An American in Mexico.

We take the following extract—which is not without its pertinency in these days when we hear so much about Spanish-American inferiority from a very interesting letter sent from the City of Mexico by an esteemed Arizona patron of the Review to a friend of his in that territory:—"The Mexican," writes our Arizona friend, "are behind the times in some things; but in others, some of our well Americans would do well to take lessons. I was walking into a hotel last night when I heard a loud burst of women's laughter. It was the loudest, the most unaccountable, the nearest vulgar, of any noise I had heard come from human lips since I had been in Mexico. I wanted to follow it to its source—it sounded so American to me. I did follow it to its source. The noise was American. A bunch of American tourists—my ever attractive fellow countrymen and countrywomen—were in a group in the public court of the hotel, and were having a good time in their own breezy way. I saw a good many Mexican eyes turned wonderingly upon them, when an especially shrill shriek of laughter would pass forth. These were 'respectable' Americans who had been successful and who were in the so-called best 'society' in their towns. I have noticed a few exquisite American ladies visiting here, but to stand off and watch some of the American women swinging down the street, gesticulating, talking and laughing loudly, 'blowing' their money in, etc., makes one feel sick—and I guess I am no aesthete, either. In point of manners, the lower middle-class Mexican is, when compared with the lower-middle-class American, an uncounted boor. I don't blame the Spanish for calling us pigs. 'So if a man comes down here expecting to find everything modernized and up-to-date in matter of mechanical contrivances and projects, as it is the 'States,' he will be disappointed. He won't even find, at the present time, an electric nor a cable car of any description in the city. 'But a man mustn't come here, either, thinking that he is strolling into a land where the people are all ignorant and poor. There is personal polish here—and polish of a pretty high type. There is wealth, too. Handsome, educated men, and beautiful, graceful women, dressed in the latest of the world's fashions, are drawn along the streets by thousands in as splendid harnesses and behind as elegant horses as I've ever seen in any part of the United States. Their turnouts are as magnificent as money will buy. Their other surroundings are luxurious in proportion. But there is no use in my trying to tell of the conditions as they exist here. To be brief, and to sum it all up from my own narrow, personal point of view—the city of Mexico has pleased me beyond expression. It is picturesque far beyond the best that I had dreamed for it. It is the strangest mingling of grotesqueness and beauty, ignorance and culture, inconceivable poverty and limitless wealth that I have ever seen. One can't read about it and understand. It is necessary to see it, and re-see it and then to see it again and again in order to comprehend the magnitude of it all. 'Americans come down here, rush about the streets for ten days or so, in and out of these wonderful churches, past scenes that would be rich—incomparably rich to the world's sublimest philosophers, and they go tripping dizzily back home and say they have seen the city of Mexico. Fools! They have seen nothing—nothing. 'The cathedral here would alone be worth much more time and money than the trip would cost, but it takes time to see these old churches—time and sense—and other things. Some people could chatter over their historic floors, and prattle glibly about them for years—and then never see them. With the history that hangs about them, they are nothing less today than materialized poems—poems built of metals, jewels, lime and stone.'—S. H. Review.

Spain's Work in the Philippines and Cuba. (Standard Times.)

We are, fortunately, at last getting some reliable news from the Philippine Islands, and so are being placed in a position to judge of the claims of the inhabitants to that freedom for which they are so manfully fighting in Luzon. The truth which is now, by a natural process, being gradually filtered out enables us at the same time to determine our moral obligations as well as to relegate to their proper limbo the many grossly calumnious stories of priestly oppression in the Philippines. We are also enabled to apply the test of achieved results to the efforts of Spain to civilize and campus out here won't be over five years, don't take him up. But something else, where you will have a show for your money. It is like fighting wild cats in hell through the swamps an' ravines. We keep them on the r... the time, but Lord bless you, like shovelling fleas across a barnyard. We thought a month ago that we had killed every soldier in their army, but, presto, change, with a whoop and a bang here are three more armies in the field waiting to land on our nobs. Lots of building is going on in the Quarter-master's Department. Major Davol is doing great work under great difficulties in erecting permanent quarters and in fixing up the former quarters of the Spanish army. It is hard to induce the Philippines to work for us, even at good wages. They have the idea in their heads that while working for us they are fastening the chains of slavery on themselves. It is all tommyrot to believe the yarns told about the ignorance of the natives. Several of the navy fellows who have been ashore over in the Isle of Panay tell me that the percentage of men, women and children who can read and write is greater than in the city of Boston, of which city two of the officers are natives. A minister of the Church of England, who is here visiting kinspeople, has been familiar with these islands, or at least the most highly civilized of the group, for thirty-five years. He holds the opinion that the Augustinian friars have done more solid work in lifting up the natives in the scale of civilization than has been accomplished by all the sects working in China and Japan. The friars converted fifty thousand families in one year in Panay—I use the Spanish spelling of the names of the isles. I believe that great triumph of the order was two centuries ago, and the people have never relapsed into barbarism. I saw a bridge built by the Augustinians in 1620, which is in a perfect state of preservation. It is a handsome bridge than any in our country. It is of marble of various colors, 700 feet long and 36 feet wide, adorned with groups carved from native stone by friars and natives. The groups represent the Holy Family, St. Augustine, Magellan, Columbus and others. In the Province of Iloilo a high state of civilization exists; the people are polite, industrious and faithful to their obligations. The men would make mighty fine additions to our handicraftsmen. For cabinet work and weaving complicated figures in fine dress stuffs they are ahead of our common run of mechanics. It would be a good deuced good thing to ship about ten thousand of the inhabitants of our slums out here and fill their places with Philippines. Our bills for police force and reformatory institutions would be smaller by millions of dollars a year. The story going the rounds is that the United States will cede these islands to Great Britain in exchange for Britain's West Indian possessions, and that Germany has an option on the Danish West Indian possessions. A sign that we are here for a long stay is the preparation for building enormous refrigerating plants for storing beef, mutton and fowl and for making ice.

