The federal government sent in the army, the navy and cavalry, and barbed-wired the province—

An hon. MEMBER: What about the air force?

Mr. GILLIS: They were not organized at that time. This was done at the request of the mining magnates of Canada. That is why there is this bit of resentment; they remember these things. The sons of the men who went through this experience feel that the attitude of the bosses of steel and coal has changed very little. Under a government owned set-up I believe this picture would change. Knowing the miners of Nova Scotia as I do, I believe they would feel that they were working for themselves.

Mr. MITCHELL: I can tell my hon. friend that it has not changed the situation in Great Britain.

Mr. GILLIS: It has not? The minister has not followed the British Hansard.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, yes. I have been reading about it.

Mr. GILLIS: Besides, I would not expect the situation in this country to change in four or five months. It is a job which would take a little time. But if I were still in those coal mines and I found a federal government which had the courage to face up to this problem, I would say that I was working now for myself, and that I had equal responsibility with the government of this country in that they were honestly trying to rehabilitate the industry, get down to brass tacks, increase production, and do everything they could to put the industry on its feet.

Make no mistake about it: the miners at our end of the country know this problem better, perhaps, than anyone else. In their brief to the royal commission which sat in Sydney when it began its work, the miners of Nova Scotia strongly emphasized the necessity of nationalization of that industry. They have no illusions. They have had boards and commissions for thirty years, but nothing came out of it. It was the same old story: pour more money into the coffers of Dominion Steel and Coal, another deficit for them to show at the end of the year as a plea that "we can't pay wages, we can't fix our houses, we can't do anything but sit tight, put pressure on the federal government and squeeze more money out of them." Not a sales agent in the field, but send a wire to Ottawa for new markets and get a delegation of citizens to go there to plead for them. The government has pap-fed them so long now that they sit back and consider themselves your baby, and you continue to hand them the milk-bottle. The industry to-day is completely inefficient and mismanaged, simply because the federal government has given them the money necessary to increase their depreciation at the end of the year, to put money in the reserve fund and to juggle profits from one subsidiary to the other.

I should like to see as quickly as possible the federal government take that industry over, set up the boards I have mentioned, ask the cooperation of the miners of Nova Scotia in putting the industry back on its feet, get a proper valuation of it, squeeze the water out of the stock, and zone the markets of this country that are fairly economical in so far as their industry is concerned. In my opinion if these things were done the labour relations would improve. I believe you can make money in this industry. It is one of our greatest natural resources; it has to be maintained; but I cannot see why the taxpayers of this country should spend millions of dollars a year in subsidizing an industry where the head of the company draws an annual salary of $100,000, another fellow draws a salary of $75,000 a year, and so all the way down the line; and they spend four or five months every year down in Florida fanning themselves with a panama "under the bamboo tree." That kind of person is not necessary. The taxpayers of Canada should not pay such salaries to people who have badly mismanaged one of our greatest resources.

I am going to conclude by urging the federal government to take the necessary steps to give back to the people of Canada a resource which belongs to them, which was deeded over to private interests without asking the people anything about it, which has been badly mismanaged under the system of free enterprise, which has gone down to nothing, which as far as the federal government is concerned has been on relief for the last twenty-five years. It is time the federal government took it over and earnestly considered restoring it to the people, putting it back on its feet, making what money can be made from it and passing the returns back to the people of the industry and the people of Canada in the way of social services.

Mr. BRACKEN: May I ask the hon. member a question, purely as a matter of information, and quite aside from the merit of the argument he has been making with respect to taking over these mines?

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly.

Mr. BRACKEN: The hon. member gave the figure of the production per man per day of coal as being 1·66 tons last year and 1·58 at present. Can he tell us what the average production per man is in Great Britain, and also in some of the better mines of the United States—just as a matter of information.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes. They are away above that.

Mr. BRACKEN: Has the hon. member the figures?

Mr. GILLIS: I have not the actual figures here, but speaking from memory, the United States production is away up, about three times as much.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is about seven tons a day. I can give the approximate figure. I am speaking from memory, but I do not think I am far out. It is down now to almost a ton per man per day in Great Britain. It is just over seven tons in the United States, and I think it is a fraction over three tons in western Canada. Of course there is a reason for this disparity, a reason it is quite easy to give. Mining in the United States is somewhat different. You get there the strip operations and open pits.

Mr. BRACKEN: What was the most production per man in the more favourable days in Nova Scotia?

Mr. GILLIS: It was up around three or four tons. Of course as far as Great Britain is concerned the explanation is that their mines are worked out. They are old seams; they are submarine; they are difficult, and the further you go into them the longer your hauls, so your production per man per day necessarily drops.

Mr. BRACKEN: And the same applies here?

Mr. GILLIS: The same applies in Nova Scotia. New openings are necessary in Nova Scotia. Conditions in the United States, of course, are not comparable at all. It is a straight mechanized electrified proposition. In many instances they just run a steam shovel in the side of a mountain and shovel out the coal.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or they strip the seam.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. GILLIS: Or they strip the seam. The grand average is taken for the industry. Conditions here are less favourable. Nevertheless this is one of our great natural resources and we have to take it as it is. This is the way we shall have to do it. The economy of the province is based on coal. Either you have got to rehabilitate it and put it on its feet, or you must start to move the people of Nova Scotia out of that province. I am reasonably sure that with a proper capital investment and a few new openings in Nova Scotia the industry can be rehabilitated. But you are not going to get that capital investment from the present operators.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): I certainly appreciate the opportunity which has been given to the House of Commons to speak on mining in general. I was surprised to some extent by what I heard from the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), although I must praise him for bringing forward so forcibly the situation of the section of the mining industry in which his province and indeed the whole of Canada is vitally interested, namely coal mining. But I know he will realize that I am not digressing if I discuss mining in general, including gold mining, in which my own section is more particularly interested.

Before I go further, however, may I say that I believe I sense in the remarks of the mover of this resolution something a little milder than might have been heard two or three years ago. I read some of the propaganda which was made by the Socialist party in Great Britain during the general election last fall. Speaking of the question of nationalization of coal mines in Great Britain, the supporters of that party were not backward in telling the British electors that if they were put into power the coal problem would be settled immediately. It was pleasing indeed to me this afternoon when the hon. member for Cape Breton South realized and recognized that it might take some time, even some years, to settle the problems of the coal mining industry in Canada. This surely applies to Great Britain also. At one time the British electors were led to believe that the moment the party got into power the question would be solved immediately.

Mr. COLDWELL: No.

Mr. BRADETTE: I want to complete my thought. It is always easier to theorize and criticize when you have not the responsibility of government. I say that without any bitterness of spirit or any idea of criticism. Our friends of the C.C.F. have that experience in Saskatchewan to-day. In the distant future they may have it in Canada. They may have the responsibility of government. They may theorize at the present time on problems that seem easy of solution, but they may find them awfully hard to solve when they have the responsibility of office.

I read British periodicals and papers of Conservative and Socialist inclinations. Even to-day the British consumers and the British people generally are far from satisfied with the coal situation. The government, through Mr. Attlee, the Prime Minister, and some of his ministers, have told the people, and rightly so, to be patient. They have asked them to endure the same sacrifices that they experienced during the war. In that they are right again. I make this statement deliberately. We all realize that it is much easier to make promises than to fulfil them the moment a party gets into power. I do not say that as an alibi for the shortcomings of my own party. They have been in power for a long time, and they realize the heavy responsibilities that fall not only upon the shoulders of the government and the representatives of the party in the house but also upon the shoulders of parliament.

I want to compliment the hon. member for Cape Breton South on presenting so eloquently and warmly the case for the coal miners and the coal mining industry in general. However, to him the solution is lamentably simple, and that applies to his party generally. Of course we are used to that in the House of Commons.

During the debate on the speech from the throne an amendment was proposed by the historical—it is not historical now; it is too new a party for that—Progressive Conservative party. The amendment suggested that it was possible to solve all the problems of Canada by following some of the policies of the Progressive Conservative party. Then there was a subamendment brought forward and ably presented by the C.C.F. party. Their formula was the simplest one possible: all you had to do was to socialize all industries and all activities in Canada. If that were done you would have a new earthly paradise as far as this country was concerned. All problems would be solved. Later on the able leader of the Social Credit party introduced a subamendment. They are sincere also in their proposals. I studied their policies. I even studied their basic dividends, which none of my relatives in Alberta ever received, although the party promised that it would be the solution of all problems. To their way of thinking the amendment they offered would solve all the problems of this country. It would be done by one simple amendment, one simple gesture. It does not work that way, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion that is one of the weaknesses of democracy.

I was speaking to some fine young men and women the day before yesterday in my office, —the youth movement. I said to them: "As Canadians are you ready to make the sacrifices that the Russian people are called upon to make at the present time for their government and for their country?" In Canada we apparently do not appreciate the benefits of democracy. Generally speaking we are ready and willing to take all the benefits, but very few of us are ready and willing to accept the necessary sacrifices to make it a going concern.

If we have a socialist government next year, or ten years from now, that government will soon find out the solution does not lie in a simple socialist formula.

What is the import of the resolution? It reads as follows:

> Whereas private enterprise in the development of the mineral resources of Canada has not operated in the best interests of all of the people of Canada either in time of peace or in time of war;
> Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of bringing the developed and undeveloped mineral resources of Canada under government control and operation.

This is a far-reaching resolution. If it were approved by parliament it would mean that all Canadians would be led and governed by the government. If you socialize the mineral resources of the country you must of necessity, in my opinion, include all the industries. If my hon. friends are sincere, if they want to go the whole show, as they may some day, they would put a resolution on the order paper calling for the socialization of land. One step leads to the other. You cannot socialize mining, you cannot single out one industry without socializing the whole, the manufacturing industries and so forth. The next step would be socialized farming.

To my way of thinking there is no simple remedy, no one formula to solve the problem. Democracy, as we understand it and practise it in this country and as it is practised in some parts of Europe, learns by its shortcomings and by its errors, and by constructive criticism and by speeches such as we had this afternoon. Through these processes it finds the solution to some of the big problems that have to be faced at the present time. Those problems will never be solved by appealing to demagoguery and promising a new heaven on earth.

One thing I deplore in intelligent and capable people is that for purely political reasons they find it advisable to decry Canada, to speak of other countries, such as Sweden, which we all respect, to speak of countries such as Norway, Australia, New Zealand and so forth, telling us that they are away ahead of us and much better countries in which to live. So far as I am concerned I am satisfied to live in Canada. I think it is the best country under the sun. You will never have a human system which is absolutely perfect. We shall never solve our problems by appeals to passion and promising pie in the sky. During the last federal election in my section of the country we had two fine C.C.F. candidates, one in Temiskaming and the other in Cochrane. One of them was a high-school teacher, a well-qualified, highly-respected citizen. The other was a prosperous pharmacist from Kirkland Lake. Every time I listened to their speeches on the radio I found that they never had a word of praise for their own country. I said to the people of my constituency: "Where is the Canadianism of these two men? Surely there must be something good in Canada. At some time, either in the not distant past or in the near future, there will be something that Canadians should be proud of." But never, never at any time, did they find it possible to utter a word of praise for what Canada had been doing. It was always a country some thousands of miles away from Canada which they praised. They never gave a bit of credit to their own country. I am not speaking politically when I say that, because they did not give any credit to the Liberal party; but at least they could have given some credit to the Canadian people who live here, who want to make it a bigger and better country. These were the only objections I had to their campaign. I have no advice to give to any party, but I do not believe in pessimism. I believe in optimism. I believe in a reformed progressive capitalistic system.

I come from a section of the country where we have been fighting the elements, fighting with nature, where you run by yourself with very little help from any government. We want the country to do as much as it possibly can. It will be no solution to the coal mining problem of Canada for the government to take it over overnight. To my mind the solution would be the finest cooperation possible between the federal and provincial governments, the unions and the owners of these mines. They are all Canadians and they want to build up this country.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South used the old cliche that somebody gets $100,000 a year. He knows quite well that nobody gets $100,000 a year without the Minister of Finance taking seventy-five per cent of it. Then he used the old cliche of their going down to Florida and fanning their faces with a panama hat. I know he wants to be fair. I had to send some of my poor relatives to Florida and I had to go into debt on account of it, but they went down for their health. People do not always go there for pleasure. I deplore any such luxuries and extravagances also, but I do not believe it is fair to group together all the people who happen to be owners and say they are all doing these things, while the fact is that most of them are trying their best to make this a bigger and better Canada. I do not think it is fair to try to make others believe these people are not playing the game with the workers of their particular section of the country. I am making these statements sincerely; I know we are going through strenuous times, but I repeat that these problems will never be solved by any such simple formula.

I could tell the house of perhaps three or four mine owners in my own section of Canada who have been practically a disgrace to the country, and who have done harm to its economy and to the capitalistic system; but they form an infinitesimal minority. Where you get one of these men acting in that way you have hundreds or thousands of others who play the game with everyone. I well remember travelling with a member of the C.C.F. party when the war expenditures committee went to Sault Ste. Marie. I am sure he was quite sincere when te told me, "I realize that to-day no man could become president of a corporation like that purely by accident." Surely it is not fair to this parliament to try to make people believe that because a person happens to be a mine owner or a mine president he is dissipating in California or Florida, or something like that. I resent such statements. They will not help this country generally. I know our hearts go out to those who suffer. I have every sympathy with the miners mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, just as I have sympathy for my own people if they do not receive justice. I have spent weeks and months at a time with my own men in the lumber camps, to see that they received the consideration they deserved.

Mr. PROBE: Was the hon. member subsidized by the government when he was doing that?

Mr. BRADETTE: Subsidized for what?

Mr. PROBE: When you were doing this work about which you are speaking?

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, no, I did that on my own, as the member for my riding and as a citizen of this country. I thought it was my duty to stay with the men, to go with them to the camps to see what the living conditions were, in order that anything that was wrong might be rectified. But if I had gone before these men and said, "Yes, you should keep on striking because the general manager of the Spruce Falls mill is getting $40,000 a year," for instance, would that have helped the situation? Would that have helped these men? Not at all. We went to these higher authorities and told them both the wages and the working conditions were unsatisfactory, and in most cases we won our points.

I am speaking sincerely on this subject, because I believe my constituency is one of the greatest gold mining centres in Canada, if not on the north American continent. I will not mention the names of the men who are at the head of these gold mines, but the hon. member for Cape Breton South was there last winter; no doubt he met some of them and spoke with them, and he must have been struck with their humanitarianism. The homes of most of these general superintendents are open day and night to any of the men; not their offices but their homes. They have made mistakes at times, because, after all, they are human, but they have tried to rectify those mistakes.

Mr. GILLIS: I was not talking about superintendents, because, after all, they are workers too. I am talking about the fellow who lives in Westmount, in Montreal, and who does not see the mine.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, you go and speak to these men in Westmount. They will tell you they are workers too. Everyone is working in his own way. We cannot all have the same occupation. We are working as members of parliament, sitting here this afternoon discussing the problems of the moment. We call ourselves workers. Men who work in the bush or on the drive would say we were having a wonderful time, not doing anything. You cannot apply the same standard to every walk of life, to all the activities of human beings. I do not make that statement with any feeling, because I repeat that I appreciate the fact that the hon. member has brought the situation of the coal mining industry of Canada to the attention of this country. In our section we are far away from the coal mines, and naturally we have to pay high prices for the coal we use in our industries.

Let me give the house another example of what public ownership has done in my part of the country. Twenty-five or thirty years ago some fine old prospectors—and God bless them; they are doing wonderful work for this country—found a great lignite field in northern Ontario. Immediately they came to our section they raised money among themselves; they went back again to stake the land and so on. Then, and I do not say this in a critical way because I believe it was done with the very best intentions, Hon. Charles McCrea, an outstanding man who was in Mr. Ferguson's cabinet, expropriated that lignite field without any compensation at all to those of us who had put money into it. Very high hopes were entertained that the government was going to see that the lignite field would be worked and exploited for the benefit of the people. That was over twenty-five years ago, but I do not believe we have seen more than three or four tons of that lignite coal. In connection with that field there has been more political gerrymandering than I have ever seen anywhere else. All governments have to take some blame for that situation, because they all went in and made an awful mess of it. I maintain that if private interests had been allowed to invest capital and take a chance there, as we do in our own mining section, the needs of northern Ontario to-day would be largely supplied from that lignite field. I am sure the Ontario members who are listening to me will agree with that statement.

Talk about public ownership of mines! We all remember the old, historic town of Cobalt, where silver mining boomed for many years. When it was at its peak the Ontario government, again with the best of intentions, expropriated one of these mines which was to be run by the government. What happened? Prior to being expropriated that mine was showing a fine surplus each year. After being operated by the Ontario government, for a year and a half it had such large deficits they had to close up the mine and get out of the mining business.

I give these examples in order that the house may realize the exact situation. I repeat that I think there is only one solution of the problems of the coal mining industry, which is so vital to our economy; and that solution is not an easy one. We realize that with all the coal we have in the east and the west most of our industries in southern Ontario have to use coal brought from Pennsylvania; and that applies even more forcibly to northern Ontario. It is true that coal has no nationality, and we have to do this because of transportation costs and also, in many instances, because of the quality of the coal we must buy. So that if we are ever to solve the coal problem, of which my hon. friend spoke so eloquently, we must find some method by which it will be possible to get that fine Nova Scotia coal to both southern and northern Ontario. If that could be done we would be your best customers and would readily buy all that coal we could use in order to help the miners of Nova Scotia and strengthen the whole national economy of this country.

I have mentioned mining in general. I offer no excuse if for a few moments I speak of the gold mining of my own section, with which I am more familiar. Many people think gold mining is such a bonanza that one can put in a dollar and after a year or two be worth a million dollars. I know my hon. friends from Nipissing and Temiskaming, and others who have invested money in gold mining operations, have always come out losers. I know I have been a loser all the way through.

An hon. MEMBER: You should be a promoter.

Mr. BRADETTE: I must say to the hon. member that with all the regulations we have from Toronto, even promoters do not always come out on the right side. We have at Queens Park some fine, well trained watch-dogs. It is true that sometimes, through bucket-shop practices, some people may be fleeced, but that was never done with official sanction, whether we had a Progressive, a Conservative or a Liberal government in office. They have always tried to play fair with everybody. The gold mining industry means a great deal to our national economy, but it is highly speculative. I wish I could put on record how many people are making money in it, and how many people are always showing deficits. As hon. members all know, personal initiative means a very great deal in connection with gold mining, silver mining, nickel mining, or any metal mining development. No doubt many hon. members listening to me this afternoon have met prospectors, both old and young. How keen these men are; how they love their jobs. Could you visualize putting these men into government service as civil servants? Could you visualize a young prospector, who has his heart in the north country, being told, "Now, we are going to put you under a civil service organization. You are going to be allowed to go to this territory only so many days or so many weeks. Then you must come back and report." You could never have any real prospecting under such conditions.

[Mr. Bradette.]

Mr. GILLIS: But the government is sending them out now.

Mr. BRADETTE: Oh, no, not now. They are sending expert men to make a map geology analysis of the whole country, to show prospectors, promoters and others who may be interested the possibility of undertaking new ventures. Surely my hon. friends do not want to create the impression that this government has a special department of prospectors, who prospect for and promote the mines they find? It does not work out in that way. Again I say that the minute you make a businessman a civil servant for the rest of his life, just at that moment you lose most of his qualifications and ability for personal initiative.

Mr. GILLIS: You release him from bondage. You take him out of the hands of the companies.

Mr. BRADETTE: The word "bondage" may have different significance in different places. It sounds as though the hon. member wishes to create the impression that we in the north country are in the relationship of masters and slaves.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member mentioned prospectors. I said that the government all through this war and even at the present time have sent prospectors out all over the country, grub-staking them and financing them. Then, when they found something they had to come back and turn it over to one of the mining companies. Why not turn it over to the government?

Mr. BRADETTE: It was done under war conditions.

Mr. GILLIS: They are still doing it.

Mr. BRADETTE: Not on a large scale. To prove what I say, I shall place before the house some of the features about mining, particularly in my own section of the country. Prospecting for new minerals at the present time in Canada has all but ceased and, if the mining industry is to continue on any worthwhile basis, this unfortunate situation must be corrected immediately. Emphasizing the necessity for quick action is the fact that under war-time demands for maximum metal production, coupled with a labour shortage, development work at producing mines has been necessarily and drastically curtailed, and ore reserves are being dissipated at an accelerated pace.

We have all heard of Mr. LaBine, who went away up into the north country, into the far north, which most of the Canadian people knew nothing about. Most people thought it was too far away; they really did not realize how far it was—up in the Great Bear lake district. But what a great thing it was for the world when there were found pitchblende, the ore from which radium is derived, and uranium.

Would that have been done under the civil service? Would it have been done by men who were paid by the government at so much an hour or so much a day? Great sacrifices were made by the men who went there. At the present time we have hundreds of young men in my section of the country—men from Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, men from every centre of population in Canada. Those men are preparing themselves, equipping themselves, to go into the wilderness, in among the flies and in the rain and bad weather, where they will have none of the comforts of life.

Why do they do it? They do it because they believe in private enterprise. They do it because they believe that to a certain extent we should work out our own salvation. Can we visualize their working for any government, provincial, municipal or federal, and working under those conditions? Can we visualize their asking for two or three months leave to do prospecting work of that kind? This applies to all walks of life.

I for one, of French descent, can never visualize the British people being absolutely tied down under the yoke of socialism or Marxism. The British empire, as we know it, would never have developed or would never have been built under a principle of socialism, because socialism simply means this, that the individual loses his identity. That would, generally speaking, be absolutely repugnant to the British people. Without trying to prophesy, I am certain that never in Great Britain, even under a so-called socialistic government will they have absolute state socialism. That is my belief, so far as that country is concerned.

This brings up some strange things. I wish the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) were in his seat at the moment. He made certain references the other day to the royal family which, perhaps, I shall have another occasion to mention.

Some people are inclined to the view that the mining industry generally is making large profits. I well remember the days when Viscount Bennett was prime minister of this country. At that time, ignoring the advice of an able minister from my northern section of the country, a gentleman who was then minister of labour, Hon. Wesley Gordon, a bullion tax was put on gold. It was thought that this would be good policy, and that it would be a popular move. But the first thing he knew, not only did he have the mining interests coming to Ottawa with their protests, but in addition he had the prospectors. He had the investors, the retailers, the wholesalers, the manufacturers—all of them were coming here and telling him it was a mistake. After a few months the government was honest enough to withdraw that bullion tax. Yes, it looked good on paper, because people are always thinking in terms of profits of gold mining or nickel mining; but it did not work out in practice.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South has shown, and rightly so, that the coal mining industry at the present time is not in a position to produce all it should, or to permit working conditions which should be permitted. That bullion tax was taken away because it would destroy the initiative of those connected with mining operations.

I have no doubt that everyone is interested in gold mining in this country. I can well remember the hon. member who formerly represented the constituency of Grey-Bruce, Miss Agnes Macphail, being invited to speak at the commencement exercises which took place in the vocational school at Timmins. In her opening remarks she said, "You are a strange people up here in the north country. You sweat and work day and night all your lives to extract these things from the earth; then you ship it down to our section of the country and we bury it in the ground." Then George Drew—not the premier of Ontario, but another George Drew, who was mayor of Timmins—said this to Miss Macphail: "Well, what you say is possibly true. But I understand you come from a section of the country where you produce large quantities of tobacco. Up here we buy that tobacco at fair prices—sometimes at high prices—and turn it into ashes and smoke." This shows that in a national economy there is a necessity for all manner of activities which may be found within the boundaries of a country.

Regardless of what some of my Social Credit friends may say, there is a sound reason for gold mining in Canada. If that industry were denied to the country, we would realize what a tremendous influence it has had. For instance, in my own section alone there are tens of thousands of people who are interested and employed in gold mining. More than that, we have always a ready market for our product. Surely we should be the last to destroy a community which has that gold production. Indeed, the whole world seems to have been satisfied with the find which was made in South Africa only a few days ago.

So that it shows there is no special privilege given to this industry. There was a member in the house at one time who represented one of the Winnipeg seats—I believe it was Mr. Heaps, who is now in the government employ—who discussed the bullion tax, and referred to gold mining as a sheltered industry. I rose in my place immediately and said that there was certainly no shelter so far as gold mining is concerned. They have never wanted anything from any government. All they want is to live their own lives and to be dealt with fairly by government in matters of taxation.

One cannot visualize the government's going into mining. Let us picture the government spending the public's money and then, after a year or two of functioning, finding out that the venture was not what had been expected, with the result that the property would be left as it was in the first instance, possibly after losing a million dollars. Let us remember that in Flin Flon private capital and private enterprise spent about $30 million before it was in a position to produce.

What can the government do? Will it spend $30 million on a venture? Let us suppose that it does venture, and does spend $30 million on something which proves to be a fizzle, on a property where the ore bed did not measure up to expectations, and where the country has to spend large sums of money for nothing. These are the things we must remember when we think of mining.

Let me say this, too, that governments have very few qualities of human beings, but very many of their faults—and that applies to all governments. For instance, let us consider nazism. Would any citizen of any country of his own initiative, through the activities of a single man, allow youth to be destroyed by the millions and tens of millions? That is what is done by governments. Can you visualize, for instance, what would have happened in England if there had been nationalization of industry at the time of the invention of the steam engine and the internal combustion engine? Can you visualize the government investing $5,000,000,000 to replace equipment that would be discarded almost overnight? It has never been done and it will never be done.

I repeat that I believe implicitly in the closest possible cooperation. Of necessity we must revolutionize our capitalistic system, but in doing that the workers will have to make some sacrifices, management will have to make sacrifices, and every citizen of this country will have to make sacrifices in order to make it a going concern.

You will never hear a whisper of a strike from the workers or farmers in Russia. I am not here to discuss communism or the internal policies of that wonderful country, but no one can make me believe that in Russia they enjoy the same liberties that are enjoyed in Canada or in other sections of the world. The Russian government has instilled into the minds of its people the necessity of sacrifice by everyone for the good of the whole, and they are doing it. We will never deprive the workers of their right to strike when it is necessary to strike. More than that, we will never deprive any section of our population of full access to our governmental machinery. But even in times like the present, every section of the population must be prepared to make some sacrifice in order that we may arrive at a solution of the problems of peace.

I should like to give a few figures in connection with metal production in Ontario in 1941. Of the mineral production 76·4 per cent was derived from mineral areas discovered prior to 1910. We have to be careful with our mining industry. We do not want to destroy it. Some of the older mining fields have been worked out. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has referred to places in which there are ramshackle buildings, but those are in districts in which the mines have been worked out. Some hon. members may remember the old town of Cobalt, although many are too young to have seen it in its best days. In the past few years that district has been deteriorating because the mining is playing out. Of the mineral production 13·2 per cent was derived from mineral areas discovered between 1910 and 1920; 4·3 per cent was derived from mineral areas discovered between 1920 and 1930, and only 6·1 per cent was derived from mineral areas discovered since 1930. I am putting these figures on Hansard because I am afraid that a resolution of this kind may scare away some of the capital which is necessary for the development of our own section of the country.

I can remember when Mr. Howard Ferguson was minister of mines and forests for Ontario. He went over to the United States and was able to interest $15,000,000 worth of capital in the development of the natural resources of the province. Those men were willing to risk their money. Many risks have been taken in connection with mining. Mining is not wholly on a dividend basis. Hon. members will probably be surprised to know that the Ontario records show that 2,800 claims were recorded during the period of 1907-41 inclusive for each company which paid one or more dividends. There was a total of 317 companies which reached production, but only 113 reached the taxpaying stage in any amount. Only 1·8 per cent of some 4,426 organizations formed for precious metal mining were sufficiently successful to make any return whatsoever to their shareholders. It will be noted in this connection that not all of this 1·8 per cent could be considered to have been economically successful.

Before concluding I should like to make a few remarks about private and public enterprise. I come from a section of the country in which we have had to stand on our own feet as far as development is concerned. We could never have developed our forests and our mines if we had had to wait for the government of the day, whoever they might have been, to carry on this development. I have always been in favour of the Ontario hydro, but I should like to make a statement which may astonish some hon. members. I have farmed and resided in northern Ontario, in the Cochrane district, for nearly forty years, and still we have not the benefit of the Ontario hydro. During that period the provincial treasury has paid $10,000,000 to subsidize rural lines in southern Ontario. I have no quarrel with that because I am perfectly satisfied that the farmers of southern Ontario should enjoy the full benefit of the Ontario hydro, but we in the north country have helped to pay for the hydro lines in southern Ontario and we receive no benefits. I can remember going to Toronto and appearing before the hydro commission to inquire what they were going to do about providing hydro for our part of the country and I was always given the answer that the field was too speculative.

The fine industrial town of Kapuskasing was built by private enterprise. The Porcupine and Kirkland Lake districts, the Rouyn-Noranda district, and the Sudbury district, were all developed by private capital and private enterprise. These private enterprises have paid taxes into the provincial treasury, which taxes have helped to support the Ontario hydro. I am not criticizing that; besides, this is not the time to go too deeply into that matter. However, I want hon. members to know that the Ontario hydro has paid no taxes whereas the private corporations have.

Private enterprise took its money into the wilderness and gambled with it. Private enterprise has had to pay all the taxes I have mentioned. Only two years ago the Ontario hydro expropriated the Northern Power Company at Timmins and immediately the town of Timmins found itself short $35,000 in municipal taxes. I want hon. members to realize that it is not all so golden and rosy as some people would have us believe. If we had had to wait for the Ontario hydro to develop northern Ontario, we would be waiting yet.

There must be cooperation between private enterprise and governmental activities, but I do not believe, nor do I think the majority of Canadian people believe, that the solution of the problems of this country will be arrived at by socializing our mining and other industries, and eventually our land. If you socialize one section of the national activities, you must socialize others. I should like to quote H. D. Ainley, of the C.C.F. who said:

> The C.C.F. has considered socialization of land. . . There are many advantages to the farmer from some form of socialism . . . We can learn much from Russia in this respect . . . Social security cannot be obtained as long as we leave control of our production in the hands of private individuals.

That is going pretty far. I believe if that language were repeated to the western farmers they would not fall in with such a system.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the hon. gentleman reading?

Mr. BRADETTE: I am quoting Mr. H. D. Ainley.

Mr. COLDWELL: Never heard of him.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. H. D. Ainley on agricultural policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: He is a private member of the organization. We do not smother people's views if they want to express them.

Mr. POULIOT: Yesterday evening it was not the same thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not smother his views; I repudiated them.

Mr. BRADETTE: Here is another statement by the C.C.F.:

> We cannot definitely state how much land a man will be allowed to hold. We propose that land socialization shall be voluntary.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said that?

Mr. BRADETTE: That is from the C.C.F. Saskatchewan farmer-labour group hand book, 1933. Then the following statement was made at the annual convention of the British Columbia C.C.F. on April 17, 1943:

> Collective agriculture by the institution of methods of collective farming, such as have featured Soviet Russia's system, and by the creation of a provincial government monopoly in the purchase, processing and wholesaling of farm products, both those grown here and those imported.

These are definite words. I am just quoting them to the house to make hon. members realize that once you get started you cannot stop half-way. Natural resources belong primarily to the provinces. If the resolution were adopted by the government there would immediately be conflict with the provinces. The provincial premiers, the premier of Ontario, the premier of Quebec and the premier of Saskatchewan, who are always ready to fight for provincial rights, would be among the first to protest against such nationalization. I know the ability and energy and honesty of purpose of the premier of Saskatchewan because I have listened to him for years in this house. No one can doubt his sincerity of purpose but even he has not honesty of purpose of the premier of Saskatchewan. He has picked out a few industries but has not extended the field of socialization to mining. He has not even yet expropriated land for collective farming. I know enough of the western farmers to know that the moment any government sought to introduce collective farming there would be a terrific revolt because every farmer wants to own his own farm. No one can tell me that the western farmers are ready for socialization of farming.

Mr. COLDWELL: They do not have to be socialized because in this country a few people do not own all the land. The land is already socialized through individual ownership.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is only a relative statement. The hon. member, who is so capable, knows that I may have a mortgage on my home or a farmer may have a mortgage on his farm, and while the law might compel me to pay the mortgage, no government has the right to interfere with the property.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nobody wants to.

Mr. BRADETTE: The same principle applies to farms owned by the farmers of the west. They may have obligations on their land; but the land is theirs; their home is theirs, and even the King of England has no right to enter without permission. But under socialization it would be entirely different. Let us be fair. You cannot call it fish at one time and flesh at another; it must be the same at all times. Our problems are great and difficult, but I believe in the intelligence of our people. I believe that in this parliament and in our provincial legislatures it will be possible to find a solution of all our problems.

In conclusion, I just wish to say how grateful I am personally—and this applies to my section of the country—for the spirit in which the premiers of the provinces met with the dominion last year to discuss dominion-provincial relations. No part of this country is greater than the whole. Every member of this parliament is primarily a municipalist; that is, we believe in our own little town or big town, as the case may be, in our rural sections. Secondly, we are provincialists. But over and above all that, we stand for this wonderful country which is Canada, and I hope that when the premiers meet the dominion again the same spirit will animate them which prevailed in the last two conferences. That will be one of the best signs that we are going to develop into a still greater and better Canada.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to follow the argument of the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) because he dealt with coal mining. The resolution however, distinctly refers to the mineral resources of Canada, and that is the subject with which I wish to deal.

In my time I have had a lot to do with minerals of one kind and another, and I am familiar with all the difficulties experienced by prospectors, geologists and engineers in the discovery and opening up of our mineral resources. If what they have done could be written up it would be a romantic saga of their achievements.

The mining industry has been one of the great industries of Canada. I do not say that it is the greatest but it is one of our very great industries. It is one industry that has done a major job in opening up this country. If I may turn to the resolution for a moment it says:

> Whereas private enterprise in the development of the mineral resources of Canada has not operated in the best interests of all of the people of Canada either in time of peace or in time of war . . .

That is a very broad statement which could not possibly be proved in any way. I am opposed to the resolution because I am in favour of private enterprise and private initiative. I have seen in my lifetime the marvellous achievements of private enterprise and private initiative, and my opinion based on that experience is that it would be impossible to have much initiative or enterprise in the mining industry if it were taken over by the government. The achievements of the mining industry are the result of private enterprise and private initiative. I think of the men I have met in the far north, the prospectors, and what they went through, how they had to endure the black flies, or bulldogs as they called them, and huge mosquitoes, grandfather and grandmother mosquitoes as they called them, when there was no such thing as Stayaway and other such liquids for protecting the human race against these pests; and when I think of all they went through and of what they achieved my hat goes off to them on every occasion. They never would have done it had it not been for private enterprise and private initiative. No man living would have endured what they endured if they were working for the government and had no chance of obtaining something for themselves through their own enterprise and initiative.

The resolution goes on to say:

Therefore be it resolved that, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of bringing the developed and undeveloped mineral resources of Canada under government control and operation.

Your honour, that is such a stupendous order that, in my opinion, it is absolutely impossible for any government to undertake it. Think of the capital invested in the mining industry, at present between one and a quarter and one and one-half billion dollars, and employing anywhere from 115,000 to 150,000 people. To think of the government undertaking to control that amount of capital and make it pay and that number of employees just in one single industry—it is out of the question; it just could not be done. The whole industry would go to pieces under any such basis of operation.

There are three classes of minerals. There are, first, the precious metals, gold, silver, perhaps copper, nickel, aluminum, platinum and radium, if it is a mineral, and so on. Then there are the base metals, such as iron, lead and other minerals of that order. Then there are the industrial minerals, if they may be so called, such as gypsum, mica, feldspar, and in particular, dolomite, because from it we get a real mineral, magnesium metal. Each one of these classes is a wide study in itself; each one has a long history behind it and many ramifications. To me it is inconceivable that any government with the material it has at hand could direct or control, much less operate, production in these various lines of minerals. It takes all the ingenuity, skill, ability and experience of private enterprise to bring about production of the various kinds of minerals.

The last speaker said, quite rightly, that the mineral problem is largely under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. Just how this government could step into Ontario, which produces 49·4 per cent of all the mineral production of Canada, or into any of the provinces which supply the remainder of the production, and undertake this class of production, I do not know. I do not know how they could operate under this resolution. This is provincial business, and we have difficulty enough in getting along now with the provinces, without any further interference in such a wide and large business as mining with all its ramifications of employment and laws in connection therewith. I do not believe it could be done. Therefore the resolution, in my opinion, could not be put into effect.

Take just one of the minerals which I have mentioned—nickel. In that industry anywhere from $170 million to $200 million is invested. There are employed in that industry approximately 15,000 men and women. How any government could undertake to operate the nickel industry I do not know. In the first place the government would have to obtain the capital necessary to take it over. In the second place it would be wholly out of the question for a government to operate the nickel industry with 15,000 people; a government would require not less than 30,000, probably 45,000. I believe the ratio as between government and private industry operation is as three to one. This, of course, would provide some additional employment, but it would also certainly add to the cost of production and make it impossible to compete in the world's markets. I suppose it could be contended that this is not wholly true of the nickel industry, because Canada contains not less than ninety per cent of the world's nickel resources. But, as the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) pointed out, if we socialized the mineral industry the process would not stop there. We would have to socialize every industry. Just fancy the government operating every industry in Canada! It is utterly out of the question.

I am perhaps more familiar with the iron and steel industry. At the moment Canada does not produce a great deal of iron ore, but we are rapidly getting along, and we are going to produce more. In recent months I have been to some big iron mines and before long they will be producing a great deal of iron; other large new mines are about to be opened up. The iron and steel industry has invested in it something like $235 million and it employs approximately 35,000 employees. When you start socializing a nation's industries you get into astronomical figures. At the moment these industries are handled and operated by tried and trained men, men who could not possibly work under government direction. I would no more work under government direction in industry than I would fly up in the air. Once I was required to lose my initiative, my right to initiate private enterprise, I would get out of the business immediately. Therein lies the difference between private enterprise and government operation.

If I might speak personally, I know one man, engaged in processing raw iron into the finished product, who wore himself out and had to go to hospital for four months to recover, from sitting up all hours of the night, and even thinking in bed after he got there, trying to figure out methods of production of a particular form of lathe, a machine which did more than any other individual instrument in Canadian industry toward winning the war. It is inconceivable that any government employee would sit up all night long, week in and week out, trying to determine how to achieve this or that. It would not be done; it is not done outside of private industry. But it takes both private industry and private initiative to achieve what this country has achieved. I have a thorough knowledge of that in connection with the iron industry. I was in it; I myself worked all hours of the night, week out and week in, to discover and process plans for the production of the lines of material I was in. No one could conceive of employees of the government doing that. You would not expect them to do it. They are not employed to do it. They are employed to carry out the directions of the departments, and do it well, and no country in the world is served better by its public employees than Canada is. I have the highest regard and respect for them. But I would never expect them to go through what I went through when I was in industry, or what a multitude of others whom I know went through.

I remember when, a few years ago, gold was increased in value. The hon. member for Cochrane, whose riding I know well, has spoken of gold. I have spent considerable time at the Lake Shore mines, at Wright Hargreaves, Macassa, in the Lake Shore area, at the Hollinger, Dome and other mines in the Timmins area. This country owes a vast amount of respect for what the mining industry of northern Ontario has accomplished. At that time the price of gold was, I believe, $20.67 per fine ounce. The world was in the throes of the depression. Through the efforts of our own government here, the then prime minister, Mr. Bennett, and the then president of the United States, as well as others, a conference was organized in London at which the price of gold was raised to what it is now, namely $35 plus exchange, or $38.50 Canadian per fine ounce. What was the result? It broke the back of the depression. That is what started the world on its way again, and that is one thing we owe the mining industry. The amount of purchases made by this industry is almost inconceivable.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Think of the thousand and one items of manufactured material which have gone, for example, into northern Ontario, as one great mining area, or into the Flin Flon area, or into the Yellowknife area, where there are great gold fields. Materials purchased by these gold mines, initiated and operated by private enterprise, have kept thousands of factories in operation in eastern Canada. To my mind, anything which interferes in any way with the initiating of new mines of any description would be bad for this country. Yet this resolution calls for taking over not only the present mines, but potential ones. That is a large order and would be detrimental to this country. I do not believe that capital would come into this country and open up new mines under such a programme. Any restrictions on the mining industry that would interfere with the investment of capital will not get my support. We need more capital to open up more and more mines. Any restrictions on that would be detrimental to this country.

I have no option but to oppose any resolution such as this. The hon. member for Cape Breton South is an earnest man. I have sat on many committees with him and I have always found that he used his own best judgment. He was always sincere and earnest in what he proposed in the committees. All I can say with regard to this resolution is that perhaps he has not had the wide business experience that is required to discuss a matter of industrial advance. I believe that he is wrong in so far as the terms of this resolution are concerned. If he had mentioned ways and means of expanding the mining industry, as I believe it can be expanded in Canada, for there is no country in the world that has such incomparable mineral resources, then I could have supported him.

The mining industry can be expanded. Some hon. member mentioned sending out more and more geologists. That is one way in which it could be done. More geologists should be sent out. Another hon. member said that in the last few years the government has been sending young men into the mining areas during the holidays. I supported that because it gives them an opportunity to learn how to prospect. When they return to the universities—the great majority of them are university students—the experience they have gained in the field will help them in their studies, and when they finish their studies they will be much more capable of achieving success in the prospecting they undertake.

In addition to increasing the number of prospectors, I would increase the number of geologists and mining engineers. That is one way in which we can advance this country. If we develop our mines we develop our country. I am sure that the hon. member for Cape Breton South is just as anxious as I am to increase the mining industry in Canada. He knows as well as I do that in that way we can expand industry all over Canada, because in some way or another, in the last analysis, much of our industry is associated with the mining industry.

Some time ago I advocated a plan whereby the federal government could assist the provincial governments in the development of roads in the mining areas. I was happy to learn that my suggestion was carried out in connection with mining areas in northern Ontario. I do not say that the government should finance it, but they should do something to assist the local provincial governments in the development of mining roads. It will be remembered that as a result of a recommendation in this house the roadway from Hawk Junction in northern Ontario was extended to the Helen Mountain iron mine where they are turning out about 750,000 tons of siderite ore a year, which, when smelted, produces about 250,000 tons of No. 1 pig iron. In that way the government can help. I would support the government taking other means to make it easier for investors to get into the mining areas, and for the mining companies to expand those areas and then get the raw product out to the market. That is one way in which we can assist in the opening of our mining areas. I take a strong stand on this, because industry in this part of Canada is frequently engaged in making large machines for the mines. That is true all over Canada. I remember when I last visited Yellowknife. I saw on the docks large amounts of iron and steel equipment made in Dundas by the Bertram company. It was shipped to the Yellowknife for use in some of the mines in that area. That is the way the country expands. We open up new areas. Orders come here which mean jobs for men in the factories in the eastern part of Canada. From your own city, sir, a large amount of mining machinery is shipped to northern Ontario, to Flin Flon, to the Yellowknife, to the Yukon and to British Columbia, which is also a great mining country.

I believe one or two other hon. members wish to speak on this resolution and I think they should have an opportunity. I am opposed to this resolution because I am for private enterprise and private initiative. I am for government assistance in every legitimate way to open up the country and provide jobs.

Mr. SOLON E. LOW (Peace River): I think I should take just a few minutes to place before the house the views of my group regarding this resolution. If the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) had brought in a resolution regarding the coal situation in Canada and had confined it to that subject I am satisfied that coal would have received much better consideration here this afternoon than will possibly be the case when it is attempted to discuss this resolution as it is placed on the order paper. I am happy that the hon. member brought it forward, however, and I am pleased at the indications of widespread concern over the coal situation. However, I shall not be able, in the few minutes that I shall speak, to deal with coal in any comprehensive way. I must confine myself largely to the principle of the resolution itself.

Before I enter into that part of the discussion, I should like to refer briefly to one or two matters which were brought up in the course of the remarks of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). I should like to point out to him that if his memory is so bad that he has in his mind only the one principle of the national dividend which has been advocated by the social credit organization, I would suggest that he improve himself by a little more reading and studying, because nobody in this organization has ever said that the implementing of a system of national dividends would solve all our problems. That principle is only one of a whole series that makes up the complete philosophy of social credit.

We believe in a system of economic and political democracy. Our philosophy is comprehensive and complete, a philosophy of life. We are in no way merely monetary reformers. We in no way advocate a single, simple solution of our complex problems in this land. We know they are complex, and we know no single thing will solve all these problems. But we do say, and with very good reason and evidence to support our assertion, that if the principles advocated by the social credit organization were applied we would set this old country on the road to peaceful prosperity. The rest of it would have to be worked out as we go along.

I was surprised that the hon. member took so much time to sideswipe the various political organizations represented in this house, of course with the exception of the Liberal organization, when he should have devoted his time to a discussion of the resolution itself. Some of the arguments he presented in support of the mining of gold bear little weight. One would almost think he was pleading the cause of the gold people. As far as I am concerned I do not care whether another pound of gold is ever mined in this or any other country. I am satisfied that the thousands of people now engaged in the gold mining industry in Canada could find work just as lucrative, just as pleasant, and just as congenial in some other field that would yield a much better return to the whole world. I never saw anyone who could eat gold. I never saw anyone who could clothe himself in gold. I never saw anyone who was very happy when he was involved in the intricacies of gold. I have yet to see anyone successfully demonstrate that gold is of vast importance in our national economy as the hon. member suggests. I am going to leave my remarks with respect to the hon. member's address at that.

I wish to point out briefly, Mr. Speaker, that I look upon this resolution as one more step toward the centralization of power in the hands of the federal government. I am opposed to this principle on the ground that true democracy simply cannot exist under centralization of authority. The best guarantee of good administration, good government and the orderly development of our resources is to decentralize as far as possible. If this resolution had been brought forward in one of the provincial legislatures; if rather than federal government ownership, it had provided for further decentralization so that the municipalities of that province might have more or less say in the control and development of the resources, then I would have given it sympathetic support. Let me point out that the western provinces, particularly Alberta and Saskatchewan, were not granted control of their resources in 1905, when they became provinces. Their resources were left in the hands, and under the administration, of the federal government under a system of completely centralized control and ownership. I would point out also that it was a very real government ownership. Nobody owned, and nobody controlled, except the federal government. During the twenty-five year period from 1905 to 1930 the dominion government demonstrated what happens when centralization takes place and when a central government attempts to own, control and develop the resources. It left to Alberta and Saskatchewan a legacy of complicated problems and disabilities which it will take many decades to clear away.

[Mr. Low.]

What are some of these problems? In a short discussion of these matters I cannot confine my remarks merely to the mineral resources, but what I have to say in general about the resources of the province of Alberta will, of course, hold true for the mineral resources. The first problem created, which has complicated the lives of the people in Saskatchewan and Alberta, was the haphazard land settlement policy of the federal government, which owned and controlled those lands in those two western provinces. They allowed, yes, encouraged, the building of widespread communities, some of them hundreds of miles apart in the hinterland, in the wild, undeveloped areas of the provinces. There was no orderly settlement, no orderly policy of settlement and there could not be with the government three thousand miles away, having no intimate association or knowledge of conditions existing in those areas and, I might add, not very much interest. They allowed the settlement of marginal and sub-marginal land. Not only did they allow it; they encouraged the settlement of land in the Palliser triangle which they knew perfectly well was not fit for settlement. I say they knew this perfectly well. The Palliser report was in the hands of the federal government for a good many years prior to the time the settlement of that area was entered upon. But they brought in settlers just the same; they colonized the land largely through the homestead method.

I might just point out that the settlement of those marginal and sub-marginal lands has cost the people of Alberta fully $25,000,000 in rehabilitation alone. They have written off their books more than $16,000,000 of taxes, seed grain advances and relief advances. To rehabilitate those areas fully after this haphazard settlement will require many more millions. That settlement in Saskatchewan and Alberta was so poorly planned under federal government ownership, administration and development that in Alberta, for example, we have had to build 96,000 miles of roads to link up the scattered communities of the province, which in itself is no mean item when it comes to maintenance. So that I say I have yet to be convinced that government ownership and development is the policy we should follow.

The second problem is the alienation from the crown—the people—of not less than 50 per cent of the total mineral resources of Alberta. The people found they did not own even 50 per cent of the mineral resources, after those resources were returned to them in 1930. They had been given away as gifts to the Hudson's Bay company, to the Canadian Pacific Railway company, to the C. and E. Corporation and others; and when it came to trying to obtain a fair share of the returns from the development of these resources the people of Alberta could not do so simply because under centralized federal government control and development those resources had been alienated from the crown and therefore from the people of the province.

Mr. PROBE: Is the hon. member arguing at this stage that this is an example of government ownership and control? It seems to me that would be a most flagrant case of government maladministration.

Mr. LOW: I am pointing it out as a fair sample of what we can expect if we centralize the development and control of resources in the hands of the federal government.

Mr. PROBE: Of the Liberal organization.

Mr. LOW: No doubt the C.C.F. would be entirely different.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member who has the floor may not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am asking permission of the hon. gentleman, if he will allow me to ask a question. Would he say, then, that he would be in favour of government ownership under the control of the provincial government, but not under the federal government?

Mr. LOW: Near the close of my few remarks I shall explain the policy I advocate, if the hon. member will allow me. I shall not forget it. Let me go on for just one moment.

The third problem that was created in that period of federal government ownership, control and development, in the twenty-five years between 1905 and 1930, which has had far-reaching results, was the depletion of the timber resources, and particularly those of Alberta. This has come about through timber slashing. Those resources were wasted; there was no reforestation; there was no attempt whatsoever to preserve watersheds. Streams became dry and, as a result, atmosphere and rainfall conditions changed.

A careful study of the situation over the years has shown that the federal government in its own areas has been a notoriously bad fire-fighter. As a matter of fact, in some areas it has done nothing whatsoever to assist. Last year I happened to visit in the United States just across the boundary line from Waterton lakes national park. I got into the area known as Glacier national park in that country. While there, I met dozens of young men who were acting as wardens and who looked for fires every day. The United States government was spending considerable money, but it was also making money because those young men were watching and preserving the timber resources of the country. At the same time, just across the border line in Alberta fires were raging in our own Waterton national park, an area which is supposed to be watched over and preserved by the federal government. Nothing was being done in Canada; the watersheds were being destroyed. It is high time something was done to prevent that sort of waste.

Another problem has been our coal problem. The hon. member for Cape Breton South made a strong plea on behalf of that industry, particularly as it applies to Nova Scotia and the Cape Breton area. In the few remarks I shall make about coal let me say at the outset that in Alberta we have a big coal problem. Coal is our greatest mining operation and, next to agriculture, our greatest resource. In Alberta for many years we have attempted to develop the Ontario market for our coal.

During the war we have seen another example of what happens under centralized federal controls, and the house should know about it. The government appointed a fuel administrator. Under his dictatorial powers he set aside certain areas in Albert which were supposed to be supplementary strip-mining areas. He built tipples and spurs of railway track. He brought in huge implements and machinery, and commenced a process of strip-mining. Mind you, those strip mines produced the worst coal we have in Alberta. With only a small amount of overburden, it is only natural that that coal would be our poorest quality. The average depth of our mines would run from 200 to 400 feet, and at those depths the coal is of better quality. But, would you believe it, the coal for which permission was granted for shipment to Ontario, to keep up the market for Alberta coal, was derived from those strip mines! No wonder some of the people in northern Ontario said, "What in the world do you mean by sending us such stuff as that?"

Mr. PROBE: To make the Pennsylvania coal more popular.

Mr. LOW: Perhaps that is it. But that is just one example of the quality of the control that is exercised by a centralized federal government, which is located so far away from the actual scene of operations. We realize that the coal problem is an extremely big one, and that it is complicated. There is no simple formula for its solution, and it is well to remember that. Perhaps in Nova Scotia, as in Alberta, our greatest single problem in connection with coal is that of marketing. Markets have to be found as near the mining operations as possible. I am convinced that the solution for Alberta in the future is so to develop that resource that the product can be used in the province. I am convinced that Alberta sits on the site of the greatest chemical industry in the world, and we shall not solve our coal problem until we begin to develop that industry in its diversified forms, with all its derivatives. We must develop those products which come from coal and which can be used right there among the people, or shipped to nearby areas of population. Our solution is certainly not found in shipping all our coal to Ontario—certainly not in the light of the arrangements the federal government now has with the United States.

One other point I should like to mention is this. It seems to me that the coal operators in Alberta, as well as those in Nova Scotia, have been losing a good bet in that they have failed to process their coals, and properly to clean and grade them before sending them to the markets in those areas where they are required. I am satisfied that if the Alberta producers would pay more attention to that phase of their activity, and see to it that the coal is properly processed, cleaned and graded, they would find a better market in Ontario for their product. I throw out that suggestion, because I believe it is true.

I am ready to assert that, in the past, natural resources have not been developed and administered in the best interests of all the people of Canada. I am ready to admit that there is much room for improvement, but I am convinced that improvement will never be brought about by centralizing administration and development in the hands of the federal government. I have good reasons for my conviction.

In addition to those already stated, I might place on record this further one, if any further is required to prove my contestations. When the war situation began to intensify the federal government asked Alberta for permission to come in and take over the Abasand oil properties in the Athabaska tar sands field, and there to carry on some developments for the purpoe of helping to supply the requirements for fuel oils and derivatives in the war effort. Everyone, especially those of us who come from the west, is quite familiar with the fiasco that followed, when Alberta did allow the federal government to come in, set up their pilot or experimental plant, for the attempt to develop and devise new ways of extracting oil from those sands. The attempt was a complete wash-out. They have shown no beneficial results whatsoever, so far as we in Alberta have been able to ascertain. That is why the provincial government joined with private enterprise in setting up a pilot plant in the Athabaska tar sands area for the purpose of making further investigations respecting the best methods of extracting the oil and bitumen from those sands. That ought to be sufficient evidence to show that centralization of controls in the federal government brings only disappointment and maladministration of things so far from the seat of government.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Alberta government has discovered a process, has it not?

Mr. LOW: Yes, it has. I further assert that there is one province in Canada in which great progress has been made in the last ten years in connection with administering and developing resources in the interests of the people. But that has not been done under government ownership. Rather, it has been done under a carefully and wisely and regulated system of private enterprise with government assistance. They have obtained results.

I do not want especially to sing the praises of Alberta, but for over ten years I was familiar with what took place there, and for that reason it is the best example I can give. In the first place we did take hold of things, and saw to it that proper conservation measures were introduced. Those conservation measures came belatedly, because many of our resources had already been wasted. As a result of the policy introduced into that province of a government regulated system of private enterprise there was gained for the people of the province a fair share of the returns from the resources of the province.

At the same time ample allowance was made to provide a sufficient reward to those people who came into the province under their own steam, and who took their own risks. They took big risks in the province, as can be shown by the record. They were permitted, we think, to obtain a just reward for their efforts and risks. The people have had a fair share of the returns from the development of these resources except in those cases where the resources had already been alienated from the crown by the action of the federal government prior to the time Alberta received her resources in 1930.

In the third place, orderly development has taken place instead of the haphazard development that occurred in those cases where the administration was located at a point thousands of miles away from the scene of the actual work. Exploration has been intensified in the gas, oil, gold and most other fields. People who wish to risk their capital are not afraid to come into the province of Alberta because they know they will get a fair deal under the system of government regulated private enterprise.

Alberta has not solved all her problems by any means. She has not solved the problem of coal, but I am satisfied that the future holds some hope of a solution, provided that we go forward in faith and work carefully in an effort to find this solution. I do not believe that government ownership can possibly take the place of private ownership and development. I believe in a system of private enterprise. I believe that a private risk should bring with it a fair reward for the risk taken and the effort put forth. Basically that is the policy of the group which I represent.

Social credit simply means laying down basic and fundamental conditions and providing a financial and political reorganization within so that we may have a nation of good and free consumers or customers. Business cannot keep going unless business has customers. It is our policy to see that we have a nation of customers who are good and constant customers. Under such conditions there will be an optimum market for all wanted goods and services, coal or whatever the people may want, and there will be minimized the opportunities for exploitation of the people. Therefore, taking all these things into consideration, I cannot support the resolution as it stands. I must oppose it.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, as a good neighbour gesture I must congratulate the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) upon the splendid presentation he has made this afternoon of the case he puts forward. I agree thoroughly with the hon. member when he said that things are not well with the mining industry of Canada, particularly the coal mining industry. I agree that that industry requires all the sympathetic support and stimulus that can be accorded to it. The hon. member for Cape Breton South has made a fairly good diagnosis of the ills of this industry, but unhappily his prescriptions are not such as I think will relieve the industry.

I think it was Longfellow who in his good-natured way of offering solace to a disappointed wooer said to talk not of wasted affection because affection never was wasted. We cannot apply that saying to all efforts that are made. When an hon. gentleman rises in his place in this house and puts forth a splendid effort, such as has been put forth by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, if that effort is made on behalf of nationalizing the mineral industry of our province then it can be said that that effort is entirely wasted so far as convincing this house or the Canadian people is concerned.

The ideas advanced by the hon. member look all right in theory. If they could be translated into the reality of actual successful performance then the prescription would be splendid and the industry would have a chance to be relieved of its troubles. Unfortunately the theories which he advances have been put into effect, not only in connection with the mining industry but also in other phases of government activity and found wanting.

The Canadian National Railways is a government-owned transportation system. For years before the war this transportation system came back to the government with annual deficits ranging from $26,000,000 to $35,000,000.

Mr. PROBE: Would the hon. member suggest that that was because it was a government-owned institution or because of the obligations that the government assumed when they took the system over from the Grand Trunk?

Mr. McGARRY: In any event it is and has been operated by the government. It was only when this system had the stimulation of abnormal transportation demands that it was able to come back with a decent surplus. Over the war years I believe it declared a dividend of about $25,000,000, which is the equivalent of the annual deficit during times of peace.

If I am permitted I should like to deal with a matter of regional interest. I refer to the operation of a coal mine in my own constituency. That mine has been operated by the government since 1933; ever since it was taken over by the government there has been a persistent decline in total production and man-day production, and the only increase that we have seen is in the deficits from year to year. The 1945 production in that government-operated mine was less than it had been in 1933. The man-day production fell to 1·22 tons which is nearly the lowest in the whole dominion, while the deficit rose to $293,000. These are a couple of examples of what can be done unsuccessfully under government control.

I fail to understand the great urge for government control. I fail to understand the urge to nationalize our industries in the face of the failures which have obtained under government management, particularly when we see what can be done under private enterprise, as, for instance, in our war effort when private enterprise effected an industrial development which was the envy of all the nations.

Mr. PROBE: We subsidized private enterprise in the war.

Mr. McGARRY: I do not catch the hon. gentleman's remark.

Mr. PROBE: During the war we subsidized private enterprise and when a particular operation required special emphasis it was put under public ownership.

Mr. McGARRY: Would the hon. member say that everything that was done in the way of industrial production during the war was done under government control?

Mr. PROBE: Or subsidy.

Mr. McGARRY: Then the hon. member's diagnosis is quite different from that of the majority of our citizens. We achieved so much under private enterprise as to be the envy of the world. Was it government control that brought this country from the days of the pioneers to its present position? My conception is that we had better move along under the same policy under which we have operated from the beginning. It is my conception that the function of government is not to operate industry, but so to legislate that a favourable opportunity will be accorded free enterprise to invest its capital, thus giving employment and contributing to the financial needs of the nation.

Some hon. members bring up the hackneyed question of "no profits" operation. Those who imagine that the sole and only motive in our free enterprise is profit are singularly ignorant of human nature. No undertaking can thrive under persistent losses. No undertaking can thrive unless from time to time there is some profit in it. I fail to see why we cannot continue to depend on the same spirit of enterprise which, as I said before, has brought this country from the days of our pioneering forefathers up to the position which we hold to-day, when we have reached the peak of our industrial production.

Why is it that government cannot manage industry as economically as private enterprise can? One reason is that under government management you cannot get the coordination and simplification and saving of time and effort that characterize private management. These are ideals that do not enter into government operation. The matter of losing a little time or a little effort does not enter so much into the minds of the government as it does into the minds of the businessman who is carrying on an enterprise of his own. There are exceptions, of course, but the conditions where you have these exceptions are not such as to satisfy the business executive. This lack of coordination, lack of simplification and saving of time and effort is not applicable alone to public ownership in Canada. It applies also in the United States. Nor is it peculiar to our generation. It is a condition that is natural to government service, but it is unnatural in private business. You will always find under government control what businessmen characterize as red tape, seniority or some such thing, which you do not find under private enterprise. I contend, therefore, that it is not wise for the people of Canada to turn over to the government to do the things which they themselves can accomplish.

Wise leaders in governments to-day are telling businessmen things that they should know. They are telling them that they have a national duty beyond the bounds of their own enterprise and that if they will step into it and do their public duty it will not be necessary for the government to take over so many projects for which it is not fitted. I am strongly convinced that individual enterprise and freedom of contract is the policy that should be followed in this country if we are to maintain and develop Canada. This is not the day of revolution either in industry or in any other effort. It is the day of evolution. Let is try to improve the policies and methods we have followed from the beginning. I do not see that we the Canadian people are suffering at all from the rheumatic pains of old age. I believe that we are suffering from the growing pains of fast and successful development. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot support this resolution. I think it is a move in the wrong direction.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order, until Monday, April 29.

The house met at three o'clock.

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENTS

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES WITH RESPECT TO GREAT LAKES FISHERIES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I beg leave to table the text of the Great lakes fisheries convention between Canada and the United States of America, signed at Washington on April 2, 1946. The convention was signed by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Bridges) and the Canadian Ambassador, Mr. Pearson, on behalf of Canada, and by the Acting Secretary of State, Mr. Dean Acheson, on behalf of the United States of America. The convention will come into force when ratifications have been exchanged.

Mr. BRACKEN: Could the Prime Minister or the Minister of Fisheries indicate briefly the substance of the convention which has just been tabled?

Mr. BRIDGES: I think there will be an opportunity later to make a statement concerning this matter; therefore I should prefer not to say anything at the present time.

Mr. BRACKEN: We shall have copies of the document?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, copies will go to my hon. friend.

HOUSING

TABLING OF P.C. 1513 VESTING RESPONSIBILITY IN MINISTER OF RECONSTRUCTION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The speech from the throne opening the present session of parliament forecast action to bring all matters relating to the construction of housing, as largely as possible under the administration of one minister of the crown. By order in council P.C. 1513 of April 16, 1946, the responsibility for housing has been vested in the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Hitherto, the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply has been responsible for the operations of Wartime Housing Limited, but other aspects of housing responsibility have been vested in the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Under the new arrangement, the responsibility for the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which was established early this year under the Minister of Finance and which has responsibility for the administration of the National Housing Act and of the emergency shelter regulations, in addition to the financing of housing construction, will be transferred to the Minister of Reconstruction and Supply. Arrangements have also been made to coordinate the operations carried on under the Veterans Land Act in relation to non-farm housing with the activities which will now centre in the Department of Reconstruction and Supply.

I wish to table a copy of order in council P.C. 1513 of April 16, in relation to housing.

PRIVILEGE

EDITORIAL IN "SATURDAY NIGHT"—REFERENCE TO EMPLOYMENT IN CIVIL SERVICE OF NATURALIZED CANADIANS

On the order for motions:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. An editorial entitled "Classifying Canadians" appears in the current issue of Saturday Night. The first paragraph thereof reads as follows:

> We should be sorry if parliament were to adopt Mr. Gordon Graydon's proposal and refuse to employ naturalized Canadians in the civil service. The further suggestion that even born Canadians be barred from the service if their parents were naturalized was probably not intended very seriously.

The remainder of the editorial is devoted to a critical analysis of the position I am supposed to have taken. My purpose in rising is to say that at no time have I taken such a position or made such a proposal, and I fancy every hon. member of the house will agree with me on that. I know that Saturday Night, whose columns are always characterized by fairness and reason, would want me to put the record straight at the first opportunity. This I am doing. Were the statement to go unchallenged, a grave injustice unwittingly might easily be done to scores of thousands of loyal naturalized citizens of Canada, many of whom have served with high distinction in the last war and this. Personally, Mr. Speaker, I think it must have been a case of mistaken identity, but I have not been able to run it down yet.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

RECOGNITION, OBSERVANCE AND COMMEMORATION—PROVISION FOR LEGAL HOLIDAY

Mr. L. R. BEAUDOIN (Vaudreuil-Soulanges) moved for leave to introduce bill No. 58, respecting the recognition, observance and commemoration of Canadian citizenship.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. BEAUDOIN: It is suggested by this bill, Mr. Speaker, that each year a day be set aside as citizenship day, a public occasion for the recognition of all who in consequence of the adoption of the Canadian citizenship act will have attained the status of Canadian citizens; a public occasion for all Canadians to develop mutual understanding and promote national unity.

I know the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) will endeavour to provide effective and impressive ceremonies for the admission of new Canadians into the Canadian family. The house agreed with him when he said, as reported at page 504 of Hansard:

One thing we hope to do, following the passage of this measure—

That is, the Canadian citizenship bill.

—is to provide a more effective and impressive ceremony for admission into the Canadian family.

Also when he said:

We are convinced of the desirability of emulating the form of ceremony which characterizes the admisssion of persons into United States citizenship.

Canada may want to emulate the form of celebration, which does not interfere with admission ceremonies, instituted by the United States on May 3, 1940, which takes place on the third Sunday in May of each year, and is designated as "I am an American" day. This bill proposes to create "I am a Canadian" day. Service clubs, social organizations and other institutions in Canada have shown their willingness to do the spade-work to bring this sort of celebration into being. For instance, at one of their annual conventions the junior chambers of commerce of Canada adopted a resolution in which they suggested a special citizenship week each year, which would be called Canada week, and I am informed that such a move is now being organized, with the period fixed as June 2 to June 8 next. Let us give these patriotic organizations our encouragement; and a debate on this bill, should it take place, I am sure will bring out most valuable suggestions. Incidentally I would hope that the proclamation of our official flag might coincide with the proclamation of our citizenship bill.

The purpose of this bill is to help Canadians, old and new, especially the older Canadians who are supposed to set the good examples and lead the way for the new, not only to realize and take pride in the achievements and the greatness of Canada but to promote national unity by reminding all of us of our present status and future aspirations as a nation. According to this bill, each year throughout Canada the anniversary of the day fixed by proclamation of the governor in council as the date of coming into force of the Canadian citizenship act, which it has been said "symbolizes our aspirations as a nation" shall be a legal holiday, kept and observed as such under the name of "Canadian citizenship day".

Let me close my explanations with these words of the Secretary of State when introducing the Canadian citizenship bill on October 1, 1945, and again on the motion for second reading of the bill on April 2, 1946:

For the national unity of Canada and for the future and greatness of this country it is felt to be of the utmost importance that all of us, new Canadians or old, have a consciousness of a common purpose and common interests as Canadians; that all of us be able to say with pride and say with meaning—

And may I add, to proclaim at least once a year, in some sort of official and solemn way: "I am a Canadian citizen."

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. Beaudoin.]

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST AND SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 51 for the relief of Vera Harriet May Kinghorn Hodgson.—Mr. MacLean.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

STEEL PRICES

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What was the amount of the increase in the price of steel allowed by the wartime prices and trade board to manufacturers of steel?

2. In granting this increase in price to the steel manufacturers, was there any stipulation written or implied that a certain amount of the increase was to meet wage increase to steelworkers?

3. If so, what amount of the price increase was intended for wage increase?

4. Were the steel companies instructed as to when the wage increase should become effective?

Mr. MacKINNON:

1. Board order No. 617 authorized an increase in steel prices based on $5 per ingot ton of steel produced.

2. No, but the manufacturers were required to provide a forecast of probable operating costs, estimated production, sales and distribution volume and other cost and financial information on the basis of which the board reached its decision as to the price increase which seemed reasonable in all the circumstances.

3 and 4. Answered by No. 2.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—AIRCRAFT AND AIRPORTS

Mr. KNIGHT:

1. How many of the transport planes known as D6 are at present (a) in use by T.C.A.; (b) on order with manufacturers for T.C.A.?

2. What is the contract price per plane?

3. When are the planes now ordered to be delivered?

4. How many Canadian airports are at present of a standard fit for the use of the D6 fully loaded?

5. What are such airports?

Mr. McILRAITH:

1. (a) Nil. (b) None, known as D6, but 20 aircraft of the 4-engine transport type are on order.

2. Not yet determined.

3. Beginning September 1946.

4. There are no D6's regularly operating in Canada but experience gained by United States authorities would indicate that 14 existing Canadian airports would be of a standard fit for use by the type of aircraft referred to in 1 (b) above.

5. Whitehorse, Watson Lake, Fort St. John, Prince George, Penticton, Vancouver, Grande Prairie, Namao, Edmonton, The Pas, Churchill, Montreal, Seven Islands, Dartmouth. It should be noted that 4-engine aircraft are intended for use on the transatlantic, transpacific and South American services and not at present for services in Canada.

CANADIAN NAVY—PERMANENT FORCE

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many ratings were enlisted in the permanent force navy (a) as of August 31, 1945; (b) as of February 28, 1946?

2. Of the ratings enlisted in the permanent force navy, how many were in the seaman branch (a) as of August 31, 1945; (b) as of February 28, 1946?

3. How many seamen are allowed for in the complement of the permanent force navy?

4. How many men in the said complement comprise each of the following categories (a) chief petty officers; (b) petty officers; (c) leading seamen; (d) able seamen; (e) ordinary seamen?

Mr. ABBOTT:

1. Ratings in permanent force—
as of August 31, 1945.....	3,383
as of February 28, 1946.....	3,765
2. Ratings in permanent force (seamen branch)—
as of August 31, 1945.....	1,674
as of February 28, 1946.....	1,740
3. Seamen allowed in complement of permanent force, navy.....	3,918*
4. Comprising—
(a) Chief petty officer.....	174*
(b) Petty officers	456*
(c) Leading seamen	548*
(d) and (e) Able seamen and ordinary seamen	2,740*

*The above figures (Nos. 3 and 4) have not been completely finalized but are accurate to within 5 per cent.

CUTTING OF MERCHANTABLE TIMBER

Mr. ZAPLITNY:

1. How many feet of lumber and/or other merchantable timber have the following firms taken out of their respective timber limits in Canada since 1899 (a) the Northern Trusts Co., Winnipeg, Manitoba; (4) Berpall Lumber Co., Milwaukee, Wisconsin; (c) The Royal Trust Co., Vancouver, British Columbia; (d) Deer Park Lumber Co., Washington, U.S.A.?

2. What amount of money was received in each case above by the Canadian government?

Mr. GLEN:

1. Feet Board Measure: (a) 13,562,435; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) 6,878,656.

Shingles: (a) 198,500; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

Poles lin. feet: (a) 1,390; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

Fuelwood cords: (a) 28,234; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

Lath: (a) 472,000; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

2. Amount paid to the government, made up of ground rent, licence fees and royalty dues: (a) $24,381.00; (b) $510.10; (c) nil; (d) $7,688.97.

VETERANS LAND ACT—PERTH COUNTY

Mr. BRADSHAW:

1. How many applications for the purchase of farms under the Veterans Land Act in Perth county are now pending awaiting inspection?

2. How many farms have been purchased in the said county since the Act came into force?

3. What was the acreage in each farm and the price paid for each?

Mr. MACKENZIE:

1. Seventy.

2. Thirty-one.

DAIRY BUTTER

Mr. HOMUTH:

1. Has the government agencies throughout the country purchasing dairy butter?

2. What price is paid for it?

3. What allowance is made to the agents for making such purchases and/or for storage?

4. What quantity was purchased last year?

5. What quantities were purchased in each of the following months: January, February and March of 1946?

Mr. MAYHEW:

1. Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation Ltd. is authorized to purchase dairy butter throughout Canada and has appointed representatives of the trade across Canada to act as its agents in the purchase of dairy butter.

2. 5. When will all the buildings on these grounds be vacated by the forces and returned to the city?

6. Who occupied the premises underneath the stand at the time of the fire?

7. What fire apparatus and appliances had the government at the time of the fire in the C.N.E. grounds?

Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Yes.

2. Not yet been determined.

3. No. However under the terms of the agreement the government reimbursed the Canadian National Exhibition for the premiums which are paid by them on this property.

4. A court of inquiry has already been convened in accordance with Army regulations. The building in question is covered by fire insurance. See No. 3 above.

5. The army will vacate these buildings on or about 31 May, 1946.

6. Army personnel—Members of No. 2 district depot.

7. Chemical extinguishers, standpipes and the necessary hose and nozzles in all buildings on a scale of issue based on fire underwriters specifications. A fire alarm system is maintained. A fire brigade composed of six full time trained fire fighters and a fire truck complete with the necessary equipment and tools are provided for the area. A night fire patrol is also maintained.

NATIONAL SELECTIVE SERVICE MOBILIZATION REGULATIONS, 1944

Mr. JUTRAS:

As of March 31, 1946, what was the total number of designated men in Canada under the N.S.S. mobilization regulations, 1944, in the following groups (a) on postponement from military service; (b) medically examined and found unfit for military service; (c) medically examined and found fit, but not sent an order to report for military service; (d) not sent an order to report for medical examination; (e) excepted from the National Selective Service mobilization regulations, 1944; (f) not accounted for?

Mr. MITCHELL:

(a) 277,118; (b) 616,794; (c) 14,543; (d) 31,283; (e) 25,061; (f) 7,632.

MOUNTED POLICE—RANK AND SENIORITY UPON RETURN FROM OVERSEAS SERVICE

Mr. LENNARD:

1. Do members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who served in the overseas forces enjoy the privileges of rank and seniority upon rejoining the R.C.M.P.?
2. If not, why are they not accorded such privileges?

Mr. JEAN:

1. At the outbreak of war the Minister of Justice made an appeal by letter to all ranks of the R.C.M. Police to stay at their posts, owing to the increased responsibilities of the force, and the impossibility of securing recruits, and in order to make it more difficult to leave the force, the normal means of discharge by purchase, etc., were suspended.

In order to assist the military authorities, and at the same time provide a channel for those members of the force who were anxious to join the fighting forces, No. 1 Provost Company of the First Canadian Division was organized within the force in October, 1939, and the police personnel which composed that company, together with reinforcements, were granted leave of absence without pay. All these retained rank, seniority and other privileges.

Furthermore, those who later severed their connection with the R.C.M. Police at the time of the expiration of their engagement with the R.C.M. Police and joined the armed forces of Canada and served overseas, on re-engagement in the R.C.M. Police have been reinstated in their former rank, pay, allowances and seniority, with the exception of N.C.O.'s who lose seniority only. (Seven N.C.O.'s are thus affected, having left the Force to accept commissions in the armed services).

2. In addition to the seven N.C.O.'s referred to in No. 1 above, all other members of the force who served in the armed forces in Canada only have been offered re-engagement in their former rank, pay and allowances but not seniority, in fairness to those members of the force who either joined the number one provost company or stayed with the R.C.M. Police.

PREPARATION AND DISTRIBUTION OF OFFICIAL STATEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. I have not given notice of it, but I think the right hon. gentleman when he hears it will realize that notice was not necessary. The government is now engaged, with the provinces, in a further dominion-provincial conference, of which there have been several since last August. Will the government give consideration to putting together in one printed form, for the information of hon. members, the official statements made by this government and by the official representatives from the provinces? These would be the statements since the first conference last August, including the present one.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend's suggestion is a good one. Certainly those statements will be brought together under one cover.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct another question, of which I have not given notice, to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Finance. It has to do with dairy products subsidies. I understand that they are given by the year, and that they terminate at the end of this month, which is to-morrow. Will either of the ministers I have named make a statement to-morrow as to government policy respecting these subsidies; and will the government give consideration to the raising of the subsidies, in view of the increased cost of labour and the increased cost of other factors entering into production?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Recommendations in connection with the subsidies on milk were made to council just before I left for the Easter recess. I returned only this morning, and have not yet had an opportunity to attend council. I shall look into the matter immediately.

WHEAT

BONUS FOR SHIPMENTS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): May I ask a question of the appropriate minister? Has the government considered the payment to farmers of a bonus of thirty cents per bushel for wheat to be delivered immediately for shipment overseas? I understand this is already being done in the United States. Sometimes we follow the action taken in that country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who is the appropriate minister?

Mr. COLDWELL: The Minister of Finance.

Mr. FAIR: Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce could give us a reply.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the first part of the question.

Mr. FAIR: I should be very glad to repeat it.

Mr. MacKINNON: However, I believe the question opened by asking whether the government would give consideration. I shall discuss the point with my colleagues.

ALLAN CUP

WINNING OF CHAMPIONSHIP BY CALGARY STAMPEDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. L. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question to ask the Minister of National Defence for Air. I have not given notice of it. Is the minister aware that there now rests in the city of Calgary a Canadian championship in the form of the Allan cup?

Hon. COLIN GIBSON (Minister of National Defence for Air): I am unfortunately aware of it, but I am very glad to offer my congratulations to Calgary.

FARM PRODUCTS

REQUEST FOR PRICE INCREASES TO ABSORB INCREASED IMPLEMENT COSTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance. Will the government consider immediately increases in agricultural production prices which will enable the farmers to absorb the recent 12½ per cent increase in the prices of agricultural implements?

Right Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I have nothing to add to the statement I made on that matter before the Easter recess.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Thursday, April 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin for the second reading of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I believe I moved the adjournment of the debate, and I am ready to continue. During the Easter recess I felt that I could not do better than to make the widest possible investigation as to the opinion of the average man in the great counties of Grey, Wellington, Perth, Middlesex, Kent, Essex and parts of Elgin and Peel, as well as in my own riding in Toronto and other ridings in that city, about Bill No. 7, particularly section 10.

Generally I am in agreement with the bill. I believe there are a number of sections that should pass, but I am opposed to part of section 10. I spent some time in the riding of the Secretary of State (Mr. Martin) who introduced this bill. In that part of the country, and in the other parts to which I referred, I spoke to as many people as I could, high and low and in all walks of life, and I found a substantial opposition to section 10. Many of these people said that the section was incomprehensible to them. Some had come to this country from other parts of the empire, particularly from Great Britain; they had come from a part of the world in which they had learned democracy and from which they had brought the spirit of democracy to this country. They represent by far the largest majority of Canadians, and to me it is simply monstrous to ask that they have to be here five years before they can be granted Canadian citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN: It has been that way for twenty-seven years.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend is entirely wrong. He knows that a man coming into this country from Great Britain to-day is permitted after one year to enrol and vote in our general elections whether he is a citizen or not.

Mr. MARTIN: This bill does not disturb that at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: Anything might happen after section 10 has carried. The next step will be to change the franchise act so that only citizens may vote. I am going to appeal to the minister to state when he speaks again that section 10 will be rewritten. As it is now, only a Philadelphia lawyer could understand it. Britishers should not be compelled to remain here five years before being granted Canadian citizenship. My own people have been here for four generations. Had they come only one generation ago, it would have been monstrous to ask them to remain here five years before being granted the right to citizenship. I spoke to clergymen of various denominations, to lawyers, to doctors, to business men, to garage men, to barbers, and to everyone whom I could engage in conversation. If, as the minister says, section 10 does not mean what I think it means, then it should be clarified.

