House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Friday, June 12, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, June 12, 1942.

Sir:—I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman Poore Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber to-day, Friday, June 12, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

Second report of special committee on land settlement of veterans of the present war.—Mr. Macmillan.

GASOLINE

LACK OF SUPPLY FOR MAGDALEN ISLANDS FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): A few minutes ago I received a telegram from Grindstone, Magdalen islands, dated to-day, and reading as follows:

Gasoline situation very serious here. No supplies in distributors hands fishermen forced to give up fishing on account shortage gas. Please contact Imperial Oil, Canadian Oil and McColl Frontenac so as to have further supplies shipped to Magdalens soon as possible.

County Council, per Armand Painchaud,
Secretary.

Will the government take some action to remedy this situation?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I will bring the matter to the attention of the oil controller immediately and ask him to do his best to relieve the situation.

USE OF TRUCKS BY FARMERS ON SUNDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply on a matter of very serious concern to the farmers in consequence of the order that has been made forbidding the use on Sundays of trucks, which is the only means of transportation that many farmers have. Has the minister given consideration to permitting farmers to use their trucks on Sundays, subject of course to conformity with the gasoline regulations?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I know of no regulation forbidding the use of trucks on Sundays. I know there is a regulation forbidding the use of trucks for pleasure travel, and if the two are synonymous the regulation would apply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How about going to church?

Mr. HOWE: The truck is a commercial vehicle and it is provided that it must be used as such.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even when it is the only means of locomotion the farmer has? Without it he cannot go to church.

Mr. HOWE: I know.

CANADIANS IN JAPAN

ARRANGEMENTS FOR EXCHANGES OF CANADIAN AND JAPANESE NATIONALS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked me a question yesterday—which I must apologize for not having answered sooner, because it was asked before—regarding the exchange of nationals between Canada and Japan. The facts are that immediately on the outbreak of the war with Japan negotiations were undertaken with the Japanese government, through the protecting power, for the repatriation of officials. Early in the year these negotiations were extended to cover non-officials, and an understanding was reached for the repatriation to Canada of Canadians in Japan and occupied China, on the understanding that Japanese subjects in Canada who wished to do so may be permitted to return to Japan. As accommodation on the first exchange vessel is limited, an early repatriation of large numbers is not to be expected. Under the circumstances, the Canadian authorities have requested the protecting power for Canadian interests to give priority to women and children in the assignment of berths on the exchange vessel leaving the far east. A small party of Canadians, other than officials, being evacuated from Japan at the present time is expected to arrive in Canada about the end of August or early in September, and other small groups may be expected to arrive at intervals of six weeks or two months from then on. The full list of persons in the first vessel has not yet been received by the Canadian government, and may not be received before the vessel sails.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Arising out of the answer which the Prime Minister has just given, may I ask if it is the intention that these exchanges shall be of equal numbers of Canadian and Japanese nationals respectively? May I also ask how many are involved in the present exchange?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sorry I cannot give any more information than that contained in the statement, but if there is anything more that I am able to ascertain I shall be glad to let my hon. friend know.

SOVIET UNION

EXCHANGE OF CONSULAR REPRESENTATIVES BETWEEN CANADA AND THE U.S.S.R.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members will recall that I informed the house on February 5 that the government of Canada and the government of the U.S.S.R. had signed an agreement in London on that date providing for the exchange of consular representatives.

The Canadian government have come to the conclusion that it is desirable to establish a Canadian legation in the U.S.S.R. on a reciprocal basis, and we have now been informed that the Soviet government accept the Canadian government's proposal and that they desire to establish a legation in Canada. We understand that the Soviet government will also establish a consulate at Halifax.

I am glad to be able to announce, therefore, that an agreement for the exchange of diplomatic missions between Canada and the U.S.S.R. was signed in London to-day at 5 p.m. London time. The text of this agreement, which was signed by Mr. Massey on behalf of Canada and by Mr. Maisky on behalf of the U.S.S.R., reads as follows:

The government of the U.S.S.R. and the government of Canada have reached an agreement as follows:

1. The two governments have agreed to establish direct diplomatic relations and to exchange ministers.

2. The present agreement comes into force immediately after its signature and is not subject to ratification.

3. The present agreement is made in two copies, each of them in the Russian and English languages. Both texts have equal force.

DR. T. T. SHIELDS

PRESS REPORT OF STATEMENT RESPECTING THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. (Translation) Has the Minister of Justice been informed of the statements made by pastor Shields against the province of Quebec? I do not wish to quote the newspaper article in its entirety but with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I would draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to an article published this morning in the French daily Le Canada, in connection with pastor Shields.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand that the hon. gentleman is calling attention to some article respecting Doctor Shields and asking a question of the Minister of Justice. From the form of the question I judge that there is no urgency about the matter, and the question should be placed on the order paper.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

1. That a sum not exceeding $19,401,586.20, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943.

2. That a sum not exceeding $550,655.91, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several following items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, in addition to the sum mentioned in resolution No. 1, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, namely:

He said: Mr. Chairman, I should explain that this is one-twelfth of the amount provided by the main estimates for 1942-43. The second part of the resolution provides for an additional one-twelfth of a limited number of items, as was done when the last interim supply was voted. It is obvious that it would be impossible for the committee of supply to pass the estimates before the end of June, and as there is to be royal assent to-day it was felt it would save the time of the house and of the other chamber if the additional one-twelfth were voted at this time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance the matter to which I referred a few moments ago on the orders of the day. Apparently an order has been made by a board which is under the administration of the Minister of Finance forbidding the use of trucks on Sundays. For many farmers their truck is the only means of transportation they have for farm work, for use on Sunday or for any other purpose. The result of the order is that a great deal of ill-feeling has been aroused, and I should like to ask what consideration has been given towards repealing the order.

I have received various letters complaining about this order, and they are all to this effect: While the farmer is denied the right to use his truck to go to town and to do any of the things that are ordinarily done on the farm, or to use his truck to take himself and his family to church, nevertheless a direction has gone out permitting a farmer who purchases another car, a second-hand car if you will, to utilize it for all the purposes which are denied to the farmer who owns only a truck. Surely such an order is unreasonable. Here is a letter from a man who has no horses. He is a patriotic citizen who has two sons overseas. He is forbidden to use his truck on Sundays. Why is it, he asks, that such discrimination has been perpetrated upon him? The position he finds himself in is not peculiar to him by any means. Many others are in the same position. Everybody agrees that there must be gas rationing, but is it reasonable to make an order that a farmer who has an automobile may use it for his ordinary purposes while the farmer who has only a truck, and there are many such farmers, is denied the right to use that truck?

Mr. FAIR: The same condition exists in my province, and I have had a number of complaints along the same line. In the city of Ottawa and vicinity you will not find, as you do in western Canada, a number of second-hand cars and small trucks which are used for the purpose of conveying small loads. They are not commercial trucks such as may be in the mind of the controller, and I would certainly like to have something done to enable farmers who have no cars to use these converted vehicles and other small trucks.

Mr. HATFIELD: The same conditions exist in New Brunswick and elsewhere in eastern Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: I, too, have had communications on this matter. May I suggest to the minister that there are in some of our cities a number of families who have two or more cars in the family and who therefore are allowed to have coupon books for each car. It seems to me that if we are rationing gas we should limit it to one car per family. As the hon. member for Lake Centre says, there are numerous people who have to go to town in their trucks. In one part of my constituency there are practically no horses, and the present practice does work a hardship upon people who have no other means of conveyance than their trucks.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I believe I raised this question a week ago Monday before the minister when we were discussing the matter of controls. In our province many farmers have disposed of their automobiles and are getting along with light delivery trucks. They are prohibited from taking their families in their trucks to marketing centres or to church on Sunday. As the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has pointed out, in these marketing centres you may find people with two automobiles and two ration books. This is certainly most unfair, and some arrangements should be made on behalf of farmers who have traded in their cars for light delivery trucks and who are now unable to convey their families to church or to town. The minister has had a couple of weeks to think about this matter. I spent a day here trying to clear it up, and had to telephone to the controller, a Mr. Stewart, in Toronto, and after running into all this difficulty among the farmers two weeks ago I was unable to get any action.

Mr. HOWDEN: My hon. friends on the other side of the chamber are not the only favoured ones in this respect.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Unfavoured!

Mr. HOWDEN: Along the Red River valley are a great many settlers of foreign extraction who have come to this country and made it their adopted home after reaching mature life. They have no means of getting to market or anywhere else except by means of a converted old Ford car which has been made into a form of truck and is so registered. These people are practically unable to leave their farms and go anywhere excepting by means of this type of old vehicle, and if they are prohibited from using it for any other purpose than to carry loads they will be subjected to much hardship.

Mr. PERLEY: I wish to join in this protest. I am doing it more or less because I am in a little personal difficulty with respect to it, because I advised one or two farmers in my district last spring to dispose of their cars and buy trucks. I gave this advice to one of my own tenants, knowing that the truck would be useful in carting out seed to the field and for many other purposes, but he finds now that he cannot use it when he wants to go to town on Saturday night to do his shopping, and his wife is no longer able, as was her habit in other years, to do a lot of running around to town and elsewhere. I could cite several similar cases. I think something should be done. These trucks are practically as comfortable as some of the old cars and are useful for going around on Saturday nights and Sundays. A neighbour of mine, a dairyman, disposed of his car and got a truck because he could use it in his general business as well as to deliver his milk, and it is a great handicap to him not to be able to use it on Sundays and in the evenings for the purposes of the household.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the committee's attention to a regulation which limits to fifteen miles the business radius of taxis in the province of Quebec.

On the north coast of Gaspé county, where there is no railroad between Matane and Gaspe, that is for a distance of over two hundred miles, this regulation has brought about a totally abnormal situation from which the local population will undoubtedly suffer unless something is done.

Following representations which I made to the war supplies department, the limit was extended from fifteen to thirty miles. Yet, this is still not enough to answer the needs of the population. From midway between the two railroad terminals at Matane and Gaspé, there is a distance of one hundred miles to travel to reach the nearest rail line, a distance which becomes shorter from village to village until one reaches the thirty mile limit.

The two nearest hospitals are located at St. Anne des Monts and Gaspé, that is a distance of one hundred and fifty miles. In case of illness or a bad accident, no taxi can reach the St. Anne des Monts hospital, or that in Gaspé, if it has to start from a point outside the thirty mile limit.

[Mr. Howden.]

I think that in consideration of this unusual situation, the government should allow taxis in each of these localities, outside the thirty mile limit, to travel as far as is necessary to reach the nearest railroad terminal or hospital.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacINNIS: While we are on this matter I might as well point out that I am a pioneer in bringing it forward. I raised it some three weeks ago when the Minister of Munitions and Supply had his share of the war appropriation bill before the committee. It is a condition which affects people in the urban centres as well as those in the rural districts, and frankly I do not know just how the oil controller is going to be able to satisfy everybody. It brings into more glaring relief a consequence of our social system. One of my constituents has a light delivery truck. He used it for business deliveries in the week, and on Sundays he took the family to one of the beaches round Vancouver, going sometimes as far as White Rock. Possibly his next-door neighbour, also having a delivery business, is well enough off to have a private car as well as a truck. He also takes his family out on Sundays, and the man who cannot afford a private car as well as a light delivery truck did not grudge his neighbour his car so long as he himself could use his delivery truck, but now he finds himself in the position that if he takes his family out in the truck on Sundays he is warned by the controller that his ration book will be taken away from him. The other man has his truck ration book and also his private ration book. So here is a social distinction, possibly not a very great one in ordinary times, but one which now comes out in all its glaring inequality. My correspondent sends me the letter he received from the regional controller, and I must admit that it was quite reasonable. There is no fault to be found there, and I am at a loss to know how the matter can be dealt with and yet do what it is intended to be done by the regulations to conserve gas, unless we cut out all travel on Sunday except what is essential.

Mr. McIVOR: I have a case which presents the other side. A farmer sold his truck and kept his car. He is a grocer merchant and delivers with his car because it saves gas, but he was face to face with the difficulty that while the other merchants in the city obtained a commercial rating he was cut down to class B, and like myself he does not like it. If he cuts down on gas by using his car he should have enough gas to carry him through the year so that he can make his living. Of course, there are two sides to every question except truth and error.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The complaints made from the central provinces and western Canada are small compared with the complaints that might be registered from the eastern provinces. In central Canada and in the west coupons are recognized as entitling the holders to five gallons per coupon. The maritime provinces are reduced to two gallons per coupon and have to contend with all the other restrictions about which they complain. The people in the maritime provinces are prepared to submit to this control if necessary in carrying on the war, but the premier of Nova Scotia, the premier of New Brunswick, and hundreds of thousands of people in the maritimes have not yet been convinced that the restrictions in those provinces are either necessary or fair. Some hope has been held out by the Minister of Munitions and Supply that the regulations as they apply to the maritimes will shortly be relaxed, and I should like to impress upon the Minister of Finance, who comes from Nova Scotia, as I do, the importance of the complaints I am making. He himself must have received many complaints; he has certainly had complaints from the premier of Nova Scotia. I urge upon him, therefore, the importance of seeing that early action is taken with regard to restoring the value of the coupon unit, in whole or at least in part, to users of gasoline in the maritime provinces. There are grievances in the other provinces, but the complaints from the maritimes are far more substantial than those registered in other parts of the country.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black). If there is a section of the country that has a grievance in connection with the rationing of gasoline it is the maritimes. The reduction in the unit can be understood. There is not sufficient transportation to get gas into that section. We accept that statement at its face value, but there are rumours, and there is considerable evidence, since the unit was reduced, to the effect that gas has been shipped out of the maritime provinces, out of Nova Scotia particularly, into other sections of Canada. I am trying to get information in that regard from the Minister of Munitions and Supply. However, accepting at its face value the statement that it is necessary at the present time to reduce the unit in Nova Scotia, we feel that if there is not sufficient gas for essential purposes the people of those provinces are prepared to make whatever sacrifices are necessary. But when it is shown to them week after week and day after day that on the part of the military authorities particularly there is little attempt to conserve gas, the situation appears in a different light.

I had a long list of complaints which I brought to the minister's attention. If there is a shortage of gasoline and if it is necessary to ration it on the basis that exists in Nova Scotia, then it should be done. But as I pointed out some time ago, in that event pleasure driving should be discontinued completely, so that what gas is available should be made available for essential purposes. In sections where there are large military concentrations station wagons and military cars are on the road practically all hours of the night, certainly not for military purposes. Moreover, military cars are in the habit of driving officers from headquarters to the barber shop and waiting for them, three or four cars at a time. They wait for these officers until they are through shaving and take them back to headquarters. They also take officers from headquarters to clubs and back to headquarters again. That is not necessary, while in small communities where there is a concentration of troops the people who have legitimate business to carry on are obliged to walk to and from their places of business. Their business is crippled or curtailed because of lack of gas, and to see these military cars used for the purpose I have indicated is not a sight to inspire further belt-tightening on the part of people who require gas for legitimate purposes.

Those who use oil will have to tighten their belts too. I had one complaint of an ex-service man who was crippled during the last war and who for the last twenty years has been earning his living as a commercial traveller. He is unable to walk and must use his car to get around, but he is in a category that gives him two gallons a week. The result is that his business is at a standstill. He made special application to the board in Halifax, but obtained no redress. I appealed to the oil controller, setting out the facts of the case. I received the reply that he was very sorry but no distinction could be made. That car is essential because it is this man's means of earning his living. He is crippled, but he demonstrated that he was prepared to lay down his life for democracy; yet he cannot get gas to earn his living, and there is no one who will feed him. Where there are extenuating circumstances, some redress should be given.

I had the privilege of going to Camp Borden some time ago and there I found a fleet of buses running out of the camp. I am not complaining about that. They leave the camp loaded, travel seventeen or twenty miles and return to the camp empty. There is not much service there. There is waste of gas and rubber. I believe that 50 per cent of the buses on the road travelling on that basis and using up gas could very well be used for other purposes. That gas could be made available for essential uses. A month has gone by, and there has been sufficient time for those who are responsible for the organization and the rationing of gas to come to some understanding as to what the future of the maritime provinces will be. Is an attempt being made at least to put the maritime provinces on the same basis as the rest of Canada? Can the minister make any statement as to when that situation will be relieved? Has he any knowledge that a certain oil company on the island of Cape Breton had a year's supply of oil on hand? That oil was pumped to ships and shipped out of that part of the country within the last month.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no such knowledge.

Mr. GILLIS: There is evidence to that effect sufficient at least to convince me. Can the minister say whether he can see any possibility in the near future of changing that oil situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I really have to leave a matter like that to the minister who is responsible, namely the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I am not able to make any statement other than the last statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): The minister should give personal attention to this matter from the point of view of Nova Scotia. There is a feeling in the maritime provinces that they are unnecessarily discriminated against. If these restrictions are necessary the people will submit, but they are not satisfied that they are not being discriminated against, and that more could not be done to meet their needs.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The matter of a farmer conveying his family in a light delivery truck does come under the minister's department. It was raised two weeks ago and was said to be under the price-ceiling control. I think the minister should make a statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it the administrator of services has made some order which is merely part of the carrying out of the oil-control policy. That, I assume, is the situation. I surmise that the oil controller found that he had not jurisdiction to make an order relating to service, that is transportation, and that he prevailed upon the service administrator to make some order. The discussion this afternoon has shown that the problem is one essentially and fundamentally of control of the use of gasoline; I do not know what else it could be. It is probably true that Mr. Stewart as administrator of services has made some order supplementary or ancillary to the orders of the oil controller.

I will bring to the attention of the services administrator the representations made this afternoon. That the matter is one of difficulty that there are conflicting considerations, and that the officials have not acted without thought, is shown by some of the speeches made this afternoon. It may be that the situation can be improved upon. The thought I have is that this simply shows the difficulties that arise in any widespread attempt at regimentation. Yet we have to have regimentation. We have been told repeatedly that the public is away ahead of the government, and that the public will submit to any degree of control—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Which is reasonable.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is what is always said. I remember last fall when the public was really clamouring for more regimentation, more control, I said: It is all right, the public wants a great deal of control, but the moment anything is done which strikes anyone as unreasonable they will say, "For heaven's sake exercise common sense in your control." And the test of common sense very often is whether it inconveniences the person concerned. It is absolutely impossible, in these far-reaching measures of regimentation and control, to avoid all discrimination. The hon. member for Lake Centre spoke about a matter. He was pretty well answered by the hon. member for Fort William; the man who gets a big gasoline ration I suppose should not be allowed to use it in pleasure travel, and the man who gets a small one can so use it to that extent. I suppose that is the reason.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think there is a distinct lack of cooperation. I took this matter up with the Department of Munitions and Supply, and they told me it was under the price ceiling. I spent a whole day on it before I ever mentioned it in the house. I was at home in the intervening period and had a terrible time trying to explain the situation to the agricultural producers in my part of the country. I want to assure the minister that these people are quite willing to submit to controls, but it is distinctly a waste of gasoline, time and various other matters essential to the war effort. There is no complaint about personal inconvenience, but it is distinctly a waste in our part of the country.

Mr. ILSLEY: What is the waste?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Well, the hon. member for Fort William said that the man who has the larger ration should be able to use some for pleasure purposes. I disagree; these people do not want it for pleasure purposes. The farmers go with light delivery trucks. A business man, in my section who is not even a British subject has two large cars. He has a class C ration book for one car and a class A ration book for the other. That is not cooperation; it is not setting the proper example. These things need to be checked up. I do not know anything about the experience of the controller, but I know this is distinctly not in the national interest throughout our part of the country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not understand the statement made by the minister when speaking of the farmers who were affected by the orders made by the commissioner or whatever his title may be. The minister says it is always the way, that the people who say that they are ahead of the government, when an order is made raise complaints. That is a very unfair statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Of course I did not say it.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that not the meaning of what the minister said?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, reading Hansard will reveal whether or not that is a correct interpretation to place upon the words he uttered. There is no question of objection to regimentation where necessary. The objection we have taken here regularly has been this: Parliament is sitting; yet you have controllers and heads of boards and all these other individuals making laws affecting, not the war effort, but the individual lives of the people of Canada engaged in civilian operations. Against unfair orders there is no recourse to parliament. We talk about parliament losing prestige. No one was more definite about that than the Minister of Finance the other day. He spoke of the falling away of parliament's authority. He gave his reasons for it. In large measure, its loss of prestige is due to the fact that parliament is abdicating its power in favour of boards and commissions which act without regard to circumstances and conditions and who refuse, when arbitary rulings are pointed out to them, to make any change. Seventy-five per cent of the laws affecting individuals in Canada to-day are passed by commissions, boards and like bodies and not by parliament. I heard it said only yesterday, that we had better not object in regard to certain orders made by the oil controller for if, as members of parliament, we do so we shall find that he will become stubborn in regard to changing objectionable orders that are now in effect.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who said this?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I said I heard it said yesterday. The minister has taken the position that he does not know how the order came to be made; he does not know who made it; and he accepted the statement of the hon. member for Souris that it must have been made by some commissioner.

Mr. ILSLEY: The services administrator.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister said, as I understood him, that it was made for the purpose of assisting in winning the war by the conservation of gasoline. Then I ask him, what reason was there in the order made in Regina the other day in the case of a farmer whose letter I am prepared to place on record if it is required, in which he informs me that a farmer was advised that if he disposed of his truck and bought a second-hand car, then the order would not apply, and he could operate it and secure gasoline under the regulations, but because of the fact that he has only a truck he is denied the right that he would possess if he owned a motor car. Surely this is unreasonable. It is just an example of bureaucracy at its worst.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, but I think the reason would be this, that if a man gets a commercial category he is supposed to use the gasoline for commercial purposes. If he gets a pleasure category he may use the gasoline for pleasure purposes, up to the limit of that category. I should think that would be the basis for the rule.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But still that does not answer the situation of thousands and thousands of farmers all over western Canada, and no doubt all over Canada, whose sole means of transportation is by truck, which they use for both purposes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman wanted to know the reason.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I can understand the reason stated by the minister; that is true enough, but it is just an example of bureaucracy at its worst, in that the controller makes regulations which parliament does not have an opportunity to look into and which work discrimination. Surely, Mr. Chairman, the minister will give the assurance that this matter will be looked into and that where there is any unfairness or discrimination it will be removed, as far as that is practicable.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can give that assurance; that is fair enough. The matter will be looked into, and in so far as there is discrimination that it is practicable to remove, it will be removed.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): Then it is understood that the matter will be looked into with special reference to the maritime provinces, where the people have to submit to a ration of two gallons per coupon, and that if there is going to be relief, or if there is to be no relief, an announcement will be made. If there is to be relief, as I am hopeful will be the situation, the people of the maritimes should be told when that will come into effect, and I hope before July 1. I am appealing to the minister now as a fellow Nova Scotian to investigate the matter from the point of view of the interests of our province, to take up the matter with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the oil controller, the big gasoline dealers and others, and to see that some announcement is made in order that the people in Nova Scotia who believe there is discrimination against them may have something definite on which to base their plans and carry on their business.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have been waiting for all these hon. members who have been speaking about the farmers to say something about the poor folk in the congested cities. Not having heard anyone say a word on behalf of the humble people in the congested centres of our great cities, I am going to say a word for them. Neither motor cars nor trucks are owned by the common people who live in the congested centre of Toronto; but I have seen, as I am sure other hon. members have someone come on Sunday with a motor truck into which they load four or five families to take the kiddies and their parents out along the lake shore drive so that they may have a dip in the lake. What are they going tc do on Sunday, if it is a day like to-day, when it is hard enough for grown people to withstand the heat? What are they going to do on Sunday if they cannot go in these trucks out along the lake shore? If there is to be any loosening up, I think it should be extended to those people too. I want to give the hon. member for Lake Centre credit for bringing up this matter to-day, though quite a number of other hon. members have tried to horn in on it. What is going to happen on Sunday if it is a day like this? If there is to be any loosening up for the farmers, as there should be, let us also have a little loosening up for the poor, humble people living in the conjected area of our great cities.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since we are talking about the welfare of people generally, I suggest that the rules of this house should be changed so that on a day like this members of parliament may sit here without wearing their coats. I would also point out to the minister that when money is being spent some consideration should be given the staff of this house. I notice that we have attendants and guards here who are wearing thick, heavy, winter clothing, which on a day like this must be almost torture. I appeal to the minister to do something for the staff in order that they may be comfortably clad, and I hope that one of these days we may be permitted to attend in the hot weather without our coats.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the minister really ready to do something about these abuses which have been aired by several hon. members, in connection with this matter of allowing men to use trucks on Sundays when they have no other means of transportation? When a series of abuses has been brought to the attention of the minister it is not good enough for him to say, "Well, that comes under the oil controller, and he has found it necessary to do so-and-so." I just do not believe it is necessary for him to do this. I see no reason why it should be necessary to permit an injustice to exist at all in this country, if sufficient attention is given to the matter. Surely the abuses that have been mentioned by the hon. member for Cape Breton South and others are so flagrant that they should be attended to. Surely it is not necessary to have such things as those. Surely it is not necessary so to restrict the poor farmer in the Red River valley, who has nothing but a poor little old rattletrap of a car that has been changed into a sort of truck, which is his only means of getting to church or doing anything else on Sunday, while other people are permitted to have two cars. This strikes one as being so painfully unjust as to be almost revolting.

I have come in contact with one or two other matters coming under this oil controller or fuel controller which also strike me as being very unjust. The question has been raised in my mind as to whether this parliament has any control at all over these controllers. Is it a recognized practice that once a man is appointed a controller he is no longer responsible to this house, and that the minister to whose department that controller belongs is no longer responsible for the behaviour of that man? If so, then we must acknowledge that in this country responsible government has ceased to exist. If that is necessary, all right; but I do not believe it really is necessary. I was waiting to hear the minister give some indication that he will bring a little pressure to bear, in response to the expressed will of members of this house, and not be content merely to talk about the matter. I recall the time when the minister was contemplating the imposition of a three-cent tax on the gasoline used by farmers. A great many members of the house exerted themselves for a long time, until they felt that they were really obstructing the government, in an endeavour to have that pernicious tax removed, but the minister sat quite still and allowed one of the most unfair taxes that could be conceived of to go into operation and to continue in operation throughout this country. If we have no recourse, what is the use of our being here? What is the use of our talking?

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1943, the sum of $19,952,242.11 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 98, for granting to his majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1943.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On the schedule.

Mr. STIRLING: I take it that this bill is in the usual form in every respect.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, exactly.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Thursday, June 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Mr. J. A. CRETE (St. Maurice-Laflèche): Mr. Speaker, on February 11 last, speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I took a clear-cut stand with regard to conscription and the plebiscite. I made the following statement at that time:

I wish to state that I remain irreducibly opposed to any kind of conscription for overseas service and that I shall not request my constituents to release me from past commitments in this connection.

I also intimated that conscription would not greatly increase the number of men in our armed forces, that it would hinder our war effort by destroying national unity, that it would make the people less enthusiastic about participating in that effort, that it would endanger the confederation pact and that, finally, it might increase the vulnerability of this country, which, acording to our military experts, was liable to be attacked by the enemy.

What has since occurred to justify the abandonment of the voluntary system? Nothing as far as I can see.

At a time when hundreds of thousands of Canadians are serving in all our armed forces overseas, when submarine attacks have just been launched against Canada in the St. Lawrence it is proposed to remove the last restriction with regard to conscription so that the government may be able to send overseas those young men of military age who are still in this country.

We are told again that this does not mean conscription. This brings to my mind the story of the sick man whose condition the doctor found slightly improved from day to day, and who was found dead, one morning, as a result of that slight improvement.

A brief review of the political history of the last twenty-five years is sufficient to give us the firm belief that repeal of clause 3 of the mobilization act of 1940 means the enactment of conscription for overseas service.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Without the slightest doubt.

Mr. CRETE: In 1914, Canada went to war against Germany and her allies. At that time, as older men remember and as those of the younger generation have learned, all political leaders in Canada assured us that conscription for overseas service would never be enforced.

The same assurance was given in 1915 and 1916. Early in 1917, a national registration took place. We still remember the solemn assurance that was given to the bishops of the province of Quebec to the effect that national registration would never be used for the purpose of enforcing conscription.

These pledges are associated with very unpleasant memories, for, in that same year 1917, a conscription measure was adopted by the Canadian parliament.

I do not intend to recall the events of this melancholy period, which has left gaping wounds in the hearts of Canadians.