Canada and the International Commercial Congress. (From a Special Correspondent.)

PHILADELPHIA, June 23rd.—The International Commercial Congress, which is to assemble in this city during the progress of the National Export Exposition next fall, has attracted wide attention abroad and promises to be the most successful and far-reaching industrial assembly in the history of trade and commerce. Governments, States, Cities and trade bodies in Africa, Asia, Australia, Europe and all the Americas have, even at this early date, named envoys and delegates.

Great Britain was the first of the nations to respond officially, and through Lord Salisbury, to announce that Lord Charles Balfour would represent the Empire. The British prime minister also announced that the invitation had been extended to Canada, Australia and the other colonies.

Canada has not as yet named an official delegate, but boasts of trade in more than a score of cities and towns have announced delegates. Three representatives have been announced from some places and two from others. Among the places to be represented are Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Westminster, Regina, St. John, Newfoundland, Brantford, Ont.; Charlottetown, P. E. I.; Fredericton, N. B.; Brockville, Ont.; Kingston, Ont.; and Woodstock, N. B. A score of boards of trade in other

With the backing of many governments of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum and the famous Franklin Institute of that city, and with the eyes of the entire commercial and industrial world riveted upon the project, there can be no such word as failure. W. F. Maish.

AN ORNERY LEGACY.

ESTHER A. WAGGAMAN, in Sacred Heart Review.

Prue answered his questions at random and she clasped her hands together convulsively to keep back the tears that were welling in her eyes.

"I don't believe you ever cared for my father," she blurted out at last, and then, before he could cover from his surprise, she had gone, and across the darkness of the hall he could see her light, retreating footsteps on the stairs.

For fully five minutes the Colonel pondered over her strange behavior without arriving at any conclusion; he had never been intimate with any woman; Prue was a perpetual puzzle and surprise; then he lit a cigar and retired to the library to busy himself with his books, and the little episode at the dinner-table was forgotten.

The days dragged monotonously by in Stanhope, but Prue soon accustomed herself to the new life. She was free—free to come and go as she pleased, and with her liberty her light-heartedness returned.

The winds sweeping across the great green waste whispered stories to her of other lands. Wrapped in her long black cloak she tramped far in fancy over the glittering waters to the kingdoms that have grown to royal battle fields, and witnessed bloodless deeds of valor.

One night, instead of pursuing her usual plan, she followed the Colonel into his study. "I would like to speak to you," she said. Her manner had softened; there was something appealing in her tone.

ing to end. I have more than I know what to do with.

"Then you can give it to me," she said, her face brightening. "Give it to you," he repeated, surprised and disappointed by her bold-faced beggary.

She was quick to note the effect of her words. Her eyes blazed with their old fire. "You don't suppose I want it for myself?" she cried. "There is a great deal of sickness among the fishermen; their huts are damp, the roofs leak. I wanted to repair them. It's your property, I believe, and turning, she left him without another word.

"And you always believe what you are told?" she asked, half mockingly. "No," he admitted, twisting the ends of the gray mustache, "but I have to accept general opinions about things I know nothing about."

"Because I have something else to do. There are my books—and that reminds me, my books are disappearing one by one. I wanted to ask you whether you were reading them or is Jenkins a thief?"

"Poor Jenkins, I hope you haven't accused him. I have them in my room. I suppose I should have put them back, but after I finished reading them I felt that they had been such good friends to me that I liked to have them near me, where I could touch them—look at them. Sometimes I have been so lonely—so very lonely," she spoke like a tired child, and he turned and stared at her, startled by her resemblance to her father.

"You are lonely?" he repeated. "I thought Mrs. Clash would try and amuse you." "Mrs. Clash!" she laughed merrily. "Poor Mrs. Clash! Have you ever heard the poor soul rattle on, a flood of words without rhyme or reason? Is that your definition of amusement? I think I prefer my own society."