I have discussed this section with several lawyers, both in and out of the house, and they tell me that they cannot understand what it really means. I suppose even a Philadelphia lawyer could not understand it. To indicate the opinion of the public with regard to section 10, I should like to quote one letter I have received. If this bill passes and persons from the British empire are forced to remain here five years before being granted Canadian citizenship, then, as I said a moment ago, the next step will be to change the franchise act to provide that only citizens may vote.

That was one cause of the South African war. The then president of the Transvaal, the late Paul Kruger, who in my judgment was a wonderful man; I have read his history many times—decided to amend the franchise act of the Transvaal to provide for several years' residence instead of what it then provided before obtaining the right to vote. That will be the next step here, and Anglo-Saxons may have to remain here five years before they have the right to vote. It is incredible that any such provision should be made part of our law. When the minister speaks I should like him to clarify this section—apparently very few people can understand it; then perhaps the bill will get through the house more rapidly.

I received a letter this morning from St. George's society in Toronto quoting a telegram which they had sent to the Prime Minister. It is dated at Toronto, April 16, 1946, and the telegram quoted therein reads as follows:

> Twelve hundred members of St. George's society of Toronto, while heartily approving the principle of establishing a Canadian citizenship, nevertheless deplore that provision of the proposed act of parliament requiring British subjects to be domiciled for five years in Canada prior to enjoying the privilege of such citizenship. Such a measure cannot fail to weaken the ties of empire at a time when they need strengthening.

This opinion therefore is general, because, as my hon. friend will freely admit, many leading citizens of Toronto and Canada are members of the St. George's society.

When the minister spoke on April 2 he quoted in support of his own argument a statement which had been made in the house by the late Hon. C. H. Cahan. I was present when Mr. Cahan spoke. He was an excellent speaker, and perhaps one of the greatest constitutional lawyers in Canada. He was referring to the progress made by Canada in the sixty-four years of its life from 1867, and he went on to say, as quoted by the minister:

In connection with that development, however, if we are to assume the status of a nation within the British commonwealth, we must also assume very serious duties and responsibilities. Among the responsibilities resting upon the parliament of Canada is that of framing a clear definition of "Canadian nationals" . . .

With that I agree, but I want especially to emphasize what the late Hon. C. H. Cahan said, "within the British commonwealth". Section 10, as I understand it, will do a lot more harm to the cause of maintaining Canada within the British empire than perhaps many of us want to believe.

Mr. MARTIN: It will not change it one iota.

Mr. MacNICOL: Of course the minister has the majority behind him and has power to do what he likes, but that will not stop me from expressing my opinion.

Mr. MARTIN: I was not suggesting that. I was simply saying that section 10 does not change what the hon. member wants, and what I personally support. It does not change that situation at all.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have found from inquiries across eight or ten great counties of Ontario that many people have the same opinion that I have of section 10, and I repeat that St. George's Society, one of the leading societies of Canada, is of that opinion. We are all in the same boat; we do not understand it, so if the minister can clarify the section and can take away our fears it would go a long way towards eliminating opposition to this particular provision of the bill.

My own section of the city of Toronto is solidly Anglo-Saxon. The great majority of the people came there two or three years before the first great war. They took an ardent and active interest in the affairs of this country. They formed their own rifle associations and other groups, and when the war of 1914 broke out they did not have to be conscripted or coaxed to come to the defence of their country; they marched right up, like the men they were, and enlisted en masse. The society of which I was president, the British Imperial Association, had a great honour roll. Speaking from memory I think there were from 200 to 300 men on its honour roll who went overseas, and a great many of whom were killed in the defence of this country. I could not conceive of that breed of people coming to Canada if they thought they would have to remain five years within a part of the British empire before they could become citizens of Canada.

A gentleman told me to-day—I think it was the member for London (Mr. Manross)—about an Australian airman who had trained at an air camp in western Ontario—I had better not specify it because I did not have the hon. member's consent to say what I am about to say. This Australian airman had the good fortune to fall in love with a London girl, and perhaps has married her, but on reading over this bill he said that Australians could not be expected to come to Canada and remain here for five years before they could become Canadian citizens. Nor can we expect New Zealanders or South Africans or people from any other part of the British empire to come here if they have to wait five years before they can become Canadian citizens—unless they want very much to come here; and the more they want to come, the more we want to have them come. We do not want to discourage people from coming to Canada from other parts of the British empire. We should do everything we can to encourage them to come, because the greater the number that come the better it is for Canada and the British empire, as was demonstrated clearly in the last war. From my own section of the city of Toronto the sons of the fathers who came back to Canada from the first great war enlisted en masse in the second great war. They did not have to be conscripted or coaxed. They marched up and enlisted in regiments very shortly after the war broke out. That is the kind of people we want to come here, men who will rise up in defence of this country and the ideals for which it stands. We should not do anything to discourage them from coming to Canada.

A few days ago I read that the Ontario government has a list of selected emigrants from Great Britain, some 30,000 people, most of them war veterans, who want to come to Canada as soon as immigration opens up again. Do you think they would want to come to Canada if they had to remain here five years before they would be entitled to citizenship papers? I can hardly conceive of Britishers accepting conditions of that kind. They did not accept those conditions in South Africa. One of the main causes of the South African war was that the Kruger government extended the number of years that it would be necessary to wait before one could exercise the franchise in South Africa. I want to tell the minister as earnestly and as strongly and as seriously as I can that I myself would not come here if I knew that I should have to wait five years before enjoying full citizenship.

I ask the minister to withdraw the clause and reword it so that it will be understood. We want those 30,000 Britishers to come here from the old land, those heroes who fought perhaps at Dunkirk and elsewhere, and saved the empire. It was the men who held up their breasts at Dunkirk against the steel of mighty Germany who fought to save Canada as well as the empire, and many of them may be listed amongst the 30,000 who have applied to the Ontario government to come to Canada. I should like to see another half million of them out in the west to help build up the three fine prairie provinces and British Columbia. A good many of the people who settled the western provinces came from the old land. We want to encourage them, not discourage them.

I do not wish anybody to think that I do not want settlers to come here from other countries too. We want Ukrainians, we want Russians, we want people from France, Italy, Poland, Holland, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Denmark and other European countries to come here and help build up this country. We should receive them with open arms. I asked a Ukrainian in Toronto on Saturday if he thought that a man coming from London, England, a man born and raised in the democracy of the old country, whence we obtained our democracy, should be put in exactly the same class with emigrants from non-democratic countries in Europe. His reply was, "I do not think so. A person coming from a country within the British empire should be able to obtain citizenship without having to wait five years." That is no reflection on any race. I love all races. This country owes a great deal, sir, to every race. They have brought their different characteristics and great qualities to this country and have helped to build it up. No one will say that those who have come from the old country have done otherwise. In all our industrial ridings a large number of the leading manufacturers were born and brought up in the old country. Without any hesitation I can name at least twenty-five in my own riding. Have they not done something to build up this country? Of course they have. I have in mind one man who lives not far from me in Toronto. He had four or five thousand men working for him in his plants during the war. He is a Scotsman, a marvellous man, an inventor, and his plant, by means of his genius, played a very large part in winning the war by reason of the material it produced. Does anyone think that such men will come here if they are expected to remain five years before becoming Canadian citizens?

I suggest that section 10 be rewritten so that all who run may read.

I do not like the title of the bill. We are told that it is "an act respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens." I do not like the word "aliens." Can we not use a better word? I do not like either "foreigner" or "alien." We are all God's creatures. He made us; he brought us into the world. Could we not say, an act respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of strangers, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) suggests? Or perhaps, settlers of non-British origin? We should use some word which does not imply the stigma attached to the expression one so often hears, "You are only a foreigner" or "an alien." We could all be called foreigners or aliens when we go to some other country. I suggest that the title of the bill be improved by substituting a less objectionable term.

Let me come back for a moment to my own constituency. I am thinking of a man named David Seggie, of Harvie avenue, Toronto, who had seven sons. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Mackenzie) is looking at me, and by his expression I take it he recognizes the name as that of a Scotsman. Well, he is right. Every one of the seven sons put on the king's uniform, or rather the Canadian uniform. All of them were in the service, some overseas, others on the west coast, which is the same as serving overseas. It is a wonderful record, and I suggest that this house should establish some sort of decoration for such people. All sorts of people are getting decorations, many of them for no other reason than the fact that they have the ability to get them. Any man who has raised seven sons, any mother who has given birth to seven sons, every one of whom fought in the defence of the empire, should receive a decoration if we are to hand out decorations at all.

So in the last war there was one family in my riding in which there were seven boys in the army, and I have no doubt that other members can say the same of their own constituencies. All these people I have been talking about are from the old country. I could not for a moment imagine that men with a record of such bravery, men with the spirit that I have indicated, should be asked to remain in this country five years before being granted Canadian citizenship, especially when they have come here with full knowledge of democracy. What is this five-year period for?

Mr. MARTIN: Sir Robert Borden put in the five-year period.

Mr. MacNICOL: That five-year period had reference to people who were charged with the commission of misdemeanours.

Mr. MARTIN: That is all this does.

Mr. MacNICOL: Sir Robert Borden's bill had nothing to do with citizenship, otherwise we would not be discussing this bill now.

Mr. MARTIN: Sir Robert Borden introduced this provision to deal with the same point.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree with what the minister is trying to do. He wishes to remove the ambiguities in our naturalization act and in the Immigration Act and the Canadian Nationals Act. All credit to him for having that desire, but I suggest that he should rewrite section 10 so that it will not be necessary for representations to come from such a great society as St. George's society, and from many others whose understanding of the bill is the same as mine. The minister must admit that men of that calibre must be all mixed up, as I must be mixed up, if he is the only one who knows what the bill means.

Mr. MARTIN: I have had no opportunity to answer what the hon. gentleman is saying, and it is because of speeches such as the one he is now making that this impression has been created. I will answer it when my turn comes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad the minister says that, because throughout the whole of this debate one member after another has referred to this point and it has gone unanswered.

Mr. MARTIN: I have repeatedly corrected every hon. member who has made the same statement.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister has not corrected me yet. He has not stated to me emphatically that in the future, if this bill passes, no measure will be introduced providing that a Britisher must be here five years before being allowed to vote.

Mr. MARTIN: That is exactly the situation as far as this government is concerned, and it always has been.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not know what the minister means.

Mr. MARTIN: As I have stated on five different occasions in this debate, there is no intention of changing the election act in any way, nor could we do so by this bill. I have stated that repeatedly.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I will say this. Having a keen recollection of what took place in this house not long ago—I know that I cannot refer to a past debate—when a certain measure passed through this house in one afternoon, I fear what might happen on some future occasion if a new franchise bill were introduced on the same basis as the one I have in mind, and which I will not name, if it was passed through this house in an afternoon, and it debarred British people from voting unless they were here five years I would not take a chance on it.

Some hon. members have said something about a ceremony in making a person a citizen. I agree with that. I have attended ceremonies in the United States when people were being granted the right of citizenship, and I think it is something we should carefully consider. Let me quote from the "Salute to the Flag". The person seeking admission to citizenship in the United States goes before the judge, or the properly constituted authority, and takes this pledge:

> I pledge allegiance to the flag of the United States of America and to the republic for which it stands, one nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.

They have a fine ceremony. I hope that the minister will have something of this kind in mind. An empire conference is now being held in England. Australia has sent delegates. I do not know whether Canada has sent any, but I read a few days ago a statement attributed to the Prime Minister of Australia approving the sending of the delegates. The dispatch was dated Canberra, April 9, and it states that the Prime Minister had announced that the Australian cabinet had approved of Australia being represented at the British commonwealth conference to discuss the proposed legislation on one nationality operating generally in the British commonwealth countries. I am not going to make any comment on that, but I am afraid of this bill being mentioned at that conference in London. If members of the St. George's society, which includes eminent and brilliant lawyers, judges and others, cannot understand it; and it may not be understood in London, England, how can the ordinary individual be expected to understand it?

Mr. MARTIN: Was the hon. gentleman not in the house when I gave an explanation?

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to hear the minister repeat it.

Mr. MARTIN: I have already said it on three occasions; apparently the hon. gentleman was too busy to listen. Officials of His Majesty's government have said that this bill is such an excellent one they consider it a model. The Prime Minister of Australia has said that the Canadian citizenship bill now before this house makes such an appeal to that country that they are going to take similar action.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall be surprised if that is so, particularly after what a young Australian said in London, Ontario, last week, namely, that he could not conceive of young Australians coming to this country and remaining here five years before they became Canadians.

Mr. MARTIN: They have it in Australia.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should prefer to say what I have to say, and then I should like the minister to get on his feet and give his explanations. We shall get him nailed down to the last letter before very long, so that there will be no ambiguity in the bill. We are going to try to see that all ambiguity is taken out of section 10.

Something has been said about what St. Paul said, and I wish to dwell on that for a moment or two. Let me refer to the citizenship we now enjoy. I am a citizen of the British empire, and always hope to be. I am proud of it. I have always felt that as I am Canadian born I am a Canadian citizen. I do not require an act to make me a citizen of Canada; I am a citizen of Canada. I agree that it is perhaps necessary to have a public statement or something to indicate that we have Canadian citizenship when the assessor comes around, so that we shall not have to say we are of Scotch, Irish, English or some other extraction. I agree with that part of the bill.

Paul had a double citizenship. I do not mean Paul, the minister, although he is a British citizen and he will be a Canadian citizen when the bill goes through, if he is not one now. I said that I am a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: I am fast developing a halo.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister will be no hero if section 10 is not changed greatly.

Mr. MARTIN: I said "halo".

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I hope it will be a long time before the minister gets a halo. In chapter 21, verse 39 of the Acts of the Apostles, Paul said:

> I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city; and, I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people.

He said he was a citizen of no mean city.

Mr. REID: Like Toronto.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not see any joke about that.

Mr. REID: I said, "like Toronto." There is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. MacNICOL: My hon. friend is a Scotsman. He ought to have a high regard for the Jews. I have.

Mr. REID: I am a Canadian.

Mr. FRASER: Not until the bill is passed.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I first came to the house and heard my hon. friend speak I could hardly understand him, his speech was so broad.

Mr. REID: That was the hon. member's fault.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was not my fault. If he had been playing the bagpipes less in those days he would have been able to speak the English language better. He does not play the bagpipes so often just now, and he is doing better.

In chapter 22, at verse 25 of the Acts of the Apostles Paul said:—and I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the bible I have in my hand was lent to me by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) who reads it diligently and who among the members of this house is one of the most widely posted on the bible.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry the hon. member has not a bible.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have one, but I do not keep it at the House. The hon. member for Broadview carries his around in his pocket all the time.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member should have his own.

Mr. MacNICOL: I read from verse 25 of chapter 22:

> And as they bound him with thongs, Paul said unto the centurion that stood by, Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?
>
> Then the chief captain came and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea.
> And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was free born.

Paul was a citizen of the city of Tarsus and of the Roman province of Cilicia. He did not go back on his Roman citizenship. He was a citizen of the Roman empire. We are Canadians. Before long, I suppose, we shall be citizens of Canada legally, but it does not take away from us our right to be British citizens. We shall be British citizens as well as Canadian citizens.

I feel very strongly on this matter. The minister has not convinced me at all. I find myself in the same position as the members of St. George's Society, and of many other societies from whom I have had communications. I find myself in the same position as are the people to whom I talked during the Easter holidays. If I said I talked to a hundred people I should be understating it. If I said I talked to 250 during my tour of western Ontario last week I might be overstating it. However, I could not find one man among the lawyers, doctors, business men and educationists to whom I spoke, whose interpretation of the bill was any different from mine. Therefore a lot of clarification has to be done to make people realize that Britishers coming into Canada from any part of the empire are not compelled to remain here five years before they become Canadian citizens.

I have read the section over carefully; I have discussed it with all the lawyers on this side of the house. My hon. friend will have to admit that they are good lawyers; if I happened to get into a bad jam I do not know which one I would want to select to defend me. All of them interpret this section as I do, namely, that anyone coming into this country from any other part of the British empire would have to remain here five years before he would be entitled to become a Canadian citizen. To that I am opposed. It is a humiliation to ask a New Zealander, an Australian, a Scotsman, an Irishman, an Englishman, a Newfoundlander, or anyone from any other part of the British empire to remain here five years before Canadian citizenship papers can be taken out.

Mr. MARTIN: Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have had the same requirement for many years. All these countries have the same provision.

Mr. MacNICOL. I am not going to argue with the minister. If I told him he was wrong, it would be a nasty thing to say. But he will have to read the acts to me to prove that their provision is the same as this one.

The Anglo-Saxons who came to the riding of Davenport in 1911, 1912 and 1913—and perhaps some who came in 1910—voted in the election of 1911. When the first world war came, they enlisted en masse. I want it to be understood that no British subject shall be made to feel humiliated on coming to Canada because of being required to wait five years before becoming a Canadian citizen.

I want it clearly understood that I have the greatest love in my heart for people of all races. I have met people all over Canada of many different non-British races who have come to this country. Most of them have made good. The Secretary of State, in introducing the bill pointed out that the five year provision was to enable persons from non-democratic countries to become accustomed to our laws, languages and methods of voting. I should not think anyone from a non-British European country would be offended at having to be here five years before becoming a Canadian citizen. Members of this House of Commons have come from some of those countries and are doing great work in this house and in Canada. But why ask anyone from Britain, the mother of parliaments, the mother of democracy, from which we took all our democratic institutions, to wait five years before becoming a Canadian citizen? They know all about it now. We do not need to tell them how to vote; we do not need to tell them what are British principles. Our fathers brought them over here and handed them on to us.

Mr. R. R. KNIGHT (Saskatoon City): Generally, Mr. Speaker, I support the bill, but I should like to speak to one or two points in connection with it. First I should like to say a word or two in regard to the revocation of citizenship. I believe citizenship should not be lightly granted, but that once granted it should be practically irrevocable. This measure provides for the cancellation of Canadian citizenship in certain circumstances, including the commission of certain types of crimes. The last time this matter was under discussion the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) made a great point of the fact a person of Japanese origin, and I think a Canadian citizen, had tortured some of our Canadian soldiers at Hong Kong. If Canadians commit crimes, let them be punished as Canadians. Let them be put in gaol as Canadians. If necessary let us shoot them as Canadians, but let us deal with them as Canadians. Let us accept responsibility for their upbringing and their environment.

Some would avoid such responsibility by a method of which as yet we have not had an example in this country; that is to say, by deportation. The other day I put a question on the order paper and was told that not a single person of Japanese origin, Canadian citizen or otherwise, as yet had been deported from this country. But deportation is a dangerous policy. The force of circumstances and international conflicts make our friends of to-day our enemies to-morrow. I need not remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the Japanese, who were our deadly enemies in the war which has just come to a conclusion, were our firm friends and allies in the last war. If you make of citizenship a scrap of paper to be torn up at will, to be torn up in the panic and hatreds of war; if you deport people of one racial origin to-day, to-morrow you may be deporting people of another racial origin. What about the many fine Canadian citizens of German origin? Would this government propose to deport them? And who are our native Canadians, anyway, unless they be the Indians?—and we are not too sure about them. Let us think twice, then, before breaking our solemn word to people whom we have accepted as citizens of this country.

The second point I should like to make is that we should not be apologetic about being Canadians. In my opinion in the past we have suffered from a distinct inferiority complex. To-day in this country there are people, and even whole sections, still suffering from the same inferiority complex. It has plagued us in our arts and in our literature, and I think it extends even to our citizenship. Let us be proud of our own country. As the hon. member for Temiscouata, Mr. Pouliot is so fond of reminding us, this is the greatest country in the world. What, then, is the citizenship of which we should be so proud?. Well, as far as I am concerned it has nothing whatever to do with racial origin. I have been astonished to hear hon. members of this house boasting about the place of their birth. Could they tell us just what they had to do with it? If you were born in Canada it is a matter not for boasting but for thankfulness, particularly when we look at other countries and see how they and their people have been decimated by the flames of war. No; as I see it, citizenship should not be judged on the basis of racial origin. It is not just a racial ribbon to be worn on your coat. It means the contribution which one makes to the environment in which he finds himself. To me that is citizenship. It is the custom of my Tory friends to my right to protest their loyalty, but methinks they do protest too much.

Mr. FRASER: That is only your opinion.

Mr. KNIGHT: I am going to elaborate on that. For instance, I shall not easily forget the last session of parliament when they bit so avidly upon the bait so skilfully thrown out by the hon. member to whom I have just referred, when he taunted them about the British coat of arms being "a circus in a garden which is not well kept," which by the way is one of the best similes I know of in the English language. I am not necessarily agreeing with the opinion of the hon. member, but in view of the interruption of the hon. gentleman to my right I thought I might repeat what he said. For days after that remark was made in this house we heard speeches from almost every Tory member about racial origin, racial pride, and, forsooth, the traditions of Belleville and of Bruce county. Our Conservative friends wrap themselves at all times in the union jack; but what does the historical record show in regard to the attitude of this very party toward, for instance, allowing our English friends who are in dire need to enter our home market? Is there any loyalty to Britain there? Or how about their friends the manufacturers who at the outbreak of the war refused to manufacture war materials on the basis of cost plus a reasonable profit, and who are now straining at the leash of price ceilings in order that they might exploit the home market? I suppose my hon. friends have an answer to that one.

Mr. FRASER: Surely.

Mr. BROOKS: It is too silly to answer.

Mr. GRAYDON: You are pretty intemperate; that is all I can say.

Mr. FRASER: Ask the Minister of Labour. He is smiling. They may have been his friends.

Mr. KNIGHT: Having been so taunted I think I shall have to reply. May I say that I too was born and bred a Tory. I was born in the northern part of Ireland, which incidentally is the only place in the world, except Ontario, where a Tory government still survives. Even there Toryism is about finished. "Cataline is at the gates." Toryism is an indigestible morsel in the body politic.

Mr. GRAYDON: What happened to the C.C.F. in Ontario?

Mr. KNIGHT: If you would like some more I can give it to you. Let us go back to Ulster and the Tories. I come from that part of northern Ireland into which the English and Scottish Tories went and from which they drove the native Irish, whose lands they grabbed; and they have been grabbing everything else they could get their hands on ever since.

Mr. GRAYDON: The hon. member had better go on with his speech.

Mr. KNIGHT: Those were the days when Cromwell was riding up and down the hills of Ireland singing psalms and cutting off Irish heads in the name of the Lord.

May I now say a word about the reluctance of some people to ask British subjects to go through some form of certification for Canadian citizenship? One would think British subjects would be delighted so to do—and I speak now about my own feelings in the matter. Strange to say, I too had intended to paraphrase St. Paul, before the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) did it, because I can say that I too am a British subject, having been in Canada for almost forty years. I too look forward to the day when there will be no doubt in the mind of anyone about my position or the position of my children in Canadian society. May I suggest that perhaps my Progressive Conservative friends' disinclination to undergo such certification is not necessarily a matter of practical affairs, but rather a whim of pride of race, and a bid for a preferred position in Canadian society.

Mr. GRAYDON: Let the Liberal party speak for itself.

Mr. KNIGHT: There should be no preferred position or preferred peoples in this country. Neither should there be any preferred province or provinces; we should all be on an equal footing. While I cannot condone, still I can understand the attitude of the Progessive Conservative party. I have already told hon. members I was born and reared among them, and I am now a renegade—and proud of it.

Mr. FRASER: You certainly are.

Mr. GRAYDON: And everybody is satisfied.

Mr. KNIGHT: Let us have more of it. Speaking a moment ago the hon. member for Davenport said, "That is the kind of blood we want in this country." That talk irritates me—"the kind of blood we want in this country." Biologically speaking, of course, blood means nothing. I was much amused by a good English friend of mine who the other day was talking about his pure blood. I said to him, "Yes, that is true; but I suggest the source of the strength of the English nation may lie in its admixture of blood." Then I went over the long list who have made up the English people. While I could not recall all of them, from memory I referred to the Picts and the Scots, the ancient Britons, the Angles, the Jutes, the Saxons, the Danes. Then came the Normans, who brought with them the blood of the Gauls, the Norwegians and the Swedes. There were the Flemish weavers who helped us to develop our textile industry. Since that day, too, England has been open to the refugees from all nations.

Mr. COLDWELL: And do not forget the French Huguenots.

Mr. KNIGHT: Yes, and the French Huguenots. That is your pure English blood. I have no quarrel with English blood. It is good blood—just as good as mine.

Before resuming my seat I would ask the minister, when he rises to speak, to clarify the position of citizens of Eire who would come to this country. There are many people who do not understand the difference between Ireland as a whole, and Eire and Ulster, which are parts of it, and quite independent of each other.

If I seem to say that British citizens do not necessarily make better Canadians, do not misunderstand me. I believe they make just as good Canadians—and I say that in spite of the fact that at one time one could see in Winnipeg, as I did in 1910, signs with the words "Men wanted; no Englishmen need apply". That was what I saw when I came there and was looking for a job. I am proud there are no signs like that in this country to-day. In fact, Englishmen, and particularly in the two great wars, have proved the kind of stuff of which they are made. No one can throw that kind of slander at them. I want to make my position perfectly clear.

The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) made a good point when he said that history had not yet proven that British people made better Canadians than other types did. His point was well taken. I am not so sure that my fellow compatriots from the British isles are more easily assimilated. In fact we have living examples—I was almost going to say right here in the house—of men who have boasted about their having lived in Canada for forty years, but who have not yet shown any striking aptitude for assimilation.

Since what I have said might be construed as an attack upon English-speaking Canadians, may I say to my Liberal French-speaking friends that to be good citizens we should not think too much in terms of one race or of one province. Rather we must think in terms of all the provinces, and as a collective whole. That, it seems to me, is the manner in which we must deal with this matter.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word because, like the hon. member who has immediately preceded me (Mr. Knight), I was born a British subject, in the United Kingdom, and came to this country about thirty-six years ago. I too remember the signs to which he referred—"Help wanted; no Englishmen need apply." I well remember the first job I held in this country, because after I had been in my position for three months I was told by the chairman of the school board which had hired me and asked me to renew my contract that, had they known I was an Englishman, I never would have stepped inside their school. That was in 1910. I am glad indeed to say that we have outlived that sort of thing; to-day those signs are absent.

I support the bill; I support it because it confers upon young men and women—and upon old men and women too, if they come here—the right to call themselves Canadian citizens. Even within the last two years, because I have nothing to show my Canadian citizenship I was described by a political opponent as "a foreigner". That was the description used by one of my friends of the Progressive Conservative party.

Mr. REID: I have been called a foreigner by members of the House of Commons.

Mr. COLDWELL: That may be so.

Mr. REID: Members of your party called me that.

Mr. IRVINE: Perhaps there was some excuse for that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Any man who says that kind of thing, no matter to what political party he belongs, does not deserve to get anywhere through saying it.

Mr. REID: I resented it.

Mr. COLDWELL: My understanding is that the bill asks for nothing new. If through its operation one were to lose the right to vote, it would be in an entirely different category, and I would discuss it from a different point of view. I agree with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that subsequently the franchise and election acts may have to be changed to conform with the bill. That is within the realm of possibility, and when it so decides it is the right of parliament to make that change. We should discuss the matter in the light of circumstances which then exist. But if any such action is ever taken I should like to see a distinction made between those who come to Canada from a country in which the institutions and language are different from ours, and those who come from countries—and I use the plural—in which there are democratic institutions analogous to our own, whether the United States, the United Kingdom, or one of the commonwealth nations.

The hon. member for Davenport went to great lengths in discussing the desirability of bringing in 30,000 British people who have applied to come to this country. I should like to see them come, but I would remind the hon. member that the government he supported between 1930 and 1935 deported over 30,000 British citizens whose only crime against this country was that they could not find jobs and were on relief. I know that to be true; the records and statistics will bear out my statement. As a member of the city council of Regina at that time I know that when we applied to the federal authorities for certain assistance we were told that some of these people had to be deported because they were public charges. As public charges they were deportable within the five years that Sir Robert Borden laid down as the length of domicile which a British citizen must have in this country before he could not be deported. Let us not forget that when we hear this bill attacked on the ground that it is doing something entirely new which is endangering the rights of British citizens in this country. Let us bear in mind that that is not so, that the situation set out in this bill is a situation which has existed for a number of years.

Mr. MARTIN: In principle from well before 1910, and the five years provisions since 1919.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is true. I think the bill, particularly section 26, should be changed. I regret that the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Jaenicke) is ill and cannot be present to-day. I agree with him when he says that this bill defines British citizenship and that we have no right to do that. I suggest to the minister that he adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Kindersley. We should consider a Canadian citizen as being a subject of His Majesty the King in the right of Canada. That would make the citizen of Canada a citizen of the British commonwealth of nations, which recognizes the same king but which recognizes also the divisibility of the crown and the sovereign as being the sovereign of each one separately of the nations that now comprise the British commonwealth. If this change were made there would be some validity in the argument raised by my hon. friend, and in that event I should like to see something placed in the bill which would give the British citizen the right to ask for and receive Canadian citizenship as a citizen of Canada in the right of His Majesty the King of Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: As a Canadian subject.

Mr. COLDWELL: As a Canadian citizen in the right of the King of Canada, that is a Canadian subject. He would be separate and distinct because the sovereign is separate and distinct. To my mind that is the way to view this. It would not for one moment affect our allegiance to a common sovereign, but it would make our citizenship what it ought to be, something distinct, something in which we can have pride as citizens of Canada.

I should like to go one step further. Anyone who comes to Canada should receive some certificate of citizenship. The length of residence need not be the same. It could be five years for those who are not used to our institutions; it could be one, two or three years for those who come from countries in which there are democratic institutions and language similar to our own. We cannot dodge the fact that there are two types of people who come to this country from other parts of the British commonwealth. There is the type of person who comes here to make Canada his home, who comes here to become a part of the great citizenship and family of Canada. This is the man who establishes his family in this country and intends to be in every respect a citizen of the country as long as he shall live. There are others who come here and stay one, two, five, ten or fifteen years but never regard this country as their homeland, and always look forward to the time when they can return home. Such a citizen has not the same loyalty to Canada as the one who makes this country his permanent home.

An hon. MEMBER: The Chinaman.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hear my hon. friend say, "the Chinaman." It is true that some Chinese have that conception, but some people who were born in the country in which I was born also have the same conception. They came to this country never expecting to stay. I know many of them who have always regarded the little isles across the sea as the place to which they are going to return, their homeland. I think we should teach all our people that if this country is good enough to make a living in, if it is good enough to establish a home in, then their loyalty should be to the country in which they live. That would not take one thing away from the broader loyalty which we feel as citizens of that great family which we call the British commonwealth, independent citizens equal with one another, owing allegiance to the same king, with the same symbol of unity. To my mind that is the dignified position in which any Canadian, Australian, New Zealander or Britisher should find himself. Those of us who have been here for many years, who have established our homes in this country, would not receive anything to show that we are citizens of this country. But those who come after us will, I am sure, appreciate some little ceremony which would give them recognition as members of this great Canadian family.

I want to support the bill because it does not, as it is now drafted, take away anything we now possess. If the change I have suggested is made, I should like to see another change made so that those who have the same institutions would not be required to put in the same length of time or apprenticeship to acquire Canadian citizenship.

I know why the five years' provision was put into effect. It was not put into effect so that we might deport someone, as my hon. friends of the Conservative party did in the days of the gloomy thirties. It was done in order to safeguard the health of our people.

Mr. MARTIN: Precisely.

Mr. COLDWELL: Immigrants should receive an examination as to mental ability and physical fitness, so thorough that we can accept them without the risk of having to deport them later on those grounds. There was some logic in having this provision when we did not have the facilities of examination that we now have.

I rose merely to express some of the things I feel as one who came to this country and who by long residence has been received into the Canadian family. I do not feel, as does the hon. member for Davenport, who was born here, that this is an insult to the people who were born elsewhere. Certainly as one of those who came here I do not consider it as an insult. My hon. friend says that as a Canadian born he feels he is a Canadian citizen. I should like to feel that I have something to show, when I am called a foreigner, that I have been here long enough to qualify as a member of the Canadian family.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to make any lengthy observations with respect to the measure which is now before the house for second reading. But I wish to make as earnest, as strong and as emphatic a plea as I can for the adoption of what I believe to be the proper procedure with respect to this bill. In discussing matters such as citizenship quite often the people of this nation are subconsciously divided when there is really no real reason for division. I have always felt

I was fortunate in being able to approach subjects of this kind without very much heat, although on many occasions subjects have been brought forward in this connection where heat seems to have been very easily generated.

It always interests me to hear people talk as if they were better Canadians than other people, but I have never found it easy to find a dividing line and say that on this side the people are all good Canadians and on that side bad Canadians. Human nature is not built that way. There are very few people in this house of Commons who have a greater affection for the old British Isles than I have and I do not think anyone need ask me to apologize for that position, which I have taken a good many times. On the other hand I want to say to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the house that I do not think that that affection should be regarded by anybody in the house as making us any less a Canadian than anybody else in Canada. I like to think that it makes us as good Canadians in any event as anybody else. I am not one of those who believe that any class or section of our people have a monopoly on good Canadianism in this country. You find good Canadianism in all sections of Canada, and I hope that we shall find that condition to continue to exist through all the years.

I have often felt that we might perhaps take a leaf out of the book of the British people themselves in developing a love of country. One of the things which struck me when I was overseas for the first time last November, December and January was the great love of country that I saw displayed everywhere I went in the British Isles, and I liked that feeling. In these days when we are spreading ourselves very thin in the international field, some may regard it as not being in the interests of world unity to express our affection too loudly for our own people and our own country, but I am not so sure that that kind of doctrine holds water. I think that the best contribution which this country can make to the commonwealth, to the empire and to the world organization is to develop a united Canada, a great country of our own, and at the same time develop a great love and affection for this land of ours.

I noticed everywhere I went in Britain that the people had a great and consuming affection for that land and I would like to see in this country no less a consuming affection for our own country and for our own people than the British have for theirs. Because, Mr. Speaker, this is a great land, great not only in its own right, but a great land to which the nations of the world are turning their eyes to-day as a country where people can live and find employment in the years that lie ahead. There is not a country in Europe where there are not thousands and scores of thousands of people who desire to emigrate to Canada. Why? Because this is regarded as one of the great lands of opportunity in the future world. If that is the view of other nations, surely it can be the view of a united Canadian people as well.

There comes to my mind at the moment an example of the type of affection I saw exhibited by the people of the old land for their own people and their own country. It was when we were leaving Southampton on one of the Clyde-built Queens, the Mary. There were on board at that time some 1,700 British war brides, with some 600 children, coming to rejoin on this side of the water American husbands whom they had married overseas. The scene left an indelible impression on my mind. As we left the dock at Southampton these girls lined the rails of the ship to take their last look at Britain and I have never seen as great a demonstration of affection not just for their families, their relatives and those who were close to them, but for their native land which they were leaving and which meant so much to them. I think in this country we do not do quite enough of that. We need to develop in Canada—I think we are all guilty in this respect, in most cases thoughtlessly guilty—the same kind of national pride, if you like, and I do not apologize for using that word, and the same kind of national affection for our country and for our people that has made the United Kingdom so great. You can perhaps rebuild devastated political structures; you can perhaps rebuild devastated economic structures, and these things are all-important in their place, but what is of the greatest national importance are the spiritual values in the nation itself. Those spiritual values comprise many things. One of the component parts of the spiritual values in this nation as in any other nation is the faith and confidence we have in ourselves as a nation and that love of country which has been so effective in building and maintaining and preserving other great nations of the world.

I make this appeal to the House of Commons this afternoon with great sincerity and with every emphasis at my command. I would like to see in the years that lie ahead the development in this country of a pride and an affection among ourselves for our own people and for our own country. I think in the end that would mean a great deal and be the greatest contribution to the success of this nation and to its prestige in the empire and among the other nations of the world.

Before closing my rambling and very impromptu remarks this afternoon I would suggest to the minister that he give consideration now to the procedure to be followed in considering this bill. I regard this bill as a very important piece of legislation, so important that we cannot afford to toy with it. It is so important that we cannot afford to give it anything less than our very best attention and the most careful consideration of which this house and parliament is capable. All through the years it has been the experience of most of us who have been in parliament for any length of time that with a very important measure such as this, with many sections and great detail, the procedure that has been found most successful and effective in bringing forward the best type of legislation is to refer the bill after second reading, where the importance of the measure warrants it, to a committee of the House of Commons. You ask why? I could give many reasons, but in this particular instance there are two that are of exceptional importance. If, as I understand, it is the government's intention, unless they change it, to bring the bill before the committee of the whole, there will be no opportunity to do more than examine the minister with reference to its various provisions. He will be before the committee of the whole, assisted, and ably assisted, by his deputy, and our questions will, of course, be answered from time to time. But that is not enough on a bill such as this. This bill requires the best that this house can give it, and the committee of the whole is not, in my opinion, the best machinery available to members for the consideration of the measure. We should have the benefit of the cross-examination, if you like, or at any rate the questioning of the members of his department and those particular officials who have been working on the bill, to see after careful review by a committee, such as that on external affairs whether we can come to a conclusion which in the years to come will render it unnecessary for other governments, for this government or for any other parliament in some other session, to amend the bill in any respect. I should like to see a good job done on the bill now, and I am not satisfied that the best job can be done under the procedure to which the minister now seems so wedded.

I would suggest as my second reason, and the minister must of course be aware of this, that many points of view with respect to a matter such as this ought, in my opinion to be aired, if that is the desire, then the members of any committee that might deal with the bill ought to be given an opportunity to consider those views, so that no stone would be left unturned in seeing that this is the best measure that can be brought forward on such a vital and important national subject as citizenship and nationality.

I am going to make an appeal to the minister. I know there are reasons against this course which to him may appear valid and cogent. But we, too, have some views as well, and views that are strongly held, which dictate the course that we now propose. I am going to ask the minister to reconsider the matter, to review the whole question of the government's policy with respect to the procedure now being adopted. If the minister will reflect carefully, if the government will look into the matter from this point of view, they will see that by putting the bill before the committee of the whole instead of submitting it to a special committee they are doing less than justice to a bill to which, I submit, we cannot afford to do less than full justice, having in mind the special position it occupies in the legislation before this parliament.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I congratulate the hon. member for peel (Mr. Graydon) on his excellent speech. He spoke so well that I will send a copy of Hansard of to-day to his fine children. I cannot use the same exordium that some of my friends have used this afternoon. I cannot tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I was not born in this country because you would not believe me. It has been refreshing, however, to listen to the debate this afternoon. There were, of course, things that were said with which we may all agree and others with which all may disagree.

The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol), who is a student, has the gift of natural legal perspicacity and he has quoted St. Paul. He did not discourse on theology when he made that reference, but St. Paul was a Roman soldier and at the time he wrote the passage which my hon. friend read from a book that belongs to a mutual friend of ours, St. Paul was a citizen of the Roman empire outside Rome, outside Italy, because he was living in one of the colonies of Rome. There is another thing my hon. friend the member for Davenport has forgotten.

Mr. MacNICOL: He does not forget much.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but he has forgotten something that is very important. He has forgotten the fall of the Roman empire which occurred between the time that St. Paul wrote that verse and this date, the 29th of April, 1946, when the hon. member read it to us. It occurred some time ago. It is a law of history that empires rise and fall. We hear no more now of Babylon; we hear no more of Persepolis; and it is surprising that Persia is talked about so much at the present time. However, it has adopted a different name.

The hon. member for Peel spoke of good Canadian citizens. There are some people in this country who are good citizens but who are not good Canadian citizens. They may say at times that they are Canadians and I will not say that they have not spiritual values and do not believe in spiritual values. But what is missing is the Canadian spirit, which should be the spirit of all Canadian members in both houses of parliament.

How many members of the Progressive Conservative party are imbued with that Canadian spirit? Whenever a member speaks of Canada, as the hon. member for Saskatoon City (Mr. Knight) did so well, everybody is puzzled. They say: "How can he speak of Canada? We are citizens of the British empire; we are citizens of the British commonwealth." Some members who are gifted and intelligent protested when the hon. member for Saskatoon City spoke. They could not understand that a member of parliament could say that he was a Canadian and that owing to that fact it did not mean that he was anti-British.

Some members do not have the Canadian spirit because they have the spirit of subservience to Britain. They deserve only one thing. They deserve the contempt of good Britishers. What the hon. member for Peel said is perfectly true, namely, that the Englishman loves his home; the Englishman loves his country. I have many friends among the British-born who love Canada more than England now that they are settled here. They are better Canadians than many people who have been born here. This is not the first time I have said that. They put to shame all the fire-eaters that we have in this house and outside this house and who represent only a handful of citizens of this country. I can speak with a little more ease and freedom than I could during the war. At that time these men who were such imperialists deserved only the contempt of those who were true to the British tradition. This I repeat because in my fan mail I receive letters from all over, letters signed by English-speaking Canadians, some of whom were born here and some others were born in the British isles or in the dominions. Your Honour would be surprised at the Canadian spirit that I find in these letters and at the condemnation of the imperialism shown by some leaders of thought. What surprises and dumbfounds me is the utter ignorance of the so-called well-read in this country. I hold in my hand a report of a lecture which was given by the president of a university in Montreal last year. He was the president of a great university; I mean great in size. It is not a university of Quebec, it is outside it. University men are presumed to be, rightly or wrongly, giants of thought. They may be compared with columns of light that dissipate all the darkness of the thinking universe. Leaving aside all artifice of literature, hyperbole, one will agree that the first duty of university men is to teach youth. On that point we must expect, especially if they are professors, that their knowledge should be at least equal to that of their average students. Without necessarily being living encyclopedias, the heads of our universities, those realms of learning, should have at least a little bit of general culture. Those were my reflections when I read the report of that lecture given by that university president on the burning subject of national unity.

We should not be ashamed of our history, and all Canadians worthy of the name should know it well. Alas, the history of Canada is a jewel-box of ignored pearls, de faits ignorés. An investigation made by a great daily of the city of New York has shown that all those who have degrees from United States universities totally ignore the history of their country. In all countries history is the cornerstone of patriotism, and patriotism is the only possible basis of lasting national unity or national good understanding. To appreciate to their value our liberties which have been so dearly won, no Canadian has the right to ignore the fights of the pioneers and the missionaries for the advancement of civilization and the sacrifices that our common ancestors have made for responsible government and freedom of religion.

This university president started by declaring that it should not be forgotten by those who doubt the reality or the continuance of Canadian unity that Canada is the only American country that has not been subjected to a revolution or a civil war. Did he tear the glorious pages which tell of the exploits of the heroes of 1837-38? It is very difficult to think that a man of such standing could deform and falsify history, and it is the more surprising when it comes from the head of a university. Then he went on to say:

> Canadians should be proud of the heritage of Canada and should look forward with confidence to a united Canada taking her place as one of the foremost nations of the world.

That is very fine, but how can Canada get there? Canada, he went on to say, on many occasions has taken a leading part in the British Empire, and took a leading part in formulating the Statute of Westminster which transformed the British empire into the British commonwealth of nations. That is a commonplace saying we hear on all sides. The statute of Westminster is just bunk. It was a concoction prepared by Sidney Webb, otherwise called Lord Passfield, who was a labour lord. I cannot conceive of a labour lord, but he was one. It has changed nothing in our constitution; it has just given us the illusion of autonomy, as the British government keeps the right to disallow all the legislation we pass here, even two years after its adoption. But to use the language of the president of this great university, how can Canada take her rank among the first nations of the universe as long as she has that string on her foot? Then he said:

> Second only to Great Britain in that commonwealth, this country must exercise its privileges and assume its responsibilities as one of the senior partners of the commonwealth.

Nothing is more complicated, according to this university president. Canada is one of the senior partners of the commonwealth. She comes to the first rank of nations of the universe, but in second place to Great Britain. It is very strange. One day I asked the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) what was the difference between "empire" and "commonwealth", and he replied that the two expressions were interchangeable; in other words that they had the same meaning, with the exception that "commonwealth" was more pompous than "empire."

Mr. COLDWELL: Is that what he said or what you are saying?

Mr. POULIOT: He said they were interchangeable, but they can be interchangeable only if they have the same meaning.

Mr. IRVINE: But were you quoting?

Mr. POULIOT: I was quoting the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, who said that the words "British empire" and "British commonwealth of nations" were interchangeable. Since then the universe has been divided into great and small countries. The great countries decide everything; but to console the others and to caress the vanity of our statesmen it has been said that Canada would head the small countries, the dwarf countries. What an honour! It is only the great countries, the big powers, that reach the all-important decisions, and the conclusions at which they arrive have great weight when they are considered by all the united nations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the hon. member quoting the professor now or making his own statement?

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that this is a second quotation from the Prime Minister in reply to a second question I put to him. I asked about Teheran and Cairo; I asked if Canada was represented there, and he said no. I asked further if Canada had anything to do with the decisions reached by the big powers when they met together, when we were not invited to be present.

Mr. BLACKMORE: At Teheran or at some other conference?

Mr. POULIOT: All the conferences. I think I mentioned Teheran and Cairo, and he replied that what is decided by the big powers has great weight with the united nations. In fact we decide nothing. We are the trailer that follows. We are like the little porpoise that goes along following the mother porpoise.

Mr. HANSELL: Is that still a quotation?

Mr. POULIOT: No; this is not a quotation at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member is talking colonialism now, is he not?

Mr. POULIOT: I will come to that for my hon. friend in one moment. No; I am talking of porpoises; I am talking of fisheries. The rule to the effect that all are equal before the law does not apply to the meetings of the big powers, or even to the meetings of the united nations, because it is only those who are on the security council who have their say.

I should like that university president, who was once mentioned as a prospective leader of the Conservative party, to enumerate the privileges and responsibilities of Canada as the senior partner of the British commonwealth. We would know better what he meant. But the language of those who pose as propagandists of national unity is never clear. They are preaching in the desert, so long as the majority of the population will not admit that the duty of all Canadians is to recognize Canada as their own country, and to promote the interests of Canada before those of any other country.

Such is the only true and lasting basis of what is called national unity, but should be called national good understanding. In answer to the hon. member for Lethbridge,

I will tell him that I do not agree or disagree with the bill. In my view it is premature. I do not think those who are ready to give all our wealth to another country, without asking anything in return, should have the right to call themselves Canadian citizens.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Are there any such?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Can the hon. member name one?

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend himself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is entirely wrong.

Mr. POULIOT: It may be wrong, but I have explained it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I challenge the hon. member to find any evidence of that in Hansard.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend is ready to put his head on the block when the British empire is mentioned.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is utterly false.

Mr. POULIOT: He has a right to sacrifice himself on the altar of the country; so has the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) who objected the other day to Canada Day. They should pair. We have some of them on our side and there are some on the other side. There are some for whom I have respect, and even admiration, because they are frank and honest. The hon. member for Davenport, for instance, is honest, and I have respect and admiration for him. He will never say he is not an imperialist. He will repeat the words of Sir John A. Macdonald, "A British subject I was born; a British subject I will die." The hon. member belongs in the category of good citizens; but he cannot call himself a Canadian citizen. He cannot do that, although he does say something for which a Canadian citizen should be congratulated. He is a most difficult case; I cannot understand him.

Here is my genial friend the hon. member for Lethbridge, whom everyone likes. He is an imperialist to the core, and cannot call himself a Canadian citizen.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In your opinion.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes, certainly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Born in the United States; does that prevent my being—

Mr. POULIOT: No, that is not it. A man may be born in China; he may be born in Africa, and he may be a good Canadian—

Mr. BLACKMORE: Why not talk sense, instead of that nonsense you are talking?

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I can speak about China, and talk sense at the same time. My hon. friend must not forget that China is the country that first put holes in buttons, and also invented gunpowder. It was the first civilized country in the world.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has that something to do with Canadian citizenship?

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, it has. I will explain that to my hon. friend.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am beginning to see through your nonsense.

Mr. POULIOT: As my hon. friend is an imperialist to the core, he is a fellow citizen of all the Asiatics in Asia who are under British domination and all the negroes in Africa who are under British domination. But for me, as a British subject, if I am a Canadian I am a fellow citizen only of those Chinese who live here, and only of those negroes who live here. That makes a great difference.

Beside that, I think of my own people, and those people include the hon. member for Lethbridge. I want him to be happy, in preference to someone who may not be living in Canada now. I know that my hon. friend has made Canada his home and that he is a good citizen. But I am very sorry I cannot call him a Canadian citizen, for the simple reason that he wants to be more imperialist than Canadian. That is not the sort of pride a real Canadian should have, a condition I regret deeply.

He should have pride in his adopted country, the country of his choice, the country in which he wishes to live with his children. One must prefer that country to any other country in the world. I do not believe in hybrid citizenship.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Did you give a son in the war for Canada?

Mr. POULIOT: My son is only eight years old, but if my hon. friend represents the Canadian attitude, probably the boys of eight will be called in the next war—and it will not take long.

However, I am not discussing citizenship with my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSELL. But you are implying that he is disloyal to Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not say he is not loyal to Canada.

Mr. HANSELL: That is your implication.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member for Macleod knows very well that it is not possible to discuss this matter—and we now have evidence of it in the present discussion. The bill is premature. If at the same time we are Canadian citizens—and the hon. member for Macleod is a good Canadian citizen; I will give him credit for that—

Mr. HANSELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: When we hear expressions of opinion, as we have since the beginning of this session, then in view of section 26 I say we cannot pass this bill, because it has been put there to appease those who are non-Canadians.

When I say to the hon. member for Lethbridge that he is a non-Canadian in spirit, it is true that his body is here and his mind is here, but his heart is not.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And is he different from the hon. member from Macleod?

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In what respect?

Mr. POULIOT: Because the hon. member for Lethbridge has crossed the fence, in his love of the empire.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I challenge the hon. member to produce from Hansard any evidence to support the unjustified remarks he is making. I am amazed at his outburst this afternoon, and that an hon. member should have to sit here and listen to that.

Mr. POULIOT: I will go to the library, produce and table all those copies of Hansard since the hon. member is a member of parliament. I do not have them at hand now, but I will table them, and my hon. friend will find in his speeches the true expression of what I have told him.

I do not say this in an offensive way. My colleagues are kind to me, and I do not wish to be unpleasant to them. However, I do not believe in this stuff, and I believe it is before us precisely to distract the attention of the people of Canada from the loan to Britain. The same is true of the flag. It is a flag which means nothing. We might better keep the union jack, to show our real colours. So long as the people of Canada have not a Canadian spirit this citizenship bill amounts to nothing. The Canadian flag amounts to nothing because it will not be a Canadian flag. It is impossible to discuss it here. There was a storm raised the other day when it was suggested that Dominion day should be changed to Canada day. I congratulate the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Cote) upon his move. That is something that should have been done as a routine matter but it raised a storm in this house. Hon. members were scandalized; they said it was not loyal. I am just as loyal as anybody to His Majesty the King whom I revere and respect, but I do not think I should be expected to be any more loyal than he is himself. We should not take up time in discussing this matter of a hybrid citizenship when we have more important matters to deal with. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has said, let us be subjects of His Majesty the King in his capacity as King of the realm of Canada, an expression that His Majesty used himself in the senate chamber.

We do not find many people talking about the realm of Canada; it is said that we should not speak about the kingdom of Canada or the realm of Canada, but those words came from the mouth of His Majesty the King. There is an element here that rejoices in servitude, in serfdom and in slavery of mind. They are so narrow-minded that they cannot conceive of Canadianism existing as a noble sentiment.

We do not have a Canadian spirit; therefore this bill is premature. I cannot see how a man who is an imperialist can be proud of being a Canadian subject of His Majesty the King. The first thing he will deny is the divisibility of the crown; he will say that the King is King of the United Kingdom, that it is to the United Kingdom that he owes allegiance. That is true. Sometimes a member of parliament is also mayor of his municipality. When he presides at a sitting of the municipal council he does not preside in his capacity as a member of parliament; he presides at that council in his capacity as mayor of the municipality. When he sits here it is not in his capacity as mayor of his home town; he sits here as a duly elected member of parliament. That shows that a man can fulfil two different functions. According to what His Majesty said in the senate chamber he will be just as proud to bear the title King of Canada as he is to bear the title of King of any other part of the world. By the way, he is already King of Great Britain, Northern Ireland and all the British possessions overseas, which include Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but he has spoken for over forty minutes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Go ahead.

Mr. POULIOT: I like you very much.

Mr. A. J. BROOKS (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say only a few words on this bill. At the outset may I say that I am a Canadian in order there will be no misunderstanding on that point. If I happen to mention England and the British empire I do not do so because I am a great imperialist, but because I have great respect and regard for both. I have enjoyed listening to this debate. It has been logical in most cases and I have marvelled at the study and research which has been carried on by hon. members. The principles of the bill have been thoroughly discussed for some time and it will not be necessary for me to take up much of the time of the house this afternoon.

Some hon. members have said that the first real Canadians came from the province of Quebec. I do not think I can agree entirely with that, but I do agree that some very fine Canadians have come from the province of Quebec. The first Canadians, if we may call them such, were the Indians who resided in this country when the first white men came. When we try to go back to the time of the arrival in Canada of the first white men I think we in the maritimes can claim that the first white Canadians settled there. In recalling our history we shall remember that the first white settlement was founded at Port Royal in Nova Scotia, the city of Quebec being founded, I believe, four or five years afterwards.

I was amazed to hear some hon. members claim that because they had been called foreigners, having come from the old country, therefore, that was an argument in support of this bill. I should like to refer them, not too seriously, to what we are called in the maritimes. Possibly the minister will contend that when this bill is passed we shall not be called these names any more. For instance, the citizens of Nova Scotia have been called blue-noses for a great many generations. We in New Brunswick are called herring-chokers and over in Prince Edward Island they are known as spud-islanders or some such appellation as that. I hope, after this bill is passed, we shall all be known as Canadians pure and simple.

My chief object in rising is to voice objection to that section which requires a British subject to be in this country for five years before he can become a Canadian citizen. It occurred to me a few weeks ago when the new governor general of this dominion arrived in this country, a man who had a very distinguished record in private life and who was one of the most outstanding generals during the last war, if he had come here as a private individual seeking entry into this country and hoping to become a citizen he would have had to wait for five years under the provisions of this bill in order to become a Canadian citizen.

[Mr. Brooks.]

Mr. MARTIN: The same situation has existed for the last twenty-seven years.

Mr. BROOKS: We have not had the bill for the last twenty-seven years.

Mr. MARTIN: Under the Immigration Act a five years' residence was necessary.

Mr. BROOKS: There were certain privileges which he would have had.

Mr. MARTIN: And which he still has.

Mr. BROOKS: But which the minister intimated this afternoon would probably be taken away.

Mr. MARTIN: I said just the opposite, that they would not be taken away.

Mr. BROOKS: I heard the minister refer to the franchise act, and my understanding of what he said was that an amendment to the franchise act would be based on Canadian citizenship, which would require five years.

Mr. MARTIN: I said the very opposite; I said there is no intention on the part of this government to change the elections act following the passage of this bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: They may do that at another session.

Mr. BROOKS: If there is no reason for changing the franchise act I do not see any reason for the provision that a British subject must be in this country for five years before he can become a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: Sir Robert Borden was the one who decided that.

Mr. BROOKS: I can understand that there are certain reasons why people coming from foreign countries should be in this country for five years. They have not our language and it takes five years to learn the English or the French language. Many of these people have been in this country for twenty years and have not learned the English language. When I hear some Englishmen and Scotsmen who have been in this country for more than five years I realize that they will have to be in Canada for almost all eternity before they will be able to speak the English language as it is spoken here.

Again, our customs throughout the British empire are very much the same, so that people coming from other parts of the British commonwealth of nations do not have to learn the customs of the Dominion of Canada because they know them already; their own customs are the same. So that both the language and the customs arguments fall to the ground. It is not necessary on either of these counts to compel a British subject to wait for five years for his citizenship papers in Canada.

Then we come to the possible argument requiring him to know the history of Canada.

I think the history of the commonwealth is taught in all British schools, so that people coming here from other parts of the commonwealth would have a knowledge of the history of this country.

The only argument that remains, and the minister mentioned it this afternoon, is the argument on health. The minister speaks of Sir Robert Borden, who was prime minister nearly forty years ago. Have we stood still all that time? Is it necessary to take five years to determine whether the health of a person is such as to qualify him to become a citizen of this country? That argument, too, falls to the ground on the statement of the minister himself.

Mr. MARTIN: That is not what the medical advisers say.

Mr. BROOKS: We have not heard from any medical advisers in this house. All we have is the minister's word now. It did not take five years to determine whether a man offering himself for enlistment was physically fit to join the army and fight in defence of this country. That did not take five years, nor five months. So that I do not think the health argument is a sound one on which to base this five-year provision in the bill.

Despite what the minister says, I am satisfied that this measure will become the foundation of other acts in the future, such as the franchise act. I am satisfied that it will result in taking away the right which has been enjoyed by people coming from other parts of the British commonwealth and the British empire to vote in this country one year after they arrive.

I see no logical reason, therefore, on the ground of language, customs, history or health for making this a five-year period.

Other hon. members have spoken of Canadian soldiers in the two wars. I do not believe that the passing of this bill is going to do away with all this hyphenated Canadianism. The mere passage of a bill cannot do away with that sort of thing. It goes much deeper than that. In the two wars Canadians got together, fought together, slept together, played together. In that way they learned to break down all prejudices that there were between men of different races and from different sections of this country, and that is the only way in which these prejudices can be broken down. It cannot be done merely by the passing of a bill, but by young men from all parts of Canada associating with and learning to know each other. I would suggest that the young people in our schools in one province should visit the young people attending school in another province. For instance, boys from Quebec could go to Ontario and Ontario boys go to Quebec; maritimers go west and westerners go east, and so on. In that way the young people of this dominion would learn something about conditions in the other provinces and get to know people living in other parts of the dominion. In that way in time we would have a united country. I do not believe that that can be done simply by passing a bill of this kind. The unity of the Canada of the future depends on the sympathetic understanding of all peoples comprising our population.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I think it would help a little in this house if we appointed a committee to draw up in detail a definition of what is an imperialist and probably appointed another committee to draw up a definition in detail of what constitutes a Canadian. I have sat here now for ten years trying to get some sort of idea of what is an imperialist and what is a Canadian. I thought I knew all about it ten years ago before I came into parliament, and I still believe I know about it. But there is a great disagreement among members of this house as to what constitutes an imperialist and what constitutes a Canadian. I have an idea that this is causing more disunity at the present time than any other one thing. If a person cannot support the unity and greatness of the British empire, if he has to stand on the floor of this house and advocate the destruction of the British empire—

Mr. RINFRET: Who did so?

Mr. BLACKMORE: If he has to do that in order to be a Canadian—

Mr. LESAGE: Who did so?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying that anybody did so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I should like to recall to hon. members that the hon. member who has the floor should not be interrupted, and the hon. member who has the floor should address himself to the Chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, I do not mind the interruptions. This sore has been festering for quite a long time and maybe we have reached the point where it has come to a head and ought to be lanced. I resent to the depths of my being some of the remarks made this afternoon. They were utterly unjustifiable.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask my hon. friend a question. Would he tell Mr. Speaker whether he considers the word "imperialist" offensive?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to know whether anybody can give a definition of "imperialist" that will be acceptable to the house. I do not think anybody here can give a definition of that word that would be acceptable to the house, and I doubt, after listening to the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), that anybody can give a definition of what constitutes a Canadian that will be acceptable to the house.

Mr. POULIOT: A man who helps Canada more than any other country.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member who has the floor, but I would remind him that, as I have said before, on the second reading the principle of the bill should be discussed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, there is only one thing I can say, and that is that if a member cannot answer an attack which has been made upon him in debate, if one member is free to make an attack and go completely off the subject in making that attack, and then the member attacked is debarred from the right of defending himself in the same debate, certainly it is time that some change was made in the rules of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: There was no attack, and you can speak for thirty minutes more.

Mr. NORMAN JAQUES (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to voice my opposition to the section of this bill which requires a British subject to be in this country for five years before he can take out his citizenship papers. I wish to know if that holds good in Great Britain. Suppose a Canadian goes to Great Britain to live; does he have to wait for five years before he receives his citizenship papers?

Mr. MARTIN: Does he not in Australia and New Zealand?

Mr. JAQUES: I am asking the question. What is the purpose of this?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member, Mr. Speaker, is asking a question when there is no opportunity of replying to it specifically now that we are debating the second reading. If that is all the hon. gentleman has to say, I would suggest that he raise the question when we reach that particular section of the bill, when there will be ample opportunity to answer fully any questions regarding the section.

Mr. JAQUES: Then, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say two or three words on the remarks made by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), who no doubt speaks for a large number of members from Quebec.

Mr. POULIOT: No.

Mr. JAQUES: Well, it sounds like that. This insistence on Canadian nationality, of which we hear so much, the insistence that we must be independent, is all right. But why are not these "Canadian nationalists" more consistent? Last session when we were discussing the Bretton Woods measure, which means nothing less than the surrender of Canadian sovereignty and therefore Canadian independence, where was their Canadianism? They all voted for it. They do not mind being under the control of Wall street or under the control of international finance. That seems to be all right. Well, I would rather be a sovereign part of the British empire. That would prove a great deal safer and more satisfactory to Canadian citizens.

Perhaps I should wait to ask the other questions I have in mind, but for the moment I will say that, with regard to the five-year provision, the only reason I can see for it is that it is perhaps planned to bring in a great many aliens—I will not be more specific than that—and unless immigrants are all treated alike, that is to say, if people from the British isles are to be citizens as soon as they get here and aliens are not, possibly the government and the Secretary of State fear they might be accused of racial discrimination. I will not be more specific than that. Perhaps the minister will answer questions when the bill is in committee.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): In closing the debate, I am sure I express the views of every member of the house when I say that the measure, one admittedly of great importance, has been debated on all sides of the house with a considerable degree of thoroughness, both as regards the subject matter involved and in other respects; and one of the most remarkable circumstances, in my opinion, is that on all sides, from every party, there has been a unanimous expression of approval of the bill itself. That, I think, reflects the determination of this house to give expression to the common conviction and desire which all Canadians have of being able to assert in law as well as in fact that they are citizens of this country.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MARTIN: In concluding this debate it was not my intention to make any protracted statement, and perhaps in some respects it may not be necessary in the light of the fact that the measure has received such wide approval in principle from all sections of the house; but because during the course of the debate attention has been paid to two points in the bill, and because on account of the rules of the house there was no opportunity to make a full statement with regard to some of the points made by hon. gentlemen opposite, it does seem desirable to take advantage of this opportunity to correct certain misapprehensions which have been expressed during the course of the debate.

As the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said to-day, the measure before the house is an important one. It was carefully studied by a committee of the departments of External Affairs, Justice, Immigration and the Department of the Secretary of State. I wish to pay tribute to-night to a number of men from these departments who were associated with me over many weeks in the preparation of this important measure. We had the advantage of having before us not only our own proposals but also the studies made by a former secretary of state to whom I made reference in this debate when I moved second reading.

First of all, I should like to express my gratification at the degree of unanimity and approval that has been shown in the speeches which have been made. I think it would not be too much to say that almost every hon. member has approved the principle embodied in the bill. This is of particular importance in a measure of this kind; for it might be called an organic measure, a measure that will go into and become part of the basic legal framework of Canada. The highest possible degree of general approval is always of greatest importance for such a fundamental piece of legislation.

In addition, however, there is the fact that this bill is intended to aid in creating a sense of unity and oneness in Canada, a feeling of community. A bill to create unity must not be based on disunity and disagreement. It is therefore particularly pleasing to see the measure of support which the bill has been receiving.

I do not wish to discuss the general aspects of the bill at any length at this time, but there are two parts of it which have caused some discussion and to which I would wish to make reference. The portions I have in mind are embodied in sections 10 and 26 of the bill. The parts of section 10 that have received particular attention are the requirements which are imposed by way of qualification and procedure on non-Canadian British subjects who desire to become Canadian citizens. The question in relation to section 26 is whether the bill should provide that the status of British subject continues for Canadian citizens. In my opening statement I said that this bill parallels the development of Canada as a nation. I repeat that statement.

This bill cannot and does not seek to meet extreme points of view which in some instances have been expressed in this house. There are extreme positions that can be taken in connection with these points. At one end of the scale there is the desire to reduce the qualification and procedure for non-Canadian British subjects to the minimum and to emphasize as much as possible the status of British subjects for Canadian citizens. At the other end of the scale the position is that no privileges whatever should be given to British subjects; that they should be aliens in the sight of our law and that the status of British subject should be eliminated with regard to Canadian citizens. These are extreme points of view. The present bill does not go to either extreme. For that reason it does not secure complete approval from either of the groups of opinion to which I have referred. The bill falls in between that. It assumes a middle position, and I think a reasonable position, one that enjoys, I believe, a greater measure of general support among the Canadian people than either of the more extreme positions would elicit.

First of all let me refer to the position of the non-Canadian British subjects. Particular criticism has been directed against the requirement of five years' residence, and against the procedure involved in the acquisition of a certificate. Before examining these matters, let me state categorically what I have said before by way of interjection and by way of my statement at the opening of the debate, but what has so frequently been ignored or forgotten, that the bill will not and does not remove one iota of the rights and privileges that are now enjoyed by British subjects in Canada. A British subject over twenty-one has now the right to vote. He will continue to have that right to vote after this bill is passed. A British subject is eligible for an old age pension. He will continue to be eligible for an old age pension after the bill is passed. A British subject is eligible for appointment to the civil service. He will continue to be eligible for such appointment after the bill is passed.

The rights that British subjects now have will remain in full. None is taken away by this bill or reduced in any respect. They remain precisely as they are. The bill does not affect the status of British subjects in any way; it merely regulates the method of becoming Canadian citizens.

Moreover, under the bill—and no attention has been paid to this fact—all those British subjects now in Canada who have domicile will become citizens of Canada on the passage of this bill. The wives of soldiers, the war brides who are coming and who will be coming to Canada in the next few months, will automatically become Canadian citizens under this bill. These two facts have not been emphasized.

The suggestion has been made from one extreme quarter that this bill was an attempt to violate Canada's relationship to the commonwealth. No reference was made by these hon. gentlemen to the provision of section 26 of the bill which in its precise terms are more definite than will be found in any corresponding legislation in any other part of the commonwealth. On the other hand, those who took exception to the fact that the bill provides that Canadian citizens shall be designated British subjects failed to recogize that the paramount status in the bill is the status of being able to say, "I am a Canadian citizen."

No one can envisage the future. In 1919, when Sir Robert Borden changed the provision from three years to five years, he was faced within his own party by the very sort of argument which has been used by some hon. gentlemen during this debate. The rights of British subjects were not changed by the amendments brought in by the government of Sir Robert Borden, any more than they will be changed to-day. This parliament, representing as it does the temper, the opinion and the conviction of the Canadian people, will always be guided by the character of Canada, a free nation within the British commonwealth. In some references which have been made to the bill, it has been suggested that the five-year requirement is something new, which never existed before. In actual fact it is nothing of the sort. The requirement of five years' residence as it applies to British subjects is exactly the same to-day as it has been since 1919. Thus it is simply a continuation of the existing provision.

In essence, citizenship is made up of a collection of rights and duties that pertain to a particular status. Some of the rights are internal to the state involved, and some are external. The former group are fairly clear: the right to own property, the right to vote, the right of appointment to particular positions, the right to pension and so forth. The external rights are also fairly clear. Normally they include the right to be admitted into the country on coming to its boundaries, the right to diplomatic and consular protection and assistance, the right to a passport and so forth. As far as Canada is concerned, the internal rights, if I may call them such, are accorded to British subjects on the same basis as to Canadian citizens. As I have already emphasized, none of this will be changed with the passage of this bill. As far as the external rights are concerned, the one normally most important is the right of entry, and for almost half a century this right has been limited to Canadian citizens and other persons having their domicile here. The British subject who comes to the shores of Canada has no right of entry. If he is admitted to Canada as an immigrant and lives here for five years he becomes a Canadian citizen under the Immigration Act, and only then does he have an automatic right to come into Canada.

When this requirement of a number of years of residence was first imposed the period was two years. That was prior to 1910. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was perhaps the only hon. member who very properly pointed out that this period was required for certain reasons, mainly health and to avoid the mischief of individuals whose records were clearly those of criminals. The period was required in order to give the immigration authorities a chance to see whether the person was desirable to have as a Canadian; whether he was sound in body and mind; whether he had criminal tendencies, and so on. Later, the two-year period was found to be too short, and in 1910, at the request of the provinces it was extended to three years. However, as I said earlier, this also was found to be inadequate and in 1919 a Conservative government under the leadership of Sir Robert Borden extended the period from three to five years, where it has remained ever since. In short, for over a quarter of a century we have required five years' residence of a British subject before granting him a right of entry.

Perhaps one more word might be said on this point. Obviously a bill such as that now before the house must be related to the Immigration Act. When we come to deal with this particular section my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Glen), speaking as Minister of Immigration, will relate to the house some of the difficulties being experienced by his department, and will show statistically how important this provision really is. I may say frankly that when the bill was being discussed we had taken the position that it might be desirable to reduce the period, but that met with objections on the part of the officers of the department of immigration. They are by no means, by their own traditions, men who can be said to be inimical to the interests of the British commonwealth. Every hon. member knows from what part of the world came the commissioner of immigration, who has to administer this measure. Everyone, of course, knows the origin of the Minister of Mines and Resources, if there should be any doubt about my own sincerity in the matter. But from the point of view of administration, having in mind the desirability that we should not be saddled with people who had criminal records, people who were of criminal tendencies or people who had mental difficulties not ascertained or ascertainable at the time of entry; having in mind that provincial institutions were being called upon to take care of many of these people, it was felt desirable that we should not be saddled within one or two or three years with the burden of maintaining them, when for the greater part of their lives they had resided elsewhere.

I think the relevance of what I have said will be apparent, for it completes the picture with regard to British subjects and makes it clear that their rights have not been changed in the present bill. The rights that British subjects have enjoyed, as British subjects, will continue to be theirs; they do not have to be Canadian citizens in order to secure them. On the other hand, the right of entry, which hitherto they have been able to obtain after five years of residence, will continue to be theirs after five years of residence. The time element is nothing new; it is no change whatsoever. It does not alter the position of a British subject; it merely perpetuates a situation which has prevailed in this country for over a quarter of a century.

During the debate the question was asked: "Why should it be necessary to give a certificate of citizenship to a non-Canadian British subject?" Well, I could understand that attitude on the part of someone who perhaps has had no experience in the administration of the immigration department, or the administration of the Department of the Secretary of State, or the administration of the Department of External Affairs, or to a lesser extent, the administration of the Department of Justice. But let me give the house one case that came to my attention only after six o'clock this afternoon. A few days ago the daughter of a well known missionary of the United Church, who had been in China for over twenty-three years, proceeded to the United States to attend university. She had never lived in this country. Her father had been born in the United Kingdom and had come to Canada, where he was ordained in the United church ministry and almost immediately thereafter went to China. Under the laws of China that girl is a citizen of that country. She is not a citizen of the United Kingdom, but she is a citizen of Canada. She was on her way to a particular university in the United States, but in the middle of the night an immigration officer instructed her to get up and prepare to answer certain questions. Later, she was put off the train because she could not prove to that officer that she was a citizen of Canada. She had nothing by way of documentary proof to show that she was not, even in her own mind, a citizen of China. Will anyone say that under those circumstances we should perpetuate that kind of injustice? As my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources will show later on, the immigration department is full of cases of that sort, clearly indicating that in the interests of justice itself to thousands of individuals it is wholly desirable that they should have documentary proof of the citizenship which the existing law or which this measure will give them.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that not the case we had up a year or so ago?

Mr. MARTIN: No; that is a case which occurred last Thursday, I believe, and came to my attention only this afternoon.

Mr. HAZEN: Would we not have a conflict of laws there? Could she not be a citizen of China?

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend is quite right. She could be a citizen of China. There are cases where people are citizens of no less than seven countries. My attention has been called to a case before the war of a citizen of another country who, under the laws of eleven different countries, was a citizen of those countries.

We cannot deal with the kind of status determined by other countries, except by our own law to do all we can to avoid two things, namely to avoid statelessness and dual nationality, or nationality of several kinds.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is what the underling in the United States did.

Mr. MARTIN: I am just reciting that as an instance.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): But that is what you are stating.

Mr. MARTIN: I am just reciting that as one case in perhaps more than many hundreds, to show the desirability of being able to provide documentary proof of citizenship. It affords some protection.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But this measure does not consider that situation.

Mr. MARTIN: Well, my hon. friend has likely given more attention to this matter than I have.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not know whether I have given it more attention, but if the minister would tell me where that has application in this measure, I should like to know.

Mr. POULIOT: There is the difference between St. Paul and St. Paul's.

Mr. MARTIN: The second general matter with which I wish to deal is the provision in the bill for the maintenance of the status of British subject. From the remarks of certain hon. members it is apparent that there is a large measure of misunderstanding as to the reason for having the sections which deal with the status of British subject. I think it has been generally felt that the principle involved in sections 26 and 28 is of such importance that the bill cannot be properly dealt with on second reading without referring to them in some detail.

Section 26 states that a Canadian citizen is a British subject. What does this mean? Does it mean that a Canadian citizen is a subject of Great Britain? It most certainly does not. No one needs to tell hon. members of the Canadian parliament that the independence of Canada is complete. Canadians are subject to the authority of no government outside Canada. No matter what they may be called, they are as Canadians subject to no other country. There is no possible room for doubt on this point.

Does the section means that we are demanding special favours for Canadians? Are we calling them British subjects in order to require of other countries of the commonwealth that they be given special treatment? Some hon. members have suggested that that is so. In reality, it is not so. The government of the United Kingdom is not obliged to give any special treatment to all persons who happen to bear the generic name "British subject". It can differentiate among them as much as it wishes, and give as many or as few rights and privileges as it sees fit. The government of Australia can treat Australian-British subjects in one way and Canadian-British subjects in another. It can differentiate between Canadian-British subjects and South African-British subjects. It can do precisely as it wishes, no matter what term of description we may use. The same is true for all other governments of the commonwealth. Each one is completely free to give or deny rights to British subjects as a whole or to any part of that broad group. Such differentiation and distinction has been a fact for years, and it will continue to be a fact.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): May I ask one simple question—and I assure the minister I am trying to be helpful? I just wrote down what the minister said, that a Canadian subject is a British subject. I wonder under what authority he is entitled to say that.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has said that it is a simple question. Is there any doubt that this parliament has the right to determine the character and status of its people?

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): None whatsoever. I was speaking extra-territorially, in conformity with the bill, I would assume.

Mr. MARTIN: I will come to that later.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am sorry I interrupted.

Mr. MARTIN: It is all right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I was not being facetious.

Mr. MARTIN: As a result, it is clear that when we say "A Canadian citizen is a British subject", we ask no recognition from anyone for any particular implications as flowing from the title. Whatever rights or privileges another country gives to Canadian citizens will depend on their law—not on ours. Nothing we may do can in any way limit their full and free capacity to treat our citizens on whatever basis they see fit in so far as their law is concerned.

There is a third possibility as to the meaning of the section. Is it necessary to ensure that a Canadian citizen is a subject of His Majesty the King? Again the answer is no. It is, of course, beyond doubt that a Canadian citizen is and will be a subject of the king, but that does not depend in any way upon the force of this section. There is no magic in the appellation "British subject", and a Canadian citizen would as surely and as loyally owe allegiance to the crown whether we called him "British subject" or not. Loyalty does not depend on a name, and it would be a rash man who would suggest that a Canadian would be less loyal as a "Canadian citizen" than he would be as a "British subject". The fact of allegiance exists. The spirit of loyalty is beyond doubt. Section 26 could go without affecting our loyalty or the fact of our allegiance in any way.

Those, then, are three possibilities that do not apply. Section 26 does not mean subjection to Great Britain. It does not constitute a demand for special treatment. It is not essential to maintain our loyalty to the crown.

What then does section 26 mean when it says that "a Canadian citizen is a British subject?" It means nothing more or less than that we are retaining a term which has been used traditionally to designate a particular group of people in the world who share a peculiar association, of which association we have been and are a part. There is a definite practical reason for retaining the term, but before coming to that I wish to deal with some more general considerations.

Some people have questioned whether the retention of this term does not conflict with one purpose of the bill, which is to foster a sense of Canadianism. I do not think that it does or that it hinders us in any way. Because the name "British subject" implies no inflexible rights and duties we are able to retain it and still be completely free to legislate as we wish. It does not impose anything on us or deny anything from us. Moreover, there is, I think, a positive value in retaining this symbol of our association in the British commonwealth of nations. The commonwealth has been and is a great force for good in the world, and there is much to be said for preserving some of the evidences of association that do not conflict or interfere in any way with the essentials of our separate personality and status. The government is of the opinion that this house and the people of Canada will, on the whole, agree that the term should be retained.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The symbolism, you mean.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. From the practical point of view, however, there is an important reason for retaining the term "British subject". While it is not a term that has any specific meaning in terms of rights and duties, it has acquired the character of a technical legal term that has become so firmly embedded in our law, particularly our statute law, both provincial and dominion, that it cannot be swept away without an extensive revision of the law.

Many dominion statutes and also many provincial statutes make reference to "British subjects." It is necessary for the operation of these statutes that this term be defined in our Canadian law. If the term "British subject" were to be dropped from the bill the result would be great confusion and uncertainty as to the application of many existing statutes. In questions of interpretation, if the meaning of the term "British subject" were not set forth as is now done in the bill, the courts would probably find it necessary to refer to the definition of "British subject" as it was recognized by the law prior to the enactment of a statutory definition. Under the common law there was no naturalization and, in general, only persons born to the status were British subjects. This would mean that, practically speaking, only persons born in His Majesty's territories and allegiance would be British subjects. A person naturalized as a Canadian citizen would probably not be a British subject. In the same way, if we change the bill to say that "a Canadian citizen is a subject of His Majesty," rather than have the present section which says that "a Canadian citizen is a British subject," there again arises in cases of the interpretation of the statutes the question whether this is the equivalent of making Canadian citizens British subjects for the purposes of our law.

The application of statutes in which reference is made to British subjects would be exceedingly difficult. Either the term "subject of His Majesty" would be construed to mean a British subject, in which case we might as well use that term and be done with it, or it would not be so construed, in which case the application of a large number of statutes would be materially altered, with a result which we cannot prophesy.

What it amounts to is this: If we do not provide for Canadian citizenship also having the status of British subjects, it will necessitate the reexamination of a large number of statutes by us, and more particularly by provincial governments. I include in that not only the provinces of Quebec and Ontario but every one of our nine provinces. There would certainly have to be extensive amendments made to many acts. So much for section 26.

Section 28 can be dealt with very briefly. It will be noted that what it does is to say that certain non-Canadians are to have the status of British subjects in Canada. The reasons for including this section are of the same order as those for including section 26. The broad argument as a symbol of association is the same, and the practical legal consideration is almost identical. If section 28 were not included there would again be the danger of confusion as to the meaning of our present statute law. Until the law is changed there would be considerable difficulty and confusion.

So far as the consequences of section 28 are concerned, in terms of rights, duties and privileges for non-Canadian British subjects, these obviously depend upon the terms and provisions of Canadian law. If we use the term "British subject" often in our statutes, section 28 may mean a great deal. If we use the term rarely, the section may mean relatively little. It all depends upon the state of our law.