On November 11, 1918, the bells of all our churches were pealing the news of the suspension of hostilities. An armistice had been signed. The civilized world, shaken in its very foundations, grieving the loss of millions of human beings, deprived of its historical treasures and its wealth, returned to its normal occupations. All the nations of the world were unanimous in their resolve that the war just ended should be the last.

During the first few years after the signing of the Versailles treaty, the Canadian people courageously resumed its march towards its ideals, silently grieving the loss of thousands of their sons fallen in strange lands.

In 1922, in Ottawa, the yearly estimates of the Department of National Defence were reduced by 2½ million dollars. Our country waged this pacifist campaign for the next 15 years. But, in the 1937, the national defence estimates were considerably increased. A new programme was announced, which included the reorganization of our military, naval and air forces. This step led the warlike nations of Europe to believe that, following their example, we were forsaking the Versailles formula for the principle of armed peace.

This new trend resulted in a lively reaction from the people and a certain section of the press. Even in the House of Commons, some hon. members uttered energetic protests against steps which were interpreted as preliminary preparations for participation in a future European war.

Reassurances were then given the Canadian people. The government stated, through its best authorized ministers, that these heavy military expenditures would be devoted exclusively to the national defence, to the defence of Canada only.

In 1938, Canada was taking a greater part than ever in the armament race. Military estimates soared still higher. New protests on the part of some members who claimed that as long as the federal parliament neglected to amend the Militia Act in such a way as to incorporate in it some clause establishing Canada as our first line of defence, it would be useless to talk of national defence and that, under certain circumstances, the military estimates voted by parliament for the defence of Canada could be used, at some future date, to promote our participation in a foreign war.

In 1939, the increase in our war appropriations took on greater and more alarming proportions. Almost one hundred million dollars for war purposes. There were renewed protests on the part of those who believed Canada was definitely committed to a course of action leading to war and who stated that military preparations would inevitably lead to war, that war meant our participation in it, that such participation would become extra-territorial, that extraterritorial participation would require the sending of men and war equipment overseas, that any expeditionary force of ours would need reinforcements, and that the organization of these reinforcements was predicated on the heavy recruiting of men which would lead in the end to conscription for overseas service, which we are now being asked to adopt. All this, it must be noted, was said way back in 1939.

Is this not, Mr. Speaker, a brief but true description of the course we have followed since 1937? Granting this, who can state now that once the government has the power to conscript men, it will not do so?

Mr. GAUTHIER: No one.

Mr. CRETE: Of what worth are the assurances being given us in order to weaken opposition to this measure?

We have been at war now for over two and a half years. Our total population does not exceed eleven and a half million inhabitants. Nevertheless, over four hundred thousand of our men have enlisted for overseas service. We supply food to the allied nations. We furnish them war equipment and food in enormous quantities. We are taxed and rationed as we have never been in our history. We have just made Britain a gift of one billion dollars. Our financial and economic resources are pledged for generations to come. Our remaining youth are mobilized for the duration. Apparently all this does not count, since we are asked, as danger threatens us, to authorize conscription for overseas service.

Mr. Speaker, Canadians of English and French descent have lived together in this country for almost 200 years. In this most critical of times, let us remember those who first settled on this Canadian land, who cultivated it and willed it to us as our most precious heritage. Let us remember their sacrifices and their hardships. Let us never forget the courage with which they defended this country on two memorable occasions. Let us recall the collective efforts we Canadians have made since 1760 to safeguard Canada, and develop her natural resources.

I appeal to my fellow citizens of both English and French descent and ask them whether the passing of a conscription measure would not forever destroy the foundations on which this country rests.

While we are fighting for everything we hold dear, so we are told, which one among us would insist on conscription if such a measure is destined to divide the Canadian people, and destroy that harmony so essential to the development of our country and the attainment of its destiny.

Which one among us wants conscription, if it entails the break-up of confederation?

What member, what Canadian citizen will reasonably uphold that conscription, by adding a few thousand men to the strength of the allied nations, will ensure victory for our side and justify destroying the results of our collective efforts, during two centuries, to make Canada what it is to-day?

Mr. Speaker, I pray that Providence may spare us from such a disaster.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, this is the third day of this debate, and all hon. members will agree that it began with a good speech and has continued with a series of good speeches; that so far it has been conducted in a tone that has been tolerant and forbearing, and that if it continues on the same plane there is at least a possibility that out of this crisis, because it is little less, we may step up to a better basis of unity than we have ever known before.

Burke said that magnanimity in politics is not seldom the truest wisdom, and our English-speaking people to-day should show to the French-speaking people magnanimity. That, even more than cold justice or efficient sternness, is what we need. Between the French- and English-speaking there should be a real effort to understand the changing nature of the world and the changing nature of Canada, and that we each must seek the same things—the security of Canada, the unity of Canada, the welfare of Canada, and the defeat of the aggressors, without which no one of these three would be possible.

This bill has been introduced in consequence of the plebiscite, and I suppose every hon. member in the course of the debate will give his interpretation of what the plebiscite meant. It seems to me to be clear that the people of Canada, in giving the government a free hand in the prosecution of the war, want the government to take the measures necessary to defend Canada wherever that can best be done. The people having removed the moral bar, the government has now introduced this bill to remove the legal bar and to give effect to the will of the people as expressed in the plebiscite.

Yesterday the member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), in his exceedingly eloquent speech, seemed to be most concerned over what in the long run is really a question of procedure, whether parliament should be consulted once, or twice, on this question. It has been suggested that in proceeding in the way in which it is the government has betrayed promises made during the plebiscite campaign, that parliament would be consulted. My own view is that this is a consultation of parliament. But if there is anything in the suggestion that has been made, I should like to make this comment: that the people, and the only people, who are qualified to raise the issue of having been misled are the people who voted yes on the plebiscite, and not the people who voted no.

As for conscription, we have had a great deal of talk about it, and it has become common to refer to it as a symbol. It is two symbols. To the French-speaking people of Canada it is a symbol of racial domination; to the English-speaking people of Canada or some of them, it is a symbol of total effort. It has become a shibboleth. As I listened to the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), it seemed to me that he was more concerned with the symbol of conscription as meaning total effort than he was with any other feature of it. He advanced no reasons as to why it should be necessary now; he advanced no suggestion that the voluntary system had broken down; it was in effect the same speech that was given during the plebiscite debate, and nothing was indicated to justify any other action than that which the government is taking.

The government does not want a symbol; it wants to do whatever is necessary to make the utmost effort that the people of Canada can make. The government has said that if that is by a voluntary effort, then it will choose the voluntary method; if it is by means of conscription, then it will choose conscription, and if it is by a combination of both, then it will combine both methods. Thus we are really discussing a means to one end—the achievement of a total and balanced war effort. My view is plain enough; it is that if conscription would advance our war effort, then we should have conscription for overseas service, but if it would not, why take any further step than we have already taken?

The leader of the opposition said that our national honour was involved in our failure to go ahead. But is there dishonour in having half a million volunteers in the armed services of Canada? Is there dishonour in having raised by the voluntary method every man that has been needed or called for or could be used in any theatre of war or in any service? If there is dishonour in that, then the world is turned upside down. It is a matter of pride to us, not of dishonour, that we have succeeded in doing what we have done, and that the Canadian people and Canadian boys and women have done what they have done without our having had to resort to conscription for overseas service. The leader of the opposition spoke about our standing in the United States being affected by this. Such knowledge as I have of United States opinion shows that our standing is not so much affected by our not having conscription for overseas service as it is by the campaign of detraction carried on in Canada, and by the failure of our government to make the full story of the Canadian war effort plain in the United States. Canada's honour does not rest on this. Canada's honour is in safe hands. It is in the hands of the half a million men in our armed forces; it is in the hands of the boys who are flying nightly over Germany, of whom—I am glad to say—we hear increasingly good stories of grand heroism.

One further word on this question of the honour of Canada. I draw it to the attention of hon. members that if this bill were not to pass it would still leave Canada with respect to conscription for overseas service in the same position as Australia, and no one has any doubt about the honour of that country, our gallant sister commonwealth.

If conscription is asked for as a symbol of total effort; if it is being demanded because of the leader of the opposition's idea of national honour, I say those reasons are not enough. If, on the other hand, Canada fails by even a hairbreadth to discharge her full duty to the united nations, to humanity and to herself, she would be dishonoured unless she took every last means of throwing into the scales every resource she had, no matter what the cost.

The opposition to this comes largely from two sources, two extremes in Canadian opinion. There are those who want conscription, no matter what it costs, immediately; there are those who want conscription never, and there are even some who say that our participation in the war should be limited. These extreme views are the very best possible justification of the policy chosen by the government and now placed by it before this house.

Of equal importance with the questions raised directly in the bill are the questions which are raised in consequence of it—the question of national unity. In that connection I should like to read to the house a passage from a fine speech of the Minister of Finance on February 4, as reported at page 313 of Hansard:

> Unity is still possible in Canada if we take ourselves in hand. The other day when the Prime Minister was speaking, appealing for unity, I understand that an hon. member interjected, "What unity?" Well, let no one scoff at unity or dispair of unity. We can maintain unity by the course we are taking. But we would shatter it into a thousand bits if we followed the course advocated by any single faction of extremists in the camps—not the camp—against us. The objective of all of us is a total war effort in the interest of the earliest possible termination of the war.

What he said then is even more true to-day; it has an even greater appeal to the members of this house and to the people of Canada, because the plebiscite showed—and there is no gainsaying the fact—a wide division in Canadian opinion. It is a challenge to Canadians, a challenge from which Canadians and this house are not going to flinch. We are not going to pass it by and we are not going to despair. This is the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation, and we can meet its challenge if we remember the way in which the fathers of confederation met the even greater difficulties of unity which threatened them at that time. They refused to be daunted. We can take up the challenge. We can take it up in their spirit. But we will need coolness and frankness and a great deal more understanding in order to meet it.

I thought I should, as a Canadian who lives in the province of Quebec, try to make some contribution, however slight, to Canadian understanding on this point. I have lived in the province of Quebec since I was born. My children were born there, in the constituency I represent. My family has been there for four generations, and I have come to know and like its people and to love the province. Because of that, and because of the feeling I have for this country, I feel that I should try in sincerity and frankness to help to bridge this gap in our understanding. The plain fact is that English-speaking Canada has never appreciated what the question of conscription has meant in the minds of French-speaking Canadians, and I do not know that they ever will, without being members of the race. It is partly a question of race, and for that and for what that means I refer hon. members to a passage in "Maria Chapdelaine" which has been read before in this chamber. It is a question of history, of fighting for survival, of the economic difficulties to which the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères referred yesterday. It is a particular attitude towards their own country, their only country; and it is due to the fact that conscription has been continuously linked in their minds with the idea of imperialism, of British wars, of fighting for Britain. The two notions of conscription and imperialism are indissolubly linked together, so that when one comes up the other is inevitably raised in their minds. Toronto Saturday Night of June 6 had this to say:

> The compelling reason why the English-speaking majority in the Dominion of Canada should hesitate a long time before imposing overseas conscription on the province of Quebec, has been expressed in a dozen words by several French Canadians who have sought to make the position of French Canada intelligible to their fellow countrymen. It is the simple fact that conscription, for a kind of military service which he regards as being capable of being directed more to the defence of the empire than to that of Canada, has become to the French Canadian the "symbol of dominance," the outstanding proof of the intention of the English-speaking majority to exercise their majority power no matter how repugnant the results may be to the minority.

If hon. members have any doubt as to whether that is not a dominant idea, a large factor in this matter, they have only to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères yesterday, when he was referring to his added difficulty of fighting in this war. He said, at page 3278:

> Because I have to reason in my mind why I have to support the British flag and spend my energies for the defence of British rule in this conflict, or perhaps elsewhere.

On that statement the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is a better imperialist than most of the members in this house, because I doubt if many Canadians really think that in this war they are fighting for the support of British rule here or elsewhere. It establishes what I have said. It is a matter of the utmost importance that English-speaking Canadians should remember this and should try to understand it—I will not say to make allowances, because that is not the thing that one race should do towards another in a country like Canada.

To my French-speaking friends may I say this. From my knowledge of English-speaking Canada, nothing could be farther from the truth than that the idea of conscription is involved in the notion of dominance. As Toronto Saturday Night says further:

> The trouble is that the great majority of English-speaking Canadians are not conscious of exercising this "dominance" and do not understand why the minority should regard it as such. They are convinced in their own minds that what they are advocating is in the best interests of Canada.

To my French-speaking friends I would add this to what I have just read. English-speaking Canadians feel that we are fighting for our survival, we feel that the fight can be best carried on the farthest away from our shores, and that in order to defend Canada we have to defeat the enemy wherever he is. And we feel that any means are justified to that end. But there is no notion of racial dominance or anything of the kind in the English-speaking attitude.

Now, what can we do about these two views? I suggest first that we English-speaking Canadians should admit frankly that some of the blame is due to us. It would be a good thing if for a few days we all adopted the practice of blaming ourselves rather than blaming anyone else for any situation that has developed in the past. Some English-speaking Canadians, the extreme imperialist element, have said, "This is a British war, and because it is a British war therefore Canada must go into the war." But what did that mean to the other extremists in French Canada? They said, "Because it is a British war, therefore it is an imperialist war and therefore we should not go into it." The statement that we were fighting for Britain prevented French Canada from seeing that we were fighting for the survival of Canada. Every time a newspaper or speaker referred to fighting for Britain it was used in the province of Quebec by the extremist press as justification for their assertion that because we were fighting for Britain, therefore it was an imperialist war in which we should take a limited part.

This attitude of the extreme British element to which I have referred, and which we call "imperialist," shows a colonial mind, and its continuation has had a bad effect on Canadian life. It has closed our eyes to the nature of our country, to its history, to the realization that the majority of Canadians are not Anglo-Saxons, and that to them the only country they can call home—as well as to all true Canadians—is Canada. It led to opposition to the idea of our separate entry into the war. These people did not realize that it was far more dramatic that we an independent nation, as a result of the free deliberation of our parliament and government, should go into the war on the side of Britain, which enabled the British to say with genuine emotion, when they saw our troops arriving, "they did not need to come." Those who held a colonial attitude were opposed to the whole idea of the constitutional development of Canada, forgetting that "freedom is the life-blood of British institutions." Its emphasis on aid to Britain prevented us from appreciating early enough the fact that this was a universal war, a world war, in which wherever there was fighting, there our battle front lay. The danger to Canada, the importance of the magnificent efforts being put up by China and Russia, were concealed by the survival of this idea. The importance of the Pacific, the fact that we had two fronts, was concealed by this idea. It concentrated attention too exclusively on the war in Britain. It concealed from us the fact that we needed universal means to make universal war. We thought too much in terms of man-power and an expeditionary force, as in the last war, and not enough in terms of industrial power, trained pilots, tanks, ships, convoys and sailors. Why, it affected our own war effort. The survival of this idea led us to take the view that we were acting as agents only to take and fill orders when we got them from Britain. We kept to British specifications and British standards far longer than we should have done. Hon. members will remember the passage I quoted from the speech of Lord Tweedsmuir in 1938, that this idea was a real disservice not only to Canada but to the commonwealth.

I call attention to the fact that the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères in the passage to which I referred said, "because I have to reason in my mind why I have to support the British flag". A Canadian has to reason in his mind why he has to support the British flag! I venture that this is true to say of a very large number of Canadians, because it is not the Canadian flag. Canada is alone among the British dominions, alone among the countries of the world, in not having a flag of her own.

Mr. MacNICOL: Newfoundland has the same design of flag.

Mr. CLAXTON: I do not suggest that we should not have the union jack in our flag, but we should have a flag to which the emotional attachment of Canadians of all races can be drawn, which will mean something to Canadians as Canadians alone.

I suggest that some of us English-speaking Canadians have, by our attitude, helped to bring about this extreme nationalist feeling on the part of some extremists in the province of Quebec. Both groups of extremists are basically colonial-minded; both of them charge each other with disloyalty; the clashing knives of their bitterness sharpen each other; both are wrong; both threaten national unity and interfere with the war effort; both undermine Canada's faith in herself and prevent her from taking the full responsibilities of nationhood. Before the war these extremists helped to promote the habit of compromise, they prevented the growth of sturdy self-reliance as a nation, the self-reliance which Canadians as individuals have. They helped to prevent our having a conception of Canada and its role in the war which would be the keystone in our thinking about the war from end to end of Canada and would be the core of all our publicity and educational efforts on the war. I referred to the feeling in Quebec about the war and the failure to realize that this is a war for the defence of Canada. We have some part of the blame for that, because we failed to bring home to the citizens of Quebec the true nature of the war. We failed to meet the propaganda that was poured in and poured out. I suggest now that here is one thing which hon. members in all parts of the house, no matter what their vote on this question is, can do together; that is to work together to develop a common idea of our country which will have an equal appeal to all Canadians of every race.

There is no chance for Canada in the long run if we have two conflicting, competing, ideas of our country. Either the stronger will prevail and the minority will feel that it is being dominated, or the weaker will prevail and the stronger will feel that the weaker is being appeased or that concessions are being made to it. Or else we shall have a weak compromise, paralyzing and stultifying national policy, preventing any sense of common purpose and the realization of a common goal. We must have a common idea of Canada, an idea big enough for all to accept. To my English-speaking friends I say we must realize that Canada is a country of two races; to my French-speaking friends I say they must realize that though two races it is still one country. We both should see the difficulties and work together without thought or fear of domination or assimilation.

I should like to grasp the hand of cooperation offered last night in the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe). Although he did not take the view of this issue that I take, every word he said was spoken as a Canadian; every word was an eloquent appeal to Canadians of all races to work together, no matter what the result of this issue is; and that appeal will, I believe, be echoed and reechoed not only through this house but throughout the country.

What should be our common idea and common goal? We are fighting for our lives, for our country, the grandest country on the face of the earth; we are fighting for the only kind of world in which a nation like Canada can survive, a world in which the peace is kept by some kind of collective action; there is no other way to keep it. Victory is worth any price, any sacrifice that may be necessary. And I think we should be fighting to make a country where no one able and willing to work will suffer the degrading agony of unemployment; where lack of money will not prevent any mother from having a child or prevent any child from having the education for which he is fitted; where the first charge on the national wealth will be the care of the young, the care of the aged, the care of the sick; where the motto "prevention is better than cure" will be a programme of action, not merely a pious platitude; where problems and difficulties will be faced and not shelved; where, in addition to the constitutional rights of French-speaking Canadians, there will be equal treatment for people of all origins and all races; and where people will have a real sense of participation in the life of the nation and of membership in a world society in which Canada shall play its full part.

Who disagrees with this? Who disagrees with any part of it? Who doubts that it would be easier to keep in step if we felt that we were on the way to such a goal? People may say, "Win the war first." The answer is no, because such a programme does not interfere in any way with the winning of the war, but helps us to fight better. We must put our minds and hearts into the job, our soul's desire, of making Canada the country we know it can become.

In this seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation I commend to hon. members the speeches of the fathers of confederation. See what faith they had in the future of the nation they knew they were setting up. Sir John Macdonald said:

> If we wish to form—using the expression which was sneered at the other evening—a great nationality, commanding the respect of the world, able to hold our own against all opponents, and to defend those institutions we prize: if we wish to have one system of government . . .

We must have union. Cartier, who I am proud to say represented part of the constituency which I myself have the honour to represent, said:

> Objection had been taken to the scheme now under consideration because of the words "new nationality". Now, when we were united together, if union were attained, we would form a political nationality with which neither the national origin nor the religion of any individual would interfere.

The name "Kingdom of Canada" was dropped only because it would "wound the sensibilities of the Yankees".

To bring to the service of the nation in peace and war the best of individual and combined effort should be our purpose. We should not lose the peace and harmony that we are fighting to gain. Whatever the result of this vote; whether or not the government extends compulsory service to overseas, we shall make our utmost effort; we shall go forward united to victory and to peace. Our sole ambition, our only hope, our supreme ideal is to assure peace to the world and plain common sense in Canada. By the manner of our discussion and conduct during and after this debate we can reassert to the world at large the superiority of a freely organized and liberty-inspired people.

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just concluded his address (Mr. Claxton) I think was the first on the government side to support his leader in the policy announced on Wednesday last. The hon. gentleman made an appeal to his compatriots in the province of Quebec, and tried to answer in part the great speech delivered here yesterday by the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres (Mr. Cardin). I am not mixing in any of the controversies of eastern Canada, but I do agree with one statement made by the last speaker; that is, that the people of Canada as a whole believe victory is worth any price and any sacrifice. That, I thought, was a noble expression of what I believe is in the mind of the whole Canadian people.

I had not intended to take very much time to-day, in fact I shall take only a very few minutes. I should have preferred to wait until the committee stage was reached, when I might have had some suggestions to offer or some remarks to make, but since I will not be here during part of next week, and it may be that this debate will be speeded up and concluded by then, I wish briefly to set out my position and indicate what I would do if I were here when the vote was taken.

To put it very briefly I may say that my position was expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in the words with which he concluded his address earlier this week after dealing pretty thoroughly with the whole situation since 1940. At page 3252 of Hansard he said:

> I shall vote for the second reading of this bill; but I shall insist that there be incorporated in the bill—

That is, in the committee stage.

> —the necessary mandatory provisions to place at once at the disposal of the state, without limitation and upon terms to be decided by parliament and not by the cabinet, the full resources of the nation in man-power, wealth and materials.

I trust that when this bill is considered in committee those on the opposition side will emphasize the necessity of parliament being given a definite statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to what he proposes to do if the time comes when he thinks conscription is necessary; how he proposes to bring it about and enforce it. It seems to me that this may easily develop into one of the most important debates we have ever had in this parliament. We are dealing with vital questions, and certainly this is a critical time in the history of Canada. There is hardly any precedent for what we are doing to-day. In his speech delivered yesterday I think the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères made a reply to the Prime Minister. He reviewed the record since the election of 1940; having been a member of the inner circle until very recently, he knew what he was talking about. His was a great effort, and I considered it a privilege to be here and listen to it. The hon. member dealt with the passing of the mobilization act and recalled how quickly it had gone through this house. He emphasized the fact that the Prime Minister could call parliament together at very short notice, if at any time he wanted to give parliament a chance to debate the question of conscription. His remarks were directed particularly to the Prime Minister, and he went on to point out the right hon. gentleman's inconsistencies during the past two and a half years.

We have had the mobilization act, under which men have been called up first for one month's training, then for four months' training and then for the duration of the war. Now we have this bill, to amend the mobilization act. In the meantime we have had what might be called two national registrations, the first in 1940 and the latest one last month, of all unemployed between the ages of sixteen and seventy. On previous occasions I have suggested that it was unfortunate that the government did not make use of the information gained in the 1940 registration. Had that been done, all Canada's forces could have been mobilized and there would have been no exodus from the farms such as we have seen during the last two years.

In his speech on Wednesday last I do not think the Prime Minister did himself justice. We expected a lengthy speech, but I think it was a disappointment to the people of Canada. I believe this parliament and the people generally expected something very definite from the Prime Minister. The public, having released him from what he termed his moral obligation through the plebiscite vote, expected something definite when he undertook to amend the mobilization act. I think they expected some form of conscription, in order that the Canadian people might put forth an all-out war effort; but in his speech he defied public opinion and this parliament. If conscription is to be imposed within the next six months, will parliament have an opportunity to discuss the matter? The Prime Minister made it definite that if we have anything to say about conscription, now is the time to say it. He did not propose to give us another opportunity, even though it might be necessary six months or a year hence to put conscription into force, of discussing this matter. We were told to discuss it now or, so to speak, forever hold our peace.

Who knows what is in the mind of the Prime Minister if and when he admits that it is necessary to impose conscription? There was nothing in his speech that would indicate what he had in mind. I think the statement of the leader of the opposition was a proper one to make. He reviewed the situation as it had developed from 1940 and referred to the different debates and speeches that had been made by the Prime Minister, members of the cabinet and others. He covered the ground very well. When he suggested that we should have had something definite, I think he was taking the right stand.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères said yesterday that the plebiscite ballot should have contained a definite question as to whether or not the voter was in favour of conscription. I shall not deal with that now. When the plebiscite bill was before the house I referred to the question on the ballot. When the bill passed I considered it to be the duty of all of us to endeavour to get a "yes" vote. In February last, before the plebiscite bill came before the house, I took the stand that there was no need of a plebiscite vote. On February 3 I referred to the fact that the government had a huge majority and I commented upon the questions that had been raised during the campaign. At that time I said, as reported on page 262 of Hansard:

> We believe, and I think the majority of the Canadian people believe, that this is no time for a plebiscite, in view of the crisis facing Canada and the world. It would have been more courageous for the government to bring in a resolution for the complete mobilization of all our resources in finance, industry and man-power, and I venture to say that such a resolution would have the almost unanimous support of this house and of the people of this country.
> I wonder what our soldiers overseas think about this plebiscite.

Further on in the debate I suggested that we as representatives of the people knew pretty well what was in their minds and what they had been thinking during the two years since the election. I contended that a vote of this house would have been a better criterion of the feeling of the people than a plebiscite vote. However, once the bill passed I went out and endeavoured to get the largest possible "yes" vote.

I am proud to say that in Saskatchewan the vote was almost five to one "yes". In my constituency of Qu'Appelle it was practically a six to one "yes" vote. No matter what the Prime Minister said last Wednesday as to what this vote meant, I say that at least 90 per cent of those people who made that vote a six to one "yes" vote thought they were really voting for conscription. What did the legion which took part in the campaign expect? What did the men on active service expect? When I was endeavouring to get the people in my province to vote "yes" I quoted from a broadcast made by the Prime Minister on April 7, and I should like to quote from that broadcast again. After pointing out the dangerous situation that existed in Canada, both east and west, and in Europe, the Prime Minister said:

> We cannot defend our country and save our homes and families by waiting at home for the enemy to attack us. Every country that has stood behind its own defences in this war has sooner or later been attacked. To remain on the defensive is the surest way to bring the war to Canada.

And again:

> We must go out to meet the enemy before he reaches our shores.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister what he meant when in appealing for a "yes" vote he said that we cannot save Canada by staying at home. Was that not practically saying to the people, "If you release me from this moral obligation, in order to save Canada we will send soldiers to any theatre of war and will meet the enemy before he reaches our shores"? That was the logical conclusion for the people of Canada to arrive at. They released the Prime Minister from his pledge. I recall on one occasion I put it that the people of Canada were exchanging pledges with the Prime Minister. They released the Prime Minister from his moral pledge, but they expected that he would follow up what he said in that broadcast.

We appreciated the fact that the government had information which the public could not have, but we expected that the facts would be laid before parliament so that parliament might decide the case on its merits. I have quoted the words he used. Surely the people of Canada had a right to expect something more definite. They expected that this question would be brought before parliament so that we would be given a chance to discuss it. I believe when the people of Canada released the Prime Minister from his pledge they were willing to pledge themselves to assist the government in making Canada's war effort more effective and if necessary to suffer greater sacrifices. The people wanted an opportunity to demonstrate their national resolution and determination to win this war in Canada's darkest hour, no matter what sacrifice might be needed.

During the campaign the people were told of the difficulties and the dangers that Canada was facing. It was really an education for the people of Canada. The Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, members of the government and nearly all the members of the House of Commons endeavoured to tell the people the true situation with respect to the war. The people learned a great deal about Canada's war effort. I quoted from the many pamphlets and other information that had been put out in this connection, and I know the people appreciated it. On one occasion I had the privilege of having the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) with me in the town of Indian Head, and the information he gave to the people in that crowded hall was worth while. I complimented the hon. member highly for giving them that information, which they were entitled to receive at first hand from an authoritative source. It did much to bring about the almost solid "yes" vote in that town of almost 2,000 people.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) last night dealt with an important point, namely, that this amendment will give power to the military authorities to bring military service for overseas into force at almost any time. Naturally the military authorities will first confer with the Department of National Defence, the Department of National War Services, and the government, who I have no doubt will act upon the advice thus received from the military authorities.

It has been said that parliament will not have the opportunity of discussing the form of conscription that will be brought in. It is true that there is no act of parliament now for conscription overseas, and there is no indication that we shall have an opportunity of discussing such a measure. But I do want to say, with other speakers, that Canada's contribution in the production of food and the necessary munitions of war, tanks, aeroplanes, guns and ships, must not be allowed to suffer. We must have complete mobilization and organization of our resources so that there shall be no lessening of the production of food and the munitions of war.

I referred a few minutes ago to the figures that were the result of the national registration which was taken about two years ago.

I think those figures should have been made use of earlier. Had that been done, we should not have had to wait until March 23 of this year for the freezing of employment on the farm. That step came too late; we should have had it a year ago.