"Of course Mrs. Clash is a great fool," he said, "but I hoped you would not discover it. I did not know that you were lonely. I have received several invitations for you from the people in town, but I declined them for you. I told them you were too young to go out at night."

"Why," she smiled, "I've watched all night by a camp fire; I've spent all night in the saddle when father was ill at the ranch and I had to ride for a doctor, and one year when the miners were on a strike I sat up for three nights with father. I was so afraid he would be hurt. Too young—I feel very old."

"The Colonel was plainly bewildered. "How old are you?" he said at last. "Eighteen."

when she made mistakes in building her castles in the air he told her of the realities he had seen in Europe and in the Orient.

On Sunday they started to call on Pere Gargaroux. It was vesper time; and the cracked bell in the ivy hung tower was ringing persuasively. Prue prevailed upon the Colonel to enter the church. They sat down on the last of the rough wooden benches and watched the people come in. The church was crowded by a motley throng—careworn men clasping their ragged shawls with red, benumbed fingers; old sailors in their thick sou'westers; rosy checked girls decked in their shabby Sunday finery, smiling happily upon the gaunt longshoremen who shambled by their sides.

The tapers flared into fire upon the altar; Pere Gargaroux appeared in his rich satin vestments; the air was fragrant with incense; the beautiful ritual of Rome asserted its wonderful sway; the Latin chant which has come echoing through the ages was answered by the piping little melodion, and when Prue's deep contralto voice took up the solemn strain the rest of the congregation followed. The words were familiar from long practice, and the Colonel listened, lost in astonishment to hear men and women who knew neither how to read nor write pronouncing with heartfelt piety the language of classical scholars.

The Colonel had visited many cathedrals abroad, but he had never been so impressed by the dignity of any religion before. Perhaps Prue, kneeling with clasped hands by his side, made him forget some of his puritanical prejudices. Truly, the power of Rome was all-embracing. He found himself wondering, as he watched the peaceful, prayerful faces around him, whether he would find any comfort in his clasp.

"You have made me feel very far away from you," he said to Prue as they left the church. "Why?" she said, "because I prayed for you?" "You prayed for me?" There was a touch of awe in his tone. "Why not? You surely don't object?"

"No, I suppose not; but I'll never do you any credit." "Suppose you try—," she suggested, smiling. "There is Pere Gargaroux; I must speak to him," and she left his side to greet the old priest who was coming down the steps that led from the little sacristy. He held out both hands when he saw her coming.

"Ah! Prue, I have not seen you for a week, and here is Colonel Stanhope—I am so glad to see you both. It is too bad that I must hurry away from you, but I have promised to go to talk to some poor man fifteen miles further up the road."

"Fifteen miles!" repeated Prue, plainly disappointed at being cheated out of her visit. "I will go on the cars," continued the priest. "It will not take me long, the poor men are convicts; they are at work upon the railroad. You will pardon me, Colonel, if I leave you in this unceremonious way, and you will come soon again?"

"And you are lonely?" he went on reflectively. "I had not thought of that. Would you like to have a governess? I have a cousin who might be willing to come; she is a good woman but a great bore, I believe. You see I am singularly bereft of friends. A 'bear' is not fit for society. I was different when Pbil knew me; now I am only a lonely old man."

His stern face had softened. Prue looked up at him wonderingly and her heart warmed towards him. Her hours of solitude had broadened her charity. "Then—then let us be friends," she said timidly, holding out her hand to him, "and perhaps we can help each other."

He took her small hand, held it in his own for a moment and said, "God bless you, child, perhaps we can," and then, as if ashamed of his weakness, he turned abruptly and left her standing on the sands alone.

ness matter that has to be attended to at once."

"I'm very sorry," she said at last. "You're sorry, he repeated, a frown gathering between his bushy eyebrows. "Don't try any polite formalities. I won't stand them from you."

"Then I'll take pattern by you!" she laughed good-naturedly—"and be as rude as I know how," and so saying she turned and left him standing by the fire alone. That night at parting the Colonel lifted Prue's small hand to his lips. She drew back a trifle, abashed by this first sign of affection. "God bless you, child; I hope you will miss me a little while I am gone," and then the front door slammed and Prue turned to face Mrs. Clash, who was standing on the steps too astonished for once in her life to speak.

And in the days that followed Prue did miss the Colonel in a way she did not understand. She grew tired of her cherished books, and bringing them all back to the library she shut them in their high glass cases, and then sitting down in the Colonel's cushioned chair she smoothed his worn leather arms tenderly and cried over his blotting-pad—she did not know why. The tears were very near her eyes in those days—she who had been called so fearless, so strong. Her long walks upon the beach wearied her; she haunted the post-office for letters, but none came to her; she was so tired—so tired and so lonely—she must be ill—perhaps she was going to die; she wondered if the Colonel would feel sorry when he heard the clumps of earth falling upon her coffin-lid. Would he remember her only as a foolish, spoiled child? The Colonel was so wise—he knew everything—some day he would marry a brilliant woman, while she, his ward, would remain to teach his children.