The house has given this measure its wide approval and endorsation, largely because we are determined, all of us, regardless of our political convictions, to create as the paramount status of our country that of Canadian citizenship, enjoying at the same time the common status of British subject; for we must not forget that we are a free nation within the Commonwealth. We must no fail to recognize the danger of the implications which are involved in the two extremes to which I referred in the course of my remarks to-night.

This bill has won not only the approval of this house in principle, but because I promised the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that I would do so to-night, I may say that it has won the approval of the government of Australia. The Ottawa Journal of April 9 contained a report that Prime Minister Chifley had announced that the Australian government had approved the principles embodied in the Canadian citizenship bill and proposed to set up an act along the same lines. That represents on the part of Australia, no less than on our part, a simple desire to create within that country, as in this country, a feeling that all the people belong to the country. In the case of Canada they belong to a country which in the light of its history and achievements has the right to be able to give to its citizens the designation which the people in every other country of the world save ourselves thus far, except for the limited purposes of the Immigration Act, have enjoyed.

During the debate the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Rinfret) in an extremely able speech suggested that we should try to avoid hyphens, that we should try to avoid differences of race and religion. I can only say that this bill seeks to do that very thing. It will not do for hon. gentlemen to suggest that one group is less loyal to the commonwealth than another group, as has been suggested during the debate this afternoon. I take second place to no one in this house in my loyalty to the king and to the institutions of the British commonwealth, and I am sure that that is true of every hon. member in this house. Instead of trying for one purpose or another to create divisions in this country, instead of trying to create strawmen only to knock them down, if we would seek to emphasize the common benefits of being members of the Canadian family we would be subscribing to the creating of a healthier condition in this country.

What we are trying to do basically by this bill, in the light of the development of Canada to-day as a nation, is to give to her citizens the right to be able to use a common designation which will apply to all whether they live on the Pacific or the Atlantic coast, whether they are French, English, Irish or Scandinavian or what you will, to give them a right to be able to say proudly, "We are citizens of Canada, we owe loyalty to a common king." I submit with great respect that by no stretch of the imagination can that be construed as a violation of the freedom which we enjoy as a people.

I referred to the desirability, instead of trying to pit one group against another, instead of trying to measure loyalty to Canada or to the crown, of considering an example which I think is a notable one in this country. I refer to what has been done by the university of western Ontario, a non-denominational university in my part of the country. I am sure the hon. member for London (Mr. Manross) will subscribe wholeheartedly to what I am going to say because he is as familiar with this work as I am. A number of years ago Doctor Sherwood Fox, a Canadian of Anglo-Saxon origin, whose love for Canada, by his own record, I think is as great as that of any man in this country, sought to give to the students of that university an understanding of Quebec by creating a summer school at Trois Pistoles, which I believe is in the riding of my distinguished colleague, the hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Bennett took it away from me.

Mr. MARTIN: That was done to instruct English-speaking Canadians in the culture and language of French Canada. That is the kind of thing we should be doing instead of constantly measuring our loyalty, the loyalty of one group as compared with another; instead of saying, "I am more loyal than you are; my whole record shows it." I believe that the example of Doctor Fox in western Ontario is an example that all of us in this house without exception might well seek to emulate. I understand that at the present time a group in the province of Quebec are seeking to establish a school in Ontario to which their students can go and have the same opportunities of subscribing to desirable outside influences. Those are the things which we as members of this house should seek to emphasize instead of for one purpose or another trying to use devices that can only divide, that cannot bring us more closely together.

I join with what has been said by other hon. gentlemen in paying a tribute, not only to those who have come into our Canadian family as British subjects but to those who have come from other parts of the world, some of whom are in this house. I could not avoid feeling impressed when I heard the speech of the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll), a man whom I have known for a long time. He comes from my own city. He was born in Russia; he came to Canada as a young lad and sold papers on the streets. His mother and father undertook the most menial tasks in the city of Windsor in order to give their children an opportunity to get along. That man is now a member of this House of Commons and was a former member of the government of Ontario. We should be proud of such people and their achievements. We should be proud of these people who are seeking to enter our Canadian family, whether they come from Yugoslavia or any other country. If we look upon them as being entitled to citizenship, then we should accord them all the privileges without creating unnecessarily divisions as between them and other potential Canadian citizens. It is only with that spirit that we shall build the kind of national fibre that everyone in this house really wants.

The hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) said to-day that this bill by itself will not make true citizens. He went on to praise the bill and commended it to the house. I agree with him that it will not make citizens, but it will remove some of the confusion and anomalies that exist in the Canadian Nationals Act, and in the Immigration Act, and inadequacies in the Naturalization Act. It will give legal emphasis to something which in our schools, in our homes and in our churches, throughout the whole of our national life, we can do if we really want to.

A week ago in a Canadian newspaper I came across the following; and while I am not given to quoting poetry I wish to quote this to the house to-night because of the lesson given in its words, and particularly having in mind their author. This poem was written by Percy J. Philip, a member of the Press Gallery who was president of the gallery last year. He has put into words something that I know will kindle the hearts of every member of this house. He has written:

> To Canada our fathers came
> And gave this unknown land its name
> This Canada of ours;
> God grant that we will never let
> That name be tarnished or forget
> The joy of building mightier yet
> This Canada of ours.
> Out of the rivalry and strife
> Of older peoples came to life
> This Canada of ours;
> They fought for what they thought was good;
> God, in His mercy, understood
> And formed into a brotherhood
> This Canada of ours.
>
> In strength together we will stand,
> Defending our beloved land,
> This Canada of ours;
> And never shall it cease to be,
> A nation where all men are free
> In unity from sea to sea
> This Canada of ours.

Those words, put into writing by a distinguished journalist, now a resident in this country, a former resident of the United Kingdom who for twenty years served a great newspaper in France, subscribe to what I know we in this house and our children and our children's children will come to regard as the standard by which real Canadianism will be judged.

My final words in moving the second reading of this bill are these. Fortune has placed this country in the position where its people do not all speak the same language and do not all adore God at the same altar. Our task is to mould all these elements into one community without destroying the richness of any of those cultural sources from which many of our people have sprung. No one, I think, has gripped the need of meeting this problem of the Canadian mosaic better than a great former prime minister of this country, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who said, speaking to a group of students at the university of Toronto of the necessity of trying to have groups in Canada understand one another; "Three years ago I visited in England one of those models of gothic architecture which the hands of genius guided by an unerring faith had moulded into a harmonious whole. This cathedral was made of oak, of granite and of marble. It is the image of the nation I want to see Canada become. I want the marble to remain the marble; I want the oak to remain the oak; I want the granite to remain the granite; and out of these elements I would build a nation great among the nations of the world."

Mr. HAZEN: May I ask the Secretary of State a question? Speaking in this debate I asked him if the provisions of this bill had been submitted to the other members of the commonwealth, and in reply he said that the answer was yes and that he would give greater detail later on. I think the minister might give that detail now.

Mr. MARTIN: I will do so in committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

Mr. MARTIN: I move, Mr. Speaker, that you do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole to consider said bill.

Mr. GRAYDON: Mr. Speaker, before the motion is put may I say that I thought the minister intended to make some reference to the suggestion I made earlier this afternoon with respect to the procedure to be adopted in considering this bill. I suggested that we might have much more effective and satisfactory results if the bill were sent to such a committee as the external affairs committee. I should like to have a statement from the minister on that point.

Mr. MARTIN: I am very sorry; I had fully intended replying to the suggestion of my hon. friend. The government has thought it desirable to proceed with the bill in committee of the whole, where there will be ample opportunity for any hon. member to put any question he desires. To send the bill to a committee would mean that it would come back here and there would be a repetition of the whole matter. We feel, in the light of all the circumstances, that it would be better to proceed with the bill in committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee. Mr. Golding in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that this bill was not sent to the committee on external affairs, where witnesses could have been called and examined.

Mr. POULIOT: Call a phrenologist.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member for Temiscouata is always close to his constituents. He likes to have his constituents heard from. Perhaps some of his constituents would like to come here and meet a committee of this house.

Mr. POULIOT: They would not be interested in the committee if the hon. member was on it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am sorry I did not hear the hon. member. However, that is all right.

The minister in the course of his remarks spoke about people being interested in national unity. I do not know of any man or any two men in Canada who have done more to bring about national unity in Canada than my old friend Stephen Leacock and René Du Roure, professor of French at McGill university.

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. POULIOT: And Doctor Shields.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): We hear a lot of talk about other people, but we all know what Stephen Leacock tried to do, and if my hon. friends want to read something instructive with reference to national unity in Canada, and all the difficulties relating thereto, it might be well for them to get the last book that Leacock wrote. It is well worth while.

I wish to ask the minister a couple of questions. When we are conferring British citizenship on Canadian citizens, we do confer the same privilege upon all citizens of the British empire, so far as the empire as a whole is concerned, in relation to Canadian citizenship. As regards the five years' residence, the minister said that it was the same as it was in 1910. But times have changed since then and people are going from one part of the empire to another. This is taking place in all parts of the British empire, and I do not see why a man in one part of the empire should be treated the same as people outside the empire.

The main reason I rose was to make this statement. One would have thought there were only one or two classes of people in Canada who really desire to have Canadian citizenship; but as a matter of fact, for quite a long time, we have had "new Canadians" as well as old Canadians. We have had Italians, loyal Germans, Ukrainians, Polish people, Russians. All these people came to this country a long while ago and they wish to have Canadian citizenship. They wish to be Canadians. For that reason I am anxious to see this bill passed. I am supporting the bill. What I wish to see, however, is that citizenship does not become a mere formality, that people will simply go and obtain citizenship without any trouble at all. There should be a decent ceremony in connection with the granting of citizenship, and people should be taught to be really good Canadian citizens. I wish to see prospective citizens made aware of the obligations which will devolve upon them in relation to the privileges which they will enjoy as a result of being Canadian citizens. I want to see them properly instructed so that they may get a reasonable idea of the history of this country and of the great traditions of their forefathers. There are great traditions so far as the great French race in Canada is concerned; there are great traditions so far as the great English race in Canada is concerned; there are great traditions so far as the German races, the Ukrainian races and others are concerned; and all that history, all that sort of thing, the good being carefully sifted from the bad, should be taught prospective citizens. They should be told what mistakes have been made in history. Inly in that way shall we get something worth while out of our Canadian citizenship.

I do not agree with the idea of simply making people Canadian citizens without proper instruction. That will result in nothing worth while. We must have a unified educational system in Canada, a system which will teach people to be good Canadian citizens and which will teach them the best that we have in Canada.

We have to get rid of all the old festering sores that we have had between the races in this country. We must get rid of all the bad things and teach people that the brotherhood of man in Canada will mean something to them and that being a Canadian citizen will be worth while.

I am certainly in favour of this bill, but I think that any British subject in the commonwealth of nations, with laws similar to our own, should be allowed to become a Canadian citizen without any fuss or feathers so long as he has become a British citizen in some other part of the commonwealth. I have nothing more to say except this. We must teach the traditions pertaining to all the good which we have acquired in the past, or this bill will not prove of any value.

Mr. FLEMING: I believe I was the first in the course of the debate on the second reading to put to the Secretary of State a question as to the relationship between this bill and the elections act in the definition of requirements in connection with the franchise. This afternoon when the question was raised again the Secretary of State indicated that in his opinion he had answered the question several times but I did not gather that in the earlier part of the debate. To-night he referred to the subject in his concluding remarks before the bill received second reading.

I think it is quite clear to all members that there is something anomalous about citizenship with all the rights and privileges pertaining to that status while it is possible for someone who does not hold citizenship to have the full right of the franchise. The Secretary of State as I followed his remarks indicated that it is not the present intention of the government to introduce a bill to amend the elections act in order to confine the franchise to those who after the final enactment of this measure will be Canadian citizens.

I would ask the Secretary of State—because it is an important question and is bound to have an influence on the views of members with regard to later sections of the bill when we come to them—if he is not prepared to make a further statement in this respect. I am not asking for a reiteration of what has already been stated. I am asking if the Secretary of State is not prepared to say on behalf of the government not simply that they do not intend to introduce an amendment to the election act but that they are giving their pledge to the house that so long as this government is in power, there will be no amendment to the elections act seeking to confine the franchise to those who will be citizens under this bill if it is adopted. That clarification is due the house. I am not at the moment suggesting to the minister what course he ought to take, but, with great respect, I suggest that the house is entitled to the clearest possible statement on that matter.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman does not want us to be Canadian citizens honoris causa but Canadian citizens de facto. Is that what he means?

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member followed my remarks he must have noted that I made it clear that at the moment I am not suggesting to the Secretary of State what his answer ought to be. I want the fullest clarification of the government's position in this respect. I also pointed out that it would be anomalous if the franchise were not confined to citizens where the status of citizenship is defined by statute of parliament.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman. The point taken by the hon. member for Eglinton was very well taken and it was subtle. He wants to lead the minister into a trap, but my duty is to warn the minister to be very careful about questions put to him by the hon. gentleman. He tries to get him on slippery ground. Here is the piece of legislation that is before us. It is fine; it is laudable. We are all proud to be Canadian citizens. That is all right. It is honoris causa. It is like an honorary degree in law.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The hon. member is an assistant to the Secretary of State.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member will never debunk me, though he boasts of debunking others. I like him just as much as I like the hon. member for Lethbridge. This is all very interesting. There are grocers. The grocery trade is an honourable trade. It is like grocers who are appointed doctors of law honoris causa. They are very useful in spite of the fact the food does not grow on their shelves. The trade is useful to all of us, and when the trade goes down we all complain about it. They may be doctors of law. Any rich man who makes an endowment to a university is given a doctor of law degree honoris causa. I wonder whether we are going to be Canadian citizens honoris causa. That is my point. If we are Canadian citizens honoris causa we should be given a diploma to keep in our living rooms. Each Canadian citizen will keep that diploma with the seal of the Secretary of State upon it in his drawing-room or living-room, and those who are more modest, in the room that serves as a dining-room kitchenette. It will be there and it will be something to hide the pipe-hole; that is all. If we are Canadian citizens de facto, if the gracious thing that is proposed to us has a meaning, then necessarily the elections act will have to be amended so that it will mean something to be a Canadian citizen and a British subject at the same time. As the bill stands now, if the elections act is amended to permit Canadian citizens only to vote, then there should be another amendment to permit only British subjects to vote, and these two amendments will mean nothing. There will be no change in the law because these two changes will make the law no different from what it is now. Therefore what is the use of arguing? What is the use of the minister answering the able question put to him by the hon. member for Eglinton, who has split the hair so fine that no barber could do it any better, not even a Philadelphia lawyer? My hon. friend is bright enough to agree with me that as the bill stands now, which I hold in my hand; in fact I hold a copy in each hand—

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Is that dual nationality?

Mr. POULIOT: He asked the question to embarrass the minister.

Mr. FLEMING: No, no.

Mr. POULIOT: I will not impute motives to my hon. friend. It was to assist the minister. It is very interesting. The hon. gentleman sits behind the fence, and when I wondered whether it was a suggestion that he had made to the minister he said No. He said, "I want information." His feeling and mine are the same. We want information about it.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): That is a neat way of getting it.

Mr. GRAYDON: When do we get it?

Mr. POULIOT: I want the right kind of information, and I want to give the minister time to think about the answer so that he answers with his usual wisdom. Let me ask the hon. gentleman who occupies the seat that I occupied when Mr. Bennett was in full bloom to be fair with the committee. I challenge him to suggest to the minister that he amend the elections act. He will not do that. If the minister amends the elections act in accordance with section 26 of this bill, then it will be a double amendment which will mean nothing. The hon. gentleman has had enough experience in law and in parliament to know very well that that amendment would change nothing in the elections act because it would be twofold.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to say something to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. The hon. gentleman asked a question of the hon. member for Eglinton. The answer did not come from the minister but from my dear old friend, the hon. member for Temiscouata. It is very easy for him to get elected. He has been working for a long time for all the constituents in his riding who are all Canadians of French origin.

Mr. POULIOT: No; I have Scotch, Irish and English people.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is quite different in my riding. I rose to speak for some of my constituents who are neither Anglo-Saxon nor French. Those are the people who want Canadian citizenship more than anything else. They are fine people.

Mr. POULIOT: Indeed they are.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Fortunately for me they elected me to the House of Commons. Had they not voted for me I would not have been elected. What we are worried about is this. Is there to be some change in the franchise act to take care of the situation? I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question through you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POULIOT: Ask it directly; no red tape.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Has the hon. gentleman done his duty as a Canadian toward educating these people from his part of the country, non-Anglo-Saxons and non-French Canadians, as far as their duty as citizens is concerned? That is part of the duty of each one of us. What we try to do in Ontario and in my riding is to make these people welcome when they come there, and make them feel that they are citizens. That is one of the reasons why we want to have something that will give them citizenship in this country. We want to welcome them there. The more people we get in this country of the type that I have in my riding who vote for me—I think they vote for me—the better. I have many fine Ukrainians, Germans, Polish and Slavic people in my riding. These are the people that my hon. friend does not have in his riding. When they come to my riding in Toronto I want them to feel that they are welcome. This bill meets with my approval.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one word in answer to what the hon. gentleman has said. He asked me a question, and I should like to answer him right away.

Mr. FULTON: Give the minister a chance.

Mr. POULIOT: He will have his chance in a moment, but an hon. gentleman on that side of the house asked me a question. He asked me if I tried to educate the people of Ontario.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No; I did not ask the hon. member about the people of Ontario; I asked him about the people of his own riding. We do not need education.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to answer the hon. gentleman seriously. I can tell him that I have a thousand more friends in the province of Ontario than he has in the province of Quebec. In the second place—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not talking about the province of Ontario. I am asking about the people who come from foreign countries to my hon. friend's own riding.

Mr. POULIOT: I want to speak to the hon. member very seriously, and it will not be personal. I will remind him that in 1933 and 1934 I spoke for Mitch Hepburn in thirty-five counties of Ontario. I spoke with the Secretary of State; I spoke with his predecessor. I spoke in many places. I spoke in Toronto in French thirteen days before the election of 1935, and I told them that Quebec would be solidly Liberal.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Occasionally the hon. member is right.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes; but I was right in advance, and it carried weight. I wanted to inform the people of Ontario, not to educate them. What I regret with regard to the people of Ontario is not that they are not educated but that they are wrongly informed, which is altogether different; and there is no discrimination in that.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Has this anything to do with section 1?

Mr. POULIOT: I went there to inform them; and if I had gone to inform the constituents of my hon. friend, probably they would have been much less generous to him than they were. He was elected by such a small margin that he must be very complimentary to his constituents. I can only say about them that they are most indulgent. They are very fine people, but they are forgetful; they are charitable, and they are not always very proud.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not say that in a bad sense, but with the best possible meaning of the word. Down home I do not educate my constituents; I inform them.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, would you page Gilbert and Sullivan and let us get on with this.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask the hon. gentleman, who reminds me of a character we have all seen in the movies, the sea captain who played with Greta Garbo in her first picture, to let us finish this discussion. Afterward he can debunk someone, according to his own expression, though by the way that is something he has never done. In addition, I would tell the hon. member for Calgary West that he is a newcomer in this house, and that police court manners in this chamber are not interesting. But I will tell him that in spite of his white hair he can learn a lot, and with his intelligence I am surprised that he has not learned more quickly. I hope he will learn quicker in future, and then he will have an opportunity to educate St. Paul's.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Please, teacher, won't you help me?

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no, unless I am asked. Then I would be willing to do so, and I would do so very quickly. Now, sir, do you see the conceit of a member who says that he educates his people, meaning that they have no education? I strongly protest. It is an insult to all the constituents of the hon. member to say that he has educated them. In future, when he speaks English I hope he will be careful to use expressions that will not reflect upon his constituents, who have been so kind to him. In their name I protest most vehemently against the insult he has thrown in their faces, by saying he was educating them.

Mr. FLEMING: If my question has not been forgotten, and if the minister has had time to consider his answer, might the question be answered?

Mr. MARTIN: Apparently the hon. gentleman is quite worried. I hope he is not going to suggest that there should be a change in the elections act, because his anxiety has been rather disturbing. I hope that is not what he is going to propose, that we should change the elections act.

Mr. FLEMING: I have not proposed anything yet. I want to know what the minister proposes.

Mr. MARTIN: But the hon. member is so anxious, in spite of the fact that on six different occasions in this debate I have indicated, first, that this bill has nothing to do with the elections act and, second, that there is no intention on the part of this government to change the elections act. The persistence of my hon friend's question suggests to my mind that perhaps he is going to urge that we should change it. He points out an anomaly. Admittedly it is an anomaly, but it is no more anomalous now than it has been for the past twenty-seven years. Section 2 of the existing Immigration Act is the only legislation, except for the definition in the Canadian Nationals Act, which defines a certain class of Canadian citizens as citizens. Non-Canadian British subjects who came to Canada under the Immigration Act were allowed, under the elections act, to vote after they had been here for a year, and after they had resided in a given electoral district for two months continuously. They did not acquire citizenship under the Immigration Act until the end of five years. So that if there is an anomaly, and I say there is—as my hon. friend knows, he and I studied constitutional law from the same source, though apparently with different results and different measures of success—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTIN: I am not saying that in an unkindly way, because my hon. friend was an outstanding student, and he certainly excelled me. But obviously he has forgotten many of the things he studied so ably. The fact is that the British commonwealth itself presents many anomalies which in the light of pure constitutional theory are sometimes hard to understand or fully appreciate. There is the further fact that in the case of Cunningham versus Tomey Homma, 1903 Appeal Cases, page 151—my hon. friend, being a good lawyer, might want to look up that case—Lord Haldane observed:

> The term "political rights" used in the Canadian Naturalization Act is, as Walken J. very justly says, a very wide phrase, and their lordships concur in his observation that, whatever it means, it cannot be held to give necessarily a right to the suffrage in all or any of the provinces.

This had reference to a provincial elections act.

> In the history of this country the right to the franchise has been granted and withheld on a great number of grounds, conspicuously upon grounds of religious faith, yet no one has ever suggested that a person excluded from the franchise was not under allegiance to the sovereign.
> Could it be suggested that the province of British Columbia . . .

It had reference to a case in that province.

> . . . could not exclude an alien from the franchise in that province? Yet, if the mere mention of alienage in the enactment could make the law ultra vires, such a construction of s. 91, sub-s. 25, would involve that absurdity.

So that assuming that for the time being we overlook the operation of the Dominion Elections Act, under this decision and under other decisions subsequently the matter of the franchise in each province is a matter for that province, in so far as it affects provincial elections. Therefore, assuming something were done here which will not be done, you would have the anomaly of provincial laws giving to people who lived here for only one year the right to vote, when they would not enjoy that right under the federal statute in the hypothetical situation envisaged. So that I can only repeat the statement I have already made, that if there is an anomaly, it is one of the anomalies inherent in the constitutional set-up of this country and of the commonwealth itself.

While the hon. member for Temiscouata was making his contribution to-night—and I always enjoy listening to him, derive a great deal of benefit from what he says and, if he will permit my saying so, much pleasure—I had in mind the fact that I ought not to overlook the observations made by the hon. member for St. Paul's. I would simply remind him that in Australia, one of the important free countries within the commonwealth, there, as here, they have a provision whereby citizens for certain limited purposes are designated as such after having lived in the country—as in this country—for five years. They are, however, allowed to vote at the end of a year—again, as in this country. That may be anomalous, as it may be here—and has been since 1919, also for three years since 1910 and for two years before 1910. But that is the fact.

With regard to instructions to new citizens, perhaps the hon. member for St. Paul's was not in the house when I made my statement on second reading, at which time I indicated what it is intended to do in that regard, and what had been done thus far. I mentioned I had gone to a number of these ceremonies to try, perhaps not through my own presence, but more because of the office I hold, to lend some additional prestige to those ceremonies, and to make them somewhat more impressive for the applicants. I told the house of having attended a ceremony in Toronto, one presided over by Judge Parker, who has taken a great deal of interest in these matters.

I have also told the house that I believe there is much to be gained by making these ceremonies more impressive hereafter than they have been. It is also desirable that we should place in the hands of potential Canadian citizens of all groups—because the knowledge of potential Canadian citizens from all groups varies—in an exemplary and not in any compulsory way much of the information we regard as essential to good citizenship in this country.

When we come to the section dealing with ceremonies I shall deal with that in more detail, but I mention it now so that the hon. member for St. Paul's will not think I had spent too much time on the hon. member for Temiscouata and the hon. member for Eglinton.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall the section carry?

Mr. HAZEN: No. On second reading of the bill I referred to the preparatory conference attended by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe in 1929, and to the recommendations which were brought in by that conference and which were later placed before the house for approval. When I spoke on second reading of this bill I asked the Secretary of State if he would tell us if the provisions of this measure had been submitted to the other members of the commonwealth; if so, when were they submitted and what were their answers? The Secretary of State then said that he would give a fuller explanation of what took place and, using his own words, replied, "Yes, I shall give greater details later on." Is he now in a position to give us those details? We are now on the first section of the bill and I should like to know what took place.

Mr. MARTIN: It is true that I did promise to explain in greater detail, not because I did not want to do so earlier, but because I had no opportunity. When he was speaking I offered to do so, but because he did not wish to have his time taken, he suggested that my reply be made later. So that if an explanation has not been forthcoming earlier it has not been my fault.

As the hon. member has said, at the imperial conference of 1929 it was agreed that there should be consultation with regard to any change in the common status. In the first place, there is no change in the common status provision. In the second place, the bill we now have before the house was sent to all the parties to that conference.

In addition, last January officials of the Department of External Affairs had discussions with officials of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom; and as a result of those discussions I am in a position to say that they regard this bill as a model one. Likewise the bill went to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa. As I indicated to the house this afternoon, when I quoted the statement of the Prime Minister of Australia, they regard our bill as a model one, and propose to adopt its provisions. I do not think I can add anything further, unless the hon. member wants something more specific.

Mr. COLDWELL: Did it go to Eire?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. HAZEN: When was the bill sent to Australia, New Zealand and South Africa? The Secretary of State has said a reply was received from Australia. Was any reply received from New Zealand or from South Africa; if so, when?

Mr. MARTIN: The first intimation extended to all parties was in a telegram of September 27. A copy of the bill was sent on October 12.

Mr. HAZEN: The other question is: Were replies received from the governments of New Zealand and South Africa; if so, what were they?

Mr. MARTIN: There were no replies.

Mr. HAZEN: The minister did not get their consent to it, then?

Mr. MARTIN: Surely my hon. friend does not contend that this free parliament has to get their consent.

An hon. MEMBER: Since when?

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to quote what Doctor E. H. Coleman, who sits before the minister to-night, said when he appeared before a committee of the house on June 15, 1943. As reported at page 734 of Hansard, he said:

> But the point I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman, is that we are bound—perhaps not legally, but morally at least—not to make any fundamental changes in the act without consultation with the other dominions, which includes the United Kingdom.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right; and that consultation has taken place.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It was a Unitarian show, was it? You just wrote them, and got no reply. So you said, "Silence gives consent." Is that the argument being used?

An hon. MEMBER: That is right.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): And he does not need your help from back there.

Mr. MARTIN: I have explained to the hon. member that first of all an intimation of the provisions of the bill was sent by telegram and, second, the bill was sent on October 12. In other words, when we let other parties know, some of them saw fit to make comment, while others, for reasons of their own, had no comment to make.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Who made it and what? That is what we are trying to find out.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman must learn to be courteous if he expects a courteous reply.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): I am awfully sorry. If I do not seem to be courteous it may be merely my western ways. However, the minister is being a little difficult himself, so do not let us get excited.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman is a new member and as time goes on he will learn that sometimes friendship can be abused. I know he does not want that to happen.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Certainly not. Now, please teacher, adopt your own ethics and we shall get along all right.

Mr. HAZEN: There is another question I should like to put to the minister.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Will the minister be kind enough to tell me what addition is made by this bill to what we already had in our statutes? The purpose of this bill is to create a Canadian nationality, but we already have an act, of which I have a copy before me, entitled, "an act to define Canadian nationals and to provide for the renunciation of Canadian nationality." That act was passed in 1921. At the end of the act will be found a declaration of renunciation of Canadian nationality. We cannot renounce what we do not have. We already have in this country a Canadian nationality and I should like to know if anything is added by this bill. What is the difference between a Canadian national under the act of 1921 and a Canadian citizen under this bill?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman asks what is done by this bill that is not done by the existing law. First of all, what is the existing law? There are three relevant acts. First, there is the Naturalization Act. My hon. friend nods and I hope he does not mean that I should push on, because I do want him to see the difference. Under that act imperial naturalization certificates were extended to applicants. It had an extra-territorial effect. That is the Naturalization Act, of which the act of 1914 was an amendment. The Naturalization Act simply provided for the issuance of naturalization certificates to non-British subjects, people who sought entry into Canada through the Immigration Act.

Then there was the Canadian Nationals Act introduced into this house by the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Doherty. It is true that that act did seek to define for a specific purpose what we call a Canadian national.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): It was creating a Canadian nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend says that it was creating a Canadian nationality, but with great respect I say that it was not. What the act in its specific terms did was to give a definition of "Canadian citizenship" by reference. By reference to what? By reference to the Immigration Act, about which I shall have something to say in a moment.

We had become signatories to the peace treaties; we were members of the league of nations; we had adhered to the statute of the permanent court of international justice. Because there was no such designation in the the Immigration Act of a national the government of the day felt that in order to overcome what seemed to be a legal difficulty there should be an act called the Canadian Nationals Act which had as its purpose the enabling of Canadians to hold certain designated offices under some of the organizations set up by the treaties of peace. That was the purpose of that act. Speaking in the house, the then Minister of Justice indicated that it was intended to be nothing else. He was faced with the sort of questions that we have been faced with in this debate, that by trying to create a Canadian nationality we were breaking up the commonwealth and so on. In order that he would not be faced with that difficulty in the light of public opinion in this country twenty-seven years ago he brought in that act for those limited purposes. The important thing about the Canadian Nationals Act is that it really had no definition at all except for one minor purpose. Its definition of "citizenship" was a definition by reference to section 2 of the Immigration Act.

The anomalous position created as a result of the act of 1919 was that the only designation of citizenship in this country was to be found in the Immigration Act. No country in the world has ever defined its citizens by a similar measure. The result is that until this bill becomes law the only class of people who receive the legal designation of citizen are those people who come into Canada from the outside. In other words, the hon. member for Temiscouata, myself, and other hon. members in this house; my genial friend, the hon. member for Calgary West, for whom I have great affection, and many others in Canada are not now entitled to the legal designation of Canadian citizen. This bill will go one step farther than the provisions of the Immigration Act and the restricted meaning of the Canadian Nationals Act. As a result, all who are in fact citizens of Canada will achieve this status by law.

Another thing this bill will do is to remove another anomaly that can exist under the Canadian Nationals Act and the Immigration Act. A person who has never lived in Canada, who may live in Europe, who is the son or daughter of a Canadian national may under the provisions of the Canadian Nationals Act be granted a passport and yet under the provisions of the Immigration Act be denied entry into Canada. Imagine such a thing as a Canadian national being denied entry to his own country! That was the anomalous situation which created all kinds of confusion and it is one of the things which will be a matter of history when this bill becomes law.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): It has existed for twenty-seven years.

Mr. MARTIN: For twenty-seven years.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Time for a change.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): When the minister spoke in the house on October 22 he said:

> Despite what one often hears to the contrary, there has been a Canadian nationality.

As I understand it, this bill does not create a Canadian nationality because we had it before. We cannot create what we already have. As I stated before, there is a schedule in the Canadian Nationals Act which provides for the renunciation of Canadian nationality. We cannot renounce what we do not have. I want this cleared up. I contend that this bill does not create a Canadian nationality. As the minister says, it is a codification of many statutes. I agree with that statement, but it does not create a Canadian nationality because we already have that.

Mr. MARTIN: I do not want to get into a metaphysical argument with my hon. friend as to what nationality means. I can only say to him what I have already said, perhaps too often, and accentuate it a little by pointing out that the first point to be considered in reading together the two sections of the Canadian Nationals Act and the Immigration Act is that the present Canadian law provides for two distinct classes of person who would come under the definition of "Canadian." A person may be a Canadian national and a Canadian citizen. That is the law as it now stands and, as the hon. member for Calgary West has said, the time has come when we should change it.

The Canadian Nationals Act confines the class of Canadian citizens to persons born in Canada who have not become aliens and to naturalized subjects of His Majesty with Canadian domicile and to those who have been naturalized under the laws of Canada and who have not subsequently become aliens. The same act defines "Canadian domicile" to mean a landing in Canada within the meaning of the act. Listen to this:

> The wife of a Canadian citizen unless landed in Canada or born in Canada and the children of a Canadian citizen unless landed in Canada or born in Canada are thus excluded from the category of Canadian citizens although such wife and children are Canadian nationals within the meaning of the second act. For example, A is a Canadian citizen and a Canadian national under the two acts. He has a wife B and several minor children. These are not citizens unless born or landed in Canada. The whole family are Canadian nationals under the act . . .

Which my hon. friend says creates Canadian nationality. And so on. I might read thousands of cases where a real injustice has been perpetrated because of the confusion.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Is this bill extending Canadian nationality?

Mr. MARTIN: There was a limited definition of a Canadian citizen; there is now. We are here clarifying ambiguities, removing confusion and extending citizenship to a point where we make the paramount status of a Canadian that of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. FULTON: Following up this point as to consultation with the other dominions, the minister has said that this bill will make no fundamental change in the status of a British subject. I would refer him to the Naturalization Act, which is, I understand, a uniform act throughout all the member countries of the British commonwealth. By section 11 of that act as it now stands the Secretary of State of Canada can by certificate of naturalization create a British subject for Canada, and the same may be done by the Secretary of State or the corresponding minister of all other empire countries. That act was passed in 1914, and it provided that after the act was adopted by all member countries of the commonwealth they should have the power to create British subjects for their own country and for all other countries of the commonwealth. That act is to be revoked by the present measure before the house. I would ask the minister to explain how he can say that this act makes no fundamental change in the status of a British subject when that is the effect of this bill. One may say that a Canadian citizen will be a British subject, but if we revoke the Naturalization Act I submit that he is not a British subject in the other countries of the empire; and that is a fundamental change made in the status of a British subject.

Mr. MARTIN: When we come to section 28 I think I can show that it is not a change in result but in method.

Mr. HAZEN: Under our present act a woman marrying a British subject becomes a British subject. But under the proposed legislation that is not the case. Surely that is a fundamental change. I think the Secretary of State was playing with words a little when he replied to me a moment or two ago.

I should like to refer again to the preparatory conference that was held in 1929. At that conference certain recommendations were made. A resolution was brought into this house by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe to approve those recommendations, some of which will be found on page 713 of Hansard of this year. In 1930 the imperia conference was held. That conference app oved those recommendations, and the conclu ions which the conference reached were cor ained in a certain memorandum. The secon conclusion is this, and I quote from page 713 of Hansard of this year:

> That, if any changes are desired in the existing requirements for the common status, provision should be made for the maintenance of the common status, and the changes should only be introduced (in accordance with present practice) after consultation and agreement among the several members of the commonwealth.

It will be noted that it says not only after consultation but after consultation and agreement among the several members of the commonwealth. It is quite apparent from what the Minister of State said to me a moment or two ago that there has not been consultation and agreement among the several members of the commonwealth, and while perhaps it may not be absolutely legally necessary for that to be done, yet there is, I submit, a moral responsibility on the government to have not only consultation but an agreement with the other members of the commonwealth. It is quite apparent that that was not done. It seems to me that that step should have been taken before this bill was introduced into this house, and the Secretary of State and the government have slipped up in that respect.

Mr. MARTIN: I can quite appreciate my hon. friend's anxiety.

Mr. HAZEN: It is not anxiety.

Mr. MARTIN: Let us say his persistence, but the fact is that we sent a telegram to each of the responsible parties advising them of the principles of our bill and we sent them the bill itself on October 12 last. The hon. gentleman will appreciate that there are many things done, many exchanges, many acts by the various dominions. For instance, Australia has passed an act dealing with the status of women, providing for separate status. Australia did not advise Canada of that; Australia decided not to. South Africa made changes; South Africa did not consult Canada. All this was done since the conference of 1929. Consultation and agreement between the dominions do not mean that you have to have an airtight agreement such as you would have perhaps between Canada and a country outside the commonwealth. There is not that barrier between the countries of the commonwealth that exists between ourselves and certain other national groups, and consultation and agreement between the dominions have come to mean not an agreement under seal or anything of that sort but exactly what we have done. We have notified all the parties. One of them has had discussions with us and has mentioned that it regards the bill as a model one. We have also had intimations of the views of Australia in statements from their Prime Minister. I might point out that the United Kingdom amended their act in 1942 or 1943 and they followed exactly the practice that we followed here. They asked us by cablegram if we had any objection, and that is the course we have followed here. My hon. friend may be assured not only that the government has not slipped but that every precaution has been taken to live up to the constitutional practice in this matter.

Mr. POULIOT: Somebody one day was showing movies, but one thing had been forgotten. They forgot to turn the lights on inside the projector. I am reminded of that by this bill. What is it? It says:

> This act may be cited as the Canadian citizenship act.

What is citizenship? No one knows. It is not mentioned there. The title of the act reads:

> An act respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens.

This is evidently in accord with the various acts that are more or less brought together in this draft legislation. Well and good. But how can anyone discuss a draft like this unless he knows what he is talking about? No one can know what he is talking about unless the most important words, the words that form the basis of the legislation, are defined. There is an obvious reason for that. According to a decision of the privy council, the most magnificent speeches that are delivered in the house cannot be produced in court. The law speaks for itself, except that we have to consider jurisprudence. Let us consider the trouble to which a judge will be put the first time he has to interpret this piece of legislation where we do not find the definitions that are of the utmost importance, the guiding stars, the pillars of light, which we need in order to understand the new enactment. I urge the minister, therefore, to remove the fear of all difficulty, all misunderstanding, all quarrels and all litigation by defining "citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens." It may be said, "Go to the dictionary and see what Webster says."

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, no.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not say that the minister would say that. The minister is a man of too much legal science and experience to speak in that way to his colleagues. I am delighted and reassured by the fact that he has said no to that possible suggestion. The bill was brought down last year and was set aside and we have it again this year. We must make it a good bill or drop it pro tempore. Is the minister willing to define those four words that we find in the title of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: The words "Canadian citizen" are defined in sections 4, 5, 7, 9 and 10.

Mr. POULIOT: Just one moment. It is wrongly drafted and I do not put the blame on the minister.

Mr. MARTIN: It is my fault, if there is a fault.

Mr. POULIOT: No. The definitions should be in the interpretation section. We should not have to run through the bill to find definitions; they should be at the beginning. The corner-stone is not in the attic; it is down below. I would ask the minister to make some amendment. I will not bother about it, but I hope he will amend the bill for the sake of those who wish to take advantage of this legislation. The legislation should be clear. We have had enough discussion and the bill itself must be made clear. There must be no misunderstanding whatever. I thank the minister for what he has said, but a layman cannot go through the bill or understand it without having all the definitions together. That is a warning to all those who draft legislation. Our legislation is putrid; it is half-baked. We have reached the stage where a minor clerk can hand out anything to the Canadian people from his desk or over the telephone There must be a change and everyone must have respect for legislation. This is a thing I have insisted on for a long time. We are not ready to sponsor legislation if it is not decently drafted. If it is not properly drafted it should be left in the keg for some time to mature and improve like good wine.

Mr. FULTON: I was struck by the Secretary of State's definition of "consultation" and it cleared up in my mind some points as to the way things are decided within the cabinet and, perhaps, the consultation which goes on between, say, the wartime prices and trade board and the Minister of Finance before a decision is announced. That definition of "consultation" will, I think, clear up for many of us a good many of the anomalies we have found in announcements of government policy and the interpretation they receive by various ministers. I do not know whether the Secretary of State consulted his own previous statement before he made the statement this evening as to the anomalies which exist at present in the elections act and which will exist as a result of this bill, but he has frequently, indeed constantly, sought to refute the suggestion that after the passing of this measure the right to vote will be in no way dependent upon becoming a Canadian citizen. However, he said that the object of the bill is to define and establish the rights and duties of citizenship and to create in the minds of all of us a clear understanding of the great privileges which are involved in becoming a Canadian citizen. I would refer him to his words, which he uttered on moving the second reading of the bill, as reported at page 503 of Hansard:

> Under this bill we are seeking to establish clearly a basic and definite Canadian citizenship which will be the fundamental status upon which the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend.

I ask the Secretary of State this question: Is there any more fundamental right, any greater right, or one more inherent in citizenship than the right to vote? Is there any privilege which a Canadian citizen could value more than the privilege of casting his vote on election day, despite what the hon. member for Temiscouata says? If that is so, and I doubt whether the minister would deny it, then it seems to me it must logically follow that if the right is not in the elections act it must depend upon becoming a Canadian citizen. The minister said it is not his intention—

Mr. MARTIN: I said it was not the intention of the government.

Mr. FULTON: —to change the elections act. Is he prepared to retract the words I have read to him or to give them some explanation? At the moment I cannot reconcile his earlier words with the statement that it is not intended to change the elections act.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has placed an interpretation upon previous words of mine. That is his privilege. I do not think there is any difficulty at all. It is a difficulty which I am sure exists at the moment largely in his own mind. If there is an anomaly, and I do not deny that there is, it is an anomaly that has existed for twenty-seven years. It has been a definition of "Canadian citizenship" in the Immigration Act of this country. Under that act non-British subjects who have come to Canada and have been here for a year can vote at the end of that time under the Dominion Elections Act, although they do not acquire Canadian domicile under section 2 of the Immigration Act until they have been here for five years. That was an anomaly if you like. It was also perhaps anomalous—my hon. friend was not in the house when I referred to the case where the Lord Chancellor pointed out that the franchise is not necessarily—

Mr. FULTON: I was here.

Mr. MARTIN: I think he goes so far as to say it is not necessarily an inherent right or corollary or ancillary to the designation of citizenship. I may say that we have individuals in this country who will be citizens of Canada under this bill, but who will not be allowed to vote. They are judges and other officials. In the district of Columbia in the United States citizens of the United States are debarred from voting. These are anomalies, but they do not destroy the fundamental situation to which I have referred. If my hon. friend has words that I have used recently on another occasion I would want to look at them, and perhaps to-morrow or the next day I shall say whether the high refinement he mentions is or is not justified by the language.

Mr. FLEMING: In dealing earlier with the communications between this government and the governments of the other nations of the commonwealth, the Secretary of State did not mention specifically, as I recall it, Ireland. He is probably aware that it is suggested, and perhaps more than suggested, that certain sections of the bill had been drafted not merely in consultation with the government of Ireland or Eire, but at its request and that certain provisions had accordingly been inserted. Would the Secretary of State clear up that point because it is a matter of interest to the house in the light of information given thus far?

Mr. MARTIN: I can only say that no section of this bill was put in at the instigation of anyone outside the constituted authorities of the government of this country.

Mr. FLEMING: That statement in the paper was quite wrong?

Mr. MARTIN: To what statement is the hon. member referring?

Mr. FLEMING: I am referring to the Winnipeg Free Press. There was an article there on the subject.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I wish to make one comment on the point raised by the hon. member for St. John-Albert which, in my opinion, the Secretary of State brushed aside too lightly. I should like to come back to what was said by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, when he spoke about consultation and agreement. I do not suppose any of us will accuse Mr. Lapointe of derogating from the rights of anybody in this country. I would think that these two words which he used and which I think were clearly used in connection with this particular thing we are talking about were not used lightly. The minister says that we did have consultation. I am, like my seatmate, a new member here and probably I do not understand these high matters. All I have to say is that if this were a business transaction nothing that has been said would suggest that we have had the kind of consultation which business friends would have with each other. I will admit that a good deal depends on what was in the cable which was sent. If the cable was a full disclosure drawing attention to these points which I think are points of substance, then maybe I would find it satisfactory, and no answer having been received, probably it would cover the matter. It does seem to me that in the troubled state of the world at the present time this is a poor time to be showing anything but the greatest courtesy to those with whom we are associated. I come back to these words, used, I think, not lightly by Mr. Lapointe, and I wish to say that to me it seems like playing with words to say that we have had anything that can properly be called consultation.

Mr. REID: May I bring to the minister's attention a situation which still confronts those from Great Britain who are living in Canada, and will confront them after this bill passes. At the present time there are in this country well over one million persons who were born in the British isles. If they want to go across the line the United States immigration officer asks them where they were born. If they say, "Canada", they are passed through. If they say "Great Britain" they are stopped. They are looked upon as British subjects. After the bill passes, people from the British isles will receive, I believe, a certificate if they ask for it, just the same as others will. Therefore we shall have an anomaly there. Let us suppose that two people are going across the line. One has a certificate and the other has not. Then they may visit the old country. On the way back they will be challenged coming in. It will probably be no good for them to say: "I was in Canada long before the new bill went through." They will probably have to show their birth certificate and the date of entry even though they have been out of Canada for only one year.

Mr. COLDWELL: A passport would settle that so far as coming in is concerned.

Mr. REID: They may not require a passport after the severe regulations are done away with, because prior to the war one could visit the old country without a passport. That condition may prevail again when this bill is passed. I am going to suggest to the minister—and I should like his comment —that a certificate be given to all those who came here from the British isles prior to the bill being passed. I know that to-day anyone on the continent of Europe who could show a Canadian citizenship paper would be looked upon as having something equal to a passage to heaven. That is how precious anything Canadian would seem in the eyes of those on the continent. I ask the minister to give serious consideration to the granting of a certificate to the million or more Britishers who are in this country, and who were here prior to the passage of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: I am grateful to the hon. member for raising that point, because it affords me an opportunity to give some information on that, and perhaps I can do it now. I wrote a letter to-day to a prominent citizen of this country who is in exactly the class that my hon. friend mentions. Under the bill all British subjects domiciled in Canada will, upon the passage of this bill, become Canadian citizens. The question is asked, what provision is made for giving them certificates so that they can avoid the sometimes humiliating situations in which they find themselves? Perhaps at this point I might answer an inquiry that has been raised in the newspapers as to how a British person who has already been in Canada for five years or more would acquire a certificate if he wanted to get one. Such a person who has been here for five years or more would be a Canadian citizen automatically as soon as the bill comes into force. No naturalization procedure, nor any certificate will be necessary. However, many of these people will undoubtedly want to get certificates simply to have them as a matter of proof, and the bill provides for such situations.

Under section 11 (a) of the bill a certificate can be issued to quiet any doubt as to whether a person has the status of Canadian citizen. This does not require the whole naturalization procedure to be gone through all over again if the minister is satisfied that the person's claim is valid. In addition, under section 39 (i) regulations may be made as to "the manner of proof of Canadian citizenship and the granting of special certificates for such purpose". Under these regulations provision will certainly be made for British subjects who have become Canadian citizens without getting certificates but who later wish to acquire them.

Mr. HAZEN: Will the minister place on record the contents of the cables that were sent to other members of the British Commonwealth with regard to the provisions of this bill, or the reasons why he should not do so?

Mr. MARTIN: So far as I am personally concerned there is no objection, but the hon. gentleman knows that these are privileged documents. Consent of the other parties will have to be obtained. I shall make inquiries at once as to whether that consent is available from the other parties. If so, I see no reason for not tabling them.

Mr. COLDWELL: I have just one question. This afternoon the point was raised by an hon. member as to what the status of a citizen of Eire is in connection with the commonwealth at this time, and in particular with regard to this bill. That question has not been answered; it is an interesting one.

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. gentleman wish to deal with that now or when we come to the appropriate section?

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not mind.

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps it would be better to leave it; there is a section later under which that comes up. I am prepared to deal with it now or at that time, but it is an involved discussion. I am prepared for it, but I think it comes more appropriately under section 28.

Mr. COLDWELL: As long as the minister does not overlook it at that point.

Mr. MARTIN: If I do I know I shall be reminded.

Mr. COLDWELL: We shall not forget it.

Section agreed to.

On Section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to ask the minister a question with regard to paragraph (g) at the top of page 2, which gives a definition to "country of the British commonwealth." I am concerned particularly with the possible extension of the list of countries included in the first schedule to the act. Paragraph (g) reads:

> "country of the British commonwealth" means for the purposes of this act a country listed in the first schedule to this act or a country declared for the purposes of this act to be a country of the British commonwealth of nations by proclamation issued under this act, and includes, in the case of any such country, all colonies, dependencies or territories thereof.

I take it that if dominion status were accorded to India, for instance, the purpose of this section is to clothe the governor in council with power to include India within the number of countries embraced in the first schedule to the bill. There may be a question of draftsmanship raised here as well as the question of principle in regard to clothing the governor in council with very wide power to extend the list of member nations of the commonwealth set out in the first schedule. Is the Secretary of State satisfied that power has been clearly reserved in other sections of the bill to deal with this matter by proclamation? He will notice the words:

> . . . or a country declared for the purposes of this act to be a country of the British commonwealth of nations by proclamation issued under this act . . .

I wonder if the minister is satisfied, if the intention of this paragraph is to permit the inclusion of other countries which may acquire dominion status, that there is power elsewhere in the bill to accomplish that purpose by proclamation.

Mr. MARTIN: I can only say I am quite satisfied from discussions with the proper departments, External Affairs and Justice, that there is no doubt about our right under this section. My hon. friend will note that the phrase "country of the British commonwealth" is a term that has been carried over. There was no item in the definition of the old act, but the first schedule was the same in principle as the one in this bill. The first schedule to the old act was drawn up in 1914 and never changed. It is now brought up to date to cover the countries of the commonwealth.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about India?

Mr. FLEMING: If my hon. friend will permit me I want to be quite clear on this question as a matter of draftsmanship, and I am not raising this question lightly. I should think there would have to be found elsewhere in the bill some definite provision clothing the governor in council with power to do by proclamation what is referred to here. At the moment apparently the only provision in the act for such inclusion by proclamation is in these definitions, which seem to me insufficient for the purpose, so that I raise that question.

Mr. MARTIN: The difficulty is that now we are anticipating the other sections, but section 39 provides:

> The governor in council may make regulations generally for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of this act . . .

That is the enabling section.

Mr. FULTON: This is a specific power, and it does not appear there.

Mr. MARTIN: That is the section under which this will be done. With regard to the point made by the hon. member for Rosetown Biggar—

Mr. COLDWELL: What point?

Mr. MARTIN: In reference to India—I am glad he asked that question, because there has been some misapprehension in certain sections of the press on this very subject. A citizen of India or a resident in the colonies depends for his nationality status upon the common law of England and upon the United Kingdom British nationality and status of aliens act. The United Kingdom is one of the countries listed in the first schedule of this bill, and section 2 (g) states that when reference is made in the bill to a country of the British commonwealth it means a country listed in the schedule and includes, in the case of any such country, all colonies, dependencies or territories thereof. It is quite clear, therefore, that a person in the colonial empire or in India who is covered by the United Kingdom act and who is a British subject under that act will be recognized as a British subject under this bill. The hon. gentleman is likely referring to an editorial which appeared in Saturday Night. I can only say that the observations in that connection are clearly not in accordance with the fact, because the statement in the editorial that the intention of the present bill is to exclude East Indians from the status of British subject is clearly erroneous.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why not make it clear in our own bill? Why depend upon a British act to clarify the definition of "a British subject." Why should we refer to the United Kingdom and make the United Kingdom inclusive of a great dependency like India, for example?

Mr. MARTIN: There is a good historical reason. The list of countries included in the schedule are countries having their own nationality acts, and this arrangement not only is the result of several conferences but is conceived from the point of view of draftsmanship to be the effective way of dealing with the situation. My hon. friend will appreciate that this is a complicated measure. We gave consideration to that point, and after great consideration we thought this was the best and most effective way of dealing with it. When we come to another section I will show why that is so.

Mr. COLDWELL: The reason I have difficulty in my own mind in approving this particular method of dealing with it is this. Here we are setting up an act dealing particularly with Canadian citizenship. We are looking forward to establishing something which has been implicit for a long time, so they say, but which has never had statute law to support it.

Mr. MARTIN: Implicit for limited purposes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, for limited purposes. If we are doing that, then should we not go the whole distance and decide ourselves under this, our own bill, who shall be regarded as British subjects for the purposes of our own legislation?

Mr. MARTIN: That is specifically what we have done. These other countries have no acts of their own.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why refer to an act of the United Kingdom?

Mr. MARTIN: Because we are dealing with the question of common status. Perhaps on reflection my hon. friend will see that I am right, if he will think the matter over.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be glad to think it over.

Mr. MARTIN: I suggest that my hon. friend do so.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the minister says it is a complicated matter, and one's thoughts are not always clear on complicated matters.

Mr. LESAGE: I only wish to contradict the hon. member for Temiscouata, who said there was in the bill no definition of a Canadian citizen. In my opinion there is a definition in too many words. It is covered by sections 4, 5, 6, 7, and 9. It takes five sections to cover the definition.

Mr. POULIOT: Not a definition; a description.

Mr. LESAGE: The only true definition—and my colleague is right—that we can find is in section 2 (a), which says:

"Canadian citizen" means a person who is a Canadian citizen under this act.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely that is clear.

Mr. LESAGE: If hon. members of the committee will follow me, I might as well say, "'Apple tree' means a tree which is an apple tree in Canada." That is exactly the sort of definition we have here. It is completely useless and, to use the words sometimes used by the hon. member for Temiscouata, it is ridiculous. So that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Outremont:

That subsection (a) be removed and that the following subsections (b) to (n) inclusive be relettered (a) to (m) inclusive.

I say that subsection (a) should be removed; it does not mean a thing. After all, it costs money to print these bills.

Mr. MARTIN: All I can say is I agree with what my hon. friend says. However, he probably knows there is before the judicial committee a case which deals with this matter. This is a matter of drafting, and I have to rely upon the drafting officials, and the law officers of the crown. They have said that while there were definitions of a particular status by way of description in sections 4, 5, 9 and 10, in the interpretation section there should be some reference. The purpose of paragraph (a) is to satisfy that exigency of draftsmanship as conceived by the judicial committee in that particular case.

Mr. LESAGE: Could we not say: a "Canadian citizen, under this measure, is defined by sections 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9." That would mean something. But what we have here is ridiculous, where it simply states that a Canadian citizen means a person who is a Canadian citizen under this act. If the privy council has rendered a decision of that kind, then I am one who would want abolition of appeals to the privy council.

(Translation):

To elaborate on what I was saying a few moments ago, let me point out, Mr. Chairman, that we have for many years made a laughing stock of ourselves. There are ridiculous things in our statutes; this is a striking example of the sheerest absurdity, and we are going to leave it in our legislation.

Mr. POULIOT: I appreciate what has been said about sections 4, 5, 9 and 10, but that is not what I want. What I want is a definition of "citizenship", and there is none in the bill. What I want is a definition of nationality, and there is none in the bill. What I want is a definition of naturalization, and there is none in the bill. What I want is a definition of "status of aliens," and there is none in the bill. I think it is necessary to have these definitions. If it is not too late to-morrow, with the assistance of my able colleagues we may try to draft something to be offered at that time. In the meantime I should hope that the section might stand, to give us an opportunity to have those definitions.

Mr. MARTIN: One other very important reason, which I omitted to point out, is that there is a definition of "Canadian citizenship" under existing law, in the Immigration Act. This bill simply says that "Canadian citizen" means a person who is a Canadian citizen under this act.

Mr. LESAGE: How does it read?

Mr. MARTIN: It defines "Canadian citizenship." At a later time the minister in charge will introduce a bill to amend section 2 of the Immigration Act. But at the present time that section is still law.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): One of the purposes of the bill, it is said, is to clarify the definition of "Canadian citizenship". If one refers to the Immigration Act he will find a definition of "Canadian citizen" which is much clearer than the one before us in this bill; because if one wishes to find the definition of "Canadian citizen", as set out in this bill, he must read practically the whole of it. In the Immigration Act one finds a clear definition.

Mr. LESAGE: Read it.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I will read it. It states:

"Canadian citizen" means

(i) a person born in Canada who has not become an alien;

(ii) a British subject who has Canadian domicile; or

(iii) a person naturalized under the laws of Canada who has not subsequently become an alien or lost Canadian domicile.

Mr. LESAGE: A man is a man who is not dead.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): A man is a man, and a woman is a woman.

Mr. MARTIN: The definition my hon. friend has just read from section 2 of the Immigration Act is not a full definition. It does not deal with the hundreds of situations which will arise, where we shall have to determine whether or not a person is a citizen.. The reason we bring in this provision lies in the very inadequacy of the definition in the Immigration Act.

I do not wish to deal with the sections we have not yet reached, but I must point out that section 4 deals with one group of people who, on the passage of this measure, become Canadian citizens. Other citizens are in the same category. But the Immigration Act does not deal with them, and because it does not we have this section. So that I cannot agree with my hon. friend when he states that the Immigration Act contains a satisfactory definition. It is simply a general statement which, when one comes to apply it to a specific case, does not help at all.

Mr. LESAGE: A definition by contrast is not a definition, and a definition by similitude is not a definition. Can we not say that "a Canadian citizen" is defined by sections 4, 5, 6, 7 and 9 of the bill? That would mean something.

Mr. HAZEN: That is limiting.

Mr. LESAGE: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: Why refer to them, then? You refer only to those sections which relate to the definition of "Canadian citizen." Therefore you do not need to specify.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: Canadian citizen is a composite, taking all of us together.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I refer to the first name in the first schedule, namely the United Kingdom. What does that include? I understand it is now known as the United Kingdom and Northern Ireland. If so, should not "Northern Ireland" come after, "United Kingdom?" Then, does it include the Shetland islands, the Orkney islands, the Channel islands and the Isle of Man.

Mr. MARTIN: I have to rely upon the officials who give me this information when they tell me that in this classifiation we are using the proper drafting term.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then what does "Ireland" include?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked that question a while ago. My suggestion is that when we come to section 28 I shall deal with that in greater detail.

Mr. FLEMING: There may be times when persistence is not a virtue. However, I come back to the point I raised earlier, which was offered in the hope of assisting the minister. With great respect may I say that if the minister is relying upon section 39 to provide the necessary powers to extend the list of countries within the first schedule, then, in my humble estimation, the powers conferred by section 39 are not adequate for the purpose. That section empowers the governor in council to make regulations generally for carrying into effect the purposes and provisions of the bill. There is nothing in section 39 which expressly or by implication clothes the governor in council with power to extend the list of countries in the first schedule by proclamation. I suggest that this, being a matter of draftsmanship, might have further consideration. I suggest that there is some inadequacy in the draftsmanship.

Mr. MARTIN: I can only say that the Department of Justice advises us that the section is satisfactory. However, section 39 will not be reached to-night, and I shall give the matter further consideration.

THE ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. POULIOT: Stand.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a further question: What about Jamaica?

Mr. POULIOT: We shall have to teach the newcomer. What is Canadian citizenship? That is what they will ask us and we shall tell them to look at the bill. They will find that under the bill it means a person who is a Canadian citizen. They will have to read the whole bill to understand what it means, and when they have reached the end they will have forgotten the beginning. I do not wish to be unpleasant; far from it.

Mr. MARTIN: You are not unpleasant.

Mr. POULIOT: Thank you. The bill should contain a meaning. Some hon. members have spoken of immigrants from Europe and other countries to the east. The legislation should be clear. A description is not a definition. Before defining "Canadian citizenship" the word "citizenship" must be defined. There are different meanings of this word to be found in Webster's dictionary, in the Century dictionary published by the Encyclopaedia Britannica and in many other fine and complete dictionaries. We shall have to make our choice.

The great trouble is that we take definitions for granted without having them in a bill. It cannot be done like that and it is not good drafting to do it. I hold in my hand the Concise Oxford dictionary that is placed on the table for the use of hon. members. I should like to quote the definition of "citizen" that is given. I intend to give the definition contained in this dictionary, but if I go to the library and get Webster's I know I shall find another definition. Then there will be another definition in the Century dictionary, another one in the French encyclopaedia and so on. When we must refer to several sections of the bill to get the meaning of this word it simply means that a lot of embarrassment will be created for the people who must administer this legislation. Here is the definition of "citizen":

> Burgess, freeman, of city; townsman; civilian; member, native or naturalized, of a state (usu. of; c. of the world, cosmopolitan); inhabitant of. Hence citizenhood, citizenship.

Then there is the medieval meaning of citesein, and so on. That is not clear.

Mr. GRAYDON: The bill is an improvement on that.

Mr. POULIOT: Inasmuch as it is a repetition of the same word. I am not saying that we have been supplied with the best dictionary that there is. There are others more complete, but I am using this one because I have it at hand. I am sure my hon. friends realize the difficulty of the man on the street who wants to know what citizenship means and who looks at the dictionary. He finds "cosmopolitan", Cosmopolitan magazine. Here is the definition of nationality:

> Being national, national quality; patriotic sentiment; one's nation (what is his n.?); a nation (men of all nn.); existence as a nation; race forming part of one or more political nations (-ity).

Mr. MacNICOL: What does that mean?

Mr. POULIOT: It must be an abbreviation for some profane language. Will every man in Canada have to have a copy of this Oxford dictionary in order to understand this? Then here is the definition of "naturalize":

> Naturalize. Admit (alien) to citizenship; adopt (foreign word, custom & c.); introduce (animal, plant) into another country; become naturalized; free from conventions, make natural; free from the miraculous, place on naturalistic basis; pursue natural history. Hence naturalization.

Then there is the French "naturaliser". If hon. members are satisfied with that, they are easy to please. Let us see the definition of "status". I am not wasting time; I am just showing the trouble that every good Canadian, whether he is a citizen or not, will have when he goes to his dictionary to look up the meaning of "status". This is a new word referring to an autonomous nation under the Statute of Westminster. The definition given here is:

> Social position, rank, relation to others, relative importance, (his s. is a matter of doubt, their s. is wholly different, his s. among novelists); (Law) person's relation to others as fixed by law; position of affairs, esp. s. (in) quo, unchanged position.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, while the hon. member for Temiscouata is mumbling to himself might we not proceed with the bill? I wonder whether it matters a great deal whether the term "citizenship" is defined any more than it is here? My hon. friend has been talking about the man on the street wanting to know what is a Canadian citizen. I doubt whether any man on the street wants any definition of it. A man comes to Canada from some other country. He finds that he is not able to partake of all that is involved in citizenship; perhaps he finds that he cannot vote or that there is some other legal technicality to his disadvantage after he has begun his life in this country, and so he decides to become a Canadian citizen. He does not look through the bill to see what a Canadian citizen is because his own common sense tells him that he is not one; so he makes application. I think we are straining at a lot of little gnats that do not amount to a great deal. My hon. friend has now a bigger dictionary and it appears that he is going to read definitions out of that dictionary until eleven o'clock. Then, when he gets through with that dictionary I am sure that there is a bigger one somewhere, and if we go on in that way we shall never get through with this bill. I do not think the definition matters a great deal.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): Does the minister not think it may be confusing to leave the definition of "domicile" as it is now in paragraph (j)? The common law definition of "domicile" has nothing to do with duration of time at all. Therefore I suggest, in order to avoid any possible confusion, that the words "for the purposes of this act" be introduced after the first word "domicile" in paragraph (j). I suggest that the introduction of these words would remove any possibility of confusion.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MARTIN: I am prepared to accept that amendment. The words were in there originally, but the Justice Department thought they were not necessary.

Mr. FLEMING: They will do no harm in there.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie) agreed to.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would refer to paragraph (i), which reads:

> (i) "disability" means the incapacity of a minor, a lunatic or an idiot.

And then "minor" is defined in paragraph (l). I object to the inclusion of "minor" with lunatics and idiots.

Mr. MARTIN: This simply means that a minor, a person who has not reached the age of twenty-one, cannot apply for citizenship. They can acquire it through the father or the mother.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does not paragraph (l) cover minor sufficiently?

Mr. MARTIN: That merely defines one of the groups who are classed as a disabled group.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not like that definition of the word "minor". We have just had a war in which young persons, eighteen, nineteen and twenty years of age have borne arms for this country, and yet under this bill they are disabled from becoming citizens of the country.

Mr. FULTON: If they have borne arms they are eligible.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is true of those who have already borne arms, but I was thinking of minors who in the future might be made liable to bear arms. It seems to me that persons who are liable to bear arms ought not to be put under a disability under this bill. That is the point I was making. In some provinces in Canada, in Saskatchewan and Alberta, persons may vote before they are twenty-one years of age, at eighteen years in Saskatchewan and nineteen in Alberta. Yet under this bill they are disabled.

Mr. MARTIN: This would not affect the act in Saskatchewan.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know it would not but I say that in this bill I do not like the inclusion of a minor, who is a person under twenty-one years of age, in the same class with lunatics or idiots. I do not like that at all. When we may appeal to young men under twenty-one years of age to bear arms and when young men under twenty-one may already vote in two provinces, they should not be categorized in this way. I think that definition should be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: I may agree with everything the hon. member has said but until the governing acts are changed, this will have to stay in law. We have made provision in section 10 whereby they may make their applications at the age of eighteen. I have gone as far as I could and I hope that in the not too distant future we shall go farther.

Mr. MacNICOL: But is not the hon. member right in what he says that a minor who may be called upon to carry arms should not be classed with lunatics and idiots?

Mr. MARTIN: I have said that I agree, but I have pointed out that we cannot go any farther in this bill because of the governing acts. I have gone as far as I could by changing section 10 to enable them to make application at the age of eighteen.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nothing in this bill would prevent this house, when we come to amending the franchise act, from extending it to a person eighteen years old, because many of us are in favour of enfranchising minors who may be called upon to bear arms. Yet they are only eighteen-year old children under this act.

Mr. MARTIN: Quite right.

Mr. HAZEN: In what sections of the bill is the word "disability" found?

Mr. MARTIN: In section 13.

Section as amended agreed to.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Golding in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I simply wish to call two items: reconstruction, 604, and justice, 96. There are three departments now in supply and these are two more. I move that the items stand.

Items stand.

Progress reported.

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION—CANADIAN AND OTHER CONTRIBUTIONS—MOTOR VEHICLES

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on April 21 I made a statement concerning Canada's contribution to UNRRA since its commencement. At that time the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) asked if I would give the house a statement showing the number of automobiles and trucks which have been apportioned to each country.

At UNRRA headquarters in Washington the needs of the various recipient countries are considered, allocations are made of goods which are most urgently required, and orders placed among the contributing countries best able to supply.

At the request of UNRRA the Canadian Export Board has purchased, with Canadian funds, 3,888 trucks at an estimated cost of $6,756,357. In addition UNRRA has purchased with free funds 7,347 trucks and 22 ambulances at a cost of $13,282,221, or a total of 11,235 trucks.

In view of the tremendous destruction of the transportation systems in Europe and China, and the need to get supplies to distressed areas immediately, UNRRA urged that trucks be shipped as quickly as possible. I understand the actual allocation made by UNRRA was as follows: China 3,761; Yugoslavia, 2,204; Poland, 1,774; Czechoslovakia, 1,471; Greece, 1,229; Albania, 234; Italy, 50; Philippines, 2. The balance of 510 have not yet been allocated. The great majority of these were of course, military type trucks.

Mr. FRASER: Did they buy any of those from War Assets Corporation?

Mr. MacKINNON: No, I do not think so.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask a question in connection with UNRRA. I am not sure whether the minister has tabled information he promised before the Easter recess with respect to the contributions of the various nations under the UNRRA agreement.

Mr. MacKINNON: I do not remember making any such promise, although I remember the hon. member's asking the question. I believe however the information is being tabled by the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to be clear on the point, because when the question was asked the minister did not demur, and I took it for granted that some member of the government would answer. It is an important matter, and it was my understanding the government had given its undertaking that it would be done.

Mr. MacKINNON: I am informed the Department of External Affairs has the information in the course of preparation, and that it will be given to the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe I can promise that that will be done.

DAIRY PRODUCTS

SUBSIDIES

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I should like to reply to a question asked yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) respecting milk subsidies. An order in council was passed to-day making the subsidies continuous as of midnight to-night on the same basis as for the past year.

Mr. HOMUTH: For how long?

Mr. GARDINER: The order in council reads that it shall be for the year beginning April 1, 1946.

Mr. JOHN BRACKEN (Leader of the Opposition): The minister has referred to subsidies on milk. My question of yesterday was wider than that; it referred to dairy products. Has the government taken action with respect to other dairy products?

Mr. GARDINER: The subsidies on dairy products are on milk. That is, there is a subsidy of so much on milk entering into cheese production, a subsidy of so much on butterfat entering into butter production, and a subsidy of so much on whole milk and canned milk, thereby covering the whole list of dairy products. It is that which has been dealt with in the order in council. It covers the whole list.

Mr. BRACKEN: And the subsidies are the same as in the past.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, the subsidies on production are the same as in the past.

PRIVATE BILLS

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN OF CANADA

Mr. W. E. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce) moved the first reading of bill No. 30 (from the senate) to amend the act incorporating the National Council of Women of Canada.

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. HARRIS (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, the National Council of Women of Canada was incorporated in 1914, and in the past thirty-two years, by expanding its activities, has advanced the objects of that association. It now wishes to bring its act of incorporation up to date, to agree with the practices which have been invoked for some time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 37, for the relief of Marie Evelyn Dormer.—Mr. Boucher.

Bill No. 48, for the relief of Margaret Ruth Weir Allan.—Mr. Boucher.

OFFICIAL SECRETS ACT

REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT OF TRIAL OF MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. BENTLEY (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. In view of the desire of Canadians for a fair and democratic trial of a Canadian member of parliament accused of a serious offence, and the desirability of the accused's having legal counsel agreeable to himself—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not supposed to make a statement or to give information to the house when asking a question. If he has a question it should be brief and to the point.

Mr. BENTLEY: —will the minister consider setting the date of the trial at a time when Mr. D. N. Pritt, K.C., a member of parliament of Great Britain, can be present to represent the accused Canadian member of parliament?

Right Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The member of parliament referred to in the question having been committed for trial, the attorney general for the province in which the committal took place now has full legal control of the case. All the federal minister of justice could do, if he were so inclined, would be to ask the provincial minister if he would agree to a postponement. I must say, however, that I am not disposed to interfere with the course of the proceedings before the courts. Moreover I do not feel that the presence of Mr. Pritt is necessary to ensure that the accused will get a fair, or even a democratic, trial—if that is anything different from a fair trial. I understand that the accused is represented by Mr. Joseph Cohen, K.C., of Montreal, and Mr. Valmore Bienvenue, K.C., of Quebec, a former speaker of the legislative assembly of Quebec. They both came to see me some days ago about this matter. They are both eminent members of the bar of the province of Quebec. Mr. Pritt might not be allowed to appear in court for the accused and no federal authority could give him that right. The practice of law before the provincial courts is something that is exclusively within provincial jurisdiction.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAYS

RESTORATION OF PENSION RIGHTS OF CERTAIN EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ALISTAIR STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is he now prepared to report on the investigation into the restoration of pension rights for certain employees of the Canadian Pacific railway?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The report of the industrial relations officer has been received and has been referred for study to the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. A further announcement will be made when a reply is received.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I would remind the minister that that report was made last December. They are taking a long time.

Mr. MITCHELL: It does not matter if it was made five months ago last December; that is my answer to the question.

PARIS CONFERENCE

PRESS REPORT AS TO COMMONWEALTH REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister to a report which appeared in the New York Times of April 27, referring to the Foreign Ministers' conference now being held in Paris. It reads as follows:

> It must always be kept in mind that Mr. Bevin in Paris is talking not only for Great Britain but for the whole British commonwealth.

Is that correct?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know that I got my hon. friend's question, but I think it was to the effect that he wished to know whether the secretary of state for foreign affairs of the United Kingdom was representing all parts of the British commonwealth at the council of foreign ministers in Paris.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): All the commonwealth.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My understanding is that the secretary of state for foreign affairs of the United Kingdom is representing the United Kingdom and the United Kingdom only.

WHEAT

BONUS FOR SHIPMENTS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce what progress he has made with his colleagues in connection with the thirty cent bonus on wheat for immediate delivery for shipment overseas?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not had an opportunity as yet to take this up with my colleagues.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Monday, April 29, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose last night it was considering section 3.

On section 3—Declaration of Canadian citizenship an adequate statement of national status.

Mr. DORION: Section 3 reads:

> Where, under any act of the parliament of Canada, or an order or a regulation made under such act, a person is required to state or declare his national status—

A person might be asked to declare his national status, for instance, in connection with provincial legislation. I do not think this section covers all the ground. For example, in Quebec we have legislation dealing with Canadian nationals, which will be affected by this bill. In order to cover all cases I think there should be added after the words "of Canada" in the first line the words "or of any provincial legislature." That would make the section cover all legislation regarding Canadian citizenship in all the provinces, I move an amendment accordingly.

Mr. MARTIN: The amendment which the hon. gentleman is now proposing to the committee is one which I considered earlier. There is some difficulty in accepting it because provincial legislation coming within one of the enumerated sections of the British North America Act giving exclusive jurisdiction to the provinces is a matter which the courts might easily construe as one within the competence of this parliament. There is some point in what the hon. member has in mind, but I suggest that there is another way of meeting it. We could delete from the section as it now stands the words, "under any act of the parliament of Canada or an order or a regulation made under such act."

Mr. DORION: I think that would be much better.

Mr. MARTIN: I think it meets the point, and I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DORION: There is another amendment I should like to move. The section continues:

—any person who is a Canadian citizen under this act may state or declare himself to be a Canadian citizen—

That word of three letters "may" makes the section useless; it merely gives permission to somebody to declare himself a Canadian citizen. The word "may" is permissive; I think it should be changed to "shall". If somebody may state that he is a Canadian citizen, he may also state that he is something else. If we are to have Canadian citizenship we must have it complete. Therefore I move:

That the word "may" in the fourth line of section 3 be struck out and the word "shall" substituted therefor.

Mr. LALONDE: I recall that this very point was discussed in the debates on conscription and the National Resources Mobilization Act. Some members objected then to the use of the word "may", but the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe made it clear that in our parliamentary language "may" does not imply a sense of latitude but rather the responsibility of obligation, exactly the same as if the word "must" were used. I have no objection to the proposed change but I have always understood that in drafting our legislation "may" has exactly the same meaning as "must".

Mr. DORION: I disagree with the hon. member for Labelle, and in support of my contention I quote from a well known authority, Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, eighth edition, where at page 216 I find this:

Following the decision of the House of Lords in the preceding case, it was said that from the nature of the English language the word "may" can never mean "must," that it is only potential, and when it is employed there is another question to be decided, viz., whether there is anything that makes it the duty of the person on whom the power is conferred to exercise that power. If not, the exercise is discretionary. But when the power is coupled with a duty of the person to whom it is given to exercise it, then it is imperative.

Further on:

So, whenever a statute confers an authority to do a judicial act in a certain case, it is imperative on those so authorized to exercise the authority when the case arises and its exercise is duly applied for by a party interested and having a right to make the application, and the exercise depends, not on the discretion of the courts or judges, but upon proof of the particular case out of which the power arises.

In cases in which the donee of the power has only his own interests or convenience to consult, the word "may" is plainly permissive only, and a mere privilege or licence is conferred which he may exercise or not at pleasure.

I think that gives the exact meaning of the word "may", and that is why I moved the amendment.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not at all follow the argument of the hon. member for Labelle that "may" is the equivalent of "shall". If it were, we should need to revise half our statutes. The two words do not mean the same thing at all.

The section as it stands leaves it within the power of any Canadian citizen under the act, where under any existing statute or regulation he is required to state his national status, to say that he is a Canadian citizen or to reply in some other way. At the present time, if he were called upon to state his national status, his answer would be: I am a British subject resident in Canada. This section does not give him power to say either, "I am a Canadian citizen," or "I am a British subject resident in Canada." The purpose of the act being to give to British subjects resident in Canada the official status of a Canadian citizen, there would appear to be much merit in the proposal for amendment of this section, unless the minister can give some good reason why the change should not be made.

I offer this observation.

An amendment should also be considered with reference to the words "national status". We had a good deal of discussion last night about the desirability of introducing definitions into the act. The words "national status" are not defined. What do we mean by national status? To what is the scope of this section confined? When the national registration came into effect some four years ago every person in Canada over sixteen years of age was required to indicate his racial lineage. Had this measure been then in effect, those who were Canadian citizens would have wished to answer that they were Canadian citizens. Racial lineage, after all, was something not at all germane to the purpose of the national registration at that time. It seems to me to indicate the necessity for some broadening of the provisions of the section. If we are to confine the scope of the section simply to national status in a narrow sense, we shall not give to the term "Canadian citizen" its full significance. One can think also of questions arising in connection with the census. There has been undue emphasis, it seems to me, in the questions put to residents of Canada, on racial lineage. There may be good reasons from a statistical or other point of view why racial lineage should be given as an answer to a question in connection with the census. But as this section stands it is too narrow in its scope. We are giving too narrow a significance to the term "Canadian citizen" and to the status of Canadian citizenship if we confine the section to questions of national status as applied to any individual resident in Canada. There is need for broadening the scope of the section or for introduction into the bill of some definition of national status which will give a more appropriate signification than ordinarily attaches to the term.

Mr. LALONDE: I have no objection to the amendment proposed, but my contention was that in our parliamentary language "may" and "must" have the same meaning. I have every respect for the opinion quoted by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, and I am sorry that I have not before me the opinions of the high legal authorities cited by the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe at the time of the discussion I mentioned. But if the Secretary of State has no objection to making the change proposed, I shall not take up any more of the time of the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I remember very well the discussion to which the hon. member for Labelle has referred. When private individuals are enjoined by the word "may", it is permissive but as applied to the governor in council, or a department or an official of government, whether provincial or federal, "may" is not permissive but obligatory. On the basis of Maxwell and the interpretations referred to by the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay, "may" is always permissive when it refers to the individual.

With regard to the matter referred to by the hon. member for Eglinton, I should like to ascertain from the minister how he defines "national status" under this section, what definition the draftsman had in mind. "Status" might be legal condition, or legal position—these are the only definitions I can think of at the moment, but no doubt the Secretary of State will be able to give us the last word in the interpretation of this expression. If I understand it aright it does not cover the situation which arises from the census. Under the census—I have the forms here—every person, regardless of the number of generations he and his forbears have been in this country, is required to set out, first, his nationality or citizenship, and second, his racial origin. The hon. member for Eglinton says he thinks that to ask for racial origin for census purposes may have some value. But I cannot see it; because according to instructions given by the appropriate officers during the last census, if a woman of French origin marries a man of English origin she thereupon ceases to register as of French origin and becomes of English origin. I have the instructions here. If we are able to change our racial origin by the simple expedient of marriage, the statistics become valueless. As a matter of fact we have carried this question of racial origin so far that, if the Duke of Windsor had been in Canada when the last census took place and had had domicile by reason of his ranch in Alberta, he would have been required to register as a German in Canada while he would be English in the United Kingdom. A person coming back to Canada, regardless of the number of generations his people have been in this country, is required to register his paternal ancestry with the immigration authorities upon entering the dominion. Most hospitals in Canada require a person, on entering the hospital, first to give his citizenship and then his racial origin, as though there would be a difference in treatment according to his racial origin. In the United States that has been done away with, except as to colour or race. Racial origin is asked for only of a person who has been naturalized. "Race" is asked for as signifying the white race or the various coloured races; otherwise no information in regard to race is required.