We have had ceilings established on wages; we have had price ceilings; we have had a cost of living bonus, but so far no fair price has been arrived at for the products of agriculture comparable to the prices received for the products of industry. I should like to elaborate on that, but I shall not take the time to-day because we are now awaiting the arrival of the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

But I do not want to conclude before saying that the Prime Minister should have been more definite, and I trust when this bill gets into the committee stage the Prime Minister will give the committee the government's definite proposals for carrying out conscription for overseas service if and when they deem that necessary—and that remains for the government to decide. But the first consideration should be the mobilization of agriculture and industry. We must organize the man-power resources of this dominion so far as production is concerned.

The crop reports from Saskatchewan are encouraging. Just before coming into the house I received word that we have had three inches of rain in the southeastern half of Saskatchewan within the last forty-eight hours. The crops are coming along well and if everything continues favourable the problem of harvest help will be a serious one for Saskatchewan. I trust the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will give his earnest attention to that.

It is my view that the whole man-power and woman-power of this dominion should be mobilized, and all our resources, and our capital, if you like, to the end that we shall win this war. Let me recall the words of a great statesman: Let us not think that this war cannot be lost, but on the other hand let us think that this war must be won, and then as Mr. Winston Churchill said, victory will crown our efforts.

If I should not be in the house when this bill is passing through the committee stage I trust that members of the opposition will see to it that the Prime Minister gives to the house definite proposals as to how conscription for overseas service is to be enforced, when the government deems that to be necessary.

[Mr. Perley.]

Mr. LUCIEN DUBOIS (Nicolet-Yamaska) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I also believe it my duty to protest against the measure now being considered by the house, authorizing the striking out of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

In doing so, I have no personal interests to further, nor can I be charged with discussing this measure from a narrow political point of view, with an eye on re-election to this house. On the contrary, I wish to assume my responsibilities as I see them, and to make sure that my stand on this issue will be as logical as I believe it to have been in the past.

For the information of that section of public opinion which I have the honour to represent here, may I be permitted to quote an interview published in Le Devoir, of Montreal, in Feb. 9, 1937. I quote this article not because I wish to boast or to appear as a prophet, but because I believe it useful to explain my present stand. The interview ran as follows:

The reporter: We met Mr. Dubois as he was leaving the office of the Clerk of the House, Mr. Arthur Beauchesne:—

Q. What do you think of the military appropriations?

A. I believe the old formula remains true. Our armament policy will be Canadian as long as peace endures, and British in time of war.

Q. Do they represent, to your mind, the introduction of a new military policy?

A. Beyond doubt.

Q. Do you see in these military appropriations a repetition of what occurred in the past, notably in 1910 and 1911?

A. Absolutely.

Q. Do you intend to oppose their passing?

A. Yes, absolutely, even though I were the only one to do so. But I shall not be the only one.

Q. You seem to be absolutely sure of the appropriateness of both your views and your acts, would it be because you foresee grave dangers for your country in the present military policy?

A. I yield, states Mr. Dubois, to a deep instinct which commands me not to support these military appropriations. Besides, we may recall past experiences. I fear we may repeat the mistakes of former years.

This interview is five years old.

As you see, from the very beginning, I felt, through some kind of intuition, the depth of the abyss in which the circumstances then obtaining would inevitably lead us.

In 1937, 1938 and 1939, I oppposed the increase in military appropriations, not because I was averse to incurring the defence of Canada, far from it; but because I feared the dire consequences which confront us to-day and which are menacing our national unity, if it still exist in our country.

Then came the 1940 election, when I was returned to office simply because I had faithfully interpreted the opinions of my constituents. I shall not relate in all its details the struggle I had to wage against those who did not share my views.

During this campaign, all the members of the present parliament pledged themselves to oppose conscription for overseas service. However, after its entry into the European conflict, on September 10, 1939, our government supported our war effort to the limit of our financial resources.

On June 21, 1940, the house passed the National Resources Mobilization Act, for the defence of Canada and of Canada only. I then supported that act which, for once, clearly stated our true military obligations. No Canadian worthy of that name could oppose the mobilization of our national resources for the sole defence of our country.

Step by step and from one concession to another we have now reached the brink of the abyss that was foreseen in 1937, because, whether we like it or not, this measure undoubtedly incorporates into our statute books the principle of conscription for overseas service. I am not the only one to entertain that belief, as evidenced by an excerpt I shall quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 1, 1942. Referring to the debate on this bill, that paper made the following statement:

> Once that debate is closed and the bill is passed, conscription shall have been definitely settled, the time when it should be applied remaining, of course, to be determined in the light of the requirements of the general military situation.

Such an opinion should be pondered, considering the source from which the Free Press obtains its information.

Under the pretext that our sacrosanct national unity is at stake, it will be asserted, to-morrow as to-day, that we are waging Canada's war for Canada, for the defence of all the liberties and all the rights of the Canadian people. In the light of recent happenings, that argument has an ironic angle. I wonder if there is really such a thing as a Canadian people. Can any one conceive a people without a flag, without a national anthem, and without any true understanding among its various elements? A Canada without a truly Canadian policy on all matters is not the kind of country which our forefathers had visualized.

Is it fitting that, for the maintenance of such a primitive colonialism, Canada should be called upon, every 20 or 25 years, to sacrifice through conscription the lives of her young men on distant theatres of war? My answer is no, not any more to-day than yesterday shall I vote for such a measure.

Were I to be asked to vote for the conscription of wealth in order to help our allies, I would gladly do so, for such would be the best means, as I see it, to put an end to all those wars which throw the world into confusion for the benefit of a few shady financiers.

What need have we of conscripting men when England is asking us for tools?

What need have we of this legislation to intensify our war effort when Mr. Churchill himself states that our effort has been more than splendid?

What need have we of conscription when the voluntary system meets the wishes of the government even beyond their expectations?

Have we so soon forgotten the telling words uttered by one of our most eminent governors, Lord Tweedsmuir, when he said:

> A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British Commonwealth of Nations but to Canada, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

With this thought I shall conclude. Whenever this legislation is adopted it shall be put into effect by order in council. Parliament shall have nothing further to do, nothing to say in the matter. Mr. King shall be at the mercy of the conscriptionist members of his government.

I entreat each and every one of my hon. colleagues in this house to join, while there is still time, in rescuing our leader from this evil predicament by a concerted vote against the present bill.

On motion of Mr. Gardiner the debate was adjourned.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major A. R. Thompson, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, His Honour, the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the house went up to the Senate.

And having returned.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the house that the deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the royal assent to the following bills:

> An act to amend the Canada Evidence Act.
> An act to authorize the raising, by way of loan, of certain sums of money for the public service.

An act for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security.

An act for granting to his majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1943.

On motion of Mr. Ilsley the house adjourned at 5.46 p.m.

Monday, June 15, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME HOUSING—ST. CATHARINES AND MERRITTON PROJECTS

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What was the cost to Wartime Housing Limited of providing water and sewage to the building projects in St. Catharines and Merritton districts?

2. How many wartime houses are served by these extensions?

3. What arrangements have been made with the civic authorities concerning the paying for these extensions?

Mr. HOWE:

1. St. Catharines project numbers (1) and (2) and Merritton project number (1), $67,549.61.

2. St. Catharines and Merritton, 325 houses.

3. These extensions were undertaken by Wartime Housing Limited, direct, with the exception that the town of Merritton installed the necessary water mains and house water connections on the Merritton project, their costs for which were submitted to and paid by Wartime Housing Limited.

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many bonuses under the wheat acreage reduction plan for the year 1941 in the province of Saskatchewan are outstanding?

2. How many prairie farm income bonuses are still outstanding in the said province for the same year?

3. How many applications approved of under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act for the year 1941 in the province of Saskatchewan, have not been finally settled?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. 1,084 as at June 11, 1942.

2. 1,224 as at June 11, 1942.

3. 2,173 as at June 11, 1942.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CONSTRUCTION OF HUTS OR HOUSES IN REGINA

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many huts or houses is the government building in the city of Regina; who is the contractor and what is the price for each hut or house?

2. Are the building contractors furnishing heating and plumbing? If not, who is?

3. What is the cost for, (a) heating, (b) plumbing, for each of said huts or houses?

4. Were tenders called for, (a) building, (b) heating, (c) plumbing?

5. If so, how many tenders were submitted and what was the amount of each?

6. If tenders were not called for, was any company or person invited to submit tenders?

7. If tenders were called for, in what newspapers were the advertisements inserted?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The Shoquist Construction Company of Saskatchewan is performing a contract for the government, awarded January 9, 1942, known as the construction of works and buildings for amalgamation of No. 12A district subdepot with No. 12 district depot. The price as quoted for each house or hut is as follows:

1	quarters and mess, 30 officers..	$ 24,300
1	quarters and W.O.'s and N.C.O.'s	16,611
6	quarters and other ranks.....	98,712*
1	mess, W.O.'s and N.C.O.'s.....	11,359
1	mess for other ranks.....	16,105
1	Q.M. stores and reg't. shops....	6,048
1	company officers and H.Q.....	9,413
12	Total.....	$182,581

* (each $16,452.)

The above prices are for buildings only and are exclusive of excavation, grading and sewers, etc.

Since the above contract was awarded, two buildings have been added to the project, the work to be done by the same contractor, as follows:

Dry canteen and lecture room, $8,496; guard house and four cells, $4,200.

2. Yes.

3. It is impossible to ascertain from the general contractor's tender the cost of the heating and plumbing as this cost is included in the price quoted for each building.

4. No. Tenders were called for the general building construction, heating and plumbing inclusive.

5. The tenders submitted and the amounts were as follows:

	Without kitchen equip.	With kitchen equip.
Shoquist Construction Co.	$191,088	$193,829
Bird Construction Co.....	192,230	No quotation
Poole Construction Co.	195,500	No quotation
Smith Bros. & Wilson Ltd..	196,967	No quotation
Waterman-Waterbury Mfg. Co.....	200,130	204,061

6. Tenders were invited from the following firms:

Shoquist Construction Co., Saskatoon, Sask.

C. M. Miners Construction Co., Saskatoon, Sask.

P. W. Graham & Sons, Moose Jaw, Sask.

Carter-Halls-Aldinger Ltd., Regina, Sask.

Bird Construction Co., Regina, Sask.

Smith Bros. & Wilson Ltd., Regina, Sask.

Poole Construction Co., Regina, Sask.

Waterman-Waterbury Mfg. Co., Regina, Sask.

7. Advertisement in newspapers was not made. Invitations to tender were sent out to all those firms in the vicinity known to be in a position to handle a project of this size. Eight invitations to tender were sent out and five tenders were received.

WARTIME HOUSING—PURCHASES OF MATERIAL

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Are contractors working on contracts for Wartime Housing Limited restricted to making purchases of material from certain companies only?

2. If so, what are the names of the companies?

3. Why are these companies the only ones from whom the contractor may purchase materials?

4. Is this creating a restraint of trade and a breach of the combines act?

Mr. CARDIFF: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have this question withdrawn for redrafting.

Question dropped.

MERCHANT MARINE—ASSISTANCE IN INSTALLING MACHINERY FOR BOAT REPAIRS

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. Has the government in anywise assisted the Sydney Foundry and Machine Company in placing new machinery in their plant?

2. If so, who pays for this machinery?

3. Is the firm of Musgrave and Company Limited, North Sydney, being given any work in the repair of government boats or boats of the merchant marine?

4. Has the firm of Musgrave and Company Limited been given any assistance in the purchase of new machinery for their plant?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

3. Musgrave and Company Limited, North Sydney were given several repair jobs on cargo boats during 1941 and it is probable that the services of this contractor will be similarly used during 1942.

4. No.

CAPE BRETON COAL MINING INDUSTRY—MULGRAVE YARDAGE FACILITIES

Mr. McGARRY:

Has the Minister of Munitions and Supply given any consideration to the advisability of extending the yardage area at the port of Mulgrave, to remedy the transportation problem in the conveyance of coal from the Cape Breton mines?

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member's question was referred to the management of Canadian National Railways, who have replied as follows:—

Traffic capacity of railway route via strait of Canso is not determined by yardage capacity at Mulgrave which is ample for current purposes. It is not proposed therefore to enlarge yard facilities at port of Mulgrave.

WAGE RATES UNDER WAR CONTRACTS

Mr. LECLERC:

What is the rate of wages in the following plants on government war contracts, (a) Canada Car Company, Montreal and Hamilton, (b) Small Arms Limited, Toronto, (c) maritime yards at Sorel, Lauzon and Vancouver, (d) munitions industries at Valleyfield (Bouchard & Cherrier)?

Mr. MITCHELL: Whilst the government has knowledge of the schedules of wages being paid to workers in plants where war orders are being executed, complete wage lists from all industrial centres mentioned are not available in the department. The schedules above referred to are often established by agreement between employers and employees. Where no such agreements exist, the following labour condition with respect to wages is attached to each government contract:

All workmen, labourers or other persons who perform labour in or upon the work to be performed by the contractor shall be paid such wages as are generally accepted as current from time to time during the continuance of the contract for competent workmen in the district in which the work is being performed for the character or class of work in which they are respectively engaged, and if there be no current rate in such district, then a fair and reasonable rate.

To furnish the wage rates prevailing in all the plants mentioned would entail an enormous amount of work, as the number of labour classifications in each plant varies from 50 to 200. This would require extra staff for a considerable length of time, or the diversion of present staff from current war duties, and it is therefore considered not in the public interest to reply in detail to this question.

ICE CREAM RATIONING

Mr. LECLERC:

Has the government rationed the quantities of ice cream which may be manufactured quarterly during 1942?

Mr. GARDINER: No, but the dairy products board has by order restricted the volume of sales of ice cream to civilian accounts during any one quarter in 1942 to those of the corresponding quarter in 1941. Volume of sales of ice cream to military establishments, certain charitable organizations operated or managed within the limits of military establishments, Red Cross and military or civilian hospitals are exempt from the provisions of the order.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—ENGINEERS AND ARCHITECTS ENGAGED IN HAMILTON

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What firms of engineers and architects have been engaged by Wartime Housing Limited for the building of houses in Hamilton, Ontario?

2. On what basis have they been paid?

3. How much have they been paid for each housing unit?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Hutton & Souter, Hamilton, Ont. Prack & Prack, Hamilton, Ont.

2. The basis is 1 per cent of the cost of the houses.

3. Between $17.21 and $27.59 depending upon the size and type of house constructed.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WARTIME HOUSING—PREFABRICATED HOUSES IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the government authorized Wartime Housing Limited to build prefabricated houses in or near New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, and in or near Pictou?

[Mr. Mitchell.]

2. If so, when was such authorization issued and for how many houses and how many staff houses or other buildings?

3. Were tenders called or prices asked for?

4. If so, what firms or persons submitted prices, stating the amount in each instance?

5. Have tenders been let or contracts entered into? If so, state names and amounts with unit costs and total costs?

6. What offers of land were originally submitted, stating the quantity and prices asked?

7. What land has been acquired, stating quantity, owners and prices?

8. Were tenders called in 1942 for construction of streets, water and sewer works?

9. If so, who submitted tenders or prices stating the amount in each instance, and what is the total estimated cost?

10. Who has been awarded the contract for building such streets, water and sewer works, stating the unit and total estimated costs?

11. Who has been engaged to search titles and survey and lay off the site and what payments have been made or arranged for?

12. When must such buildings be removed and total estimated costs?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

MILITARY SERVICE—FARM LEAVE—BENOIT TELLIER

Mr. FERLAND:

1. Did Benoit Tellier, enlisted No. D-606356, in March, 1942, request farm leave from his C.O. at Three Rivers, Quebec, his request being signed and sworn to by himself and his father, Eugene Tellier, farmer of St. Elizabeth?

2. Has this application for leave been forwarded to military headquarters in Montreal in accordance with the requirements of military law?

3. What is the final decision upon this application?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

MILITARY UNIFORMS AND WOOLLEN BLANKETS

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. Has Canada imported any cloth for men's overcoats and greatcoats from the British isles since 1939?

2. If so, (a) how many yards, in each of the years 1939, 1940 and 1941; (b) what total sum in Canadian currency do these importations represent?

3. Has the government, since 1939, given military uniforms to England or any other of the united nations?

4. If so, (a) how many to each; (b) how many to each in the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?

5. Has the Canadian government given wool blankets to England and to any of the united nations?

6. If so, how many and to what value?

7. Has Canada exported military uniforms or cloth for military uniforms to England or to any of the united nations since 1939? If so, to what country or countries?

8. Has Canada exported wool blankets to England or any of the united nations? If so, what quantity to each country and for what amount?

CANADIAN ARMY—DOCTOR LEBBITTER

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Was Dr. Lebbitter commissioned to the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel?
2. What are his qualifications?
3. What was his former rank in the army and former experience?
4. What are his duties?
5. On whose authority was he commissioned?
6. On whose request?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

BRITISH COLUMBIA SECURITY COMMISSION

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a return showing the names of all the persons on the staff of the British Columbia security commission and their respective duties and the salary paid to each one of such persons.

COAL

CAPE BRETON MINING FIELDS—TRANSPORTATION BY WATER TO CENTRAL CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond): I desire to direct to the acting Minister of Transport a question of urgent national importance. Can the minister give information with regard to any considered plan by the Canadian National Railways to transport coal by water carriers and rail to the central Canadian markets and thus adequately to supply these markets and stabilize production in the Cape Breton mining fields?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This is a question which should be placed on the order paper.

RECRUITING

REMARKS LIABLE TO PREJUDICE VOLUNTARY ENLISTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). Has he any knowledge of the following excerpt from an address given in a public meeting:

Enlistment figures in Quebec do not represent the true situation because the clergy has been so opposed to enlistment that it has been necessary to bring in soldiers from elsewhere.

Since remarks of this nature are liable to prejudice recruiting and cause disaffection with respect to his majesty, has the Minister of Justice—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order. This is a question which should be placed upon the order paper.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Friday, June 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the question before the house is the second reading of a bill to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act by the deletion of section 3. As is well known by hon. members, section 3 provides the one exception to the powers which were given to the government of Canada under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

I should like to ask in the first instance, in presenting argument in favour of the amendment, why section 3 was placed in the act in 1940, when that measure was brought before this house, and I would answer that question by reading a statement which was made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on that occasion, as reported in Hansard of June 18, 1940:

The bill is intended to remove any doubt as to the power of the government and the will of parliament that the whole of the material resources of the country should be available whenever they are required to meet the needs of the war. The operation of the measure will be confined to the period of the war.

Recruitment for service overseas will be maintained on a voluntary basis. No difficulty has been experienced and no difficulty is anticipated in raising by the voluntary system all the men required for service outside Canada.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, in order that some remarks which I am going to make during the time that is allowed me may be fully understood, I should also place on Hansard a statement which was then made by the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe. He was speaking to an amendment which had been moved to the motion then before the house, and he said, as reported at page 877:

I feel perfectly at ease to explain my attitude on this question. Somebody speaks of the pledges given. I invite all my friends to read the observations I made in this house when war was declared; I invite them to read my speech of the preceding session on the subject of Canada's neutrality.

I am sure that every hon. member who was then here will recall that that was one of the finest speeches ever delivered in the Canadian House of Commons.

I then said to my fellow-countrymen that the province, one of whose representatives I have the honour to be, was opposed to compulsory military service overseas, and that we would fight it, and that I would fight it; that if it were proposed by my government I would resign from that government. That is what I said, and that is what I repeat to-day. But for the defence of my country, for the defence of Canada, no! The defence of the fatherland is the duty of every citizen and it is an obligation for everyone to defend Canada. This bill provides that its powers may not be exercised in so far as the question of compulsion is concerned in connection with service overseas.

I repeat, I read these two quotations to the house to-day in order to place clearly before hon. members and the country the position which was taken by the government two years ago when the National Resources Mobilization Act was submitted to this house.

On Wednesday of last week we had the privilege of listening to a speech from the leader of the government outlining the present position of the government in relation to this matter, a position in which we find ourselves as a result of having made certain declarations to the people of Canada over a period of time, and as a result of having asked the people to release us from the obligations that we had taken upon ourselves by these declarations. It was stated to this house that we had asked the people of Canada to free the government from any restrictions on its actions, and on this occasion I submit we are asking the house to free the government from any restrictions upon its actions in matters having to do with the prosecution of the war. It has been stated in this house, it was stated on Wednesday last, that a "yes" vote on the plebiscite was not a "yes" vote for conscription, and it has been stated in the house and will be repeated during this debate that a "yes" vote on this amendment is not a vote for conscription. This bill is to free the government, to enable it to give consideration to the question whether conscription for overseas service or for any other purpose is necessary for the prosecution of the war.

Having reviewed that matter, may I call attention to this question. What will be the effect of the act as a result of this amendment? Again I read from a speech of the Prime Minister delivered in this house on the occasion when the bill was first introduced. Speaking on June 18, 1940, at page 900 of Hansard, the Prime Minister stated:

> I come now to the inquiry as to how we are going to exercise this power. I would say in a word that we shall continue to exercise all the powers we have or may be given, just as we have from the beginning of the war when exceptional powers were first given to us. We are not going to exercise all these powers—put into effect the provisions in their entirety—within the next 24 hours. We need enabling legislation—for that is what it is—to enable the government to meet each situation as it arises in the most effective way it can possibly be met. The need to-morrow may be for one thing in one place; the need the day after may be for something else in another place. We do not know how the situation will develop in the next little while, but we want to be in a position to take the most effective action in the shortest possible time.

I submit that when the amendment is made to the act we shall be in exactly the same position with regard to everything for which the act provides. The Prime Minister has merely stated that he desires to be free to do certain things now, and also free not to do certain things now. He has stated very clearly to the house that he desires to be free to send men outside what has been defined in the original act as the boundaries of Canada into the areas immediately surrounding our coasts; and I am sure that when the news came over the radio this morning with regard to the activities of the Japanese in the Aleutian islands the necessity for such a change in the legislation was recognized at once. I venture to say that there is not a member of this house who would not consider at this time, as being too great a restriction, the provision which is now in the act that no soldier called up under this legislation can be asked to cross the boundaries of the Dominion of Canada. Under any such provision, if the Japanese were able to force their way to the Alaska boundary we would have to stop at the Alaska boundary if our men raised under the act were able to drive them back to that point, and we would not be able to cross the boundary. It will be recognized therefore that some change has to be made in that particular at the present time.

As the Prime Minister stated in this house it does not necessarily mean that we shall be sending troops overseas immediately. I believe he even went so far as to suggest that it may never become necessary to do so. We shall have powers under the legislation as it will be enlarged to do certain things that must be done immediately, and, on the other hand, to give consideration as time passes to the question whether other things should be done. In this regard it was emphasized to the house the other day that it would be inadvisable for this house to have to take action on two different occasions in order to get authority to do these two things, one of which ought to be done immediately, and the other of which may never be required to be done.

Having stated that position with regard to the legislation itself and the attitude of the government towards it, and with regard to the statement made the other day to the house, may I be permitted for a few moments to discuss a question which was raised by the member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) in his speech a few days ago. On that occasion he had something to say as to the meaning of the vote in Saskatchewan, and it has been suggested that I had something to do with the campaign which was put on in that province. I was in Saskatchewan most of the period during which the plebiscite was being discussed, and during that time I delivered eight speeches in the province. On one occasion I had on the platform with me the member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), who has already spoken in this debate, and the runner-up for the leadership of the Conservative party in the convention of 1938, Mr. M. A. MacPherson. I would suggest that all three of us made practically the same appeal to the people of Moose Jaw. I have before me the appeal which I made in the presence of those two gentlemen at a dinner in the evening, and also the appeal which I made over the radio later, and which was made on each occasion that I spoke to the people of the province. Before reading it, however, I would remind hon. members of what I said in this house on February 10 last, as reported at page 480 of Hansard. I said:

> I shall never say that under no circumstance will I support conscription, but I will say that until such time as I am convinced that we can get in Canada a more effective force under conscription than under voluntary enlistment for overseas service, I am against conscription. So far as I am concerned, a vote of "yes" on the plebiscite will leave me free to make my decision, as a member of this government, with all the facts before me, when the time comes to make that decision. I am not called upon at this moment, neither is anyone else in the house, nor anybody else in Canada, to make a decision on conscription at a time when the best authority in Canada states that at the moment it is not necessary.

Speaking on the plebiscite in the province of Saskatchewan on each occasion I made this appeal:

> Those who value democracy will, I am sure, agree that nothing should be preserved which can be made an instrument to divide our people. The pledge given by every political party excepting Social Credit, in the last election not to resort to conscription for overseas service is tending to raise issues which tend to divide our people. We are therefore asking the people to release us one and all from any pledge given. We are not asking you to vote for conscription, nor are we asking you to vote against it; we are merely asking you to say—Do not let any past commitment to me interfere with your judgment in deciding what ought to be done under the circumstances which threaten our country. Up to date the government would not have brought in conscription even had it never been mentioned in the last election. But let no one say after April 27 next that the government was bound by our votes and therefore could not have brought in conscription for overseas service even had it desired to do so. Vote "yes".

I think that makes perfectly plain the issue which was before the people of Saskatchewan, and I do not think it leaves any ground for anyone who took part in the campaign to say to the people of Canada that a "yes" vote on the plebiscite meant "yes" for conscription or meant "no" for conscription. In my opinion it meant neither one.

Mr. ROWE: It meant nothing.

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend says it meant nothing. If we wish to have a decision whether the vote meant conscription or did not mean conscription immediately, I would refer to what has already happened in this house. To start at the lower end of the house, I should mention the speech delivered by the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore). I need only remind the house that it was stated that that group would not vote for conscription immediately, if that issue were placed before the house at the present time, unless upon terms which I am sure my hon. friends who sit immediately opposite could not support.

On the other hand the leader of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) has stated to this house that unless the foundations for state socialism were to be established in Canada he and his supporters would not be prepared at this time to vote for conscription either immediately, as I understand it, or in the distant future.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said nothing about state socialism.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, we will come to that. I have read very carefully the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), and I have grave doubts as to whether he would vote for conscription immediately if it were presented to this house. I shall deal with that later as well.

But when I come to this side of the house I have no doubts. The Prime Minister has already quoted to the house the contention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the contention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and there is already on the records of this house the contention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), and the contention of myself as Minister of Agriculture; and the other day there was placed on the records of this house in unquestionable terms the contention of the leader of the government that conscription for service overseas is not necessary at the present time in order to provide total effort. This assures me that the great majority of hon. members on this side of the house, if not all of them, would cast a "no" vote on conscription if the issue were presented to this house for the calling up of men for service overseas immediately.

Having said that, does anyone doubt whether the members of this house who cast their vote on April 27, practically all of them as a "yes" vote, were voting for conscription immediately? I venture to say no one has any doubt about it, that it was not a vote for conscription immediately, although circumstances might develop which would make it necessary for the government to bring in conscription either within a short time or at some distant day.

I repeat that the vote in Saskatchewan and the vote throughout Canada was not a vote for the bringing in of conscription in this country immediately. I can assure hon. members that if the vote had been taken on that basis there would have been a different story, just as there would have been a different story in this house.

Having made that as clear as possible in the time at my disposal, may I refer to the attitude of those who have spoken in this debate up to the present. I will start at the lower end of the house and come up the opposite side and finally arrive at my old friend, the ex-minister, who sits on this side of the house. Following that course I will therefore discuss first the remarks of the leader of the Social Credit group. Towards the end of his speech there were some outstanding remarks which I think make his attitude very clear. He said on June 11, as reported on page 3274 of Hansard:

> Can Canada not produce enough meat, fruits, lumber, fuel; can Canada not train sufficient doctors and teachers to provide her fighters and her people with a decent standard of living? The answer must be unquestionably that she can. Reasons would dictate that she do so and then distribute the goods.

Well, it is not quite so simple as that. It is true that we can produce most of the necessary foods in Canada, but it is not true that we can produce all the requirements to make possible the standard of living that the people of Canada would desire to be theirs. And it is not just such a simple matter as calling on our people to produce everything they can in abundance and then distribute it. We must exchange surpluses of the things which we can produce in Canada for surplus goods of other countries—rubber for example. How can we get rubber today by the simple process outlined by the leader of the Social Credit group? Long before we can again enjoy all the privileges we had a few years ago we must accomplish the defeat of an enemy who today has control of a large part of that commodity. I could go on and deal with other aspects of the matter, but I shall not do so.

The leader of the Social Credit group proceeded to quote the views of Mr. Berle in the United States, one of which was the following:

> We shall have in our hands the tools by which we can create a greater amount of economic justice, without sacrificing any of the essential freedoms.

