The cofor had returned to the Old Man's face a little more quickly and freely than usual. He picked up the hat he had cast down, put it on carefully over his brown curls, drew the flap down on the side toward his companions, and put his hands in his pockets. "All right," he said, in a slightly altered voice. "When do you go?"

of voice and lip. "If it's a conundrum, ask me an easier one."

Any lingering doubt he might have had of their meaning was dispelled by the Judge. "It's about the softest thing you can drop into, Old Man," he said confidentially; "if I hadn't promised the other boys to go with them, and if I didn't need the best medical advice in Sacramento for my lungs, I'd just enjoy staying with you."

"It gives a sorter freedom to ayoung fellow like you, Old Man, like goin' into the world on your own capital—that every Californian boy hasn't got," said Union Mills, patronizingly.

"Of course, it's rather hard papers of the interest is settled now. Farewell!" is settled now. Farewell! To limp remembering, however, that there was something of this in the last wells when novel they had read together, and that his antagonist might recognize it, or even werse, anticipate the himself, the idea was quick-lay rejected. Besides, the opportunity for an apotheosis of self-sacrifice was past. Nothing remained now but to refuse the profered bribe of claim and cahin by letter, for he must not wait their return. He tore a leaf from a blotted diary, begun and abandoned

"To-day," answered the Left Bower, "We calculate to take a moonlight impassioned exposition of his feelings to least indited a satisfactory and impassioned exposition of his feelings to least the down stage at about twelve to-night. There's plenty of time yet," he added, with a slight laugh; "it's only three o'clock now."

There was a dead silence. Even the rain withheld its continuous patter, a dumb, gray film covered the askes of the hushed hearth. For the first time the Right Bower exhibited some slight embarrassment.

Stight embarrassment.

Stight entering tread, to exhale the sweeter perfume in his effort to subdue or rise above them. "I reckon it's held up for a spell," he said, ostentatiously examining the weather, "and we might as well take a run round the claim to see if we've forgotten nothing. Of course, we'll be back again," he added hastily, without looking at the Old Man, "before we go, you know."

The others began to look for their hats, but so awkwardly and with such evident preoccupation of mind that it, was not at first discovered that the Judge had his already on. This raised a laugh, as did also a clumsy stumble of Union Mills against the pork barrel, although that gentleman took was the single more handled to the threshold and gazed on the hushed prospect. In this listless attitude he was faintly onscious of a distant reverberation, a mere phantom of sound—perhaps the explosion of a distant blast in the hills—that left the silence more merked and oppressive.