If we allow this section to remain as it is, using the words "national status," the census authorities will be able to ask at the next census a question on racial origin, I suggest that, in order to clarify this matter once and for all, there be added to the words "national origin," the words "or racial origin." In other words, any person required to declare his national status or racial origin will be able to answer except so far as colour is concerned, or so far as naturalized citizens are concerned, by describing himself as "Canadian citizen". If this amendment were accepted it would clarify the section, and the amendment of the hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay would make it mandatory for Canadians to register as Canadians.

The CHAIRMAN: There is already one amendment before the committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have not offered an amendment; I have just suggested the acceptance of this proposal.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Charlevoix-Saguenay moves that the word "may" in the fourth line of section 3 be struck out and the word "shall" substituted therefor.

Mr. MARTIN: This argument is, of course, the argument which went on in the drafting of the bill. I have always held the view which the hon. member has, but some draftsmen take the view of the hon. member for Labelle. In the light of the discussion the government will be pleased to accept the suggestion made by the hon. member.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: May I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops:

That section 3 be amended by adding after the word "status" in line 35, the following words, "or racial origin."

Mr. LESAGE: I went to the United States last week. The immigration officer asked me what was my nationality. I said "Canadian citizen". He inscribed "Canadian citizen", but he said, "What is your racial origin?" I said, "White". He put down "White", and he was satisfied. But I had to give both. I do not think that when the racial origin is asked for it is sufficient to answer "Canadian citizen". I may be a negro and be a Canadian citizen, and my racial origin is "black"; I may be a Chinaman and be a Canadian citizen, and my racial origin is "yellow". There are not many racial origins. It is untrue to say that I am of the French race. I am of French descent; some others are of English or of Scottish descent. There are not a great number of races; there are white, black, yellow, red, brown.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the hon. member sure it is "white?" The Chinese believe it is "pink".

Mr. LESAGE: It may be.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MARTIN: No. There is a good deal of merit in what has been said by the hon. members for Eglinton and Lake Centre. The hon. member for Lake Centre, as he has demonstrated on many occasions in this house, is a good lawyer, and he knows perfectly well that it is not possible to envisage every kind of situation. What we are seeking to do is, as he stated, to avoid the carte blanche imposition of such questionnaires as he has referred to and others which I know about, as well, in the administration of my department. By "national status" we simply mean the sort of thing that has to do with the country to which the person owes his allegiance. I do not think the section should be amended to take care of the particular suggestions he has in mind; not that I am not fully appreciative of the points which he makes. But, having in mind the provisions of the other acts we have looked at and the experience of other countries, I think it would be better to leave the situation just as it is. I should have no objection to adding this—and I make it as a suggestion without undertaking to add it or to suggest that it should be added, but merely to argue the point. In order to have it conform to one of the latter sections, we might say "is required to state or declare his citizenship, nationality, or national status". That would help a little, but would not meet the point of the member for Lake Centre, but that is the extent to which I think we should go.

Mr. REID: In municipal and provincial elections many persons have been challenged at the poll on the ground of citizenship. I refer to those who come from European countries and have been granted naturalization. Under this bill, when a man appears to cast his vote, in a provincial election, and is asked by the presiding officer to produce his naturalization papers, exactly what will be his status?

Mr. MARTIN: No act of this parliament can affect the operation of a provincial act dealing with elections. That is one of the prerogatives given to the provinces. If, however, anyone is asked what his national status is, he will say in reply, pursuant to the passage of this section, that he is a Canadian citizen.

Mr. REID: Has the minister discussed this bill with the United States authorities? How will the United States treat citizens under the act if this bill becomes law?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has asked a question to which I am glad to reply. When the bill was prepared we thought it desirable to have the advantage of as many minds as possible. Officials of my department invited persons who have to do with the administration of the naturalization act and the citizenship act of the United States to give us the benefit of some of their experiences, and we also profited by the experience of others in other parts of the commonwealth. While I have no right to say what the United States will do by way of its laws, I have every assurance that our wishes in this matter will hereafter be fully respected.

Mr. McMASTER: I have often heard politicians on the hustings make statements which they do not believe to be true and do not intend to abide by, but when it comes to enacting law, surely we must mean what we say. If the bill is amended as suggested, this might result. A man comes, say from Poland, and after four years of intensive education, which the learned Secretary of State has said he will get, he has learned enough English and enough about our laws to become a Canadian citizen. How can he say that his racial origin is Canadian, seeing that he is only a naturalized Canadian citizen anyway? We should not say something which even an act of parliament cannot make true.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has expressed what I should have stated. It is a fuller answer than I gave to the member for Lake Centre. I agree with much that he says.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think it is any kind of answer, with due respect to both hon. gentlemen. There is no difference to-day in national status in this country by reason of this legislation. That was stated by the Secretary of State. People who were Canadian citizens before this bill was introduced are still Canadian citizens. Canadian citizen was accepted as a description of Canadians before this bill was introduced.

Mr. MARTIN: Only for a limited purpose.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: For what limited purpose?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman was not here last night.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I read what the minister said.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 2 of the immigration act did define citizenship for a limited group of persons. Citizenship under the immigration act was a definition of citizenship for those who came to Canada from outside. This bill goes beyond that and touches people who were born here, and British subjects who have acquired domicile here and will become citizens automatically on the passing of the bill. It covers a whole series of individuals who are not affected by section 2 of the immigration act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I fully realize that. A Canadian nationality was accepted by departments of government. You could register as a Canadian when you enlisted in the army, provided you were born in this country. Does the minister negative that suggestion? I see him bowing his head in a way which indicates that he does not agree.

Mr. MARTIN: Do you object to my bowing my head?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: After last night's experience and after reading Hansard it is difficult to know whether the minister wants any suggestions or wants any help in connection with the bill. I read what he said last night and it did not indicate that cooperation which he asked the house to give him in putting through the measure.

Mr. POULIOT: He thanked me for what I did for him.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, well; I read the hon. gentleman's contribution—

Mr. POULIOT: I did very little, and he appreciated it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the minister had any conversations with those in charge of the census which would indicate that from now on they will not ask native-born Canadians their racial origin at the time of registration? Because unless that assurance is given, this section is meaningless and the hopes of many people across the country as to what will result from the passing of the measure will be denied. If the minister has the assurance that that is going to follow, I do not care whether it says national status or what it says. If however he has not that assurance, then we shall be placing before the people of the country a bill translated into law which will lead them to believe that there will be a new citizenship without regard to racial origin, while at the same time retaining the one thing that has caused more difficulty than any other in attaining Canadian unity. The minister waved aside the suggestion when I raised it at first and said that it had been answered by the hon. member for High Park. I do not think it was answered. The minister is being praised across the country for doing away with a condition which holds back unity in Canada, and now when an opportunity is given to clarify the situation, since there is no definition of national status, he says: I cannot accept that at all, because apparently it would be going too far. My hon. friend mentioned the question of race a while ago. That is what I have in mind. If under the census the question of race is asked, as in the United States, then the various coloured races may so describe themselves, the Japanese and Chinese being required to describe themselves accordingly. But if under the guise of leading the people of this country to believe that a new Canadian nationality is to be established we continue by the back door to accentuate racial origin, then the act will be meaningless.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has just come back from his holiday, as we all have, and I want him to know that the very pleasant relations which have always prevailed between us continue, in spite of the recess. If I appeared to give another impression, certainly that was not my intention. One of the most encouraging things to me about this bill has been that right from the outset the hon. gentleman, with whom I took the liberty of talking about this matter, spoke of it in such high terms and gave me such support that I would not want that situation to be changed; and I assure him that is exactly the spirit in which I am continuing. Last night I had thought that I displayed very good humour, and I am sorry if that was not so. I want to say to the hon. gentleman that I share with him to the full the desirability of avoiding this business of origins, as he has indicated. Not only have I discussed this matter with the bureau of statistics and the minister under whose jurisdiction that comes; the new census, or for that matter any census, before it is carried out, must be approved by the executive arm of government, so I can tell the hon. gentleman that hereafter the sort of thing he complains about regarding national status, and I think very properly, will not happen.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Does that apply to the quinquennial census to be taken this year in the west?

Mr. MARTIN: It applies to every census after the passage of this bill in so far as national status is concerned.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): There will be one starting in June.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. FLEMING: As the discussion on this section has proceeded I am bound to say it has given me a certain measure of disquiet. I had assumed that this section had been carefully considered in relation to the problem we are now discussing; that is, the relationship of citizenship to racial origin. I entirely agree with what has been said as to the desirability of eliminating, as far as possible, considerations of racial origin, where these have been inimical to the development of a sense of national unity. I appreciate the suggestion of the Secretary of State that when it comes to inserting such words as "or racial origin" it may be a little difficult to say how far such an amendment might extend, but I had hoped consideration would have been given to that already. We have been told that very careful thought has been devoted to the draftsmanship and the principles of this bill. Census has been discussed. Census is an important question in relation to the matter we are now discussing, but I am not at all sure that it is the whole question. Other situations affecting racial origin could properly be dealt with on the basis of giving an answer in terms of citizenship.

I take it the purpose of this bill is to direct the thought of the people to Canadian citizenship rather than to matters of racial origin. Canadian citizenship is something we are all to have in common, something that will be a binding force in Canada, because it puts us all on a common footing and surely that is what we want. If we do not do it in this bill, I do not know where we are going to do it in relation to carrying that matter of citizenship, the thing we have in common, into those situations where we have not things in common, namely, questions of racial origin.

I suggest that further consideration be given to this section, and that it be held over in the meantime. We may be some time on the other sections. In the interval further consideration can be given to the relationship of section 3, as it now stands, to situations in which a citizen may be required to declare his racial origin. I do not think we should pass the section in the limited form in which it now appears. The words "national status" may have a narrow significance; and if they have, this bill if passed would fall far short of our hopes. If there are complications which the Secretary of State feels cannot be adequately foreseen at the moment in connection with the introduction of such words as "or racial origin" then I earnestly call upon him to postpone consideration of this section until it can be given further consideration. If we do not do something about putting aside considerations of racial origin in this measure, I do not know where we are going to do it. This section must be the place in which it is done. If we cannot foresee all the permutations and combinations which might then arise, I earnestly suggest that the section be held over for further consideration, if the minister will agree to do so.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think we should entirely do away with this question of racial origin, though I cannot see far enough ahead definitely to say so. I am of Scotch descent and I am proud of it, but I cannot think of any race whose people need be ashamed of their origin. They can all be proud of it; and I do not believe any member of any race who is not proud of that race will ever make a good Canadian.

Mr. FULTON: Carrying on from where the hon. member for High Park left off, I agree with him one hundred per cent; but what we are trying to do here is to make every Canadian proud of his Canadian citizenship. I think perhaps the trouble is that hon. members are not fully aware of what the hon. member for Lake Centre had in mind when he brought up this question of racial origin. If in the returns that we are required to make we perpetuate the racial origin, as that term is now understood, then we are making it impossible to be proud of being Canadian citizens and of being Canadians. I have here a page from the instructions to the census takers, issued at the time of the last census. The hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet brought to the attention of the house the fact that when he went into the United States the other day they asked his racial origin. He replied "white", and that was accepted. If that were all that was implied in connection with racial origin I should say it would be satisfactory. But the heading on page 44 of these instructions to census takers is, "Column 25—racial origin." If you look at the census form, column 25 is subjoined to column 24. Column 24 is headed "Nationality or citizenship", and column 25 is headed "Racial origin". Then on page 44 the instructions go on to say:

(1) What is racial origin? The word "race" signifies "descendants of a common ancestor."

(a) It is imperative to understand that a person's racial origin and nationality very often are different, for instance, the Canadian nationality comprises many different racial origins, e.g., English, French, Irish, Scottish, Welsh, Italian, German, et cetera.

That is what the hon. member for Lake Centre is talking about when he speaks about racial origin and the desirability of doing away with that in our census regulations.

(b) The name of a country from which a person came to Canada gives no indication of that person's racial origin, e.g., a person may have come to Canada from Austria, but may be Polish or German or Italian, et cetera . . .

(c) The word "Canadian" does not denote a racial origin, but a nationality; the same applies to the word "American."

Then I see this in paragraph 2:

(2) What determines racial origin? As a general rule a person's racial origin is to be traced through his father, e.g., if a person's father is English and his mother French the racial origin shall be entered as English, while a person whose father is French and whose mother is English shall be entered as French, and similarly for other combinations.

Racial origin, as so far understood in our departmental instructions, is taken to mean the country of origin of a person's father. We do not want that perpetuated. From now on a person is a Canadian, and if his father was a Canadian his racial origin is Canadian. If the hon. member for Eglinton is agreeable I do not think the matter should be left over. It should be settled now. If the minister will consider the point of view to which I have just referred, I believe he will agree that it is not sufficient to say that departmental instructions will be altered. We would like to see the alterations written into the act itself, and to help him do away with the distinction as to race in our new Canadian citizenship.

Mr. LESAGE: One very easy way would be to correct the census regulations so that they will give the true definition of racial origin, in contrast with the country of origin of ancestors. There is a difference between the country of origin of ancestors, and racial origin. That should be in the census regulations, and not in Canadian citizenship law.

Mr. FULTON: Why?

Mr. LESAGE: That is the law dealing with nationality. It does not deal with racial origin, or with racial origin of forefathers. We are now talking about citizenship, and if there is a question on the census form dealing with racial origin, and if such definition of racial origin is not correct, it should be changed there. We have no business to change it in a law dealing with citizenship.

Mr. FULTON: That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet has read the section, because section 3 says:

Where, under any act of the parliament of Canada—

Mr. LESAGE: No.

Mr. MARTIN: The words from "under" to "such act" have been deleted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Regardless of the omission, there is no difference in the import. It says that where under an order or a regulation made—

Mr. LESAGE: No, no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: This is what it says:

Where a person is required to state or declare his national status—

That does not alter the circumstances at all.

Mr. FLEMING: It broadens it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, as the hon. member for Eglinton points out, it actually broadens it, because it makes it more general, and does not restrict it to an act of parliament or an order or a regulation. It covers every possible contingency.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, all this discussion reminds me of the German theories respecting the Aryan race, which they say is superior to all other races. What do we care about the race of a man if he is a good citizen? A man may be born of parents who are in gaol, and still be an excellent citizen. He may suffer because of his parentage, but still be a good citizen—not always, of course, because there are some cases of heredity. But we must consider this matter from a different point of view, because we are supposed to show a democratic spirit. Here we are discussing this matter along exactly the same lines as were followed by Hitler's general staff, when they were organizing Hitler Germany.

There are some races to whom people in some parts of Canada object. Some of the people in British Columbia do not like the Japanese, and this is a controversial question in that part of Canada. In eastern Canada some other people are not interested in living with people from continental Europe. That, too, is a controversial matter. I am wondering if the best possible way to find new citizens would not be to consider their turn of mind, their disposition or inclination to help us make something out of this country. To my mind this is a vital and crucial point, although I respect the views of those who have discussed the matter of racial origin.

I would refer to my hon. friend from Vegreville, who is not of British or of French stock. But he is proud of his race, and his nationality is Canadian—period. He is a good Canadian, and the type of desirable citizen we need in this country. He is not the only one; there are many others. I wonder if he has any objection to the discussions of racial origin which inevitably result in discrimination. And those discussions of racial issues are carried on by whom? It is done by the master race, which has the privilege of telling all other races, "You do not belong to our master race." That is the German attitude. It can be said in English; it can be said in French; it can be said in Ukrainian; it can be said in Russian—it can be said in any other language. But as a democrat I do not care for it. I believe the time spent in discussing anyone's racial merits is lost time.

The best speech made in this debate was made by the hon. member for Saskatoon City, when he discussed the intermingling and mixing of races. I have been in Europe, and have known many people in England. There were a very few who thought that at the time of the coronation their only equals were the bombastic Germans. Blomberg was there, with his big chest, and was considered their equal by some of the English. But that was not the mentality or the opinion of the majority of the English people who were there. There is however a group of individuals who recognize the master race. There is a German point of view and there is an English point of view in some heads in England—and unfortunately in some heads in Canada, too.

This, precisely, is the main obstacle to national unity—the attitude of superiority on the part of men who think they are better than others, or who think that because they were born of certain parentage they are of better stock. This reminds me of the foolishness of the English clergyman who, writing a geneology of the present king, stated that King David was his ancestor, and that he was a cousin of our Lord. This was distributed at the time of the coronation, and I believe all hon. members who were there received a copy of it. Well, that may be so; but we are now in the twentieth century, and far from King David. We have to live with our contemporaries and we must make the best of it. Opinions are free, and of course matters connected with racial origin may be discussed. All hon. members have the same rights, and they may enter into the discussion if they wish. But I find that the basis of that discussion is wrong, and that it is dangerous and explosive. It will create animosity throughout the country. When one man says, "I am a big man and you are a little man," conditions are not good. If he is a big man because he belongs to a certain race, and the other fellow, who in fact may be greater than he is, is a minor fellow because he belongs to another race, then we have friction and trouble which may end in civil war. Very often such things are not said here in the house but they are written in papers which are circulated among the ignorant in an effort to create prejudices.

This sort of thing is seldom done in the old country. Even the leaders of the Orangemen, whom I have known and who were members of this parliament, would not do this sort of thing. One of these men whom I knew intimately wrote me a letter in French in his own handwriting. I knew him very well and I was about to convert him. Neither of them ever quoted in this house anything that had been written in their favour. They would have been ashamed to repeat in this House of Commons what had been written by their scribes in their own papers.

Since last evening I have discovered that science can be very weighty, and I did not attempt to bring with me the large Webster's dictionary which a friend of mine was kind enough to send over to me last evening. I shall try to make a contribution to this debate by putting on Hansard some of the definitions which I found in Webster's dictionary, and I think they will astound hon. members. When you put them all together it gives you a vue d'ensemble of the whole matter of citizenship, of nationhood and so on. The first definition is of "nation", and it reads as follows:

Nation: (2) People connected by supposed ties of blood generally manifested by community of language, religion and customs, and by a sense of common interest and inter-relation; thus, the Jews and the Gypsies are often called nations.

3. Popularly, any group of people having like institutions and customs and a sense of social homogeneity and mutual interest. Most nations are formed of agglomerations of tribes or peoples either of a common ethnic stock or of different stocks fused by long intercourse of single language or closely related dialects, a common religion, a common tradition and history, and a common sense of right and wrong, and a more or less compact territory, or typically characteristic;

That reminds me of the speech made in Boston by the former minister for air when he said that we should have one language. The definition continues:

—but one or more of these elements may be lacking and yet leave a group that from its community of interest and desire to lead a common life is called a nation.

Is it not agreeable to hon. members that they should consider seriously these definitions from Webster's?

4. Loosely, the body of inhabitants of a country united under a single independent government; a state.

7. One tribe of a group of Indian tribes; as, the Six Nations.

The next definition is of "nationality", and it reads as follows:

Nationality: 2. State, quality, or fact of belonging to, or being connected with a nation or state as by nativity or allegiance; as, nationality acquired by birth may be lost through naturalization in another country.

Nationality and citizenship may be different. The definition of "citizen" is as follows:

Citizen: 1. An inhabitant of a city or town, esp. one who enjoys its freedom and privileges as free man or burgess.

2. A member of a state; a person, native or naturalized, of either sex, who owes allegiance to a government, and is entitled to reciprocal protection from it;—opposed to alien.

Between the word citizen, answering in meaning to the Latin civis and the Greek polites, and the word subject, there is a fundamental distinction in meaning. Subject implies a master or lord to whom the subject owes a personal allegiance; citizen does not, but implies membership of, and the tie of loyalty to, a state, with the reciprocal right to the enjoyment of the privileges and protection flowing from these. A citizen as such is entitled to the protection of life, liberty, and property at home and abroad, but is not necessarily vested with the suffrage or other political rights. In the construction of statutes, citizen is sometimes made to include corporation.

That is very interesting. According to the definition of "citizen" given by Webster, it is a man who is endowed with civilian rights of a private character rather than public rights. The word has different meanings and the definition is not clear. The definitions I have given probably do not satisfy the minds of the hon. gentlemen who are honouring me by listening to me at the present time. The definition of "subject" is as follows:

Subject: 2. Under the power or dominion of another; specif., in international law owing allegiance to, or being a subject of a particular sovereign or state; as, Jamaica is subject to Great Britain. "Esau was never subject to Jacob." (Locke)

And then "alien":

Alien: 1. A person of another family, race, or nation; a foreigner, stranger.

2. One owing allegiance to another state, a foreign born resident of a country in which he does not possess the privileges of a citizen; also, loosely, a foreign born citizen.

And then "naturalization" and "naturalized":

Naturalization: 1. An act or process of naturalizing or state of being naturalized.

Naturalized: 2 (a) to confer the rights and privileges of a native subject or citizen on; to make as if native; to adopt (as an alien) into a state and place in the condition of a native subject or citizen.

Those are the definitions that I found in Webster's. I draw the attention of the committee to the fact that a distinction is made between the word "citizen", which is used often in connection with republics, and the word "subject", which is used mostly in connection with the inhabitants of kingdoms or possessions of a kingdom. We are a long way from the middle ages, but there are still many people who are subjects of a king. A subtle distinctions drawn between these two expressions, and I suggest to my colleagues that they have a look at them and endeavour to discuss this matter with an open mind and in the best possible spirit.

Some hon. members may be surprised at our insisting upon a definition, but there is a reason. I want this bill to satisfy my own mind and expectations. My idea of citizenship is very lofty. I agree to a certain extent with the hon. member for Vaudreuil-Soulanges, who is sponsoring legislation to come before us later to make more impressive the ceremony of adjudicating upon certificates of citizenship. If there is no definition of citizenship in the bill, if we do not agree to work together to draft a satisfactory definition of citizenship, there will be 244 definitions of it offered by the members of this committee. I say 244 instead of 245 because of the unavoidable absence of the former member for Parkdale, Doctor Bruce. Here we are and each member may have his own definition, and more than one; he may offer two; he may offer three; he may offer four, so that we may be confronted with a volume of definitions, so much so that nobody will understand any of them. What is this great privilege which we confer, for instance, upon some person coming to us from Czechoslovakia who has never heard before of democracy and citizenship, or upon some brave man from the steppes of Russia who never had an opportunity to vote for several candidates in the few elections held in his own country? Et cetera, et cetera, et cetera.

One has only to look at what is going on in the west where there are so many people of different races. They are doing well. They work together. They show a fine spirit of unison in promoting the interests of this country. Yet the western provinces are the least English and perhaps the least French of all the provinces of Canada. This shows that people may come to us from all over the world and join together with the common and definite purpose of making good here and of serving this country as good Canadians. That is our ambition for them.

What will be the immigration policy of this government, I do not know, and I am not interested in that at the present time. What I am now interested in is in finding ways and means of impressing those who come here from other countries that it is a great privilege to be a Canadian citizen because Canada is the finest country in the world. That must be impressed upon them, and they must be told in very clear language what citizenship is, so that they can abide by the law. If there is a good definition of citizenship in the act it will serve a good purpose because then there will be no ambiguity about it. The newcomer will be told: Here is your duty according to the law. Those who have been living in totalitarian countries do not care much about kings. They do not care much about some of the institutions which many Canadians cherish. But they do respect the law, and if we want them to act as good Canadian citizens they must know what the law is and they must abide by it.

I must tell you, Mr. Chairman, that during the past fifteen years I have not been enthusiastic about all the pieces of legislation that have been submitted to us. Some were wrong, and others which were good were wrongly drafted. This is the first opportunity I have to make good a piece of legislation which can better serve the definite purpose of uniting Canada than any lectures given by university professors or highly paid speakers who go round addressing the various clubs.

I have taken this matter to heart and discussed it with the hon. members for Charlevoix-Saguenay, and Jacques Cartier, and there is one definition of a Canadian citizen which has been arrived at. It is this. A Canadian citizen is a person who has a combination of public rights and duties. Another and more complete definition of citizenship would be a combination of public rights and duties of persons domiciled in Canada. Perhaps that is not complete, but it will serve as a basis for discussion, a much better basis than the discussion of racial origin, and it is very close to that which was given by the leader of the C.C.F. group. It refers to a Canadian subject. There is a shade of difference between a Canadian subject and a Canadian citizen, because in the definition of Canadian subject the link between the subject and the king appears. A Canadian subject would be one who by birth or by naturalization is a subject of His Majesty the King of Canada. That is another definition though it probably will not be agreed to by all the members. Opinions are free. The members who do not agree to it may have suggestions of their own to offer. We live in a free country, but the rule in a free country is the rule of the majority, and I do not see why an imposing majority of Canadians at heart should cater to a small and noisy minority of Canadians of different opinions, which may be respectable just the same. We are all here to decide what the act shall be. It may be unpleasant to some of us, but as we are here we have to submit to the rule of the majority. I did it so often myself that I understand it very well. I submitted to it even when I disagreed with everybody. It is the law of the country, and the only thing to do is to try to improve the law by making some suggestions. At the present time my contention is not at all that I am infallible in offering these definitions; it is a contribution to the discussion, and I invite most cordially my colleagues of all shades of opinion to make their discussion to the same effect, instead of discussing racial origins; it will serve a much better purpose. I hope in all earnestness for the good of the country that this will be done, and I hope the minister will be broad enough to accept the suggestion which will be supported by a majority of the members of parliament. It will be sent to the senate. Perhaps it will pass there; perhaps it will not. But the effect of getting together to find a formula will be an example of national unity to the people of Canada. How many times the people complain that nothing is done in the House of Commons. The other day my hon. friend the ex-leader of the opposition spoke of spiritual values. A clear enunciation in a limpid definition of "citizenship" will do more for national unity than one might suppose at first sight. The question has been considered seriously, I think, and I hope it will bear fruit.

Mr. McMASTER: This discussion has arisen, perhaps, unexpectedly. I would call the attention of the Secretary of State to the Statistics Act, chapter 190 of the revised statutes of Canada, in which provision is made for a census to be taken in June, 1931, and every tenth year thereafter. In section 19, provision is made as follows:

> Each census of population and agriculture shall be so taken as to ascertain with the utmost possible accuracy for the various territorial divisions of Canada, or of the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta as the case may be, > (a) their population and the classification thereof, as regards name, age, sex, conjugal condition, relation to head of household, nationality, race, education. . . .

So that the particular forms used by the census enumerators have the authority of statute. Again, I wish to say, because I have been opposed to this bill from the beginning as being unnecessary, that in the instructions given to the enumerators they were told that there was a Canadian citizenship. That is why I think this bill is not necessary to provide a Canadian citizenship—but for some other reason, which we shall probably discuss further.

Mr. CASE: A great deal of emphasis seems to be placed upon the census feature in relation to the bill. I take it that the object of Canadian citizenship is to seek to have Canadian citizens recognized under international law as Canadian citizens and to give them a greater sense of appreciation of their own country. I fail to see what objection there can be to declaring racial origin or national status. I look upon the census as a statistical record, and the more information it contains the better it will be for record purposes. I do not see that the provision is objectionable from the point of view that is being emphasized here to-day. As a matter of fact, almost everyone, surely, must be proud of his racial origin, and it is declared with the object of having the record that much more complete.

Mr. REID: I should like to say a word on this matter; I am inspired to do so by the remarks made by the hon. member for High Park.

A great deal has been said this afternoon regarding races and racial origins. But let us consider what we are intending to do; let us keep in mind as well the people in this country; for it is advisable, to my way of thinking, that we should take note of this amendment and be careful about letting it go through. There are in this country some thirty-six different races. I suppose someone will say that all are of the same race because all came from Adam, but hon. members know what I mean when I say that there are in Canada people from thirty-six different countries, and I can see nothing wrong, nothing detrimental to the idea of Canadian citizenship, that a man from Japan or China or Scotland should be asked to state from what country he comes. As a matter of fact, when one speaks of racial prejudice what do we actually find in this country? We find people whose ancestors came from Scotland or England or Germany, two, four, or five generations back who are more proud of the lands of their forefathers than even I, who come from Scotland. It is a well known fact, and it need no longer be concealed, that Great Britain during the recent war wished to move in on the south of Ireland. Britain would have had possession of the south of Ireland but for one thing—the great numbers of people in the United States whose forefathers came from the south of Ireland. Every second policeman in New York is an Irishman, and the political influence of these people, the second, third and fourth generations of Irishmen in the United States, had more effect on policy relating to the south of Ireland than any other factor. Great Britain was afraid to move in and take charge of the south of Ireland, as she should have done, for the safety of the country, at that time.

Consider, too, what Great Britain does. Those of us who come from the British isles know that, whether we are Scottish, English, Northern Irish, or Welsh, the births of the children are not registered as British, but Scottish children are registered as Scots, English children as English, Irish children as Irish, and Welsh children as Welsh. Has that caused any great discord in the British isles? I know there are those who would control one's even getting up to speak about racial origin, but have we no trust in the people? I come from a land where a man can stand on the street corner and talk about the churches, criticize the Roman Catholic church, denounce the Pope, talk about the Jews, or anything else under the sun, in full freedom. Does it arouse any animosity in the minds of the people of Great Britain? Where has there been fairer treatment for all nationalities than in Great Britain? Where has the Jew found surer rest for his feet and greater peace than in Great Britain? Yet you can go to the street corners or the parks and hear now, as for the last fifty years, people denouncing the Jews and talking against many other people; no one prevents them.

I am one of those who have faith in the people, and I am surprised at any member from British Columbia taking any other stand. Particularly I am surprised that the hon. member for Kamloops supports this amendment, in view of the stand he took regarding the Japanese. In my opinion there is no undue interference in the present procedure; we must have some guide or record regarding the thirty-six different peoples represented in this country.

Mr. MARTIN: I wish to rise for just one moment. The hon. member for Temiscouata raised the point which he discussed last night and since that time he has put a great deal of research on the matter. I would not want that research to go without some comment from me. He is to be commended for once again showing great industry, and the suggestions he has made will receive the fullest consideration at my hands. I want him to know that his words have been listened to with close attention and will receive further close study by me. Once again the hon. member has shown his capacity for deep research, and I commend him for it.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the minister very much for his kind words, and I will say that the Prime Minister must be congratulated upon having appointed him to the cabinet at the same time as the Minister of Transport was appointed. Both of them are doing very well; and I shall have something finer to tell the minister if he accepts the suggestion of any member of the committee who will come with a good definition of "citizenship" to give a real backbone to the bill.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): An immigrant, on going to the United States, within twenty-four hours of landing can say with justifiable pride "I am an American". An immigrant coming to this country has little chance to say, "I am a Canadian". That is going to stop and I hope that we shall all be known as Canadians. One of the most divisive forces we have is insistence on racial origin. I see no reason and no necessity for it at all. We are told that it is necessary for the purposes of the census. I doubt that. I have friends in western Canada who are of the third or fourth generation and who are still, as far as the census is concerned, referred to as Germans, Ukrainians, Scots and so on. They are Canadians. The steady insistence by governments as well as by business on this aspect of racial origin is, I think, detrimental to what we wish to see prevail in Canada, namely, genuine unity. I hope the minister will accept the suggestion of the hon. member for Lake Centre and add the three words "or racial origin" to this clause.

Mr. RICHARD (Gloucester): Is this discussion really necessary? Must we on this section go into the question of national status or racial origin? It seems to me that the section as it reads is clear enough. A man is asked what his national status is and he must state whether he is a Canadian citizen or not. It has no reference to racial origin. If there are other acts or regulations under which a man is asked what his racial origin is and he replies "Canadian citizen" he is not complying with that particular act or regulation. He is not answering the question there asked. That is all. As the section stands, it serves a purpose. A man in Canada is asked whether he is a Canadian subject; he is asked about his national status, and he need not go into the question of racial origin, because if he does so he is going into another sphere altogether. The clause should remain as it stands.

As to differentiating between racial origins, I am proud to be a Canadian citizen, but I am also proud to be of French origin, and I do not think we should drop that distinction altogether. For certain purposes we should retain it. There is no reason why, for the purposes of the census, our population should not be divided according to racial origin. I do not think there is any harm in that, nor do I believe it makes a man less a Canadian citizen simply because we divide the population according to racial origin purely for purposes of the census. I do not think the bill needs any amendment in that regard because the section is quite clear. For other purposes, so far as other acts are concerned, people can be guided by the provisions therein set out.

Amendment (Mr. Diefenbaker) negatived on division.

On section 4—Born before the commencement of the act.

Mr. MacNICOL: What about Indians who have left their tribes and have established themselves like the rest of us, or Indians who have served in His Majesty's forces? Are they automatically Canadian citizens by virtue of the fact that they were born here?

Mr. MARTIN: They are Canadian citizens. If an Indian was born in Canada he is a Canadian citizen. The section is clear.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the Six Nations Indians around Brantford? Are they regarded as Canadians? I believe they have some international status which enables them to cross the boundary with their own passports.

Mr. MARTIN: If they were born in Canada, then under the act they are Canadian citizens. There are two principles by which most countries determine citizenship, law of blood and law of the place of birth. We have a combination of both principles.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Conditions for retention of Canadian citizenship by persons born outside of Canada.

Mr. REID: Some explanation should be given of this section. When I spoke before I took exception to the fact that a child born outside the country is made a naturalized Canadian merely because either of its parents happened to have been born on a Canadian ship. It is certainly carrying national status pretty far when we confer it upon a child, making that child equal with a person born in Canada. I should ilke to see us adopt some regulation such as they have in the United States with regard to children born outside that country. After all, we are conferring Canadian nationality upon a child born in another country simply because one of its parents was born on a Canadian ship, and as I say, that is going too far. Let me read the provision that exists in the United States:

> A person born outside the United States and its outlying possessions of parents one of whom is a citizen of the United States who, prior to the birth of such person, has had ten years' residence in the United States or one of its outlying possessions, at least five of which were after attaining the age of sixteen years, the other being an alien; provided—

And here is the point I wish to emphasize.

> —that in order to retain such citizenship the child must reside in the United States or its outlying possessions for a period or periods totalling five years between the ages of thirteen and twenty-one years.

They stipulate there that a child cannot attain American citizenship at birth but must have had some residence, at some period, in the United States before it reaches the age of twenty-one. We should be careful in extending citizenship. I would ask the minister the reasons for extending citizenship as far as this bill goes.

Mr. MARTIN: The principle involved in the section to which the hon. member has referred is not a new one. It was in the old naturalization act even before 1914. In the act as it now stands it is found in section 3, subsection 5, so that it is not new. The principle is one that is recognized by most countries. I would refer to the "Consolidation of Nationality Laws", prepared by Hudson, which is recognized as the best English text on nationality laws, wherein the principle is discussed. The hon. member will find that in almost all countries which were represented at the Hague conference of 1930, the principle is accepted. It is accepted in all the dominions, and we consider the principle is too important to drop. The reason for it, in theory, I think is sound. The desire is, as far as possible, to keep the members of a family within the same national status group, without in any way imposing nationality upon them. It seems desirable that minor children, until such time as they have attained their majority, should have the nationality or the national status of their parents. As to the use of the words "Canadian ship", the hon. member will note that in paragraph (b) of the interpretation section that is defined to mean a ship of Canadian registry, which is a slight change. I can only repeat that the rule is an effort to keep members of the same family within the same national group as far as that is possible, without compulsion and without interfering with their rights, until they attain their majority. When we come to discuss subsequent sections of the bill it will be apparent that this does not mean that nationality acquired in this way cannot be rejected or withdrawn by the parties concerned. One of the main reasons for the section, and one of the most difficult things to administer in this kind of act, is the question of statelessness. In the Department of the Secretary of State and in the department of my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources we have thousands of pitiable cases of statelessness among children, and I should think this would be the most undesirable time to try to change this principle, particularly in view of conditions in Europe.

Mr. REID: Suppose a child was born in China, whose father had been born on a ship of Canadian registry. Is there no time limit in a case of that kind? Naturally China would confer citizenship on that child, owing to the fact that it was born in that country. Would that child retain Canadian nationality all the days of its life? Is there no time limit?

Mr. MARTIN: There is a time limit of two years in regard to registration. The birth must be registered within two years.

Section agreed to.

Section 7 agreed to.

On section 8—Child born after the death of his father.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is just one point in connection with this section. It seemed to us in discussing this matter, that something else should be added in connection with giving this status to a child. At the moment a person born on board a foreign ship in Canadian territorial waters would be considered to have been born in Canada. Is that not right?

Mr. MARTIN: I wonder if the hon. gentleman would mind repeating that question; I am sorry, I was otherwise engaged.

Mr. COLDWELL: A child born on board a ship in Canadian territorial waters—

Mr. MARTIN. A ship of Canadian registry?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, of foreign registry. Technically it would be born in Canada. There is nothing in the bill, it seemed to us when we were going through it, to cover that point. Should there not be something in the bill which would state that a child born on board a foreign ship in Canadian territorial waters should not be regarded as a Canadian citizen? It is quite conceivable that at some future time, under certain conditions that might exist, a child so born in Canadian territorial waters on a foreign ship might claim to be Canadian when it would not serve the interests of this country to recognize that person as of Canadian nationality. I raise that point because when we were going through the bill we thought it was not covered.

Mr. MARTIN: It is very funny that our minds should be working in the same direction.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not very funny.

Mr. MARTIN: No, it is not, because up to a point the hon. gentleman and I have the same type of liberalism. We cannot agree on everything, but one thing on which we do agree is that the hon. member for Peel is a very genial member; as to that there is no argument. What the hon. gentleman has said really applies to section 5. The point is interesting and not without some merit. I have in my hand an amendment which I have been thinking about, but according to the officers of the immigration department such cases are very rare. I think there have been two in about sixty years, and it would be perhaps the wrong thing to include a principle which seems to strike particularly at what Hudson says in his treatise. In view of the fact that the cases are very rare, perhaps I should not proceed with what I have been toying with to cover the particular case. Sometimes more is to be gained by dealing with broader questions than by trying to cover many things which in themselves are important but which in their context may not be so important. I think I had better leave it that way.

Mr. DORION: I believe there is a time limit missing from this section. As it reads now, if a child is born five years after the death of his father he is deemed to have been born before his father's death. I suggest to the minister that in our civil code we have a section which settles the question. I believe this section should be amended along the lines of section 218 of the civil code, which says:

> A child born on or after the one hundred and eightieth day after the marriage was solemnized or within three hundred days after its dissolution is held to have been conceived during marriage.

So that in this section I think after the word "father" should be added, "but within three hundred days after such death." That would mean something, I think.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has raised a point which I am afraid is away beyond my imagination. I do not see how a person could be the child of a father when that child is born five years after the father's death, though there may be something in medical science with which the Minister of Veterans Affairs has not yet made me acquainted. I believe the section is satisfactory as it stands.

Mr. DORION: I move that amendment, Mr. Chairman, because I think it is necessary.

Mr. MARTIN: Perhaps I had better explain why the section is there. As the committee will note, this is a new section. In the comments made about this bill in the "American Journal of International Law" some months ago it will be noted that this section was praised as an advanced section in nationality legislation. Incidentally, I am sure hon. members would profit from reading the article in that journal, because it comments on some of the outstanding features of this bill.

This section is new, and it is important because in certain cases where the father is a Canadian citizen but the mother is not the child is not deprived of his Canadian status merely because of the prenatal death of his father. It could be particularly important in times such as the war from which we have just emerged, when large numbers of Canadians were abroad on hazardous duties. The reason for the section is to give a posthumous child the status of his brothers and sisters born during the lifetime of his father. All the provincial statutes dealing with inheritance contain provisions placing the posthumous child on the same basis as children born during the father's lifetime. The mother may not necessarily be a Canadian citizen, since she may never have come to this country. On the other hand, by section 4(b) we are conferring Canadian citizenship upon the children of a father if the father was a natural-born Canadian. This will cover the situation of a Canadian soldier stationed, for example, in Belgium or Holland, and contracting marriage with a woman in one of those countries. Under the bill, while the father was alive, the child would be a natural-born Canadian citizen.

Mr. HACKETT: May I ask a question? All that has been suggested is—

Mr. MARTIN: May I finish this point, and state the reasons for the section. It would clearly be an injustice if, should the father be accidentally killed or die, a child born two days or a few months after his death would not enjoy the same status as other children. That is the purpose of the section.

Mr. HACKETT: What the hon. member has suggested is that in the first line of section 8 there should be added after the word "born" the words "within 300 days".

Mr. MARTIN: What is the point of that? Surely that is covered.

Mr. HACKETT: The point is to fix the date within which legitimacy is beyond question.

Mr. MARTIN: This section has nothing to do with legitimacy or illegitimacy.

Mr. HACKETT: I think it has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. MARTIN: No, it has not.

Mr. HACKETT: If a child were born out of wedlock it would not qualify here. The suggestion of the hon. member is one which would make it quite clear that a child born "within 300 days after the death of its father" would not be put to proof of nationality.

Mr. DORION: How long after the death of its father would a child be deemed to be born before the death of its father?

Mr. LESAGE: That is provincial law.

Mr. DORION: What would be the time for the purpose of this bill?

Mr. LESAGE: There are laws in the provinces concerning affiliation. We do not have to deal with that. All section 8 says is that where a child is born after the death of his father certain things shall take place. The question of knowing whether the man was or was not the father is one of affiliation, and that is a provincial matter. We have nothing to do with it. He either is or is not the father. To determine whether he is or is not is the duty of the provinces under provincial law.

Amendment (Mr. Dorion) negatived.

Section 8 agreed to.

On section 9—On commencement of the act.

Mr. FLEMING: I suggest that some clarification is required in subsection 1 at line 20. Section 9 (1) says:

> A person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen is a Canadian citizen if he . . .

Then we find paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), with nothing to link them. The Secretary of State will notice that at the end of paragraph (a) there is only a semi-colon, that at the end of paragraph (b) appears another semi-colon and the words "or, in the case of a woman". Is subsection 1 to be read as though these were conjunctive clauses? It seems to me there should be inserted after the semi-colon the word "and" or the word "or"; or if it is intended to cover it both ways, the words "and/or" should appear. A similar change may have to be made after paragraph (b).

This is a point of real importance, it seems to me, namely whether a person becomes a Canadian citizen technically if he complies with (a) or with (b), and does not have to comply with both.

Mr. MARTIN: Does the hon. member suggest that we should insert the word "or" between paragraphs (a) and (b)?

Mr. FLEMING: It has to be "or" or "and", depending on whether the minister intends that the stipulations in (a) and (b) should be cumulative or alternative.

Mr. MARTIN: They are alternative, of course.

Mr. FLEMING: Then, if they are alternative the word "or" will have to be inserted after the semi-colon in line 20.

Mr. MARTIN: I believe under the Interpretation Act when the conjunctive is used, there is no need for a change of this kind. However, I have no objection to adding the word "or."

Mr. FLEMING: It would clarify the meaning. Therefore I would move:

That the word "or" be added after the semi-colon in line 20 of section 9 (1) of the bill.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McMASTER: Would the minister explain paragraph (c)? I find it difficult to understand the meaning of it. Let us suppose this act were declared in force on June 1. Then let us suppose that on June 2 one of our soldiers overseas were to marry an English girl. Would she become a Canadian citizen?

Mr. MARTIN: She would not be a Canadian citizen automatically.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to refer to subsection 2 (a). I understand that many years ago there were two forms of naturalization. In the homesteading days in western Canada there was a residence of three years, at the end of which time those making application received certificates which were looked upon as naturalization certificates. Subsequently, however, when the imperial act was passed and we changed our naturalization procedure to conform with it, we stipulated a period of five years domicile before naturalization could be changed.

Mr. MARTIN: It was five years in 1919 and three years in 1910.

Mr. COLDWELL: Some of these people took out the second naturalization certificate. Should we not recognize the first certificate to this extent, that where the name of an applicant was included in a certificate of naturalization on, as stated here, "the date of the certificate", it should be the date of the earliest certificate?

Mr. MARTIN: I would call the hon. member's attention to section 2 (d) where it says that—

"Certificate of naturalization" means a certificate of naturalization granted under any act heretofore in force in Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: That covers the point I have just raised?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, that was the chief point we had in mind.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. COLDWELL: Then that satisfies me.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Grant of a certificate of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. FLEMING: This is a section of great importance. Up to the present time one might state fairly that there has been no disagreement in principle on the bill, although a number of textual amendments have been offered. But when we come to section 10 we have reached one of the leading sections in the bill. I suppose this section taken with section 26 would contain the nub of the bill, so far as debate is concerned.

May I draw the attention of the committee to the fact, first, that the bill contains no definition of "British subject". It has been indicated on all sides of the house that the correct interpretation of the term "British subject" is a person who owes allegiance to the crown. By section 28 it is made quite clear that such privileges as are extended to British subjects under this bill are confined to British subjects coming from one of the commonwealth countries. By section 28 these privileges are confined to those countries in the first schedule of the bill, which limits any benefits accruing to British subjects as such to those who come from the self-governing nations of the commonwealth. What I have to say relates to that class. We are not dealing with British subjects from other parts of the empire; we are dealing simply with British subjects from the self-governing nations of the commonwealth.

Mr. MARTIN: May I point out that this section deals with British subjects from all parts of the commonwealth. I do not wish to interfere with my hon. friend's argument, but I want him to know my point of view.

Mr. FLEMING: My remarks will be quite clear on that when I move the amendment which I propose to introduce. I draw to the attention of the committee the requirements of section 10. It will be found that it is permissive in empowering the minister, who is the Secretary of State, to grant a certificate of Canadian citizenship to any person who is not a Canadian citizen and who makes application for that purpose and satisfies the court that he has the qualifications within the terms of paragraphs (a) to (g) inclusive.

In a word, those qualifications are, first, that a declaration of intention to become a Canadian citizen should be filed; second, that the applicant has been lawfully admitted to Canada for permanent residence in Canada; third, that he has resided in Canada for a total period of five years, one of which must be the year immediately preceding the date of the application, and four years of which must be within a six-year period—I am omitting certain exception, to which I shall return later—fourth, that he is of good character; fifth, that he has an adequate knowledge of either the English or the French language, or, alternatively, that he has resided in Canada continuously for more than twenty years; sixth, that he has an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship, and, seventh, that he intends, if his application is granted. either to reside permanently in Canada or to enter or continue in the public service of Canada or of a province thereof.

I draw the attention of the committee to one or two exceptions which are made. Paragraph (a) makes an exception in the case of two classes of persons; first, the spouse of a Canadian citizen residing in Canada, that is, a husband or wife and, second, a British subject. Those are the two exceptions. If the applicant has either one or the other of those two attributes he is absolved from filing a declaration of intention. That is the only benefit that accrues to the British subject under subsection 1.

Mr. MARTIN: He still has the other rights which were mentioned, the right to vote and the right to old age pension.

Mr. FLEMING: We are dealing now with the acquisition of Canadian citizenship under this bill. I am pointing out that the one exception made by this section in favour of a British subject as such is that he is absolved from filing a declaration of intention under paragraph (a). That is the one difference provided by section 10, subsection 1, between an applicant who is a British subject and an applicant who is not a British subject. The filing of a declaration of intention can hardly be regarded as an onerous undertaking. It is merely the act of filing the declaration in a court office. That is the extent of the benefit extended to a British subject under this section in respect of his application for Canadian citizenship. If that section is enacted in its present form and the renowned Winston Churchill chose to take up residence in Canada, he could not become a Canadian citizen in less than five years.

Mr. MARTIN: Nor could he for the past twenty-seven years.

Mr. FLEMING: I am going to come to that point the minister has been raising. I suggest that what the minister has raised in what he has just said and in what he has said very often during the debate is simply a strawman and I am going to deal with it in a moment.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not a very good strawman either.

Mr. FLEMING: Reference has been made to persons who come to this country for temporary purposes. Yesterday the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said that people who had come to this country—this is, as I recall his remarks—from the British isles, not intending to make this country their final or permanent abode, up to the present time had rights of citizenship which, rightly speaking, should not be accorded to people who come for a period limited in point of time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not quite say that.

Mr. FLEMING: That is the sense in which I apprehended the remarks of the hon. gentleman. Whatever his meaning was, I think it is quite fair to say that no one, regardless of one year's residence or five years' residence, can qualify under this bill for Canadian citizenship unless he has established domicile here. Five years' residence is the minimum, but it is five years after he has acquired domicile within the definition of that term given in section 2 (j), which is as follows:

> "domicile" means the place in which a person has his home or in which he resides and to which he returns as his place of permanent abode and does not mean the place where he resides for a mere special or temporary purpose . . .

We can wash out all those cases to which I understood the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was referring. No one, whether a British subject or anything else, can acquire status under this bill to apply for Canadian citizenship or to begin to fulfil the necessary qualifications unless he has first established domicile. This means that he must have come to Canada with the firm intention of making this country his permanent home, that he has left the country of his origin with no intention of returning to it. That is the effect of this section. The applicant must first have established domicile in Canada and then, in order to qualify under the section dealing with Canadian domicile, he must thereafter have five years' residence.

If hon. members will look at section 10 (1) (g) they will see that he must have this permanent intention. That is reinforced by section 10 (1) (g) as well as by the section defining "domicile". So that we start with that point, that he must have come to this country with the intention of making it his permanent home. Then, domicile here having been established, the time of residence, which is five years in practically all cases or one year in two cases under this section, begins to run.

Let us ask ourselves what is the purpose of requiring five years' residence. In the first place, it is linked up to the subject of domicile because it gives full proof of the intention of establishing a settled residence. It is designed principally, however, to ensure that the applicant shall have learned the ways of this country, shall have absorbed its democratic methods and shall have shown sufficient proof that he will be assimilated into this country and especially to that end that he shall have learned one or other of the two official languages.

What is the position of a British subject in Canada at the present time under existing legislation? In the course of what I shall say in reply to that question I shall deal with the point raised by the Secretary of State.

The Naturalization Act has no application to British subjects. It applies to aliens. The effect of naturalization under the provisions of the Naturalization Act is to extend to an alien qualifying under that act the rights and status of a natural-born British subject. The Naturalization Act has no reference whatever to British subjects coming to Canada. No British subject has ever had to qualify under that act. It simply has no application to British subjects coming to this country. Section 4 empowers the minister to grant a certificate of naturalization to an alien, and section 5 of the Naturalization Act, in defining the effect of the grant of a certificate of naturalization, provides that as and from the date of the naturalization the applicant shall have to all intents and purposes the status of a natural-born British subject. In other words, the Naturalization Act has for its purpose the granting to aliens who satisfy the requirements of the act of a status equivalent to that of natural-born British subjects. Similarly, where a person who has obtained a certificate of naturalization forfeits it for any one of several reasons, section 16 provides that he ceases to be a British subject. So we have that quite clear. The Naturalization Act has never had any reference to British subjects coming to this country.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend does not suggest that I ever suggested it had?

Mr. FLEMING: No. I am trying to make clear that this bill, and especially section 10, with which we are now dealing, will make a great difference in the position and status of British subjects coming to this country. In other words, I am answering as directly as I can the point raised by the minister, and I must say with great respect that I completely differ with him in the view he has put before the committee.

Let us look for a moment at the elections act. We are assured by the minister that the government has no intention of changing the provisions of the elections act. At the present time that may hold out some hope that there will be no interference with the status in respect of franchise now granted to a British subject coming to this country who has established one year's residence here under the elections act. But, of course, we have agreement on the part of the minister, and I think this is known to us all, that there are anomalies about granting the right to vote to persons who are not citizens in the eyes of the country. I am sure that in the United States of America the idea of giving the franchise without citizenship would be regarded as a very strange and anomalous idea indeed. But whatever the anomaly may be, the anomaly is to continue. If section 10 (1) is left in its present form we are legislating an anomaly, when we compare the right to the franchise with citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN: Did my hon. friend read the judgment to which I referred last night?

Mr. FLEMING: I am acquainted with that judgment. There is no disagreement between the Secretary of State and myself as to the existence of the anomaly. As a matter of fact he admitted it last night. He pointed to other anomalies. Of course there are anomalies, and I am drawing to his attention that if we pass section 10 (1) in its present form we are legislating an anomaly, as to the existence of which the minister and I are in agreement.

I now turn to the Immigration Act. Here I come to the place where with great respect I hold quite a different view from that propounded in this house by the Secretary of State. He made reference to the fact that there has been a Canadian citizenship of a kind under the Immigration Act. He said that provision has been there for twenty-nine years and we are asked because of that fact to legislate in such a way that there would be no practical difference whatever in respect of application for citizenship between a British subject coming to this country and one coming from an alien land. That is the effect of section 10. If section 10 (1) is enacted in its present form there is no practical difference under this bill between the status of a British subject coming here from any other part of the commonwealth and that of a person coming to these shores from an alien land. The only advantage that is given to the British subject coming here from another part of the commonwealth is that he is absolved from the mere detail of filing a declaration of intention, which is no material difference at all.

Mr. MARTIN: Does my hon. friend not think he should add that the British subject will continue to have certain privileges—the right to vote, the right to old age pension, the right to be appointed to a civil service position, and so on? Those are privileges not given to any other group.

Mr. FLEMING: We are talking about citizenship, and I am pointing out, and it is incontrovertible, that if section 10(1) is adopted in its present form there is no material difference between the position of a British subject from another part of the commonwealth and the position of an alien from any other land when it comes to applying for Canadian citizenship. That is incontrovertible.

We are told that it is not the intention of the government to interfere with the franchise in the case of a British subject who has been here for one year and has qualified. But is that a guarantee that it will not be changed? The minister would not go any farther last night, when asked if he would clarify the government's position, than to say that it is not the intention of the government to introduce an amendment to the election act.

Mr. MARTIN: What more could I say?

Mr. FLEMING: Presumably the law can be changed even apart from an intention on the part of the government.

I come back to the Immigration Act. The Immigration Act is an act dealing with a particular field. It does not at all purport to be an act defining "Canadian citizenship" or the status of a Canadian citizen. The Secretary of State was much closer to the law, may I say with great respect, when he said this afternoon in reply to a question by the hon. member for Lake Centre that the definition of "Canadian citizenship" under the Immigration Act applies only to a limited number of those in this country who have the rights of citizenship. Are we to be told that the limited definition of "Canadian citizen" under the Immigration Act, put there for a very limited purpose in relation to immigration and not at all for the purpose of defining the rights and status of a Canadian citizen, and applying to a very limited class of those properly entitled to the rights of citizenship in this country, is an answer to those who say that if you enact section 10 in its present form you are to all intents and purposes putting the British subject coming here from some other part of the commonwealth in practically the same position as an alien?

Let us bear in mind that there is no proposal to interfere with the Immigration Act. Whatever is to be said in justification of the provision of the Immigration Act which makes persons admitted under that act liable to deportation within five years of their entry in certain events—whatever is to be said in support of that will continue to be said because that act is not to be interfered with. But we are not here dealing with the Immigration Act but rather with the question of establishing the terms of citizenship, those who are to qualify for it and the terms on which they should qualify and the rights and privileges which flow from Canadian citizenship. So let us not drag in any red herrings about the Immigration Act because the term "citizen" is not used at all in that act in the same sense in which it is used in this bill. So let us have no confusion. The two acts are separate and distinct.

Even in the face of the provisions of the Immigration Act, what was the position of a British subject coming to this country? On lawful admission he had the rights and privileges of any other citizen of this country. After a year's residence he acquired the right to the franchise. He had everything in the way of citizenship rights that any Canadian-born citizen had. The only distinction was that, in certain clearly defined events, under the Immigration Act he was subject to deportation within five years. What were those events? One was the health condition mentioned yesterday in the debate: if, for instance, he appeared to be insane and had to be confined to a mental institution, or if he was convicted of offences involving moral turpitude. Under those conditions he was liable to be deported within five years. But within that time he had the rights of citizenship. Therefore let it not be said that the position of a British subject, if section 10, subsection 1 comes into effect in its present form, will be the same as it is now or as it has been for the past twenty-nine years; because that is not so; that has not been the law.

Let us be very careful about immigration. I would be the last person in the world to suggest that we ought to relax in any way the restrictions of the kind referred to in the Immigration Act. Certainly we do not want the kind of restrictions to which I have referred to be relaxed, and we must be very careful in our selection of immigrants at the source. But I am putting this forward to establish what I think is an incontrovertible position, that if you enact section 10 in its present form you are taking from a British subject coming to this land from another part of the commonwealth something which he has at the present time.

Mr. MARTIN: What?

Mr. FLEMING: The right of citizenship after a year. All the rights of citizenship. Yes, his position is the same as that of a Canadian-born subject—

Mr. MARTIN: What right is taken away? Name one.

Mr. FLEMING: The right of citizenship in this country. The minister cannot, simply by saying to me, "Well, citizenship up to this time has been spelled with a small 'c' and in this bill it will be spelled with a big 'C' ", answer the point that I am making.

Mr. MARTIN: What right of citizenship is taken away?

Mr. FLEMING: He has every right of a citizen at the present time. He has the right to call himself a citizen of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: What right of citizenship is taken away?

Mr. FLEMING: He has the right to call himself a Canadian, because he has had all the rights of citizenship in the country. It is true that he was liable to deportation if he was admitted to a mental institution or had committed some offence involving moral turpitude; but he was a citizen and he was a Canadian.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. FLEMING: Well, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. MARTIN: We are in committee now. What right of citizenship does this bill take away from British subjects?

Mr. FLEMING: The right of citizenship; that is what. He has the right to-day to call himself a citizen of Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: After one year.

Mr. FLEMING: After one year.

Mr. MARTIN: What is the hon. member's authority for that?

Mr. FLEMING: Does the minister need authority for that?

Mr. MARTIN: I certainly do.

Mr. FLEMING: Let the minister look at the present legislation. A British citizen coming to this country at the present time has every privilege.

Mr. MARTIN: And he continues to have.

Mr. FLEMING: Including the privilege of the franchise, which any Canadian citizen has had. From this time on, if this bill with section 10, subsection 1, in its present form is adopted, there will be a distinction between a Canadian-born British subject and a British subject coming from another part of the commonwealth. To every intent and purpose, except for the mere trifle of filing a declaration of intention, a British subject from another part of the commonwealth is an alien applying for citizenship.

Mr. LESAGE: Why should he not be considered as an alien?

Mr. FLEMING: If you reduce to the vanishing point the privileges which go with partnership in the commonwealth, if you do not put any store upon the benefits which go with being a British subject in the commonwealth, then all right, do not give the British subject any advantage here. But if it means anything to be a British subject—

Mr. LESAGE: What does it mean?

Mr. FLEMING: If it means anything to enjoy in other parts of the commonwealth the privileges which the laws of the other parts of the commonwealth extend to British subjects, then I say that there is good and ample reason why we should accord a special status to British subjects coming to this country to make this their home, a status over and above that accorded to those coming from alien lands.

Mr. GLEN: Would the hon. member abolish the period for acquiring domicile as a British subject in this country?

Mr. FLEMING: The point which the minister has raised is a quite proper one, if I may say so, and the amendment I intend to move will deal with it.

I have said something about the effects of this bill in depriving a British subject who comes from other parts of the commonwealth of rights which he now enjoys, rights which come to him automatically because he is a British subject, and as introducing a discrimination which I think is bound to create feelings of humiliation. Let us examine what I have suggested in the light of the purposes, as I conceive them, of the five years' residence, to which I referred earlier. I suggested that the reason we want a five-year Canadian domicile in the case of applicants for Canadian citizenship is that we wish to be sure that they have absorbed our ways, that they are capable of fitting in with our democratic conceptions and that they have indicated a capacity for assimilation. Apply this to the British subject. First of all, what about language? A British subject coming from some other part of the commonwealth obviously speaks one of the two official languages of this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Not necessarily.

An hon. MEMBER: Not if he comes from Papua.

Mr. FLEMING: In the second place, I suggest that a British subject coming from the self-governing nations of the commonwealth does not need schooling in democracy. He is accustomed to looking at things from the point of view of the British traditional attitude toward democracy, the rights of the individual, his rights before the law, his right to equality before the law with all other citizens, his right to be self-governing, to determine the government by his vote at the ballot box. Surely we do not have to establish a school to train people with that background in the kind of thing we are proposing to establish by way of education for people coming from other lands.

Mr. LESAGE: What about the Americans?

Mr. FULTON: Answer that one yourself.

Mr. FLEMING: If the hon. member is suggesting that we ought to extend reciprocal citizenship to citizens of the United States, I do not know whether I am prepared to go that far, but if he will put the suggestion forward the house will perhaps give it serious consideration.

I return now to the answer I sought to give a moment ago to a question suggested by an hon. member opposite, when I said that it does means something to be a British subject—

Mr. MARTIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FLEMING: —when we have regard to the advantages which are extended to British subjects in other parts of the commonwealth. I must take issue with the Secretary of State in his suggestion that, after all, the position is the same in the other parts of the commonwealth; that after all, this bill is just about the same law as they have there. If that is the impression the committee has I believe a good deal of correction is needed. These other nations of the commonwealth, with the exception of Ireland, have not yet enacted anything comparable with our citizenship bill. In Australia, for instance, in New Zealand, in the United Kingdom, they have no citizenship act. They have legislation there in relation to the franchise. If the franchise is a badge of citizenship, then the situation is that a definite privilege is extended by the laws of these member nations of the commonwealth to British subjects. A Canadian going from Canada to take up residence there has a definite advantage in that regard over persons coming from alien lands. That certainly is an advantage and I hope we do not want to deprive any British subject of comparable advantages here. Even though we were to leave them the franchise there for a time, we still would have a discrimination if section 10 (1) is adopted in its present form, and that, I suggest, is an indefensible discrimination. How long can we expect our partners in the commonwealth to extend privileges to us as Canadians if we are not prepared to deal with them on a reciprocal basis.

In South Africa there is the aliens act of 1937. South Africa there makes a clear distinction between British subjects and those from alien lands; and it is so even in the case of the Irish legislation, to which reference was made earlier in the debate on the second reading, the Irish nationality and citizenship act of 1935 and the aliens act of 1935, which on the face of them appear to suggest that Irish citizens are not British subjects from that time on, and that British subjects are not to have special recognition of their status in Ireland. But as I tried to point out earlier, the aliens exemption order of 1935 was passed on the heels of that legislation to give to British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth reciprocal treatment. If this legislation is adopted, I suggest that you carry Ireland a step further out of the commonwealth.

I am offering an amendment to section 10 (1) of the bill. I am proposing that in paragraph (c) in line 25 there be inserted certain new words. The amendment is:

That section 10 (1) (c) be amended by inserting after the word "war" in line 25, the following words:

"or is a British subject within the meaning of section 28."

The effect of that amendment would be that in section 10 (1) (c), where we now have an exception made for certain classes of persons in reducing the residence requirement in their case from five years to one year, we add to the exceptions the case of a British subject coming from another part of the commonwealth. I say coming from another part of the commonwealth, because in the amendment we introduce the words "or is a British subject within the meaning of section 28", and that is the section which confines "commonwealth" to those nations within schedule 1 of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN: For purposes of clarification, does the hon. gentleman intend that by thus reducing the period from five years to one year, once that year has elapsed a British subject cannot be deported?

Mr. FLEMING: The amendment would have no such effect whatever. I made it clear that we are not here dealing with the Immigration Act at all. I said that my own personal view was that I should be the last to advocate the removal of the restrictions to which I have referred, those causes upon which the right of deportation arises.

Mr. MARTIN: So that you would deport citizens of Canada?

Mr. FLEMING: I am prepared to say that anyone coming in must comply with all the proper restrictions in regard to health and obedience to our laws as they are now set forth in principle in the Immigration Act, and anyone coming here must be guided accordingly for the term of the five-year requirement under the Immigration Act. If the time comes when it is possible to determine sufficiently the health problems that were referred to yesterday, and to determine them in a shorter period, well and good. But I am not suggesting for a moment that the grounds for deportation under the Immigration Act should be reduced, because I think it is reasonable that people who have committed and have been convicted of offences involving moral turpitude, or who have become confined to institutions for the mentally ill, should in proper cases be deported. I am not prepared to see that legislation used, however —and I wish to make this clear—in order to deport people who are out of employment through no fault of their own.

Mr. MARTIN: But you would deport a British subject who had acquired citizenship under your amendment.

Mr. FLEMING: Certainly, if that citizen commits an offence involving moral turpitude during the five-year period of the Immigration Act, or is confined to a mental institution. I do not suggest the abolition of these requirements. I am contending that the individual must establish domicile here. We are not proposing that this should open the door of citizenship to anyone who does not intend to make this his permanent home. He must establish domicile under the definition of "domicile" which we have in section 2, and that requirement is buttressed by section 10 (1) (g), which provides that he must, if his application is granted, indicate his intention of residing permanently in Canada.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Let us remember that in the bill there is already reserved to the minister the right to revoke citizenship in certain cases. If it is sound in principle to revoke citizenship in the cases referred to in this bill, why should it not be possible to revoke citizenship within the period referred to in the Immigration Act for the causes I have mentioned, namely, conviction of an offence involving moral turpitude or confinement to a mental institution. I do not see the slightest distinction in principle between the case referred to by the minister and that provided for elsewhere in the act as a ground for the revocation of citizenship.

I call attention to section 21, subsection 1 (c), where we find this provision:

> 21. (1) The governor in council may order that any person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the minister, he is satisfied that the said person either
> (c) has, within five years after becoming a Canadian citizen, been sentenced by any court in Canada to imprisonment for a term of not less than twelve months.

There you have the same thing. A sentence of twelve months is ground for revocation of the certificate of citizenship under the bill introduced by the minister. Is there, then, any difficulty on the part of the minister, in the face of that, in accepting the principle that a Canadian citizen within the five-year period referred to in the Immigration Act should be liable to loss of certificate of Canadian citizenship if he commits an offence involving moral turpitude or is confined in an institution for the mentally ill?

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

INMATES OF INSTITUTIONS FOR THE POOR

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the Dominion Elections Act, 1938.—Mr. Fair.

Hon. PAUL MARTIN (Secretary of State): Before this motion is dealt with, Mr. Speaker, I have had an opportunity of discussing this matter with the hon. gentleman, and without in any way at this moment expressing the attitude of the government with regard to the matter may I say that in all probability next session a committee will be set up to deal with the elections act. So that in view of that possibility it does seem to me that it would be better to let this matter stand over until next session. Then, in the event a committee is set up, which I expect will be the case, this matter could be referred to that committee for consideration.

Mr. FAIR: With the definite understanding that this bill will be brought in and considered next session I am agreeable to the suggestion made by the Secretary of State.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Veterans Affairs): May I say there can be no definite understanding. There will be such action as may be possible in view of the circumstances prevailing at the time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. gentleman may have the privilege of withdrawing his bill?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Bill withdrawn and order discharged.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

COMMISSIONS TO AGENTS IN CONNECTION WITH SALE OF WHEAT

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River) moved the second reading of bill No. 5, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board Act was passed in 1935 after practically everybody in Canada, I believe, became satisfied that our marketing system, that is the grain exchange, had broken down. It was found necessary to pass that legislation; and while to a certain extent it is satisfactory to most farmers, there are still some things in it which should be rectified. In order to rectify some of these matters, I have on more than one occasion introduced the present amendment to the act. The relevant paragraphs of section 8 read as follows:

8. It shall be the duty of the board—

(h) to give effect to any order in council that may be passed with respect to its operations;

(i) in selling and disposing of wheat as by this act provided, to utilize and employ without discrimination such marketing agencies, including commission merchants, brokers, elevator men, exporters and other persons engaged in or operating facilities for the selling and handling of wheat, as the board in its discretion may determine;

(j) to offer wheat for sale in the markets of the world through the established channels: Provided that the board may, if in its opinion any existing agencies are not operating satisfactorily, take such steps as it deems expedient to establish, utilize and employ its own or other marketing agencies or channels.

This ties the wheat board down to using the established channels. It is my opinion that this should not be so, that we are keeping in existence in Winnipeg an organization which is detrimental to agriculture, to farmers all over Canada and to other citizens of this country. Therefore I have introduced the following amendment, striking out paragraphs (h), (i) and (j) and substituting the following:

(h) subject to the provisions of paragraph (i) of this section, to give effect to any order in council that may be passed with respect to its operations;

(i) in selling and disposing of wheat as by this act provided, to employ such methods, consistent with the provisions of paragraph (b) of this section, as will not involve the payment, directly or indirectly, of any commission or other remuneration to commission merchants, brokers or other marketing agencies.

The direct purpose of this bill is to eliminate the payment of commissions to brokers or other individuals, but the indirect purpose of the amendment is to do away forever with the grain exchange at Winnipeg. We consider that this step is long overdue and that the soonér it is taken the better. Those who profit by the operations of the Winnipeg grain exchange have boosted it as the best method of disposing of our grain. I am not satisfied that it is the best method, and intend to prove this before I have finished. Under the grain exchange system we have had grain prices going up or down as much as twenty cents a bushel without any actual change in the supplies of grain available within the country. It is quite certain that as long as a condition of this kind is allowed to exist, the farming industry cannot be on a sound or solid basis. During the first three or four months of each crop year, commencing August 1 of each year, we find from seventy to seventy-five per cent of the grain delivered to market; but because of the hedging of this grain as well as the selling of millions of bushels of paper wheat, that is wheat which does not exist in the country, wheat never sown and never grown, we find that grain prices have been forced down considerably. As a result, the very farmers who are most in need of higher prices have been compelled to take lower prices and sooner or later forced off their farms.

Most of these futures were bought by speculators, many of whom did not know the tricks of the grain trade; and unless those speculators were in attendance it was not possible for the grain exchange to carry on very successfully. We find that many types of citizens, including farmers, workers, teachers, lawyers, doctors and even preachers were in the grain exchange for the express purpose of making money. But in many instances we find that ninety per cent or ninety-five per cent of those people were skinned, and were losers in this racket. It would seem, however, that the racket is legalized, and one wonders why many other rackets in the country are not legalized.

For instance, let us consider the black market in meat, which exists at the present time. A good deal of fuss is being made about this racket. Why is it not legalized, if the grain exchange is legalized? The futures system, we find, provides protection for the banks, the millers and the elevator companies; but it entirely disregards the interests of the producers. In my opinion it is the interests of those producers which should be protected, first of all, because if we have not food we find that things do not go along very well in this or in any other country.

Those who claim that trading in futures is a satisfactory manner of marketing our grain should explain, before this debate concludes, why under a system of futures trading away back in the thirties our grain on the Winnipeg grain exchange went down to 38½ cents a bushel. In my part of the country this meant a price of 19½ cents a bushel for the best grain grown anywhere in the world.

When that condition existed many thousands of farmers lost the savings of a lifetime, and were out on the road without even their farms on which to live. These men were told that futures trading provides markets. This is not a fact. When Mr. Turgeon made his investigation he, too, said that it was not a fact. This is what I find at page 183 of the report of the royal grain inquiry commission of 1938:

I have mentioned the "imperfections" of the futures trading system, and I know that, in the eyes of many, the greatest of these is its dependence upon the speculator. And the fact must be faced that this dependence, while not absolute, is substantial not only in Winnipeg but in Liverpool, as the evidence shows. It has well been said that there are only three classes of buyers in the wheat market: (1) those who have immediate need of the wheat; (2) hedgers who buy to insure their transactions, and (3) speculators who buy and hold in the hope of making profits but also at the risk of making losses. When buyers of this last class are absent, or are present only in small numbers, the market becomes weak and prices fall. This was the situation which existed in 1931 when the government was urged to send somebody into the market to take the speculator's place, and the situation was met by the institution of stabilization measures.

Then, again, the opinion of the three wheat pool organizations was placed before the royal commission in this way, at page 39 of the same report:

We are satisfied that the futures market does cause fluctuations not justified by the supply and demand for wheat, and this fluctuating price does not necessarily reflect world value. Indeed, it would appear to be true to say that the futures market is not a system of intelligent merchandising; it is merely an example of irresponsible mob blundering. This tendency toward instability in price, which many farmers are convinced is aggravated by speculation, is one of the most serious indictments numerous farmers level against the futures market.

I may say the wheat pools are still of the same opinion, because during the past winter and spring months those wheat pools, and practically every other farm organization in western Canada, passed resolutions demanding that the grain exchange at Winnipeg be closed and the present wheat board be continued in operation. I believe the government also agrees that the grain exchange should be closed, because away back in 1935, when conditions forced them to, the wheat board was set up, and is still in operation.

It is perhaps also worthy of note to know that all the grain exchanges in the world were closed during the war. If it is necessary and if it is good business to close those exchanges during the war, then why not in peace time as well because, while we have had a good deal of trouble in winning the war, the winning of the peace may be a bigger problem than some of us at present realize?

In 1942, according to the best information I have been able to obtain, there were on the Winnipeg grain exchange 109 operators, 85 of whom traded in futures and 24 in cash wheat. I understand that for many years a number of those men have been subsidized by the farmers, directly or indirectly, whichever way you wish to put it, and that they are waiting for those happy days to come back again. Many of them are collecting commissions on grain they never sold. This is not right. All along they have been collecting on grain that some members of the organizations sold, but also in the past they have collected on paper sales.

I think it is time this subsidization of a number of parasites should be done away with. Let them find employment while it can be found; let them get off the backs of the farmers where, at the present time, they have attached themselves as leeches. It is important that at this time Canadian farmers have purchasing power, because I believe we shall find in the near future we shall be scrambling again for markets for those industries operating in Canada. There is no better market for Canadian products than that found on our farms to-day. For that reason, therefore, it is important that the farmers have purchasing power.

Back in 1938 when the farm machinery industry was under investigation we were told that 70 per cent of farm machinery was being sold in western Canada. If we out there do not have more money to buy, then Canadian manufacturers will have to look somewhere else for markets.

Some of those who are agitating for the existence of the grain exchange tell us that we are ten cents to twelve cents a bushel better off because of the operations of the exchange. However, according to information I secured only a short time ago, the operations of the futures market means that we are getting ten to twelve cents a bushel less taken from us than before the operations of that system. If we were told, or if those in charge were good enough to tell us the cost to us of the operations of the exchange, outside of commissions being paid, I feel that many of us would be greatly surprised.

Fluctuations in grain prices in past years have constituted the second greatest cause of the farmers' defeat. Drought was the greatest, and price fluctuation was the second greatest. The farmers are continually gambling against odds against which they have no protection. We have dry weather, wet weather, frost, rust, hail, grasshoppers and several other pests. Then we have legislation which is permitted to stand on our statute books; and one more pest in this industry is that of gambling on the grain exchange. So that again I say: Remove this bloodsucker from the backs of the farmers of Canada.

Many commissions, I believe eighteen in all, have endorsed the principle of trading in grain futures. I am not at all surprised at that because in the past certain people have endorsed the principles of slavery, child labour, and longer hours of work, as many as twelve hours a day in some instances. It is time that we brought our system up to date. These things are not allowed any longer, and we should remove one more injustice by doing away forever with the operations of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

I could go on for quite a long time, but I expect there will be many other hon. members who will want to speak on this bill, including many who will want to talk it out rather than give it a fair democratic trial. When the arguments have been presented perhaps later on in the debate I shall have an opportunity to answer the objections that will be raised. With that I must take my seat and see what other hon. members have to say.

Mr. R. N. JUTRAS (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was introduced at the last session I tried very hard to take part in the discussion but I was unable to do so because of the time limit. It came up on a Tuesday last session just as it has at this session. I am gratified to have an opportunity of saying a few words on this question which I consider to be of great importance, especially to the farmers of western Canada.

I listened with a great deal of interest to what the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) has just said. I have made quite a study of this subject. At the time he introduced the bill for first reading I was surprised to note that most of his time was taken up in condemning the grain exchange as such. As far as I can see, this bill deals exclusively with the Canadian wheat board; it is an amendment to the Canadian Wheat Board Act. I am not unmindful of what implications there may be from the operations of the board that affect the grain exchange, but I think we should be more concerned with the effect that this bill will have on the Canadian wheat board than on the effect it may have on the Winnipeg grain exchange.

There are various ways of dealing with the grain exchange as such, and I am certainly not of the opinion that the onus of closing that exchange should be placed upon the Canadian wheat board. I think all hon. members will agree that this board has done a magnificent job since the start of the war. We should be careful before we start tampering with the organization or the administration of the board.

Before dealing further with this contentious matter, I should like to place on record a few words which I feel will meet with the approval of all hon. members, particularly those who come from western Canada. I wish to refer briefly to the manner in which the officials of the Canadian wheat board have discharged their duties and to commend particularly the chairman of the board for the efficient and obliging manner in which he has discharged his responsibilities as chief commissioner of the board since 1938. All those who have had dealings with Mr. McIvor will appreciate the full implications of my remark. To my mind, he has done a great job since the date of his appointment, and more particularly during the war. One has but to look at the reports of the wheat board to appreciate the extent of his responsibilities. In spite of his heavy duties as chief commissioner he has agreed repeatedly to serve on various committees. Hon. members will have noticed that he was the first to speak at the conference in London. He has been serving as chairman of the combined food board since January, 1943, and he has served his country well on the emergency grain transportation committee since 1943. After eight years as chief commissioner he is still the affable business man, anxious to help his fellowmen and keenly interested in showing a favourable balance sheet at the end of the year. It is no accident that he enjoys the confidence of his organization and his fellowmen.

I wish also to commend Doctor Grindley, as well as many others whom I do not happen to know personally but whose good work has attracted our attention. I should like to refer particularly to the field inspectors in my province. They deserve commendation for their responsible sense of duty and their sincere desire to have the administration of the board above reproach.

Mr. BURTON: Why not compliment the farmers who raised the wheat?

Mr. JUTRAS: I shall come to that afterward.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not stick to the subject?

Mr. JUTRAS: I am perfectly in order and I resent that remark very much. If this bill does not deal with the Canadian wheat board, I do not know what it deals with. The trouble with most of the discussion so far has been that it referred to the grain exchange and there is no mention whatsoever in the bill of the grain exchange. Then the hon. member remarked that this bill would be talked out. Surely he was not referring to the present speaker because I certainly cannot be accused of having taken too much of the time of this house. Those who say, "No, no," certainly cannot say the same. If the hon. member is seized at all with the importance of this bill he would not try to rush it through in one or even two hours. If the bill is so insignificant that it can be rushed through the house in half an hour or in an hour and a half, it is not worth considering. If it has any value at all it should be considered for at least a few hours and more than one member on the opposite side of the house given an opportunity of discussing it.

Mr. BURTON: All I was asking you to do was to give the farmers a little credit.

Mr. JUTRAS: I shall come to the farmers in due course.

Mr. BURTON: They are always left at the tail end.

Mr. JUTRAS: I think I am quite capable of organizing my own speech, if you do not mind.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: You must admit that the bill has been before the house for two years.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is talking about what?

Mr. JUTRAS: I resent the fact that every time we rise to say something we are accused of talking out a bill. I do not think any hon. member should be permitted to impute a motive like that, especially at the beginning of a discussion.

I was referring to the Canadian wheat board and I repeat that that board has done a magnificent job. There is no one more grateful to the Canadian wheat board than the farmers of western Canada. My reason for rising to-night is to defend the farmers of western Canada and to see that there is no tinkering with the Canadian wheat board so as to impair its efficiency. I ask hon members to bear with me for a while and be quiet. I know I have had to stay silent when hon. members across the chamber were speaking. I have had to put up with that kind of thing and I ask that they give me the same courtesy that I have to them.