The leader of the Social Credit group stopped in the middle of the quotation to say:

> May I pause to comment that if the government institutes a policy of owning the industries of this country, many freedoms of Canadians will be destroyed. But it is not necessary to organize on that basis.

In other words, the leader of the Social Credit group says that what we require to make us all happy in this country is production to the limit of the things we can produce in Canada and then the possession of purchasing power with which to handle them. Then he says: "But we are absolutely opposed to the government ownership and control of many of the things that other political groups are suggesting should be owned and controlled by the government." And he adds further: "I do not want anyone to understand that I am advocating in this house that the government should take control of bank balances."

Well, this makes very clear the position which the leader of the Social Credit group takes with regard to the proposal which would make it possible for the government to control all the natural resources of this country, all the industries of this country, all the financial institutions, and the activities of every individual in Canada.

But when we come to the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) we get an entirely different story. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group says this: "We are in favour of government ownership of industry. We are in favour of government ownership and control of the financial institutions of this country. We are in favour of doing something about bank balances. We are in favour of doing many other things." In short, in spite of the fact, as he mentioned a few moments ago, that the leader of the group said nothing about state socialism, everything he said the other day had some relationship to state socialism.

Mr. COLDWELL: Better define state socialism.

Mr. GARDINER: I can best define it in the words of my hon. friend himself. When he was leader of the same group in the province of Saskatchewan he issued a platform, and the first statement in that platform was:

Socialization of the banking, credit and financial system of the country, together with the social ownership, development, operation and control of utilities and natural resources.

In the same document this question was asked:

Does this political party consider that this objective so stated gives us a mandate to bring into operation socialism if elected?

The answer is in one word "Yes".

Mr. COLDWELL: Not state socialism.

Mr. GARDINER: Could anything be clearer than that? The only thing there is to state socialism is ownership of all the resources and the financial and industrial institutions in the country. In other words my hon. friend is an advocate of state socialism.

Mr. COLDWELL: I deny that.

Mr. GARDINER: Here we have two groups sitting in the opposite corner of the chamber, one of which says it is not at all in favour of state ownership of our industries, while the other says it is. That is perfectly proper in a democratic country. It is perfectly proper that such a difference should exist in a country like Canada. Free discussion is what we want; but I think the people of Canada should understand what is meant when our friends say they are in favour of the nationalization of this, the socialization of that, the ownership of this and the control of that. There is no doubt in western Canada as to what it means. It means state socialism; and, as someone has said, it has been voted upon on that basis on several occasions. If I had time I could read into Hansard some of the things that have been said in that regard. For example, speaking in this house on June 11, 1942, as reported at page 3266 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

But the shouts of reactionary super-patriotism for human conscription are immediately answered. We cannot and will not agree to giving of further powers for human conscription without concrete measures for the conscription of material resources.

This war, with everything which is at stake in it, with the heroism of whole peoples to inspire us, should have been the occasion for building a deeper unity in our own nation than we have ever known.

With that sentiment I am in agreement. Then the hon. member continues:

That the contrary should face us now is a condemnation of the leadership and policies which have guided us since the outbreak of hostilities. I believe the policies which I have outlined could win back that unity, could build this nation into a powerful instrument for victory in the war and for a people's peace afterwards. That is why we urge them at this time.

If one takes the six points that were placed on Hansard the other day, during the course of that address, and examines them carefully, he will find that they contain the fundamental principles of state socialism as understood where attempts have been made to establish it in different countries throughout the world; and I submit that it is not an issue upon which this country could be united, either in peace time or in war time.

If this were all that had been said by the hon. gentleman, it would not be so difficult to understand his position. In the same speech, however, he goes on, at page 3259:

And, what is more, I am profoundly convinced that such a policy would greatly reduce the opposition to conscription for overseas service.

Is there any man in this house who is opposed to the conscription of men for overseas service, who has associated that matter with the adoption of state socialism in Canada? I venture to say there is not. Then the hon. member continued:

In our view, the problem of conscription for overseas service should not be dealt with on the basis of past prejudices and divisions. It is purely a question of strategy and should be considered exclusively on the basis of how we can make our best and most effective contribution to the defeat of the Hitler axis.

Every experience in this war—our successes as well as our reverses—has underlined the correctness and, if I may say so, the far-sightedness of the position which we took in this regard at the beginning of the war. It has always been clear that Canada's vital contribution in this war must be the supplying of implements of war and of foodstuffs. . . .

In order to save time I will not read more of those remarks, but I should like to turn to what the hon. gentleman did say at the beginning of the war, to which he referred in making this statement. Here it is in black and white, taken from page 55 of Hansard for September 9, 1939:

Canada should be prepared to defend her own shores, but her assistance overseas should be limited to economic aid and must not include conscription of man-power or the sending of any expeditionary force.

Well, that is plain enough.

Mr. MacNICOL: Who said that?

Mr. GARDINER: The present leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, who was then acting leader. Then he went on to enunciate the four planks in the platform for which they stood. I am not going to read the first plank, though I would refer hon. members to it; but these were the second and third planks:

2. Defence of Canada: Reasonable provision should be made for the defence of Canadian shores. Volunteers for home defence should not be required to sign also for overseas service. This practice, now being followed, is unwarranted and should be abandoned.

3. No military participation overseas: Any attempt to send a force abroad would rob us of the man-power necessary for the defence of our shores and for home production, would greatly endanger national unity, would threaten our civil liberties and democratic institutions, and would ultimately lead to conscription.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely South York did not vote for that.

Mr. GARDINER: I am inclined to think they did not, but there is no doubt about the fact that they did vote against conscription for overseas service at the present time.

Mr. COLDWELL: Why not put on record at the same time statements made by the government?

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend took considerable time the other day to put the government's statements on record, and now in the few moments available to me I am dealing with the statements of my hon. friend. He calls upon the members of this house and the people of this country to read what he said in 1939, and from that to judge what he proposes to do now. So I would ask the members of this house and the people of Canada to pay attention to what was said by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group.

Now I come to the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson). Right at the beginning of his remarks he promised that he was not going to discuss the merits or demerits of conscription, further than to say that he favoured the principle. Then he went on to say that the Prime Minister had made pledges but that he himself had made no such pledges. Well, I recall that at the time the pledges were being made he was not the leader of his party; and but for the fact that the leader of the party at that time has gone on record in recent weeks in regard to this matter we probably would not be in a position to refute what has been said. But the leader of that day, Hon. Doctor Manion, has placed on record what happened at that time, and this is what he says:

> Re national government: I personally consulted men considered leaders of the party in all the provinces (including Mr. Hanson, who was not a member of parliament at the time), and not one of them had other than support for the idea. Not one of them ever put himself on record as opposed to national government.

Then, item No. 4:

> Re conscription for overseas service: This subject was discussed also at a full meeting of our house members and only one member supported conscription—the Hon. Earl Lawson of South York. He did not run in the ensuing election, but gave me untiring and very loyal support, a fact that appears to be very worthy of mention. Alan Cockeram, an old friend of mine, who ran in North York, fully endorsed my position in every way, so far as I know, and he was elected as one of my followers.
> Later Alan Cockeram resigned to give his seat to Mr. Meighen, and in the by-election Mr. Meighen, as leader ran for all-out conscription. Incidentially, in one of his speeches, he said that I had no right to promise that there would be no conscription and, without pausing for breath, or taking time to reflect upon some of his own various promises in Hamilton and elsewhere, he went on to promise that there would be conscription. He was defeated by about 5,000 votes.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the record placed on file by the gentleman who was the leader of the Conservative party at the time he was before the people of Canada in 1940. I submit that when the present house leader of the Conservative party did accept the candidacy in his constituency to run under the leadership of Doctor Manion, he committed himself to the same undertakings as did the leader of that great party.

So much for his statement. Having made that statement, the leader of the opposition went on to discuss selective national service, and he discussed that subject for three-quarters of the time. I would ask this question: Does or does not selective national service include the immediate conscription of men for overseas? That question was never answered in his speech. But he did go on to say what he meant by selective national service. These were the words of the leader of the opposition:

> And what does selective national service imply? It implies, it means, simply and solely, the practical application of total war in a sensibly, just and effective manner. It means in a word that every man among us shall be called upon to perform the right war job at the right time, in the right place, in the right way.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, who is going to tell us what that job is? Who is going to tell us what the right time is? Who is going to tell us what the right place is? I have no doubt he would answer: The government of the day. Well, we have had governments of that kind in the world, both in peace time and in war time—governments that have undertaken to tell the people and direct the people in everything that they undertook to do. One sponsor of that system was Bismarck, in Germany, and the outcome of that Bismarckian policy has been the modern nazi of to-day, who is operating in different parts of the world against democratic institutions.

My hon. friend said, too, that the only kind of government which could put that kind of policy into effect would be a national government. I am inclined to agree with him; on that one point he might have been correct.

I doubt whether any political party with traditions in Canada, which understands the place of the Dominion of Canada in the British empire, and which desires British institutions to continue in force in this country in the future, would place such a policy as that before the people of Canada, with the intention of putting it immediately into effect. I say that, knowing something of the history of this country, knowing something of the traditions of political parties, knowing something of what they stand for, knowing something of their relationship to the representative, responsible, democratic institution of government under which we live. No; the only kind of government which could bring that kind of policy into effect in Canada at present, the only kind of government which would undertake to do so, would be the government with no political past and no desire to have a political future. There are many other things that such a government would have to decide. It is because of those other things that I would oppose it.

There is only one condition under which responsible party government in Canada would bring in conscription for overseas service, and that would be a condition under which, if they did not do so, the democratic institution of government would be threatened with destruction. Under such conditions probably there is not a man in the house who would not support a government which took action in that direction.

If I had time I would go into another matter which is of great importance at this time, but I shall discuss it in committee. It has to do with the distribution of man power as it affects the number of people in Canada at the present time. But I do wish just for a moment to discuss a speech which has been quoted in this house on a number of occasions.

Mr. STIRLING: On a point of order, if the hon. member has finished dealing with my leader, may I say with regret that I must disagree to his continuing for more than forty minutes, after Your Honour's ruling of the other day.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The minister began at 3.20.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have noted the time as 3.20.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, that is the time I noted on the clock.

Mr. STIRLING: Then I regret to say that the clocks do not agree, because the hon. member began at 3.14 by the clock opposite me.

An hon. MEMBER: Get yours fixed.

Mr. GARDINER: I regret to have to disagree with my hon. friend, because usually we do not have occasion to do so.

Mr. ROWE: The clock on your side is as bad as your war policy.

Mr. GARDINER: I should be allowed the time this interruption has taken.

Mr. STIRLING: The hon. member has already gone three minutes over his time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The time I took was 3.20, and the hon. member will have concluded at 4 o'clock.

Mr. GARDINER: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that I should be allowed an extra minute. If that cannot be allowed, then I submit that hon. members should be prevented from using any of the time of the member who has the floor.

On May 17, 1941, I am reported, and properly so, to have said that it would be possible in Canada to raise and maintain a fighting force over a three-year period requiring three-quarters of a million men. I submit to the house that the plans now presented to it by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) provide for such an army. There are something over 600,000 up to the end of the present fiscal year, and 750,000 would provide us with the necessary troops to carry on during a three-year period of time, if the troops at the front were in action. Under these circumstances we have the possibility of carrying out in Canada the present policy in relation to the army, without conscription.

To conclude, I should like to deal for a moment or two with the statements made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), the ex-minister of public works. I believe I am expressing the view of every hon. member when I say that we regret he found it necessary to resign at this time. I belong to the west.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: There would have to be unanimous consent to exceeding the forty-minute limit.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) upon the consistency of his attitude toward military service overseas. That was his attitude in 1917; that is his attitude to-day. Up to the present time the only two ministers who have spoken in this debate on behalf of the government have been the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), both of whom have consistently opposed military service overseas, and from whom, having regard to the speech to which we have listened to-day, we cannot ever expect in my opinion to have military service overseas regardless of what the people may demand. As to the attitude taken by the Minister of Agriculture, he goes much farther than even the Prime Minister did. He says: All that we ask in the removal of section 3 is the opportunity to be free to carry on our obligations as a government, to give consideration to matters as and when they arise and to make a "yes" or "no" decision on the question of conscription for overseas service in the future.

The Minister of Agriculture went on to point out one circumstance, Mr. Speaker, which to me epitomizes his attitude towards this question. He said that regardless of conditions, however dangerous our situation as a country and an empire may be, any party government to-day which would bring in compulsory military service for overseas would have no regard for the political future of that party. Surely that is a dangerous attitude to be taken by a member of a government charged with the aspirations of the people of Canada and their right to survival. However dangerous the situation may be, mark you! He pictured that danger when he spoke of the situation in the Aleutian islands; yet in the face of all that he said: I stand where I have always stood; my consideration,—and no doubt he was speaking for the members of the government around him—is political survival at some time in the future, even though the world may stand in danger of being one great concentration camp. The minister and members of the government who sit around him have made a great contribution in the sending of their sons to fight overseas, and I honour them for that. But great as that contribution is, the Minister of Agriculture nevertheless stands up in this house to-day and says: The ballot box—right or wrong, "yes" or "no"—the ballot box.

I hope and trust that some of the other ministers who have not yet spoken—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald)—if they speak in this debate, and I think they are challenged to do so, will disavow the attitude expressed by the Minister of Agriculture as not representing the present attitude of the government.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

In 1939 and 1940 things were looked at differently from what they are to-day. The Prime Minister himself, speaking in western Canada in the 1940 election campaign, said, according to the report in the press at the time, that there was general agreement that it was extremely unlikely that expeditionary forces from Canada would again take part in a European war. That was his attitude then. The Minister of Agriculture made a speech about the same time which secured a great many votes for his party, and in that speech he divided the people into three groups. Speaking in the town of Markinch, he said, according to the press report:

> The entry of Canada into the war had resulted, Mr. Gardiner said, in three groups with varying opinions as to the best method of prosecuting the war. First there was a group that did not wish to do anything, then another that wished to do everything, and a third, a sort of in-between group. He, said Mr. Gardiner, hoped he belonged in the in-between group.
> In the first category was the C.C.F. party, from whose platform he read a number of clauses, but referred particularly to the call for the conscription of wealth for war. In the second group was the party headed by Hon. R. J. Manion, that opposed the conscription of men to be sent out of Canada; they did not mind conscripting men for the defence of Canada. The Liberals, through their leader, Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, had already taken their stand—no conscription of men, and no direct conscription of wealth, but men and money for the prosecution of the war.

That was his attitude in 1940. After all the changes that have since taken place, can it be true that the attitude of isolationism which characterized some members of the government prior to the outbreak of the war is still the attitude of the government? Let us look at the record over the years. Let us examine first the record of the government with respect to man-power. It is the record of a government which has been forced to take a stand on the man-power question day by day and week by week. The leadership which has been given to this country has been a leadership based on political expediency. Deny it as you will but the record stands—a temporizing and a postponing of consideration so far as the man-power problem is concerned. I frankly admit that the material contribution of Canada has been very great. Our contribution to the navy and to the air force and to the production of munitions has been something of which Canada may well be proud. But so far as man-power for overseas service is concerned there has never been any dynamic force or vision shown by this government. Its attitude has simply been to move step by step as and when it was forced to do so. It has been a record of treating the man-power problem in a piecemeal, uncertain and, I might say, unstatesmanlike manner. A fine war effort has been done in many respects, but in the matter of man-power this government has steadily fought a delaying action against the adoption of any system of national selective service. The consequence has been a lowering of morale all over this dominion. When the Prime Minister came before parliament and pointed out that he and his government had been hobbled by the promises that had been made, we supported him in the country by pleading with the people to vote "yes" on the plebiscite. We went on the platform and spoke over the radio, and all of us asked that the Prime Minister and his government be relieved of those promises. Now what are we to get? The Minister of Agriculture, if I understood him correctly, says that so far as he is concerned nothing is going to be done about this matter, either now or in the near future.

In 1940, two years ago now, when the prospects were dark and fearful, there was introduced for the first time a national resources mobilization bill. Parliament enacted that measure in two days. Speedy action was necessary because it was the determination of the government that there should be no delay. What was the result? First there came the national registration for the purpose of ascertaining and mobilizing the man-power of the nation, and ascertaining the skills and abilities of the people in every part of this dominion. A dead letter it has been, except for the calling up of men for service under the thirty-day plan. The next step was the thirty-day plan, and well I remember the arguments that were advanced against it from this side of the house. It has proven to have been extravagant, costly, wasteful, and fruitless. Many of the young men who were called up under that plan are still at their homes, having returned there when their thirty-days' training was over, and so far as Canada is concerned their training is ended.

Then came the four-months plan, finally extended for the period of the war. So far as that plan is concerned it has been unfair, unjust and inexcusable. Quotas have been fixed, not on the fair basis of population or available man-power, but on bases that have no justification. Much is made of national unity, but you cannot build national unity on any foundation other than that of equality of service province by province and equality of service within each province. In the west, as in other parts of Canada, large groups of individuals have been freed as a result of their conscientious objection from giving any equal service to this country in time of war, or at least from a type of service similar to that given by those called into the army. All they have been required to do is to go to parks as guests of his majesty for a period of three or four months, where they are paid at the rate of 50 cents a day, and are then allowed to return home. There is no equality of service in that.

The next stage was that enunciated by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), when, speaking I believe last December, he announced the new policy of selective service for Canada. Have we got that policy yet? Well, it took almost four months before the regulations were first handed down or placed before this parliament on the twenty-fourth of March last, and only a few days ago the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) had to admit that it is impossible to say at the present time when men will be called under that selective service scheme, because the system which is to operate in this respect has not yet been determined. All along a delaying action, to satisfy and appease; then a step; then a temporary appeasement; then another step, until now when the government asked to be relieved from its promises, it got that relief from the people of Canada, and now it comes before parliament and says, "All we intend to do is to repeal section 3. So far as the rest of our intentions are concerned, they shall remain hidden within the council of the government."

I now come to the matter of selective service. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) says that we have conscription to-day in Canada, that the principle had been established, and that his policy is total war. I venture to say that I have read his speech more carefully and thoroughly than has any of his constituents. I have gone over every line of it to ascertain what, in that arsenal of words, is the present intention of the government. What will the government do? What action will it take? I notice that when he quotes utterances of his ministers to support him in the stand he has taken against immediate action he refers to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), both of whom are believed throughout the country to be men who are pressing for conscription for ovreseas service. As I said, I read his speech carefully and I can find no indication displayed therein as to what the government intends to do. In some places it says yes, in other places it says no.

What is the purpose of the repeal of this section unless there is to be action? Is the submission of this repeal proposal to parliament but another step in the temporizing attitude that has been displayed? Is it real, or is it placed before parliament for its psychological effect? If it is real it will give hope to the millions of Canadians who voted in favour of relieving the government, and hope to our men overseas, who when they enter the battle must realize the necessity of having reinforcements at home, or has it another purpose, namely, to delude Canadians into believing that something will be done, to temporize once more, to beguile the united nations into believing that Canada has an all-out war effort? For you will remember that the Prime Minister throughout his speech maintained that one of the most serious situations in which Canada found herself to-day was the fact that throughout the world her attitude was misinterpreted. His words were these:

> If there is any wisdom in removing false impressions surely the sooner they are removed the better.

The false impression is removed when the section is deleted, but so far as action is concerned there is no hope whatsoever. I ask the Prime Minister: in the removal of this section is it the real thing that we now see? Is it selective service for overseas, as was pointed out so brilliantly and eloquently by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin)? Is it the real thing, or is it just an imitation based upon political expediency which the Minister of Agriculture implied should at all times be considered?

To sum up, I say that the record of this government as regards man-power has been a record of promises, postponements, plebiscite, and now procrastination.

Mr. McNIVEN: And 600,000 men on active service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: A brilliant record of enlistments; no doubt about that. But that is not the record of the government; that is the record of the people of Canada, who are willing and anxious to serve. Only those who serve can boast of that service.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And there are not 600,000 on active service.

Mr. McNIVEN: There surely are.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) will be able to make his speech in due course.

Mr. HOMOUTH: Figures don't mean much to him, anyway.

Mr. McCANN: They're as good as yours.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The Prime Minister implied that the repeal of this section means that the government is empowered to act. It may act, and again it may not. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, who was a member of that government when this measure was introduced, says that it means a surreptitious form of overseas conscription. I say to the government that the Canadian people are aroused, they are angered, they are discouraged, as a result of government inaction. We complain about parliament; we say that parliament to-day is not appreciated throughout the country. How can you expect parliament to occupy the high plane which the British house occupied in the days of Burke, when members were prepared, regardless of the views of their leaders, to stand up for the opinions they believed in; when there was government by parliament, not government by caucus? If there is one redeeming feature of this debate, it is this, that men who heretofore have seen fit to follow their party regardless of personal opinions are going to stand up during this debate and express the views of their constituents and support the things in which they personally believe. I say to the government that it cannot forever procrastinate; it cannot forever fight this delaying action, if the morale of the people of Canada is to be maintained.

What is the policy of the administration? Where are we going? What stand does the government take? "We don't know where we're going, but we're on our way" may be political expediency, but it cannot be or become a battle slogan for a country at war. The Prime Minister in the plebiscite asked for a release because he said the government was hobbled, and he declared that when the release came action would be taken. Well, if action is to be taken on the basis of what was said to-day by the Minister of Agriculture, then the 600,000 who were spoken of a moment ago, three million who voted "yes," have been hoodwinked. What is more serious, the Prime Minister says to parliament in effect that it will not get a second chance to discuss this matter, having this power in the hands of the government, in the hands of the governor in council, and that so far as parliament is concerned it shall be handcuffed in that it will henceforth be unable to deal with this matter.

It may be said that I am going too far. But what rights have we as private members when we pass this legislation and place this power in the hands of the government of the day? Private members' days are gone. True, we have an opportunity to move the adjournment of the house, but only under the gravest circumstances. So far as parliament is concerned this is our last opportunity to bring this matter of national selective service before the government, because when we pass this measure the government will have the power and parliament will have abdicated its right to determine the matter. Henceforth it will be a question for the decision of the cabinet. If the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture represents the attitude of the government, and it must, then the men and women who are prepared to give their all have received an affront from this parliament which will not be conducive to building up greater morale in the country.

We are going to have an opportunity of seeing the regulations that will be passed by this government if and when it decides to act. This act as it stands makes no provision for incorporating the regulations therein, and I for one intend, when the bill is in committee, to demand that all regulations designed to carry into effect the provisions of the act shall be embodied in the law of the land, so that this parliament will not entrust the lives of our manhood to the caprice of government regulations. We have a right in matters such as this to demand administration by law passed by parliament, and not by law passed by administrative officialdom, and this is the last opportunity we shall have to make that demand, and in committee the demand will be made in the way in which it will be most effective. I do not believe that we as a parliament should give to the government a blank cheque on life itself. What the Prime Minister asks for is the right, the power to act as he pleases without any control on his actions. We want the regulations under the act brought before parliament in order to ensure that there will be uniformity of application and that the rights of individuals thereunder shall be protected. For there is to be no appeal under the regulations; there will be no opportunity to take advantage of the safeguards which have protected Britons for 300 years. All that is done away with under these regulations. I submit that we have the right to have the regulations passed in parliament so that we shall know what powers are going to be taken by the government and how they will be used. We have a right to know how the act will be administered; we have a right to know its mechanics and its provisions. We have a right to see that under these regulations favours will be denied, that favouritism will not be permitted, so that there will be honest administration.

I say to the Prime Minister: arouse this nation. His speech introducing second reading was a masterpiece in language and diction. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that to the people of Canada who at this time need the incentive of words that will arouse them and inspire them with enthusiasm, the speech was one that brought little hope. When I think of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères the other day, I cannot help thinking of twenty-five years of the teaching of isolationism. We were all more or less guilty, but how that boomerang has come back after twenty-five years! I say to my fellow Canadians of the French race, advance your arguments in this debate. Let your viewpoint be known. Canada is a confederation and needs you, and you need us. There can be no confederation based upon the right of the minority to dictate to the majority, any more than there can be confederation wherein the majority will unfairly coerce. This measure is asked for by the people from one end of Canada to the other. If there were any alternative there is not a member on this side of the house who would not place it before the house. We are faced with a fearful position in Canada and in the empire. The days of isolationism and non-participation abroad are over, it may be thought; and yet, are they? In the year 1942 on the Pacific war council Canada has no representative minister of the crown although every other country has. To-day, when we should be united with the rest of the empire, in a great empire war council, Canada remains aloof. One way out of our difficulties has been suggested, namely, to establish for the will of the majority in other parts of Canada, a law applicable only to eight provinces. But can confederation exist on that basis? Can Canada survive unless there is equality under the law? I do not blame the people of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: You have no reason to.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, I do not condemn the people of Quebec; I do not endeavour to judge. But I do say to the Prime Minister that the attitude there to-day is due in large measure to the policy carried on for twenty-five years.

Mr. DUPUIS: By both parties.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: But more successfully by one party. I do not condemn them when they now claim the face value of the policy for which they have paid the premium, election after election, since 1917. I ask the French-Canadian members of this house to-day, when this measure becomes law, if it becomes law, to go back to their constituencies and ask the people of Quebec province—

Mr. DUPUIS: We invite you.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall be glad to come. That is the attitude of tolerance. I ask them to place before their compatriots the situation as it is. Let those who misled them admit that the teachings of twenty-five years have been wrong. I suggest that Canada's motto to-day should be, "Everything mobilized to prevent everything being lost." Place men where they are needed in the army. Why was the army expanded from four divisions to eight? It improved the rank of the higher-up officers, but it made reinforcement more difficult. Now is the time to prepare to train reinforcements, to the end that when casualties come and sacrifices are made, we in Canada shall not be placed in the position of having the government saying "too late." We need men now, and we will now bring in selective service.

So far as labour is concerned, surveys have been made, but little has been done to assure an adequate supply. Labour has cooperated, but its cooperation could be secured in increasing measure by the establishment of a shop steward system similar to that employed in Great Britain, giving to the labouring man who is doing his part an opportunity to suggest means whereby production can be speeded up and the worker given a reward therefor. As for agriculture, utilize the services of the aliens and conscientious objectors in order to assist in supplying the needs of agricultural labour. Give them an opportunity to serve, and at the same time assure agriculture of a proper supply of labour through the mobilization of a land army.

Mr. Speaker, something must be done and done now by this parliament.

Mr. MARTIN: What does the hon. member suggest?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I suggest the immediate promise by this government that there will be action.

Mr. MARTIN: What kind of action?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Action that will ensure proper and complete mobilization of the man-power of this nation.

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I have answered the question. I suggest that the time has now come, and I hope the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who has just interrupted, is not one of those who does not believe in the complete mobilization of the nation at this time.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. MARTIN: Will the hon. member permit a question now?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. MARTIN: I have been following the hon. gentleman very carefully, and I should like to know whether he believes it is desirable at this moment to have conscription for overseas service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I answer that question in this way—

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes or no.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The hon. gentleman is too good a lawyer to think that such an answer would be adequate. I say that the time has come when there is only one mobilization that will assure equality, and fairness, and unity in Canada, so that each province will know that all are properly contributing and that all within each province are contributing, and that is by establishing selective service for overseas immediately. There is no qualification about that. Although I may not have the opportunity to ask him that question, I hope he will answer it when he speaks.

Mr. MARTIN: I will state it unequivocally.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The challenge to us to-day as Canadians, without regard to race or creed, is to unite in a common dedication to our way of life, and our national life itself. If there is one thing that has done more to undermine this dominion and its unity—I do not know whether it is an outgrowth of our history—it is the fact that we as Canadians are too prone to hyphenate our citizenship. In the United States they do not think of Roosevelt as a Dutch-American, or of Willkie as a German-American; they think of those men as great Americans. We in Canada have something to learn from that. We in this country should build up a Canadianism that knows no hyphenate. Let us be proud of the racial strains from which we spring, but at the same time not separate this country on the basis of a hyphenated Canadianism. It has been my hope to see the day when that will come to pass. Coming from western Canada let me say that if there is one thing more hopeful of Canada's future it is the fact that men, the second generation from continental Europe, from enemy countries, are to-day enlisting not as hyphenates but as Canadians. I know of one family of which the father served against this country in the last war and to-day four of his sons serve in the armed forces of this country. The day I hope for is the day when we can be united as Canadians, when party considerations will be forgotten in an all out war effort—it is not yet too late—so that we as members of this parliament, to whom has come the greatest challenge that ever came to a Canadian parliament, will do our duty, not with our eye on the ballot box, but with a sincere desire to serve regardless of whether or not we are returned to parliament at the next election; so that we can look back to this hour and say that out of the trials and tribulations through which Canada passed in the second great war was created a saga of grandeur of a united Canada ready for that new world that Churchill and Roosevelt have pictured. To my French-Canadian friends I say sincerely—

Mr. DUPUIS: Talk about Saskatchewan a little.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not know why my hon. friend objects to that. Does he object to an attitude of tolerance, an attitude of fairness?