I was referring to the field inspectors of the Canadian wheat board. I am very glad to give them credit for the work they have done and for the sense of duty they have shown. Theirs has been a big achievement and is in part responsible for the confidence which the Canadian wheat board enjoys to-day among the producers in western Canada. These officials are out on the road every day inspecting the various elevators and talking to the farmers coming to the elevators, and it is only fair that we should recognize the good work they have done. I repeat again that it is no small achievement, and we must give them credit if they have been able to win the confidence of the producer.

Coming now to the bill itself, I have read all the speeches that have been made on this subject at the last session. Very little was said about the Canadian wheat board; in fact there were only two or three references to it. There was a long dissertation condemning the Winnipeg grain exchange, but the other speakers who followed the sponsor of the bill confined themselves to extolling the great humanitarian and social benefits flowing from the grain exchange. We should be concerned primarily with the wheat board itself. I propose first to examine the amendment and then to analyse briefly the financial report of the Canadian wheat board.

The first contention of the sponsor of the bill is that it will, to use his own words, free the officials of the wheat board from some of the restrictions which have been imposed upon them. The new proposed paragraph (i), which was read a moment ago provides that the board is:

> to employ such methods . . . as will not involve the payment, directly or indirectly, of any commission or other remuneration to commissioned merchants, brokers or other marketing agencies.

In other words, this would compel the Canadian wheat board to do its own marketing without having the privilege of asking the odd elevator man or brokerage company to transact some business for it. The explanatory note is quite clear on that, and the intent of the sponsor is also made clear in the explanatory note, which states:

> This bill is designed to eliminate the prevalent practice of the Canadian wheat board of paying commissions to agents in connection with the sale of wheat and to free the board to conduct its sale operations without engaging and paying for such unnecessary service.

Those are strong words. To say that the Canadian wheat board is paying for unnecessary service is certainly, to my mind, a reflection on the officials of the board. Whether it would free or restrict the board is, to say the least, a debatable point. In the original act of 1935, we find this provision:

> The board is to offer continuously wheat for sale in the markets of the world through the established channels: provided that the board may, if in its opinion any existing agencies are not operating satisfactorily, take such steps as it deems expedient to establish, utilize and employ its own or other marketing agencies or channels.

Consequently, if the board feel they are paying for unnecessary services they have the right to establish their own agencies to take care of that situation. By what stretch of the imagination can it be thought that it would give the board more freedom to cut out this provision which gives the board the authority to establish their own channels? The intention of the amendment is to cut out this provision, and then it is claimed that the board would have more freedom.

Mr. JOHNSTON: Has not the board to pay these commissions whether it likes to or not?

Mr. JUTRAS: It does not have to, because the board may employ its own or other marketing agencies or channels if, in its opinion, any existing agencies are not operating satisfactorily. That provision is quite clear in the act, and that provision the amendment would cut out.

It comes down to this: Either my hon. friends believe that the officials are not using that provision of the act, or they have a different interpretation of that section. I cannot read anybody's mind. I can only take the bill for what it is worth. We could go on discussing this for days, and I sincerely believe that it is our duty to have the officials of the board appear before a committee where they could be examined and give us the benefit of their experience. Then we could find out how they have been acting with respect to this section and how it has been interpreted. But with the bill before the house this cannot be done and we have to depend on the explanatory notes attached to the bill.

I would respectfully submit that we should hear from the officials exactly what is meant, for instance, by marketing facilities. The amendment refers almost exclusively to the marketing agencies, and paragraph (i) provides that the only restriction shall apply to the selling and disposing of wheat. That is an involved question. Exactly what is meant by marketing agencies is not clear to me. I have tried to find out exactly what is meant by it, but it is quite debatable. It would appear that the facilities used by the board at the present time are numerous and diversified. For instance, the Canadian wheat board, is, I believe, now using the facilities of the country elevators, the small and large mills, the terminal elevators, the government elevators as well as the private elevators, the pools, the United Grain Growers Limited, the terminals owned by the national harbours board, and the brokerage facilities of the shippers and importers. There is no doubt that the question of storage facilities, handling facilities, purchasing facilities and marketing facilities is interrelated and in many instances very difficult to seggregate. I do not believe it is the intention of this bill that the wheat board should go out and buy all the country elevators and put civil servants in every one of them to purchase the grain from the farmers, because, as I pointed out, the amendment refers more particularly to the selling and disposing of wheat. However, it must be remembered that the elevators are used at the present time to complete certain transactions of sale. For instance, I have in mind a country miller who buys wheat from the wheat board; this wheat often never leaves the community; it is bought there and sold to the miller right on the spot. In that case it could be argued that the elevator man has been used as a marketing agent. I am just pointing this out to show that the question is an intricate one, and a wrong policy might lead to serious consequences.

The allegation has also been made that large sums of money can be saved. Naturally when it comes to saving money I am 100 per cent in favour of the intent. However, there is always the danger that in trying to save money you may spend more than you actually save, especially when it has to do with setting up a large and cumbersome government agency or government organization.

I took the trouble to analyse the report of the Canadian wheat board. I have here the report of the board for the crop year 1943-44. This is the statement of operations on the crop account, western division, for the year ended July 31, 1944, and it is the last report, or at least the most recent I have. We find that the wheat acquired by the board amounted to 293,000,000 bushels, at a cost, in round figures, of $354 million. The surplus on cash wheat transactions is shown as $23 million. We now come to the expenses, and I bring these in with the object of trying to find exactly where we could save large sums of money. As I said before, if it can be done I am 100 per cent behind it, but before tinkering with this organization I should like to have some facts or figures on which to base a decision. In the report the expenses are given. The carrying charges are $4,000,000. Other items are: additional freight on wheat, $900,000; then, handling stop off division charges and so on, $2,000; drying and reconditioning, $19,000; brokerage charges, $115,000; administration and general expenses, $436,000, making a total of close to $5,000,000. The largest item of expense is, of course, the carrying charges, and as hon. members know, this represents the storage of wheat carried at country elevators at a rate determined under the tariff of the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, plus haulage, and allowance for interest on the grain which is financed by the elevator company until it reaches the delivery point where it is turned over to the Canadian wheat board. The terminal storage rates are also fixed by the board of grain commissioners, and I believe the mill elevators take the rate that is nearest to the terminal elevators. So that I do not see how we could effect a big saving in this item of carrying charges. I have not been able to probe deeply into these items of brokerage charges and administrative and general expenses, but I would fancy that there is probably more than meets the eye in those items. If it is only $115,000 which we could save by setting up a huge organization, I am quite sure that in the long run we would not save any money but that actually it would be more costly to the wheat board; and naturally, if it is costlier to the wheat board, eventually it will be costlier to the producer, to the farmer, because at the present time it is doubtful if you could hire more than seven or eight good marketing agents out of that appropriation of $115,000.

I have been referring to expenses, and for the benefit of those who are not from the western provinces I hasten to make it quite clear that those expenses do not represent losses and that they do not involve any liability to the treasury or the government, because the board has been operating at a profit. I do not know exactly how far back, but at any rate ever since 1940 it has been in the happy position of distributing money on participation certificates held by the farmers. As a matter of fact, distributions in the 1940-41 crop year amounted to a little over $26 million; in 1941-42, to $15 million; in 1942-43 the amount rose to $19½ million; and for 1943-44 the figures are not yet available, but I assume the amount is something like that of 1942-43. Actually a total of $60 million has been distributed to the farmers since the operation of the Canadian wheat board; and I repeat that these figures reflect a surplus, so that actually there is no cost to the government or the treasury. All administrative and general expenses are, of course, chargeable against the proceeds of the wheat. It explains why the board has been successful, when one considers the amount of money that has been distributed. Exactly where we should bring about such a change as has been mentioned by the mover of the bill is difficult to detect. However, I still maintain that it would probably be a wise thing to go over these reports with the officials of the department and get a full story on the subject. As a matter of fact, the Canadian wheat board has not lately been before a committee, and I believe it is almost due for an airing there. I therefore strongly urge that this be done.

I wish now to refer briefly to another angle of the situation. I shall turn to the administrative aspect and the experience of the past. In this bill the board is asked to do it own marketing exclusive of existing facilities. It is probably wise to remember that the pools attempted this at one time and abandoned it later, to use the existing facilities. I am given to understand that they now use the existing marketing facilities. I went back and read the debates that took place in this house in 1932 and 1933, when the then prime minister was going to blast his way through the markets of the world. Many pertinent things were said then and there is no doubt that the failure of the venture was not due to lack of energetic enterprise on his part. However, the fact remains that even the dynamic personality of the then prime minister did not make much of a hole in the wall of determination of the old world. I am quite sure that the country would not like a recurrence of the McFarland episode, and it is not inappropriate to be cautioned by it. I am given to understand that all grain handling companies, including the three pools and United Grain Growers Limited, use the existing facilities. Whether it is significant or not, it should at least arouse our curiosity.

When we consider the marketing situation, I submit that it would be dangerous to use the last few years as a criterion.

Everyone knows that it is a relatively easy matter at the present time to market wheat, as the minister pointed out in his statement at the time he announced the policy of the government on wheat. The European countries, nearly all of them our allies, are buying out of necessity and to a large extent on credit. Furthermore, the second world war came to an end with Canadian wheat producers in a particularly strong marketing position. Not only have the general disruption and bad weather reduced production in all areas, but the Australian and South African crop failures and a similar crop failure in the Argentine have left Canada and the United States as the only countries in the export market for wheat. This has coincided with the release of pent-up demands in liberated areas, so that there is no problem of finding markets to-day.

It is, however, very hard to say how long this situation will last. The European countries are now sowing all the wheat they can and it will take many years before they have money to pay. As I pointed out, we and the United States are now the only two wheat exporting countries in the world. It is to be hoped that the policy of the government, which is to offer wheat at a low price as compared with world prices, will encourage those countries which were not producing wheat before the thirties to revert to their original position before that time. The government assures them that we shall keep our prices around $1.55. However, this is a mere hope and we do not know what those countries will do, whether they will leave us the job of producing wheat, or whether they will attempt to produce their own.

It is well to remember that the success of that policy outside Canada will depend in no small measure on the support it receives within the country. The government gives the assurance that it will keep the price around $1.55, but it is seriously handicapped in the eyes of importers when political groups and various grain companies and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bracken) demand that producers be paid world prices. They, too, know the diversity of politics in a democratic country and they appreciate as well as the leader of the opposition the public appeal of the dollar.

I felt sure that the leader of the opposition, with his background and experience, would be the first to appreciate the wisdom of offering wheat at slightly lower than world prices. Apparently however, that was to be but the beginning of my surprise, because shortly afterwards he rose and demanded that the ceiling be taken away completely on all farm products. If I had time at my disposal I could go on...

Some hon. MEMBERS: Lots of time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but the hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will revert to the business prior to six o'clock.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford) in the chair.

Mr. FLEMING: Mr. Chairman, may I say a word now by way of explanation of the purpose and effect of the amendment. It will be observed that the amendment is introduced into certain excepting words in parapraph (c). In other words, where the section now requires one year's residence in Canada immediately preceding the date of application and then goes on, with two exceptions, to require four years' residence within the six years preceding the application, the amendment proposes to add to the two exceptions now contained in the paragraph a third exception. The two exceptions already provided for are these. First is the case where the applicant has served outside Canada in the armed forces of Canada during time of war; second is the applicant who is the wife of and who resides in Canada with a Canadian citizen. The amendment proposes to add another exception, in the case where the applicant is a British subject within the meaning of section 28 of the act.

Mr. GIBSON (Comox-Alberni): By naturalization.

[Mr. Jutras.]

Mr. FLEMING: A British subject within section 28 of the act, which means a British subject whether by birth or by naturalization coming from another part of the commonwealth, the nations of the commonwealth being set forth in the first schedule to the act. If that amendment is accepted, in my submission it will preserve the proper recognition to which British subjects from the other member nations of the commonwealth are entitled by reason of being subjects of the same king.

I have dwelt, Mr. Chairman, on the fact that this is introduced as a third exception. Will you please note that already in the act there are two exceptions to the principle for which the Secretary of State has been contending during this debate. He has argued that you cannot reduce the five-year period for two reasons, as I apprehend his remarks; first, that it is necessary that the five-year period be preserved because there are certain incidents attached to that five-year period of residence under the Immigration Act, and, second, that it would be an unheard-of thing to take away his citizenship from one who is a Canadian citizen. In view of what I said this afternoon I do not know that I need deal further with these two observations of the minister. Suffice it to say at this point, as to the first one, that the incidents applied by the Immigration Act will continue to apply in all cases, and therefore have no relevance whatever to the matter now under discussion with reference to section 10 (1) (c). In the second place, as to the alleged impossibility of taking away a man's right of citizenship once he has it, I need refer only to section 21, which empowers the Secretary of State, for any one of half a dozen causes or reasons, to deprive one who has received a certificate of Canadian citizenship of that certificate and thus deprive him of his rights as a citizen.

In passing, I observe that the right conferred on the Secretary of State by section 21 (1) (c) to deprive of his citizenship and of his certificate of citizenship one who within five years after becoming a Canadian citizen has been sentenced by any court in Canada to imprisonment for a term of not less than twelve months, goes much farther than the grounds of deportation now existing under the Immigration Act, in two respects. In the first place, the right given to the minister under section 21 (1) (c) will apply in the cases now provided for in the act for not less than ten years after the legal admission to this country of such person. If he did not acquire domicile at once after coming in, ten years would be the minimum. So that you are no longer dealing simply with the five years provided by the Immigration Act; you are adding another five years. Thus the minister is asking this parliament for power to take away from one who has received Canadian citizenship under this act, for a period of ten years after his lawful entry into Canada, all the rights he has acquired as a Canadian citizen. In the second place, that right is vested in the minister in case of conviction for an offence for which the person has been sentenced to imprisonment for a term of not less than twelve months. In some courts it does not take a tremendously serious offence to lead to the imposition of a sentence of twelve months' imprisonment. That is going a great deal farther than the relevant sections of the Immigration Act, which are principally sections 40 and 43. It will permit the Secretary of State to take away everything in the way of rights of citizenship that has been acquired by a person under this act because of offences in many cases much less serious than those which must be proved before the Minister of Mines and Resources would have the right to exercise his power of deportation under the Immigration Act.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. FLEMING: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I yielded to a number of interruptions.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

The CHAIRMAN: With the unanimous consent of the committee the hon. member may continue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. FLEMING: I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I thank hon. members for their courtesy. So much for what might be said by way of introducing exceptions into the bill. The exceptions are there now; and if it is so important in the view of the minister that you should not have any exceptions cutting across the principle for which he is arguing in the light of the Immigration Act, then how does he justify the two exceptions that already exist in section 10 (1) (c)? I am simply adding an exception for which there is ample justification and without which a grave injury will be done.

Shall I be repeating if I again remind the committee that an exception exists already in section 10 (1) in respect of British subjects? I pointed out that the exception in the consequences which flow from it is of no importance, because all that is waived in the case of the British subject is the filing of his declaration of intention. Nevertheless there is a distinction drawn in section 10 (1) (a), and is drawn by the minister himself. What possible justification is there for the exception made in section 10 (1) (a) if the arguments he has been bringing before this chamber for the past two days are sound? There is no justification for it in principle.

I shall leave this question with the committee. The minister has indicated that as far as the government is concerned the British subject with one year's residence in Canada—no domicile, it will be noticed, but just one year's residence—is good enough to enjoy the great privilege of the franchise; but the British subject to whom is accorded what most of us consider to be the highest right of citizenship, namely the franchise, is, by the minister's argument, not qualified, for some reason or another, to enjoy the other rights of citizenship. Is there any consistency in that? I submit there is none. The committee will notice that my amendment calls for equating the residence requirements under this bill with those already existing under the elections act. In addition, domicile will be required; that is, the intention of making Canada the applicant's permanent home. But if that provision in the elections act which the minister supports is sound, then how can my amendment be other than sound in principle and deserving of the minister's full support?

I have heard some people say, "Well what about communists?" Some communists in Canada to-day are people who hailed from the British isles. Is that a reason for the discrimination which I say this section proposes to apply to all British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth in relation to their present status? It is clear from what has been said already that the full power enjoyed by the government under the Immigration Act is to be continued. There has been no suggestion from any quarter of the house that the Immigration Act should be amended. Section 41 of that act gives the government ample power to deport those who attempt to promote in this country the overthrow of the government by force. That power will still exist. If hon. members will look at section 21 (1) (e) of the bill they will see that the minister has reserved to himself the power, even after the granting of a certificate of citizenship, to revoke that citizenship and to withdraw the certificate in the case of any citizen who shows himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty.

Are not those powers adequate? I submit they are adequate if the government will use them. There is nothing in the contention that because the odd or exceptional immigrant from the British isles has blossomed forth in Canada as a communist, that is any reason for requiring all British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth to submit to the same conditions as those from alien lands.

There are several matters which, in conclusion, I shall discuss briefly. It is abundantly clear that change is made by this section in the present position of the British subject from other parts of the commonwealth who comes to this country. Right now he has all the rights of citizenship spelled with a small "c". This bill proposes to attach conditions which have not hitherto been exacted of him if he wishes to possess Canadian citizenship, with the citizenship now to be spelled with a capital "C".

He has been entitled to call himself a citizen. What is he to be in the five years of residence here? He is still a British subject. No one can take that from him. Thus, there are three classes of people provided for in this bill. There is the Canadian citizen, the man who is here and who has established his rights to become a citizen. There is the man who is an alien, and who continues to be an alien at least for those five years. In the third place, under the present bill there is an in-between class which is composed of British subjects who have not yet been here for five years. The British subject in this class is not an alien and he is not a Canadian citizen. What is he to call himself? He is still to be a British subject who is waiting to qualify at the end of five years for Canadian citizenship.

Who is there in this chamber who will say that it is a contribution to Canadian citizenship or Canadian unity to say to that man with all his traditions—the same traditions as we have, and the same democratic approach to life as we have—that for that period he is neither flesh nor fowl? I cannot square that with even common sense.

I have pointed out that the principle of section 10 (1) is to place British subjects from another part of the commonwealth and aliens from alien lands, no matter how good they may become as citizens, in precisely the same position under this bill, when coming to Canada and seeking to become Canadian citizens. That is the principle of section 10 of the bill, and it is a principle which I submit this chamber cannot endorse.

It means that we tell the British subject coming from another part of this commonwealth, "When you enter Canada, so far as your rights as a Canadian citizen are concerned, and your status, the fact that you owe allegiance to the same king as we do makes no difference." That is the significance of section 10. It means that our common allegiance means nothing under this bill. It is, as if we were putting up at the ports of debarkation of ships bearing immigrants to this country a notice to all British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth stating, "Your allegiance to the same sovereign as we have means nothing, when it comes to applying for rights for citizenship in this country." Can this chamber endorse that principle? How can it do so?

What would we lose by accepting this amendment? I submit we would lose nothing. There is no question of principle at stake in permitting a British subject to enjoy rights similar to those he now enjoys. In securing his rights to that Canadian citizenship, with domicile, plus one year's residence, and other qualifications, there is no principle at stake. There is likewise no inconvenience at stake—notwithstanding this red herring about the Immigration Act which has been drawn across the discussion of this question.

Moreover I say there is no question of Canadian autonomy at stake. From some of the expressions from some quarters of this chamber one would think that Canada, by recognizing any preferred position for British subjects coming from other parts of the commonwealth over aliens was derogating in some way from its autonomy. How could anything be farther from the fact? Those who are bringing that theme forward are troubling themselves with something in the nature of unwarranted fears and suspicions. There is somewhere an inferiority complex in that attitude. What we need in our approach to these matters is a complex of equality, not an inferiority complex. Let us not go on fighting old battles. In that connection I cannot help remembering a cartoon by the famous cartoonist Low of London which appeared a year or two before the outbreak of war. That was in the days when guarantees were being asked for—guarantees, guarantees, guarantees! Guarantees had been given by the government of the United Kingdom. But some of the continental powers kept on coming back asking for more guarantees. The cartoon showed two British statesmen talking to each other. One said to the other, "Our friends on the continent want us to guarantee the guarantee that we have given to guarantee the guarantee which we have given." And the other gentleman said, "Gad, that's going a little bit too far."

Mr. Chairman, surely this matter of autonomy is played out. There is no question as to our full equality in the commonwealth. How are we going to use the rights we have? Are we going to use those rights to place British subjects from other parts of the commonwealth, men now with equal status in the commonwealth, in the invidious position where their allegiance to a common sovereign means nothing when it comes to the matter of securing Canadian citizenship? That is the issue raised by the bill, and that issue is inescapable.

I have asked what we would lose by accepting the amendment. My answer is that we would lose nothing. I ask, in conclusion, what we would lose by enacting the section as it stands. I suggest that, in effect, it reduces the value and store we place in a common allegiance to a common sovereign. I suggest that in putting the alien and the British subject from other parts of the commonwealth in precisely the same position we are saying in effect, "Well, that common allegiance means very little to us." It would seem that it means much less to us than I had hoped it meant. Is this any time to be reducing the value we are putting upon our rights throughout the commonwealth as citizens and as British subjects in common allegiance? This is no time for that. We have nothing to lose and we have everything to gain by strengthening those bonds. As to preserving our autonomy—certainly there is no thought of yielding one inch or iota of our autonomy. Let us exercise some common sense in the use to which we are going to put those rights which we possess as Canadians and as equal partners in the commonwealth.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. FLEMING: The issue in this debate on section 10 is this: What value do we place upon our common allegiance with our fellow citizens in all parts of the commonwealth?

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Chairman, it is an interesting fact in dealing with a matter of this kind that, as one of the thirty-two immigrants in the chamber, in the course of events I am the minister of the department of which the immigration branch is a part. I remember distinctly when I left the old country, and I suppose I had in my mind then the thought that was expressed by the old Scotsman in his prayer when he said, "I do not ask Thee, Lord, that Thou shouldst give me wealth, all that I ask is that Thou showest me where it is." I may have had that thought in my mind; yet I recall most vividly that when I left Glasgow a very close friend of mine shook my hand and said, "You will not be able to forget Scotland when you get to Canada, but when you get there I want you to be a Canadian." I have endeavoured to be a Canadian. I just introduce that little personal note so that my remarks my not be taken to be prejudiced and it may be realized that I am dealing with this subject from the point of view of Canada and not from the point of view of the old country or with the idea of there being any discrimination against her.

Therefore I have to take exception to many of the things that have been said by the hon. member for Eglinton in his able presentation. When I came to this country I could have been a member of parliament within one year. After I had lived in Canada for a year and six months in a constituency I had the right to vote and was therefore able to be a representative of the people of Canada. There has been no deprivation of any of my rights during the years I have been here.

The hon. member speaks of the autonomy of Canada, but in my mind there is no question of the autonomy of Canada when it comes to those she will permit to come within her borders. No one can gainsay the right of this parliament to exercise its powers over immigrants and to impose any conditions of entry that it desires. When the hon. member says that this is a matter of strengthening the bonds between this country and the old country by the loosening of the provisions and restrictions against immigrants, I take clear issue with him.

Mr. FLEMING: I did not suggest anything of the kind.

Mr. GLEN: I understood my hon. friend to say that the passing of the amendment which he has proposed would mean the strengthening of the links between the old country and this country.

Mr. FLEMING: I am sure the minister wants my remarks to be correctly understood. What I said in that respect was that the passing of section 10 (1) (c) in its present form would have the effect of saying to persons from other parts of the commonwealth with a common allegiance that that allegiance has little or no meaning. I did not suggest that it had any bearing whatever on the Immigration Act. What I said was predicated on the assumption that there will be no change in the Immigration Act. I think he will recall that I supported the provisions of the Immigration Act all the way through.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member in his explanation has not dealt with what I had in mind. He was dealing with and speaking of the Immigration Act. I was referring to the fact that no immigrant was deprived by this bill of anything that he had not already under the Immigration Act. Perhaps I might read the sections of the Immigration Act which bear on the question. Section 2 reads:

In this act, and in all orders in council, proclamations and regulations made hereunder, unless the context otherwise requires,

(a) "alien" means a person who is not a British subject;

(b) "Canadian citizen" means

(i) A person born in Canada who has not become an alien;

(ii) A British subject who has Canadian domicile.

That is exactly what this bill is doing. The British subject who has Canadian domicile will obtain the full rights of citizenship. What is "domicile?" The definition in the act is as follows:

(e) "domicile" means the place in which a person has his home, or in which he resides, or to which he returns as his place of permanent abode, and does not mean the place where he resides for a mere special or temporary purpose;

(i) Canadian domicile can only be acquired, for the purposes of this act, by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada after having been landed therein within the meaning of this act.

Mr. FLEMING: For the purposes of this act.

Mr. GLEN: For the purposes of this act. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member were to pass there would have to be a corresponding amendment to the Immigration Act in order to have the two acts in conformity with each other. The amendment we are now discussing provides that entry can be allowed and residence take place in one year and that citizenship can then be accomplished. That comes into immediate conflict with the provisions of the Immigration Act that Canadian domicile can be acquired only after a period of five years. Necessarily it would have to be changed.

I think the hon. member is dealing with two subjects; the question of citizenship is one and the question of domicile is another. He is confused and he has arrived at the conclusion that his amendment will give effect to certain things and at the same time also give effect to the provisions in the regulations which an immigrant must undergo.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. GLEN: I did not interrupt my hon. friend.

Mr. FLEMING: I asked the minister if he would permit me one question.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): The hon. member who is speaking can be interrupted only with his consent.

[Mr. Glen.]

Mr. FLEMING: I am asking for his consent. I allowed him to interrupt me with a question.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member dealt with section 21. In reading his amendment I think I could take exception to it on the ground that it is clearly out of order. The amendment contains the words "within the meaning of section 28." We have not dealt with section 28. That section may be altered and amended and the amendment of my hon. friend might not be relevant. I am making no point of that. I do not think the temper of the committee when dealing with a bill of this importance is such that it would permit the raising of any technicality with regard to points of order, and for that reason I am not taking exception to it. But I do say to the hon. member that his amendment is entirely out of order.

The hon. member dealt with section 21 which provides that the governor in council may order, upon a report from the minister, that any person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if he has, within five years after becoming a Canadian citizen, been sentenced by any court in Canada to imprisonment for a term of not less than twelve months. The only authority given to the minister is with regard to a person who has landed in Canada and who has been the subject of prosecution and has suffered a penalty of twelve months' imprisonment.

The hon. member did not refer to the restrictions that are necessary under the Immigration Act. Section 3 of that Act contains the prohibited classes. It deals with persons who are mentally defective, diseased persons, persons physically defective, criminals, prostitutes and pimps, procurers, beggars and vagrants, charity immigrants, persons not complying with regulations, public charges, psychopathic inferiority, chronic alcoholism, mentally or physically defective, advocates of force or violence against organized government, members of societies opposed to organized government or advocates of unlawful assault or killing, enemy aliens, spies, conspirators, deported conspirators and illiterates. Exceptions are members of family accompanying a rejected person.

If the amendment proposed by the hon. member is adopted by this committee and we have a British citizen coming into this country and being accepted and in one year receiving his citizenship, then, as I said before, the provisions of the Immigration Act will have to be amended. Otherwise these charges could not be laid against an immigrant if he became a citizen within one year. Surely Canada has the right to say what class of immigrant shall come here. In these days surely Canada has the right to say what type of citizen shall be admitted, and surely Canada has the right to say that those admitted shall have a sound body and a sound mind. Would the hon. gentleman say that one year would be a sufficient length of time within which to determine the character and physical fitness of the immigrant?

Mr. FLEMING: If that is a question my answer is no.

Mr. GLEN: The answer is no. But if the amendment of the hon. member were accepted the restrictions in the Immigration Act would be wiped out. The hon. gentleman did say in the course of his speech that there should be a careful medical inspection of immigrants entering this country and that the regulations should not be relaxed. It is an extraordinary position for him to take because, if his amendment were accepted and the immigrant obtained citizenship at the end of one year, the immigrant could not be deported on the grounds set forth in the Immigration Act. If the hon. member does not take that position, then he takes this, that citizenship having been granted, with all that that means, the citizenship can be revoked.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): The minister does not think that this repeals the Immigration Act? Yet it must if what he says is correct. But of course it does not do that.

Mr. GLEN: I am sure that the committee will agree with me that what I have said is the law of the land to-day.

Mr. FLEMING: And still will be if this bill is carried.

Mr. GLEN: We have heard a good deal in recent years of citizens of this country of Japanese origin who were losing their rights of citizenship, and we have all heard the protests that were made, that after the granting of citizenship these citizens were entitled to stay in Canada. I say definitely and surely that if the amendment of the hon. gentleman were carried it would mean that we would have to revoke the citizenship granted by this country to those immigrants who had been resident for one year in this country.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): You have already revoked the citizenship of the Japanese by order in council.

Mr. GLEN: I have said that that was done, but it has not yet been carried into effect, and we all know the outcry that was made over the revocation of their citizenship.

I have had a report prepared by the officers of the immigration branch with regard to the causes for deportations on the grounds of ill health and for other causes. There was a fifteen-year check made of people deported, and it shows that 14,367 British subjects were deported in the fifteen-year period from April 1, 1930, to March 31, 1945.

In those fifteen years 1,740 were deported following convictions for criminal offences after arrival in Canada.

In the same period 560 were deported on account of mental troubles, and the remaining 12,067 were deported for other reasons. The other causes for deportation are: becoming a public charge, entering Canada in violation of the Immigration Act or becoming incapacitated through tuberculosis or other disability. Entering in violation of the Immigration Act would include entry by stealth, entry without examination, entry by misrepresentation.

The department has studied all the criminal cases and all the mental cases occurring in British subjects deported over a ten-year period from April 1, 1930 to March 31, 1939. There were 845 criminal cases actually deported in ten years from 1930 to 1939, as follows:

	Persons deported	Per cent
First year	133	15·5
Second year ...	178	36·8
Third year	217	62·5
Fourth year ..	169	82·5
Fifth year	148	100
Total	845

There were also 272 mental cases deported in the ten years 1930 to 1939, as follows:

	Persons deported	Per cent
First year	42	15·4
Second year ...	40	30·1
Third year	50	48·5
Fourth year ...	71	74·6
Fifth year	69	100
Total	272

I asked the officers of the department to give me further particulars, and they state:

It has not been possible to make a thorough study of the situation but we have up to the moment examined forty-seven cases of British subjects deported following convictions for criminal offences after arrival in Canada, with the following results:

If domicile had been acquired within one year only 17 per cent of this group would have been deported; if domicile had been acquired within three years 66 per cent would have been deported. We examined twenty-four cases of British subjects deported on account of mental troubles. Had domicile been acquired in one year only 17 per cent of the group would have been deported; if domicile had been acquired in three years 50 per cent of the group would have been deported.

I have also been given a statement of deportations from Canada from April 1, 1930, to March 31, 1945. The table shows the causes for the deportations and classifies the deportations by British subjects, United States citizens and other aliens. It is rather a long table and with the permission of the committee I should like to put it on Hansard. It is as follows:

Mr. LOCKHART: Has the minister the total admissions?

Mr. GLEN: No; these figures are just of the deportations over fifteen years from April 1, 1930, to March 31, 1945. I will give the totals: Deportations for criminal offences numbered, in the case of British subjects, 1,740; for mental causes, 560, and for other causes 12,067.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister put on the record the admissions as well as the deportations?

Mr. GLEN: I have not the admissions here. The argument I am making is this, that if citizenship were granted after one year's residence in Canada, the experience which the immigration branch has had with deportations is borne out by the table, which shows the actual results over a fifteen-year period.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I suggest that if the minister wants to make his statement complete he should accept the suggestion of the hon. member and also give the admissions.

Mr. GLEN: I am not dealing with the admissions to Canada but with the problem before us, namely, the question of deportation, because the hon. member for Eglinton has based his argument on British subjects, and I am pointing out what has been the experience with regard to immigrants coming in over a period of fifteen years. The whole basis of the argument I am submitting here is that if the amendment is carried we may be faced with the very same condition of affairs with regard to immigrants as has been threatened in the last fifteen years. More than that; in these days, after a war of six years, when the health of the people is necessarily lower than it was before, special care will have to be taken with regard to these people. I am informed by competent medical men that though an immigrant may to all appearances be well, and may pass the medical test, in one, two or three years diseases may appear which were latent in his body but would only come to light after a lapse of time.

Mr. FRASER: He should have the X-ray examination overseas.

Mr. GLEN: They have, I know, a pretty fair inspection. But I am also told in this connection that a person might have tuberculosis and might apparently be cured of it, could come before a medical inspection board and be passed; yet the disease might develop again within a period of two or three years. The same thing occurs in connection with mental cases.

When I say I am looking at these matters from the point of view of Canada I mean I am taking the position that Canada wants men of sound bodies and sound minds to come in here, and I am quite sure that no hon. member would wish it to be otherwise, because the results, as we know them through many records of people with mental disease coming into the country, are simply appalling. I have here a book entitled "The Fruit of the Family Tree". I got it from the library. It deals, among other things, with the famous case of the Jukes family in the United States. It tells the melancholy tale of Max Juke, a lazy New England vagabond, born nearly two hundred years ago.

The original record of these 1,200 social scourges reads as follows: 300 died in infancy; 310 professional paupers; 440 wrecked by disease; 50 prostitutes; 60 thieves; 7 murderers; 53 other criminals.

In another book, "The family and the Nation", by Whetham, dealing with the same matter, it is said:

One such case has been investigated fully that of the notorious "Jukes" family in the United States of America. The pedigree contains some 830 known individuals, all descended from five sisters born about 1760. A large proportion of these individuals have been in prison, some of them for serious crimes. Frequently the women have consorted with criminals. Many of the race have been paupers, partially or wholly supported by the country. The total direct loss to the state caused by this one family has been calculated as about £260,000 while the indirect loss cannot be estimated.

Is it any wonder that I, charged with the administration of immigration into this country, should look with a great deal of disfavour on the amendment proposed by the hon. member to-night? I would wish that the immigration department should be strengthened in order that it might protect the people of this country, when I reflect on such an illustration as the history of this family and what one insane person coming to a country and procreating, may mean to the state.

In this connection may I also say that certainly the amendment moved by the hon. member should take into account the obligations of the provincial governments. They are charged with the maintenance of mental institutions. The cost of these, as everyone knows, is enormous. Why should they not be consulted, because they would be more directly affected than we as a federal government would be?

It seems to me, therefore, that this amendment—and I wish to speak of it only on its merits—should not be accepted by the committee; and I think in the light of what I have said with regard to the soundness of it the committee will support my view that it should not be accepted.

Coming back to the original argument on the amendment, I cannot understand how anyone in the light of that amendment can read it otherwise than that a person who makes application, coming into this country, can be admitted to citizenship if he has resided in Canada for a period of one year immediately preceding the date of the application and, in addition, where the applicant has served outside Canada in the armed forces of Canada during time of war or is a British subject within the meaning of section 28. The hon. gentleman made some point with regard to two exceptions and said that this was a third exception. I do not think anyone in the committee is likely to object to the two exceptions of the applicant who has served outside Canada in the armed forces of Canada, or who is the wife of and resides in Canada with a Canadian citizen and has also resided in Canada for a further period of not less than four years during the six years immediately preceding the date of the application. Surely there is merit in exceptions being made in cases like that. But what I say is that the effect of the hon. gentleman's amendment will be that a British immigrant can obtain, after one year, full rights of citizenship and the immigration department will be deprived of the right to inquire, after the year is over, into the capacity or character of the immigrant, and you will abolish absolutely all the provisions of the Immigration Act with regard to this class of immigrants.

Mr. FLEMING: It will not change one word of the Immigration Act.

Mr. GLEN: I do not see how you are going to divorce it, because if this amendment passes inevitably the Immigration Act must be amended. The two acts deal with the same matter, one expressely providing that one year will give the right of citizenship, and the Immigration Act providing, as I have already stated, that five years' residence in Canada is required. There must certainly be no overlapping in that respect, and if this amendment is carried, as it will be the latest expression of this house on the subject, you will immediately cancel all provisions with regard to the entry of applicants who are not, as we think, competent to enter the country under the provisions of this act.

I view this matter with a great deal of seriousness because to-day, with the tremendous number of applications from Europe and eleswhere by those who desire to come to Canada, I do not want to see the restrictions on immigrants relaxed to the extent that we may be bound to take those whom otherwise we would reject. It is an extremely serious matter. It is a matter on which, I know, every member of the house feels as deeply as I do. None of us would go to our constituencies and plead for anything other than that we should have only men and women of sound bodies and sound minds coming into this country. It is for this reason, realizing the dangers, that I have spoken with some degree of heat, although not personal heat. I feel that the committee should not pass this amendment. I feel that provincial governments should have some opportunity of giving expression to their views of the class of immigrants that should be allowed in, the qualifications of those immigrants, in order that those who are, after all, charged with the responsibility and expense of maintaining them shall have some say as to the conditions governing their admission.

[Mr. Glen.]

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not going to speak at length.

An hon. MEMBER: Good.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): "Good"? That is fine. I do not speak at length; it is not my practice to take up much of the time of the house. But I think the figures given by the minister in connection with deportations of people who have come to this country are startling, although he has not given us the figures of the total number of admissions. Of course we want in this country people of sound bodies and sound minds; but, assuming the figures to be as he has stated, I do not see that the amendment of the hon. member to my left is in any way related to this situation, because persons from any part of the British empire, if they are allowed by the department to come into this country, should be of sound mind and sound body.

I suggested before that this bill should go to a committee to be properly studied, and I am still of that opinion. If one may judge by the figures which the Minister of Mines and resources has given to the committee, it is obvious that something is wrong. This country must have been put to a cost involving thousands of dollars simply because the inspection of people coming into Canada has not been properly carried out. I repeat, there is something wrong, and it has nothing whatever to do with the question of somebody coming from some part of the British empire and not being given a privilege which we should extend on a reciprocal basis to all people from the British commonwealth of nations. The figures which the minister has put on Hansard are so startling that something ought to be done about the matter. We do not want to have unsound people coming to the country. I see the Minister of National Revenue over there and perhaps he can tell me what should be done in regard to the examination of these people. With medical science what it is to-day, we ought to be able to examine them and ascertain whether they are likely to make good citizens before they come in. I suggest that an investigation should be started right away.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think the minister gave an answer to the members who originally asked him for the figures with regard to immigrants coming from the British isles.

Mr. GLEN: For this period of years?

Mr. GRAYDON: Yes. I have been checking up on one of the returns tabled this session, and I find that from June 1, 1945, to January 31 of this year, of 14,367 immigrants admitted to Canada 8,552 were British. I take it that the figures the minister has put on Hansard ought to be contrasted with the numbers who were actually admitted in those particular years. I do not wish to interfere with the minister's argument by asking him to put those figures on Hansard, but it would give the committee a better opportunity of assessing the exact position if the total number of immigrants from the British isles were indicated at the same time.

Mr. GLEN: I will see the officials about it, but I think the hon. member missed the point of my argument. I was not at the moment concerned about the question of admission into Canada. What I was dealing with was the fact that we had to deport British subjects who did not conform to the requirements of the Immigration Acts. These things are necessary no matter whether the people concerned are English, Scottish, Welsh or anybody else. It is necessary to have the power to deport them in that period of time and that is the reason I gave the figures to support the argument.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister is not doing it consciously, but unconsciously he is actually giving a black eye to the British isles by simply putting on Hansard—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: Wait a minute. Do not be so touchy over there.

An hon. MEMBER: Another lecture?

Mr. GRAYDON: I was simply trying to state a case fairly and if it touches a tender spot I suggest that it might be well for my hon. friends not to be so touchy about it. It is giving a black eye to the British isles to put on Hansard the figures with regard to a large number of people who are supposed to have been deported from Canada without at the same time indicating the numbers that came in. That is the only reason I raised the point. I know that when the minister reflects upon it he will realize that the suggestion is a perfectly proper one, and those hon. members who have heard what I have said in this regard will not think it is so bad after all.

Mr. COLDWELL: In the table that has been put on Hansard, is there a break-down of the causes for deportation? While my guess yesterday was slightly high in the figure given, a large number of people were deported because they were public charges.

Mr. REID: Many asked to be deported.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to know whether, in the table that has been put on Hansard, we are given the number of persons deported year by year because they were public charges. As I said yesterday, my hon. friends are very anxious to protect British citizens coming to the country, but when they were in power they deported a large number simply because they were poor. I should like to know what the figure is.

Mr. GLEN: The table I have put on Hansard shows deportations in connection with the British isles and the United States from the point of view of criminal offences and mental reasons, as well as other causes. These other causes are not broken down.

Mr. KIDD: I know the minister wishes to be fair. He will correct me if I am wrong, but speaking from memory I believe that in the ten-year period from 1930 to 1940 there entered Canada about 150,000 immigrants annually. That would represent a million and a half, and of those 150,000 annually there were about 50,000 from the British isles. Multiply that ten by fifty and you have 500,000 British immigrants coming to Canada in that peirod. I suggest that, to be fair, the Minister of Mines and Resources should have tabulated his figures on a percentage basis. But that was not done. He should take the figures he submitted a few minutes ago and couple with them the half million immigrants who came from Great Britain. If he does so he will find the percentage is very small.

Mr. MITCHELL: This is the trouble you get into when you try to grade Canadians like eggs in a grocer's store. I came from the old country, as did the Minister of Mines and Resources, and I have had some experience as an alderman in Hamilton during the bad days from 1930 to 1935. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar raised a question about people who were deported because they were destitute, and I should like to get the figures of the number of people who voluntarily asked for deportation on the ground of destitution. I agree with the Minister of Mines and Resources. Those of us who have had anything to do with public institutions know it is absolutely necessary, no matter where people come from, that the state should have some say as to the return of individuals who, for reasons possibly beyond their control, become public charges—through insanity, disease or for any other reason. In my opinion, the amendment raises the question of differentiation between Canadian citizens. I believe that everybody should be treated alike, irrespective of where they came from.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): What about the Japanese?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can answer that too. If my hon. friend had been sitting where I sat in 1942, what would he have done?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I would have done a better job than you.

Mr. MITCHELL: If he had been sitting where I was sitting in 1942, when freedom as we understand it was almost disappearing from the face of the earth, he probably would have taken the same position that we had to take, and the Americans had to take, at that time.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): The Americans did not.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Americans did it, of course. But I was speaking of an entirely different matter. I was speaking of the immigrants who have come to this country, and I think they should all be treated the same, irrespective of where they come from. If five years is the trial period before citizenship is granted, I think it is like the law; you cannot have two principles, one for the rich and a different one for the poor, for if you do you are headed for revolution. So that I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. FULTON: I think a few things remain to be added, and for a few minutes I would like to deal with what the Minister of Mines and Resources said. Before doing so, however, I should like to go back to perhaps the main tenor of the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton, which was that by section 10 (1) (c) as it now stands the value of the common citizenship which members of the British commonwealth share is being reduced. At that time one hon. member on the other side interjected a remark to the effect that he saw no reason why a non-Canadian British subject should not be treated as an alien. Well, it has been said earlier in this debate, and I think with a certain amount of truth, that in this world as we know it the only approach we have had as yet to a common world citizenship it that concept of a British subject which is common to all the empire countries. A great deal has been said to the effect that somehow we must arrive at a concept of world citizenship. We have an approach to it in the concept of a British subject. It is not a question, let us make this clear again, of being a subject of Great Britain. It is a brotherhood which is shared by all the members of the empire; and to my way of thinking a British subject of Great Britain is as much privileged to share my citizenship of my country as I am to share his. We should not always look at it the other way. I do not always look to the United Kingdom when I think about British subjects. You can look to Australia or New Zealand or the other members of the empire. I say we should not always look to Great Britain, which is only the origin of the empire. We should look to all the other countries and develop a real feeling of empire unity.

I see no reason why that feeling should not be expanded. First we have to make it a real feeling within the commonwealth; and then I see no reason why it should not be expanded, as was said so magnificently the other day by Mr. Churchill, so that eventually we might be able to realize the ideal of a union of all English-speaking peoples. There are certain tendencies in the world to-day which are definitely working toward unity, toward a common idealism; and I think it would be a great shame if we in Canada, because of some misplaced or unreal concept of a derogation from our autonomy, were to strike a blow at the little progress we have made so far toward that common idealism.

That, I think, is what is at the root of the objections which come from this side of the house to this particular section of the bill. We do not accuse hon. members opposite of being poor Canadians or of trying to derogate from empire unity as a matter of policy, but we do feel that inadvertently—let us put it in that way—by this section they are striking a blow at the status of British subjects which we now hold. The Secretary of State has asked how this could be so, how this accusation could be correct when by this section no right which he now possesses in Canada is taken away from the British subject. I think the answer to that contention was given by the hon. member for Eglinton, that it is the very right of Canadian citizenship which is denied to him for the five-year period.

What does this denial mean? Some people may say it does not mean a great deal, but I say that if my position as a British subject means anything it means that I can have the knowledge that were I to go to Australia or New Zealand, then, because I share the same citizenship they have, I would be entitled to become a citizen of that country without going through the same formalities, the same procedure, the same routine and perhaps even the same delay as an immigrant from some other part of the world which is not a member of the British empire. I feel that quite strongly, and I value that right which is accorded to me by the other dominions. I see no reason, in equity and in justice to the other members of the empire, why we in Canada should take that right away from British subjects from those parts of the empire.

It sometimes helps if we bring these things down to concrete, simple examples, and I should like to give one in this instance. It may seem far-fetched, but if it is thought over carefully I think some force will be found in it. I give the committee the example of Hitler, Mussolini and Churchill arriving to-morrow on a ship at Montreal and applying for Canadian citizenship. Under the terms of this bill as they now stand each of these gentlemen would have to go through the same procedure to become Canadian citizens. Churchill would have to go through exactly the same formalities and be subjected to the same delay as the other two. In the course of the debate it has been pointed out it is not necessary that the non-Canadian British subject should wait for five years. He shares our language, our ideas of government, our British traditions of freedom and democracy, and he requires no training in those principles. Sometimes, of course, when I examine the trend of government in Canada to-day, government by order in council; when I examine some of the opposition to the suggestions which are advanced by hon. members on this side, I think possibly that is put in the wrong way. Perhaps, after all, an immigrant from another part of the British empire does need some training when he comes to Canada. If the present trend is continued he will soon be needing training in dictatorship before he can become a full-fledged Canadian citizen. However, we on this side are fully convinced that after the next three or four years, after the people have had another opportunity to express their will at the polls, the position will be reversed, and the non-Canadian British subject arriving here once more will need only his traditions of democracy to be qualified to become a full Canadian citizen.

To deal for a moment specifically with some of the points raised by the Minister of Mines and Resources, the first contention he advanced was that if the amendment now before the committee were to be adopted it would necessitate a corresponding amendment in the Immigration Act. I think the first answer to that contention is that the hon. member for Eglinton made it abundantly clear that his amendment contemplated no change in the provisions of the Immigration Act. He dwelt at some length on the reasons behind that statement and, I think, showed conclusively that no change need follow. I shall not repeat his grounds, but would simply direct the attention of hon. members to that portion of the Immigration Act cited by the Minister of Mines and Resources in support of his contention. He read from section 2(b), which defines the meaning of Canadian citizens. In section 2 (b) (ii) it is stated that a Canadian citizen means a British subject who has Canadian domicile. Under section 2 (e) it is stated that "Canadian domicile can only be acquired for the purposes of this act" by a person having his domicile for at least five years in Canada.

The minister's point was that a British subject coming to Canada under this bill, as it is proposed to amend it, would require only one year of residence before he might be admitted to citizenship. He said that there is conflict, because under the Immigration Act he requires five years before he can acquire domicile. Therefore I wish to emphasize that part of the Immigration Act which says that Canadian domicile "can only be acquired for the purposes of this act", and so on. It is specifically stated that this provision is directed only to what is contemplated in the Immigration Act. Therefore it does not necessarily follow because we pass any other act whatsoever, or because we amend the present bill, that we must amend the Immigration Act.

This passage which states that Canadian domicile can only be acquired after five years "for the purposes of this act" clearly has reference to section 40 of the Immigration Act which gives the minister power to deport any person other than a Canadian citizen or person having Canadian domicile, for certain offences, and also if it may be found that such persons are suffering from lunacy or from certain contagious diseases. It is designed to protect the right in the minister to deport a person with residence of less than five years who may be found guilty of certain offences, or suffering from any of these complaints. Therefore, as I say, that provision as to domicile in the Immigration Act is clearly directed solely to that particular purpose contemplated in the Immigration Act, and is not affected by the present bill or by the present amendment before the house. That is my first point.

The Minister of Mines and Resources went on to refer to a feeling which he stated has become prevalent throughout the country against orders in council providing for the deportation of certain Japanese citizens. Here I should like to put myself clear for the record, and for the benefit of the hon. member for New Westminster who took me to task this afternoon for supporting another amendment.

Earlier in this debate the question of the Japanese was raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. At that time I placed myself on record as favouring the implementing of the government's policy with respect to deportation of the Japanese. I did, however, declare that I felt this matter should be decided before the present bill becomes law, because if this bill becomes law the Japanese have the right to become Canadian citizens. I made that clear at the time.

If, however, the government's policy is changed, or for any other reason they do not implement that policy, and the Japanese remain in Canada, then, although I personally regard that as a mistake, as I have said we live in a democracy and presumably would have to abide by the decision of the majority. We, however, from British Columbia have asked for a fair chance first to state our case against the Japanese. If it should be decided, nevertheless, that they remain in Canada, then that decision can only be based on the fact that they are fit to become Canadian citizens, because they can be allowed to remain in Canada only if they are fit to be Canadian citizens. If, then, they stay in the country, my position would be that they must be given full rights to citizenship, much as I may disagree with the original decision to allow them to remain in the country.

Mr. REID: Even though they hold Japanese citizenship?

Mr. FULTON: That is an argument against allowing them to remain. But if the decision is to allow them to remain, then I am afraid my position is that we must give them full citizenship. That is why I supported the amendment previously suggested by the hon. member for Lake Centre as to elimination of racial distinction.

However, to return to the point made by the Minister of Mines and Resources about the feeling now being indicated in the country against this method of deportation of citizens by orders in council, let me point out that he said it would be an evil principle to admit that a man who had acquired Canadian citizenship could be deported in one year, or at any time after having acquired citizenship. I am wondering if the Minister of Mines and Resources has consulted with the Secretary of State in the matter, because if he will look at section 21 in the present bill he will find it is there provided that the governor in council may order that any person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if upon a report he is satisfied that certain conditions exist.

It is provided in the bill that the governor in council shall have power to revoke a grant of Canadian citizenship, and therefore the righteous horror of the Minister of Mines and Resources at the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Eglinton loses a great deal of its effect. If he supports the bill, that means that he wants it carried into effect as it now stands; if he supports the bill, he is supporting that very principle against which he protested, namely that the governor in council shall have the right to revoke a grant of Canadian citizenship.

Therefore I think that the Minister of Mines and Resources must either modify his opposition to the amendment offered by the hon. member for Eglinton or, at the proper time, suggest to the Secretary of State that he amend the bill by deleting section 21. I shall be most interested to see what course he follows when we come to section 21

The minister based his further argument against the present amendment on his objection to the possibility of admitting physically unfit and mentally unfit people into the country to become citizens and to become a liability upon Canada. I would point out to the minister and to other hon. members that full power will be left either to the Minister of Mines and Resources, to the Secretary of State or to whoever is administering affairs having to do with immigration, to send those people out of the country exactly as he has power now to do. It will be recalled that my first point was that nothing in the amendment involves any change to the Immigration Act, because the two acts are directed toward entirely different objects. The Immigration Act will stand and should stand as it is to-day. However, even if the minister does not accept that point, there is still ample power under section 21 of the bill to deport any person found to be suffering from certain complaints indicated, or to be guilty of certain crimes which would now render him liable to deportation under the Immigration Act.

Let me read some of the relevant parts:

> 21 (1) The governor in council may order that any person other than a natural-born Canadian citizen shall cease to be a Canadian citizen if, upon a report from the minister, he is satisfied—

Of a number of things. And one of those things is "that such person has obtained a certificate of naturalization or of Canadian citizenship by false representation or fraud or by concealment of material circumstances". I submit if it were found two years after the arrival of a person in Canada that he or she was suffering from some serious contagious disease, it could be easily established that he or she had obtained the certificate by concealment of material circumstances, if the disease existed before the arrival of the immigrant. If it did not exist at the time of arrival I should not think we would be entitled to deport, because the disease would have been contracted after the arrival in Canada. But if it is a condition which existed before arrival, then I would say that citizenship had been acquired by concealment of material circumstances. There is power in the present bill for deportation under such circumstances.

If a person is guilty of certain crimes, such as are now contemplated by the Immigration Act, then under paragraph (c) of section 21 (1) there is, again, power in the Secretary of State to revoke citizenship and provide for deportation.

There are a number of other circumstances contemplated in that section which give the right to deport undesirable immigrants. I think it is a good section. I do not share the objection of the Minister of Mines and Resources to entrusting that power to the Secretary of State. As I say, a similar power is already in existence under the Immigration Act and there is no reason to change that. We shall have a double guarantee by section 21 of the present bill. Finally, if it should happen that the clauses I have recited do not cover the specific points the minister has in mind, then it would be a simple matter to amend section 21 at the appropriate time to give specific coverage.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, we support this amendment because we do not wish to abrogate any of the attributes of Canadian citizenship which we now enjoy, and among those attributes is our status as British subjects. We do not wish to sever any ties with the empire, and they are very slender ties as ties of loyalty and affection must always be; you cannot put your finger on them and they are broken quite easily, particularly when there is a constant picking away, a pin-prick here and a pin-prick there. If that sort of thing continues, we are likely to wake up one day and find that these ties have vanished. Because we do not want that possibility to occur, we oppose with all our vigour this section of the bill as it now stands. Moreover, the fears expressed by the Minister of Mines and Resources with regard to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Eglinton can be dissolved if he will read carefully the Immigration Act, or if the Secretary of State will avail himself of the powers contained in section 21 of the present bill. For these reason I fail to see that the objections of the Minister of Mines and Resources have a great deal of validity, and I submit to the committee that it should judge on their face value the reasons advanced by the hon. member for Eglinton when he put forward this amendment.

Mr. HANSELL: I would not want this amendment to pass without saying a word or two on the matter. Like some of those who have spoken this evening, I also was born on the other side of the Atlantic ocean. However, I have spent most of my life in Canada. I appreciate the hon. member for Peel asking the minister if he would not on some future occasion give us a better and more complete picture. When the Minister of Mines and Resources was giving the details of the deportations my blood boiled. He may have been just debating a point, but he certainly was leaving an impression with me that we were taking a terrible chance in letting these people from the United Kingdom into Canada.

Mr. LESAGE: That is true.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend over there says, "That is true." I should like that to get on Hansard with his name on it.

Mr. LESAGE: Yes, of course; I do not care.

Mr. FRASER: You should be ashamed of yourself for making that statement.

Mr. LESAGE: I never will, I hope.

Mr. MacNICOL: Those are the men who fought at Dieppe and Dunkirk. They did not run away. They were not conscripted either.

Mr. HANSELL: If the minister has failed to give the committee a complete picture, then as a responsible minister he opens himself to attack by the British people themselves. I ask him to remedy the matter quickly by giving us a complete picture; otherwise I will guarantee the British press will have something to say about this.

It may be perfectly true that many of the people who came to this country were deported because of mental failure, but what was their condition when they came here? What happened during the years? There must have been a reason for their condition. I do not believe there is any greater reason for mental deficiency than stark poverty. If the minister really wants to give a true picture, let him give the committee statistics showing how many Canadian people went insane during the nineteen-thirties and how many of our young men could not be placed in category

A when they were called to arms. What was wrong with this country? That should go into the picture.

In the nineteen-thirties, when this country was abundantly wealthy, how many people were put off their farms and out of their homes and because of a stupid policy had to go into the insane asylum? Many of those people committed suicide. That also is part of the picture. Considering the real wealth that we had and the fact that people were living in poverty, I am inclined to think it was the government that was crazy.

An hon. MEMBER: The government of the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE: You mean in Alberta.

Mr. HANSELL: Yes, the government of the time.

Mr. FULTON: Members opposite were here for five years of that time.

Mr. HANSELL: I am not concerned with that; I am concerned with the fact that somebody was running the affairs of this country at the time and did not have sense enough to be able to distribute our surplus real wealth to the poor people who were faced with the insane asylum because of their stark poverty. As I say, if anybody needed to be deported for insanity it was the people who were running this country at the time.

Mr. MERRITT: I wish to say a few words before this amendment is put to the committee. A short time ago you, Mr. Chairman, attempted to put the question and I noticed that the Secretary of State did not attempt to rise to answer the hon. member for Eglinton. I think that was a significant omission on the part of the Secretary of State.

Mr. MARTIN: Give me a chance and I will.

Mr. MERRITT: The Chairman attempted to put the question and the Secretary of State did not rise to stop him. I think I am entitled to take it that the Secretary of State did not intend to make a further statement before this amendment was put if he could avoid doing so. I am interested also in what the Minister of Mines and Resources has said. Neither the Secretary of State nor the Minister of Mines and Resources has made any attempt whatever to meet the real point raised by the hon. member for Eglinton in his amendment. The whole process has been one of dragging red herrings across the path and conjuring up strawmen, as my hon. friend has said, in order to support a section of the bill which is unsupportable in this country. When the Minister of Mines and Resources added to that process by attempting to drag his red herring across the trail, I was amazed indeed. I shall deal with that as I go on.

I do not believe that section 10 is in the bill in its present form on the grounds of health at all, and I propose to prove that and I have a particular reason for doing so. I have here the Montreal Gazette of April 30, of which the heading is "Martin defends Citizenship Bill," and the sub-headings are "Replies to Critics—Rights and Privileges of British Subjects Inviolate." If that is the kind of thing that is getting into the press as a result of the minister's jumping up and down all day yesterday and to-day to protest about the rights and privileges of British subjects being held inviolate under this bill, I wish to state that I for one entirely disagree with the minister, and I want the press of this country to know there are members of this house who do not believe that the rights and privileges of British subjects are being held inviolate under this bill.

Mr. MARTIN: Name one right that is being violated by this bill.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister asks what right of citizenship is being taken away from a British subject by this bill. I would answer him—the whole thing—the whole thing—everything that citizenship means. That is what is being taken away from the British subject who enters Canada under this bill. At the present moment a British subject who has been in Canada for one year has exactly the same rights as I, a British subject who was born in Canada. He has the same right to call himself a Canadian citizen that I have, and I would say to the minister that very many of them earned that right by their service to Canada. By that service they have the same right that I have by birth. The minister cannot deny that at the moment if a British subject from outside Canada comes to this country and is willing to serve and fight for Canada he has the same right that I have. The minister cannot deny that the moment this bill is passed that British subject no longer has the same right that I have because he has not the right to call himself a Canadian citizen. That is the right he will lose, the whole right—and that is the right which I shall retain.

Mr. MARTIN: I say that he does not lose one right under this bill and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. MERRITT: I shall go on as the minister is so interested in this point. I was coming down on the train last year and another member told me a pig story. He told me that a pig in his pen had more freedom than a lot of Canadian people. He said that the pig had freedom from want because it was never denied food. It had freedom from care because all it had to do was to stay in his sty and be fed. It had freedom from rain because it was protected from the weather. When the hon. member had finished his story, I said to him, as I say to the minister, that the only thing the pig did not have, in spite of all these freedoms, was Freedom itself. That is the answer I make to the minister. It is a parallel case. So that the minister's pretence is torn aside.

I go on now to the series of other pretences which have been put up as the ostensible reasons for the wording of this section. First of all, we on this side claim that this will infringe the right of a British subject to vote. The minister said that nothing like that was intended. But he has practically admitted it. He challenged some member on this side to say that he would like to see the franchise act amended to restrict it to Canadian citizens. Well, Mr. Chairman, I cannot see any good reason, once we pass a Canadian citizenship act, why anybody but Canadian citizens should be granted the franchise; and I am prepared to say that that is one of the inevitable consequences of this bill, whether or not the Secretary of State intends at this particular moment to bring in any such amendment. Do not let us fool ourselves about this thing; it is too obvious. The Secretary of State may not do it, but somebody will do it and perhaps before very long.

Mr. MARTIN: Twenty-seven years.

Mr. MERRITT: The minister must have a copy of my notes and know what I was going to say.

The second pretence that is being advanced is the pretence that the provisions of the Immigration Act defining "Canadian domicile" have anything to do with this bill. The Immigration Act and the citizenship bill are two entirely different things. I shall not add to what the hon. member for Eglinton has said on that point except to comment that it is significant that the minister did not attempt to answer him.

The next strawman that was put up by the minister was his challenge to the hon. member for Eglinton to say that no citizen who has been granted Canadian citizenship should be deported. The minister forgot at the time he made that challenge—which the hon. member for Eglinton met by the frank statement that he would be in favour of granting the right to deport—that he had in his own bill that very provision in section 21, as has been pointed out several times. That was the next strawman to be knocked down.

I come to another thing. There has been talk as if section 10 by itself granted Canadian citizenship. Section 10 does nothing of the sort. It only provides the means by which application shall be made and the conditions under which application shall be made for the granting of citizenship. There is no reason in the world why, if my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Resources—who is so full of these bogeys that he will not admit anybody into this country anyhow—is so frightened on health grounds, he could not have the officials of the immigration branch appear in court at the time application for citizenship was made, and oppose the application if they were not satisfied with the physical or mental health of the candidate for citizenship. Even if the minister's officials did not turn up to do that, we already have in section 21 ample procedure for the revocation of a certificate. If necessary, a further subsection could be added providing that the certificate could be revoked for any of the reasons so laboriously read out by the Minister of Mines and Resources. Any government wishing to do more than pay mere lip-service to the status of British subjects, could have found procedural ways to get around procedural difficulties and procedural strawmen, which they have set up in order to support a section which strikes deeply at a status which a very large number of Canadians, although they do not talk about it a great deal, value very deeply indeed.

I have noticed that the Secretary of State several times, when the status of a British subject has been eulogized, has called loudly and vigorously, "hear, hear."

Mr. MARTIN: Because I believe in it.

Mr. MERRITT: Yes, the Secretary of State believes in it. I call upon the Secretary of State for more than lip-service to a status in which he believes.

I go on one step further. We showed good reason for differentiating between the status and the treatment of someone coming into Canada who was a British subject, and someone coming into Canada who was an alien. I am not going to restate the reason; it has been stated over and over again; and I have heard nobody on the other side claim that a British subject coming into Canada has not a start in training in our democratic methods over an alien coming into Canada. That is our stand, and it is not based on anything but a good sound reason and a good solid belief in a status which we know to be valuable, and valuable to Canada.

So I say, Mr. Chairman, that speakers on this side of the house have laid bare all the pretences and strawmen set up by the Secretary of State. I want to give now what I believe to be the real reason why the minister insists that this provision be kept in the bill and the amendment not accepted. That real reason has been stated to-night by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet. He made the following statements on two occasions. He said, "Why should not British subjects be treated as aliens?"

Mr. MacNICOL: Shame.

Mr. MERRITT: And again, when somebody raised the question of the knowledge that British subjects held of democratic rights, he said, "What about Americans?" If the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet is giving voice to beliefs held by any hon. members other than himself—and I have reason to believe, after all I have heard in this chamber, that that may be so—I wish to say that I believe the minister has listened to these arguments, and that is why the amendment is not being accepted. I say to him that he has heard the roar of the train with the hot-box as he lay dozing away in the country, and because of that roar he has failed to notice the steady murmurings of the countryside.

An hon. MEMBER: That is complicated.

Mr. MERRITT: Hon. members laugh; they do not understand what I mean. I will make it too clear for them. I will simply say that he has listened to a vocal minority and he has missed the clear feeling of the majority of people in this country. I say this too, that he has overbid the middle position in this country. We on this side of the house who believe in the status of a British subject follow the principles it upholds. We believe in evolution. We believe in freedom. I said the other day in the house that the very reason I am proud of being a British subject and that I want to remain so, is that I am perfectly free if I have that status. So that we shall go all the way in compromise with other Canadians to meet their views so long as that process is evolution; but when it becomes retrogression and when it cuts in on rights that we hold to our hearts as dearly as they hold their feelings, then we must stop; we cannot agree with views of that kind, and Canadian unity is not to be built upon that kind of foundation.

I am all for building up complete Canadianism. I am all for enlarging the status of the Canadian citizen. But that must be done and that can be done without derogating from another right which I also hold dearly. There is no reason why these rights should clash. There is no reason for this difference of views; there is nothing in it at all. A Canadian who is a British subject cannot rest content if his Canadianism is incomplete. There need be no clash, unless you want to torture yourselves over words.

I have said some things earlier in this debate upon the value of the status we are toying with so lightly and paying lip-service to, but that we are not upholding. I just wish very shortly to repeat them in principle.

The value of the status of a British subject and of the British commonwealth of nations is that, in time of trouble, although we differ often in good times, we can sink our differences and be as one to face that trouble. Another great value to us all is that it enables us to enter into negotiations with another empire country in a spirit of mutual trust, which you could not do with a foreign country. You cannot be sure of a foreign country; you can be sure that though your brother-country may disagree with you, it will never take advantage of you or knife you in the back. Finally, the status of a British subject is the status of freedom itself.

Let us talk for one second about change in status. We are British subjects; we are free; we can change our status any time we want to. So that I say yes, if your change is based on a sound principle of evolution I am with you to change it; but if your change is based on a misconception of the status, on an inferiority complex or something of that nature, if your Canadianism is so lukewarm that you doubt it when it is allied to citizenship in the British empire, if that is the motivating cause of the desire to change, then I say no; I am not with you. In this case I say that that is the motivating cause.

Canada has in this post-war world a new role and a big role. We talk a great deal, and rightly, of our new and greater place in the world. Canada, therefore, has the responsibility which goes with that power. It has a responsibility now in the task of evolving this status of a British subject and of the British commonwealth of nations. What Canada does in connection with the status she is doing not only for Canada; she is setting an example, as the Secretary of State has already said, to the British peoples in all parts of the world. Although this bill will not affect me at all, because it will not deprive me in any respect of my rights as a British subject, nevertheless I cannot see the rights of other British subjects who may come to Canada derogated from in any way that I should not like were it applied to myself. That is why I have spoken in this way. The minister has also said that the position I take is an extreme one. Let me disabuse his mind. The position I take is in no way extreme; it is the position that is taken by the great majority of the people of Canada.

We talk also of this great question of national unity in the country and no one wants it more than I do. Indeed, there is no one in Canada who does not want it and want it quickly. But I must say I am fed up with gibes directed at my status as a Canadian because I am one of those who hold the British connection, dear. Let me say to hon. members opposite, who so freely make gibes at me and my kind, that our Canadianism is not complete; that we walk in a shadow; that we are colonials, and things of that nature—that I bitterly resent these remarks. I do not reply with counter gibes, but I do say to them that Canadian unity is not to be built on any foundation such as that. I will go a long way to meet the views of any hon. gentleman in this house, but I do not see why I should have to put up with things that I consider insulting to myself. If we who value the British connection think that Canada's destiny is to take a part in the world commensurate with our greatness as a nation, and therefore we look outwards as well as inwards—outwards to the world as well as inwards on ourselves—that does not make us any less good Canadians than those who look inwards only.

May I conclude by saying that I shall await, from the Secretary of State with interest some reasonable ground upon which he can support his opposition to this amendment. But it will have to be a great deal better, if it is to convince me, than anything I have heard so far in this debate.

Mr. MARTIN: I have listened attentively to the hon. gentleman. I did not intend to take the line which I am about to follow, but I feel that in the few moments remaining before eleven o'clock I should say this. No one appreciates more than I do the character and gallantry of the hon. gentleman. No one admires him more in this house. In fact, we all admire the hon. gentleman for his gallantry. But he has no monopoly on patriotism in so far as it concerns Canada—

Mr. MERRITT: Nor does he claim it.

Mr. MARTIN: —or in so far as it concerns the feeling which all of us share of loyalty to a common crown, which is the basis of that common status which we call British subjects. Under this measure British subjects do not lose one right which they have now.

Mr. COCKERAM: They certainly do.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend says they certainly do. Let me repeat that under this bill British subjects, at the end of one year, having resided in a constituency for two months continuously, will have the right to vote. Having resided here for one year, after the passage of this bill, British subjects will be able to run for parliament. They will be eligible for civil service appointments; they will be eligible to vote. I repeat, what right under this bill is taken away from British subjects?

I should have thought that my hon. friends would have commended the government—and perhaps, too, the Secretary of State—for doing what is done in no act in any dominion in the commonwealth, namely, saying, without fear and unequivocally, in section 26—the only place where it is done in the British commonwealth—that a Canadian citizen is a British subject.

Why try to create the impression that only one group in this house has loyalty to the crown? We all have. Loyalty is not confined only to one group; it is shared by all of us. As my hon. friend spoke I reflected that I happen to be three-quarters of French descent. My wife's father's people, all came from the British isles. As a young lad I studied in the province of Quebec. My mother, a French-Canadian woman, said, "I want you to understand that Canada is a large country with many groups." As the hon. gentleman sitting right in front of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard knows, I took my university course at the university of Toronto and I studied at an English university with the view of trying to understand both sides. I cannot, therefore, sit in my place and have anyone suggest to me that I have not a full appreciation of the value of the words "British subject".

It is for that reason that, addressing myself to other hon. gentlemen in this house who take an opposite view—what I call an extreme view—I have resisted the suggestion that this bill suffers in its purposes because of the implications of section 26.

I believe that Canada is a free nation within the commonwealth, a commonwealth which, as I said last night, has been a source of good in the world and has been maintained because those who have had to do with the commonwealth have recognized that by giving personality, maturity and autonomy to its constituents it could thereby best carry on as a great force for good in the world.

This bill, instead of depriving British subjects of their rights, gives them a right which they have not to-night—documentary proof wherever they go in the world as to their national status. That is the situation.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, May 1, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

RAILWAYS, CANALS, AND TELEGRAPH LINES—FIRST REPORT

Mr. L. O. BREITHAUPT (Waterloo North) presented the first report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL

FIRST READING—SENATE BILL

Bill No. 18, for the relief of Juliana Edmonda Isabella Ferdinanda Becquaert de Beaujeu—Mr. MacLean.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—HERBERT HUGHES

Mr. FRASER:

1. Is Bert Hughes an employee of the National Film Board?
2. If so (a) what position does he hold; (b) what salary does he receive; (c) what are his duties?
3. Are there any known communists employed by the National Film Board?

Mr. CLAXTON:

1. This question presumably refers to Herbert Hughes, who is a temporary employee of the film board.

2. (a) Circulation manager; (b) $220 per month; (c) distribution and shipping of catalogues, and other similar materials.

3. No. Of course, applications for positions in the public service of Canada do not require applicants to state their political affiliations.

[Mr. Martin.]

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

VETERANS AFFAIRS—WHITEHORSE AREA

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. To what financial assistance are veterans resident in the Whitehorse area of the Yukon entitled?
2. Is approved agricultural land available for settlement by veterans in that area?
3. Is it possible for veterans to purchase property and fulfil the requirements for the erection of homes in Whitehorse?
4. What steps have been taken by the Department of Veterans Affairs to rehabilitate veterans in the Yukon territory?

POSTAL SERVICE—COMMISSIONS ON STAMP SALES

Mr. PROBE:

1. As of March 31, 1946, in what post offices in Canada is it the practice of the department to sell stamps to the public without commission being paid on such sales?
2. Are stamps sold in post offices in Canada by individuals or companies who receive commissions on such sales? If so, in what post offices and at what rate of commission or on what terms?
3. Do any persons or companies other than those selling in regular post offices receive commissions on stamp sales? If so, at what rate of commission or on what terms?
4. How many persons or companies received commissions in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, for sales as above?
5. In what general cases do the salaries or remuneration of postmasters become affected by the amount of stamp sales within their post office?
6. With respect to the persons or companies included in the terms of questions 2 and 3, in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1946, how many received commissions of (a) less than $1,000; (b) between $1,000 and $5,000; (c) more than $5,000?

ESQUIMALT NAVAL BARRACKS—CIVIC ARENA

Mr. PEARKES:

1. Has an ice hockey arena been authorized for the Royal Canadian Naval Barracks at Esquimalt, British Columbia?
2. If so, what is the estimated cost of this building?
3. Has construction commenced?
4. If so, have any priorities for building materials been granted?
5. Have any requests been received for permission to construct a civic ice arena in Victoria?
6. If so, have building permits been granted or refused for the construction of a civic arena?
7. If refused, for what reason?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

WHITE PASS AND YUKON RAILWAY

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of any agreement or agreements under which the White Pass and Yukon Railway acquired properties in the Whitehorse and Yukon territories.

NAVAL HAUL-UP SLIP, ANDERSON'S POINT, N.S.

Mr. GILLIS:

For a copy of any agreement entered into between the Sydney Engineering and Dry Dock Company and the Department of Munitions and Supply or the Department of Reconstruction, with respect to the operation of the naval haul-up slip at Anderson's Point, Cape Breton, Nova Scotia.

RADIO BROADCASTING — PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS AND CROWN COMPANIES

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of all correspondence, reports and recommendations exchanged between the Department of Transport, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and any provincial governments, regarding the ownership of radio stations by provincial crown companies or by provincial governments.

Mr. McCANN: In view of the fact that a committee on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been set up I would suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that this motion be withdrawn. The information which he seeks can be brought out to a better advantage when the committee is sitting.

Mr. COLDWELL: The radio committee may not sit for some time; therefore it would be a few weeks before the information would be available. I am anxious to get it as soon as possible; therefore I should be glad if the house would pass the motion.

Mr. McCANN: In any event it would be necessary to receive the consent of the provinces that the information be given. I oppose the motion on the ground that it is not the practice to produce in the house correspondence between the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which is a separate corporation, and other agencies.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister has said that this is a separate corporation. Is it?

Mr. McCANN: That is what I say.

Mr. GRAYDON: If it is a separate corporation, has there been any change with respect to its employees being allowed to organize a union? I understand that in the past they were not allowed to organize, on the ground that the corporation was connected with the government. It cannot be both. The government cannot blow hot and cold with respect to the corporation. Either it is a separate corporation or it is a department of government.

Mr. McCANN: I have no knowledge of a desire on the part of the employees of the corporation to organize a union, and therefore I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question. I take the position which has been taken in this house before, that since the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is a separate corporation, correspondence between it and other agencies is not producible in the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope the minister will obtain the permission of the provincial governments as soon as possible. I should like to point out also that this is a practice that has crept in in recent years. Formerly permission was regarded as necessary where the correspondence was with governments of other countries; now it is the governments of the provinces as well.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

EQUALIZING OF OPPORTUNITY—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO PROVINCES

Mr. F. S. ZAPLITNY (Dauphin) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration ways and means of equalizing educational opportunity across this dominion and granting financial assistance to the various provinces for this purpose.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move this resolution I am doing something with which I am sure a great many members of this house agree. Since this resolution first appeared on the order paper some time ago, a large number of hon. members as well as others outside the house have expressed interest in it. I hope therefore that what I have to say and what other hon. members may have to say on the resolution will be carefully considered by the government with a view to doing something about it when the debate is ended.

I should like to present a few reasons why I consider the matter of education and the question of federal aid to education to be among the most vital issues before us to-day.

Education is practically synonymous with civilization. If we read history we realize that in some ways education must be considered older than civilization itself, because had it not been for education, whether in an organized or in an incidental form, no civilization would have been possible.

I ask the house to give consideration to the fact that education is in the modern world one of the chief sources of power. We talk about natural sources of power, about solar and other varieties of energy. If it were not for organized education over the years it would not have been possible for us to enjoy the benefits of the natural energy which we have developed. Any of us who read history at all realize that the discovery of steam power, of electrical energy, of the internal combustion engine, and—more recently—atomic energy, has been possible, not because somebody merely stumbled on the discovery, as we are sometimes erroneously led to believe, but because people skilled in science and research have, over a number of years, done work which they would not have been able to do had they not had the advantages of education.

Let me refer again to atomic energy. Most of us who read about it in the first instance might have had the idea that some bearded recluse, playing around with test tubes in his laboratory, stumbled across a startling discovery and so we had the atomic bomb. Of course we know that that is not so. It took the scientific experts not of one country but of several allied countries together, with a whole staff of trained men working for a long time and spending millions of dollars on equipment, before they, working as a team, came to the conclusion that the atom was divisible.

I would also ask hon. members to realize that education is so important that the race is actually between education and disaster in the future of the world. All we have to do is glance at the headlines each day to realize that there is grave danger of world conflict at almost any moment. Once again we are, so to speak, sitting on a powder keg; and in my view only through education can the peoples of the world solve their problems and face up to their great opportunities.

We must have education in order to solve our problems of the future—and we have great opportunities, because if we can apply the knowledge we have gained during the course of the war, especially in the discovery of new forms of power; if we can learn to control the power which we have discovered and developed, we shall be the masters of our destiny. But if we allow these new forms of power to control us; if we allow these new methods of destruction to gain mastery over us, the future of the world will be black indeed.

Some people will say that there is organized education all over the world, that the people of to-day are not as ignorant as the people of one hundred or even fifty years ago. Perhaps that is so, literally speaking, but comparatively speaking I would say that we are as ignorant to-day in relation to the complexity of our environment as was primitive man in relation to the comparative simplicity of his environment. We sometimes laugh when we read about the centuries it took primitive man to discover that by rubbing two sticks of wood together he could create fire. We have since learned how to create fire in all its forms, and yet we have not learned to use it without burning our fingers.

I say, therefore, that in the interest of the future of civilization itself we must turn our attention more and more to education as our hope. We can make out of atomic energy either a utopia or a Frankenstein's monster. If we can so train ourselves and so train future generations of children that they can put atomic energy to use for peaceful purposes and the happiness of mankind, we shall have created a utopia or something very much like it. If on the other hand that skill and that knowledge are not there, then we may have created something which will devour us in the end.

Someone may ask why it is I express such concern about the present state of education. We may think that the educational system we have in Canada at present is adequate. It is certainly something better than we had years ago, but I would quote, from "Canada 1946", the official report on the state of education as the department responsible for this report sees it. These are not my words. They will be found at page 204 of "Canada 1946":

> The Canadian Teachers Federation reported that, using the criteria of cost per pupil, no progress was made during the sixteen years ended in 1942. Teachers' salaries, which form a considerable percentage of this, began to increase after the outbreak of war but until 1943 rose no more proportionately than the increase measured by the cost of living. Since that time several of the provinces have increased their minimum salary standard and while none as yet has reached the mark set by the C.N.E.A., Saskatchewan's minimum of $1,200 for teachers with permanent certificates and $1,000 for others is a long way from the $400 or less received by highly qualified experienced teachers in the middle 1930's.

The significant fact there stated is that, according to the Canadian Teachers Federation, an organization that should know, and does know, no progress has been made in relation to cost per pupil in the last sixteen years ending in 1942, which means that if the cost of education has risen, if teachers' salaries have risen, it has been only in proportion to the cost of living all round, and we are not proportionately any better off so far as the educational system is concerned.

I wish to turn now to an analysis of the present position in dollars and cents. The figures I will use are for comparative purposes only, and do not mean that what I am going to propose has to be carried out to the letter.