Mr. DUPUIS: Leave Quebec alone.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The attitude being shown to-day by the hon. member who interrupts is regrettable.

Mr. DUPUIS: "Physician, cure thyself."

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is it a refusal to cooperate? As a member from another part of Canada I would say to hon. members from the province of Quebec, let us forget these differences and unite.

Mr. DUPUIS: You do your share; we will do ours.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): It is with some hesitation that I rise at this stage of this momentous debate, following some of the giants of the tribune and the platform and the bar. But I am consoled by the fact that for many weeks, almost I might say for two years, like many other hon. members, I have been a listener rather than a talker. That is particularly so since there has been so much small talk, loose talk, political talk, and even evil talk. So I think I am justified in taking part in the debate at this stage.

In asking for the privilege of the floor, Mr. Speaker, I was actuated by the fact that I represent a constituency in which may be found perhaps a truer cross-section of the people of Canada than exists anywhere else in this country. Canadians now living in the great constituency of Athabaska have come from all over the world—from every province in this dominion, from almost every state of the union, from practically every country in Europe; and it includes thousands of French Canadians, from which race I am proud to trace my descent. In speaking this afternoon I only wish I had the proper words with which to clothe my thoughts, with which to express them as clearly as I feel them. I have never read a speech in my life, and I am not going to start to-day, but I would ask to be allowed to read just one paragraph from something I sent to a newspaper in my constituency a few days ago, in reply to an article which was published therein, which article caused a good deal of comment and called forth many letters supporting one side or the other. In my communication I set out the reason why the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), brought this amendment before the house at this time. I said:

> A few months ago the people of Canada were given a privilege shared by only a chosen few in these chaotic times, the privilege of expressing their opinion and views on a matter of grave concern to their country. Unlike those countries labouring under the heavy yoke of ruthless invasion, where the voice of the people has been silenced, and where a dark wilderness of oppression, of despair and famine has descended, Canada has kept intact the birthright of her citizens. The debate which has just started in this house is a direct consequence of that expression of will by the people. To ignore it would be a denial of democracy itself. I propose to keep that fact ever present in my mind in adding my voice to the discussion on the proposed amendment to the mobilization act——which I thought then would be introduced, as it has been. I have not consulted with any party, with any whip, with any minister, or with any leader as to the things I have to say. The thoughts which I wish to express are entirely my own. I will admit, however, that though I was confined to the hospital I did write to every member of the executive in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. This executive numbers some forty-seven and represents every element in that area—English-speaking Canadians, French Canadians, central Europeans, Americans, and so on. It is a true representation of the population of the constituency. Strange as it may appear, though the riding voted almost fifty-fifty on the plebiscite, while the members of the Liberal association and the executive almost all voted "yes", with one or two exceptions the replies I received from the executive empowered me to say what I thought. I was told that I had kept the confidence they had reposed in me at the time of the election, and that they trusted me to represent truly the views of the riding of Athabaska on this matter.

I have said, and I repeat, that I take my hat off to no one, if you will pardon the expression, in pride of ancestry or in loyalty to race and religion. When I speak to you to-day I have vividly in mind two pictures which I only wish I had the words adequately to describe. I see first September 1, 1905, in the old exhibition grounds at Edmonton, on the flats, as we used to call them, just below the old Hudson bay fort, when the province of Alberta was inaugurated. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then prime minister of Canada, addressed a great gathering in that indescribable setting. I cannot do justice to the beauties of that spot, which would compare favourably with scenery anywhere in the universe, with the great Saskatchewan river, the hills in the background and a tremendous crowd which had come from every part of the province. The old chief was impressed by the audience that was before him, and he told us things which I will never forget and which we should remember to-day. He referred to the fact that it had taken a century or more to compose the differences between men of the Anglo-Saxon race and those descended from old France. He went on to say how we had come to know and appreciate one another, as I do. May I digress here to say that as a French Canadian I have spent most of my life with Anglo-Saxons, and they have been my dearest friends. We all need friends at times, do we not? No man can live without at some time requiring the help and counsel of a friend, a man to whom he can say, "I am in trouble. What should I do?" Some of my best friends were of the Anglo-Saxon race. Who said that the Scots were stingy? They may be thrifty, but the greatest generosity I have ever encountered has been on the part of Scotsmen.

In the district of Athabaska, which I now represent, when everything was going Conservative in 1930 we elected a Liberal, a Welshman born in the old country, a returned soldier who had come to that constituency only a few years before, whom the French Canadians of Athabaska had come to love, admire and trust. He was elected with the greatest majority which has ever been given, either before or since, in any French-Canadian poll in Athabaska.

To continue my thoughts: The old chief then addressed himself to the newcomers, those who were then pouring into Canada from the Ukraine, from Lithuania, from Galicia, from Austria, from Poland, from the Scandinavian countries, from every state in the union—he made an appeal to all of them. He said, "In the folds of that flag which flies in the breeze of Alberta you gentlemen from other lands will find freedom and liberty. You can trust that flag; you can trust the government which exists under that flag. You can depend on what we say. You come here to a land of plenty, a land of bounty, a generous and a fertile land, a land where you may devote the energies of your arms as well as those of your hearts and souls." And he added, "I ask only one thing, and that is that you need not forget the lands of your ancestors. Do not forget those lands from which you originated. I am telling you to remember them, cherish them in your hearts. Remember the glories of those lands from which you have come, because there are glories on every hand. Every nation has its heroes and its history. Remember the lands where your ancestors struggled, lived and died, and, in keeping those remembrances in your hearts, keep your eyes to the future. Think of the future of this great country. Strive to learn our language; strive to become real Canadians, and to love the flag."

That was in 1905. Since that time, on two vital occasions, one issue has arisen to divide the people of Canada. But it started long before that. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who preceded me in the debate, has pointed out that some of my fellow members are supposed to have raised the issue of conscription in Quebec. I say to him that the issue is much older than that. I know he will grow up some day and read the history of Canada. When he does he will find that the issue is much older; it goes away beyond the time he mentioned. It goes back beyond confederation, but more particularly to 1910 and 1911, when the same kind of organization was developed to destroy the government, a government which could not be defeated in any way other than by racial and class appeal.

If my hon. friend will read history he will find what was said in Quebec by the canvassers and organizers of the party to which he belongs. When he reads that he will not be surprised that it was most difficult to elect a Conservative in Quebes, when they found out how they had been fooled. The year 1917, to which some of my friends across the floor owe their lives politically, was the time when the same kind of pressure was brought to bear. I say that, even if I am the only one to say it, because in my opinion it must be said. That was the time when the same kind of organization made appeal to those controlling the economic power of Canada.

We now have a Liberal government in office. We know that under the terms of the Atlantic charter something radically new is going to develop in the world, a condition under which every man and every class will have an opportunity. That is the new order for which we are fighting. But the organization of to-day, as it did in 1917, is attempting to bring about exactly the same result. There is no difference at all in the methods used, with the exception that at that time a friendly government was in office. Do hon. members think for one moment that if this insidious committee had not been organized to start an invidious propaganda respecting conscription, at a time when conscription was not necessary, we would be facing the issue we are facing in the house to-day? All this is done at a time when French-Canadians are behaving just as loyally as any other group. I say no; that is the way it began. Master minds that they are, they knew they did not control a majority of people in Canada. They knew also that they could depend on propaganda and on part of the press, and that the moment the agitation was started there would be reaction in the Quebec part of the house. Of course that is exactly what is happening.

A few moments ago I spoke about loyalty, and, in my own way, I tried to describe two pictures, one a beautiful picture and the other a dark one. In that connection I should like to speak of the town of St. Paul in which I used to live—in fact I live only a few miles away from it at the present time. It is a pioneer town, one of the finest in western Canada. It was founded by old Father Lacombe. It was first settled by French Canadians, the English-speaking people, Ukrainians and others following in later years. What a wonderful town it was—and still is. But to-day propaganda has split the town.

If I were considering only my own political salvation, my own political life;—and what does it amount to, in this crisis?—if I were thinking only of my own political safety, I would be silent to-day, and as I read a few days ago in Saturday Night, one moment of silence is better than an hour of explanation. I went down to defeat twice for saying things I thought, but I was afterwards elected by the very people who defeated me, because they found I was right.

To-day that town I mentioned appears to be divided. I believe it is the most hospitable place in western Canada. It is indeed a broad-minded, hospitable and lovely town, where the people got along well together. We never talked about religion, if we got together on a Saturday night and made the plans for our community, when the other fellow wanted to speak his mind, we did not question his right. We have done our best to learn our respective languages. To-day however we find this nefarious propaganda—and unfortunately it does not come from only one side. The result is that the town and the surrounding district are divided. Unfortunately we are divided on an issue which is clear. I am not going to enter into an argument with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) or the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). I am convinced that in the county I represent the vote was taken on the issue of conscription. The people voted definitely one way or the other when they voted. By 1,302,000 votes or more the government of this country, which lived up to the democratic principle of allowing the people to express their opinion on this question, has been relieved of its obligation and empowered to have the restriction with regard to service overseas removed. What else could the Prime Minister do in view of that vote? In implementing the demand he has just received, is he not taking the same stand that was taken by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917, by bringing down this bill to remove the restriction which the people of Canada have said must be taken out of the National Resources Mobilization Act?

I am not unmindful of the vote in the old province of Quebec, and certainly I do not blame the people for voting as they did. But the Prime Minister is the Prime Minister of Canada, not the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan or of Nova Scotia or of any other province. The majority of the people gave him a mandate which he is bound to carry out, and I for one was elected to support the Prime Minister and his government. After the plebiscite was taken I was given a mandate by my executive to carry on and support the government and use my own best judgment, and therefore, Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for the amendment which the government has brought down.

I am going to make this appeal. I have already said once in this house that nothing in this world can be achieved, either individually or collectively, except by sacrifice. A successful life or a great achievement cannot be attained without sacrifice—the sacrifice of our leisure, of our rest, of our vacation perhaps, sometimes the sacrifice of everything. If it be otherwise, it is a different world from the one I have always known. That has been the rule of this world ever since the great sacrifice. It cannot be any other way, and sometimes when we are inclined to agitate for an easy life we should bear in mind this great truth which cannot be denied. I think we are beginning to realize the necessity for sacrifice in this war. Before the war, we were looking forward to a life of ease in which we wanted to enjoy everything. But I hope we have learned a lesson. Nothing can be earned without sacrifice, and that is the foundation of the most admirable philosophy that will ever be taught in this world.

I admire and love my French-Canadian friends in the old province of Quebec. I wonder if hon. members from other parts of the country know what the population of the province of Quebec is, and something of its culture and traditions. The other day I heard a well educated young lady, smart and well-poised, say pityingly, "Poor old Quebec." How we are failing as a democracy in this country when we do not understand each other! I think these things ought to be said now. I am talking, not of the past, because it is gone, but of the present and the future. I am thinking of your children and my children as children of a minority in this country. I say to my children—they were here the other day; some of them are in the army—you cannot get anything without sacrifice, and you should strive to make yourself worthy of the admiration and support of the majority. It was heart-breaking to hear that brilliant young lady talking learnedly about the province of Quebec, about which she really know nothing. We should learn to know one another in this country, and then we should come to admire the great qualities of the Anglo-Saxon race, the French-Canadian race, and all the other races, the Ukrainians, the Germans, and the Scandinavians who have come here to help us develop this great land. If we want to have a truly united Canada, one of the first things that should be taught in our schools in the English-speaking provinces is the contribution the province of Quebec has made to the building up of this country and of what that has meant to Canada. The story of Canada began in 1763 for some of the provinces. Not only should the people of Ontario and of other English-speaking provinces be told of the contribution Quebec has made, but the people of Quebec should learn more of the great province of Ontario. There is a lake a few miles from here that bears the name of one of my ancestors. When Alexander Mackenzie went up the Mackenzie river he discovered a half-breed, Beaulieu, who had been there before him and had travelled all the way from the great lakes to Louisiana. But we do not know each other to-day, and the people of every province should get to know the people of every other province.

The Prime Minister in speaking the other day said that this amendment did not mean conscription, and he thought conscription for overseas service might never be necessary. I hope so. I rose in this house to speak to-day as a French Canadian from an English-speaking province, elected by a majority that was not French Canadian. Let us get together. Let us forget about the past and think of the present and the future, that future for which we are making such magnificent contributions and putting up such a great fight. This country has a great future. I have attempted to describe it to my children. As I seem to see it, speaking to a child of mine, I would say: Let us climb that hill. There is a cross on the field of battle. I can see, Mr. Speaker, just as surely as I can see the sun shining through the window above you, a most wonderful future for this dominion. I can see that the greedy who have been trying to control the wealth of this country are fearful of losing that control. It does not matter if they succeed in driving the Prime Minister out of office. It does not matter if they succeed in driving the present government out of office. They should know, if they ever learn anything—and this kind of people seldom does—that never again in this country, no matter what they do, will they control its destinies as they have controlled them or hinder the wheels of progress as they hindered them in the past.

To our young people, Scottish, Irish, English, French and others, I say, let us walk up our Calvary. I know that in my humble way I am ready to face this ordeal, because beyond there is resurrection, beyond lies happiness, a world in which will flourish peace and friendship and everything that makes worth while the life of men and women. Beyond the summit of the hill new vistas will appear. A young man who has attained this point will find that his progress has only begun. There will be other hills for him to climb, other things for him to achieve. This is the thought I wish to leave with our young people. But it is an ideal which cannot be attained unless we are united.

We believe that under the terms of the Atlantic charter a new order of things will come into existence. I would urge the young men who are my compatriots to forget what has happened in the past. I could speak for a long time on the handicaps which they they have had to sustain. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères mentioned some of them in the economic field. May I remind the house that our people were also kept out of the military field. I hope that others will stress these things, knowing them to be true. The French-Canadian boy who has the inclination and the aptitude for military affairs has had no opportunity since the last war. Since 1930 it has been almost impossible for him to get into the military college or qualify for the militia. The result was plain: when the war broke out we had no officers or very few. It has been said that French Canadians have not enlisted so numerously as they might have done, because of the fact that they were unable to understand the language of training. I have had a young man come to me and say, "I am the butt of the jokes of the men in my battalion because I do not understand English; I make a wrong move or I do not go to the right place," and he was ill at ease. He was just as brave and just as bright as his comrades, but he did not understand the English language. I do not wish to divulge any secrets, but I want to congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) upon the fact that he has taken steps in the last few months to enable educated French Canadians, some of them Bachelors of Arts or Bachelors of Law, to qualify as officers, men who are able to qualify in either language, and French Canadians will not be the butt of jokes or a source of amusement to the rest of the forces. When they do understand English, as many of them do, they show no hesitation. Going through the towns in my riding I can confirm what was said the other day by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères; you cannot find a young French-Canadian boy of military age who has not enlisted. Last winter there were not enough to fill the hockey teams; as usual; there are no baseball teams except those composed of the little fellows or the older men. All the young men of military age are either in the navy, the army or the air force. They are doing their share, and I am not particularly concerned whether they are enlisted as French Canadians in an Alberta battalion or elsewhere; if they are doing their duty, why should we worry? But these men had no difficulty because they understood English perfectly; they were raised and educated in the west.

I have forgotten many things I wanted to say, but there is one other matter I should like to mention. Some time ago, when I was talking to the gentleman in this city who has charge of my health, he suggested I should take a rest. When I told him I was a member of the house he said, "You are doomed; if you go there and listen to them much longer, I won't have anything to do with you." Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope your health is good, for you have to listen to a great deal, but my health, apparently, cannot stand it.

I have been rather embittered by the terrific criticism which I have read in the press, that great fourth estate which, according to the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) makes no mistakes. It seems to me that the older the hon. member gets, the bitterer he becomes, in contrast with the rest of us who, as we grow older, become mellower and more disposed to make allowances for others. But he does not. Let me tell him that his suggestion that the province of Quebec should be taken out of the dominion, cost the affirmative side 200,000 votes in the plebiscite in that province. That is what he wanted.

I wish to refer, briefly, to criticisms of the ministers. Let us be fair. Men as able as any of whom this country can boast, no matter in what line, are sitting to-day on the treasury benches—I do not say there are others just as able who are not in the ministry—and receiving a very small salary compared with what they could earn elsewhere. Some of the ablest practitioners of law and other callings are sacrificing their health, and some have given their lives, for the country. You and I can go home at 11 o'clock at night and take things a little more easily, but these men do not know family life. They are working until the small hours of the morning, passing orders in council, approving contracts, doing many other things, back again at sunrise, carrying on eighteen or nineteen hours a day. And what do they get? Criticism of the bitterest and most unfair kind. Hitler was not altogether wrong in his estimate of the sort of democracies which we have in the world to-day. He knew how unfair a democracy can be. He knew how hard a taskmaster politics can be. But we have lived through crises of this kind. We do not fear Hitler; we can lick him, provided we take care of our own men, provided we look after our leaders, provided we act fairly, no matter what political opinions we hold, towards the men who are sacrificing the best years of their lives, and sometimes life itself. It will not be surprising to learn of other ministers breaking under the tremendous ordeal of administering this terrific business.

I apologize to hon. members if I have said anything which I should not have said, but I am speaking from the heart. Let us from now on dedicate ourselves to one cause. We know that the French-Canadian boy has no more fear of the Germans than of anybody else. Make no mistake about that; once you get a French-Canadian battalion alongside your own overseas you have some real dependable friends. Do not doubt that. Let us dedicate our lives to a better understanding.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. member that his time is up.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): As I listened this afternoon to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) I was amazed to hear him say that he was opposed to conscription and that no political party with any regard for their political future would ever think of putting conscription in force in this country. I am amazed that a member of the cabinet at this time should think for a moment of party before country. Apparently the hon. gentleman is still travelling in the middle of the road as he was in March, 1940. Surely we should endeavour to save the country in manly fashion for our children and for the generations to come, whether as individuals we ever come back to parliament or not, because we should realize that should we lose the war this nation will be disgraced for many generations to come.

The bill before us follows in consequence of the plebiscite. This plebiscite was the strangest and most cumbersome manoeuvre ever conceived and imposed upon the people in the name of national unity, by any country. It has given needless emphasis to a division in the country's make-up which everyone knew beforehand existed, a division that exists chiefly as a result of the attitude and example of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) during the first great world war from 1914 to 1918, and in his leadership and appeal during the past twenty-five years in this country—all for political expediency. This is well borne out in the speech on foreign policy which he delivered in this chamber on March 30, 1939, as reported at page 2426 of Hansard:

> One strategic fact is clear: the days of great expeditionary forces of infantry crossing the oceans are not likely to recur Two years ago, I expressed in this house the view that it was extremely doubtful if any of the British dominions would ever send another expeditionary force to Europe.
> One political fact is equally clear: in a war to save the liberty of others, and thus our own, we should not sacrifice our own liberty or our own unity. Planning and coordination would be essential, but the necessary coordination could be made, and if this government were in power it would be made, without sacrificing those vital ends and conditions of our existence. Profits could and would be rigidly controlled, and profiteering suppressed. But men's lives and men's wills cannot be put on the same basis as goods and profits. The present government believes that conscription of men for overseas service would not be a necessary or an effective step. Let me say that so long as this government may be in power, no such measure will be enacted.

That is not so different from the speech which the Minister of Agriculture quoted this afternoon concerning the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell)—very similar in fact. I vigorously opposed the plebiscite as being the negation of parliamentary responsibility; but when the government carried the measure I submitted to majority rule in the house and went out to assist in every way possible to obtain an affirmative vote, and I was pleased to see that Canada voted two to one "yes" on the plebiscite. It is said that the plebiscite was not a vote either for or against compulsory overseas service. No; nothing as straightforward as that was meant by that vote. On June 11, I listened to that great speech delivered by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). He maintained that when the people of Quebec voted "no" they voted against conscription for overseas service, but he did not think many of those who voted "yes" voted for conscription. Surely by the same token, if those people who voted "no" voted against conscription for overseas service, those who voted "yes," the vast majority, voted for conscription for overseas service. What did the Prime Minister mean in his broadcast on April 7, after pointing out the dangerous situation that existed in Canada, both east and west, and in Europe, when he spoke as follows:

> We cannot defend our country and save our homes and families by waiting at home for the enemy to attack us. Every country that has stood behind its own defences in this war has sooner or later been attacked. To remain on the defensive is the surest way to bring the war to Canada. We must go out and meet the enemy before he reaches our shores. If you cannot trust parliament, your own elected representatives, whom can you trust!

On the basis of those words I think we should be entitled to discuss this bill in a mandatory form before this house. The logical conclusion for the people of Canada to arrive at was that if they released the Prime Minister from his pledge, then soldiers would be sent to any theatre of war, as is done by our good neighbour and ally, the United States of America, and we would no longer be looked upon by them as a nation in disgrace, as we are at this time. Here in the House of Commons is the place and now is the time to discuss and determine whether and by what methods the resources and man-power of this nation shall be mobilized. Parliament and not the cabinet in secrecy is the proper body to discuss these measures. I remember reading earnestly the debates during the year 1932, I having lived in the drought area of the west at that time. I wonder to-day if the Prime Minister is the same man who led the opposition during those debates and protested so vigorously over the fact that Prime Minister Bennett should be given a blank cheque to feed and clothe those people who were suffering as a result of the drought, and who were on relief, throughout the greater part of that section. He protested severely, and yet in this debate he asks the people for a blank cheque which enables him, if the occasion arises, to dispose of those same lives that were then being cared for. There is not much consistency in that stand. If the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères thinks that the Prime Minister has betrayed the people of Quebec, then in my opinion there are many people in eight other provinces who also feel that the Prime Minister has betrayed them to some extent.

I presume that during this debate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will speak and endeavour to prove how satisfactorily the voluntary system is working to-day. During the campaign in 1917 for a national government in this country, Major J. L. Ralston, then serving in France, wrote letters to the Halifax papers urging the people to support a national government in Canada at that time. Speaking at Charlottetown during the plebiscite campaign this year, in appealing for a "yes" vote, he said, "We must back up our boys overseas." Speaking in Winnipeg on May 25, 1942, before the Canadian Legion convention, Colonel Ralston promised a relentless war effort. He spoke of our man-power problems, stating that competition and wages had attracted men from one job to another. He said that this had, in many instances, left useful jobs with too few men to do them. Key men from industry and agriculture had, he said, joined the armed forces in many instances. Notwithstanding the splendid speech delivered that day by our senior Minister of National Defence on the achievements of our armed forces and on industrial expansion to date in Canada, the following day that great non-political organization representing the nine provinces of Canada passed a unanimous resolution for total war and asked for immediate conscription for overseas service. I contend that no organization in Canada has done more to assist the government in the war effort than the Canadian Legion.

I have the privilege and honour of representing a constituency that polled the greatest percentage of "yes" over "no" votes of any rural riding in Canada, the proportion being over sixteen to one. The only riding in Canada to surpass that record was Eglinton in the city of Toronto. The constituency of Souris is predominantly Anglo-Saxon, but there is one solid French polling division in it, and they voted "yes" in the proportion of well over two to one. There is a predominantly Mennonite polling division; they voted "yes", 128 to "no" 12. My home town of Melita polled 531 "yes" and 8 "no". Of two small rural school divisions, Bede voted 71 "yes", none "no"; and Swaffan, 56 "yes", and none "no". Fifty-four polling divisions in the constituency voted 8,043 "yes", and 484 "no". The municipal officials, legion officials, church and other community organizations, along with the general public, demonstrated a keen sense of citizenship and of public duty in so doing. At every meeting which I addressed in the riding during that plebiscite campaign I referred to my plea to the government on November 10, 1941, in this house for immediate national selective service in any theatre of war. At the same time I told them that the Prime Minister had said that they were not voting for or against conscription and that I had no idea what they might get as a result. While the people considered the plebiscite useless they now expect some immediate action.

The province of Manitoba voted "yes" almost five to one despite the isolationist and non-conscription views of our two federal cabinet ministers.

The press of Canada on June 3, 1942, quoting the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler), which constituency adjoins mine on the east, said that he had stated:

> Many old heads in Ottawa say when the government falls, as all things eventually must, it will not be over conscription. . . .
> The advice of the government's wartime specialists is going to govern. There is no escaping it. The government only has all the facts, they and only they. Theirs is the responsibility and theirs the decision.
> But the opposition is lying awake nights thinking of formulae which by way of amendment they can embarrass supporters in the eyes of their constituents.
> The Tories will try to embarrass government supporters before their "yes" (plebiscite) voters.

There is no one in the opposition who could do that job half as well as it has been done by those hon. members themselves. In the constituency of Lisgar during the plebiscite there was an available vote of 14,658. There was a "yes" vote of 4,633 and a "no" vote of 620. Poll No. 32, Rhineland, with 249 available votes, polled no votes either "yes" or "no". Poll No. 32A Rhineland, with 220 available votes, polled no votes "yes" or "no". Poll No. 21A, Winkler, with 287 available votes, polled one "yes", none "no". Poll No. 21 Winkler, with 244 available votes, polled two "yes" and none "no". Poll No. 16A, Horndean, with 187 available votes, polled one "yes" and one "no". Fifteen polls in that area, with a total available vote of 3,432, voted 40 "yes" and 40 "no". These people are a splendid type; there has been lack of leadership somewhere.

Just over a year ago the Minister of National Defence appealed to all federal members for assistance in recruiting throughout this country. What assistance did he obtain from his Manitoba colleagues in that respect? I venture to say his department received more active assistance from the lone opposition member than from all the government members from Manitoba.

The Winnipeg Tribune of June 6, 1942, had an article entitled, "No Complacency". It stated:

> The number of recruits for the armed services coming from Manitoba towns is a constant source of amazement. The record for enlistment in rural Manitoba has been consistently high ever since the war began, yet every call is quickly answered.
> Here is a sample of what rural Manitoba is doing. The air force mobile recruiting party visited four communities and this is how the young men flocked to the colours:
> Deloraine, population 850, joined up... 150
> Killarney, population 1,000, joined up.. 250
> Glenboro, population 500, joined up.... 70
> Souris, population 1,600, joined up.... 300
> This rural response is the reason why Manitoba is at the top of the recruiting list for Canada with one volunteer for every twenty residents. It is also a clear sign that there is no complacency in the country.

The same might be said of the population of many other towns in southwestern Manitoba.

However, as a result of this there is a decided shortage of efficient farm labour. National selective service for any theatre of war would have avoided many of the conditions now prevailing in industry, agriculture and the armed forces in this respect. I have discussed this matter on previous occasions with both the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). The Minister of Agriculture published a speech on September 12, 1941, as a press release from the bureau of public information, in which he stated:

> If we are required to muster a million men for our armed forces we would still have seven million people left in Canada over sixteen years of age. These seven million, properly organized and determined to stand behind the armed forces, can operate all our farms, our factories and places of business, in a manner which will give us the production required.

The same minister during August, 1940, was Minister of National War Services when the registration of man-power of this country was made. During that period of almost two years, what has been done properly to organize the people of this nation? Speaking on June 9 I referred to the matter and pointed out that the Prime Minister made his man-power speech on March 24 about national selective service, but that to this date nothing has been done about applying it to agriculture. We are simply drifting into a hopeless muddle.

It may be argued that the voluntary system is obtaining sufficient men while our troops are not in battle, but I would urge the government not to wait until a military crisis is upon us so that again it will have to be said: "Too little and too late."

We have the report on the Canadian expeditionary force to Hong Kong. I do not wish to refer at any length to that, but there were some parts of the report not referred to when the Prime Minister put a portion on Hansard on June 5. On page 42 it is stated that:

> . . . men without previous military experience served in the basic training centre for periods varying from three to eleven weeks.

Some had served only three weeks.

It was stated that:

> These steps were taken with speed and secrecy. . . .

The Grenadier Guards were reinforced from military district No. 10. A number were taken from Dundurn camp, military district No. 12. They ran around the country getting men who were untrained. On page 39 the report says:

> Colonel Sutcliffe estimated on October 10 that between 150 and 200 additional men would be required.

And permission was obtained from headquarters to take these men. On page 45 it says:

> On the whole matter I find there was no dereliction of duty or error in judgment from the mere fact that approximately 120 men were included in the expedition before they had completed their prescribed periods of training.
> I have already found that the addition of these men did not impair the efficiency of the expedition nor did it constitute an injustice to these men themselves.

Would any ex-service man believe that untrained men taken under these conditions constituted no injustice?

On another page it states that they went without mechanical transport and other equipment; and the reason why they did not get at least a portion of their mechanical transport was that one of these controllers misunderstood orders and did not send it. I say to the country that this report, which suggests that it does not matter whether troops are trained or whether they have sufficient equipment, was a fine piece of whitewashing. Let us not be misled in this way at such a time; let us act immediately to have, on a basis of equality of sacrifice, armed forces with proper and sufficient reserves and equipment which will be second to none in the world. Let us raise those forces as they are raised in Great Britain and the United States of America to-day. Then we shall not have to hang our heads in shame, as many of us must do these days.

Perhaps we suffer from too much provincialism of the past. In my opinion we require in this country a federal system of education. In the past too much was left to provincial departments. I trust that we may study and appreciate the problems of the Canadian people irrespective of our racial antecedents. Canada has vast possibilities for the future if we win this war. Can we not discuss and deal with these matters as Canadians, from the Canadian viewpoint? If we do so, may I be so bold as to suggest, in view of what is happening to-day, that the manly course for the Prime Minister under these circumstances would be to hand over the reins of government to either the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) or the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and ask either of these hon. gentlemen to form a national government composed of the best and ablest men in Canada, representative of all shades of opinion, but united in the common, single purpose of waging a total war by a total effort. Canada is distinctly held back during these days by party limitations. The limitations of party government must be thrown off before the will of the Canadian people can be translated into more effective national action, which is so urgently needed at this time. I thought there was a great deal of merit in the appeal made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon to his compatriots in the province of Quebec, and I should like to join with him in that appeal. We should all try to solve the problems which are confronting us to-day by dealing with them as Canadians, irrespective of our past racial history, on the basis on which these matters have been dealt with by our great neighbours to the south. A great deal still can be accomplished if we go at it in the right manner.

The hopes of Canada now rest with the conscience of parliament. The people have spoken, and it is the business of their representatives to give effect to their voice. Surely members of parliament on the government side will not remain silent and unconcerned while the birthright of the young men who are now awaiting the zero hour in England is sold for a mere mess of political pottage.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, we must all take our part in this debate according to the way we view what is happening in the world to-day. My first word will be that in my humble opinion this debate is the most important we have had in this house since September, 1939. It is important not only because of the conscription issue itself. I think the mere question of conscription for overseas military service is relatively unimportant in comparison with the stakes at issue in this world struggle in which we, together with the other free nations, are engaged. I believe that if we face the facts with minds as free as possible from prejudices both old and new, we shall find first that in each of the united nations the paramount need to defeat the axis powers has produced a degree of unity that is magnificently inspiring for the present and gives hope of great accomplishments for the future. I do not think it is necessary to draw to the attention of this house how a decade of struggle against a ruthless, cruel enemy has unified the warring factions of the sprawling population of China. We also have the example of how a realization of the dangers confronting them has for the time being almost obliterated class and party barriers in Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and the United States. The right to criticize of course has not been relinquished, but it is exercised in such a way as not to interfere with the task at hand, the defeat of the enemy. That unity in some of these countries, however, was not gained without some persons, who for long had been high in the councils of the nation, having to step aside.

If we face the facts, I think the second thing we shall find is that where unity could not be achieved because of the selfish machinations of a privileged, profiteering class, and because of the loss of faith in democratic institutions by some sections of the working class, a great nation, France, lies prostrate under the nazi heel.

If we face the facts, I think the third thing we shall find is that for Canada the need for unity is just as important as it was in the case of the countries I have mentioned; and may I say again that it is important not only because of our part in this war but because it is necessary if we are to meet the problems which will confront us when peace is made.

One of the problems confronting us in Canada is how we are to bring about unity within the country itself. I believe the essentials to the creation of national unity in Canada are that the people everywhere should have a clear understanding of:

1. Why we are in the war.

(2) why and how we went into the war of our own free will, and

(3) what we as a people expect to get out of the war.

The last and the first are particularly important, because unless we understand why we are fighting and what the results of our share in the fighting will be, or what the results of the sacrifices we are called upon to make will be, we cannot carry on with the enthusiasm and fortitude necessary in a struggle of this kind.

The reason why we have not the desired unity in Canada to-day is that no real effort has been made by the government to give the people an understanding of the three factors I have mentioned. There has been a holding back on the part of the government, a refusal to accept and proclaim the revolutionary nature of the war as a complete break with the political and economic policies of the last twenty-five years—policies which led inevitably and inexorably to war.

Last Thursday all hon. members listened to an eloquent and moving address by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). For myself, there was much in his speech with which I agreed, and I believe there was much with which we all agreed. I agreed with him when he condemned the government for lack of honesty with regard to the subject of conscription. I mentioned that matter myself in my speech on the address. As some other hon. members have quoted from other debates in this session, I crave the privilege of quoting a short paragraph from my speech on that occasion. I pointed out that, because of the way the plebiscite was introduced, in one part of the country it would be taken as a vote for conscription, and in another part it would be taken merely as a vote to relieve the government of any pledges which had been made. The group to which I belong proposed that in dealing with the question of conscription the people of Canada should have before them a clear and definite issue. It was with this in mind that I said, as reported at page 341 of Hansard:

> The group with which I sit are, as we have already stated, in favour of a vote on the clear issue of conscription, because we believe it is the real issue confronting the people of Canada to-day. We favour a vote on two questions: (a) conscription of man-power; (b) conscription of material reosurces, industry and finance. If both questions were given to the people for endorsation or rejection, I feel convinced that they would approve both provided they were told it was necessary.

They were not told it was necessary. They are not being told to-day that it is necessary. The government is saying, "Give us the power, and when we think it is necessary we will put conscription into effect on the terms and conditions we think fit, without any reference whatsoever to parliament. We have asked the people to free our hands. We now ask you, parliament, to free our hands and let us carry on, as if parliament were not here at all." That is not good enough, in view of the past record of the government.

I fully agreed with the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères when he said, or implied, that the cry for conscription of man-power, without regard to the nature of Canada's contribution to the total war plans of the united nations, came mainly from a small group of profit-seekers. These people have been shouting for the conscription of man-power and the regimentation of labour almost ever since the war began. Yet they oppose every move which seeks not only to conscript, but to give the government definite and reasonable control over the material and financial resources of this country.

I have nothing but contempt for this group of short-sighted reactionaries in Canada, who are more ready even to sacrifice their own sons than to give up a tittle of their wealth, privilege and power. It was the refusal of similar reactionaries at the heart of empire to make any concessions to the colonial sections of the empire which has brought that empire to the very verge of dismemberment. That class of people has always acted too late.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I had made reference to the fact that there was a small group of people in this country who were calling for the conscription of men and for the regimentation of labour but were not prepared themselves to give up the smallest fraction of their wealth or privileges. A concrete example comes to my mind. I remember that one of the first of these gentlemen to call for the conscription of man-power was James Duncan who, just prior to the incident mentioned, had been deputy minister of national defence for air. He made the demand for conscription in a speech that was reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of November 1, 1941, but just a short time before, this same James Duncan, when the Massey-Harris company called him, abandoned his important war post as deputy minister for air and went back to his private business. The men whom he would conscript, once they are called to their posts, stay at their posts for the duration. They cannot desert their posts whether family or business reasons call.

The hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) this afternoon referred in scathing terms to the control exercised by a small group of industrial and financial pirates, I think he called them, and gave it as his considered conviction that when this war was over, the power exercised by these gentlemen would be a thing of the past. I do not know where he got his information—possibly from the stars—but certainly he did not get it from a study of conditions as they are in Canada to-day because, if there is one thing that has been clear beyond anything else ever since this war began, it is that these people are becoming more and more powerful. I saw it put very nicely in the last issue of Maclean's magazine. A gentleman in business for himself and also occupying a high position with the government wrote from his own business office a letter to himself as a government official about some matter. Next morning he went to his government office and found the letter he wrote to himself waiting for him. Then as a government official he replied to himself as a business man, and then going back to his own office the next morning and getting the letter he had sent to himself, he was greatly pleased with the efficiency of government departments. That is what is happening, and I am afraid that the hon. member for Athabaska is going to be greatly disappointed if he sticks to the notion that once this war is over, these gentlemen are going to let go their strangle-hold on the people of Canada.

I have already made reference to the speech made on Thursday last by the former Minister of Public Works and Minister of Transport (Mr. Cardin) and indicated some points in his speech with which I agree. I also agree with the hon. gentleman when he warned the house that the deletion of section 3 from the National Resources Mobilization Act means conscription for overseas service, in spite of all the sophistry of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). And not only that; it means conscription for overseas service without any further reference of the question to parliament. Further, I think the hon. gentleman was also on solid ground when he protested against the undemocratic procedure of conscription being imposed by the stealth and secrecy of order in council. From his long association with such methods his words should carry weight with this house. In all of this serious criticism I think the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères was definitely in the right. But even before he spoke, on the same day, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of this group, had pointed out the same facts. We of this group I think may be pardoned if we feel perhaps gratified—that is not quite the proper term at such a time as this, but I cannot think of a better one—that our criticisms and suspicions of the government's methods have been confirmed by one who himself has had so many years of experience in the cabinet.

There were, however, points in the ex-minister's speech with which I did not agree, with which, indeed, I must take issue. He was seriously wrong, I think, when he implied that the support of English-speaking Canada for the war is mainly because of our British connection. I do not deny that there are small groups in this country to whom our British connection is sufficient reason for support in this or in any other war. There are similar people in all countries, but their kind is getting less and less each day. I think my hon. friend was wrong there, but there may be justification for his statement, and that justification lies in the fact that the government of which he himself has so recently been an influential member has fostered those ideas. I could give a thousand illustrations, as could any man in this house, of how such ideas have been spread and fostered by the present government—that is that Canada is at war because Britain is at war. But I think one will suffice—I believe, an outstanding one. Some months ago the Prime Minister published a book of his war speeches. The title of the book, "Canada at Britain's Side", is sufficient justification for the statement made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. That title to my mind is as good an expression of apron-clinging colonialism as any imperialist could wish for. Taken as the title of a collection of his war speeches by a man who, since the passing of the statute of Westminster, has continually reminded us of Canada's equality with Great Britain as a member of the British commonwealth of nations, it is bad enough; but when one learns that the title of the French edition of the same book is "Le Canada et la Guerre", which is, I believe, translated into English, "Canada and the War", the thing is beyond comprehension. But it does explain to some extent why to-day we have disunity in Canada. It is and has long been the accepted policy of this government to say one thing in the province of Quebec and another thing, though not always the same thing, in the other provinces. It depended upon whether they were going east or west. When they went west they were monetary reformers; when they came east they were the most orthodox of the orthodox.

I wish again to emphasize that the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is seriously wrong when he says that the people of English-speaking Canada, in giving support to the war, are motivated by emotion rather than reason. In saying that, he does English-speaking Canada a great injustice, and I do not think he wanted to do that.

I am of British stock. Usually when a person says that he follows it up by saying that he is proud of it. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères said the other day that such things were accidents, and I am willing to leave it at that; no one needs feel proud of an accident. My father came to this country over a hundred years ago. My mother's people have been in Canada for over a hundred and fifty years. In my love for Canada I yield place to no one. But for an intelligent man to-day love of country is not enough. One must love freedom. One must love humanity. One must love progress. One must love decency. These are the things which are involved in this struggle, and it is for these reasons that the people of my race have given and are giving all that they can. I, therefore, want to assure the hon member for Richelieu-Verchères and my other French-Canadian friends in this chamber that I have, like many other English-speaking people, passed through many troubled days during the past seven or eight years. We saw the menace of fascism coming nearer and nearer. We saw the reactionary Tory government of Great Britain making concession after concession to the dictators of Rome and Berlin. We saw the government of Canada spinelessly following the vacillating footsteps of a Baldwin and a Chamberlain. We saw collective security sabotaged and aggressors appeased in the hope of saving for a little while longer the right of a privileged class to rule and exploit. For me, for hundreds, for hundreds of thousands of Canadians this war did not begin in 1939. It has been going on for years—in Abyssinia, in China, in Spain, where the strategy and the implements we find to-day on every war front had been used and tested and perfected and their deficiencies, if any, found out.

The people of English-speaking Canada may and do feel pride in the courage and determination which the people of Britain have shown since May, 1940, but we support the war because of the issues at stake. These issues can be put very briefly. We are fighting to maintain the position won by us and others through years of sacrifice and struggle. We are also fighting to maintain the right of the common people to enlarge and enrich their lives by their own efforts, through their own organization, and to live under the rule of law. We of this group made that abundantly clear in the very first statement just before Canada's declaration of war, in the session of September, 1939. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) speaking for this group, said on that occasion, as reported in Hansard, page 55:

> Nevertheless, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation recognizes that Canada is now implicated in a struggle which may involve the survival of democratic institutions. We consider that in the cause of the allied powers lies a hope of building European peace on a more secure foundation because, in part at least, the people of Britain and France are waging a war against aggression.

We could not, Mr. Speaker, be unconcerned as to which side would win, and consequently we favoured Canada's participation in this war. In this war to-day we are proud to associate ourselves not only with Britain but with every free nation in the fight for survival, in the fight for freedom, and in the fight for the right to progress in our own way.

It is not necessary for me to elaborate on the causes which led to war; it is not a part of this debate. It is sufficient to note that the position of the world to-day is like that of a city in which dangerous gangsters are at large. No individual is safe until these gangsters are put under restraint. If the war has taught me anything, it is that the world to-day is a huge city. There is no longer isolation for nations any more than there is in an ordinary city isolation for the individual. The various nations are only the various sections of the city; the Chinese nation is the Chinese quarter, the Italian nation the Italian quarter, the British nation the British quarter, and so on. Consequently every nation must be concerned with what is taking place, and every nation must do its part to bring about a better and more orderly way of life.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in common with the Labour parties of other sections of the commonwealth, has condemned British imperialism as vigorously as any other and perhaps more vigorously because we felt we had more right to do so. It is our belief, however, that the British commonwealth of nations as a league of self-governing, independent and equal partners will play an important part in the new world which will follow this war. I have stressed these points because I want to make it clear beyond the possibility of doubt why this group wants an all-out war effort.

We cannot, however, support the government in what it is now asking unless we get from the government some guarantee that will convince us that the sacrifice asked of the people will not be in vain. Past experience, as the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) pointed out the other evening, is a justification for asking the government for these guarantees. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy):

> That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> "this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that the principle of the bill before the house is inadequate and inequitable, permits the governor general in council to conscript men for overseas service without reference to parliament, and is, therefore, contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

When, Mr. Speaker, you were giving the reasons the other evening for ruling out of order the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) Your Honour quoted an amendment moved by the present Prime Minister, who was leader of the opposition at the time, in 1934, that amendment being:

This house, while prepared to support legislation or assist in the orderly marketing of natural products, is unalterably opposed to the enactment of any compulsory measure which delegates to unnamed and undetermined individuals, groups or organizations, sweeping powers over the production and trade and commerce of the nation.

This same right hon. gentleman is asking now, not that this house give him power over trade and commerce, over the natural products of the nation; he is asking parliament to give him power over the lives of the individuals in the nation. Surely, if the amendment I have just quoted was justified in 1934, when this house was dealing with inanimate things, the amendment I have just moved is much more justified on this occasion when we are dealing with the very lives of the people of the country. I submit that no better argument could be used for the appropriateness of this amendment.

There seems to be a wide difference of opinion even among members of the government as to whether or not this is a conscription bill. If I heard aright this afternoon, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said it was not; but the Prime Minister said the other evening very definitely that it was. I quote from page 3288 of Hansard of June 11:

Mr. Mackenzie King: What is my hon. friend talking about right now?

Mr. Douglas (Weyburn): May I ask: are we discussing conscription?

Mr. Mackenzie King: Yes; the question of overseas service is now before parliament.

But once this bill is passed, it will no longer be before parliament and all the power will be in the hands of the government. I noticed a quotation in a speech delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), at the legion convention in Winnipeg recently:

If the trumpet give an uncertain sound—who shall prepare himself to the battle?

By the sounds the trumpet is making I think it is badly cracked.

In the few moments left at my disposal there is another point I wish to make. I do so to support a statement I made a few minutes ago, that the policy of the members of the government changes as they go east or west. In Ottawa it is, of course, stationary and absolutely reactionary. When my hon. friend was at the legion convention, speaking of course not as Minister of Pensions and National Health, but as a member of the Canadian Legion, he said:

You are to have a serious debate to-morrow morning on the conscription question. If I had my way, the first conscript in Canada would be money.

When my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar moved a motion to conscript money the other day, the Minister of Pensions and National Health—he was not then speaking to the legion in Winnipeg—was the first one to rise in his place and draw to Your Honour's attention the fact that the hon. member was out of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I tell my hon. friend that in 1925 I moved a resolution, the first one in Canada, which was carried unanimously by a vote of the Canadian Legion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes but my hon. friend was on the opposition side of the house in 1935. To-day he is on the government benches.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I said 1925.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, 1925. That is still further back, and there was no hope of anyone doing anything about the matter then. That is the reason, Your Honour, why we have so many difficulties to-day. I imagine my time has expired, and so I leave these thoughts with you.

Mr. R. T. GRAHAM (Swift Current): The bill which this house is now discussing has excited a debate which it is quite apparent is seriously claiming the attention of hon. members. That is rather strange, Mr. Speaker, because I do not think you can find in the bill itself anything that should create the feeling of tension that has been quite obvious during the course of the debate thus far. There is no doubt that the importance the house is attaching to the bill arises, not from the terms of the bill itself but from the possible use of the authority given the government as a result of the removal of the restriction now contained in the National Resources Mobilization Act; and I think we should pay particular attention to the fact that this tension was made much more apparent by the address which was delivered by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), which we all realize constitutes a threat to the unity which has, so far at least, during the course of this war characterized all the people of Canada. I believe the seriousness of the matter properly justifies the consideration being given this debate. The opening address by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the addresses of the leaders of the opposition parties, and in particular the address of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, bring home to us not only the seriousness of the world situation but also the serious state of our internal, domestic affairs, which is a very important matter in relation to the other, larger question.

In the time allotted to me I propose to deal with some of the matters brought up by the leaders of the opposition parties in this house. First I should like to deal with the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. Hon. members of course will remember the manner in which that address was dealt with to-day by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I come from Saskatchewan; and hon. members will not be surprised that those of us who come from that province take perhaps a greater interest than others in the utterances of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group. The policies which he enunciates in this house, and which he repeated so cleverly and so ably on Thursday last, are not new to the people of Saskatchewan. Though the speech of the hon. member was thinly disguised to make it appear an attempt to assist in the war effort, I do not believe that was the real purpose of the speech delivered by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is imputing improper motives. I say on my word that my speech was an attempt to assist the government and the country in the war effort, and a very deliberate attempt at that. I ask that the statement be withdrawn.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I have offended against the rules of the house, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw; but I challenge the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group to tell this house of a single principle included by him in his six points which his party have not supported in the past, when there was peace in this land, and which they do not propose to support after this war has been brought to what we hope will be a victorious conclusion.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I am asked that question I can answer it very briefly. Certainly that is true; but is it not a fact that the Liberal party itself carries its peace-time policies into its war effort and its policies relating to the war into the peace effort? If not, there is a complete break with all that goes before and all that comes after.

Mr. GRAHAM: Using the premise which has been established by my hon. friend's answer, I propose to deal with his speech as I think it should be dealt with; because I believe that to propose at this serious moment in the history of this nation a policy which would fasten upon Canada not only in time of war but in time of peace a system of state socialism would be fatal not only to the war effort but to the happiness, contentment and liberty of our people.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who says it is state socialism, to begin with?

Mr. GRAHAM: I think also, while I hope I would be the last man in this house to bring up old controversies merely for the sake of bringing them up, it would be proper to examine the speech of the hon. gentleman in the light of the past performances of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. As the Minister of Agriculture pointed out this afternoon, away back in 1933 the group which my hon. friend now leads enunciated the very same principle, only in different words:

> Socialization of the banking, credit and financial system of the country, together with the social ownership, development, operation and control of utilities and natural resources.

That was then part and parcel of what they called "planned economy." It was part and parcel of a policy which they suggested had in mind production for use only.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is quoting from something? If so, I wonder if he would table it.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend has interrupted me several times. I did not interrupt him when he was speaking, and I ask that he accord me the same treatment.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry, but if the hon. gentleman alleges that he is quoting from some of our literature, I am asking him to table the document so that I may see it.

Mr. GRAHAM: Does my hon. friend suggest that this is an incorrect statement of the policy of his party?

Mr. COLDWELL: That has nothing to do with the matter. Will the hon. member table the document?

Mr. GRAHAM: As I say, included in that policy was the "production for use" programme, and at that time they also had a "use-lease-land" system which envisioned the taking over, the nationalization at least in part, of the farm lands of that province—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is not true.

Mr. GRAHAM:—and in turn leasing that land back to the farmers of the province, on terms that might be thought fit.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is incorrect.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yet the verdict of the people of that province, as might be expected, was wholly adverse to the policy, and to the leadership that sponsored it. I suggest that since that time the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group has acquired greater wisdom, for I do not think anyone in this house has ever heard him use the term "use-lease system", nor has he used the term "planned economy".

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. I never did use the term "use-lease system".

Mr. GRAHAM: I noticed that to-day the hon. member interrupted the Minister of Agriculture and said he had never used the term "state socialism".

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite right.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then what is the basic root of the policy enunciated by my hon. friend?

Mr. COLDWELL: Cooperation.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it not the transfer to a centralized authority, to be known as the state, of all the rights, powers and authority that now reside in the people?

Mr. COLDWELL: Absolutely not.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then am I wrong in interpreting the policy which he gave to this house as meaning that it would have the effect of clothing the centralized authority with the constitutional power which we, as a free people, have given our government; that is to say, authority over the appointment of the judiciary, authority over our police forces, power and authority over our army and militia? My hon. friend now suggests that in addition we should transfer to that centralized authority control over our finances, which of course includes the issue of currency and credit, and control of our war industries, as he described them in his speech of last Thursday, though in ordinary times he describes them as simply "industry" or "key industries," and in addition all those powers which my hon. friend suggests should be given to the centralized government in this country.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does my hon. friend not think that is better than having dollar-a-year men controlling everything?

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend went further; he warned us that that was not an exhaustive statement of their policy, and he left to our imagination just how far he and his group are prepared to go in the matter of the transfer of the rights of the people to a centralized government.

Mr. GILLIS: The rights of what people?

Mr. GRAHAM: I ask him now, would the people of the province of Quebec who have historically and jealously guarded provincial rights, who set great value on the rights guaranteed them by the treaty of Paris, who see in minority rights a cause that they constantly champion and protect, ever dream of giving to any group—

Mr. MacINNIS: They have given it already. What about the Montreal light and power companies?

Mr. GRAHAM: —not only the power to control the ordinary processes of law and order but almost absolute control over the spiritual, cultural and economic life of the people?

Mr. MacINNIS: That is good political talk for Quebec.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have a book that I would recommend to hon. members. It is entitled, "Socialism Critically Analysed," written by Doctor O. D. Skelton, a man whose memory is honoured in this house and this country. Although that book was written some thirty years ago, he sets out clearly the propositions enunciated in this house by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and he examines them with the keen analytical mind which we all know that Doctor Skelton possessed. Therefore I suggest that all who are interested in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation policy read and digest that book.

Mr. COLDWELL: And then listen to the Hon. Walter Nash.

Mr. GRAHAM: He warns us exactly what would happen if such powers were granted to a centralized authority which would make the state not a servant of the people but the master of the people. Is that not one of the essentials for which we are fighting, to retain the liberty of the individual as against any fascist or collective state?

Mr. MacINNIS: What about the monopolies?

Mr. GRAHAM: Surely the policy which my hon. friend attempts to persuade this house should be accepted is the policy against which we are fighting.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about Australia, New Zealand, Great Britain?

Mr. GILLIS: And Kirkland Lake and Dumarts in Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: I was surprised at the statement of my hon. friend when he accused the Prime Minister and members of the government of sowing disunity and creating confusion in this country. I thought that charge particularly inappropriate in the mouth of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. I do not wish to recall except for the purpose of my argument the attitude taken by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party prior to the outbreak of the war. We all remember it, and I would have been prepared to hear the leader of the group after the outbreak of the war announce that he had seen the error of his ways, show a reasonable measure of repentance and make a declaration that he had been wrong and that the party had changed its attitude toward the war. Instead of that, as late as Thursday of last week he attempted to persuade this house that the attitude he took then is still the proper one for this country to take.

Let me go further, because I think it is important. In July, 1940, in the city of Regina, the capital of Saskatchewan, the provincial Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group met for the purpose of electing a leader. The then leader, Mr. G. H. Williams, who had at that time I think become a member of his majesty's forces, challenged that convention to defeat him as leader on the ground that he supported the war effort of this country. I am proud to say that the convention did support his leadership, although I think he was opposed by a Professor Carlyle King on grounds not quite as certain.

Mr. MacINNIS: Was there no opposition to the war in your party?

Mr. GRAHAM: In the same city at the same time and under the same auspices, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation youth movement met for the same purpose, and my hon. friend knows that at that convention, meeting in July, 1940, after Dunkirk, after the fall of France, they passed a resolution calling upon the government of Canada to recall all troops sent to England and to confine Canada's war effort to the supply of material.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, not that I know of.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps my hon. friend does not have to accept full responsibility for something done by the youthful wing of his party.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know nothing about it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I suggest that "by their fruits shall ye know them", and that the fact that the youth of this country who have been educated in their political doctrines by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation leaders, in the face of the awful realities of July, 1940, passed such a resolution, is an indictment of the leadership of that party.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know nothing about it, but I do know what the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) said about it.

Mr. HOWDEN: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I ask that the hon. member be given fair play.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not wish to interrupt, but the hon. member keeps asking me questions, and when he does so I feel bound to answer. If he will refrain from asking rhetorical questions I will refrain from answering them.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member's questions are largely rhetorical and do not call for interruption of his speech.

Mr. GRAHAM: If I may now continue, even as a war-time policy I think the argument is all against the suggestions of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. I do not believe that the leader of that party in this house or any of those who sit with him have any fixed conviction that there is any possibility now or in the near future of the adoption of the programme he suggests as the proper one for Canada to pursue. I think he would agree with that statement. If that be true, does he consider that he is adding to the efficiency of this country's war effort by saying, in effect, to the government, properly elected in a democratic manner by the Canadian people since the outbreak of the war to conduct the country's war effort, "we refuse to support any measure which this government presents unless they will accept the dictation of this party and impose, not only upon this parliament but upon the people of this country, state socialism", which he knows cannot come into existence now or in the near future?

I will go further. I have listened to my hon. friend speak highly—and in that I would join him—with regard to the leaders of the Labour party in the old land. He has often referred, and with approval, to the Hon. Ernest Bevin. Let me bring to the attention of the house the attitude of Mr. Bevin toward the war effort of Great Britain on an occasion of exact similarity to that which is now before this house. On December 4, 1941, the British House of Commons was discussing the extension of the selective service system to women. One Mr. Daggar moved an amendment, similar in its purpose but differently phrased from that moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Let me read Mr. Daggar's resolution:

Mr. Daggar: I beg to move, in line 1, to leave out from the word "that" to end of the question, and to add instead thereof:

"This house, while assenting to the extension of the principle of compulsion to the man-power and woman-power still available, is of opinion that, in order to secure the full utilization of national resources in the war effort, it is essential that industries vital to the successful prosecution of the war, and especially transport, coal mining and the manufacture of munitions, should be brought under public ownership and control, and that the necessary legislation should be brought in as soon as possible."

I ask the house to notice this, that those who moved that resolution had the interests of the war effort at heart—and it is so stated in the wording of the resolution, because the first words are "while assenting to the extension of the principle".

The amendment attempted to be moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar starts off by saying that this bill be not now read a second time. In other words, it is a refusal to give any measure of support to the Prime Minister and the government who are charged with the task of carrying on this war effort.