Mr. LaCROIX: Is the hon. member aware of the fact that education, according to our constitution, is entirely under the control of the provinces?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I am aware of that, and in due course I will answer the hon. member's question. I shall be glad to deal with it as I go on. According to a survey report of the Canada and Newfoundland Education Association, 1943, we were spending at that time $146 million on education in this country. We cannot say that this is either adequate or inadequate without reference to the recommendations of the committee in that respect. They recommended that an annual increase of $144 million be made, which is almost double what was spent at that time, and in addition they recommended that a capital expenditure of $59 million be made in order to improve buildings, equipment, facilities and so on, making a total increase of $203 million. If we add that to the $146 million spent at that time, it comes to $349 million.

As I say, I am not using these figures because I am asking the government to spend any specific amount of money, but rather as a comparison to see what the position is. It means that if we work it out on the basis of the Canadian population, estimated roughly at twelve million, we have a per capita of $29, which would answer the recommendation of the Canada and Newfoundland Education Association.

The reason I quote these figures is to show what it would take in the way of financing by the provinces, the municipalities and the federal government to implement the report of the C.N.E.A. Out of the $29 per capita, how much is the federal government proposing to spend in the financing of education at the present time? The only source from which I can get figures in that respect is the dominion proposals to the provinces in connection with the dominion-provincial conference, which appear at page 46 of the brief. All members, I believe, have the brief.

With the exception of special training given in connection with rehabilitation, the dominion proposes these sums of money to the provinces, if an agreement is reached. First of all there is a lump sum of $85,000. I would not say that is a ridiculous figure, but I do not know how it got in there; perhaps it is a left-over from some benevolent fund. That $85,000 is to be spent in this way: $5,000 to Prince Edward Island and $10,000 to each of the other eight provinces. However, it gets better as it goes along. There is an amount of $1,915,000 to be allotted annually to the provinces on the basis of the number of youth in the age group of fifteen to nineteen in each province. There is a capital allotment of $10 million to be used for putting up buildings and getting equipment in connection with vocational training. This is on the basis of vocational and technical training, none of it being earmarked for elementary or public school education.

This works out to a total of $12 million proposed by the dominion to the provinces if an agreement is reached. Going back to the per capita figure of $29, it means that the dominion is proposing to spend one dollar per capita out of the $29 that needs to be spent in order to provide even a modest and reasonable standard of education in the country, which leaves $28 out of the $29 per capita to be raised by the provinces and the municipalities.

How is this amount to be raised, and in what proportions? According to figures I have from the bureau of statistics for 1941, the latest I could get in this respect, the municipalities were raising 83·3 per cent on school finance, and the provinces 16·7. From the figures I am using for illustration purposes it can easily be seen that under the present proposals of the dominion government to the provinces, and under the present system of financing education in this country, the municipalities will still have to carry the heaviest burden. Then come the provinces, and after that the dominion, whose costs will be very light in comparison. I myself cannot see how this can be done under the present set-up. If the proposals of the dominion to the provinces were implemented I do not believe that even a minimum standard of education could be attained in Canada without much greater contributions by the dominion government.

So much for the present financial situation. The resolution calls for equality of educational opportunity in Canada. This is the theme to which I want to devote most of my time today. No one will argue with me when I say that unless we have equal opportunity in education, and an equal standard of education, or come as closely as we can to it, all talk of national unity is futile. Last night we heard a great deal from all sides of the house about the need for national unity. Unless we can first get equality of opportunity in the field of education across this dominion, we shall not reach the stage of national unity which we all desire.

I wish to place on record a few tables of statistics which will bear out my contention that the opportunities for education across Canada are anything but equal at the present time. To save the time of the house I am going to ask for consent to place the tables in Hansard without going through them in detail.

The first table to which I should like to refer deals with the expenditures per child between the ages of five and nineteen by provinces, which is referred to in this report as the expenditures per unit. It will be seen from the table that the amount ranges from $14.29 in Prince Edward Island to $49.61 in British Columbia. Approximately three times as much is spent in British Columbia as is spent in Prince Edward Island. These are the two extremes.

Now let us take three geographical areas for purposes of comparison. If we take the maritime provinces as a unit we find, according to the 1941 figures, which are the latest ones I could obtain, that $21 per child is spent. If we take the prairie provinces as a unit we find they are spending $33 per child. Ontario and British Columbia as a unit are spending $46.50 per child. The Canadian average is $33 per child. How does this compare with the recommendation of the Canada and Newfoundland Educational Association? Their recommendations work out to $67 per child. In other words we shall have to spend $67 per child throughout the dominion if we are to attain even a reasonable standard of education. At the time to which I have referred we were spending approximately $33, which means that we shall almost have to double our expenditure for education if we are to reach the standard recommended.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to place the tables on Hansard?

Mr. COTE (Verdun): Would the hon. gentleman tell us the source from which he obtained these tables?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: This table is taken from the report by Professor K. F. Argue, presented to the national convention of the Canadian Teachers' Federation in 1945. The table is as follows:

Expenditure per child (ages 5-19)

By provinces: 1941

Prince Edward Island	$14 29
Nova Scotia	22 70
New Brunswick	19 74
Quebec	22 86
Ontario	46 87
Manitoba	35 37
Saskatchewan	32 85
Alberta	39 41
British Columbia	49 61

Comparison of three areas:

Maritimes	21 00
Prairie provinces	33 00
Ontario and British Columbia	46 50
Canadian average	33 00
Amount recommended by Canada-Newfoundland Education Association	67 00

The next table to which I want to refer is one that shows that there is not only a difference between the amounts spent, and consequently a variation in standards of education from province to province, but also a difference between urban and rural centres. Those of us who come from rural areas will agree that almost without exception the opportunities for education in rural Canada leave very much to be desired. Indeed that is an understatement. Here are some figures which will show that the opportunities and facilities for education in the higher brackets, namely, high school and universities, are much greater in urban centres than in rural areas. The table gives a comparison of boys by age groups across Canada. These figures were also taken from the Argue report:

Attendance: urban and rural. 1941.

Boys by age groups:

	Rural per cent	Urban per cent
13	93	97
14	75	94
15	52	81
16	33	59
17	19	39
18	12	25

The figure of 16 per cent is not a high one, and leaves much to be desired; but it is more than twice as high in the urban centres as in the rural areas. It means that out of every one hundred boys who started school, only seven were still in school by the time they had reached nineteen. This is a serious state of affairs. We who come from the rural areas know something about the reasons why so many boys and girls leave school at the age of fourteen or fifteen. I have had some practical experience in teaching. There are two chief reasons for this situation. One of them is that in the rural areas, especially throughout western Canada, there are no high school facilities for teaching these children unless their parents are in a financial position to send them to a town of considerable size where they can attend high school, which incurs expenditures greater than the parents are able to afford. The second reason is that where there are facilities for high school education in small towns they usually consist of a two-room school, with all the grades from grade 9 to 11 in one room and from grade 1 to 8 in the other. The high school teacher is obliged to handle all grades from grade 9 to 11, and sometimes from grade 8 to 11. Therefore it is physically impossible to offer the variety of courses to fit the needs and desires of the students who are attending school. I have seen boys and girls of fourteen years of age leaving school because the talents with which they are gifted or the abilities which they possess cannot be satisfied in a school which offers only one course of education. This lack of variety, this lack of something to satisfy their intellectual appetites, causes them to become disinterested. They leave school not because they have not intelligence. Perhaps they have more than the average intelligence in certain lines, but the courses offered lack variety. Everybody has not the same intellectual appetite, and these students do not wish to take what is offered.

In my twelve years of experience in teaching I have seen young people who were practically geniuses being driven away from school because of the fact we had nothing to offer them to keep up their interest. You cannot offer a potential electrician a course in history and expect him to like it. It is not up his alley. On the other hand, you may have a budding diplomat, and if you make him do mathematics two or three hours a day he is not going to try to carry on.

I have another set of figures to which I wish to refer, and I am going to ask the consent of the house to put them on Hansard in order to save time. This refers to the variation and inequality in salaries across the dominion. I do not think anyone will deny that if we want to have a high standard of education we must, first of all, have a high standard of teaching personnel. There are several reasons why people who might otherwise become good teachers, either leave the teaching profession, or go somewhere else rather than make any effort to enter that profession.

In this connection let me quote from the report of the reconstruction committee of the Canadian Teachers' Federation. This report contains a significant paragraph as to the quality of teachers which, in the opinion of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, we should have. They state:

> The status of the teaching profession must be raised to the level where it will attract into the profession young men and young women of the very best character and ability in such numbers as to allow for a careful selection of those to be trained as teachers, on the basis of health, leadership, character and other outstanding qualities of mind and heart, as well as on the basis of academic standing of at least one year of post-secondary study.

That is asking for a fairly high standard, but it is not at all too high. I am one who considers education so important that we cannot overemphasize the quality of teaching personnel. But if we are exacting that type of teaching personnel, if we are asking for that type of teachers, then we must be prepared to pay for it. The following table, from the bureau of statistics, which I mentioned earlier in my observations, will serve to show the way in which we have been paying for it:

Median salaries of Teachers, 1944
By provinces: Rural

	More than one room	one room
Prince Edward Island	$598	$538
Nova Scotia	730	580
New Brunswick	774	612
Ontario	1,204	1,021
Manitoba	996	843
Saskatchewan	955	902
Alberta	1,176	996
British Columbia	1,250	1,007

A mere glance at these figures will show that in none of the provinces is the schedule of teachers' salaries anywhere near where it should be. Indeed, in some of the maritime provinces the salaries are such that it is impossible for the teachers to maintain any adequate standards of academic attainments; in fact it makes it difficult to make a living. I could probably say much more about the position in which teachers have found themselves for many years; but I shall refrain from doing so, since the time at my disposal is passing by.

Having given those figures, having shown the lack of equality in opportunity across the dominion, and having proven, I suggest, that there is a need for the federal government to enter the field of financing education, I should like to place upon the record the stand taken in this connection by certain organizations and individuals.

What is the stand of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, a body which is in a position to speak for teachers in this dominion? In a letter dated July 23, 1945, addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Canadian Teachers' Federation said this in part:

> The plain truth is that education can never be raised to the status that it should occupy in a democratic society unless the dominion government provides the necessary money by liberal grants on the basis of need.

And that is "liberal" with a small "l".

Mr. GRAYDON: That is taken for granted.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I should like also to quote a resolution passed by the national convention of the Canadian Teachers' Federation in 1945. This is recent, and puts the organization clearly on the record. This is what they say:

Whereas important aspects of federal-provincial finance are to be decided at the present dominion-provincial conference; and
Whereas the matter of federal aid to education is considered to be one of the most important of these;
Be it resolved that we urge the federal and provincial representatives at this conference to see that the matter is included in their discussions with a view to implementing some such scheme in order to assure all Canadian children an adequate standard of education.

Surely this sets out their stand clearly and unequivocally; there can be no quibbling as to the position of this great body of teachers.

Where do the political organizations in this country stand? I am fortunate in having before me excerpts from statements made by the leaders of three of the parties, and by one of the ministers of the government. I shall begin by quoting the leader of my own group, in a statement he made in May, 1945. Here are his words:

Education is a matter of concern for Canada as a whole; not for a community or a province only. And next, and equally important, there is implied the recognition that the resources of the provincial governments are insufficient to undertake all the educational activities that modern requirements of peace and war demand.

That makes it clear where we in this group stand in the matter of federal financial aid to education. I now come to the then leader of the opposition, the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon). Here are his words—and I wonder if he will recognize them to-day:

The ability to pay affects the whole problem of equal opportunity. The answer lies in federal aid for education.

I believe this sets out his attitude quite clearly. If it does not he will have an opportunity of setting the record straight.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is anybody arguing against that?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Not at all. I am just leaving it open, in the case the hon. member wishes to say something.

Mr. GRAYDON: Perhaps the hon. member does not like me to think in that way; but I do.

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I now come to the leader of the Social Credit party, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low). Here are his words.

Equality of educational opportunity is desirable and, therefore, substantial federal grants should be made to the provinces.

I think that is clear, and the hon. member nods his head in agreement.

I come now to the government side of the house, and quote these words from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton) who, I assume, speaks for the government in this respect:

But the constitution does not prevent the federal government from giving substantial assistance to education.

I hope the hon. member who interrupted me earlier will take that to heart, because those are the words of a minister in the government he supports. I believe these quotations place upon the record as fairly as it can be done the attitude taken by the various political parties in the house, taken, significantly enough, in May, 1945. It will be recalled that there was an election in June of that year. I have no reason to believe that any one of these gentlemen has taken a different position since then; therefore I have nothing but the highest confidence that, when the time comes, each of them will rise in support of this resolution.

In the time left at my disposal I should like to answer two possible objections to the proposal I made. One of those objections, which was implied in a question asked by an hon. member opposite, is that of provincial autonomy. I was asked whether I was aware that, according to the constitution, education is under the jurisdiction of the provinces. I answered that I was well aware of that, and may I point out that a careful reading of my resolution will show that I am not asking the federal government to take over the administration of education in this country. That is not suggested in the resolution, or in anything I have said to-day. What I am asking for, and what all the leaders of the various groups and one of the ministers of the government have agreed upon, is that the federal government should make substantial grants to the provinces to make it possible for the provinces to finance education properly. I hope that will clear up any misunderstanding which may exist in the minds of hon. members. This resolution does not suggest that the federal government should administer education.

Mr. LaCROIX: Is the hon. member adding the words, "Without any control from the federal government, so far as expenses are concerned?"

Mr. ZAPLITNY: Although I thought I had made myself clear, for the benefit of the hon. member may I repeat that I am not suggesting that the federal government take over the administration of education. My resolution calls for a substantial federal grant to the provinces, to be used as the provinces see fit.

Mr. LaCROIX: Without any control?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: I think I have made it clear.

The other objection which may be raised, and it is one of the stock objections, is the matter of cost. There are those who will throw up their hands in despair and say that this will cost too much. I do not deny that it will cost money, and a great deal of money because if we are to obtain quality we must pay the price. But let me assure the house that if we want to make the safest possible investment in the future of this country there is no safer or more gilt-edged security than the education of the growing children of Canada. It is impossible for us to overspend in this respect. What I have said earlier in my address should, I think, bear out the fact that for every dollar spent in this way we shall get hundreds, perhaps thousands, of dollars of value in the future. I ask hon. members to use their imaginations to the extent of realizing that we are now standing on the threshhold of a great opportunity. We have discovered through our scientific efforts the sources of power of which we never dreamed before. All we need to do now is to control those powers and direct them into the proper channels, and then we shall have in the future a veritable paradise in this country. I have no apologies to make and no hesitation in recommending to the government, with all the vehemence I can gather, the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. HANSELL: If I may ask the hon. member a question because I do not expect to participate in this debate, I fancy that what has bothered some hon. members, judging by the interruptions, is the same question that is bothering me. I agree that we should seek financial aid from the federal government, but can my hon. friend throw some light on this question? Can we expect the federal government to give financial aid to the provinces without the federal government expecting to have something to say as to how the money is to be used?

Mr. ZAPLITNY: It is quite possible that the federal government may make certain recommendations to the provinces as to the best possible way in which the money could be spent, but I would point out that it is not necessary for the federal government to go into the fiield in which the provinces are now operating. The federal government, without interfering with what the provinces are doing, could spend large sums of money for erecting buildings and in purchasing equipment and in paying for teacher training which the provinces are in need of to-day.

Mr. HANSELL: That is a good answer.

Mr. BONA ARSENAULT (Bonaventure): (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) on his very able presentation of this resolution; however, the fact remains that were this motion to be adopted by the house, it would, in my estimation, constitute a serious threat to provincial autonomy, with regard to education. The resolution is worded as follows:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration ways and means of equalizing educational opportunity across this dominion and granting financial assistance to the various provinces for this purpose.

Such a resolution constitutes a threat to our provincial rights in matters pertaining to education. It does not say what sort of education it is intended to equalize across the Dominion. Does it refer to primary, secondary or postgraduate teaching? We do not know. But in its very vagueness, the resolution constitutes a threat, and it is up to the representatives from the Province of Quebec, from the French speaking settlements of Ontario, New Brunswick, the western provinces, and other parts of this country, to ward off this intrusion of the federal government in the field of education.

Section 93 of the British North America Act grants the provincial legislatures exclusive rights in matters of education and teaching, so that the hon. member for Dauphin has presented his resolution in defiance of our constitution, in defiance of the greatest chapters in the history of French Canada, of those heroic struggles which our compatriots have had to wage in Ontario, New Brunswick, western Canada and elsewhere, on matters with regard to which there can be no compromise.

Those who, in this period of unrest, take pleasure in gnawing at the confederation agreement of 1867, may as well know that the French-speaking members of this house are ready to take up the challenge.

We want none of this federal centralization in matters pertaining to education.

I would not be surprised that this apparently harmless motion would be but the beginning of a great manoeuvre launched by the partisans of centralization in Canada, to deprive us of our educational rights and aim a blow at provincial autonomy in that respect.

As lately as October last, at their annual convention, held in Quebec City, the Canadian Congress of Labour put forward the following proposal:

> That a standard educational programme be drawn up by the federal government and implemented by the municipalities.

When one is aware of the present tendencies within neutral labour unions, the suggested surrendering of the educational field to the Federal government, in defiance of our constitution, is not at all surprising.

But when a member of Parliament, the member of party represented in this house, one whose attitude is often so typically Canadian and who is therefore discreetly admired by a great number of his colleagues, puts forward a proposal which would have such a centralizing effect on the field of education, we have reason to be thoughtful, particularly when this member's party could well constitute, before very long, His Majesty's official opposition in this house. To those who might think that this approach to this important question is peculiar to the members from Quebec or to the French-speaking members of the other parts of the country, may I say that at the last meeting of the Canadian Newfoundland Education Association, held in Toronto in October 1945, the director of education for Ontario, Mr. Althouse, stated that the provincial autonomy in matters of education was not only a provincial right but a national asset.

Certain provinces, he added, due to financial difficulties, would gladly accept the federal government's intervention by way of grants, but other provinces, including Quebec, do not want any such grants as their acceptance would imply a recognition of the dominion government's rights in educational matters.

Not only did the director of education for Ontario admit the exclusive right of the provinces in educational matters but he also recognized its practical value from a strictly Canadian standpoint.

Further, on February 13 last, the hon. Wilfrid Bovey, who sits in the legislative council, and is a member of the Canadian Association for Adult Education, a recognized authority in educational matters, after lauding the teaching standards in the province of Quebec, made the following statement in the Quebec legislature:

> I have been told that our third party proposes to establish a dominion department of education. I do not believe in the centralization of education. I believe in a maximum of decentralization. I believe that the principles recognized in the province of Quebec are sound. If the day comes—and I think it will come—when the dominion government increases sharply its grants for educational purposes, we must make sure that we do not sacrifice our academic freedom for financial considerations.

Personally, I am convinced that in educational matters we would lose this freedom to the extent that we accept such grants.

In a questionnaire submitted to the Prime Minister, which was published in Maclean's of February 1, 1946, the following question was asked:

> Do you believe that the dominion government should play a larger part in education?

And the Prime Minister replied:

> Under the Canadian constitution, education is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. Therefore the dominion government must not in any way interfere in matters within the purview of the provinces. But the central authority should help the latter to make greater educational facilities available (1) by concluding financial agreements which would enable the provinces better to meet the cost of education; (2) by granting financial assistance towards vocational training, scientific research, educational training of servicemen, etc.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the stand taken by the Prime Minister of this country, that is the policy of the Liberal government, the policy which should be endorsed by all Canadians respectful of confederation and of the exclusive rights of provinces in educational matters. We are against any direct Dominion cooperation which would inevitably result in a more or less rigid control by the central authority in this sphere which, under our constitution, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces.

And this question offers a special importance to the province of Quebec to which rights have been specifically guaranteed by the constitution.

Do you realize where the direct interference of the dominion government in educational matters might lead at a time when not a single dominion deputy minister is French-speaking and when most of the key positions in the dominion civil service are held by people who are undoubtedly well intentioned but who are neither of our tongue nor of our faith.

In Quebec, the educational system is placed on a non-political basis. This province has no minister of Education, but a department of Public education represented in the legislature by the provincial Secretary. The Superintendent of Public education of the province of Quebec has two secretaries as assistants, one French speaking and the other English speaking, and all the powers in the educational field are vested in the Superior council of public education with the superintendent as ex-officio chairman. This council is comprised of two committees, one with a Catholic membership and the other composed of Protestants and they hold separate meetings. Each committee has the same number of members and administers, independently from the other, all educational matters falling under its jurisdiction. Besides, in every community with a protestant minority, this minority is entitled to form its own school board.

Some provinces should draw inspiration from this time-honoured system which is perfectly satisfactory to the various racial and religious groups and leaves no room for provincial, and much less federal, political interference of the kind suggested by the hon. member for Dauphin.

Education is probably the Canadian activity that has been the most difficult to establish on a sound basis. At any rate, no other has required more sacrifices and heroism. In Quebec, but more especially in the French speaking districts of Ontario, New Brunswick and the Western provinces, it has required the best that could be recruited in intelligence, devotedness, courage, self-denial and perseverance of a racial group feeling that it had a religious and intellectual mission to fulfil; of a racial group that has so far proudly discharged its duty and has entrusted to the French-speaking members of this house especially, the imperative duty of fighting every attempt at absorption and every infringement of our rights, especially in the field of education.

I will no doubt be permitted to add with Mgr. Camille Roy that:

"Compared to the other provinces of the Canadian confederation, the province of Quebec has indeed nothing to envy from the points of view of its institutions, its general intellectual culture, or the special value of its leading classes."

Of this, I need no better proof than the acknowledged excellence of the young French speaking representatives sitting in this house since the opening of the present Parliament.

The provinces have already accepted indirect help from the federal authorities in extra-scholastic fields such as scholarships, professional and technical training which had become imperative, it was claimed, as a result of war.

Because of this fact, the supporters of centralization will no doubt invoke the classical argument of precedent to insist from now on, on a direct participation in school activities, which we shall oppose to the limit of our strength. This is the reason for which we oppose the motion of the hon. member for Dauphin, which, we hope, will be defeated by the house.

(Text):

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): Mr. Speaker, I desire to participate in this discussion only briefly. I am prompted to do so by the fact that for a good many years I have taken a keen interest in the subject brought before the house by this resolution, and also because during the course of the debate the mover of the resolution (Mr. Zaplitny) mentioned my position with respect to federal aid to the provinces. I would recall to your mind, Mr. Speaker, that in October, 1943, at a convention in the province of Quebec of teachers' associations there, a comprehensive discussion with respect to education generally was participated in by three of the political parties: the party to which the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny), the mover of the resolution, gives allegiance; the party of the then parliamentary assistant to the Prime Minister, now the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Claxton); and the party represented by myself. That forum provided an interesting opportunity to discuss in some detail the approaches of the various parties to the subject of education. Because of the fact that the leader of the C.C.F., Mr. Claxton and myself are all federal men, the question of federal and provincial jurisdiction naturally formed a subject of discussion. To-day I only want to confirm and in some respects to reiterate and repeat the position which I took then and which I hope I shall always take with respect to this matter, namely that we must base all our discussions about education on the firm and solid foundation that, though we discuss the matter in the dominion parliament, it falls directly and completely within the purview and jurisdiction of the provincial governments. That, I think, must be our first approach. While the hon. member for Dauphin spoke of it later in his speech, I should like to make it the foundation upon which any arguments I shall advance will be built.

I was interested in the interruption and intervention of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), who raised a question which is probably in the minds of most people who have given some study to the subject of education and how it shall be financed. I thought there was some merit in the question he raised. I have only one concern with respect to federal aid to education, and I believe it is profoundly shared by most hon. members. In seeking federal aid for education we must bear in mind that when it is forthcoming it must be subject to complete safeguards that the giving of money shall not be used as a big stick over provincial governments to impose upon them the will of the dominion concerning education, or anything else. I therefore preface my remarks by saying that when aid is sought, or when it is suggested that the government should consider the whole problem of giving aid to the provinces in matters of education, in whatever aid is given both the letter and the spirit of the constitution with respect to the safeguarding of education for the provinces shall be observed. That is one of the planks upon which we must stand in connection with dominion aid to education. I am one of the last in this house—and I think I have plenty of company in other parties—who would consent to any rigid standardization or uniformity of the educational system, because in a country with such varied interests as Canada it just cannot be done. We have to consider our Canadian problems in the light of the conditions in which we as a nation find ourselves, and work upon that basic ground as best we can to make a good job out of the situation as we find it.

That viewpoint, however, does not lead me, and I hope it does not lead either the country or this parliament, to the conclusion that we as a federal parliament must neither discuss nor deal with the question of education across Canada. There are many ways in which the safeguards I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks can appropriately be applied and at the same time we can still do a great deal as a dominion parliament.

What the hon. member for Dauphin said a few moments ago with respect to educational opportunities is perfectly true. I feel keenly in this matter because, like many others in this house, I was born and raised in a country district, where we had to go two and a half miles to and from school morning and night, where the conveniences were quite different from those available in urban places or, for that matter, in many rural districts nowadays. As one moves on and takes a place in the business, industrial, professional or agricultural life of the country, one realizes how important it is to have a good educational system. More than that, geography and finance must not be the sole yardsticks by which the amount of education in this or any other country is to be measured. My conviction in that respect comes from the depths of an experience which many of us have had who originated in the rural districts of Canada. For that reason it seems to me that the boy or the girl in the remote hinterlands of Canada is just as great an asset to the country and should be developed in the same degree as the person who was born under more favourable geographical and financial circumstances. I would go farther; as far as that aspect of the problem is concerned I believe there is a responsibility resting upon the dominion parliament, subject to the safeguards and to the jurisdictional questions which I have mentioned, to give opportunities to people who, because of such circumstances as I have indicated, are now denied those opportunities. I remember very well making this statement in October, 1943, at the forum to which I was referring a few moments ago:

> While the cost of education is not necessarily the only measure of educational value, at the same time it may well serve and sometimes does serve as an index of educational facilities.

There is one matter I wish to touch upon, and my remarks this afternoon are not planned; they come to my mind as I approach a subject in which we are all interested.

Mr. MARTIN: From the heart.

Mr. GRAYDON: Well, that is perhaps the fact. We talk about schools as being the only element in education, but there are two other important factors that should be considered. I know that the hon. member for Dauphin is a very distinguished leader in his own profession; and I must be careful, too, when I discuss the teaching profession, especially when I recollect that early in life I came under the influence and control of a young lady who is now my wife and who was for a few years in that profession. I have, therefore, a wholesome regard and respect for the authority and influence of that great profession. I would say, however, that there are two other important factors to be taken into account, namely, the home and the church. Let us not always assume that all the educational facilities in the country are provided by the primary and secondary schools or by any other type of school. They certainly do a great work and anything I say must not be regarded at all as a reflection upon them. I do not believe, however, that the schools can do a good job—and I say this with a firm conviction—unless they form part of a great team in which the home and the church are important partners.

I believe that the greatest citizens in Canada have been trained for citizenship and to take their part in the future of this country in this three-way partnership that I have mentioned—the home, the church and the school. I am going to express a purely personal opinion which I have stated before in private. Perhaps there is no harm in repeating it in the House of Commons. I have sometimes wondered whether we are not organized to the point where we have become overorganized as a society. And in this I have not education in mind.

People are planning so hard and comprehensively to live better that they themselves have scarcely the time to live. So that instead of placing the emphasis upon the objective they place it upon the method. The result is that the objective comes in for secondary consideration. I hope that in our education, as in other matters, the objective will not be lost sight of in the maze of organization which is so often essential if that objective is to be attained.

I do not know what my colleagues in the house have found in the ramifications of their experience, but my opinion is this. The skill of the mind is an important matter, but let us also remember that there is a skill of the hand; and if we build up in this country only those who are skilled in brains, skilled in mind, and disregard the skilled hand of the manual labourer, we shall not have the balanced type of activity, the balanced population, which in my opinion is essential to the well-being and the advancement of a great Canadian community.

I have seen, as no doubt many other hon. members have seen, well educated men and women who have not been able to make their full contribution to society and to lead a fuller life. This is something I have discussed many times before, though I am not sure whether I have mentioned it in the house However, I shall do so this afternoon. I refer to the industrious man—or the woman —who is endowed not merely with a good brain or with skilful hands but with a well developed fund of common sense. Such a man or woman is a great asset, an important factor in making a full contribution to the Canadian community and to Canadian affairs generally.

Education is a broad topic with many ramifications, and much as I should like to philosophize on the subject this afternoon I must hurry on to one or two points I have in mind. I do not think we always plan our education as well as we might. I know this is strictly a provincial matter, but I do not think there is any harm in mentioning it here because it applies to all the provinces. I suggest that we do not always educate our men and women for the callings for which they are best fitted. The selective type of education seems to me to be of vast importance in the days that lie ahead. This nation has a population of eleven and a half millions and it cannot afford to waste many of those people by educating men and women for the wrong jobs. For that reason I hope that as time goes on, in the various educational movements in Canada, we shall eliminate as far as possible the round pegs in square holes, as we have tried to do in other directions. I say that because there is no reason why a man who is capable of developing manual skill should not have just as high a place of prestige and standing in any community in Canada as the man who is skilled in brains and mind. That is the kind of balanced community I should like to see in this country. I should like to see people educated along the lines for which they are best fitted. It is a waste of education, a waste of money, if we follow any other course, because every time a man or woman is turned out of one of our universities there is a substantial public investment in that person. Because there is a public investment in every one of them the public has some right to see that the money has been spent in the proper places, as is done in other investments that the people make. That, I hasten to point out, is another personal view. I felt that this was the forum which gave me the opportunity to express it. I believe in the selective form of education which is being utilized in some provinces, perhaps not all. It is being utilized to some extent in the province from which I come. Speaking of Ontario I should like to say that since the present regime took office in that province there has been a most marked and significant advancement on the whole question of costs of education, the whole question of plan of education and the utilization of the best means of reaching the objective of a well educated province.

May I mention the question of our position in the schools with regard to teaching. This is not a national matter. It may be regarded as a matter that comes entirely within provincial jurisdiction. I wish to mention it because it fits into the general picture. One of the things that this country must do is to see that the seats of learning, whether they be higher or lower, are purged of any teachers who may be found to have undemocratic ideals, whether they are purveying them to the pupils or not. This is a matter that recent events would indicate as being an essential need. In making reference to it I am not casting any reflection upon any seat of learning except to say that if in the future we are to build up a great Canada based upon democratic ideals and principles, we cannot do so unless we have people teaching those ideals in the schools, whether they be public schools, high schools, or universities. I should like to see more emphasis laid upon the teaching of what democracy really means. We have a great system of government, our democratic system. I know there are weaknesses in it, but there will always be weaknesses in any type of government where there are imperfect people to govern. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that more emphasis ought to be laid than has been laid in this country, and in others, upon seeing that our younger generation are brought up under democratic ideals, and that the dangers of other types of totalitarian government ought to be shown to our younger generation. It may be argued, of course, that these are matters again that should not be dealt with in a measure of this kind, but to me they seem to be part and parcel of a great general picture which deserves to be shown.

Great strides have been made in the teaching of civics and in the teaching of our form of government, but I believe we can go even farther. As a layman I feel—I am going to risk such criticism as may come to me—that perhaps we might do more than we have done along that line.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer before I conclude my rambling remarks. Coming up through our schools in every province we have men and women who almost seem to be predestined to take leadership in certain lines of activity. There is not one in this chamber this afternoon who, if he looks back on his early school days, cannot think of some students whom he regarded as potential leaders, and who, because of financial or other obstacles standing in their way had to finish their schooling at an early age. Because of that we have lost men and women with leadership qualities who could have contributed much to this nation as a whole. Our brilliant minds must have some avenue by which they can reach the top, regardless of geography or finance.

I well remember that in the early days of another parliament the present Secretary of State (Mr. Martin), and others of us, took a stand in favour of something which comes within the jurisdiction of this parliament and of which this parliament should take cognizance, namely, the question of a comprehensive system of national scholarships. That was a movement and a policy that met with almost universal approval in most parts of Canada. I raised it again in the session of 1944; I raise it now. I believe that national scholarships would interfere with nothing so far as the jurisdiction of the provinces is concerned. It could in no way be regarded or criticized as stepping into the field of provincial jurisdiction. On a broad national scale it would help to bring out of the schools of our country our men and women who would be of great value to the nation at large. Once a comprehensive system of national scholarships is put into effect my belief is that no money would be better spent. No money would provide greater dividends to the people of Canada than national scholarships. I wish to leave that thought with the minister and with the government.

There is another problem to which I should like to call attention. Now that the war is over—I know there was some objection during the war and no one desired to press it at that time—we should institute a national library. Othe countries have been pressing for this. It is a matter which has been brought up on many occasions by the teachers' federation. It is a matter which finds agreement amongst educationists generally. This country is in the position where it can no longer suggest that we cannot afford to place at the disposal of the people of Canada a great national institution such as a national library. I leave that problem with the government as one to which they might properly give their consideration.

I have another suggestion to offer. There ought to be some move made by provincial governments to come to some kind of agreement whereby there might be an effective provincial teachers' exchange. This is a matter on which leadership might properly be given by the dominion government. It is a matter which, in my opinion, would go a long way toward bringing into effect the type of national unity which my hon. friend suggested when he moved his motion.

I should like, if I may, because of the time factor, to pass over some of the points I had in mind when I rose to speak. I wish to say in passing, however, that when we speak about the division of jurisdiction between the dominion and the provinces in matters of education, we should keep in mind that in 1944 there was passed an amendment to the Technical Education Act, which allowed the provinces and the dominion to work hand in hand in matters of vocational and technical training. So far as I know, that amendment met with unanimous approval in parliament, following which it became law.

The whole matter of vocational training and technical assistance has been worked out between the dominion and the provinces. The provinces have jealously and properly maintained full jurisdiction over the manner in which money shall be expended for educational purposes, and the education made available. At the same time, however, there has been a broadening and a levelling of the burden of payments across the dominion.

I think most hon. members in this debate have hesitated to go far into the question of dominion-provincial relations, and for a very good reason. To-day within the precincts of this building the whole question of finance, as applied to the provinces and to the dominion is open for discussion and decision. In my view it would be presumptious if, in the midst of significant discussions which have not yet been concluded or which have not come to fruition, parliament were to attempt to set out in specific form proposals which in any way would interfere with or which would project themselves into the general discussions now taking place.

I am sure the remarks of other hon. members will be made with that important reservation, as indeed mine have been made, and that they will be made for the purpose of bringing before parliament some thoughts respecting the manner in which, in the days ahead, as a federal parliament we can help our people in matters of education. That has been our desire and our objective.

When discussing this afternoon one of the fundamental matters which come before the people of Canada, we are discussing something which has also been projected into the international field. The economic and social council of the united nations organization set up at San Francisco was a new organ. It was a further experiment in the field of international cooperation and understanding. We have tried different curatives; but the preventive measures as envisaged by the work of the economic and social council constitute some of the most important work of the united nations. Under the activities of the economic and social council comes the whole question, on an international level, of cultural and educational cooperation.

As I sat in the conference at San Francisco, when the economic and social council was being set up I was deeply impressed with the importance and the stress indicated by the various delegates of the world upon the question of education. Sometimes we take education for granted. In my view, however, many of the world's problems can be either solved or made more acute, depending upon the type of education applied to them.

While in Germany last December those of us who were there had some opportunity—perhaps not a great one—of assessing the position of the younger members of the German population. While it might be considered presumptuous on my part to express an opinion as to what should be done in that country—because it is under the competent control of the allied control authority—nevertheless it was the opinion of many that through proper educational processes and planning there was still hope to make of the younger boys and girls of tender age a democratic nation which would eventually take its place among the nations of the world. Yet this was a country which in twenty-five years on two occasions and with bad education along totalitarian lines had disturbed the peace of the world so materially.

We talk about the tremendous value and importance of education. This afternoon I should like to add my word to those of the hon. member for Dauphin and to say that in my view the government should take into consideration ways and means of equalizing educational opportunity across the dominion, and of granting financial assistance to the various provinces for this purpose; but with these reservations and conditions, namely that by its support of such a resolution the present position of the dominion-provincial conference and the negotiations taking place therein shall not be prejudiced. In addition to that, nothing herein should be allowed to permit the dominion government or parliament, by the payment of any sums for any purpose, to wield a big stick over any province, or to compel or enforce its will in those provinces with respect to any type of education upon which parliament might decide.

Mr. BENOIT MICHAUD (Restigouche-Madawaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the resolution dealing with education which is now before the house, I wish to voice my remarks in my mother tongue, the language of my forbears and of the long line of pioneers and settlers who, during 300 years, through hard and persevering work, performed inconspicuously and receiving but little notice, have so deservingly contributed to the building up on the American continent of this country of abundance, this land of unlimited prospects, this extraordinary country which is envied and admired throughout the world, and which should ever be foremost in the thoughts of the members of this house, my country and yours, Canada.

In using the language of my forebears, I wish to pay a tribute to 13 generations of ancestors who are sleeping their last sleep in this Canadian soil which they have cleared by dint of unremitting toil. I wish to render homage to all my fellow-citizens of French language and culture, and thereby to reaffirm their right to the use of their language and to the development of their culture, from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I wish to pay a tribute to all those worthy pioneers, those valiant settlers, those daring trappers, those fearless explorers, like Louis Joliet whose tercentenary we celebrated last year. Finally, I wish to honour all those gallant missionaries and those heroic nuns who left their beautiful and dear country to dedicate their lives to the evangelization of the wild tribes of the new world, in the most primitive living conditions.

Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be forgiven if I emphasize those facts, but I want to stress the highly civilizing part played by the doughty people who came from France in the seventeenth century and who prompted the historian Parkman to make this significant statement:

> Spanish civilization crushed the Indians; English civilization despised and neglected them, but French civilization opened its heart to them and gave them its love.

We have heard, during the last month, words of high praise about the real merits of English culture and the numerous advantages which the status of British subject implies; therefore, I do not see why a wrong interpretation should be placed on my tribute to those great men of the past, sprung from another race which is equally noble and proud, and steeped in a culture which has brought such a great contribution to the progress of mankind in many fields.

Mr. PINARD: Hear, hear!

Mr. MICHAUD: Thinking of all those great men of the past, most of whom were born outside this country, and who have so greatly contributed to the building up of the Canadian nation, I wish to say that their sacrifices were not made in vain. The civilization they so highly personified and which they established in this American wilderness, has kept progressing satisfactorily.

Thanks to the fair-mindedness of the majority of our countrymen of British origin, this same civilization may now be expected to flourish in peace, in harmony and in justice, to the country's greatest benefit and glory.

No one more than myself, as a former teacher, bewails the lack of educational facilities unfortunately apparent in many sections of this country.

Until I was fifteen, the only school-house I ever knew was the small, overcrowded, one-room affair, under a teacher holding the lowest elementary certificate then available.

Some years later, I taught in schools that were hardly better equipped, save for the teacher who, nevertheless, must not be too underrated.

There are now schools in my constituency which are even more handicapped than those I knew as pupil and teacher. It saddens me deeply, and I have no dearer wish than to see established throughout Canada, a school system which would command the admiration of the whole world and, especially, bring joy and happiness to all Canadians. And that is why, if I thought that this resolution could in any way bring some improvement in our schools, I should unhesitatingly say: "Let us carry it, and put an end to this debate."

While deploring the deficiencies of our educational system, we should not however yield to pessimism and close our eyes on the consistent progress accomplished in this field during the last few years. At its last session, the Quebec legislature passed a bill which, according to a school inspector will do much to promote the cause of education in that province.

I am not very familiar with conditions in other provinces but I know that in New Brunswick, of late years much progress has been made in this field.

Among the many laws enacted in my province for the promotion of education, I should like to mention the following: first, an act to raise the minimum wage, second, an act providing very liberal grants for the building and equipment of new schools of all kinds, from little red schoolhouses to consolidated rural schools.

Finally, may I point out that under the rule of county units, all country districts in the county are grouped for the purpose of financial administration. As a result of this law, passed by 14 out of 15 counties in the province, a minimum of uniform and quite satisfactory educational facilities has been established. The new act came into force some three years ago in the first counties where it was applied, so that it is rather early to come to a conclusion as to its effects, but even now we may foresee very encouraging results from this new legislation.

Does that mean that the situation is satisfactory? Far from it. Salaries are still too low, as well as teaching standards. Schools are too few and are not adequately equipped.

From a practical point of view, however, what is the meaning of the present resolution? It calls for financial aid to the various provinces with a view to insuring that all parts of the dominion will share the same educational facilities and in order to help the provinces financially. In other words, this resolution, in the last analysis, is asking the dominion to grant certain sums to the provinces for educational purposes.

At the present time the dominion government and the nine provinces are discussing problems of a significance and importance that can hardly be exaggerated. They bear directly on the matter of financial assistance to the provinces. I believe that nobody in this house is unaware of the tremendous difficulties facing our public men at this moment.

A number of very ticklish problems have been dealt with in the course of negotiations. Time and again the provinces have charged the federal government with intruding in provincial matters and invading the field reserved exclusively to the provinces by section 92 of our constitution.

No field has been more jealously guarded by the provinces, none has been freer of dominion interference than that of education. The fact that it has not yet been mentioned once at the dominion-provincial conference seems to indicate that the policy on this matter has never wavered since confederation.

I am not well versed in provincial history, but I know that in New Brunswick, when the Public Schools Act was passed in 1871, vain efforts were made by the minority to have it disallowed. It was hotly and bitterly discussed during the 1872, 1873 and 1874 sessions. Rightly or wrongly, the dominion refused to exercise its power of veto.

In any event, parliament took the position that educational matters came under the exclusive jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. Here is a statement, chosen at random, made during the 1872 session by Sir John A. Macdonald:

It is common knowledge that this matter almost threatened the existence of confederation and that, if the federal parliament had been asked to settle the problem of public schooling, that would have been sufficient for the people of Lower Canada to repudiate confederation.

To my mind, the above-mentioned act clearly violated the spirit if not the letter of the confederation act and in support of my contention, I will quote more evidence from the same statesman:

I entirely disagree with the hope expressed in certain quarters that we should, by some means, oppress one language or place it on a level inferior to that of another. I believe that the attempt, if made, would fail or that it would be foolish and spiteful to carry it out should it be practicable. The oft-repeated statement that Canada is a conquered country is always untimely. Whether Canada be conquered or surrendered we have a constitution under which all British subjects are placed on an equal status, enjoying equal rights as far as language, religion, property and the individual are concerned. There is no superior race; there is no conquered race, here; we are all British subjects and those who are not of English descent are nevertheless British subjects.

Like any other piece of human workmanship, the British North America Act is marked by some imperfection, and when interpreting it, we would do well to remember the words of the Master: "The letter killeth and the spirit giveth life".

To my mind, the unfortunate educational quarrels that have been rife since 1867 are directly due to the narrow meaning which we attach to sections 93 and 133 and which never occurred to the fathers of confederation.

[Mr. Michaud.]

Thank God, bitter educational quarrels have vanished almost completely from this country, equal to Europe in area. As if Canada were not large enough to harbour comfortably two civilizations, while more than twenty different cultures are flourishing on the old continent.

To all Canadians, holding these narrow views on education and linguistic rights and interpreting section 33 in its more restricted meaning, may I point out that this section does not insure greater protection to the minorities in Quebec than to the minorities in other provinces. There is the difference, however, that under the same section, Quebec has always granted the greatest possible protection to minorities, while other provinces have subjected them to vexations and inflictions such as the double tax, with which this province is faced once again.

In fact, for the past five or six months, there has been an organized campaign to limit the full flowering of one culture and to strip minorities of rights already sorely curbed. The local papers of yesterday and to-day bring us snatches of the unfortunate struggle waged at a time when harmony and tolerance of the highest degree are so eminently desirable.

I am convinced that the distribution of equal educational advantages throughout the country matters less than the dissemination of an educational system based more directly on the principles of equality, justice and tolerance mentioned in Sir John A. Macdonald's judicious saying, which I quoted a moment ago: "There is no superior race". Such is Canada's greatest need, as regards education. The discussions which have taken place in the house for the past month lead one to believe that things have changed considerably since 1890. In this very house, we have heard some members speak on behalf of one race and one culture. Discussion did not always remain on a friendly plane. Some members considered expressions, harmless in themselves, such as the words "imperialists and colonials", meant for them. They replied by other equally innocuous statements which were nevertheless intended to do mischief, and we heard the words "conscripts, conscription, etc."

Those terms, to my mind, carry no opprobrium. I ask my fellow-citizens on this side of the house to keep calm when an hon. member opposite speaks of conscription. That method of recruiting exists in practically every country in the world. Even Great Britain had to resort to conscription during the last two wars.

We have no reason to upbraid a man for not taking up arms of his own free will in defense of a foreign country or even of his own, when the laws of the land do not compel him to do so. Until the Napoleonic wars, there were only career soldiers, armies of mercenaries, and conscription or coercion for military service did not exist.

I need not remind hon. members opposite that Great Britain did not have to enforce conscription when my ancestors were called upon to defend Quebec, the key to Canada, against the armies of Arnold and Montgomery in 1775.

Mr. PINARD: Hear, hear!

Mr. MICHAUD: May I be permitted, in that respect, to quote the words of testimony spoken by Lord Baldwin, on April 21, 1939, before the student body of the University of Toronto:

(Text)

And let Canada never forget it was the loyalty of Quebec in the American War of Independence, and subsequently, that settled the future destiny of Canada and makes her nationhood to-day a reality. Two languages, two cultures, two great religious branches, unity and freedom.

Great Britain did not have to resort to conscription when it was necessary to defend this country against the United States in the war of 1812-14. It was not my ancestors who were lacking in loyalty around 1850 when there was strong agitation for the annexation of Canada to the United States. Finally I wish to point out that conscription in Canada did not apply only to the province of Quebec. The figures quoted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the hectic session of November, 1944, show that the draftees were distributed throughout the provinces in such proportions that it is very difficult for a province to cast reflections upon another. Incidentally, the draftee who threw his rifle overboard in Halifax—an incident which assumed gigantic proportions in the eyes of the official opposition—was not from Quebec and was not of French origin or language.

In view of the fact that some time the most trivial discussions in this house give rise to fiery outbursts, it seems that the teachings of Sir John A. Macdonald have not been very well understood by many citizens of this country, and for this reason I am of the opinion that the encouragement which the Dominion government should give to education should be along the lines that I have suggested.

I hope my remarks have not been offensive. I have endeavoured to limit them to generalities and I would be sorry if they had been misunderstood.

In concluding, I wish to summarize in a few words the stand I have taken on the present resolution:

First, education does not come under the federal authorities and this field is among those that the provinces guard with the greatest care.

Secondly, all that the federal government could do would be in the nature of financial help to the provinces.

Thirdly, such financial help from the federal authorities, as far as administration is concerned, is presently under discussion by the provinces and the federal government and any resolution adopted in this house could not, in any way, contribute to the success of the conference.

Fourthly, the greatest need of education in Canada, is for education in accordance with the principles expounded by the great statesmen I have quoted in the course of my remarks.

Let us hope that this kind of education may be instilled and perfected for the greatest good of our country.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset emphasize the fact that we of the Social Credit group greatly appreciate the opportunity of associating ourselves with the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny) in support of his resolution. We have felt for a long time that the federal government should take steps toward the equalization of educational oportunity in Canada and toward giving financial assistance in the field of education.

Speaking in the House of Commons a few weeks ago, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low), a former minister of education in the government of Alberta, emphasized the fact that we must strengthen the sinews of our Canadian democracy and revitalize that democracy. It is obvious to me that there is a growing feeling among Canadians that that revitalization is overdue and that the strengthening of the sinews of our Canadian democracy is also overdue.

I am sure that the members of this house will agree with me when I assert that unquestionably the greatest agency for accomplishing the revitalization of democracy is education. It would seem, therefore, that we as Canadians must direct our effort toward two things: first, a nation-wide effort toward the improvement of education and the expanding of that education, and, second, making possible a greater equalization of educational opportunity in this country. The provision of even a modest programme of technical, agricultural and adult education, to say nothing of equalizing the limited educational opportunities which we now enjoy, offers such a task under our present system of financial restrictions as to be quite beyond the possibilities of several provinces, possibly all of them. The provision, therefore, of this expansion of opportunities should be the prime concern of all Canadians, not of just one community in Canada.

I realize fully that under the British North America Act education was one subject assigned exclusively to the legislative authority of the provinces, barring, of course, the education of Indians. Probably in no other field does the anomaly of the authority allocated to the provinces on the one hand, and the narrow basis of taxation assigned to the provinces on the other, become so apparent as with respect to education.

History, I believe, reveals the reason for this. Confederation, as we all know, occurred in 1867, but it was not until 1870 that the first legislation was passed in England to establish the ordinary public elementary schools. It is certain that the fathers of confederation in all their wisdom looked eastward in rendering many of their decisions, but even in looking eastward they could not discover that in England the ordinary public elementary schools had yet been established. Even making allowance for the greater social progress which has taken place in North America, it is inconceivable to me that the fathers of confederation could have envisioned such development as has occurred in the field of public services. Many provinces have actually in the past expended more on education than the subsidies which they received annually from the dominion. May I also say that those fathers of confederation could hardly be expected to have envisioned the development which has taken place in the fields of technical and agricultural education and of vocational instruction.

I said a moment ago that many of the provinces found themselves in the position of expending more for education than the subsidies received from the dominion. Let me just go back to my own province for one moment to give the house an indication of the trend there as far as educational costs are concerned. Back in the fiscal year 1935-36 the government of that province appropriated approximately $1,450,000 for school grants. During the present fiscal year the ordinary grants in that province for educational purposes amount to $5,372,000. That is an increase of approximately $4,000,000 between 1935-36 and 1945-46. May I say that in that province, where we have progressed tremendously in the field of education, we now find that approximately 20 per cent of our total revenues must be appropriated for educational purposes. Think what that means: fifteen government departments, and a department of education having to be granted approximately 20 per cent of all revenues to meet educational costs. That is not all. Other departments make appropriations for repairs, say, to our agricultural colleges, to our technical schools, for capital structure, and so forth, making a total grant in our province of $6,555,000 a year for educational purposes; that is, between 20 and 25 per cent of our total revenues.

Naturally in our province, as in most other provinces, the people are asking for—demanding, may I say—better schools, better paid teachers, better facilities within those schools. Certainly they are entitled to them; but there must be a limit to which a province depending upon its own resources can go in order to provide those much needed and necessary services to its people. I might add that we are also faced with this situation as far as the costs of operating the public and separate schools, namely providing elementary and secondary education in our province: we have to meet as high as 26·2 per cent of the costs. In some of our divisions the cost of operating rural schools requires that the government pay 40½ per cent, and in at least one of these remote areas where conditions are not so good the government of the province have been called upon to pay 80 per cent of the cost. I say that the government of our province are happy to do that, but what will happen in advancing those educational services if we are forced, through conditions over which have no control, to witness our revenues falling drastically? There can be only one result unless we secure federal assistance, namely a reduction in our educational services to our people, and I am sure we do not want to see that happen in any part of Canada.

In this dominion we have no legal restrictions upon the migration of people from one province to the other. The educational standard, therefore, of one province is of vital concern to another province. If people migrate from what I might call, from the point of view of education, a low standard area to a province having a higher educational standard, the latter will suffer the infiltration of what I can think of in no other term than, perhaps, the ill-equipped masses. This question of unrestricted migration from one province to another is one of the strongest reasons for urging upon the federal government grants-in-aid to assist the provinces to bring about the equalization of educational opportunity.

Mr. LOW: With no strings attached.

Mr. SHAW: As my colleague the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) asserts, with no strings attached. I intend to come to that if time permits.

I am not one of those who are always inclined to look elsewhere in order to determine what we should do. I think we have made a pretty good job in many respects of carrying on, ourselves. But let us look to England for a moment. In England education has undergone a marked change; and I am not speaking of the period since the labour government came into office; this happened a long time ago. In England over 50 per cent of the cost of education is met by the central government out of the national treasury. There is no question over there, as far as one can ascertain, about the principle that education is a national responsibility. As far at least as I am able to determine, they recognize that grants for education in the modern state are virtually indispensable; and I say that the same applies here.

The best evidence which I have been able to procure would indicate that in the United States the situation is similar to our own. I have in my hand an interesting publication which came off the press in 1937, entitled, "Wealth, Children and Education", by John and Margaret Norton, of Columbia university. I am going to quote a short section from this, not because I want to indicate what conditions are in the United States but because conditions here are in so many respects parallel to what we find there. I quote:

> Larger participation by the federal government in the financing of public education has been advocated by many students of the problem of educational finance during the past two decades. This advocacy is based upon the known facts of the lack of significant educational opportunity for hundreds of thousands of American boys and girls and upon the increasing evidence of the disparity among the states in ability to support schools.
> The obligation of the nation to provide support for public education is fundamental. Schools and other means of education have been recognized from the beginning of our history as necessary for the maintenance of the nation and for the prosperity of its people.
> It was in line with this early appreciation of the importance of education that action was taken by the congress of the United States in the support of schools. As the nation expanded beyond the thirteen original colonies, land was set aside in each state by the federal government for the support of higher education. In more recent years money has been granted for the development of agricultural experiment stations, for vocational education, for the rehabilitation of those injured in the great war, for persons disabled in industry, for a programme of education of youth and adults through the extension service of the department of agriculture, and for many other purposes.

The situation is quite comparable here and I expect to deal with it in a moment. I continue the quotation:

> But all of the measures taken up to the present time are insufficient to meet the legitimate demand for an acceptable programme of education for all children and youths throughout the nation. There are children in the United States for whom no school at all or a very minimum term of three or four months is provided. There are others who are taught by teachers with inadequate preparation. There are still others for whom the necessary books and other educational supplies are wanting. There are hundreds of thousands enrolled in schools in which the opportunities provided are limited to a traditional school curriculum which takes little or no account of the special aptitudes or abilities of those who vary in intelligence, in interests, or in vocational outlook from the selected group for whom the schools were originally organized.

How true that is in our own country.

> Children who are denied education in the poorer sections of the country to-day will live in other parts of the United States and will be responsible for government, local, state, and national, in the years which lie ahead. From those areas in which educational opportunity is most meagre there will be recruited the population of our cities.

This publication deals with the disparity of opportunity as between states, and communities within states. I have no up-to-date statistics showing the disparity in this country, but it would almost stagger the imagination if one did have complete statistics. The discrepancy between provinces is not so great; but go into any province and notice the discrepancies which exist as between communities, and you will agree that it is staggering. In our own province, for example, the government, through the department of education, has made every effort to remove these disparities within its own province. There have been special grants; there have been bonuses to teachers. In our province they bonus teachers to go into our more remote areas to carry the message to children who otherwise would be without the opportunity of attending school. That is in Alberta. Better salary schedules have encouraged better teachers to join the profession there. Then, of course, through the reorganization of our whole administrative system, we have enabled some of the schools which operated for only a month or two during the year to operate now for a full ten-month period.

I could go on for a considerable time and deal with the situation which did exist in some of the remote communities and the situations that exist to-day, but I shall not take the time at the moment to do so. The following extract is to me extremely significant. I do not even recall the source from which I obtained it, but I think it is worth listening to because it contains the very essence of truth:

> Because a province or an area within a province is too depressed to furnish an adequate programme of education is no fault of the children. Poorly equipped schools, underpaid and dissatisfied teachers cannot produce an environment for our children which is conducive to mental health and a progressive society. This is a good reason for claiming that education is a national problem. The productivity, the mental tone and the outlook of all our people make Canada what it is. If an area is depressed, if its children suffer and become disillusioned, the effect on the social and economic institutions wrought out of the experience of hundreds of years may be disastrous. Reckless and irresponsible experimentation in education may result in immeasurable damage to the fabric of society. Recent European experience has shown that we cannot afford to permit our young people to become discouraged.

When I refer to this fact I do not want it to be thought that I am trying to create the impression that Ottawa, as we say, has totally ignored education in the national sphere, because I realize that is not correct. If my reading has resulted in my being correctly informed, it was early in the present century that there was an exodus of people in Canada from the farm back to the city. This, so I have learned, caused a great deal of concern. The government or governments of the day recognized the need for encouraging a more diversified agriculture and the carrying of scientific knowledge out to the farms. I believe it was in 1913 that $10 million was provided by Ottawa to be paid over ten years, $20,000 to each province per annum, the balance distributed on a population basis. Most of this, however, went for capital works. No province could resist the offer; the people would not permit them to. They had to construct educational institutions, and by that time, the end of the ten-year period, the grant ceased and the provinces were left with the complete responsibility of maintaining the institutions which they had established.

I believe it was in the same year, 1913, that a royal commission reported in favour of dominion grants for technical education on the ground that, since technical education might give a stimulus to national development, the federal government had both an interest and a responsibility in it. I believe it was in 1919 that a dominion act provided another $10 million for a ten-year period for technical education, $10,000 to be paid per annum to each province and the balance on a population basis. The province in that case was to spend an equal amount. What happened in my own province? If the information I have is correct, we spent a million and a half on the technical school in Calgary. But the grants suddenly ceased and we had the whole project on our hands, to be kept up and operated out of revenues from the province.

In 1931 there was a new measure for the promotion of vocational education. I believe that $750,000 per annum was to be paid to the provinces under that act for a period of 15 years, and in 1937 $1,000,000 was appropriated for technical education. But this actually was a relief measure since it was designated for the purpose of education of young unemployed people.

While a province naturally appreciated the assistance granted under this act and other acts, it left them in the unfortunate position of using most of the grant for capital works and then having to shoulder the full responsibility of maintaining and operating the institutions.

I also know that under the Vocational Training Co-ordination Act of 1942, which was a war emergency training program, any type of training needed in connection with the prosecution of the war was to be made available. Provision was made there for rehabilitation of the armed forces, and we know that there was to be a continuation of those projects commenced under the youth training.

These are all very fine. I congratulate the government on them. But it was unfortunate, I would suggest, that it took a war to bring about a recognition of the dire urgency of giving the children, our greatest asset, the opportunity of higher education.

Speaking of the rehabilitation of the armed forces, which is taking place under the Vocational Training Coordination Act of 1942, I wish to congratulate the government. In my city of Red Deer we have one of these institutions. I have talked to the young men and they are completely satisfied with the nature of the instruction being offered. There is a fine staff of teachers. Though this may be apart from the subject, I take the opportunity of expressing the wish that the government, the responsible minister, would decide to cooperate with the city of Red Deer in taking care of the serious housing situation that has developed there as a consequence of this school. There is a great deal of buck-passing from one department to another.

These young men come back from overseas after four or five years and they go to Red Deer to take the vocational course. They are asked to be separated from their families again. Any who do find rooms for their families squeeze out somebody else or render it impossible for a returned serviceman to secure adequate accommodation.

I say, in passing, that I wish the government would make that picture wholly complete and satisfactory by cooperating with the council of the city of Red Deer. I know that during the war the government made provision for ordinary educational services for the navy, the army and the air force in various ways. We appreciate all that. We know it is providing education for many of those who would not have been educated if there had not been a war; but we also remind the government that there are still those younger generations coming up, those who were too young to participate in the war. We should like to see an extension of all these educational facilities to these younger people as they grow up.

We all know that the provision of technical education is extremely costly. The same might be said of agricultural advanced education and of any type of vocational training. We realize that we must have the best type of teachers; we recognize that we must have the best possible equipment in these institutions; but, Mr. Speaker, the provinces have reached the stage where it is becoming impossible for them to proceed much further in the provision of these facilities.

I believe the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) referred to geographical and financial factors when considering this matter of education. I reflect with horror upon some of my experiences in the early thirties while engaged in the profession of teaching. Almost daily I saw children, bright youngsters, walking out of my classrooms simply because economic conditions at home were such as to make it impossible for them to carry on with their education. Fortunately—and it is tragic to have to couple the two together—many of them have been provided now with an opportunity for further education as a result of having volunteered for service in the armed forces of Canada. But if there had not have been a war what would have been the situation? The words of the hon. member for Peel bring this one experience to my mind. I remember a little lad of about ten. He just did not seem to get anywhere in school when taking the ordinary courses we had to offer him. I had written him off as just a bit hopeless. One Saturday afternoon that lad happened to come to me. I was standing beside a truck, the hood of which had been lifted. He started asking me questions about the engine, and he embarrassed me quite a bit. He knew more about it than I did. That lad should have had an opportunity of leaving the ordinary school, the best that we could provide, and taking the course for which he was properly adapted. That case could be multiplied scores of times.

Let us consider our universities. Generally speaking, our universities are struggling along on endowments, tuition fees from students and provincial grants. We know what the result has been. Every year we lose many of our finest professors from the universities. A number of them go over the border into the United States because they are offered more money. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not saying that these professors are looking only for the dollar, but they had a costly course of training and we think they are entitled to decent remuneration. They cannot get it from many of our institutions to-day, and because the institutions cannot meet the cost these professors are leaving us every year. The dominion government should make available to the universities of this country sufficient funds to enable them to retain the best possible instructors.

There is a great deal of controversy with respect to how the assistance should be granted to the provinces. All one has to do is to listen to the discourses which have taken place in another place in recent days to know the great differences of opinion which exist. My colleagues and I feel that the only way in which the grant could be made to a province for education purposes is on the weighted basis, taking all factors such as the wealth of the province, the taxable income, probably the number of children of school age within the province, the number of children in rural areas, and so forth, determine a formula and apply it in an impersonal manner. That is only one way. I wish to emphasize that we are not advocating interference by the dominion government with the administration of education within the provinces. We say, leave it with the provinces. The federal government might do something else, namely, establish a capital fund for the construction of schools. Every member of parliament, at least those outside the cities, has occasion to travel through the country and speak to audiences in these schools. On top of that I have had an opportunity of teaching in some of them, and the situation is a disgrace. Capital costs are so high in every part of Canada to-day that it is becoming increasingly difficult to improve these schools. Even in so-called normal times it is becoming increasingly difficult to provide the necessary schools. The federal government should establish a capital fund at cost to enable the provinces to build more and better schools.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that it must be apparent to all that a nation cannot compete successfully with other nations to-day if the entire responsibility for educational training and scientific research is left to the care of each individual province. Let me make that clear. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I refer to care only in the sense that the provinces have to meet the bulk of the costs connected with educational institutions.

May I repeat what I said earlier? We support this resolution. We feel that the government should take into consideration ways and means of equalizing educational opportunity across the dominion by granting financial assistance to the various provinces for these purposes.

Mr. JOSEPH ALFRED DION (Lake St. John-Roberval) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I oppose the resolution now before the house because it would inevitably lead to the centralization of education. I feel that for all true Canadians provincial autonomy in that field is an inalienable right. It is not merely a relic of the past, but a spiritual value of present importance for the peace and prosperity of the Canadian nation as well as for the progress of education itself.

From a pedagogical standpoint, the mischief done by centralization cannot be overemphasized. It tends to kill all initiative among teachers and to hamper teaching. Through it, the drawing-up of the curricula falls into the hands of bureaucrats and officials, and without any desire to say evil things concerning those honest people, no one can be content with holding only favourable opinions about them. With centralization, impersonal reports and directions are substituted to intimate and beneficial contacts. That is why experienced teachers fear educational centralization. As an illustration, I only have to mention what happened in the American Senate in 1944. I quote from the September 1944 issue of Relations:

The American Senate has just received bill No. 637, which was supposed to save education through generous grants from Washington. The vice-rector of the Catholic University of America, Mgr. Edward B. Jordan, in his booklet entitled "Federal Aid for Education," states the reasons for that rejection. The sponsors of the bill had brought up as arguments the situation of poorly-paid teachers and the too unequal educational facilities as between the various states. But those reasons did not overshadow the much more serious drawbacks that are involved in any federal subsidy in that field. Generally speaking, the writer said, the opposition to the bill " took the form of a protest against any measure likely to bring about federal control on education" . . . The bill would be the wedge which would allow the federal authorities gradually to gain control of the whole United States public school system, thus ruining the principle whereby the control of schools belongs to local authorities, a principle that has featured American civilization since the colonial days.

I quote further:

The statement made by the President of Harvard, Dr. James Bryant Conant, deserves to be quoted: "In the field of education, more than in any other sphere, the only principle that should be held is the one whereby responsibility is devolved on local authorities. The dangers of a centralized and strong power, having a preponderant influence in educational matters is so obvious and they have been so often pointed out, that it would be unnecessary to make further comments about them."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it is six o'clock.

(Text):

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, May 2, 1946.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN PACIFIC BRIDGE AT MISSION, B.C.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. What is the depth of the Fraser river at the C.P.R. bridge at Mission?
2. How many piers are there in this bridge, and what is the total space taken up in the channel of the Fraser river by the piers?
3. Since the construction of the bridge, how many yards of rocks have been dumped at the piers?
4. What effect have these obstructions had on the channel of the river?
5. Are the C.P.R. granted exemption from dyking or any other taxation on the Mission-Huntingdon branch line?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull):

1. 24·36 feet.
2. (a) Twelve; (b) 136 feet.
3, 4 and 5. No information.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

VETERANS LAND ACT—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. PROBE:

1. Have negotiations been undertaken by the Department of Veterans Affairs to provide regular mail and transportation service for the veterans settled under the Small Holdings feature of the Veterans Land Act (a) at Regina; (b) at Saskatoon? If so, of what nature and with whom?

2. What steps have been taken to secure priority for purchase and installation of telephone equipment on behalf of veterans on small holdings at Regina, Saskatoon and Prince Albert, where the nature of the veterans' occupation makes the installation of such service necessary?

COLD STORAGE SUBSIDIES

Mr. WINTERS:

1. How many subsidies have been granted under the Cold Storage Act, 1907?
2. To whom were the subsidies granted?
3. For what purpose was the subsidy granted in each case?
4. What was the amount of the subsidy in each case?

UNITED NATIONS

RELIEF AND REHABILITATION—CANADIAN AND OTHER CONTRIBUTORS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to reply to a question which was asked two days ago by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) with respect to the contributions of various nations under the UNRRA agreement. It was mentioned at the time that this information was being prepared by the Department of External Affairs. It has been prepared and it was intended to include it in a complete report on UNRRA which will be presented to the house, I hope within a few days. In the meantime I have the information which my hon. friend has asked for and it might be placed on Hansard. This is statistical information and in connection with it I would draw the attention of the house to the following facts.

It will be noted that Australia, Canada, the Dominican republic, Iceland, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and the United States of America have made a second contribution to UNRRA. Canada, the Dominican republic, Iceland and the United Kingdom have completed their contributions; the United States has paid in $750,000,000 out of its second contribution and the second part of $600,000,000 is in process of authorization.

Of the invaded countries, which are only expected to contribute to the administrative expenses of UNRRA and not to the operating fund, four, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Poland and Yugoslavia, have made contributions of supplies produced in their country.

The contributions to administrative expenses were only set at the meeting of UNRRA which took place during the month of March, and therefore as of the end of that month few countries had had time to make their contributions to administrative expenses. This explains the amounts which appear as yet unpaid in the largest number of cases, particularly in the second group of countries; those which were invaded were only expected to contribute to the administrative expenses of the organization.

It may also be worth noting, as indicated in the last note to the tables, that the amount paid or available is over eighty per cent of the total authorized or in process of authorization for UNRRA. With the completion of the second contribution of the United States of America, Australia and New Zealand, this percentage will be raised to almost ninety-five per cent.

The statistical information follows:

[a] Includes both first and second contributions.
[b] Council's administrative allocation for 1946 included pending government's legislative action.
[c] No operating contribution authorized as of 31st March, 1946.
[d] Amount of contribution not determined as of 31st March, 1946.
[e] Excludes payments in local currencies to defray local expenses of UNRRA missions.
[f] Includes value of contributed supplies.
[g] Includes advance payment of $80,000.
[h] The amount paid or available is over 80 per cent of the total authorized or in process. With the completion of the second contribution of the U.S.A., Australia and New Zealand, this percentage will be raised to almost 95 per cent.

MILK

INQUIRY AS TO SUMMER SUBSIDY RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. CHARLTON (Brant): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Owing to representations made by the Milk Producers' Association and the increased costs of production, would the minister not consider continuing throughout the summer months the winter rates of subsidy on milk?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question which has just been put by the hon. member has been submitted to me, and one has also been put on my desk by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott) relating to the same matter. I think I should answer both at the same time. The question put by the hon. member for Springfield reads:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Will the hon. Minister of Agriculture restore the 55 cent milk subsidy to dairy producers?

The position in regard to milk subsidies is that a subsidy is paid both in the winter and summer months. There is a subsidy on whole milk of 55 cents in winter and 35 cents in the summer months. The time at which the change is made is 12 o'clock on the night of the 30th day of April to cover the new dairy year. There has been no change made this year, so that the suggestion here that we restore the 55 cents milk subsidy is scarcely an accurate way of stating the position. The order governing the subsidies has been exactly the same for the last two years, and the new order will make it the same for the next twelve months. In other words it is just a seasonal reduction from 55 to 35 cents.

It is hardly necessary for me to say that if there are to be seasonal subsidies there is no possibility of having the same subsidy in the summer months as in the winter months. To ask anyone to continue the winter subsidy into the summer months would be asking something illogical if we are to base the decision on production costs

There may be some reason for saying that we should have a flat subsidy throughout the year. In that event we would have to take into consideration winter costs of production as well as summer costs and average the two to arrive at the proper figure for a subsidy for the whole twelve months. In giving consideration to this matter, which I have already said the government intends to do, it will not be a question of returning in the summer months to the winter subsidy, but it will be the question whether we should have a flat rate throughout the year and in determining that question consideration would have to be given to both winter and summer production costs to arrive at an average figure.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister spoke of the costs of production in the summer months as compared with the winter months, but is it not a fact that the production costs this summer to the farmer will be higher than they have been in other summers?

Mr. GARDINER: That is a question that would have to be considered in arriving at a figure. There are two different groups of producers of whole milk. One is part of the group living close to cities, and this group place emphasis on the importance of winter production. They breed their stock and conduct their whole business with the idea of supplying milk at a time when the costs are high. I understand that this group will not be satisfied with a flat rate throughout the whole year, so there has to be a discussion with both groups—those who want a higher winter rate and those who want a flat rate throughout the year. I have some doubt whether any decision would satisfy both groups.

Mr. GRAYDON: You could increase both rates.

TIMBER CONTROL

SHORT SUPPLY OF LUMBER IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. BURTON (Humboldt): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Reconstruction, notice of which has been sent to his office. Is he aware that the timber controller has offered further inducements to the saw mills operating in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to ship lumber beyond the prairie provinces? Secondly, what reason has the timber controller to justify the further depletion—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member knows that the rules do not permit him, in asking a question on the orders of the day, to make a statement. If he wishes to put a question, it must be brief and to the point.

Mr. BURTON: I would ask the minister what justification there is for further depleting the present short supply of lumber in the prairie provinces.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

Mr. BURTON: Is all of my question ruled out, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have asked the hon. member to put his question on the order paper.

HOUSING

APPLICATION OF ACT TO FARMERS AND RESIDENTS OF TOWNS AND VILLAGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I would like to ask the Minister of Reconstruction a question. Will he indicate to the house the arrangements which have been made to enable farmers and residents of towns and villages to take advantage of part 3 of the National Housing Act? The question was asked by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) when he was responsible for national housing. Since then the Prime Minister has tabled P.C. 1513, of April 16, vesting in the Minister of Reconstruction (Mr. Howe) the responsibility for housing.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Reconstruction): I shall be glad to accept the question as a notice and give a reply to-morrow or Monday.

WHEAT

BONUS FOR SHIPMENTS OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether he has yet had an opportunity to discuss with his colleagues the question of paying to the farmers a bonus of 30 cents a bushel on wheat for immediate delivery so that it may be shipped overseas, and if so, what the decision is in this regard?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when there is a statement to be made on the point raised by my hon. friend it will be made in this house.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

NATIONALITY, NATURALIZATION AND STATUS OF ALIENS

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 30, consideration in committee of bill No. 7, respecting citizenship, nationality, and naturalization and status of aliens—Mr. Martin—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee last sat it was considering amendments to section 10 moved by the hon member for Eglinton:

That section 10 (1) (c) be amended by inserting after the word "war" in line 25, the following words:

"or is a British subject within the meaning of section 28."

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MARTIN: Before proceeding, I think this might be the appropriate place—I was waiting until we finished with subsection 1—to say that I intend to introduce an amendment to provide for a new subsection 2. As the committee will recall, in my opening statement I said that I should be glad to listen to suggestions from all sides of the house, and after listening to the debate and giving some consideration to the matter, I should like to offer an amendment to section 10 to provide that the requirement as to British subjects going before a judge and making a declaration and so on shall be dispensed with. The situation now will be that, the necessary period of residence having been complied with, a British subject will merely make an application to the Secretary of State, and if the department is satisfied as to the declaration the certificate will issue. It is felt however that in certain doubtful cases there should be the right to refer the declaration and the application to a proper officer for consideration. The situation will be, therefore, that British subject applicants shall not be subjected to the normal ceremony provided for in the bill in so far as it applies to other groups. As to the actual terms of the amendment, I will disclose them after subsection 1 has been dealt with, but I thought I should tell the committee ahead of time that that is the proposal.

Mr. GREEN: Will it be necessary for that British subject to take the oath of allegiance?

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, yes. He will take the oath of allegiance as the governor general has done, as we all do, as all members of parliament do. But he will do it simply by signing a document.

Mr. GREEN: There will be no appearance in court at all?

[Mr. MacKinnon.]

Mr. FLEMING: The amendment to be proposed is as to subsection 2; is that correct?

Mr. MARTIN: It will be a new subsection 2. The present subsection 2 will become subsection 3.

Mr. FLEMING: It will be an entirely new provision?

Mr. MARTIN: It is a new subsection.

Mr. FLEMING: Will the minister indicate whether he intends to dispense with the residence requirements in subsection 1 (c)?

Mr. MARTIN: The situation will merely be that a British subject who wants to become a citizen of Canada under the law, and who will continue at the end of one year, as now, to have the right to vote, the right to civil service employment, the right to pension, all the rights he has now, if at the end of the period he will simply write on a special form to the department of the Secretary of State, that certificate will be issued to him.

Mr. FLEMING: But he still will not be a citizen?

Mr. MARTIN: Any rights he has now will be continued.

Mr. MacNICOL: If he does not write in and ask for a certificate of citizenship, what will be his status?

Mr. MARTIN: Obviously if he does not write in, nobody has the opportunity of knowing of his existence.

Mr. MacNICOL: He still would be able to have all the prerogatives—

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. I thank my hon. friend for asking that question. He will have the right to vote, the right to an appointment in the civil service, all the rights he enjoys now, whether he applies for it or not. That has always been and will continue to be the situation.

Mr. BOUCHER: Will the privileges that a British subject in Canada now has be extended to members of the commonwealth who enter Canada later under the same conditions? In other words, does it just happen to those who are now in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: No. With regard to those who are now in Canada, with regard to all British subjects now in Canada, on the passage of this act they are automatically affected just as is the hon. member himself. They do not have to do anything.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that they must have been here for five years before they can be in that position?

Mr. MARTIN: Oh, yes; that is the law now.

Mr. GREEN: If they have been here only four years and eleven months they are not in the same position as we are?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right. The law is the same as it has been for twenty-seven years, under a provision introduced by the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. FLEMING: The minister is begging the same old question.

Mr. BRYCE: I have been listening, but it gets more complicated. I am a layman and I do not follow this lawyer's argument. I was an immigrant thirty years ago. Had I come in after this bill was passed, would I have the same status as I have through coming here before, and if I were living here would I get Canadian citizenship papers at once, or only after five years' residence in Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: Take the specific case. If the hon. gentleman came in after the passage of this bill, then in one year, as a British subject, he would have the right to vote. Under this bill that right is confirmed. He would also have under this bill the right to any privilege which a British subject now enjoys.

Mr. POULIOT: The only difference is that his passport will indicate, I presume, that he is a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: A British subject who comes here and has not been here a year would also have a passport describing him as a British subject.

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. POULIOT: And therefore the only difference between the two would be the description in the passport according to their liking. One would be here for a year and he would be described as "Canadian citizen", and if less than a year, he would be described as "British subject".

Now I will ask another question of the minister. If a British subject comes here and stays here more than a year, will he be bound to accept a passport describing him as a Canadian citizen, or will he be allowed to have a passport describing him as a British subject?

Mr MARTIN: The situation continues as at present.

Mr. POULIOT: Yes. Therefore there is no change. I wonder why some hon. members are so bitter about it, and others so enthusiastic. Why be bitter against nihil and be enthusiastic for nihil? It is shadow-boxing. I thought there was something in it until the minister said that there was no change. It is a compilation, the same as the revised statutes, where the commissioners have not the right to change a single provision of the law. We are in a strange position. As for me, I am a Canadian citizen and at the same time I am a British subject. When I am asked who I am I say I am a Canadian, and officially I am described as a British subject; but now, when I travel, I shall have the privilege of receiving a passport describing me as a Canadian citizen. That is all. I do not think there is anything else. Because all the gentlemen who come from all over the empire—not only those of British stock, but every British subject—will be described as a British subject. That is all. I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will not waste energy in fighting a measure which was acceptable to Sir Robert Borden, to Mr. Arthur Meighen, perhaps to Doctor Bruce, since he never objected to it when he was in the house; and Doctor Shields made no speech about it. Now I will tell the minister one thing in all candour.

Mr. MacNICOL: Doctor Shields is away in the south.

Mr. POULIOT: I was not informed as to his whereabouts.

Mr. MacNICOL: It was in the newspapers.

Mr. POULIOT: The Liberal party is an imposing group in the house. The Liberal party has the majority in the house. A small turbulent minority is always complaining about what is done—and sometimes I am one of them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Most of the time.

Mr. POULIOT: When I speak on my own behalf as a Liberal. But I am surprised that concessions should be made to appease that small and noisy crowd. And why? Why do that? Why disappoint all the supporters of the Liberal party to appease—no, not to appease but to try to appease—those who will never be appeased? It is useless. It only hurts someone's head on the rock. They are good fellows with genial dispositions, but sometimes they are bitter, and so persistent that finally concessions are made to them. Why? They build skyscrapers on pinheads and then they describe the skyline—the skyline of skyscrapers built on pinheads. Let me say this to the younger set, the younger smart set of the Progressive Conservative party: they will be astonished to know how ungrateful a section of their own party is. I have here an editorial from the St. Catharines Standard, a Conservative paper. Some time ago I asked whether Doctor Bruce was resigning to make a hole for Mr. Meighen to fall into, and the incident is related by that great Conservative paper, which states:

> More than that, his presence in the house would stir public interest in national affairs, as it hasn't been aroused since he left the arena. John Bracken is proving a wise leader and a man of courage, but every leader needs some brilliant stars in the field. Mr. Bracken has a few now and they are more than making good, but what a team Diefenbaker and Meighen would make! They would be like Ruth and Gehrig coming up with the bases full!

An hon. MEMBER: Who was full?

Mr. POULIOT: The bases. Now, Mr. Chairman, back benchers have the same rights as front benchers, just as the British subject has the same rights as a Canadian citizen. They do their best, they work hard, but they work hard for an ungrateful crowd. The only one who is described as a brilliant star is the hon. member for Lake Centre. He outshines all the others, and to find his equal they will have to import Arthur Meighen to the House of Commons. What a tough proposition!