What attitude did Mr. Ernest Bevin take with regard to Mr. Daggar's resolution? He took the attitude I would expect a great patriot would take. He spoke against it and succeeded in persuading the house that it was an improper resolution to bring before it. I not only quote him, but I could quote Mr. Shinwell who, I think my hon. friend would agree, is an ardent and enthusiastic socialist in the old country. He, too, in discussing the amendment admitted quite frankly that it was impossible to bring in such a transfer of management and ownership and control of the industries without creating such confusion and, shall I say, almost revolution in the country that it would so disturb the war effort as to be unwise. Let me quote his words, in dealing with all the avenues open to him:

Another possibility is to take over all war production, including shipbuilding, and run it as a state affair, using the technical and administrative staffs and leaving questions of compensation to be determined at the close of the war. While this is consistent with the policy of the Labour party, it may be rejected because of the political disturbance it involves.

In order that I may assist the war effort, I want to draw to the attention of the house the difference between my hon. friend's party and those in Great Britain who are held up by my hon. friend for approval. They have been held up on more than one occasion. I would compare their attitude with that of hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party in this house, in moving the amendment they did.

Mr. COLDWELL: What is the date of that speech?

Mr. GRAHAM: December, 1941. It is reported in the parliamentary debates, volume 376, November 12 to December 19.

I would invite the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, whose political capacity and whose power to assist the government in this war effort is very great, to forsake the opportunity to advance the fortunes of the political party to which he adheres, and to do as we on this side of the house are doing, namely, surrender for the moment, in the interests of the nation, the right to bring up controversial matters, which can be left until peace comes to us again.

Surely that is the attitude we have the right to ask of every hon. member in the house, when we examine the war situation as it is to-day. My own attitude in this matter is, I believe, very plain and, I hope, a patriotic one. If it becomes a necessity, and if I believe it will help the war effort of the country, I am prepared to conscript man-power for any purpose. If it becomes a necessity, and if I believe it will further the interests of the war effort of the country, I would conscript wealth of all kinds, both annual and accumulated. If it becomes a necessity, and if I believe that it will help the war effort of the country, I would conscript or compulsorily take over all of the industry needed to be taken over.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not concede us the same right?

Mr. GRAHAM: I go further than the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—at least, if I understand their policy as that enunciated last Thursday by its leader. If it were a necessity and if I thought it in the interests of the war effort of this country, I would conscript labour, I noticed particularly that my hon. friend did not suggest that to this house, when he mentioned conscription of man-power.

On the other hand, if, after giving due consideration to each, and after having, I hope, obtained the information I require from the sources which would have that information, I find that that is not a necessity, and that it would not help the war effort, I would vote against any such measure. I believe that is the simple attitude which we can all adopt, because it is the one which holds out the only present hope of speedy victory.

It seems to me that if we could imagine the people of Canada all gathered together in this House of Commons to-night, and suddenly the gentleman usher of the black rod, or some other official, came and announced that the Japanese were at the west block and the Germans at the east block, we would speedily forget all of our political futures, all our political plans and hopes, and would join together under the best leadership available for the purpose of meeting the enemy. I will admit that that illustration is somewhat extreme, but I submit that the real and actual situation justifies the illustration. Inasmuch as the Japanese have invaded the Aleutian islands off our western coast, and the German submarines have entered the St. Lawrence river, I think my illustration is not too far-fetched. We as members of the House of Commons have a common duty to perform in supporting the government, as well as the duty each one has in carrying out his share of the war effort.

We speak of the patriotism and the sacrifice of the young men who are called upon to fight in the front line. In my day and age we were called upon to fight in the war of 1914-18. The young men and the young women of this day are called to fight in a much more terrible and more serious war in every respect, so far as the results which may possibly flow from it are concerned. If we are asking those young men to risk the sacrifice of their physical lives, then surely it is not asking too much of hon. members to ask us to place upon the altar of this our native land our political lives, and to consecrate ourselves to the duty of giving to this government, the chosen of the people, every possible measure of support, so that we can bring victory—certain, and as soon as possible.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke this afternoon he said that the leader of this group had stated, when speaking on this measure, that we had taken a stand against either public ownership or control of industry. Therefore, in order to set the record straight in the matter I should like to quote what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) did say in regard to industry. I am sure, had the Minister of Agriculture read the speech, he would not have made the statement he did make.

The speech of the hon. member for Lethbridge is found at page 3273 of Hansard, and from it I quote the following:

> Nevertheless this group conceives a state in which industry shall do what the state tells it to do. Why should such an outrage as has been referred to already, in the Dumart plant, continue unchecked? If an industry simply refuses to obey the directions of government, then the government without hesitation should force it to sell its shares to the government or to some other industry which would be prepared to obey the government's will and fall into co-operation. There are other forms of compulsion which could be used. As a result of the application of these devices it would be possible to conscript completely industry in this country, which means to bring it under control so that it will cooperate with the state for the people of the state.

In passing, I should like to stress the fact that this group has consistently advocated the control of industry by government.

To-day it is so obvious that unless we defeat the enemy overseas we shall have to defeat him at home on the American continent, that no sound argument can any longer be presented that Canada ought not to participate to the greatest possible degree in the overseas conflict. That conclusion having been reached, it becomes a question of what is the most equitable way of calling up men for military service. The voluntary system to-day as imposed by this government is a policy of flogging the willing horse. It is neither just nor efficient. A continual appeal is made to a person's sense of patriotism, to his conscience, with the result that the entire personnel of some families is wiped out, while other families make no contribution whatsoever. This policy has been maintained largely no doubt as a matter of political expediency. I would call it appeasement in its very worst form, and appeasement invariably fails. If the objective is, as we have been told, national unity, I think we can say that the government has failed to achieve its objective. If the objective has been unity within the Liberal party, I think one can also say, after listening to some of the speeches that have been made in this house, that appeasement has failed even in that direction.

If the war were a minor operation, or if we had many men wishing to volunteer for foreign service, then I would say that the voluntary system would be satisfactory. So long as we had plenty of men in this country clamouring to be allowed to go overseas I would say that the voluntary system was satisfactory. But as soon as you had a situation where you had to badger men and resort to various questionable practices in order to induce or coerce men to enlist, I would say that the voluntary system had failed and that the time for conscription had come.

In war-time it is absolutely essential that we should at all times strive for the greatest degree of equality of service and sacrifice. It may not be possible to achieve that objective. It cannot be achieved, I admit, 100 per cent, but that does not for one minute excuse the government for failing to strive continually to reach that objective to the greatest degree possible, and I would say that is equally true whether we have a voluntary or a compulsory service for overseas. Surely those who enlist on a voluntary basis have just as much right to demand equality of service and sacrifice as those who are conscripted, and I would say that no man should be asked to give his life for his country either voluntarily or by compulsion unless at the same time those who stay at home are prepared to assume their full responsibility in that effort. Just to show that we have been quite consistent in our attitude regarding the war since its declaration, I would quote briefly what I said on September 11, 1939, when we were discussing the appropriation bill. It will be found at page 99 of Hansard. I said:

> In time of war it becomes necessary to call upon certain people to be willing to sacrifice their lives. It becomes necessary for some people to make that supreme sacrifice. It is necessary for others to suffer mutilation of the body. Is it asking too much to ask people remaining in Canada, in comparative safety, to be willing to sacrifice the major portions of their incomes? Is that asking too much, at a time when we are asking other people to sacrifice their lives? I say we have every right to demand that those who remain in safety be prepared to sacrifice the major portion of their incomes, that they be permitted to retain only that portion which is necessary for the maintenance of a moderate standard of living.

Again:

> We believe in utilizing the Bank of Canada so that we may create the necessary financial credits and currency, combined with definite price regulation so as to obviate any serious rise in prices. We would advocate, further, steeply graded income and profits taxes. We maintain, further, that the only possible justification for borrowing is when our need for goods is greater than our ability to produce them. That condition of course requires external borrowing. We see absolutely no justification for internal borrowing.

So, Mr. Speaker, I would say that when the men return from overseas they should not be called upon to make any further sacrifice. When they have fought this war and won it they will have made all the sacrifices they should be called upon to make, without being called upon, when they return, to start to help paying the cost of the war. That is our responsibility now.

There would be no question of our overseas forces having to pay the cost of this war had there been adopted from the outset, as we were led to believe would be adopted, a strictly pay-as-you-go policy. But to say to the men now overseas or in the active service forces: "We asked you to go without that guarantee, but we will not allow reinforcements to be conscripted without it", would in my opinion be a betrayal of our men overseas. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I cannot agree with those who say that we must vote against this bill until the government have adopted their particular brand of conscription of wealth. Furthermore, I consider that the plebiscite vote was a direct mandate to the government for the introduction of the bill now before us. Whether or not we have conscription for overseas makes no difference so far as the immediate conscription of the industrial and financial resources of the nation are concerned. Failure to do this means the loss of morale, and the loss of morale may easily mean the loss of the war.

There is much that the people have to do in the line of duty. But that is not enough. For an all-out war effort people must be prepared to go beyond the line of duty. However, before you can expect to develop that spirit, before you can expect to instil a greater esprit de corps among the people, you must convince them not merely that you are fighting to defeat Hitlerism, which is simply a means to an end but that the real end in view is to introduce into the world a new social order based upon true Christian principles. As the Prime Minister, however, has said on several occasions, unless that new social order is well on its way before the end of the war, we might well look for that new order in vain.

Speak to the people on the streets; speak to the men in the army; speak to the men on the production lines, and what do you find? You find they are fearful. Fearful of what? Fearful of what is going to happen to them at the end of the war. The depression years from 1930 to 1939 are all too fresh in their memory. They remember the hundreds of thousands of men who were wandering across Canada looking for work, hundreds of whom were arrested on a vagrancy charge when their only crime was that they were looking for a job. They are wondering to-day what is going to happen when half a million men come back from overseas and when one million people now in the war industries are thrown out of a job upon the conclusion of the war. That is not a healthy state of mind for the people of any nation to be in, and so I believe it is high time for the Prime Minister to tell the people in unmistakable terms, and assure them of it so that they can be certain of it beyond the shadow of a doubt, that a new social order will be brought in at the conclusion of the war. Promises such as those made by ministers sitting over there are not enough.

I remember that the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), speaking this afternoon, said that people should not be doubtful on this question. He said we are told that there will be a new social order. He said we have had the Atlantic charter. But I would remind the hon. member that, when I was overseas in the last war, we also listened to promises. Members of the government came to us in France and told us what would be done; we were fighting to make the world safe for democracy; this was a war to end wars, and everyone when he returned to Canada would be guaranteed a job and his family looked after. Were those promises kept? If promises to the soldiers in the last war were not kept, have we any reason to expect a better fate for the vague promises which are being made to-day? I do not think so.

So I would say that, before calling upon the people to make any greater sacrifices than they have already made—we are led to believe that further impositions will be announced in the coming budget, and the conscription of manpower will mean even greater sacrifices—the government of Canada should issue a declaration of principles for a Canadian charter. In other words, let them issue a declaration which will apply the Atlantic charter to Canada, and show how it will work, especially with regard to sections 4, 5 and 6. Take the section which says that the nations of the world shall have free access to the raw materials of the world and that all peoples of the world shall be guaranteed freedom from fear and want and freedom from war. I believe that if the government were to issue a declaration such as I suggest and make it clear how the Atlantic charter will be applied to Canada, a long step would have been taken to build up the type of morale which is so necessary in war time.

I want to give a few examples of what the government might tell the people of Canada at this time in order to build up confidence. May I here remark that if such a declaration were issued, it would not be necessary to hire cheer leaders such as Mr. Hirst to go and try to build up the morale of the aircraft workers.

Let the Prime Minister tell the people of this country that the policy of not allowing financial restrictions to impede our war effort will apply equally to our post-war reconstruction period.

Let the Prime Minister say, giving it the widest possible publicity, that anything which can be achieved in the physical sense to bring in a new social order will be made financially possible. I am satisfied that in that event the morale of the Canadian people would be greatly improved. I am somewhat doubtful whether the Prime Minister would be prepared to make such a statement.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): So is everybody else.

Mr. QUELCH: I have in mind a discussion which I had the other day with Doctor James, who is chairman of a seven-man committee for reconstruction. I pointed out to him that the Liberal party had been unable to solve the pre-war problems. I pointed out that we had had half a million unemployed, and that our group had continually urged in the house that these unemployed should be put to work on national projects so that the money paid out on the projects would create a demand for the goods which industry can produce, but that always we were met with the same argument, that there was no money available for such a purpose. Then Doctor James said, "Oh, but don't you realize that there has been a tremendous change of opinion regarding monetary policy since 1939?" I will agree that in so far as the people of the country are concerned there has been a change. I do not believe the people will ever be satisfied to be told again that they have to go on relief because there is not enough money to put them to work. Having seen that we can spend not only hundreds but thousands of millions of dollars for war, they are not going to be willing to have their sons wander from one end of the country to the other looking for work because the government says that there is no money available.

So I believe the people of the country realize that there must be changes, that the type of monetary policy we had before this war—a deflationary monetary policy—will never come back. I am not so sure that the government realizes it. I pointed out to Doctor James, when we were discussing the thousand million dollar gift, that the main reasons for giving instead of lending these goods to Britain—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman has been discussing post-war conditions. He is now referring to a debate which has already taken place during this session, namely the debate on the billion dollar gift to Britain. This is out of order. The measure before the committee is a provision to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. QUELCH: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I will not refer again to the billion dollar gift. I hope you are not suggesting that I cannot discuss social conditions. I have sat in this house for three days listening to a discussion on this very matter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: My ruling can be appealed from but cannot be discussed. I do not know what has taken place during the last three days; I was not here, but I know it is a fundamental rule that the discussion must be relevant to the measure before the house.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Speaker, I have said that I bow to your ruling.

Before I mentioned the billion dollar gift I was stressing the fact that if we are going to call upon the people of this nation to make further sacrifices, it is absolutely essential that we take steps to build up morale. I want to explain and stress how necessary it is that certain declarations shall be made to the people in order to build up the type of morale necessary to make them willing to undergo these sacrifices. I suggest that if the Prime Minister would explain to the people that by the end of this war Canada will be wealthier than it has ever been before, due to the fact that we shall have a greater plant capacity, and more skilled labour than we ever had, it will be merely a question of applying that skilled labour to our idle resources in order to give to the Canadian people the highest standard of living they have ever had; and if due publicity were given to that statement, that also would help to build up morale. I stress this point, because time and again I have read predictions that we are going to be poor at the end of this war and that it will be necessary to tighten the belts of the people to pay for it.

Anybody who studies this question knows that such a statement is unsound, and that in reality we shall have more wealth than we ever had before. I do not believe it is a good thing to cause loss of morale by making people believe that when this war is over they will undergo another depression. Yet we are being continually warned about another depression at the end of this war, without the smallest reason for such an assumption.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must again draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the rule which forbids a discussion of post-war conditions on the measure now before the house. I must apply the rules of the house.

Mr. QUELCH: Let the Prime Minister declare that at no time is the striving for a favourable balance of payments justifiable so long as we have in this country the extreme poverty we had in the past. I would point out that from 1934 to 1939 we had on the average a favourable balance of payments to the extent of $218,000,000 a year. In other words, during that five-year period we shipped out a billion dollars' worth more wealth than we brought in. In spite of that fact, we had over a million people in this country in a dire state of poverty. I am satisfied that if, following up a declaration of that kind, the government would take immediate action to prove to the people that they are going to do everything in their power to bring about greater equality of service and sacrifice, they would go a long way toward restoring public confidence that a new social order is in reality in the making. As an immediate proof of our sincerity, let the government take the following steps to demonstrate to the people now that we mean what we say when we assert that a new social order will be brought in.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Again I must point out to the hon. gentleman that the question before the house is mobilization for overseas service by the amendment in Bill No. 80. The new social order or future conditions in the country are not sufficiently linked up with the subject matter before the house to enable me to rule the hon. gentleman's remarks in order. This is the third time I have called his attention to this fact.

Mr. QUELCH: It is pretty hard when one has been listening to a debate for three days and taking notes to find suddenly that the greater part of the discussion which has taken place in that time is ruled out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with the ruling, he knows the remedy.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not going to refer to the new social order any more.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That question cannot be discussed.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not discussing it.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman is not referring to my ruling, I do not know what he is referring to.

Mr. QUELCH: I am bowing to your ruling and proceeding to develop another phase of the argument. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation moved an amendment; there is another amendment now before the house which refers to certain policies that should be brought into operation to assure the people that everything is being done to bring about equality of sacrifice and service in the country, and this group agrees that all incomes below $750 for single persons and $1,500 for married people should be free from taxation. But if it is going to be argued that such a policy would cause inflation, then compulsory savings could very well be instituted—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman is talking about inflation. In my opinion, inflation is not linked up with the bill before the house.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Speaker, may I ask this question: Are we discussing the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment? Is that amendment before the house, or is it not?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am not here to answer questions; I am here to say whether the hon. gentleman's remarks are pertinent to the bill. We are discussing Bill No. 80, the provisions of which are before the hon. gentleman. The object of the bill is to repeal section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. QUELCH: I have in my hand the amendment moved by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which I understand has not been ruled out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman cannot discuss my ruling.

Mr. QUELCH: I am not discussing your ruling. I am discussing the amendment, and I will read it. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis)—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman referring to the amendment just moved?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes. That amendment is:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor: this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that the principle of the bill before the house is inadequate and inequitable, permits the governor general in council to conscript men for overseas service without reference to parliament, and is therefore contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

The amendment declares that the present measure is inequitable and inadequate, and the hon. member for Vancouver East stressed the fact and showed why it was inadequate. He stressed the fact that it was inadequate because it did not provide for conscription of wealth, and he also pointed out that it would be necessary to revise our whole system of taxation. To that extent I agree with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, that when we are calling upon people to make the supreme sacrifice the very least we can do is to ask others to be prepared to sacrifice the major portion of their incomes.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, I believe, suggested a ceiling of from $12,000 to $15,000. I am satisfied that if people could be guaranteed an income of $15,000 during the war, making allowance for a steeply graduated income tax from the low income brackets up to $15,000, such people should indeed consider themselves lucky. I have often stated in this house that if any man can go through this war and maintain his pre-war savings intact and maintain a fair standard of living, being no worse off at the end of the war than at the start, he should consider himself indeed fortunate and should not be allowed to accumulate large holdings of bonds, as is being done at the present time. I believe also that in order that we may have a more equitable condition in this country, a comprehensive programme of social services should be introduced. When we heard the programme referred to by Mr. Nash, and when we read of various other programmes of social services in other countries throughout the world, I think we should justly feel that there is much to be done in that regard in Canada.

I believe that the soldiers from the last war can justly demand that greater consideration be given their problems in the future. When we take into consideration that widows of disability pensioners to-day are still in many cases on relief, receiving no pension, and when we remember that many a soldier settler from the last war is living to-day in poverty and destitution, I think we can feel that much can be done with regard to these men.

All the things to which I have referred should be put into operation at the very earliest possible date, and I submit that the government should give a definite assurance to the people that better conditions will be brought about at the end of the war. The men in the active service forces are entitled to that assurance now; but the members of the group to which I belong are not going to refuse to agree to the removal of the overseas limitation from the mobilization bill until that is done. The plebiscite gives the government a free hand in that regard, and the fact that we are doing the men overseas an injustice now by not having conscription of wealth is no reason why we should add to that injustice by refusing to guarantee them reinforcements for overseas service.

Mr. LIONEL BERTRAND (Terrebonne) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, last February, I opposed in this house, to the indignation of certain people in my province, the holding of the plebiscite foreshadowed in the speech from the throne. I held that the government, commanding an unprecedented majority in the house, would thereby merely give ground in the face of a group less interested in national unity than in the passing of conscription for overseas service. I have not changed my views on the subject. I also held that in the event of an affirmative vote the pressure exerted by certain cabinet ministers and members, as well as by the opposition and the imperialists and their newspapers, would be so strong, so hard to counter that the government could not long refrain from resorting to such conscription. I predicted moreover that the plebiscite would inevitably lead to overseas conscription, and that such a measure would destroy national unity and hamper our war effort.

The plebiscite was held. Discussion on the subject was not uniform in tenor throughout the country. In every province but Quebec, the need of a total war effort was stressed to the people. The speeches given by certain ministers are ample evidence that they considered conscription for overseas service as the natural corollary of an affirmative vote. And the opposition shared their view.

In Quebec, an affirmative reply was sought on the basis that such a vote would prevent conscription. Quebec voted in the negative. Had Quebec voted otherwise, are we not justified in presuming, at the present rapid pace of events, that Bill No. 80 would have been introduced on the very evening of the vote? The very next day the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was already asking the government to act. And now, hardly seven weeks after voting day, the measure is under discussion. Bill No. 80, if passed, will establish the principle of conscription for overseas service. Apparently the measure is considered urgent!

Mr. Speaker, I shall speak my mind freely, for I am conscious that in doing so I am fulfilling my duty. I oppose Bill No. 80 and shall vote against it. In February, I voted against the plebiscite which I termed mere camouflage; to-day I oppose this measure which proves to me how right I was in condemning the plebiscite. Bill No. 80 is a piece of anti-national legislation because its passing will imperil if not destroy this embryo of unity to which years of understanding and concessions had begun to give shape. The measure is useless, Mr. Speaker, if it is true that the voluntary enlistment system is adequate for our needs, and it would be nothing short of superfluous to demonstrate that only such a system can give to our war effort its maximum efficiency. And if I oppose this bill after opposing the plebiscite, if the province of Quebec shares the same view, if all those who voted negatively think the same way, it is certainly not because I, any more than they, am opposed to the war effort or a traitor to the British crown, as the imperialistic press would have us believe.

The province of Quebec voted no on the plebiscite. This she was entitled to do, as were all voters in Canada, French Canadian or otherwise, who shared the same opinion. At the moment, however, it would appear that the imperialists and their newspapers are reserving their fire for Quebec and Quebec only.

I do not countenance separatist views, Mr. Speaker. I consider that Quebec cannot live apart in this confederation, no more than any of our other provinces could. I do not favour nationalism based on racial prejudice, for my conception of true nationalism embraces the entire country.

But the time has arrived, I believe, to restate certain questions. This in no way applies to the English-speaking voters in my constituency who, while holding their own views, have long since learned to respect their French-speaking fellow citizens, nor to those English Canadians who have unceasingly cooperated with their fellow citizens of French descent in the moulding of a greater and better Canada. Rather does it apply to a group of Canadians, mostly by adoption, whose sympathies are not here but across the seas. To them I say that national unity has always been maintained in this country, not because all provinces made equal concessions but because Quebec was the only one to make them. Her kindness, tolerance and good will were well known. Because she never refused, the imperialists made hay while the sun shone. Because she granted their every request, they paid her homage; less because she deserved it than because she placed no obstacle in their path to domination and autocracy. Now that Quebec has voted no on the plebiscite, she has immediately become the unworthy province, the treacherous province, the one to be feared.

We are little understood, Mr. Speaker. It is no doubt due to the negative answer given by Quebec on the plebiscite that Mr. Carson, made the following statement at the eighty-third annual meeting of the Grand Lodge for western Ontario, held in Toronto on May 27 last:

As members of the Orange order, we are not willing to see this great country pass under the control of such a reactionary power as the Roman Catholic church, of that kind of a Catholic church which is to be found in French Canada. The fullest consideration should be given to the steps necessary to meet this insidious menace coming from the province of Quebec and which threatens the British and protestant character of this dominion.

Such a statement, Mr. Speaker, proves both the blind fanaticism of its author and his ignorance of Canadian history. The reverend Mr. Shields, who should have been interned long since, for he has more than any one Canadian raised prejudices to foster antagonism toward Quebec on the part of the English-speaking provinces, is unceasing in his attacks upon our province, our clergy and our institutions. Is all this conducive to national unity? Is national unity fostered in any way by the insults coming from the imperialistic press in this country and having Quebec for target? Are all these people ignorant of the fact that no other province shows greater tolerance, greater benevolence, yea, greater love for minorities than does the province of Quebec. This disposition has its root in our hospitable nature, our wish for good understanding, our spirit of charity in keeping with the teachings of our clergy. We have no reason to be ashamed of our tolerance toward minorities. They who would sow the seed of prejudice should at least have some knowledge of the history of the country in which they live: they might mend their ways. If there are extremists in my province, I certainly condemn them as I condemn extremists in other provinces. If others knew us better they would soon find out that we have never ceased to be loyal subjects of the British crown.

Of course, French Canadians will always remain a minority in this country. Even if a generous birth-rate is constantly increasing their number, immigration will always be a compensating factor. Besides, they do not seek to become masters in the land, but they do hold to their fair share of sunlight, being fully convinced that they had something to do with settling and developing this country.

We were the first to come here. When England, in 1760, took from France one of the fairest colonies of that time, we accepted defeat, but we did not accept to be deprived of our rights. If I have reason to state to-night that England granted privileges to my people, I know I make no mistake in stating that even in practising our religion and in speaking our tongue we have never been guilty of treason to the British crown.

Moreover, history is witness to our cooperation. Less than fifteen years after the conquest, in 1775, French Canadians stood by England, at the behest of Monsignor Briand, then Bishop of Quebec. Our people turned a deaf ear to the English from New England seeking their own independence, yea, even to France who, bent on revenge, had joined the revolutionary cause.

The war of 1812 between England and the United States furnished another proof of our loyalty. The third route of invasion—through the Richelieu valley leading to Montreal—was defended by our own people. Led by de Salaberry at Châteauguay, outnumbered fifteen to one, so staunch and so brave was their resistance that the American army was forced to retreat.

Should one claim that in 1837 there was a revolt in Quebec, I would reply that this revolt was, in its way, a demand for the recognition of disregarded rights, similar in every respect to that which Ontario loyalists organized about the same time when they went on to attack the Toronto city hall for the selfsame purpose of obtaining redress. It is possible to condemn certain excesses, to condemn certain attitudes, without condemning at the same time the misuse of power which brought them on.

Was there in 1918 any regiment which brought more glory to itself than the 22nd, exclusively made up of Canadians of French descent? And in the present war, have French Canadians been remiss in their duty, have they refused to do their part? How many of our people are now under arms on active service? Have we refused to cooperate in any war service? Have we declined to help England and the united nations? Have we been opposed to the war effort?

And, in the mind of certain people, Quebec would represent a threat to the British empire, to the security of the country! They would tag us as anti-British because we decline to accept the principle of conscription for overseas service. I should be a traitor to the empire because, as a Canadian, I condemn a measure destined to destroy national unity in Canada, a British country. A traitor, because in a free country I enjoy the right of holding an opinion freely and because I state it? Not traitors, Mr. Speaker, but authentic Canadians, for our first love goes to our own country.

I intend voting against Bill No. 80 because it confers upon the government unlimited powers. We are asked by the proposed legislation to remove section 3 from the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, a clause which prevented the government from conscripting men for service outside Canada. If this bill is adopted the government will be authorized to send troops to any part of the world. One might object that although the government will be free to exercise this power, it is possible that they may never do so. If the government do not avail themselves of this authority or intend to do so, what purpose will this bill serve save that of dividing Canada for years to come? If the government does avail itself of this authorization, will the consequences be less serious? I consider that voting for this bill is equivalent to giving the government a blank cheque; I feel that such a procedure is fraught with danger or, even reprehensible in private life, it is no less so in public affairs. Once article 3 is struck out, the government, in possession of sufficient power, will be in a position to adopt conscription, by order in council, at any time, without consulting parliament. I protest against this abusive use of authority with added vehemence due to the fact that the trainees under the 1940 act will immediately become subject to be sent overseas to any part of the world; I protest against this abuse of power, because we have no right to conscript for other fronts trainees who have been drafted on the promise that their energies would be expended for the defence of Canada only.

This is probably the last opportunity we will have of denouncing conscription for overseas. This method is repellent to our legitimate pride. We of Quebec are averse to any idea of compulsion in the line of sacrifice and duty. During the last three centuries, our ancestors fought the Iroquois and then the forest and the unproductive soil; they dedicated themselves to the accomplishment of this momentous task; their efforts were put forth not so much for their own sake as for the sake of the generations to come. This fact binds us so closely to the Canadian soil that we cannot conceive, even for a moment, that our country might extend outside of Canada. Could it be within the power, even of imperialists, to sever us from our soil, to which we are so deeply attached? For our Canadian homeland, for its defence, we shall stop at no sacrifice, we shall give our last dollar, our life blood, even our lives.

The people of Quebec are averse to conscription for overseas because they have not forgotten 1917. Our small people may have struck from their memory many facts that have deeply wounded them at various times, but they have never and will never forgot that in 1917, conscription was a political manœuvre directly applied against them and their province. The mistakes against Quebec and its people during the last war have been both serious and exasperating, for the enlistment officers have systematically refused to acknowledge the pride felt by a sensitive ethnical group on account of their special characteristics.