Mr. MacNICOL: The member for Lake Centre is brilliant, very brilliant.

Mr. POULIOT: Surely; I do not deny it. But the member for Davenport is equal to him, the member for Muskoka-Ontario is at least his equal, and the member for Vancouver-South is also his equal. I have great admiration for the gentlemen who compose the Conservative party, and I think this article is unfair. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard—

Mr. HANSELL: Do these gentlemen come under this section?

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes; because they describe themselves as British subjects, and that is the subject matter of the clause. I was going to say, with reference to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, that he was born in this country and he has less Canadian spirit than his deskmate the hon. member for Nanaimo, who was born in England.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask my hon. friends to listen to this.

Mr. GREEN: Be fair.

Mr. POULIOT: I will define Canadian spirit if the hon. gentleman wishes. I have the Oxford and other dictionaries. I stand by my guns. There is the hon. member for Eglinton and there is the hon. member for Kamloops. They are brilliant young men but they do not speak for the Liberal party; they do not speak for the C.C.F. group or for the Social Credit group; they do not speak for the Bloc Populaire; they do not even speak for the Conservative party, according to what was said by the St. Catharines Standard. I regret it on their account and it will be sufficient to make them understand that, from the point of view of their party, their efforts are fruitless.

There is something else I would say about colonialism, but if what I am going to say is granted as established and proved I will not go on. A friend of mine sent me this fine book. It is a little lighter than the other because it is printed on India paper. I am quoting from Webster's New International Dictionary.

> Colonial: Of or pertaining to a colony or colonies; specifically of or pertaining to the British colonies, especially American history, the thirteen which formed the United States of America.

It is a definition which must have been written by civil servants in Ottawa. We now come to "colony", the definition of which is very interesting. It is as follows:

> A Roman colonia, which was a subject settlement of Romans (orig. of coloni) in a newly acquired or hostile country, made originally as a means of permanent occupation.
> A Greek apoikia, or a settlement, nearly always independent or self-governing, of Greeks in a foreign country.
>
> A company of people transplanted from their mother country to a remote province or country, and remaining subject to the jurisdiction of the parent state; loosely, any distant territory dependent on a ruling power.

What is colonialism? It is:

> A state or quality of, or the relationship involved in, being colonial.
>
> A custom, idiom, idea, feature of government, or the like, characteristic of a colony.
> The colonial system or policy in industrial legislation or extension of territory.

There is nothing to insult anybody in saying of one gentleman that he is colonial, even if he does not realize it himself. The hon. member who spoke the night before last was much aggrieved by the fact that one may speak of colonials and non-Canadians. I want to make myself clear. It is only an observation that everyone has the right to make, that a man is not a Canadian in spirit, although he may be a very good citizen otherwise, and as to those who spend so much energy in defending the British empire, it is only natural to think that they would still be subject to it.

I should be interested to hear them explain their position a little better than they did on that occasion.

Mr. MacNICOL: I must say that the hon. member who has just taken his seat is always very kind to myself and to others.

Mr. POULIOT: Everybody is, and the hon. member deserves it.

Mr. MacNICOL: But I do not like to hear hon. members on this side of the house described as noisy or bitter. I do not believe that any hon. member who has spoken in this debate has had any bitterness in his heart. Hon. members may have been a little loud in their expression, but I certainly spoke without bitterness. When the minister spoke the other day he was a little warm, and perhaps he had reason to be. I have no fault to find with the minister, because he is one of the men whom I admire. I recognize his ability and the success he has made in life, which has been an example for others to follow. At the beginning of his remarks the other day he spoke of certain hon. members as being of one of two classes. I presume he was referring to me, because I had been speaking.

Mr. MARTIN: I was not referring to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am glad to hear that. I know the minister is always very kind in any reference he makes to myself; but I want to dissociate myself from either of the classes referred to by the minister as being extreme. I am only speaking for myself; others can speak for themselves. I am not one of the class of extremists, because I took the stand the other day that the five-year period was much too long to impose on a Britisher coming into this country to live. I want to address my remarks to the minister, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARTIN: I am following the hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. May I ask all hon. members to address the Chair, so that all hon. members may hear what is being said.

Mr. MacNICOL: I was at the point of saying that I did not want to be placed in the class of an extremist. Personally I always try to look fairly and broadly at any matter that comes before me. Speaking the other day the minister said, as reported at page 1053 of Hansard:

> At one end of the scale there is the desire to reduce the qualification and procedure for non-Canadian British subjects to the minimum and to emphasize as much as possible the status of British subjects for Canadian citizens. At the other end of the scale the position is that no privileges whatever should be given to British subjects; that they should be aliens in the sight of our law and that the status of British subjects should be eliminated with regard to Canadian citizens.

Then the minister added:

> These are extreme points of view.

Because I expressed an opinion somewhat in accordance with the first point of view mentioned, I hope I am not an extremist. I am happy to see the minister shaking his head, because words do not always convey the same meaning to everybody. When the minister was speaking I felt that I was being put in with the body of extremists, and I am anything but that in anything pertaining to life.

I want a little more elucidation. I was pleased to hear the minister say what he said to-day, because it was a concession to people coming to Canada from the British Commonwealth as immigrants, namely, that they would not have to go before a judge to swear to their British allegiance, traditions and so forth. Since that remark was made I have been wondering what position they would be in if they did not take out their papers at the expiration of five years. The minister said that they would still be able to obtain old age pensions, to run for parliament and to hold office under the crown.

Mr. MARTIN: Every right they have now.

Mr. MacNICOL: Therefore they would be in the same position as I am. I cannot see how I can have any opposition to that position; it is the one they occupy to-day.

Mr. MARTIN: That is what I have been arguing all along. The hon. gentleman has stated the case quite correctly.

Mr. MacNICOL: In every way they will be in the position in which they are to-day? If I may refer to the Minister of Mines and Resources, who spoke the other evening, when he came here and had been in Canada one year he could vote, provided he had been in the riding for the stated time, two months—

Mr. MARTIN: Two months.

Mr. MacNICOL: He could run for parliament, as he did later, and could hold any office under the crown. Is that the meaning of the proposed amendment?

Mr. MARTIN: No, the amendment does not mean that. The amendment did not need to be introduced to effect that, because that is the situation regardless of the amendment I have announced.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then what does the amendment imply?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman has approached this question very constructively, and I will explain it again. First of all this bill does not change one iota the rights which British subjects have enjoyed in this country for more than twenty-seven years. That is the first point. The amendment I have introduced will simply mean that a British subject applying for a certificate of citizenship, that is documentary proof of his status for use abroad or elsewhere, will not have to go before a court to obtain that certificate except in such cases as the department may want to refer to the courts, such doubtful cases as may arise from time to time. The hon. gentleman will appreciate that many British subjects come to this country who were not necessarily born in the old country. Many come from elsewhere, such as British Honduras and so on, and it is necessary and desirable, as my hon. friend and all hon. members will recognize, that such cases should be gone into; but such cases are the exception.

Mr. MacNICOL: Suppose an immigrant from the old country, remains here for a year or two and then desires to visit the old country again, with the intention of returning to Canada. Does he have to be registered in Canada as a citizen before he can get his passport?

Mr. MARTIN: He would not get a Canadian passport at that point. He would have a British subject passport.

Mr. MacNICOL: And he could go back and forth?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: But if he wanted to go away as a Canadian citizen he would have to be registered as such, and he could not do that until the expiration of five years?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the minister was speaking I hoped he would go a step farther, because I do not see any difference between the position of a British subject as outlined in this bill and the position as it existed when the Minister of Mines and Resources came here. It remains the very same. What would be the advantage to the Minister of Mines and Resources, if he were to come here now, in taking out his Canadian papers at all?

Mr. MARTIN: There would be every advantage in the world. As I pointed out in my statement on second reading, and perhaps in my reply, thousands of persons come here from various parts of the commonwealth and remain for many years, but with no documentary proof whatever as to their status. As an example of what I had in mind I mentioned the daughter of a missionary in China. This gentleman was himself a Canadian citizen. He had been born in Scotland and had lived in Canada for some eight years. He was a well known clergyman in the city of Toronto, and I have no doubt is well known to the hon. member. His daughter had never lived in Canada. Under the laws of China she was a citizen of that country. Under the laws of Canada she would have been entitled to entry here like anyone else. She went to the United States to study and was taken off the train in the middle of the night with no means of proving her national status. When this bill is passed we shall be able to give her a certificate, but at present we cannot do so.

Living at the border as I do I have had not only departmental but personal experience of cases involving British subjects who lived in Canada for a long time and then went to the United States. For some reason or other they have been deported from the United States. In one case I have in mind the deportation occurred after the person had been in Canada for seventeen years. He developed a disease which made him inadmissible under the Immigration Act, and he was deported to the old country, where he had not been for something like forty-eight years. He had no documentary proof whatsoever of his status. We have business men who were born in the old country, who have come here and become part of our life, and who are then engaged to work in foreign countries. Right now in the department we have a case of a man who was born in Wales, lived in this country for about fifteen years, voted here like anyone else, and became part of the Canadian community. Under the laws of a particular South American country, because he has no documentary proof of his national status—and he has none—he is not able to stay there. One could go on giving case after case. My deputy is in front of me, and I think I can say that in our department I know of over 3,800 such cases that have occurred since 1925. In the interests of justice as well as of personal convenience it is highly desirable that these people should have documentary proof of their status, and they will now get it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I supported that principle of the bill from the time I first read it. I think it is quite right and quite in order that Canadians should have documentary proof. I was just going to say to the committee a moment ago that when the minister suggested his amendment I hoped he would go a step farther and not ask the British subject to be here five years before being able to get those papers. I just do not grasp why that is necessary. I remember what was said the other evening by the Minister of Mines and Resources about people with diseases and people not right in the head, and all that, but they can all be deported under the Immigration Act.

Mr. MARTIN: Just as an indication of what the Minister of Mines and Resources had in mind the other evening, Hon. Mr. Calder was Minister of Immigration in the government of Sir Robert Borden in 1919. Before 1910 the period was two years. In 1910 it became three years, at the request of the provinces, who have to maintain many of these institutions in which mental cases are cared for. They requested that the period be extended from two years to three, because they could not possibly cope with the problem. Then they asked the government of Sir Robert Borden to increase the period from three to five years, the period we are maintaining now. In giving an explanation Mr. Calder said, in volume II of Hansard for 1919, at page 1872:

> It is the intention to extend to five years, as is the case in the United States, the time during which undesirables who may get into the country, or who may prove to be undesirable after they have entered, may be deported. Heretofore the period has been only three years, but I am sure the house will agree that the extension is proper. We are going to adopt that five-year period here, not because they have it in the United States, but simply because we think it is necessary that there should be a longer period than three years in which to ascertain whether or not many of these people who get into the country are desirable.

That is the only reason we are continuing it. We are not doing anything that has not being done previously; we are simply continuing that principle. I would only point out, as the Minister of Mines and Resources pointed out so ably the other evening, that many individuals come here with diseases that are not ascertained at the time, and which medical people say cannot be ascertained. We feel that these people who have spent most of their lives elsewhere should not be saddled on our provincial institutions simply because they have been here for two, three or four years. That is the only reason for the period of five years. I can only repeat that it does not interfere with the privileges they have enjoyed up to now.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not want to worry the minister.

Mr. MARTIN: You are not worrying me.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am heartily in accord with the provision which I believe is now in the Immigration Act, that anyone coming into this country can be deported within five years if he develops a disease which if it had been observable when he made application to come here would have prevented his coming in. But I just do not grasp why this provision should be in a citizenship bill. At the time of Sir Robert Borden there was no such thing as a citizenship certificate. I am in accord with the necessity of having a citizenship paper, but I keep asking myself why the period of five years should be made applicable to Britishers by the citizenship bill. That provision is still in the Immigration Act, and I imagine it will remain there. I do not see why a man who develops a disease after five years which is attributable to some condition which existed before he came here, should have indefinite protection. As the minister has stated so well, things like this have cast a great burden upon the country. People have been admitted who should never have been admitted.

As the section is at present, as far as the five year period is concerned the Britisher is in the same position as a non-Britisher. Otherwise he is in a somewhat better position in that he does not have to go before a judge. To all intents and purposes he is a citizen, but he is not a registered citizen. I can see this section passing immediately if the period be reduced. This question of deportation is covered by the Immigration Act; I cannot understand why it is in the citizenship bill.

Mr. MARTIN: I will explain why. We regard, and I am sure the hon. member does likewise, evidence of citizenship as being a very important matter. I think it would be the most un-British thing in the world, and I am saying that with all sincerity, to say to a person, "We will give you a certificate of citizenship, but if you develop tuberculosis we are going to send you back." That is the sort of thing certain dictators have done. Once a man is given citizenship it seems to me that he should be deported only for disloyalty to the crown, fraud and other similar reasons. Once you have given a man evidence of citizenship, once you have given him a certificate which he can show to the whole world, I do not think you should be in position to deport him because of one of those things. It has been suggested that no change should be made in the Immigration Act. Under that act the causes for deportation include becoming a public charge. I know my hon. friend would be the last in the world to suggest that we should say to a British subject, "Here is a certificate of citizenship, but if you do any one of the things provided for by the Immigration Act you can be deported in five years." To use his own words, I think that would be monstrous; it would be contrary to the whole spirit of what we call British institutions. I know that he for one would not want to subscribe to that.

There is another reason which I mentioned at the outset. Many British subjects come to this country or to Australia from outside. I am not saying that these people are not as good, because I do not believe in the superiority of races, but many who come to this country as British subjects were not born in the commonwealth. They go to England, become citizens of the United Kingdom, and then come to us later on as British subjects. Are we going to create a situation that would not only make deportation provocative but would at the same time render a man stateless? That is one of the things we have to try to avoid. There is nothing worse than a stateless individual. Unfortunately there are many of them in the world and a lot of them in this country. We hope we can rectify that.

When we come to section 21 I propose to suggest an amendment which I think will prove consistent with what I have just said. This would provide that the revocation of certificates of citizenship would be based on the strictest grounds. This should apply to all people. I have listened to this debate and I should like to say that I do not think that people who come from outside, British subjects, regard themselves as members of a superior race.

What we should try to do is to have all potential Canadian citizens on the same plane. Let them feel that if they are good enough for citizenship in this great country they should be prepared to regard themselves as being on the same level. I think that is the only way we can build up the country. I mentioned being present the other day at a ceremony in Toronto. The hon. gentleman was kind enough to commend me publicly for having gone to it. It was a ceremony at which thirty-five individuals became Canadian citizens, and I should like to give hon. members a picture of what happened. Two of them who took part in the ceremony are among the outstanding men in the medical world. One was born in Czechoslovakia. He is a graduate of Oxford university, of the university of Czechoslovakia and of Columbia university. He is one of the outstanding medical men of this country. When he became a citizen of Canada he took his place alongside thirty-four other people who also became Canadian citizens. The ceremony did not take place in a courtroom—the ceremonies we propose to hold will not take place in courtrooms—but rather in a room which was conducive to giving the applicants an impression of the kind of responsibilities and opportunities they are acquiring. That man was an eminent scientist, one of the world's eminent people who had come to this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is the kind we want to come here.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. I do not think there was anything belittling in that man taking his place with the others. It was an impressive thing. They were all doing the same thing, they were all taking part in the same ceremony. I should think that is preferable to encouraging the suggestion that there should be discrimination between one national group and another. That is the purpose we had behind this measure. I know when it becomes law and we are given a chance to administer it, it will do a great deal to make all potential citizens happier and perhaps more responsive to and more impressed by the opportunities and responsibilities to be found in this country.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask two more questions?

The CHAIRMAN: May I remind the committee that we are now considering an amendment to section 10, subsection (c). It occurred to me that it might be well to try to dispose of that amendment before continuing a general discussion on the whole section.

Mr. HACKETT: I intended to ask the minister—

The CHAIRMAN: It might expedite the proceedings of the committee if we could dispose of the amendment before continuing a general discussion on the whole section.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have two questions.

Mr. FLEMING: I take it that the point you have just raised, Mr. Chairman, is a point of order. I have the strongest possible exception to the suggestion that this amendment ought to be disposed of without discussion. The essence of the amendment is to avoid the position created by the section as it now stands, which to all intents and purposes puts the British subject from another part of the commonwealth in precisely the same position as an alien coming here and applying for citizenship. This discussion is germane to the amendment, and I strongly urge that there should be no suggestion about disposing of the amendment in the light of the current discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member for Eglinton misunderstood me. I intended to suggest that the speeches should be with respect to the amendment in order that the amendment may be disposed of, not that we should dispose of the amendment at this minute. I was suggesting that all speeches be directed to the amendment rather than generally to the section.

Mr. CHURCH: I am very much surprised at the minister, who comes from a city in Ontario, bringing in a bill like this, with this most mischievous section 10(1). I believe it will cause more widespread disunity than anything else I know of, not only amongst the British citizens referred to in 10(1)(a) but amongst other immigrants coming here from other countries. I doubt whether the minister who has talked so much about the bill understands it himself. The minister and his officials seem to think they should be something like Mr. Byrnes in Washington, with a large department, spending money like water. And on what? On citizenship. I believe that under the British North America Act part of this bill is ultra vires, because it concerns provincial matters which cannot be changed without the consent of the province.

On the second reading of the bill I referred to a legal opinion which had been given by the privy council, under which 10(1)(a) would be declared ultra vires. It was made clear in the case of Williams v. Howarth that there is only one king ruling over the empire and not a separate king for each dominion, which this bill sets up. That case was referred to by Lord Bennett in the House of Lords, where he stated that nothing in the Statute of Westminster alters the law made clear in the case of Williams v. Howarth that there is only one king ruling over the empire. This bill attempts to alter the law regarding that and the status of a British subject. A British subject is one by origin, or by domicile, or by later choice. This bill alters the whole principle of British citizenship, and it is brought down just on the eve of an election—for don't forget, we are going to have an election next July over the dominion-provincial conference—as to who is right on it. Coming events cast their shadows before.

This bill should have gone to a committee. The flag question was sent to the committee; why was not this bill sent to a committee? As I said on the second reading of the bill, I believe section 10(1)(a) would be declared ultra vires of this parliament. This is no time to bring in such a bill. It is putting the cart before the horse. We have no mandate for passing such a bill. We should first decide on our immigration policy. When did the minister get a mandate from his constituency to bring in this bill? Who is asking for it? Are the soldiers who fought for the mother country asking for it? No. This bill is much misunderstood, it is so complex and involved. If passed it will throw a load of work on the county court judge, and ten times the number of judges will have to be appointed to deal with nothing else but citizenship.

Who is worrying about citizenship? One newspaper said it was the Orange order. I belong to that order myself, and our principles are: equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Shades of Clarke Wallace and McCarthy and John Ross Robertson and other stalwarts occupying the Conservative benches in the olden days—to think of an Ontario minister bringing in a bill like this! The people are beginning to wake up to the meaning of this bill. The largest number of those in Ontario came from Great Britain. Many of them fought and died in the defence of our country. We have also a large number of fine citizens who have come here under the law permitting aliens to enter Canada.

I would like to see this bill given the six months' hoist. Let it wait until next year. It is an insult to the British soldiers. I want to give the government credit for having done well in granting a loan to Britain. That was most admirable and they have done a good deal of good work in that connection. I want to be fair and say that. But this bill is not timely. We are now in the eighth week of the session and six weeks have been spent on secondary matters—the flag, change of status, isolationism. One hon. gentleman has told the house that those who come here from the British isles are aliens, but I can tell you this, that but for our soldiers standing by the side of the mother country at Dunkirk not only the maritime provinces but Quebec and Ontario would have been overrun by the Germans. Section 10(1) (a) is an insult to the soldiers who served overseas. I am beginning to get a little doubtful of some of our Conservative friends when I hear them talking status, autonomy, isolationism and the change of anthem and flag. One or two newspapers are referring to the Orange order, of which Sir John A. Macdonald was a member. All we see of the Orange order now on parliament hill is around the east block where compartments are marked off on the pavements with orange paint, "Reserved—No. 1," "Reserved—No. 2," "Reserved—No. 3", indicating parking areas for east block officials.

I have seen what some of the British newspapers are saying about section 10(1) (a). It is an insult to the British people coming to this country. This particular section is of no more value than some of the other clauses. Section 10(1) encircles, so to speak, every other section in the bill. It is a sort of omnibus section. In my opinion it is a gesture to certain influences, to the foreign-born against the British-born. It is, of course, a political bill and is designed as such. In my opinion it is also a most mischievous bill, and has caused a lot of discussion in the old land. It puts us as Canadians in much the same position as when, in 1887, in Sir Wilfrid Laurier's day, we were first in the diamond jubilee procession and the last dominion to send a contingent to the South African war. That movement was opposed on all sorts of grounds. It was said to be against the British North America Act, against the constitution, perhaps against the Immigration Act. But these arguments did not appeal to the loyal people of this country, who, fortunately, are not all in one political party. They decided this particular issue once and for all, as Sir John Macdonald expressed it years ago.

I may tell the government that I felt some annoyance, although my feeling was more of sorrow than of anger, against the minister for inserting in his bill a section like this one. Consider the effect of this and other sections referred to by the hon. member for Marquette, the Minister of Mines and Resources, who is responsible for immigration. It is an impossible bill. It is a political bill, an election bill.

In the period between the two great wars, according to a return presented to the house nearly a million of our citizens had to leave Canada and go to the United States to get employment in a new country—among them many soldiers who fought for us at the hazard of their lives.

The more I consider this bill the less I am in favour of it. Here is the return indicating the public interest in this legislation. Nobody is asking for it. I have looked through this small return and I can find no evidence that any religious denomination is in favour of it. Why is such a bill brought forward, to the exclusion of measures relating to fuel and housing and other matters of primary importance? Who is concerning himself about citizenship? The subject is largely a provincial one, although the federal power has jurisdiction over naturalization and immigration laws.

This bill should go to a committee, as the flag bill did. We hear all about citizenship on a public holiday, but hon. members seem to be afraid of it. Civic holiday is set aside in nearly all the provinces to discuss citizenship and the elements which make a good citizen.

I am very much surprised at the principle of the bill. It will do untold harm. Section 10 is an illustration of putting the cart before the horse. The first thing to do before having any citizenship bill is to decide by an immigration policy who shall come to the country now that the war is over. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, in an admirable speech the other day, alluded to opinions on all sides of the house as to what constitutes a good Canadian. As regards hon. members, they are all good Canadians or they would not be elected to the House of Commons.

I say to the government that this bill should be withdrawn, or it should stand over for a year. The government has no mandate to pass one section of the bill. It was not discussed in the last election, either in my constituency or in any other so far as I know. Why should it be sprung on the house at the present time, when so many pressing questions are before us?

Finally, it seems to me that this matter is one for the dominion-provincial conference. It deals with perhaps the most important matter which can come before them, namely immigration. What is the sort of citizenship they want? Whom do they want in this country?

This bill will do untold harm in the old country. I have talked with hundreds of soldiers returning from the present war, and that is their opinion. People from the old land will go as immigrants to Australia, or to New Zealand, to countries where they will be welcomed. We are told what South Africa is doing. But what have we to do with South Africa? The South African union will not even give the black man a vote, and what they want is a republic; they are for isolation and separation. Are we to imitate a dominion like that?

Under the law, once a British subject always a British subject, but the whole policy under international law affecting domicile will have to be rewritten in the light of this bill. The law regarding domicile of origin, domicile of choice and the rest, all the law books and all the case law will have to be reviewed and revised. This measure is another of the offspring of that mischievous empire-wrecking act known as the statute of Westminster. In New Zealand and Australia they recognized the Statute of Westminster only in part; they were exempted from several clauses of it. They would not assent to the measure, and if they have signed it, they have done so only recently.

What I have to say about this clause is generally applicable to all other sections of the bill. If a six months' hoist is proposed I will vote for it. I certainly will not agree that the opposition throw out a lifeline to the government all the time. It is the duty of the opposition to give constructive criticism, but I should be the last to throw out any more lifelines to the present government on a policy of isolationism, of separatism, and the rest. I can tell you, nobody is worrying about this sort of legislation at the present time. It is not status, sovereignty, or autonomy that people are interested in. The soldiers are looking for jobs, houses and fuel; yet here we are, spending days and days on this particular bill. I protest against it. I believe the whole bill should go to a committee and be given the six months' hoist, if it does go to those in another place. It would give them a chance to stage a comeback. While ordinarily they do very little work, they have here a chance to stage a come-back by throwing three or four bills of this kind out the window and the front door.

Mr. BROWN: I should like to add another note to this chorus, and I am sure it will not cause any discord. Section 10, subsection 1 (f) requires the court to satisfy itself of the knowledge of applicants of the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship. This can be read in conjunction with sections 37 and 38, where it is provided that certain facilities are to be set up to instruct applicants in the responsibilities and privileges of Canadian citizenship. In the United States provision is made for such ceremonies and instruction. I should like to pay tribute to His Honour A. J. Gordon, of the city of Windsor, who for some time has been making provision for such ceremonies on the admission to citizenship of persons making application for it. In addition to this, being from Windsor, where probably we are a little more advanced than some other parts, because Windsor is in the constituency of Essex West—

Mr. MacNICOL: A large part of it is in Essex East.

Mr. BROWN: No, I am sorry: Essex West is not in Essex East.

Mr. MARTIN: Essex East is the governing factor.

Mr. BROWN: Essex East, I quite agree is the governing factor—in Essex East. But to get back to my theme. We have there classes of instruction, and I should like to pay a tribute to Mrs. Lois E. Hamilton, who is a member of Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire. She has compiled a book which is used in giving instruction. In the United States there is provision for instruction, and a textbook is provided. One book I have in my hand gives in very simple story and outline certain phases of government. Mrs. Hamilton has compiled a book known as the Citizenship Textbook.

Mr. MARTIN: A very good one, too.

Mr. BROWN: It was compiled for the Imperial Order of Daughters of the Empire, and in that book, by picture, by map, by story, by question and answer, given in a readable, simple and understandable way, she has conveyed to her readers the fundamentals of our citizenship. By profession Mrs. Hamilton is a nurse, but as a public service she has compiled this book. They hold classes for applicants for citizenship. These classes convene once a week for two hours and are under the supervision of accredited public school teachers. At present there are about thirty-five in each class.

There is one part of that textbook which I think would be applicable not only to those who are applying for naturalization and Canadian citizenship but to those who now say they have citizenship, those who were born in this country or who have been naturalized. May I give to the house and to the people of Canada a short resume of what is set forth in that book. Let me quote from page 11:

> A citizen in a democracy has both duties and responsibilities. He must not sit down quietly and allow the affairs of state to go on without feeling that he has a duty to perform.
> The first duty of a citizen is to try to understand as well as he can our system of government, and to keep himself informed as to all the important acts of those who are in authority. Just as an engineer must know and understand the machinery under his control, so a Canadian, to be a good citizen, must know and understand the government under which he lives. Citizenship is not a condition into which a person is born, but is like a profession or a trade which must be learned.
>
> Secondly, to be a good Canadian citizen, you must not only be obedient to the laws of the country, but must actively participate in the governing of the country by voting intelligently and wisely,—

Probably Liberally.

> —and by knowing and appreciating the work and methods of government. Laws affect each and every individual, but each and every individual has a share in choosing what laws shall be made, and only by voting intelligently and wisely can the individual meet the heavy responsibilities which democratic government imposes on him.
> A third duty incumbent on you as a citizen is to be ready to assist, as far as you are able, all good causes. Never oppose them by speaking ill of them, or by making them objects of ridicule. One of these causes is the thorough education of all citizens. It is the common every-day people that make the governments, good or bad. The most important of all causes, which you should support, is that of religion. A nation that scoffs at religion is in grave peril. Nothing can be found to take its place in the life of the people.

The last duty of a citizen is to endeavour to lessen the cruelty of our civilization. It would be well, if each day, everyone would think of the cruel things they have seen done, or that they themselves have done and then try to discover how much of the suffering thus caused might have been prevented. If such a course were followed, there is no doubt, we should soon have a bright and happy world.

I commend that not only to those who are attending classes to be instructed in citizenship, but to the members of this house and to the people of Canada generally.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Mr. Chairman, may I thank the two hon. members who have applauded. I intervene in this debate for the first time to occupy only five or six minutes. Perhaps I should make an exception to that, because I very rudely interrupted the minister the other night, and therefore I should make allowance for that.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman's interruption was not rude.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Thank you. I have been trying to find out just what all this is about, and if I interpret the minister's remarks correctly, leaving aside for the moment the use of the words "Canadian citizen", it is nothing more than the formalizing of an existing state of law which we have had for twenty-seven years. That is my interpretation of what he has said, and may I say that my view coincides with his in that regard.

The fact, though, that something has been in existence for twenty-seven years does not make it sacrosanct or anything like that, because evolution is change, and laws change. Laws occasionally should be changed. Somebody tells me that governments, too, change. I am not very good at wishful thinking, but perhaps there is something in that.

I turn to the one thing which I think seems to have been dividing us, and it is this question of the treatment of British subjects from other places in the British commonwealth of nations. Looking at that, I am quite unable to see the validity of the objection to the suggestion we make. Remember, that is not said critically, and I am not going to be that way. I am hoping to make a suggestion which may be of some value.

It is a fact of law and of moral conduct that we treat our partners rather better than we treat persons who have not that relationship with us. The basis of the whole law of partnership is mutual trust, and I am not suggesting that as among these nations it would go so far as to permit an individual to do something which would be a contract for the whole. But we have all been proud of this partnership. We have talked about it; we have talked about the invisible bonds, and so on, that have kept us together; and it does seem to me that in that very idea of partnership, which we have all of us acclaimed, there is reason for somewhat different treatment of persons coming to our shores from other parts of the commonwealth from the treatment we accord those who are aliens to begin with.

I am pleased to congratulate the minister on what he granted at the opening of the discussion to-day, and it is in that same spirit that I congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton on his speech the other day, which I have just read, in which he conceded, as he should have done, that after a period of five years' deportation might take place. In answering the hon. member for Davenport a moment ago the minister thought it was not inconceivable, and copying my hon. friend's large word, that it might be interpreted as monstrous. I tried to examine that. What does it mean? It simply means that a person gets a certificate of citizenship, which he had not in a formal document but which he had in fact in times gone by, because after a year's residence here a British subject voted and was entitled to appointment to the civil service. In fact I can think of no right whatever he did not have that I have, for example, and I was born in this country. I may be wrong about that, but I do not think so. I am quite prepared to join the club which the hon. member for Broadview spanked a few moments ago. I am quite prepared to join the club of spankees. I thoroughly believe that that as men of an earlier day said civis Romanus sum, so civis Canadensis sum is worth saying and worth believing. If ever a bill should come before this House of Commons with the unanimous consent of its members, it is this one. When we in this chamber presume to make these words mean something, presume to give people certificates so that they can say: "This is what I am in this world," we should do all we can, even more than we think we can, to try to find unanimity. If we cannot find unity in this matter how can we expect persons not of this gathering to find unity when we preach it to them? I say this to the minister, in the best spirit I know: Maintain your provisions in the Immigration Act. They are sound.

It is obvious that no inquiring body, no police force, if you like, can check up and find in one year the necessary history of all those who have been criminals or have criminal tendencies. It may well be that at the ports our doctors miss some illnesses and diseases, and certainly time is required to make inquiries. What I am asking from the minister, in the spirit of compromise, is that, to use his own words, we continue what we have always had with the people from the different parts of the commonwealth; to permit them to formalize themselves with us as Canadian citizens at the end of one year.

I cannot understand why the suggestion is opposed. It is taking nothing from anybody, not a single thing. I am one of those who believe in no hyphens. Surely the association with countries speaking the same language, with similar institutions and so forth, would permit the minister and the government, and I hope all members of this house to say: "Yes, this we will do." Then indeed we can go out and say that we have done something for this country. Then indeed we can have pride in our citizenship. We can say: "Here is my certificate; I am a Canadian citizen."

Mr. GARDINER: I have not so far taken any part in this discussion, and I do not think I should do so now were it not that I should like to make a similar appeal to that which has just been made by the hon. member for Calgary West.

First of all I should like to say a word in reply to one suggestion made by the hon. member for Broadview, to the effect that we have no mandate to be discussing this question at the present time. At the beginning of last session, the first session following the last election, I made it plain that so far as I was concerned I had a mandate on this question. One who has a majority so small as mine can probably speak in terms of a mandate with much greater authority than one who has a larger majority. I am quite sure there were more than fourteen people in my constituency who voted for me on the understanding that I believed that a person born in Canada, or one who had lived in Canada for a certain period of time and had been naturalized, should be in a position to call himself a Canadian citizen and have legal authority for so doing. Therefore, on that point I think it will be agreed that I at least have a mandate to come before this committee and say that a bill of this kind ought to be passed.

I recall that when I made that statement on the address in reply to the speech from the throne at the last session, the remark was more loudly applauded from all sides of the house than any other remark I have made in this house during the last two sessions.

The statement was made that when a person goes into court or anywhere else and is asked what country he is a citizen of, or what his nationality is, he ought to be in a position to say that he is a Canadian, and should not be compelled to go any farther in stating his nationality. That, I say, was applauded on all sides of the house; therefore I think we can all assume that we have a mandate to discuss this question at this particular time and to express our views on a bill of this kind. To me it is just as important as some of the other matters which were referred to by the hon. member for Broadview.

May I now come back to the point I had in mind, that of British citizenship or British subject. I have found it rather difficult to determine in my own mind—and I have not yet been convinced that it is correct—that any British subject had to be in this country a year before he became a Canadian. My understanding is a British subject has always been a Canadian on arrival in this country. He became a Canadian on the day he arrived. For that reason I cannot see any difference in principle between the amendment which says that a man should remain here a year, and the bill itself which says that a man should remain here for five years before he obtains a certificate. The principle is the same in both cases. It is simply a matter of time, and it does not affect his rights as a Canadian citizen. In order to emphasize that point may I read paragraph (c) of section 29 of the elections act:

> 29. Save as in this act otherwise provided, every person, male or female, shall be qualified to vote at the election of a member, who, not being an Indian ordinarily resident on an Indian reservation,
> (c) has ordinarily resided in Canada for at least twelve months and in the electoral district wherein such person seeks to vote for at least two months immediately preceding the issue of the writ of election.

That applies to me as a native born Canadian just as much as it applies to a British subject born in Britain. If I go out of this country and remain away for two years or five years and then come back, I must reside in the constituency for the twelve months immediately preceding the election before I can vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Two months.

Mr. GARDINER: In Canada for twelve months and in the constituency for the two months immediately preceding the election.

That is, I must reside in this country, whether in that constituency or somewhere else, for twelve months, and in the constituency for two months before I can vote. In other words when I, a native-born Canadian, return I am in exactly the same position as the British subject coming here for the first time.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): If the minister will permit a question, I noticed that all the lawyers here agreed with him, but I do not. I think, and in fact I am sure, that you can go away for a year or two years, but if that absence is temporary your domicile remains right where it was, and you do not need to spend a year in Canada after you come back in order to vote in an election. Otherwise how would any of our students at universities be able to vote?

Mr. GARDINER: Let us take the case of a man who is known by everyone in this house. I refer to Mr. Weston, who was a Canadian-born British subject and who went to Britain where he ran for the British House of Commons.

Mr. HACKETT: And he became domiciled there.

Mr. GARDINER: He became a member of the British House of Commons, and then came back to this country. I take it he must live here for twelve months before he can vote in an election.

Mr. SMITH (Calgary West): Quite right, because he changed his domicile.

Mr. GARDINER: I am assuming I get a job and go to Britain where I intend to stay, but that after five years I do not like it and come back to this country. I have to live here for a year before I can vote, and the British subject is in exactly the same position. In other words, as soon as a man comes here from another part of the British empire and settles in this country he has all the rights I have as a Canadian; he has to simply live out his domicile in a certain area in order to attain certain rights, just as I would have to do. If I transfer my residence from the province of Saskatchewan to the province of Ontario I must live here for a certain length of time before I can assume the ordinary rights of citizenship in this province, and the same thing is true throughout the empire. So I repeat that in principle if we say in this bill that a man must be here for twelve months we are doing the same as if we say that he must be here for five years before he can get a certificate of citizenship, and it is simply a matter of time. In the one case you do not get your certificate for five years, and in the other case you do not get it for one year. But there is no difference within the five years as to what you can do as a citizen.

Having said that, may I say that I would have been inclined to agree with some of the arguments put forth, particularly by the hon. member for Vancouver South, in regard to the section as it was originally drafted, in connection with the provision that a British subject must go before a court in order to obtain his certificate. To my mind that would have been changing the principle that has applied in the past to British subjects coming to this country. But since the minister has indicated his willingness and his desire to bring in an amendment eliminating that procedure, it seems to me the only thing now involved in the question under discussion is the point raised by the amendment in regard to the granting of a certificate at the end of one year, as opposed to the five-year provision contained in the bill itself. On that question I think the point raised the other evening by the Minister of Mines and Resources, in his capacity as administrator of the Immigration Act, is well taken, namely that the five-year period is necessary in order to determine certain matters in relation to sending people out of this country I do not like to use the term "deportation" in connection with British subjects, any more than I would care to use it in connection with a person who is sent from one province to another. If I go from the province of Saskatchewan to the province of Ontario, and within a certain period of time become a public charge or have to be sent to a provincial institution, I am liable to be sent back to the province of Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, even within a province we make arrangements to send people back to their original municipalities when they become public charges. So I do not see that it affects a man's citizenship as a British subject if he is required to go back to Britain, or to Australia, because when he came here he had certain shortcomings or certain physical deficiencies which made it necessary for him to be looked after by the state in which he is or from which he came.

As I understand the remarks of the hon. member for Eglinton and the hon. member for Calgary West, they have no objection to the five-year term being applied in such cases. If I read and interpret the bill properly it simply means now, that a British subject is not required to go before a court in order to establish his right to a certificate, that he is given an absolute right to a certificate if he applies for it at the end of five years, and that this section simply places a definite limitation on the time within which he can be sent back to Great Britain or Australia or whereever he may have come from. After he has come here he has only to prove that he has been here for five years; then he gets his certificate, and any attempt to deport him or send him out of the country after that time is met by the fact that he has established by certificate his position as a Canadian, and that therefore no one has any right to send him out of the country.

With the amendment that has been moved this afternoon I think we can all get together. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary West that there will be no measure before this house in connection with which it would be more important that we should have unanimity than this measure. For a long time in Canada we have had discussions with regard to citizenship. Those discussions have caused divisions among us. If we could put through this house in a manner satisfactory to all a bill dealing with matters that are of importance to us, it would be to the benefit of this country and would greatly improve our postion in future. With so little difference between us, as to whether a man should wait until the end of the five-year period before it would be impossible for him to be sent back to the country from which he came for treatment or because of anything he had done before coming here, I should think we might agree and have this bill go through unanimously. I do not think there is enough difference to warrant pressing the amendment. I would hope that in the light of the amendment which it has been suggested the Secretary of State will move to follow the passage of this section it might be possible to withdraw the amendment of the hon. member for Eglinton.

There has been a helpful discussion of the whole issue, and if it is desired to discuss it farther it might be discussed from different points of view, but I think it would be wise in the interests of all concerned that the amendment to this section should not be voted upon. After having had a discussion and after having had the amendment which has been proposed and which really takes the substance out of any criticism there was before, I think we could accept the section unanimously and go on to the next.

Mr. HANSELL: I was pleased to hear the minister make the announcement that he was going to propose an amendment. It has not been presented to us yet and we do not know the wording.

Mr. GARDINER: I understood the amendment was read by the minister.

Mr. MARTIN: I did not read the amendment; I stated what was in it.

Mr. HANSELL: I was pleased with the minister's explanation because it overcomes any objections that I have. I am wondering if it would not be well, now that we are talking about procedure, if we let the present section stand so that we can go forward with the bill and have the minister's amendment. We could then come back to the section and perhaps there would not be any trouble in disposing of it then. I am making that suggestion.

I am quite satisfied with the minister's explanation. As the section would have stood I pictured British people coming into this country and having the embarrassment of having to go before courts the same as those who are becoming naturalized. I can think of cases where that would involve considerable embarrassment. One particular case is that of a family who came to this country many years ago and who in turn raised a family here. The mother and father went back to England just after the first great war. The father died and the mother expects to return. I can see considerable embarrassment to that lady when she returns to Canada to be with her family if she has to go before a court of law in order to be declared a Canadian citizen. According to the minister's explanation, that would not be necessary. I believe that the government should reserve the right, if upon application certain documentary evidence is not satisfactory, of conducting a further investigation, even to the point of having the party appear before a judge. I make the suggestion that it might speed up things a little if we allowed the section to stand until the minister could present his amendment.

Mr. MARTIN: Although it is not strictly in accordance with the rules, I think I had better read the amendment to the committee so that we can have it before us. We have had a lot of discussion and I do not think a postponement of the section would help greatly. I am suggesting that section 10 be amended, first, by inserting a new subsection 2 which would read as follows—

Mr. HACKETT: Does that replace the subsection 2 that is in already?

Mr. MARTIN: The present subsection 2 would become subsection 3. The new subsection I am introducing would take the place of subsection 2.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I think we should deal with the amendment that is before the committee. The minister's amendment is really a later amendment.

Mr. GRAYDON: He is not moving it.

Mr. MARTIN: It is not strictly in accordance with the rules and that is why I did not read it earlier. It might facilitate the discussion and the passage of the section if I gave the details of the new subsection. I am in part following the constructive suggestion of the hon. member for Macleod. It is as follows:

Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection one of this section, the minister may grant a certificate of Canadian citizenship to any person who is not a Canadian citizen but who is a British subject and who makes to the minister a declaration that he desires such certificate and who satisfies the minister that he possesses the qualifications prescribed; provided that in any case where, in the opinion of the minister, there is doubt as to whether the applicant possesses the said qualifications, the minister before granting such certificate may refer the declaration and the material in support thereof to the court in the judicial district in which the declarant resides, and it shall thereupon be dealt with as an application under subsection one of this section.

I think that meets the point to which my hon. friend referred.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Muskoka-Ontario): I rise to make a brief comment on the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture, but in particular to reecho what was said by the hon. member for Calgary West, and indeed also by the Minister of Agriculture. This bill at its inception had every chance of being carried unanimously and our whole purpose has been to try to eradicate differences in order that there may be a common feeling of unanimity. That is most desirable.

First of all, I should like to comment upon one remark made by the Minister of Agriculture who said that it was just a matter of time. Time is an important element, and I might tell a story that I heard the other day about a professor of geology who was asked to make a speech before the inmates of a penitentiary I believe at Stony Mountain, for their edification. He dealt with his own profession and described the geological formation of the Churchill river and how it had changed through the years. He said that these changes had taken some hundreds of years, but that in the contemplation of geologists a thousand years were really no more than one day. A vote of thanks was moved by one of the convicts who said that he was certainly glad that the judge who sentenced him was not a geologist who would think of a thousand years as being just one day.

I submit to the Minister of Agriculture that time is important in this matter. However, the thing I really rose to say was not that at all. The hon. member for Calgary West has expressed my views so well that I want merely to underline what he said. There is one point I should like to add and I believe this is an important point.

The Minister of Agriculture wisely and eloquently emphasized his belief in the need for unanimity. I think he felt, as we so often feel, that if we are to have unanimity other people will have to change their views. I am going to suggest that that is not true in this case. The hon. member for Eglinton has agreed with the provisions of the Immigration Act and we raise no question as to deportation. Besides, there is another section in this bill which also contemplates deportation.

Therefore, as I see it, the position is simply this: However much hon. gentlemen opposite, or some of them, may disagree with us in attaching importance to this, I think they realize that we are sincere. If that is so, then I put this to them, and again I am echoing what the hon. member for Calgary West has said, does this derogate in any way, however small, from the citizenship of any one who is going to be affected by the terms of the bill? If it does not, as I think it does not, then I suggest that here is a case where, by generosity or cooperation or what you will, people who have different views can accept the view which we sincerely believe to be of some importance.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I should like to say a word as one of those people about whom some of my hon. friends to my right are perturbed. I never felt that it was any hardship at all for me to wait for five years before I could be a Canadian, even though I could not then call myself a Canadian citizen. I came to this country to get a better chance than that the old world offered me. I do not see why we should not have to serve an apprenticeship in this country to show ourselves qualified and fit to become Canadians, a designation which I think stands very high in this world. I can see no reason at all why immigrants to Canada, no matter where they come from, should not all be treated on the same basis. I do not see why a person born in Scotland, the Ukraine, Germany or France should be put on a different level so far as citizenship is concerned. A knowledge and an appreciation of democracy are not confined to the people of the United Kingdom. We know that during the war certain people over there had such a poor concept of democracy that they were hanged by the neck as an object lesson to others. Democracy is not the prerogative of any one group or nation, and I think that those who come to this country should be treated on exactly the same basis without any distinction or differentiation being made between them.

The other day I took exception to some remarks made by the hon. member for Kamloops. Speaking of the Japanese on Tuesday in this debate he said something which I admired very much. It is on page 1082 of Hansard:

> If, then, they stay in the country, my position would be that they must be given full rights to citizenship, much as I may disagree with the original decision to allow them to remain in the country.

That was an honest and forthright statement, especially from one who holds the views he does. But he mentioned something else, on which I should like a little enlightenment. Discussing a British subject, and the hope of arriving at a concept of world citizenship, he said:

> We have an approach to it in the concept of a British subject . . . It is a brotherhood which is shared by all the members of the empire.

We are talking about the immigration of British subjects to this country. Are hon. gentlemen to my right willing to grant to British subjects coming here from Hong Kong or India the same rights as human beings coming from the United Kingdom? If they are, they will be logical, which would be a change for them, although I would still disagree with them on this amendment.

Mr. REID: Arising out of the remarks just made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, may I, as one coming from the old country, say a word on behalf of the British subject. I come to this parliament from the province of British Columbia, a territory which was taken over one hundred years ago by the British people. No other race in this country had anything to do with the development of British Columbia from its early days.

May I point out why we from British Columbia think as we do? When I left Scotland to better my position in life—and I am pleased and proud to say that I did benefit myself by coming to Canada, and I am proud to be a Canadian—I brought with me a love of Scotland which I still have. But this thought must be kept in mind by those who are inclined to ridicule the British stock, that were it not for the British people this country would not be a confederation and I doubt whether we would be sitting here to-day. In British Columbia, eighty per cent of the people come from the British race. They took over that territory in the first place and they have developed it all the way along with the help of British people. Hence you can understand that the people who come from that province and whose forefathers developed it think that in this year 1946 some little further consideration should be given to the British people in the matter of citizenship.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that I have spoken in the long debate on this bill. I had hoped to speak on the second reading but unforeseen circumstances prevented me.

I am in a little different position from that of the two last speakers, the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for New Westminster. I was born a Canadian, but that was purely an accident so far as I was concerned. I think the way it happened was that a certain duke in the Highlands of Scotland wanted to get his tenants off the land and start raising sheep. So that my people had no other course open to them than to go somewhere else to better their condition. They came to this country, and I imagine that they did better their condition, although they passed through some hard times.

The point I rose to make was that I do not agree with the point of view put forward by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North. The people of the British commonwealth, a term I would rather use than the British empire, have something in common with the people of Canada because we are all a part of the British commonwealth. Consequently when people from other parts of the British commonwealth come here they come here not as foreigners from alien lands. This does not mean that they are any better than the people who come here from any other country. It is simply a recognition that they are in a different position from immigrants from countries outside the commonwealth, because in the commonwealth we all have allegiance to the same king and we are all members of the one family as it were. I see no reason in the world why we should try to alter that position. I do not think it would help us as a nation to do so, nor do I think it would be beneficial to the world in its present state.

Let me say again that I am not boasting of the fact that I am a Canadian or a British subject or anything like that because that was something with which I had nothing to do. I can only consider it my good fortune that it did happen in that way. But there are certain factors, intangible perhaps, that are important. I do not know whether the point has been made but I think it is a good one that the status of a person coming to Canada from another part of the British commonwealth should depend upon whether, after entering this country and being here for a certain period of time, he intended to maintain domicile here and become a citizen of Canada. In that case I do not think he should necessarily have to wait for five years before being accepted into full citizenship.

Another point I wish to make is that I do not believe in the revocation of naturalization certificates. I think that when we give Canadian citizenship he or she should remain a Canadian citizen for keeps. If he breaks the law he should be treated as any other Canadian citizen who breaks the law and should be punished just as any other Canadian would be punished. To revoke his citizenship and send him back to where he came from is not the proper thing to do, in my opinion, in this enlightened age. We are here trying to create a Canadian citizenship, and I am all for that. I think the minister is to be commended for bringing in this measure so soon after taking office. I would much rather, when I visit other countries, that I visit them as a Canadian than as a British subject. Let me say again that I am casting no reflections on those who are British subjects. We should try to build up reciprocal relations between ourselves and the other parts of the British commonwealth. There are certain rights and privileges which British subjects have in Canada and which Canadians have in other parts of the commonwealth, I do not want to see them curtailed in any respect whatsoever.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): We have an amendment to section 10 (1):

That section 10 (1) (c) be amended by inserting after the word "war" in line 25, the following words:

"or is a British subject within the meaning of section 28."

Mr. GRAYDON: I desire to ask the minister some questions, and I am rather surprised, Mr. Chairman, that you are reading the amendment, because I do not think the debate is quite concluded. Unfortunately I have not been able to be here all the afternoon, and perhaps the Minister of Mines and Resources has carried out the undertaking he gave me the day before yesterday to place upon Hansard for each year the immigration figures from the United Kingdom to Canada. Would he mind doing that now if he has the information available?

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member for Peel asked me the other day if I could state the number of admissions during the fifteen years which I quoted, and the number of deportations during that period. I have here the statistics of immigration to Canada of British subjects from April 1, 1930, to March 31, 1945:

Immigration to Canada of British Subjects, from April 1, 1930, to March 31, 1945.

Fiscal year	From overseas	From U.S.A.	Totals
1930-31	28,144	2,938	31,082
1931-32	7,332	1,815	9,147
1932-33	3,283	1,806	5,089
1933-34	2,454	1,032	3,486
1934-35	2,408	769	3,177
1935-36	2,264	709	2,973
1936-37	2,521	742	3,263
1937-38	3,351	852	4,203
1938-39	3,831	917	4,748
1939-40	3,962	1,234	5,196
1940-41	3,428	2,064	5,492
1941-42	2,353	1,180	3,533
1942-43	2,524	1,344	3,868
1943-44	4,519	1,101	5,620
1944-45	10,564	907	11,471
Totals	82,938	19,410	102,348

Mr. GRAYDON: That is the period in which the fourteen thousand were deported?

Mr. GLEN: Yes. May I add a few remarks while I am on my feet? When I was listening to the hon. member for Calgary West, I was struck of course with the manner of his presentation; as a matter of fact, with the manner in which all hon. members have presented their views; but it also seemed to me that, in dealing with the subject from the immigration point of view, the committee has not exactly appreciated what would happen if this period of five years were abolished. Suppose it happened that an immigrant from the British isles, having all the requisite qualifications to enable him to come to this country, was admitted, and stayed for a year; if the amendment moved by the hon. member for Eglinton became the law of the land this man would be entitled to a certificate of permanent landing and citizenship. Suppose that later on, say in another two or three years, it was found that he was a criminal or otherwise came within the prohibitions of the Immigration Act and therefore liable to deportation, and suppose that then the immigration officials proposed to deport him and took the necessary proceedings; he would be able to claim, in view of the citizenship law as amended by the motion of the hon. member for Eglinton, that he could not be deported because by the latest act of the parliament of Canada he had the right of citizenship one year or so after his arrival, and that he had received his certificate, and the immigration authorities would be deprived of the power of deportation which is now contained in the Immigration Act. I think the committee will realize that in such an event a certificate of citizenship, given at the end of one year, would need to be revoked. In many cases such as I gave in the list submitted to the committee, there was eminent reason why the persons involved should be deported because, as I pointed out, the effects on the country of procreation by persons mentally unstable created problems with which we would have to deal. Again, if a person who had been here a year was recommended for deportation, he would be in the position of not having a state elsewhere.

Mr. GREEN: Would he not still be a British subject?

Mr. GLEN: He has acquired Canadian citizenship.

Mr. GREEN: He is still a British subject.

Mr. GLEN: He is still a British subject, of course, but that does not give him the same privileges of going back to Britain as he had before.

Mr. GREEN: It does, under present British law.

Mr. GLEN: If he had Canadian citizenship and he went back to Britain he would have to comply with the requirements of the law with regard to immigrants.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has not the minister now touched upon the very point which has been raised on this side time after time, that the giving of Canadian citizenship does interfere and may sometimes derogate from the position of a British subject?

Mr. GLEN: The point I am making is that if a man who comes here is given a certificate after one year, and if the immigration authorities find him unacceptable under the provisions of the immigration law and want to deport him, they cannot do so, assuming the hon. member's amendment is passed. We would have two laws in conflict. The hon. member for Eglinton does not think it will be necessary to alter the provisions of the immigration law, but the law officers and the officers of the department are convinced that if this amendment should pass we shall have to alter the immigration law to accord with it.

Mr. FLEMING: Let us do so.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member said he did not want that.

Mr. FLEMING: I said I did not think it was necessary, but if it is, we are all of one mind, surely.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member has been discussing the matter from one point of view, but I am discussing it from another. I am discussing it from the point of view of immigration, and I wish to reserve and preserve the provision of the Immigration Act whereunder we can deal with undesirable citizens who come to this country, for the reasons which I have given, and which I think are satisfactory to all hon. members. But by this amendment we would be giving absolute citizenship to all immigrants after one year, and that citizenship would have to be revoked in order that they could be deported to their country of origin.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister have any objection if a provision were inserted in this bill to enable the Department of Immigration to deport, up to a period of five years, people who should be deported?

Mr. GLEN: Then what is the use of the alteration?

Mr. GREEN: Would he have objection if that were done?

Mr. GLEN: The point is that all these laws should be related. We cannot have conflict between two laws—the Immigration Act enabling men to enter the country, and another law saying we cannot deport them.

Mr. GREEN: If that provision were inserted in the citizenship bill we could still deport them.

Mr. GLEN: I do not see the necessity for it at all. I believe the bill as now framed gives exactly the same rights and privileges to a British subject as he has had for twenty-seven years. As the Minister of Agriculture has pointed out, any immigrant to this country from the British isles can obtain the privilege of voting or of being nominated to any office in the country after one year, but he has not absolute citizenship until the lapse of five years, during which time his record may be investigated and he would be subject to deportation if he had not conformed with our immigration laws during that period of five years. This law does no more than that. It takes nothing away from a citizen coming from the old country; he is in exactly the same position as he was in before. The only difference is on the question of procedure and the fact that he can now obtain documentary evidence of his citizenship, whereas before he did not. I take a strong position in this matter, because naturally I shall be faced with the duty of dealing with immigrants coming to this country and if the powers of the immigration law are removed by the bill we are now discussing, by virtue of an amendment such as is proposed by the hon. member for Eglinton we shall defeat the very purposes of the immigration law and create difficulties which it will be hard to surmount. That, I suggest, would be harmful to the country.

Mr. McMASTER: The whole basis of the argument put forward by the Minister of Mines and Resources has been that we must wait for five years to find out whether a man should be deported for some defect or because of some crime which could not be discovered at the time he came in. The minister gave figures the other day of the number of deportations from 1930 to 1945 and yet, when asked for the number of immigrants that had come in, he gave only the number that came in between the same years, 1930 and 1945. In other words, he overlooked the very basis of his own argument that anyone here for five years should be deported for certain reasons. Why did he not give the number of immigrants who came from Britain in the five years preceding 1930? We know that immigration fell off largely from 1930 on because of conditions that prevailed in this country. I find that there came to Canada from the British isles in 1926, which would be within the five-year period, 48,000; in 1927, 52,000; in 1928, 55,000; in 1929, 66,000; in 1930, which may have been included in the minister's figures, 31,000; the next year, 7,000; and down to as low as three thousand.

No fair comparison can be made as between the number of immigrants who came in and those who were deported unless we go back to 1925, particularly in view of the fact that that is the very basis of the argument the minister used. The fact is that over 225,000 came from the British isles from 1926 to 1930. Adding that to the 80,000 mentioned by the minister, you will find that over 300,000 Britishers came in, and the total sent back for crimes was, using the figure the minister gave, about 1,740. That would be less than two per cent of those who came in; in fact, far less than one per cent.

What about the rest of Canada? Was the rest of Canada good during all that time? I agree with the hon. member from Vancouver East who said that if you make a man a Canadian citizen you should take him for better or for worse, just as you do if you marry a woman, and these people should not be sent back for crimes committed a considerable time after they came here. The minister mentioned 1,740 crimes committed by these 300,000 Britishers. What about all Canadians? I find that in 1930, when we deported several hundred Britishers because they had committed crimes—I am referring to indictable crimes and not the lesser offences —there were indictable crimes committed in Canada to the extent of 34,000; in 1931, 36,000; in 1932, 36,000—and all this time, remember, we were sending Britishers back because they committed crimes—in 1934, 38,000; in 1935, 37,000; and in 1936, 41,000. In other words, it did not stop crime in Canada. In 1937 there were 42,000 such crimes; in 1938, 48,000; in 1939, 53,000.

After all, I do not think these Britishers were so bad. They might be said to be at least the equal of those who were here. As a matter of fact, in computing the number of crimes committed throughout Canada, in the ten years I have spoken of, I find they amounted to three per cent for the whole period, whereas the number committed by Britishers was much less than two per cent; in fact, less than one per cent.

The Minister of Labour in half-hesitating way put his finger on the cause of deportation when he said that during that time many Britishers asked to be deported. I live in a good district of Toronto, in fact, the best district, but on our borders are a large number of people who lived in moderate circumstances—tradesmen, men working on buildings and so on—and many of them lost their jobs. I know many of those people who asked to be deported. They came to my office and said they wanted to go back to England where some of them had friends who would provide for them. At their own request they were seeking a return to the old country and at that time it was suggested that some of them were going back to take the dole. We used to use the word "dole" in those days in reference to unemployment insurance, and those people would be quite indignant when the word was used in their hearing. They would get angry and say, "It is not a dole but unemployment insurance." In fact, it was unemployment insurance such as this government introduced into this country during the last few years.

Therefore we have no reason to say that these people were unsatisfactory citizens, though the conditions here were unsatisfactory to them at that time. The present government, and also perhaps our own prior Conservative government, were to blame. People with a child of six would receive, in addition to what milk was put on their doorstep, the sum of eighty-one cents a week to support the sixth child. These men had, therefore, reason to be dissatisfied with Canada and to ask to be deported.

I really cannot understand the position taken against the amendment by the people who themselves came from the old country. I can only assume that in every walk of life, there are those who are most severe against their own people and take a contrary attitude when they get away from their old traditions. But we who claim to be of the third or fourth generation believe that these people are good people and we want to give them a chance. If we had given them a chance they would have been good citizens. I agree with the hon. member who suggested that we might safely adopt British citizens after one year, for better or for worse.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has almost intimated that I might have some prejudice against Britishers coming to this country. I have no prejudices, as he can understand, and as the committee will appreciate. We shall be glad to have them. But I take the position that any immigrant coming to Canada must be in exactly the same position as I was in. I was subject to the laws of the country, and if I were not a suitable immigrant that country had the power to deport me to Scotland. In other words, the immigration law deals with the individual and not with the race, and if the individual has the qualifications necessary he will be welcomed to the country. I hope the hon. gentleman will not seek to convey the idea that I would be against immigration from Britain, because we have many inquiries and I shall be glad to see them here myself.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not believe the minister's attitude in this matter is any different from my own. We are both of British stock. Would he, however, care to place on the record the number of deportations of British subjects that were sent back at their own request? Perhaps the department does not have that detailed information, but I am sure it would be appreciated by the committee if we could get it.

Mr. GLEN: I do not know if the information is available in that form. I shall make inquiries, and if it is available I shall be glad to give it.

Mr. BENTLEY: I have one or two questions on which I should like to get some information. I would be in sympathy with the amendment if it were confined and could be confined to the people who are in the minds of those who wish to see the amendment go through, namely, the people from the British isles; but the amendment reads as follows:

> That section 10 (1) (c) be amended by inserting after the word "war" in line 25, the following words:
> "or is a British subject within the meaning of section 28."

Turning to section 28 we find this:

> A person, who has acquired the status of British subject by birth or naturalization under the laws of any country of the British commonwealth other than Canada to which he was subject at the time of his birth or naturalization, shall be recognized in Canada as a British subject.

I am not too certain that the people in British Guiana are of the same state of mind or educational advancement with regard to democracy as we think we are in Canada. If I read contemporary history correctly I am not too sure that the Dutch Boers and the negro population of South Africa and some of the people down there who came from Great Britain have the same conception of democracy as we have. I do not know whether the native population of Australia may be called British subjects. I do not know to what extent the many generations of civil servants who originally came from Britain and their descendants whose blood in some cases may be mixed with the British subjects of India, are in exactly the same position as we are in regard to the development of democratic institutions. I am not saying this to detract from any values they have.

It has been argued that by admitting these people under this amendment we would be admitting people who would be in the same state of development with regard to democracy as we are. I do not think the argument holds good when we take into consideration those who are described in section 28. Unless I have assurance on that one way or the other, I shall have to vote against the amendment.

There is something else to which I should like to refer, and I wish my hon. friends opposite to take these remarks in the same spirit in which I am trying to use them. I am a native of Canada, and come from many generations who were natives of Canada. My blood contains blood from all of the original immigrants to the maritimes with the exception of French. In this country we have almost three and a half million people of French descent. Why not add to this amendment the words, "people from France"? There is an affiliation there. Unless an amendment of this kind is clearly defined, some of us who are trying to be honest and fair about this matter, and who have not too much training in legal technicalities, are being put in an impossible position.

I am giving the Secretary of State credit for having given consideration to all these factors. When I spoke on this matter earlier I indicated that this was one time that a minister of this government had done something which pleased me. I have not yet seen any reason why I should change that statement. I like the bill the way it is. I shall have to vote for it the way it is unless somebody brings forward something better than has been offered up to date.

Mr. FULTON: I realize that the committee is anxious to come to a vote on this subject, but possibly an opportunity should be given to the hon. member for Temiscouata to bring another definition before the committee.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current because I think he will receive his answer. It is contained within the bill. Further than that, I understand that he will receive his answer from the hon. member for Eglinton. At that time I shall be interested in seeing which way he votes on this amendment.

Judging from the remarks of the last few speakers, I believe it is generally agreed that if we could arrive at an agreement as to the importance of this amendment, then we might achieve unanimity either in adopting or rejecting it. As the arguments developed it became apparent to my mind that hon. gentlemen opposite felt that we had failed to make out a case to show that if the section carries as it stands unamended, then the condition of the British subject coming to Canada in the future will be in no way prejudiced. I should like to revert to that question for a moment. If we were convinced that the lot of the non-Canadian British subject coming into Canada in the future were not to be changed by the section, if we were convinced after all that has been said as to the desirability of unanimity in this connection, we would most certainly not prolong our advocacy of this amendment; but we are not convinced.

I should like to refer the Secretary of State to his words as they appear on page 503 of Hansard, which he used on introducing the bill for second reading. He said:

> Under this bill we are seeking to establish clearly a basic and definite Canadian citizenship which will be the fundamental status upon which the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend.

I referred to these words two nights ago and asked the minister to explain them in view of his later statement that this bill will make no difference to the rights of the British subject coming into Canada. The minister said that I was trying to put an interpretation on his words. I do not think that is strictly accurate. I merely quoted his words and asked him to explain them. I repeat my request to the Secretary of State. I ask him what he means by "rights and privileges of Canadians"? It seems to me that these words, as he used them, can only mean that the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend upon the acquisition of Canadian citizenship.

[Mr. Bentley.]

In the debate so far it has been generally agreed that up until the time this bill becomes law the British subject coming to Canada has all the rights and privileges of other Canadians, at least within a year, and probably has them when he lands. Now, however, his rights and privileges are to be dependent upon the acquisition of citizenship, and that is going to take him five years. The minister does not agree. I can see that we are still not at one on this question.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. gentleman allow me to state the situation again? Let it be clearly understood so that there will be no question about it. Under this bill every right, every privilege which the British subject had and has to-day will continue. Need there be any more affirmation on that point?

Mr. GREEN: It is not quite that simple.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. gentleman show me what right or privilege the British subject will lose after the passage of this bill?

Mr. FULTON: Mere constant repetition does not constitute proof. The minister has stated that over and over again. He has stated that under this bill the British subject is not losing a right. On one occasion I agreed with him. I said: "Not under this bill." This bill does not take anything away from the British subject now in the country, but it does impose an obstacle on British subjects coming into the country in the future.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What obstacle?

Mr. FULTON: That obstacle is that they will have to wait for five years before they can acquire Canadian citizenship. It is generally agreed that at present, to all intents and purposes, they acquire it the day they land or, at the most, after having established domicile for one year.

This five-year provision will have an effect the moment an act is passed making any of these fundamental rights and duties dependent upon Canadian citizenship. We have been assured it is not the intention of this government to pass such an act, but many of the rights and duties which Canadians enjoy are dependent upon provincial statutes. Personally I think it would be quite right, once having defined the status of Canadian citizenship, to make the rights and duties of Canadians dependent upon the acquisition of that status. I think that would be a right and proper thing to do. The avowed purpose of this bill, in the words of the minister, is to define the status and to make the acquisition of rights dependent upon the acquisition of that status. Therefore, if you place an obstacle, whether it be a temporal obstacle or a physical obstacle such as actual restriction, in the way of the acquisition of the status, then you impose that obstacle in the way of the acquisition of those rights and duties.

I am not going to repeat the arguments which have been advanced as to the desirability of maintaining a uniform status of British subjects throughout the commonwealth. I think we have seen a great deal of unanimity this afternoon as to that point. Therefore what I am trying to say is that we have good grounds for our contention that by this bill we in Canada are discriminating against the British subject as no other part of the empire has so far done. I realize that is not a pleasant thing to say about a bill introduced by this government, and I did say the other evening that I thought it was done inadvertently. But in support of my contention that so far Canada alone is imposing this restriction, this obstacle to British subjects, I should like to read a newspaper article I came across the other day, in order to contrast our attitude and our actions with those of the United Kingdom government. In the Victorian Daily Colonist of February 1, under the date line of London, England, January 31, appears a report that Mr. E. Thurtle, labour member at Westminster, asked whether the British government intended to continue admitting citizens of Eire to the British civil service. His question was asked in view of the recent announcement by Mr. De Valera that citizens of Eire were not British subjects. The report in the Colonist continued:

> Glanvil Hall, financial secretary to the treasury, in a written reply said: "According to the law of the United Kingdom, citizens of Eire, with few exceptions, are British subjects and His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom does not propose to discriminate against them in making appointments to the civil service."

There I think you have a definite distinction between the attitudes adopted by the two governments. You have the one country, Eire, going so far as to say her citizens are not British subjects; yet you still have the government of the United Kingdom saying that because they are British subjects they will not discriminate against them, that all they have to do is come to the United Kingdom and they may become civil servants immediately. I submit that no one could criticize any government for making appointment to the civil service, for instance, dependent upon the acquisition of Canadian citizenship. The moment that is done it means that a British subject coming from the United Kingdom cannot be appointed to the civil service for a period of five years. Without for the moment entering into the question of whether that is a good or bad thing, it means that a British subject coming to this country from any other part of the commonwealth must wait for five years before he can receive that appointment. Then it is quite logical to assume that the bar society of British Columbia, for instance, may restrict the enrolment of students to those who are Canadian citizens. Then a British subject from Australia, New Zealand or the United Kingdom would have to wait for five years after coming to this country before he could be enrolled as a law student. There are many ways in which it would be quite possible for this bill to be made the basis of discrimination against British subjects, as compared with the rights they now enjoy. As I have said, at the present time a citizen of Eire, whose government has said it does not regard its people as British subjects, may become a civil servant as soon as he arrives in the United Kingdom.

That being the case, I suggest that we in Canada in justice can do no less than the same thing that is being done in the United Kingdom and all the other parts of the empire; that is, to continue to give British subjects their right to acquire citizenship on entry. No one on this side of the house, and I imagine no one in any part of the house, would have any objection to requiring a British subject to file a formal declaration of intention. I think it would be perfectly proper to require him to declare his intention of residing in Canada for the necessary period, but I submit it is inescapable that as long as we retain the five-year clause in this bill and make it apply to British subjects just as it applies to emigrants from other parts of the world, then we in Canada are open to the charge that we have been derogating from the status of a British subject.

One objection advanced by the Minister of Mines and Resources was that he requires this five-year period because he must be able to deport undesirable immigrants. That objection, I believe, can be met in section 21 of the present bill. The minister has said that if a person is allowed to become a citizen at the end of a year, that right is irrevocable. I would point out that under section 21 there is provision for the revocation of a certificate of naturalization.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FULTON: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose at six o'clock I was in the process of discussing the objections of the Minister of Mines and Resources to the present amendment. As far as I could understand, they were largely a repetition of what he said last night. My answer must be, as it was last night, that if he foresees in the present amendment danger to his powers under the Immigration Act, then under section 21 of the present bill as it now stands there is preserved to the Secretary of State all the powers necessary to protect this country against the danger, largely fancied I think, of the undesirable British subject who may be an immigrant to this country. I can only repeat what I said on a previous occasion that if the Minister of Mines and Resources has any specific fears on that score and if he does not feel that there exists ample power under section 21 it would be within the rights of this parliament to amend that section to give him all the powers he requires.

That being the case, and in view of the fact that there was such a large degree of unanimity this afternoon as to the desirability of preserving the present status of British subjects in this dominion, I would close simply by repeating my request to the Secretary of State that he explain to the committee the meaning of his words which are to be found on page 503 of Hansard:

> Under this bill we are seeking to establish clearly a basic and definite Canadian citizenship which will be the fundamental status upon which the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend.

I ask him to explain how those words can be reconciled with his subsequent statement that a British subject from any part of the empire coming to this country must wait for five years before he acquires the status of a Canadian citizen.

Mr. GREEN: There are one or two points I should like to mention this evening. The Secretary of State said on Monday, as reported on page 1015 of Hansard:

> . . . the bill will not and does not remove one iota of the rights and privileges that are now enjoyed by British subjects in Canada.

He has repeated that at different times, both in his remarks and by way of interjection when other members were speaking. I think he is not correct. In the first place, as the bill was originally presented a British subject had to appear in the naturalization court. That certainly changed his rights; it changed his position and was a detriment. The government has admitted that by withdrawing the provision and providing that he need not appear in naturalization court. Then there are other rights and privileges at stake, and I refer you, Mr. Chairman, and the ministers concerned to the election act which was passed last year by the province of Quebec. This is chapter 15 of the statutes of that province. Section 47 sets out the qualifications of electors, which are as follows:

> 1. Has been domiciled in the province for at least twelve months immediately preceding the date fixed for the enumeration;
> 2. Is domiciled in a polling subdivision on the first day fixed for the enumeration;
> 3. Is of the full age of twenty-one years on or before the polling day;
> 4. Is of Canadian nationality;
> 5. Is not affected by any disqualification from voting contemplated by this act.

I understand that before that the provision was that an elector must be a British subject. Here is one provincial government that has the qualification that a voter must be of Canadian nationality. There is a distinct loss of rights if the citizenship bill now before the committee goes through in its present form. I realize that the Dominion Elections Act contains the qualification that a voter must be a British subject and we have had the asurance of the minister that that act will not be changed. However, the minister is not in a position to say that provincial election acts will not be changed.

Mr. MARTIN: We have no power.

Mr. GREEN: Here is one instance where a change has been made less than a year ago and I have no doubt that a similar change will be made in Saskatchewan. It will probably be only a matter of time before changes will be made in other provinces or in other legislation. For example, there is the old age pension legislation in which a change may be made. The minister is stretching a point when he says that no rights or privileges are being taken away by this bill.

We have asked in this amendment that there be a distinction made between the British subject and the alien. The basic reason for that request is that the person coming here from a partner nation in the commonwealth has had training in our British institutions, in our parliamentary government, and has the same general outlook. I do not think there is a person on the government side of the house who would deny that a person coming from another British nation is better qualified to become a Canadian citizen because of his experience and background than the person who comes from another country such as Russia or China. We are asking that that difference be acknowledged by this bill.

As far as I can see, the only reason put forth by the government for not making that distinction is that it will complicate the administration of the Immigration Act. The defence put forward is based on the Immigration Act and that is not a proper answer to our submission. Surely the position is the same with the Immigration Act. In the partner nations of the commonwealth we have Canadian facilities for examining immigrants to make sure that a person is not allowed to come to Canada who will not be able to establish a permanent citizenship here. The Immigration Department has far better facilities for making the necessary investigations and doing the necessary checking in Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand than it has in Holland or Russia. I do not think anyone would contend to the contrary. Therefore I submit that one way out of this difficulty would be to have the Immigration Act amended so that a British subject from one of the partner nations of the commonwealth should not be deported after a shorter period than five years, should not be deported, say after three years. It should be possible to check up on a person from another British nation within three years if it takes five years to check up on a person coming from outside the commonwealth. I put that suggestion before the ministers concerned because I think it is one way out of the difficulty.

But if they do not feel free to accept that suggestion, why not provide in this citizenship bill itself that there be power to deport up to five years, although citizenship be granted to such a British subject in a shorter time? In other words, retain the power to deport up to five years. These people will not be stateless; they are still British subjects and that status is carefully preserved for them under the bill as drawn. I think you can get around the difficulty, leaving the Immigration Act as it is, if the government will not cut down the time under that act to three years for a British subject, and yet providing in this bill that a person entering Canada from a partner British nation can get citizenship within a shorter time than persons coming from, say Russia or China. I would ask the two ministers concerned to give these suggestions serious consideration because, if something like that were done, I do not think there would be reason for much controversy over the other provisions of this bill and we might be able to get it through practically unanimously.

Mr. KNIGHT: I asked the minister a question which is recorded on page 1003 of Hansard, and the same subject was mentioned this afternoon in connection with section 28, which has a distinct bearing on the section before us. Section 28 states:

A person, who has acquired the status of British subject by birth . . .

As the hon. member for Kamloops has pointed out, most of the citizens of the Irish Free State were born British subjects but they have renounced the status of a British subject. Is the minister now prepared to answer the question I asked at that time?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked the same question and it was agreed that we would discuss it under the pertinent section, section 28.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to say a brief word to clear up several problems that seem to have arisen during the course of the discussion.

The hon. member for Swift Current raised the question of the position of British subjects coming from lands outside the self-governing nations of the commonwealth. It will have been observed that my amendment confines the privilege which I suggest ought to be given to those within the scope of section 28. Section 28 refers to:

A person, who has acquired the status of British subject by birth or naturalization under the laws of any country of the British commonwealth other than Canada.

Section 2(g) defines "country of the British commonwealth" as "a country listed in the first schedule to this act," and the first schedule to the act embraces only the self-governing nations of the commonwealth. So that we are not concerned in this amendment, with persons coming to this country from other than self-governing nations of the commonwealth.

The Secretary of State indicated that he would present an amendment to section 10. The house will welcome that amendment. But it does not touch the point I raised in my amendment. There is no escape from the issue raised there.

Someone has spoken of the desirability of unanimity on this bill, and I endorse that sentiment completely. No one would have been happier than I to see complete unanimity, and the minister will bear me out when I say I had hoped that we might approach this bill with unanimity, but apparently that has not been possible.

The immigration regulations really have no part in the debate on this amendment. I made it clear in everything I said in support of the amendment that I am assuming the provisions of the Immigration Act will remain inviolate. If there is the slightest doubt in the mind of the Minister of Mines and Resources it would be very simple for him to introduce the requisite amendment to make that perfectly plain beyond the shadow of doubt. So let us not have this question confused by raising these points about immigration.

As I followed the remarks of the Secretary of State to-day, he said that one reason why he could not give support to this amendment was the problem raised by the Immigration Act. If we are to amend the provisions of the Immigration Act, there cannot be any objection in principle to my amendment.

The one point remaining is that raised by the Secretary of State as to deporting someone to whom a certificate of citizenship has already been granted. We have had it from the Secretary of State himself that, after all, no change is made by this bill in the status of a British subject coming to this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE: We heard the opposite from the hon. member for Kamloops just before six o'clock, because he said that the rights and privileges of Canadians were absolutely destroyed by this bill.

Mr. FLEMING: I do not know what the Minister is referring to. I am dealing with the statement made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. MACKENZIE: The hon. member for Kamloops said before six o'clock that the rights and privileges of Canadians were taken away by this bill.

Mr. FLEMING: I am dealing now with the point raised by the Secretary of State, the question of deporting those now enjoying the rights of citizenship. The right of deportation at the present time is being exercised in the case of those who, according to the argument of the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon and on the reasoning of the two ministers are to-day citizens in the eyes of our law.

On the next question which has been advanced, the Secretary of State, I suggest, has raised for himself a dilemma in the course of the argument on the bill. He has said that it is in effect the same citizenship as now exists. He has said that in substance we are only legislating what is the practice. If that is the case; if the rights of citizenship are in effect, continuing the right of franchise as heretofore, the only difference created by the bill is the grant of a certificate. Why make that exception in the position of the British subject for that one mere trifle? If that is the only difference the bill is making, why raise this distinction against British subjects in the bill?

The other horn of the dilemma is—and this is the basis on which I understood the bill was first put before the house—that this was said to be a measure of far-reaching importance, that it would make a substantial change, that it was something of a new advent in legislation in this country. If that is the case—and I think the earlier contributions to the debate from the other side were in that vein rather than in the vein in which later remarks have been made—this new possession, this new citizenship, is not to be enjoyed by British subjects coming to this country from other parts of the commonwealth, except on substantially the same basis as aliens.

We have one new point, and I welcome it, because it led me to hope that we might arrive at some unanimity with respect to the question raised by the amendment. The ministers who spoke—particularly, in this respect, the Secretary of State and the Minister of Agriculture—indicated this afternoon a desire to preserve what they regarded and described as the present status of the British subject resident in this country, his present citizenship. That is precisely the desire to which this amendment seeks to give legislative effect. It has been assumed by the ministers that no other changes are to be made in existing legislation, whether federal or provincial, and that no practical difference will arise between the Canadian citizen as he will be created under this bill and the man who has enjoyed the right to call himself a citizen heretofore, the man who has had all the rights of citizenship, as we are told, namely a British subject resident in this country for a lesser period than five years.

I say that we now are in agreement that it is desirable that the full rights of citizenship now enjoyed by the British citizen from another part of the commonwealth who is in this country during the five-year period should be preserved to him. There is no argument left against this amendment of the bill, because a British subject of the kind I have mentioned will lose something under this bill; he will lose the right to call himself a citizen of this country, because once this bill becomes law the position is inescapable that there are only three classes of persons within the scope of this present discussion. There is the Canadian citizen; there is the alien; there is the British subject resident in this country who is waiting for the expiration of five years in order to qualify himself for citizenship. The man who is a British subject from another part of the commonwealth after taking up domicile here is no citizen; he has no right to call himself a citizen. This bill deprives such a person, compared with people who came to the country prior to the enactment of this bill, of the right to call himself a citizen, and we have it from the minister that that man is a citizen to-day. That is what this bill takes away from him.

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is it?

Mr. FLEMING: The right to call himself a citizen of Canada. Do I have to repeat it?

Mr. MACKENZIE: How?

Mr. FLEMING: If the minister cannot see it on reading the bill I shall go over it again. There is, for this purpose, the citizen under the bill; there is the alien coming to this land, and there is the British subject from other parts of the commonwealth coming here. During the five-year period which must elapse while he enjoys the franchise under the elections act as it is at present, and has the right, we are told, to stand for election to parliament, nevertheless he is not under this bill a Canadian citizen; and that is the status which this bill, if adopted, takes from him. If we are at one in the professed desire of the ministry to preserve the present status of citizenship of the British subject from other parts of the commonwealth acquired either immediately, as the Minister of Agriculture said this afternoon, or at the end of the one-year period—which is the test under the elections act—then the only way to express it is to adopt the amendment proposed.

Mr. MacNICOL: This afternoon I had intended to ask two further questions when I was interrogating the minister, but I did not get a chance to finish. I should therefore like to ask now two short questions. Section 10, subsection 1 (c) reads, at line 23:

. . . except where the applicant has served outside of Canada in the armed forces of Canada during time of war . . .

If, say a Polish citizen, one of the many races whose refugees fled to England after war broke out, joined while there a Canadian regiment and served on the continent of Europe, if he comes to Canada and remains here one year, will he then be able to qualify?

Mr. MARTIN: If he fought for Canada, yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: If a United States citizen came to Canada to train in any of our camps, remained here a year, proceeded overseas with some unit of our forces and returns to Canada, would he be eligible for Canadian citizenship in one year?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, if he fought for Canada outside Canada.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I have been wondering is this. Take the case of a non-British citizen from Europe who served in a Canadian regiment. He marches into Holland alongside a British regiment, because our battalions and the British battalions were together under General Sir Bernard Montgomery. Would the British soldier who fought alongside the Polish soldier, if he came to Canada, have to be here for five years before he has full citizenship? I was just wondering if the minister had taken that distinction into consideration.

Mr. MARTIN: The soldier in that case is identified with the country. The point is that he served in the armed forces of Canada and fought with the Canadian forces overseas, and that gives him citizenship.

Mr. MacNICOL: The non-British soldier would get citizenship in one year, but the British soldier fighting alongside of him would not get it under five years?

Mr. MARTIN: If he came in he would, of course, have the right to vote and do everything as a British subject. He is a British subject. He could come to Canada and have the privileges of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. MacNICOL: But he would not get his full citizenship until five years had expired?

Mr. MARTIN: He would not get his certificate.

Mr. MacNICOL: The other day the hon. member for High Park asked the minister a question. He took a hypothetical case. He asked: Assume that the bill comes into force on June 1 and suppose that on June 2 a Canadian soldier overseas marries an English girl; would she become a Canadian citizen? The minister answered that she would not be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. MARTIN: Under this bill all war brides will automatically become Canadian citizens. But in the case put to me, it was the day after this bill comes into force. In that case that British subject woman would have to wait for one year.

Mr. MacNICOL: She would have to wait for only one year?

Mr. BENTLEY: This afternoon I was discussing some parts of the British world not likely to come within the scope of the requirements as suggested by the amendment. The amendment is predicated on people from certain parts of Britain, the self-governing colonies or dominions, or nations as described in section 28. I wish, however, to mention another country, which I did not refer to this afternoon, more for courtesy's sake than for any other reason. If we want to put some people in a preferred position—and I do not think there should be any change in the bill—and we look to a country where the people have always exercised the kind of democratic procedure we have, then we could not possibly apply the present amendment to them. I refer to the little island of Newfoundland. The people there have submitted to government by a commission, and I cannot foresee any situation arising in Canada in which Canadians would submit to rule by commission. I would rather have a Tory government than that.

Mr. FULTON: Certain references have been made in the last few minutes by the Minister of Veterans Affairs to what I said this afternoon. He said that I stated that as a result of this bill the rights and privileges of Canadian citizens were being abrogated. What I said this evening before six o'clock was that under this bill as it stands the rights and privileges as Canadian citizens of British subjects who have so far been admitted to Canada are not being abrogated but that the rights and privileges of British subjects who may hereafter seek admission to Canada will be prejudiced; and that, inasmuch as that is the case, Canada, if the bill is adopted—

Mr. MACKENZIE: How are they prejudiced?

Mr. FULTON: Canada, as the bill stands, by unilaterally derogating from the rights and privileges of British subjects, is inviting similar derogation on the part of other empire countries. That was my whole point.

Mr. MACKENZIE: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman but I should like to ask him a simple question. I believe my hon. friend before six o'clock made a differentiation between rights and privileges of the British subject in Canada and such rights and privileges as they might have under the citizenship of Canada. Is that correct?

Mr. FULTON: It is not correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE: That is my memory of it.

Mr. FULTON: I am unable to obtain a proof of the statement I made, but my point was that the rights and privileges of British subjects who hereafter seek admission will be different.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Why?

Mr. FULTON: I made the point here in my speech this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE: No.

Mr. FULTON: Then I shall be glad to say it again if the committee wishes.

[Mr. Bentley.]

An hon. MEMBER: No, not that.

Mr. FULTON: Speaking on April 2, the Secretary of State said, with reference to this bill:

> Under this bill we are seeking to establish clearly a basic and definite Canadian citizenship which will be the fundamental status upon which the rights and privileges of Canadians will depend.

With that statement I have no quarrel; no member on this side has any quarrel. That is a very proper statement to make. But implicit in that statement is the declaration that any person coming to the country and seeking rights and privileges which we as Canadians enjoy, which everyone of the twelve million people here now enjoys, will be required to assume to himself and to acquire the status of a Canadian citizen. I think that is a very proper position. We have all agreed that this bill is in principle a good one inasmuch as it attempts. and its object is, to set up and define the position of Canadian citizen and to give to a Canadian the right in law to say, "I am a Canadian citizen." If we are agreed on that, I fail to see how we can disagree when we say that the person who is unable to say, "I am a Canadian citizen," will have fewer rights and privileges than we have now, and therefore the person who is denied for five years—

Mr. MACKENZIE: What is the difference?

Mr. FULTON: —the right to say, "I am a Canadian citizen", will not share the same rights and privileges which the Minister of Veterans Affairs and I have now and which will be the status of the British subject coming to this country the day after this bill as it stands is law.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Nonsense.

Mr. FULTON: The minister says, "nonsense".

Mr. MACKENIE: Yes, absolutely, and I meant it too.

Mr. GRAYDON: That is not parliamentary.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Then I say it is not correct.

Mr. FULTON: I am perfectly willing to have the minister point out to me where I am wrong. We are striving for unanimity—

Mr. MACKENZIE: I shall be glad to point out to the hon. member where he is wrong, but I would rather have the committee point out to him that he is not right.

Mr. FULTON: All I can say to the Minister of Veterans Affairs is that on occasion his lack of understanding passes comprehension. We have been striving, we are told, after unanimity, but if in order to achieve unanimity it is necessary to substitute a set of brains in the minister's head for what he has now, we shall never achieve it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: Another red herring.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no intention of delaying the committee on this matter. We have sat here for weeks and weeks now discussing the question of citizenship and my impression this evening is that some of the lawyers in this house should go and get a legal opinion on it.

Mr. MACKENZIE: From you?

Mr. GILLIS: You can consult a good firm. We have listened to at least a dozen lawyers and the interpretation which each places on this very simple matter is different. They lack either intelligence or expert legal training and that is why I say they should go and consult some good lawyer and find out where they stand. I am going to be frank about this matter. I have read this clause carefully and I cannot find anything wrong with it. I think this simple amendment injected into it is merely a matter of giving some free legal training to some young aspiring lawyers; and, taking advantage of the fact that the Secretary of State is an old practising lawyer, we are getting some pointers on this, because there is no doubt that some of them in the future, under this bill, will be extracting some pretty nice fees. After they have the necessary expert advice from the Secretary of State they will be able to use it to good advantage. Personally I believe we are wasting a great deal of valuable time. Someone is trying to make a lot of cheap political capital out of this. I see no reason in the world why we should change the bill from what it is. I suggest that we get down to business and take a vote on this matter, so that we can begin to deal with matters which are of more importance.

Mr. McGREGOR: Well, sit down.

Mr. GILLIS: In the nine weeks that my Tory friends have been rising in their places making cheap political capital out of this measure—

Mr. McGREGOR: The hon. member has done his share.

Mr. GILLIS: This is the first time that I have risen to say anything on the subject.

Mr. BROOKS: The hon. member is a good judge of cheap political capital.

Mr. GILLIS: I would not have taken part in this debate at this time were it not that I have become disgusted with the line of chatter that has come from my right. I am sure that if the people of the country read the press and think of the many matters that are of pressing importance in Canada at the present time, such as employment, taxes and all these things that affect them directly, they must think that this House of Commons is becoming merely a debating society, that we lack common sense and that we are wasting too much time on the subject matter of this bill.

In my opinion the amendment is irrelevant. It is unnecessary; it is a lot of nonsense, and it is about time that we got down to business and voted.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

The CHAIRMAN: Does the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

The CHAIRMAN: All those in favour of the amendment will please say, "yea".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yea.

The CHAIRMAN: Those opposed will please say, "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the "nays" have it. The amendment is lost.

Mr. HLYNKA: I should like to bring up two matters in connection with paragraph (d) of subsection 1 of section 10, and paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of the same section. These are matters in regard to which I should like to obtain some information from the minister. My first point has to do with applicants who apply for naturalization certificates and who unfortunately at one time or another happened to have been on relief. From personal knowledge I know that in Edmonton a number of people, through no fault of their own, were forced to go on relief in the thirties. They were refused naturalization certificates when they applied because there was an outstanding relief debt marked against them.

A resident of Canada who is a good citizen should not be penalized or discriminated against when it comes to a matter such as relief. I have personal knowledge of a number of these cases. I tried to see that these people got fair treatment. I endeavoured to assist them in whatever way I could, and yet in practically every case the judge would refuse to grant an application unless the applicant wiped out the outstanding relief payments which he had drawn. I know there is nothing in the bill requiring an applicant to repay the debt, but the judges take it upon themselves to order these people to repay the debt. I have known families with two, three or even more children who in the thirties became deeply indebted in the matter of relief. It seems unreasonable now to demand that these people repay $1,000, $1,500 or $2,000 of this relief money. If they are asked to repay it, why should not the Canadian-born do the same? It is not their fault that the governments of the day failed to give them an opportunity to make a living. Therefore I appeal to the minister to request the judges to grant certificates to these people so that they may be treated the same as Canadian-born persons when it comes to a matter of relief money.

The other matter upon which I should like to touch briefly deals with a particular case which I have in mind, but it covers a certain principle which has been overlooked, disregarded or ignored, not by the applicant but by the government. The care and the amount of work the minister and his advisers have put into the preparation of this bill are a good indication that various sections which have been included in the bill are important and should be observed. These sections are embodied in the bill for a definite purpose and they should be followed. At least the government should set an example in this regard. But I desire to draw the attention of hon. members as a matter of principle to the case of Sam Carr, who until recently lived in Toronto, and who obtained his certificate of citizenship within the last two years or so in spite of his anti-Canadian attitude.

Mr. MacINNIS: He was a Liberal pal in those days.

Mr. HLYNKA: That may be so. I am not dealing particularly with Mr. Carr, but with the principle which is involved. According to the information which I have, Mr. Carr came to Canada in 1924. In 1929 he went to Moscow to study at the Lenin Institute and returned to Canada in 1931. He was arrested for internment in September, 1942, and was released conditionally by the present government, and yet some time prior to the Grey North by-election and the general election Mr. Carr was granted a citizenship certificate. I should like the minister, not necessarily to-day, but to-morrow or the day after, to answer five questions in regard to this matter. It is not that I particularly desire to have these answers myself, but I think the people of this country should know what happened in this case. I am not reflecting in any way upon the present minister or his predecessors. The Secretary of State is a conscientious minister, and this happened before he took over the department. But I want some information on this matter, because we cannot afford to be so lax as to grant naturalization to individuals who during the first part of the war held a definite view against the interests of Canada. It seems to me there is something wrong here. It does not matter what party is in power; no bargains should be made with any individual or group of individuals when it comes to matters of this sort. I do not know if this were done, but it will be up to the minister to give this house the information I seek. These are the questions:

1. On what date did Mr. Sam Carr of Toronto make his first application for a naturalization certificate?

2. Were any of his applications turned down? If so, on what grounds, and by whom?

3. On what date was Mr. Carr's application approved, and who was the presiding judge?

4. Who investigated the facts concerning Mr. Carr's eligibility to become a Canadian citizen?

5. Upon whose recommendation was Mr. Carr's application approved? What are the names, occupations and addresses of those persons?

Mr. MARTIN: First, may I say that I fully concur in what the hon. gentleman has said, that no one should be deprived of the right to Canadian citizenship under this bill, or for that matter under the existing Naturalization Act, on the mere ground that he owes somebody else some money. Poverty is not and should not be in any way a disqualification from a right that should be open to everyone in this country regardless of economic position, regardless of race, religion or any of these matters. I may assure the hon. gentleman with all the force at my command that in the administration of this measure and the regulations which will be passed pursuant to the authority given under it, some of the abuses that have existed heretofore will not be allowed to continue, in so far as I have any power to prevent them.

The hon. member for Rosthern brought to my attention last fall an instance where in a certain part of western Canada a particular judge had refused two individuals the right to become naturalized on the mere ground that one owed a fairly large debt and the other owed a smaller debt. That judge, to the extent of the powers then existing, was told that he had acted contrary to the spirit of the act, and I can only say that in the regulations which will be developed under this measure that sort of thing will not be allowed to happen again.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was that the only ground in each case?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, that was the only ground given in the report of the judge. I may add that was not the first complaint in that particular community, but it will not happen again.

With regard to the questions concerning this individual, Mr. Carr, I cannot give the answers to-day because I was not in the department; I was not the minister when he was naturalized, and I have not the information. However, I shall make inquiries, and to the extent that I can find the answers I shall give them to the hon. gentleman at the first opportunity.

Mr. REID: I should like to direct a question to the minister in regard to section 10 (1) (a). Perhaps if I read it in layman's language I may give it a clearer interpretation than it is given in the bill itself. I read it in this way: "The minister may grant a certificate of Canadian citizenship to any person who is not a Canadian citizen, and who makes application for that purpose and satisfies the court that he has filed in the office of the clerk of the court for the judicial district in which he resides a declaration of intention to become a Canadian citizen not less than one or more than five years prior to the date of his application." My question to the minister is, does that debar a person who comes to this country from applying for citizenship six years, seven years or even ten years later? As I read this, it would seem that he must make his application or at least his declaration of intention between one and five years after coming to this country.

Mr. MARTIN: No. The section means there cannot be a gap of more than five years between the time notice of intention is given and the application is made; and of course this provision does not apply to British subjects.

Mr. HERRIDGE: I have not participated in this debate to any extent, but have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments coming from both sides, particularly in reference to this section. I must say that I find myself largely in sympathy with the point of view expressed by hon. members to my right on this side of the house. I do not think they have been dealing with a matter of light significance. I am one of those who believe we should give serious consideration to the fact that we are common citizens of the British commonwealth of nations. I am bound to say that in this bill I believe it should be possible for us to reconcile our two points of view. I believe in this bill we should recognize British citizenship as a whole because unless we recognize it, we will not preserve it. I am not going to repeat the arguments that have been advanced many times during this debate, because I do not intend to speak for very long, but those people for whom we are asking special consideration on a principle, the principle being our common citizenship in the British commonwealth, have some particular qualifications. First of all, they are British subjects and as such come here already as subjects of the king. Second, they have a knowledge of the workings of democracy under British institutions. Third, the great majority have a knowledge of one of the two official languages.

I listened with considerable interest to the objections raised by the Minister of Mines and Resources, as the one who has to administer the immigration laws of this country, and I quite appreciate his arguments and the force of his objections. But in an effort to reconcile the two points of view which I fully appreciate, I move the following amendment:

That section 10 (1) (c) be amended by inserting after the word "application" in line 29 the following words: "except that in the case of a British subject, two years shall suffice."

Mr. GREEN: Are the ministers not going to make any statement with regard to this amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Herridge) negatived.

The CHAIRMAN: Does section 10, subsection 1, carry?

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask the Secretary of State about three different points which arise in connection with this section. The first has to do with the wife of a Canadian, which is covered by paragraph (c) which states in part:

. . . where the applicant is the wife of and resides in Canada with a Canadian citizen . . .

Is that to be interpreted that unless and until that wife comes to Canada she cannot acquire Canadian citizenship?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: If a war bride from Holland comes to Canada after this bill becomes law, will it be necessary for her to appear in naturalization court?

Mr. MARTIN: Not if she married before the bill came into effect.

Mr. GREEN: It is the time she is married that governs?

Mr. MARTIN: If she comes in before the bill is in effect, she comes in under section 9 (c).

Mr. GREEN: But if she comes in after the bill comes into effect?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: She would have to appear in naturalization court?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: Paragraph (e) reads:

(e) he has an adequate knowledge of either the English or the French language, or, if he has not such adequate knowledge, he has resided continuously in Canada for more than twenty years.

Some suggestion was made during the debate that there should be an age limit in that paragraph, that it should apply, for example, to the person who was fifty years of age or over rather than to everyone. As I read this paragraph, a young man who comes here at the age of ten years could qualify at the age of thirty years under this twenty-year provision even though he could not then speak either English or French. I take it that the intention was to cover only those people who are now so old that it is difficult for them to learn one of the official languages. If that is the purpose of the section, would it not be wise to word it in that way?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has referred to the case of a boy who comes to Canada at the age of ten years and then applies twenty years later at the age of thirty. In the first place, the subsection is purely permissive; it does not state that a certificate must be granted to such a person. A discretion is maintained. As I said the other day, I was much impressed with the number of cases that had come to my attention. One notable one which I mentioned was that of a woman, over fifty years of age it is true, who came here from Europe. She had a number of children, all of them a credit to this country and to her. Two of those children fought with the armed services, one son being killed at Dieppe and the other being awarded the D.F.C. She had been turned down for citizenship and I had no answer to give that woman. That was one reason why, when I collaborated with my officers and with others, I thought this kind of section should go in. Many hon. members from all sides of the house, particularly those from the western provinces, have told me of like cases.

It is not possible to envisage every case and there might be one such as the hon. gentleman mentioned. But I think in that case the judge and the minister, exercising the discretion that is permitted to them, would be on their guard about admitting to citizenship someone who had spent twenty years in this country, after having entered at the age of ten years, without having learned one of the official languages. I hope there will be no more wars, and so does the hon. gentleman, but I do not think any minister administering this measure should be put in the position of receiving requests such as the one I have mentioned and not being able to accede to it. I think the case to which my hon. friend refers is one that is unlikely to come up. Surely it is not conceivable that a boy would come to this country at the age of ten years and then twenty years theerafter not have an adequate knowledge within the meaning of the bill.

Mr. GREEN: As the subsection reads it will apply to any one who comes here in the future?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: He may come next year, stay here for twenty years, not learn either English or French, and then apply for naturalization?

Mr. MARTIN: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: That is the effect of this subsection?

Mr. MARTIN: That is the effect.

Mr. GREEN: My final question has to do with the subject of an enemy state, for example, subjects of Germany or Japan. I see nothing in the bill referring to such people and apparently they are to be treated in the same way as people coming from any other part of the world. As the minister knows, after the last war special provision was made for the subjects of enemy countries

Mr. MARTIN: Would the hon. member mind waiting until we come to section 21 before discussing that?

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to put something in the bill to cover that matter?

Mr. MARTIN: That question properly should be asked under section 21.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On subsection 2—Special certificate to minor children.

Mr. MARTIN: I wish to propose an amendment which I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move. The amendment reads as follows:

That section 10 be amended.

1. By inserting a new subsection (2), as follows:

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection one of this section, the minister may grant a certificate of Canadian citizenship to any person who is a British subject and who makes to the minister a declaration that he desires such certificate and who satisfies the minister that he possesses the qualifications prescribed by paragraphs (b), (c), (d), (e), (f) and (g) of subsection one of this section; provided that in any case where, in the opinion of the minister, there is doubt as to whether the applicant possesses the said qualifications, the minister before granting such a certificate may refer the declaration and the material in support thereof to the court in the judicial district in which the declarant resides, and the declaration shall thereupon be dealt with as an application under subsection one of this section."

2. By renumbering the present subsection (2) as subsection (3).

3. By renumbering the present subsection (3) as subsection (4) and inserting after the words "subsection one" in line six thereof the words "and subsection two."

4. By renumbering the present subsection (4) as subsection (5) and substituting for the words "for the purpose of subsection one of this section" in line five thereof the words "for the purposes of subsection one and subsection two of this section."

Mr. MACKENZIE: I so move.

Mr. BRACKEN: I understand that the minister proposed this amendment as a result of the discussion this afternoon and earlier.

Mr. MARTIN: I can say that the discussion from all sides has been very helpful, but I might add that for some time we have had the matter in mind but did not know exactly what should be done until we had heard the discussion in the house.

Mr. BRACKEN: That is not the point I wished to make. It is this, that while a few members of the house, my own supporters, have seen and, I understand, approved this amendment, I would respectfully suggest to the minister that since all the members of the house have not seen it and since the amendment is long and complicated it might be left over for consideration to-morrow when all hon. members will be able to see it in Hansard.

Mr. MARTIN: With that understanding we shall let the section stand and come back to it.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask one question with regard to this amendment? As I understand it, its purpose is to meet our objection that the British subject should not be required to appear in a naturalization court. This amendment provides that a certificate shall be granted to him without that appearance except in the rare case where there is some doubt whether he meets the requirements of the bill, in which rare case the minister will ask that he go before a naturalization court. Is it or is it not the intention of the government that the great majority of cases will be covered by this amendment and that the great majority of British subjects applying for Canadian citizenship will not have to appear in a naturalization court?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman in the last sentence is quite correct. It will be only in very rare special instances that that will be required. The amendment came into being as a result not only of suggestions made from all sides of the house but following consideration by officials of my own department and myself, who have been giving these matters a good deal of thought for the last seven months. My hon. friend has made some valuable contributions; as has also the hon. member for New Westminster who has had some intimate discussion with me on this matter, also the hon. member for Spadina. Every member has been very helpful, as I feel we all must be in this matter, and we are only too glad to get the opinions of all hon. members.

Mr. GREEN: I am very glad that the minister has made the change.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before we proceed to section 11, Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to propose as subsection 6 of section 10 and I think I should put it before the minister and the committee now in order that consideration may be given to it before the entire section comes before the committee to-morrow, so that the minister will be in a position to decide whether he will be prepared to accept it.

This proposed amendment arises out of certain remarks which have been made by myself and by other members of the house from time to time regarding the necessity of assuring that a certificate of citizenship should carry with it certain inalienable rights.

Under section 10(1)(f) a step has been taken in the right direction whereby the minister intends to ensure that an adequate knowledge of the responsibility and privileges of Canadian citizenship shall be conveyed to applicants for citizenship. I do not intend to go into details in that regard, but the system adopted in the United States of America is such that I am sure that, subject to the necessary changes, it could be incorporated into our regulations here, namely, the adoption of a text-book on citizenship and the setting up of schools for citizenship to the end that our citizens may have a greater appreciation and knowledge of what citizenship actually means, for only in recent weeks the Gallup polls have demonstrated that Canadian citizens in too many cases have little knowledge and appreciation of our system of government, or of those who govern us and of our constitution.

The subsection I propose is designed to provide that the citizen to be shall receive an adequate knowledge of the privileges of citizenship. When I spoke on April 2, following the speech of the minister, I said, as reported at page 513 of Hansard, and I ask the indulgence of the committee in referring to what I then said:

> Having established the basis of Canadian citizenship and having given a new unity to this country, I suggest that citizenship, if it is to mean what our citizenship does mean, requires that at this time—I referred to this incidentally the other day—we should consider the adoption by Canada of a Bill of Rights.

May I say that my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North introduced a resolution in the house which did not arrive, I think, at the point where it was discussed.

Mr. STEWART: I dropped it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Then I went on to say:

> There have been recent infringements upon citizenship by this government which have been a denial of the heritage that is ours.

I pointed out a little later:

> The British North America Act contains no personal safeguards against unwise or discriminatory legislation that might be passed by federal governments.

Great Britain has a Bill of Rights, and has had one for generations. I have before me "Selected Documents of English Constitutional History", wherein are set forth the rights that are inalienable under British citizenship; the first is the Petition of Right of 1628; the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679, and the Bill of Rights itself of 1689. All these acts setting forth the rights of British citizenship are part of the law of Britain and, as such, signify and set forth the rights of British citizens. The United States of America has a Bill of Rights, although it is not incorporated in the original constitution. Their Bill of Rights was passed in 1791 by way of amendments to the constitution.

I suggest this, that if citizenship is to mean what we hope it will mean, and what it does mean to us, freedom must flow from it. Freedom itself is immutable, although as conditions change ideas of freedom change. In this country—I am not at the moment raising an issue but am speaking in a spirit of cooperation—there has been continuing over a period of time since 1914 a series of gradual invasions and infringements of citizenship as epitomized in the Bill of Rights, in habeas corpus, in the Petition of Right and of other rights that are traditional. In this country in recent months there have been invasions of the rights of Canadian citizens which do not require to be discussed at this time. I refrain from discussing them in detail, but these invasions must be guarded against for the future. There has been a trend against freedom for the individual, going back to 1914, when the War Measures Act was passed, which act remained unrepealed. I think the time has come for a declaration on the part of parliament that Canadians possess certain rights under their citizenship; that these rights should not be unfairly or unjustly interfered with, and that, above all, there shall be no suspension, abrogation or temporary diminution or removal of those rights excepting by parliament, to the end that Canadian citizenship will imply and will carry into actuality equality without regard to race, religion or colour. I suggest that Canadian citizenship can be assured of these freedoms and their maintenance only by the incorporation into this measure of certain inalienable rights which have characterized British citizenship throughout the generations.

Without going into further detail in that connection and threshing old straw, the words of my amendment will convey the ideas I have in mind, the rights which should be protected, the rights which, in my opinion, should not be alienated other than by parliament itself, and certainly not by the executive. I therefore move, sir—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member should give notice of the amendment, because there is one amendment now before the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE: By consent.

Mr. MARTIN: He just wants to give it to us so that we can read it over.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I move, seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops:

> That the following words be added to the section as subsection 6: "Such certificate of citizenship shall be deemed to include a Bill of Rights as follows:
> 1. Freedom of religion, freedom of speech, and the right to peaceable assembly are assured.
>
> 2. Habeas corpus shall not be suspended except by parliament.
>
> 3. No one shall be required to give evidence before any tribunal or commission at any time if denied counsel or other constitutional safeguards."

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 10 stand?

Section stands.

On section 11—Grant of certificate of citizenship in certain cases.

Mr. GREEN: In paragraph (c) of section 11 we find the word "alien." Apparently there is no definition of "alien" in the bill, although it is defined in our present Naturalization Act and in our Immigration Act as meaning a person who is not a British subject. Why is no definition of that word inserted in this bill?

Mr. MARTIN: The reason it was left out is that there is no doubt concerning the legal connotation of the word and it was felt unnecessary to define it. "Canadian citizen" and "British subject" are defined in this bill, and in the case of other parts of the commonwealth which are recognized in section 28 of this bill. All other persons are aliens; "British subjects" are characterized in sections 26 and 28; and it was felt that we should follow the practice of recent legislation, based particularly on the treatise on nationality by Professor Hudson, to which I referred. Other countries have no such provisions. But we wanted to single out "Canadian citizen" and "British subject", which are characterized.

Mr. GREEN: What is the definition of "British subject"?

Mr. MARTIN: A person who owes allegiance to a common king.

Mr. GREEN: That is not set out in the bill?

Mr. MARTIN: But surely we know that. That is set out in the proceedings of the imperial conferences of 1930 and 1937.

Mr. FULTON: Would the minister by way of amplication tell us what sort of case is contemplated in section 11, subparagraph (b)?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. In the administration of the measure it has been found useful in cases of adoption of an alien child or a child of doubtful antecedents, and it really is a most essential clause. Adoption, as the hon. gentleman knows, cannot of itself confer national status. The consequence is that many families in Canada who have adopted children who happen to have been born in the United States or elsewhere found that the child when approaching maturity cannot, for example, obtain a schoolteacher's certificate, cannot enrol for certain professions, because the child cannot establish that he is a British subject. We have many such cases, and it is to deal with that kind of problem, which up to now we have been wholly unable to deal with, simply because we had no authority.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Certificate not effective till oath of allegiance taken.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain what the plan is with regard to the way in which the oath of allegiance is to be taken?

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member is now talking about other than British subjects?

Mr. GREEN: Explain it for both British subjects and non-British subjects.

Mr. MARTIN: In the case of British subjects there will be a regular form which contains at the bottom the words which appear in the second schedule of this bill, and they will simply sign their names underneath. In the case of others who will go before a judge, the intention is to have a ceremony. It will not be possible to maintain the ritual in all communities, because of considerations of the size of community and convenience and so on, but the ceremony as far as the oath is concerned will be somewhat as follows. Just before the applicants are presented with the certificate there will be an address, by the judge, we hope in most communities by the mayor, perhaps by visiting dignitaries of the various churches, and so on.

Mr. FLEMING: A member of parliament?

Mr. GREEN: The Secretary of State?

Mr. MARTIN: The Secretary of State has gone to a number of these, and proposes to go to others if he can. While the present Secretary of State does not personally add very much to the proceedings, I think his office does.

Mr. MacNICOL: Humility exalteth a nation.

Mr. MARTIN: Just before the certificate is presented they will be asked to rise, and the judge will administer the oath in a formal ceremony which we hope will be both impressive and memorable.

Mr. GREEN: A British subject can take the oath before anyone empowered to administer an oath?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. REID: When applicants come before the various judges of the nine provinces, are they to be asked questions as to their knowledge of the responsibilities of citizenship and so on, and is it proposed to have the series of questions similar for the whole of Canada?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. Up to now that has not been done. The hon. member for Lake Centre was speaking a while ago about a certain manual which we hope to get from certain educational institutions and which will set out in factual form certain well-known facts concerning Canadian life, and we shall have a series of questions prepared, which need not be exclusive but will be suggested to the person in charge of the ceremony. As the hon. member for Essex West said, Mrs. Hamilton of Windsor has written a wonderful textbook which will be widely used throughout this province and in which there are certain questions that she puts in a hypothetical way. In answer to the hon. member for New Westminster I may say that, so far as we can, we shall formulate a series of uniform questions seeking to convey to the potential Canadian citizen facts which I am sure all of us regard as necessary in such an application.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With reference to section 12, in the case of an infant under fourteen years of age, is there any provision for its being required to take the oath of allegiance on reaching the age of twenty-one, where the father was naturalized?

Mr. MARTIN: No, there is not. What is intended in the case of a child of fourteen who cannot take the oath is to have the schoolteacher in the particular community impress upon that child the nature of the obligation, and so on. That is all that is contemplated.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The child is automatically naturalized and becomes a Canadian citizen and remains such?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Certificate not to be granted to persons under a disability.

Mr. McKAY: How inclusive is the term "disability"?

Mr. MARTIN: It means incapacity of a minor, lunatic or idiot. The hon. gentleman will recall perhaps that under the heading disability in the interpretation section of the old act women were included. Under this bill—and little reference has been made to the fact, although in many commentaries on the bill in other countries, in journals on international law, much is made of it—we take the lead in giving to women the control of their national status. As I have said, at long last they are taken out of the disabled class as they should have been, and I am glad to make that statement to-night in the presence of the distinguished woman member of the house.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Rehearing.

Mr. GREEN: Is this a new clause?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain it.

Mr. MARTIN: Hon. members who have compared this bill with the old act will note that there has been a considerable diminution in some of the discretionary powers given the Secretary of State. I felt as soon as I became Secretary of State that I was doing many things that I should not have the power to do, and I have reduced to a minimum the discretionary powers exercised heretofore by secretaries of state. This section is new and provides in subsection 2 that the minister, in a case where a certificate has been granted, may order a rehearing. The purpose is to enable a rehearing to be required in cases where we are not satisfied that the proceedings have been properly conducted, or when all the evidence has not been produced or examined, or where for any other reason another examination of the case seems desirable. Once the rehearing takes place, the decision will be final. It does not apply, of course, when the court has rejected the application but only in cases of approval, where the minister has occasion for doubt.

If the committee wishes other reasons I can give them because there have been instances where in one place on one occasion no fewer than twenty-two certificates were granted. If we had had this power, I suggest that no one in this house would have granted those certificates. It is felt that there are cases where, because of lack of interest on the judge's part, the examination is so perfunctory that it cannot be said to have involved either a proper ceremony or the laying of a foundation for determining whether the application should be granted. The intention is to cover embarrassing situations that may develop.

Mr. GREEN: Is the judge given wider discretion than he is under the present regulations? At the present time his powers are limited by regulation 16, which reads:

> At the conclusion of the hearing of the application by the judge, the said judge shall endorse upon the petition his decision in the case as to (a) residence qualification, (b) good character, (c) adequate knowledge of English or French, (d) intention to reside in His Majesty's dominions and (e) no disability under section 2 (f) . . .

Which simply defines what is a disability. Judges have told me they are very much handicapped in putting in the report because their instructions are that they must report on nothing except these points I have read, and they do not feel free to write out a general report. That perhaps should be the key point in deciding whether or not the applicant should receive citizenship. Is it the intention to give the judges wider discretion than at the present time?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What discretion?

Mr. MARTIN: We are going to put in the regulations a general clause providing that if the judge feels these do not cover the particular situation he is free to report on that situation as he sees fit; in other words, to give the department a true picture of what happens. There is a real handicap which we intend to remove.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—New application allowed.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the application has been rejected by the court on a hearing or rehearing the applicant may make another application under section 10 of the bill after the expiration of a period of two years from the date of such rejection. If the application has been rejected for some major reason, is the applicant allowed to remain in the country for the two years?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. The fact that the applicant is turned down does not mean that he has to leave the country.

Mr. MacNICOL: I said, for some major reason.

Mr. MARTIN: It all depends. If it were disloyalty to the crown involving an act of treason that might be altogether different. The hon. member for Vegreville mentioned certain applicants who had been turned down because of certain obligations they owed. There is no way of dealing with such a case and the intention is to cover situations like that.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—On acquisition of other nationality.

Mr. GREEN: The minister should explain this in detail. This is the only way in which a Canadian citizen who is natural-born can lose his citizenship, and apparently he can lose it only when he is outside Canada and acquires a nationality or citizenship of some other country. We should be very careful about a section of this type. Take, for example, the case of a Canadian-born Japanese who served in the Japanese forces against us. One such was one of the main torturers of Canadians in Hong Kong. As I read the section, that man still retains his Canadian citizenship. There should be some way in which the citizenship could be taken away from a man like that, and I suggest to the minister that he give consideration to having a test as to whether or not the person has become disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty. Certainly a person who is born in Canada and who serves in an enemy force should lose his Canadian citizenship, and lose it fast. Yet under this section he does not.

Mr. MARTIN: I point out to the hon. gentleman that what he says is substantially correct, except that he has not covered the question of dual nationality covered by section 17 to which we shall make reference when we come to it. Perhaps I should read this section again:

> A Canadian citizen who, when outside of Canada and not under a disability, by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires the nationality or citizenship of a country other than Canada shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

In all of the nationality acts of the commonwealth this provision exists. Citizenship is derived from two classes of people: those who were natural-born and those who acquired citizenship through other than natural-born methods. In the case of a natural-born person citizenship is something which, if taken away, would easily lead to a condition of statelessness. I am not thinking particularly of the group of people to whom my hon. friend is referring, but one of the difficulties in the administration of nationality acts is the question of trying to avoid statelessness. If you take away the citizenship of a natural-born person, unless he has another state to which he can go—I am not referring to the cases my hon. friend had in mind, but to illustrate the principle—he has no place to which he can be deported. It is to avoid that kind of situation that you have to tread with great care.

Mr. REID: Would the minister mind answering a question? What would happen in the case of a man who had two citizenships and you took away his Canadian citizenship? Would he be stateless?

Mr. MARTIN: It all depends on the circumstances. If by some voluntary act the man acquires the nationality of another country, then of course the consequences are as stated in the section. I am not admitting that it is not without difficulty, but the committee will recall what we are trying to do. Here we are dealing with natural-born people who have no other nationality. If you take away their nationality they have no other country to which they owe allegiance.

Mr. GREEN: You do that under section 21.

Mr. MARTIN: That is a different situation. These are not natural-born people. This deals with natural-born citizens. The way to deal with the case to which my hon. friend has referred is through the courts of justice. They should be dealt with vigorously in that way. That is the proper way to do it. I am not saying this to be flippant, and I am sure my hon. friend will recognize that. That is the British way. Everyone in this committee will recall the case which came up in Great Britain recently of a certain person—I do not want to identify him. He was the son of a well-known public figure who had committed a serious crime against the crown. That person was a natural-born citizen of the United Kingdom. His citizenship was not taken away from him in spite of his act; but he was dealt with effectively and completely by the courts. That is the only way, in my opinion, to deal with this matter. I do not know of any other way. We have thought of this problem and given it a great deal of attention. We talked about the very situation that my hon. friend has in mind and argued about it. We discussed this matter in relation to the nationality laws of the commonwealth. I think in only two countries of the world will it be found that there is a provision by which the citizenship of natural-born people can be taken away from them.

Mr. GREEN: The United States do it.

Mr. MARTIN: No, they do not do it. They do it in one small country; I think it is San Salvador.

Mr. HACKETT: Does any country do it when the citizen is in his own country?

Mr. MARTIN: No, except the two countries I have in mind.

Mr. HACKETT: Do they take the man's citizenship from him when he is in the country?

Mr. MARTIN: No; only when he is out.

Mr. REID: I wonder whether the minister is correct. I hold in my hand a section of the United States act entitled, "Chapter IV, loss of nationality." Section 401 reads:

> A person who is a national of the United States whether by birth or naturalization shall lose his nationality . . .

Then there is a whole page in which reasons for loss of nationality are outlined, whether born in the United States or not.

Mr. MARTIN: What are the reasons?

[Mr. Martin.]

Mr. REID: One is voting at a political election in this country. If he does that they take away his citizenship and forbid him to enter.

Mr. MARTIN: We do the same thing under section 16 which reads:

> A Canadian citizen who, when outside of Canada and not under a disability, by any voluntary and formal act other than marriage, acquires the nationality or citizenship of a country other than Canada shall thereupon cease to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. REID: That is not a natural-born person.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. FULTON: Outside of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: This section refers to Canadian-born persons outside of Canada. Surely the minister does not contend that a Canadian-born person who serves in the army of our enemy should retain his citizenship?

Mr. MARTIN: That is a case of treason on a par with the case I referred to in England.

Mr. GREEN: Here is a man who served in the Japanese army.

Mr. MARTIN: He may have acquired foreign nationality.

Mr. GREEN: Why should he have any right to retain Canadian citizenship?

Mr. MARTIN: Because there is an effective way of dealing with such natural-born people, the way they do it in Great Britain. The hon. gentleman will recall the case to which I refer. The question was put to the Home Secretary in the British house. I wish I had his reply here. I should have brought it down. Recognizing the difficulty, he said in substance that the main purpose of the provision was to avoid the danger of people becoming stateless. If a Canadian citizen or a natural-born Canadian citizen does something along the lines referred to by my hon. friend it seems to me the effective way to deal with the situation is to bring him before the courts, and, if he is found guilty, give him the justice and ignominy which he deserves. That is the British system and I think it is the system we must follow.

Mr. GREEN: What about Canadian-born persons who go to Japan in peace time and take military training in the Japanese army? Hundreds of them did that, and then applied to come back to Canada as British subjects. What happens in cases like that? I want an answer to my question.

Mr. MacINNIS: I can add a little to the discussion and the minister can give his answer then. If a Canadian citizen helps a foreign enemy, it does not make any difference if he does it in this country or outside, he has committed treason, and if he is in this country the law of the land applies to him. If he is out of the country, the moment he returns the law of the land applies to him as well. Surely we should not do things on a racial basis just because a person happens to do a certain thing in one country. There is a law to apply in this case, and if we apply the law rigidly, fairly and justly in every case we shall take care of every case. Therefore, in my opinion, the points raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South do not really exist as difficult points. They are questions of application of the law, as the law stands; and if we apply the law, then the situation is met.

Mr. REID: Of course many of us differ with the views of the last speaker—

Mr. MacINNIS: All right; you also differ with the views of the Secretary of State.

Mr. REID: All the hon. gentleman says may be true, but we are speaking now particularly of persons in this country, whether Japanese or others, who are sitting here holding two citizenships. My whole public fight has been against this. I realize that a child has no control over what its parents may do, but I say when that child reaches the age of twenty-one years, if he is a registered citizen of Japan and looked upon by that country as a citizen, then that person should take some steps to renounce his foreign allegiance, if he really is a Canadian and has been born in this country. Our anxiety under the bill is this. Many Japanese have left this country and then returned making no bones about where their loyalty and their support lie.

Mr. MARTIN: Is that person a natural-born Canadian?

Mr. REID: Yes; I am speaking about a natural-born Canadian. I have here a return brought down in this house concerning one man, and this is not an isolated case. It deals with one Noboru Yamamoto, who was born in this country, who then spent fifteen years in Japan and finally returned to this country while we were at war. When the war was at its toughest he was asked by this government to do some work. He refused, and his letter to the Minister of Labour was most astounding. I am going to read it; it is dated May 22, 1944:

To the Honourable the Minister of Labour:

I am sorry to interrupt your precious time for stating my concerns—

I am reading this letter just as it was written.

—but I think you will be kind enough to listen and judge to what I state under the following order.

Now I am already 21 years old. Speaking from this standpoint I must be working or otherwise, be serving in the armed forces in this country, however, as I came here from Japan just before the war, 1940, after being educated 11 years school course there; I have no desire to be working for this country especially in this war time because such work would be considered as though I were helping this country to win the war against Japan.

I feel very sorry to Japan if I do work, as you might have been already noted that the Japanese have very strong patriotism to their mothers country, especially in the war time; they are willing to offer everything that they have to their country even their life if they asked to do so.

There is no exception in my case to this conclusion particularly as I have been under the military training while in the school course there.

I know that there is left only two ways by which I can keep my living in this country. The first and best thing is to keep my studying until the end of the war. By doing so, I would neither hurt Canada nor Japan. The next thing is to be interned or imprisoned until the end of the war however this would hurt Canada.

Although I have no intention to hurt this country, there is no alternative course left for me, but to be interned or imprisoned if the selective service or commission (B.C. security commission) would force me to work.

I here professed my suggestion so that there will be left nothing indefinite between us.

Will you be kind enough to tell me if there is left any chance by which I could keep my study in the east? I hope to receive your answer as early as possible.

Mr. FULTON: What happened to him?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): He was not shot, anyway.

Mr. REID: I really cannot tell the hon. member what happened. I do not think anything very startling happened to him, but he kept on writing letters to Ottawa. I notice that in one letter to the selective service authorities he says, "I also have stated my reason fully to the general Spanish consul." Here was a man born in this country, and he is only one of many. At his birth he was registered in Japan; his parents saw to that. Then he and others went to that country, to which they owed allegiance. There they are registered as Japanese nationals and Japanese citizens, and the government of Japan intimated that it would do its utmost to protect them in this country. Then he comes back, and this is the kind of letter he writes to the minister.

We who have been taking this stand realize that it is particularly directed against the Japanese, but I do not know of any other race of people who are sitting in this country holding two citizenships. I have challenged all those who have come out in opposition to my views in regard to this matter. Last year the Japanese newspaper printed the remarks I made in this house; they made the statement, "Mr. Reid says we have dual citizenship and are non-assimilable", but they did not attempt to contradict my statement. Why? Not one of the 22,000 Japanese has said, "We have nothing to do with Japan. I am a Canadian citizen." Many of us who have carried on this fight all the way through have been unjustly accused of having an attitude of racial hatred, but we have simply taken the stand that no person in this country should be allowed to possess Canadian citizenship if he holds allegiance to some other country, be it Japan or any other. That is our fight, and in this bill we want to see something done about that class of citizen, whether he comes from Japan, Yugoslavia, Russia, Germany or any other country.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. GREEN: The minister has not answered my question.

Mr. MARTIN: In the case to which the hon. gentleman has referred, that young man went back and took military service under the government of Japan.

Mr. GREEN: In peace time.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. If, by doing so, he acquired Japanese nationality, under this section he is out.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be wise to put that right in our bill, that if a man serves in the armed forces of any other country he loses his Canadian citizenship? What is the objection to putting that in the section?

Mr. MARTIN: You cannot cover cases like that. It would include service, for instance, in the forces of the United States and other countries. If you start to draw lines in that way you get into tremendous difficulties. In that case, if by going to Japan and serving in the military forces of the Japanese government that man thereby acquired Japanese nationality, he ceases to be a Canadian citizen.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Just to follow that thought, section 401 of the United States act, which the hon. member for New Westminster is talking about, expressly states that American citizens who serve in the armies of foreign countries are going to lose their American citizenship, whether they are natural-born or naturalized. A little further down they have another interesting provision, that any man who deserts the military or naval service of the United States in time of war shall also lose his American citizenship, something which certainly should be in our bill. Then the hon. member for Vancouver East suggested that if a man served in the Japanese military forces he should be tried as a traitor if he returned to Canada. But these Japanese, with dual citizenship, cannot be loyal to both Canada and Japan when the two countries are at war. How could you legally try a man who has dual citizenship for being disloyal to either country when at the same time he was loyal to the other? That is the whole nub of the case of the British Columbia members, other than the C.C.F. members, against the Japanese. They are dual citizens; they are not, cannot be and do not want to be Canadians.

Mr. MacINNIS: But that is not the case. Japanese Canadians by the hundred wanted to demonstrate their citizenship by service in the Canadian army, and they were not allowed to do so until Great Britain made application for their services. That application was turned down but later it was accepted, under some compulsion or another.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Nonsense.

Mr. MacINNIS: The way to allow people to show their citizenship is first to give them full citizenship and then let them discharge all the duties and obligations that go with it.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): To both countries?

Mr. MacINNIS: No. The statement was made by the hon. member for New Westminster that all the 22,000 Canadian-born persons of Japanese origin in Canada had dual citizenship. I say that that is not correct. I know of dozens of them who revoked their citizenship in Japan, or it was done by their parents. They were given no encouragement to do that. As some one has said, the nub of the question is their loyalty, and the nub of their loyalty is their willingness to serve in the Canadian armed forces. They served in the armed forces of the United States, and their record in Italy is that their section of the army was the most decorated section in the United States army. There is no doubt that if they had been given the same opportunity to serve in the Canadian army they would have given the same service. Before we ask for loyalty we must provide opportunity.

Mr. REID: That may be so far as it goes, but the fact still remains that the Japanese born in this country whose births were registered in Japan and who are now twenty-one years of age have a dual citizenship. Japan looks upon them as citizens of Japan. They are so much under the control of Japan that even when they die in this country both their birth and death certificates must be sent to Japan.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And their ashes as well.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is true of other orientals.

Mr. REID: Japan recognizes these people and that is why so many of them went back to do military duty there. To the best of my knowledge, 1,600 of them left just prior to 1939. They were born here and they went to Japan to serve in the army. They can now come back to this country and say, "We are Canadian citizens." There is no law such as has been spoken of by the hon. member for Vancouver East that would touch them. I do not know of any law that can touch them. Should we open the door to those 1,600 who went to Japan to do military duty and then stayed there at the request of Japan? Should they be allowed to come back to this country and claim Canadian citizenship?

Mr. MacINNIS: Surely if the Canadian government has information that 1,600 persons born of Japanese parents in Canada went to Japan and served in the Japanese army, when those 1,600 return to Canada they can be picked up as having been disloyal to Canada and punished according to Canadian law.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How can they?

Mr. MacINNIS: You know the crime they committed, or whatever you may call it. I do not know why you could not do that. Take the case mentioned by the Secretary of State that occurred in Great Britain. That case had to do with Germany.

Mr. FULTON: He was not a citizen of Germany.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is true he was a citizen of Great Britain, but the claim is that these persons are also citizens of Canada. We are dealing with them not because they are citizens of Japan but because they are citizens of Canada. We can do the same thing as was done by the British government in connection with that case.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: How are we to tell which are Canadian citizens and which are not? Will the hon. member state what allegiance is owed by the two Japanese who were in the galleries and who must have been introduced there by members of only one party?

An hon. MEMBER: Were they in the government gallery?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They were in the members' gallery and no Liberal or Conservative brought them in.

Mr. MacINNIS: As the members' gallery we would put them in is on that side of the chamber, the hon. member will have to ask his hon. friends on his side of the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No hon. member on this side brought them in. I have my own ideas as to who entertained them at lunch and who brought them in here.

Mr. KNIGHT: I respectfully suggest that we are getting away from the subject.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, we are not.

Mr. KNIGHT: This debate seems to have developed into another debate on the Japanese question. I heard enough of that during the last session and I do not want to hear any more.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You know nothing about it.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are two who do not know anything about it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You should know it all because you have dealt with them long enough.

Mr. MacINNIS: Certainly I know it all.

Mr. KNIGHT: I think we as Canadians should accept responsibility for the bringing up of our own Canadian-born citizens. That is why I referred to the case raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. He was not in the house when I spoke, as reported on page 1001 of Hansard. If we bring boys up in this country after having accepted their parents, if we put them through our schools then I am afraid we shall have to accept responsibility, and if they get into trouble we shall have to punish them as Canadians. We cannot dodge our responsibility by saying to a young German or a young Czech or a young Englishman or a young what have you, "We do not want you; we have brought you up in this country; we gave you your education, but we do not like you and you will have to go back to France, to Japan, to Germany or somewhere else." I am afraid we shall have to accept that responsibility. If these people commit crimes they will have to be punished as Canadian citizens. We cannot deprive them of their only nationality because there is no other country prepared to take these criminals. We must deal with them ourselves. I hope hon. members do not think I am talking about the Japanese because I am not. They are quite far from my thoughts at the present time.

Mr. FULTON: With due respect to all hon. members I think we should try to discuss this matter without heat. I have asked continually that the members from British Columbia be given a fair opportunity to state their case against the Japanese in order that this parliament of Canada may decide the matter on principles of justice. There is this distinction to be drawn between the Japanese referred to by the hon. member for New Westminster and by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the case referred to by the Secretary of State. I think 1,600 was the figure given by the hon. member for New Westminster. Those persons acquired Japanese nationality by virtue of the registration of their births in Canada. Therefore I think they are in a different category; from their point of view they were citizens of Japan.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Are they not citizens of Canada?

Mr. FULTON: These people are not desirable Canadian citizens because, according to their own light, they are Japanese citizens. Later, when section 17 is being considered, I shall have something more to say. However, I just wanted to draw a distinction between these cases, because in my submission these people in their own minds are not Canadians; they are Japanese and they should be so regarded and so treated.

Mr. McMASTER: I thought the debate on this particular phase of the matter had ended. If it has not, perhaps my remarks should be left until it has. However, since I am on my feet perhaps I might offer a suggestion about this clause which is general in its application. The Secretary of State has referred to stateless persons; but I have always thought that no one could be stateless, that is, that domicile or nationality is something that is cast upon a person by his birth. If you drive him out of one state and he is not a subject of another state, by international law, which says that a man comes back to his original domicile or original state, he immediately bounces back.

Mr. GREEN: It is quite amusing, but not very helpful, to hear the hon. member for Saskatoon City talk about welcoming back these Japanese. His province has been quite successful in keeping away from having many Japanese settle in its territory. They are really not in a very good position to talk about the Japanese question.

Mr. KNIGHT: Did the hon. gentleman say that I had welcomed back the Japanese?

Mr. GREEN: He is suggesting that this Japanese torturer should be brought back to Canada and tried.

Mr. KNIGHT: The hon. gentleman should withdraw what he has said because I said no such thing.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Your province did.

Mr. GREEN: That was the inference.

Mr. KNIGHT: Will the hon. gentleman withdraw that?

Mr. GREEN: No; I will not withdraw it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I appeal to the Chair. The hon. member has said that I said something which I did not say.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He said your province said it.

Mr. KNIGHT: I appeal to the chair.

Mr. BOUCHER: Let the record speak.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I must confess that I did not hear what the hon. member said.

Mr. GREEN: I forget what I said myself. However, as I understood the suggestion of the hon. member it was that cases such as this torturer should be brought back to Canada to be tried; that he should be brought back to Canada to be tried and any other Japanese who served in the Japanese forces should be brought back here and we should accept the blame for them being as they are. That is what I understood from his remarks and I think that is what he meant. I suggest to the minister that he allow this section to stand with section 10, because I think that in bringing in a section of this type the minister is not facing realities. This question must be faced. This question of dual nationality cannot be sidetracked. We must be protected against happenings such as have taken place during the last few years.

There is no provision in this section for a man renouncing his Canadian citizenship; he cannot renounce his Canadian citizenship. There are cases where a person in Canada may wish to renounce his citizenship and certainly should be allowed to do so, but there is no provision for that.

I repeat again that a Canadian-born person who serves in the armed forces of any other nation should lose his citizenship by so doing. Let us not be carried away and be too free in giving our right of citizenship. We must be careful to draw the line somewhere. People who serve in the armed forces of another country are not entitled to retain their Canadian citizenship. I would ask the minister to let this section stand.

Mr. MARTIN: I suggest that we let section 17 stand, that is the section which concerns dual nationality; and let section 16 pass.

Mr. GREEN: Section 16 also concerns dual nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: No.

Mr. GREEN: Oh yes, it does, and it concerns this question of serving in the armed forces of another nation.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 17 is the one, if my hon. friend will look at it carefully.

Mr. REID: I think section 17 covers that.

Mr. MARTIN: I have no doubt of that, and I am willing to let section 17 stand if we can pass section 16.

Mr. GREEN: Section 17 applies only to a minor.

Mr. MARTIN: Section 17 applies to a man of the full age of twenty-one years.

Mr. GREEN: Section 17 applies only to a person who during his minority becomes a citizen of another country, and section 16 applies to a person who has attained his majority and goes abroad.

Mr. MARTIN: If he acquires another nationality after his majority he loses his Canadian citizenship under section 16. Section 17 is the one.

Mr. GREEN: No; section 17 applies only where he gets dual nationality as a minor.

Mr. MARTIN: A person under this bill cannot get dual nationality until after attaining his majority. You have to elect under this bill.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the two sections are tied up together and that both should be allowed to stand for further consideration.

Mr. MARTIN: I am prepared to let section 17 stand, but I do not think section 16 applies to the problem.

Mr. GREEN: The minister should not try to force through section 16 without giving further consideration to the suggestions that have been made.

Mr. MARTIN: I have given very full consideration to section 16. I am prepared to let section 17 stand. I am satisfied beyond any doubt that section 17 applies and I am prepared to give further consideration to it. I shall have to consider what should be done in the case of persons who serve in the armed forces of another country when Canada is at war. I do not think section 17 covers the point my hon. friend has in mind. If we let section 17 stand, before I undertake to say what I shall do about it, I would want to say something after we pass section 16.

Mr. GREEN: One question that arises under section 16 is the right of a person in Canada to renounce his citizenship. There is no provision in this bill for the renouncing of citizenship, and there should be.

Mr. MARTIN: That is dealt with in section 16.

Mr. GREEN: That only concerns a person outside of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: The persons the hon. member is talking about are outside of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: There should be a provision whereby a person within Canada can renounce his citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN: I cannot agree to that.

Mr. GREEN: There is a provision of that kind in the United States.

Mr. MARTIN: That does not make it right. I know that the United States has such a provision, but you will not find that provision in any country in the British commonwealth. The United States have had considerable difficulty with this whole question of men serving in the armed forces of another country. As I told the house the other night we have had discussions with United States officials and authorities on this very subject both here in Ottawa and elsewhere, discussions in which I along with some of my officials participated. As a member of the government I naturally hesitate to say certain things in public, but I will go this far and say that the United States have had very considerable difficulty with this provision. For instance, Americans served in the armed forces of Canada and that has placed United States citizens in an extremely difficult position. I do not want to go too far on that. Perhaps the committee will understand to what I refer. Numbers of Americans did serve in the armed forces of Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I ask what happened to Canadian citizens who served in the Spanish republican army in 1936?

Mr. MARTIN: I do not really know, I shall have to give an answer to-morrow.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Vancouver North): Is the minister aware that United States citizens who served in the R.C.A.F. did not take the oath of allegiance.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes, because special action was taken in that case. I have to be careful in commenting on difficulties other countries have had. They have had to use other methods. I should like to be able to say exactly what they have told us about their difficulties in the United States. They had difficulties not only in the last war but in the first great war because certain countries which fought against the United States this time were their allies last time. That creates all sorts of difficulties, and one has to be extremely careful.

In Australia—we have been in touch with Australia—they have had the same problem and they are dealing with this problem as I think we should deal with it, in the British way. Take the case of Captain Baillie Stewart. He was a citizen of Great Britain and was convicted of aiding a foreign power, was discharged from the British army and imprisoned. Later he went to Germany. Nothing further was done until he was recaptured after the war. Then he was tried and convicted of giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

Mr. FULTON: Was it proven or alleged that he had acquired German citizenship or nationality?

Mr. MARTIN: I really do not know.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is an important question.

Mr. MARTIN: It is in one sense, but not as far as the principle is concerned. In other words, Britain regards citizenship once obtained through natural-born process as a thing which can be dealt with in the case of disloyalty in the most effective and the most humiliating way possible, and that is by disposition at the hands of the courts.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He mentioned the fact that Britain considers that of the utmost importance. Has he any reason to believe that Japan does not also consider it of the utmost importance?

Mr. MARTIN: I may say in answer to that that my hon. friend knows that we are not, or certainly I hope we are not, to be governed in this parliament or this country by the methods—the diabolical methods—of our enemies.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, no, that is no answer at all.

Mr. FULTON: I asked that question because I have been informed that, in the hearing of the case, it was held that Baillie Stewart had not completed the formalities of acquiring German citizenship and nationality, and it was for that reason that he was dealt with as a British subject and a traitor to Great Britain.

Mr. MARTIN: What about the case of "Lord Haw-Haw"? There have been many others, and Britain has dealt with them in the effective way I mentioned.

Mr. FULTON: We should look up the record, but I think that "Haw-Haw", or William Joyce, was dealt with on the same basis.

Mr. MARTIN: You are quite right. I am wrong in that case. "Lord Haw-Haw" was declared to be a United States citizen. I suggest that we let section 16 pass, and I will hold section 17 over and give it consideration.

Mr. GREEN: What about section 16?

Mr. MARTIN: I think we should allow section 16 to pass. I do not think it covers the issue.

Mr. GREEN: In the ordinary course, in this house, where the suggestion is made in good faith that a section stand over, the practice is for the government to let it stand over and not try to force it through.

Mr. MARTIN: I will agree to let them both stand over, so that we can get on. I know that from now on I can expect complete cooperation.

Mr. GREEN: The Prime Minister at the session last fall made a statement outlining the policy of the government on this Japanese question. Will the minister assure the committee that if this bill becomes law it will in no way affect the carrying out of that policy?

Mr. MARTIN: All I can say is that this bill has nothing to do one way or the other with these orders. The responsible minister in connection with that matter will have to answer on behalf of the government. I am not particularly charged with that matter, but this bill does not affect one way or the other that situation. This bill stands by itself.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has not given the assurance for which I asked. Will the Minister of Veterans Affairs, who is leading the house at the moment, give that assurance?

Mr. MACKENZIE: My understanding is that the measure now being considered by this committee will not and cannot alter in any way the policy of the government with respect to the issue raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. MARTIN: This bill was introduced long before these orders were passed.

An hon. MEMBER: In that case it will have been passed after the event.

Mr. MacINNIS: In view of certain matters which were raised in connection with this bill, the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South is certainly a most amazing one. The hon. member for Lake Centre attacked and slashed the government in a really fine way over certain orders in council by which a few individuals were picked up and confined and later brought to trial, and then over one case of a man who had deserted from the Canadian army, where there was an order passed getting him under control. I imagine that the hon. member for Lake Centre was talking for the Progressive Conservative party when he denounced—

Mr. MACKENZIE: Would the hon. member forgive me for rising on a point of order. I understand that the minister in charge agreed, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South, to have sections 16 and 17 stand over for further discussion. So that I think we might possibly postpone the discussion of this issue to another occasion.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think it is quite fair to ask me to postpone my discussion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We could not hope for it.

Mr. MacINNIS: I listened to the hon. member for Lake Centre dealing with one question, and to the hon. members for Vancouver South, Kamloops, Vancouver-Burrard and Nanaimo dealing with a definitely opposite principle. One of these principles is right. Either orders in council which take away the liberty of the Canadian citizen are wrong, or orders in council which take away the freedom of Canadian citizens are right.

Mr. FULTON: Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he define the difference between these principles?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I think there was agreement that sections 16 and 17 would stand for further consideration.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, I object to that ruling, although I bow to it. The point I made is this. If I am wrong, then the hon. member for Vancouver South should not be allowed to ask his questions. As a matter of fact, for days and days the whole discussion on this point was out of order, because it had nothing to do with the question. I was anticipating that, the moment I would rise to speak on it, I would say things and then I would be out of order. So it has turned out. But before this is finished I am going to have my say on this question, and I am going to show the contradictions in the policies of my hon. friends to my right.

Mr. GRAYDON: Meanwhile you are wasting a lot of time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not wasting any time. I do not waste any time.

Sections 16 and 17 stand.

On section 18—Child of parent ceasing to be a Canadian citizen. Declaration for resuming Canadian citizenship.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister explain this section?

Mr. MARTIN: This is not new; it has been in the act for thirty-one years.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—When loss of Canadian citizenship involves loss of British nationality.

Mr. REID: May I ask the minister if we have the right to declare that a person "thereupon ceases to be a British subject"? The minister might explain that. Have we the right to take away the status of a British subject if a person takes out foreign citizenship? Under this section, if a person takes out foreign citizenship we assume the right to declare that he is not a British subject.

Mr. CASE: We cannot do that.

Mr. MARTIN: These people acquire Canadian citizenship under Canadian law. Of course we have the power. They have the status of a British subject. But if they become nationals of another country—

An hon. MEMBER: British subjects?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. Australia has acted thus and South Africa has done so. There is no doubt about that. They are British subjects by virtue of naturalization in Canada.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Did I understand the Secretary of State to say that we had the right to take away British citizenship? I believe we have no power to do so. This is absolutely unconstitutional. We cannot invade the field of legislating as to the citizenship of another country. At least I do not know how that can be done. Besides this, I would ask another question: if a person ceases to be a British subject, does he cease to be a Canadian citizen?

Mr. MARTIN: There is no doubt about the first question. I did not hear the hon. member's second question.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I wish to know if a person ceases to be a British citizen if he ceases to be a Canadian citizen?

Mr. HACKETT: British subject.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): Yes, British subject.

Mr. MARTIN: If he is a Canadian citizen. A person who lives in South Africa would cease to be a British subject if he goes to live, let us say, in Yugoslavia as a citizen of that country.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): I understand section 19 provides that when a person ceases to be a Canadian citizen he thereupon ceases to be a British subject. Is it reciprocal? If a person ceases to be a British subject, does he cease to be a Canadian citizen?

Mr. MARTIN: If he is a Canadian citizen, certainly. The two are joined together.

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Lapriarie): I just want to remind the minister of a discussion which took place in 1921 on the subject of Canadian nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: All Canadian citizens are British subjects. Surely that should help the hon. gentleman in understanding the nature of my reply.

[Mr. Reid.]

Mr. RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie): That means that we have dual nationality.

Mr. MARTIN: No, it does not. It means that under this bill we are citizens of Canada, at the same time enjoying the common status of loyalty to a common king.

Mr. REID: Suppose a man leaves some continental country, France we will say for the sake of argument, resides in Great Britain for a few years, becoming a British subject, then comes to this country and after five years takes out Canadian citizenship papers. Following that, he returns to the continental country and takes out papers there. I am questioning the right of this country to declare that he is not a British subject in view of the fact that he might have had that status in the first instance when he came to Canada.

Mr. CASE: I have listened to the minister's explanation and what I have in mind is this. A man comes as a British subject when he arrives and then becomes a Canadian citizen. If he renounces his Canadian citizenship, does the minister mean to say that we can declare that he is no longer a British subject?

Mr. MARTIN: The section says that where one ceases to be a Canadian citizen as provided in certain sections, if he is at such time or thereupon becomes a national or citizen of a country other than a country of the British commonwealth he thereby ceases to be a British subject. He does under this law, under the law of New Zealand, and of all the dominions. He joins another country. Should we allow him to continue to be a British subject?

Section agreed to.

On section 20—By residence outside of Canada for six years.

Mr. GREEN: Was consideration given to inserting a provision such as there is in the United States law to the effect that if a citizen other than a natural-born citizen returns to his country of origin and becomes domiciled there, the time of residence is only two years, or is a shorter time than if he goes to a third country? I have the report of Professor W. P. M. Kennedy, published in 1943.

Mr. MARTIN: I may say that we have not adopted the suggestion.

Mr. GREEN: At page 18 the following remarks appear:

If after naturalization and the acquisition of Canadian domicile, they return to the country of their origin and remain there for two years, this ought to be presumptive evidence that they have abandoned Canadian domicile, and such is in fact the law of the United States.

Has that been considered?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: What are the reasons for not following it?

Mr. MARTIN: After canvassing the whole situation we thought six years was the proper time.

Mr. HACKETT: Must these six years be consecutive?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes.

Mr. HACKETT: They are not cumulative?

Mr. MARTIN: No, they are consecutive.

Mr. HACKETT: Why, then, is that word not inserted? As it stands, it does not say so. As the section now reads, if the man were out of the country two years ten years ago—

Mr. MARTIN: I have no objection to saying six consecutive years.

Mr. HACKETT: I so move.

Mr. FULTON: Will the Secretary of State explain what is contemplated in section 20, paragraph (e)? I do not understand the purpose.

Mr. MARTIN: We are not excluding a person if the wife goes and lives with her husband who is engaged in one of the privileged occupations, outside the country, enumerated from (a) to (f).

Mr. FULTON: This contemplates the husband inasmuch as it says "he".

Mr. MARTIN: "He" under the interpretation act means he or she.

Mr. FULTON: Does it contemplate the case of a man married to a C.W.A.C.?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): There is an amendment by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Hackett) that the word "consecutive" be added in line 12 after the word six. It would then read "at least six consecutive years".

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 21—By revocation of Canadian citizenship.

Mr. MARTIN: I told the house that I intended to ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move that subsection 1 (c) be deleted and (d) and (e) be relettered (c) and (d).

Mr. MACKENZIE: I so move.

Mr. REID: I wish to direct the attention of the committee to this point. There appears later on in the bill a provision that a Canadian subject naturalized has equal status with a natural-born citizen. Some time ago we were speaking about natural-born persons and the Japanese race was mentioned. My objection is that a naturalized citizen will lose his citizenship by the commission of certain acts, whereas the natural-born citizen will not, and I am propounding this question to the minister: How can we give like status to the naturalized citizen if we make a differentiation not only in section 21 but in other sections?

Mr. MARTIN: The only answer is the sound principle that one is natural-born and has no country to go to while the other is a national of Canada who has had another national status to which he has apparently a greater national affinity. We can deal with his case more effectively than with that of the natural-born person.

Mr. REID: That answer is not satisfactory; at any rate it is not satisfactory to me, because the bill then is not sound. Later on, it says that the two of them have like status, but they have not and the country should be informed that they have not. We have been talking for weeks about citizenship, about everyone throwing racial pride to the winds, and all meeting on an equal plane, and now we are saying that if certain persons like myself do certain acts they lose their citizenship, whereas if the son of such a person, born in this country, does the same thing the case is different. There is no like status there and I call the attention of the committee to the fact. I suggest that this section should be held over for consideration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Stand.

Mr. MARTIN: I will agree to let section 16 and 17 stand because of the principle involved, but I do not think there is any necessity to have this one stand, with great respect to my hon. friend. He will find no country in the world where the suggestion he is now making is followed, except in the two I have mentioned.

Mr. REID: Then section 27 is not true. There is no like status as between the two classes.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN: (Mr. Golding): There is an amendment moved by Mr. Mackenzie that paragraph (c) of section 21 be deleted and the subsequent paragraphs be relettered accordingly.

Mr. GREEN: Earlier in the evening I asked the minister a question as to what was to be done in connection with nationals of an enemy country and he requested me to repeat the question on section 21. Will he give an answer now?

Mr. MARTIN: There is nothing I can say on that. Perhaps I did not quite understand the question. It is obviously a matter for the courts if I understand what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. GREEN: After the last war a special amendment was introduced into the Naturalization Act putting a restriction on applications for naturalization by subjects of enemy countries for a certain length of time—ten years, I believe.

Mr. MARTIN: I know.

Mr. GREEN: Subsequently, when that period expired the provision was repealed. I can find nothing in this bill which deals with enemy nationals. Has the minister given consideration to inserting a provision of that kind? If not, why not?

Mr. MARTIN: That provision was inserted and shortly after it was removed. It was felt to have no value. We shall have to deal with that situation when it arises.

Mr. GREEN: Does that mean that a citizen of Germany has the same right of Canadian naturalization as a citizen of France?

Mr. MARTIN: If he is a deserving person, certainly. If he is not, no. All I can say is there are many being turned down and many being granted because there are many good German citizens in this country. Professor Einstein in the United States is an illustration. We have to deal with these cases in an ad hoc manner, and we are dealing with them carefully.

Mr. FLEMING: I should like to commend the amendment proposed by the minister. To say the least, I think it would have been a grave misfortune if this section had passed with paragraph (c) in it. I do not need to elaborate what I said about it the other day. Before we deal finally with the amendment, would the minister explain what meaning he attaches to certain words in paragraph (d) which, under the amendment, will be relettered paragraph (c)?

Mr. MARTIN: Could we deal with the amendment first?

Mr. FLEMING: My question has to do with paragraph (d) which is being relettered. If the Chairman would leave the question open I do not mind waiting.

[The Acting Chairman.]

Mr. MARTIN: Let us deal with the amendment first.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I do not like this section. I do not think there is any doubt that it is discriminatory.

Mr. FLEMING: My question has to do with the concluding words in paragraph (d). In the course of administration of this bill I should like to know what meaning the minister proposes to attach to these concluding words: "and has not maintained substantial connection with Canada." Take the case of a Canadian citizen who leaves this country and is absent for six years; let us say, he takes up ordinary residence outside Canada and has not maintained substantial connection here. What meaning is to be attached to these words? There is nothing in the bill that gives any clue to the meaning of them.

Mr. MARTIN: My hon. friend knows that the section substantially means exactly what it says, and the courts will so interpret it.

Mr. FLEMING: This is not a court; this is the governor in council.

Mr. MARTIN: I will give the reason, and the courts may easily construe it in construing the action of the governor in council. First of all, the period has been reduced from seven years to six. In the existing act it is seven years. Since Canadian citizenship will hereafter give a right of entry, whereas status as a British subject does not at present, it was thought desirable to shorten the period that a person could be abroad. This provision is needed because there may be cases where revocation of naturalization is desirable even though a person is not subject to automatic loss. For example, a person may be abroad for years with a purely nominal agency from a Canadian company. This agency would protect him from automatic loss. However, if it were merely a deliberate blind or shield, it would be desirable to be able to revoke his naturalization if he has maintained no substantial connection with Canada.

We have had a number of cases of individuals who left Canada prior to the war and went to Germany. They were away beyond the prescribed period. These people alleged that they had connection with Canada and that they were acting for certain companies. We were able to find out that these companies were blinds, that they were just fictitious agencies. In fact they were not really employed by them at all. Certainly that is no substantial connection with Canada, and it is hoped we shall be able to deal with that kind of case.

Mr. FLEMING: Suppose a man is not representing an agency, but some members of his family may be here. For reasons of health he may be compelled to take up residence abroad. Suppose a man goes to California and for reasons of health he takes up ordinary residence there and corresponds with his family. Would that be considered substantial connection?

Mr. MARTIN: There is no doubt about that. He could not have a more substantial connection than having a family in Canada.

Mr. FLEMING: Suppose he has no family?

Mr. MARTIN: He might have some other connection.

Mr. FLEMING: Suppose he has property. Suppose he is a former minister of the crown and is a bachelor?

Mr. MARTIN: That is a doubtful case. Take a case of substance.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Would the minister explain exactly what is meant by what was subparagraph (e) of paragraph 1, of section 21, which reads as follows:

. . . has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty.

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. I want to take the committee into my confidence. When we came to deal with that paragraph it gave us a great deal of trouble. The hon. gentleman knows me well enough to know that I would not want to have any measure in the bill which could be unscrupulously used by an individual to deport an alleged undesirable person.

Mr. HACKETT: Is that the language of the subparagraph taken from the criminal code?

Mr. MARTIN: Yes. I do not wish to refer to existing cases, but there are many instances. I forget the exact number we had before the war, but there were Canadian citizens who went to Germany between 1934 and 1936, many of whom took part in the activities of the German army. Others, if they did not take part, did other things which were obviously disloyal, and certainly could come within the characterization of being by act or speech disloyal to the crown. We must have some provision to deal with these people. These people acquired naturalization. They were not natural-born people. They came into this country and we took them for people who would give their loyalty to Canada. They did not. They being naturalized persons, we felt that we should have the right to deal with such people in this way. I am not denying that with people who have no responsibility this sort of thing could be open to abuse; but we have to trust whoever holds the office of Secretary of State, whoever serves in the government of this country, that they will not act lightly in a matter like this. That is the only effective reply I can give to the hon. gentleman, but it is a powerful reply. I do not think there has been any abuse of it, and I see no occasion to suspect that there will be.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): I am quite willing to accept the Secretary of State's word that he would not abuse it. I believe that implicitly, but there may be other secretaries of state following him. To some extent it has been abused in the past. I remember the history of the 1919 strike when undoubtedly men who afterwards achieved eminence of position in legislatures were arrested and virtually charged with treason and sedition. The founder of this political party, of which I am a member was arrested and incarcerated for four days, I think, because he quoted Isaiah in the streets of Winnipeg. We are not always going to get men in the position of the Secretary of State who are liberals in the best sense of the word. To my mind this section gives undue power to a minister, and I do not like to see that no matter how good the minister may be. I should like to move in amendment that what is now section 21(1)(d) be stricken out.

Mr. MARTIN: That is paragraph (e) as it appears in the bill?

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Yes.

Mr. PINARD: I should like to add a few words to what was said by a previous speaker. I think paragraph (e), which was just referred to, is a very general provision. It says that a person will cease to be a Canadian citizen and will lose his citizenship if he shows himself to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty. On that point I think this paragraph should be clarified and explained, because "disloyalty" has been defined in the criminal code. I think sections 74 to 87 describe the treasonable offences, but I believe here we should better explain what we believe would be disloyalty to His Majesty. For instance, I do not think it should be considered disloyal to His Majesty if one did not approve a measure which was ratified by the king on the advice of his South African or Australian ministers or, as another example, that a man would be disloyal if he did not approve the policy followed by His Majesty in India. For these reasons I think this section should be clarified, and that after the words "His Majesty", we should add the words "as king of Canada". Otherwise there would be a great deal of confusion, and some injustice might be done. So that we might add after the words "His Majesty" the words "in the right of Canada".

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): May I amend my own amendment?

Mr. MACKENZIE: By unanimous consent.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): If the hon. member wishes to do so he may withdraw his amendment by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): Then, if I may have consent to withdraw it I should like to substitute the following for the present paragraph:

has been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction under the law of Canada.

Mr. MARTIN: That would not cover the cases I have mentioned, of people who have not committed treason. We have suspicions, or perhaps more than suspicions, but they have not committed treason. They have done things that come close to treason, but under the law they are not characterized as such. That is so, for example, in connection with some of those people who went to Germany. The words, "by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty" have been in the present act since 1914. They are in all the corresponding acts throughout the commonwealth. They were in the Naturalization Act prior to 1914. They have caused no difficulty, and regretfully I must say that I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If I may ask a question, did I understand the minister to say that the Secretary of State would have the power, to be used in his discretion?

Mr. MARTIN: The governor in council.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What I am afraid of is that if we should be so unfortunate as to have the C.C.F. party get into power, they might be able to cancel my citizenship.

Mr. STEWART (Winnipeg North): We shall preserve you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: At this hour I am not going to get into another controversy regarding orders in council. I think we shall have an interesting debate on that, from the warning given by the hon. member for Vancouver East. But there is a question which should be settled by an opinion from the law officers of the crown. It deals generally with the question of orders in council. Earlier this evening it was stated than an order in council passed prior to this bill becoming law, of an import contrary to the statute itself, would be effectual as against this statute when it becomes law.

Mr. MARTIN: I will see that what my hon. friend suggests is done; but if my hon. friend does not mind my saying so, I do not think that comes under this section. However, I shall note the point. I am rather anxious to have this section passed, if I can; and since I did something which provoked the observation that I would be receiving excessive co-operation, perhaps I might ask for that consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not want to go into the question at the moment, because I do not think this particular section will pass this evening, but this is just another of these sections which will result in the setting up of more of these inquiries and commissions, to which we have been raising strong objection in recent days. I thought I would join a discussion of this section with a request to the minister that he secure an opinion from the law officers of the crown supporting the view expressed this evening by himself and by the Minister of Veterans Affairs—

Mr. MARTIN: I shall.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:—that when this statute is passed and becomes the law of the country it is going to take second place to an order in council passed before this statute came into effect. If that is so, then we have arrived at a state of affairs in this country that is not to be found anywhere else. To me it is a most amazing proposition, that in May, 1946, we pass a statute in this parliament, and that when in reference to an order in council previously passed we import into the statute conditions, terms and qualifications different from the order in council, the order in council takes precedence over this statute. To me that is an incomprehensible view, and I do not think it has even been supported in any court of law.

Mr. MARTIN: Of course this act, as an act of parliament, has priority over anything.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: All right; this act of parliament has priority over anything. That being so, this act of parliament, granting as it does rights to Canadian citizens, will not be subject to any interpretation on the basis of an order in council passed last fall. I think it is a matter of great importance, because we are going to find ourselves in this position. The order in council respecting the Japanese is now before the courts for interpretation. While that is the case parliament passes a citizenship bill which in part goes contrary to the provisions of the order in council. If the statement made by my hon. friend is correct, with which I agree, that the act of parliament is superior to the order in council—

Mr. MARTIN: It does not affect the order in council. They are two separate matters.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Oh, no. The order in council affects citizens of this country, and we are now passing an act of parliament granting rights to citizens different from those provided under the order in council. I think it is a matter which deserves serious consideration and on which an opinion of the law officers of the crown should be secured. If my view is correct, and it is supported by my hon. friend the Secretary of State, then we are going to find ourselves in a most peculiar position.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Golding): I wonder if we could deal with the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, that section 21(1)(d) be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

has been convicted of treason or sedition by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