Once again, conscription would be adopted by imperialists, enforced by them and used to their selfish ends. What measure of fairness could we expect when so much unfairness has already been perpetrated? How much consideration could Quebec command? How much consideration could the large families command—and they are all in Quebec—when, at the present time, the methods of enlistment for the defence of our country, do not take this fact into account?

Conscription for service overseas would be a colossal mistake; it would even be a disgrace for our territorial defence forces. Would Canada then enjoy sufficient protection? Is she in a position to cope with an invasion threat when her vast territory borders on two oceans? Has enough thought been given to her position? What has Australia done? During two years she has sent the very best of her soldiers to battlefronts all over the world; to-day, left without enough troops to face the danger, she is calling for reinforcements. What a sad mistake and also what a lesson!

Conscription for overseas service would be a crime because it is unnecessary. The ministers have told us many times during the last six months that the voluntary system of enlistment was adequate. Has there been any sudden failure of that system? Has it been advertised as much as it could have been? Has every effort been made to ensure its success? Have not certain imperialistic circles endeavoured to hinder the voluntary system of enlistment? Have they not dealt with it carelessly, for the sole purpose of forcing the government to resort eventually to conscription? If the voluntary system does not yield enough men, let the government take whatever means may be necessary to stimulate it. Let the government increase the allowances to the volunteers' dependents. Let them give more opportunities for promotion, so that military life may become a permanent career instead of a temporary avocation. Let voluntary service be made interesting, and the voluntary system will be adequate. The expenditure of a few more millions in order to ensure the success of the voluntary system would not be extravagant at a time when billions of dollars are being spent. What if the government were to pay a few more millions in dependents' allowances to maintain the voluntary system, which is the basis of our national unity and our war effort?

The champions of imperialism, be they tories or grits, want conscription for overseas service. They want it and they brush aside every objection. Remind them that the population of this country is only 11 million, that is three persons per square mile, as compared with 43 in the United States and 489 in England, they still want conscription. Tell them that out of five and a half million men in Canada, two million are under 17 or over 70, they want it just as badly. Tell them that over a million men are under arms, that there remain perhaps one million and a half for the factories, and the farms, without taking into account those who are unfit for military service, or those who are sick or crippled, they still want conscription. Why do they want it? Could they explain why they want it?

But we do know why we do not want conscription for overseas service. We do not want it because, in our opinion, that kind of conscription is more for the defence of the empire than for the defence of my country. My opposition to this bill is not a protest against Canada's war effort, but a protest against imperialism which seeks to dictate a policy to my country. History repeats itself. During each war, the champions of imperialism display more love for England than for Canada, and that provokes us. In this war, despite the fact that in 1940 all political parties stated their opposition to conscription for overseas service, the same imperialistic group from Toronto, the same small clique reappears on the scene. We are against that kind of conscription just as Australia, South Africa and Northern Ireland have opposed it. Why should we, as Canadians, accept it? Is there a province of Quebec in any of those countries?

We are primarily in favour of a truly Canadian war effort. Of course we are willing to help the allies win this war. We have spent huge sums, we have contributed in many ways, we have even made an outright gift of one billion dollars—or nearly $100 for each citizen of this country—as a further evidence of our sincerity. In those staggering expenditures, which are perhaps larger, in proportion to our population, than those of Great Britain or the United States, we French Canadians have also had a part. We have in this war shouldered the burden of taxation, accepted our share of the common sacrifices as well as every restriction, contributed in every field of the war effort—army, navy and air force—our voluntary and unstinted cooperation. What we have been asked to do we have done. We have contributed to all war services. The national debt is growing to such a size that perhaps we will never get out of it. Along with all other Canadians, we have not stayed behind. But the constituency of Terrebonne and its member will never agree to such a useless, autocratic and antinational measure as conscription for overseas service.

I will vote against the bill. I have been elected to do my duty and so I will. But I have a right to ask myself: "Whither the Liberal party?" Owing to its wild nonsense and its misuse of authority in 1917, the Conservative party could only be a party which lacked life-giving breath; in the province of Quebec it has long been dead and cremated. The Liberal party had always preached a doctrine which took its inspiration at the very source of the true Canadian spirit. People had put their trust in it. My constituents had faith in the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Even to-day, they cannot imagine the Liberal party obliterating from our history with a stroke of the pen all its political prestige and disrupting this national unity which has always been its objective and its ideal; my constituents cannot conceive of the Prime Minister destroying or allowing to be destroyed, for the benefit of an imperialist clique, the essentially Canadian policies which he had championed and out of which he derived the sway and brilliancy of his parliamentary career; after so many years of boundless confidence, they feel repugnance to ask themselves: "Now that the old parties have deceived us, whom shall we trust?"

They will be told that the bill is but a confirmation of the general result of the plebiscite, that it does not entail conscription, that the government will impose conscription only if circumstances require, and may perhaps never do so. Unfortunately, my constituents no longer believe such promises.

As a member of this house, as a citizen of this country, I do not look upon myself as a French Canadian but simply as a Canadian. I am a Canadian who speaks French. A Roman Catholic Canadian. The fact that I speak French and that I am a Catholic does not prevent my loving Canada and admiring Great Britain. But my first duty is to my country. I want the allies to win, I favour help to Great Britain and the united nations in the form of money, food, munitions and volunteers but I deny imperialism the right to thrust orders and leadership upon us. In this most solemn hour of its history, I feel that I am serving, not betraying my country, in voting against this measure of conscription for overseas which, in addition to doing a disservice to the allies, will make Canada a hotbed of mistrust, sterile wrangling, fruitless effort and sham cooperation. What mischievous blows the imperialist coterie has dealt our war effort.

Mr. EUGENE DUROCHER (St. James) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the matter which is now before the house is so serious and important that it is our bounden duty to discuss it in all possible moderation, without bitterness or rancour, but solely from a national standpoint, taking into account the war effort we have already accomplished and what we were planning to do before the government introduced the proposed amendment for the repeal of section 3 of the mobilization act of 1940.

As we all know, that section empowers the government to require persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces only within Canada and its territorial waters. It was passed only after long discussions and in order to meet the wishes of the various elements in the Canadian parliament, and its purpose was to safeguard our national unity.

That act seemed to appease all minds and it stimulated in no small degree our war effort as regards our production, which was so much needed in Europe. It has been said on various occasions that we should have a total war effort. May I say at this time that however great our effort may have been so far, it could have been still greater if our factories had been allowed to produce to their utmost capacity. Unfortunately, they have been prevented from doing so, against our own will, for well known reasons which I deem better not to mention in this house, but which, nevertheless, discredited our war effort in Quebec even though we were in no way responsible. If the proposed amendment is passed, shall not the door be opened wide to conscription for overseas service, a policy which we have always opposed? If the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will permit me, I should like to quote the following excerpt from his radio address of April 7, 1942:

> The pledge not to impose conscription, as every one knows, was the result of Canada's experience in the last war. The way in which conscription was then introduced, and the way it was enforced, gave rise to bitter resentment. Moreover, events proved that conscription in the last war had little or no military value.
> The pledge not to impose conscription for service overseas was given in order to maintain the unity of Canada. Without this assurance, I do not believe that parliament would have given, as it did, prompt and wholehearted approval to Canada's entry into the war.

Do we now intend to destroy this national unity so persistently advocated and to dampen the enthusiasm which has never faltered from the very beginning?

Further, the Prime Minister goes on to say:

> The truth, of course, is that our army to-day is just as large as it would have been if conscription for overseas had been adopted.

If our war effort has in no way been limited by our not applying conscription, why not, as the saying goes, leave well enough alone? If the voluntary system has given such satisfactory results, for Heaven's sake, let us keep it, let us improve it if we can, but let us not spoil through any legislation or any amendment of an existing statute the good effects of the present system.

Throughout the campaign preceding the plebiscite vote, the Prime Minister, the ministers from Quebec as well as those from the other provinces and the members of parliament almost to a man unequivocally stated that the question of the plebiscite was in no way linked up with that of conscription. Nevertheless, as was so well stated by the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) in his speech of the 11th instant, on the very day after the vote, even before the votes had been counted, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) rose in the house and made the following statement to be found on page 1921 of Hansard for April 28, 1942. I quote:

> Now there is no stumbling block, real or imaginary, to total war. The hour has struck when every human and material resource must be mobilized for war service. Parliament now is free to act—there are no fetters upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or his government.

The leader of the opposition, however, had stated some time before in the house that it was impossible for him to put conscription on the banner of the Conservative party because that measure was not popular; he stated also that he had received numerous letters from mothers stating that they had not raised their sons to have them conscripted and this explains how it was that a movement was on foot, a few days later, to oust him out as leader of the opposition. This statement has displeased the ultra-imperialist members of his party.

We have also the oft repeated statements of the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National War Services and others, setting forth officially that the voluntary enlistment system is giving fully adequate results. If we accept these statements as being made in good faith, why are we called upon now to strike out of the National Resources Mobilization Act the only clause which enabled us to make certain pledges and declarations to the voters at the last election? I well remember having had the honour of greeting in my constituency, during the electoral campaign of March 1940, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, who repeated the following statement which I quote:

> I shall never be a member of a cabinet which introduces a measure calling for conscription for overseas service.

This statement was repeated by every minister and member of the house who took part in the campaign in Quebec. We made the most solemn pledges to our electors and only they could free us from our obligations. And if the purpose of the plebiscite is being deliberately distorted to-day as an expression of public opinion in favour of conscription for overseas service, the only ones who are in a position to accept such a verdict are the members whose constituents recorded a majority of affirmative votes. What of the others? Like most of the Quebec members, they have not been released from their pledges. The voters of Quebec have once again shown most clearly their unalterable opposition to any amendment to the present legislation which would empower the cabinet to impose at discretion, by order in council and without consulting parliament, that conscription for overseas service which has been held up to us as a bogey for over twenty-five years by all political parties without exception.

We are being asked to expand our war effort in Canada, to furnish more airplanes, more ships and more munitions. How can we possibly do this if the labour necessary to such an end is conscripted from our plants? Let us not forget that we are already exempting farmers' sons, teachers, certain classes of students, the clergy and conscientious objectors, fishermen and lumbermen. Does this then mean that our cities will be called upon to supply all the men needed in the armed forces? Does it mean that conscientious objectors, who are able to bear arms, can invoke the privileges granted to them by the country and take refuge behind a principle, in order not to contribute to the war effort in the same measure as the rest of their fellow citizens?

No group or section of this house have attempted to influence my stand concerning this matter. Already at the partial election held in Saint James constituency, in 1939, as well as during the 1940 campaign, I stated unequivocally and without restriction, that, confident in my leaders, I opposed compulsory enlistment for overseas service; my views in this regard have not altered. Allow me to quote an article published a few days ago, in one of our English Canadian newspapers:

> Conscription is an ugly expression. It conveys the idea of compulsion and it is one of the worst words in the English language. It should be replaced by something nicer, perhaps general military training. This would sound better in the ears of a generation who prefers to keep fit rather than fat.

[Mr. Durocher.]

Could anyone state, in this house, that our war effort is not as complete as it should be, when one of our leaders has acknowledged that voluntary service has been more efficient than compulsory enlistment could ever have been; when, in our factories, we have everywhere exceeded the objectives set for our production? To mention but one case, I may state that, in the course of a visit by a number of members of parliament, on June 13, to the Canadian Car munitions plant at Saint Paul L'Ermite, we were informed that the weekly objective of 9,000 shells had been more than doubled and that, at the present time, that plant alone supplies, every week, more than 18,000 shells of all sizes. Have we not done our share of the war effort when this house has unanimously consented to give Great Britain munitions and supplies to the amount of one billion dollars and when, furthermore, we are willing to lend the mother country $750,000,000 without interest for the duration? All this, Mr. Speaker, in a country whose population is less than 12 million inhabitants. What other British dominion has made such a tremendous war contribution in men, munitions, supplies and money? What other British dominion has adopted conscription for overseas service? On two separate occasions a bill of this nature has been rejected in Australia and neither India, New Zealand, South Africa, nor Northern Ireland have ever countenanced such a measure.

Until now, Quebec has done its full share in every field of endeavour. Have we forgotten that the very first regiment to be brought to full active force for overseas service is a French-Canadian regiment, the Régiment de Maisonneuve?

Have we not subscribed generously and even oversubscribed our share of the war loans? Have not the workers in our plants, both men and women, produced beyond expectation?

Let us face the facts squarely and ask ourselves if a change in the system would bring better results?

The Labour World reported the following quotation by E. M. Little, director of the national selective service, in its edition of May 23, 1942:

> Every battle the united nations have lost in two and a half years was lost in the factory. Without exception there is the story from Norway to Bataan. When we Canadians get this seared into our minds as it has been in the minds of the defeated peoples of half a world, there will be no need for compulsion in organizing our man-power.

"Give us the tools," exclaimed Churchill, and we have responded generously in producing more than was expected of us. We supplied the tools and the men. Is it not a fact that voluntary enlistments for overseas had reached in December last the substantial figure of 422,000 men, which must now be nearer the 500,000 mark.

We entered the war freely and we shall keep on doing our share.

In the last few days, conditions have changed and the war is getting nearer to us. The Japanese have already set foot on American territory. Let us then do nothing likely to divide Canada or to slow down our war effort.

Let us prepare to meet any attack by the enemy. Let us not forget Hong Kong, Singapore. Let us remember Australia, who when she was attacked had to send an S.O.S. to London but to no avail.

The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) unwittingly defined our policy when he stated, as reported at page 3291 of Hansard:

> The decision on this question was taken out of my hands. It was made for me by an authority that I acknowledge to be my superior and to whom I owe a very willing obedience. It has been decided by the high court of the electors of the riding from which I come.

I take the same position. Having received an affirmative vote on the plebiscite, the hon. member considers himself bound to support the measure now before the house; my own electors having refused to relieve me of my past commitments, I must oppose any change in the Mobilization Act calling for compulsory enlistment for overseas service.

As the former minister of Public Works has said, should the proposed amendment be allowed to pass without debate or protest, it would be too late to protest later on. For this motive, Mr. Speaker, I regret my inability to accept the amendment to the Mobilization Act introduced in the house.

Mr. G. T. FULFORD (Leeds): It was at first with a bit of hesitation that I decided to enter this debate on what has become now the famous Bill No. 80. However, I feel that I would have been remiss in my duty had I not taken the opportunity to express to this house my views on the subject.

My very first recollections of the city of Ottawa are among my most treasured and prized memories, because as a child I remember being driven through a blinding snowstorm to the home of the late Sir Wilfrid and Lady Laurier. As I grew older I had the rare opportunity to repeat those visits, and it was through the influence of the great chieftain that I came to love my native land, my Canada, as I do. It was through the influence of—I was going to say the greatest—certainly one of the greatest of all Canadians that I came to know, to respect, to admire my French compatriots, my fellow-Canadian citizens, to respect their traditions, to know their culture and something of their home life and their deep religious feeling. I therefore feel that I know my French compatriots a little better perhaps than do some other English members, and I hope that with that knowledge goes a large degree of understanding and tolerance.

(Text) It has always been a great source of pride to me as a Canadian to realize that this vast dominion of ours is composed of the two great races, the Anglo-Saxon and the French, each speaking his own language and each trying in a very difficult situation to keep this country united. Never was there a time when this need was more felt. I do not know of any monument quite like the one to Montcalm and Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham. To me it is the very essence of Canadian nationhood. It shows how two great races can and must and will live together in complete unity and harmony. True, we have had our differences. Unfortunately, we are having a difference right now; but have we ever known great friends who have not argued, who have not had their differences, and who afterwards have not become closer friends? I think that is an axiom of life.

In Europe the little country of Switzerland is even more complex in its make-up than are we. Although that country in size is hardly any larger than a good sized Ontario county, nevertheless there are four distinct sections in it. In one section Italian is spoken; just along the shores of lac Léman one finds French. By far the largest section of Switzerland speaks German, and one tiny little corner speaks what is known as Romanish, which is said by linguists to resemble ancient Latin more than any modern language. Yet Switzerland demonstrates the principles of true democracy better than any other European country even before the war? To-day it is the only democracy left on the European continent. Some may say that in Switzerland this is easy because the country is so small, but it is not so easy to keep it unified because of vast mountain ranges separating the various sections. For instance, to get from the French section along the shores of lac Léman one has to go through Simplon tunnel, under one of the highest spurs of the Alps. When one comes into the tunnel one hears only French spoken; when one emerges from the tunnel fifteen minutes later one hears only Italian. One sees a difference in the complexion of the people. Yet that seems to make no difference. I think that when we have our little differences, as we do, we can well look to Switzerland as an example and remember that through thick and thin that little country has stayed a democracy; it has stayed unified and has defied all Europe—Napoleon, Hitler and the rest—to conquer it.

In 1937 I was privileged to visit the European continent. It was a rare opportunity because I doubt whether one will ever see Europe again as it was in those years. Certain aspects of European life I hope we shall never see again, but it is quite evident that the Europe that has survived for centuries, until 1939, will never be the same again. It is hard to visualize how peaceful the countries were through which we passed. Holland sat back quite confident that because of its complicated system of dykes and dams it could never be invaded by the Germans; that it might be bombed from the air but that it could never be invaded by the army. Well, Holland was one of the first European countries to fall. Brave little Belguim, which relied so much on its marvellously trained army and its system of superior fortifications, and on the Albert canal, did not last much longer after the Netherlands fell. And then France. Who would have thought that the valorous and courageous French, with their "liberté, égalité, fraternité", would have fallen under the heel of the German hordes? Yet France fell.

We see countries who are to-day fighting, presumably on the side of Germany, who are in reality no better off than the conquered nations. Take Austria. When I was in Austria in 1937 that country was in a period of frustration. They knew something was going to happen, though they did not know what. They dreaded Germany; they distrusted the Germans, and they were the very first to feel the effects of all the might of Hitler's monsters. Czechoslovakia was well aware of what was going to happen and was well prepared. Time and again they warned us what would happen, but the warnings went unheeded. The fortifications of Czechoslovakia were second to none in the world; they had built great armaments; and yet we allowed their warnings to go. There was nothing but complacency. Unless one has been in the fascist and nazi countries it is impossible to realize just what they are like. How would you like to be spat upon just because you were driving with a licence bearing the British sign—"G.B."? That is what happened to us. In Germany you dared not speak your mind; you felt you were constantly being watched; wherever you turned you saw the dreaded swastika. The country was at that time armed to the teeth.

[Mr. Fulford.]

You did not have to be a member of the intelligence branch of the British army or any other army to see what was going on; it was right before you—armies on the march, columns of mechanized forces travelling along the magnificent highways at fifty to sixty miles an hour, when the world was fooling itself saying that Germany could not use mechanized forces because they had artificial rubber and the tires would burn up if they travelled more than twenty-five miles an hour. I remember hearing that when I was in Great Britain. And Britain herself, brave Britain, hoping and thinking wishfully that this world conflict, this armageddon could be staved off.

I mention these facts because they all have a bearing on the present situation. Are we completely and entirely alive even to-day in Canada to the war situation? I had an opportunity of speaking with an intimate friend and close business associate from Shanghai who was on furlough in Canada last December and who, incidentally, arrived back in Shanghai just before the Japanese seized the city. He told me tales of the cruelty of the Japanese that would make one's blood run cold. One night for an hour he told of one atrocity after another until I had to tell him to stop; I could not stand it any more. It was cruelty beyond belief. All the things he said are substantiated in a series of articles now appearing in the Saturday Evening Post entitled, "I Escaped from Hong Kong" by Jan Henrik Marsman. It shows us in Canada what we are up against. Someone might say, "these are all places far away"; but what has happened in Europe, what is happening in Asia, can happen here. What does it mean? It means that if we, along with our allies, are not successful in defeating the forces of evil, we stand to lose our language, our religion, our freedom of thought, our courts of law, our rights of assembly, in fact everything we have come to consider nearest and dearest.

This brings me to the point where I feel that the government has to have the right to employ conscription. I agree with the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Durocher) that conscription is a nasty word, one of the most disagreeable in our language. Nevertheless we might as well call a spade a spade; this is a blitzkrieg, a lightning war; we do not know when or where the axis forces will strike next. Our government must have the right to conscript men for military service if and when the time arrives that reinforcements are necessary for those who have so valiantly and bravely offered their lives for their country.

One could not hear the sincere and impassioned remarks of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) without being touched. I do not think there was an

hon. member in this house who did not appreciate what it meant to that hon. gentleman to say what he did. But there were two or three things with which I could not agree. He spoke of the necessity of impressing upon the French Canadians the reasons for sending men to the battle-front. I could see the point of that up to the time of this war. But on the day Germany entered Poland, September 1, 1939, our thought had, of necessity, to change. This is not "England's war"—I use an old familiar phrase—this is humanity's war. This is not Canada's war; this is a war for survival of the democratic nations and of democratic principles in the world. We do not have to appeal to reason to know this; the facts are before us; we cannot miss them.

Then the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères stated that for many years the province of Quebec had been told that conscription would never again be enforced. Those statements were made by all shades of political opinion in all sincerity. But was not the world told for an equal length of time that there would never be another war? The world has had to change its opinion. It took Dunkirk really to arouse the United Kingdom. Then on top of Dunkirk came the frightful nights of blitzkrieg over the city of London and, in fact, all over the British isles, horrors of which none of us can know anything unless he has been through such a blitzkrieg. It took Pearl Harbour to awaken the United States. They are fully aware of the danger now, and they have a universal national selective draft in that country. In that connection, the one thing that Americans point the accusing finger at Canada about is the fact that they have conscription and we have not. They do not understand what a magnificent job this country has done, and they will not understand until this country is given the right to enforce conscription at such time as it is deemed necessary. Let us reverently pray that it will not take a Dunkirk or an air blitz over Ottawa or another Pearl Harbour to awaken Canada. In addition, we have Hong Kong to remember and avenge. To-day Canada is not alone in this war, as far as north America is concerned; we have been joined by Mexico and the United States. We were first in this war, and we have to show them that in proportion we are going to do the best job. That is one thing for which Canadians are noted; when they start something they always finish it.

I do not intend to argue whether the plebiscite was right or wrong, but the fact remains that eight of the nine provinces voted "yes." In my own riding the "yes" vote was 86 per cent; in my own town of Brockville it was 89 per cent, and in Gananoque, the other urban municipality in the riding, it was 93 per cent. I know whereof I speak when I say that by far the great majority of the people in the riding who voted "yes" did so with the thought that they were voting for some sort of conscription. The exact wording of the question on the ballot paper was:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

I grant you, sir, that there was nothing in that to make one believe he was voting either for or against conscription; but the fact remains that no matter what my revered leader, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or his ministers or I had to say, the feeling was that when the voters marked an X opposite "yes" they were voting for conscription. At this point I should like to give credit to two organizations that were of the greatest help in getting out the vote—the Canadian Legion and certain labour unions in the town in which I live. The Canadian Legion made a point of attending all the meetings held throughout the riding; they organized car drivers, provided speakers at meetings, and saw that the largest possible number of voters got out. That may serve to indicate how the people conceived the idea that they were voting on conscription, because everyone in Canada knows how the legion feels on the subject of national selective service. Personally I am in favour of conscription, in spite of the fact that it proved to be a failure in the last war. I consider it to be by far the fairest, most equitable and surest way of raising an army or of obtaining reinforcements. On February 3, 1942, when I was speaking in this house I mentioned a telephone call that I had received from one of the members of the committee of two hundred; and these words, which appear at page 272 of Hansard, I think set forth my position very clearly:

> Some weeks ago I was telephoned by a member of the committee of two hundred which was meeting in Toronto with the alleged object of advancing Canada's war effort. I was asked if I favoured the policies advocated by this committee. I said in reply that if what they were after was national selective service with complete mobilization of all our man-power and resources, I was heartily behind them, but that if it was only conscription of men for overseas service, I was diametrically opposed to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the hon. member referring to a previous debate which took place during this session?

Mr. FULFORD: Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not believe that is in order.

Mr. FULFORD: Then I can serve the same purpose by saying that I have stated previously that I am unequivocally in favour of conscription of man-power along with conscription of resources. Nearly half a million young Canadians have decided that the best way to keep this war from our shores is to fight our enemies abroad, three thousand miles away. Their deeds, when recorded in history, will make every Canadian proud of the country of his birth. We cannot let these young men down. They must have adequate reinforcements. Fortunately, up to date our army casualties have been very light, simply because our men have not been in the fore-front of battle. The day will come, however, when the continent of Europe will be invaded. Then reinforcements will be needed, and then, after Bill No. 80 is passed, the government will have to decide whether it is necessary to raise men for reinforcements by conscription. I must congratulate the Prime Minister upon the method he has devised to meet the situation. We are actually debating conscription now; but if the time should come when it is found necessary to enforce conscription, then it can be applied by order in council, thereby relieving this house and the country of the pain of having old wounds reopened and new hard feelings created.

I have no alternative; I must follow the dictates of my conscience. I must support Bill No. 80 and, sir, I urge all to do likewise. I urge this for the sake of Canada, for the sake of the empire, for the sake of civilization and humanity.

On motion of Mr. Howe the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, June 16, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) moved:

That the second report of the special committee on land settlement of veterans of the present war, presented on June 12 last, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Fulford.]

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

REPORT ON DETENTIONS FOR THE PERIOD MAY 18 TO JUNE 15, 1942

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I lay on the table of the house a report pursuant to paragraph 3 of regulation 21 of the Defence of Canada Regulations, showing (a) the number of persons detained under orders made pursuant to these regulations from May 18 to June 15, 1942, inclusive, namely 125, of whom 124 are Japanese; (b) the number of cases in which the Minister of Justice declined to follow the advice of any advisory committee appointed under regulation 22 from May 18 to June 15, 1942, inclusive—nil.

PRIVATE BILLS

SAGUENAY TRANSMISSION COMPANY, SAGUENAY ELECTRIC COMPANY AND ALUMINUM POWER COMPANY

Mr. J. E. A. DUBUC (Chicoutimi) moved the first reading of Bill No. 99 (from the senate) respecting certain transmission and distribution lines of Saguenay Transmission Company, Limited, Saguenay Electric Company and Aluminum Power Company, Limited.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. DUBUC: These lines, which have been in existence for a number of years, are mostly on rivers which were regarded as not navigable, and it was therefore considered that special permission was not required. That has been contested of late, and it has been suggested that, no matter whether rivers are navigable or not, in order to cross them with transmission lines it is necessary to have special permission from Ottawa. That is why this bill has been introduced, although, as I have stated, these works were constructed a number of years ago.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 100, for the relief of Barbara Patricia Strange Wolfe.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 101, for the relief of Bella Miller Keller.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 102, for the relief of Effie Euphemia Shannon Monette.—Mr. Boucher.

Bill No. 103, for the relief of Elsie May Cape Newman.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 104, for the relief of Bella White Wolfe.—Mr. McIlraith.

Bill No. 105, for the relief of Alan Swabey.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 106, for the relief of Jean Walker Creighton King.—Mr. Bercovitch.

Bill No. 107, for the relief of Alice Beatrice Armand Roberts.—Mr. Hanson (Skeena).

Bill No. 108, for the relief of Frederick William Merchant.—Mr. Hanson (Skeena).

Bill No. 109, for the relief of Irma Kern Ulrich.—Mr. Hanson (Skeena).

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he is now in a position to inform us when he will bring down the budget. May I point out to him that we have almost reached the end of the fifth month of the present session and the third month of the present fiscal year. The business interests and others in this country want to know what taxation position they have to face, and I think the budget should be brought down with the least possible delay.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I cannot say just what day, Mr. Speaker, but I think I shall be able to inform the house before the end of the present week.

BEEF

SHORTAGE OF SUPPLIES IN TORONTO DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I should like to ask a question which I was not able to transmit earlier to the Minister of Finance, but which he can probably answer in a day or two. There is a severe shortage of beef for the consuming public in the Toronto area, due to restrictions of the wartime prices and trade board, coupled with the fact that exports will begin again on the first of July at a much higher level than prevails under the ruling of the board, and also that army contracts are let at higher levels than the present price structure will permit for domestic consumption. Will the minister survey the situation with the wartime prices and trade board and say what is going to be done to assure a domestic supply of beef for the Toronto and Ontario areas?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I shall be glad to do that.

TRANSPORT CONTROL

EFFECT OF ORDER OF CONTROLLER UPON ROSELANDS-TORONTO BUS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I wish to ask a question of the Acting Minister of Transport or the Minister of Munitions and Supply concerning a matter of urgent public importance. I have received about twenty telegrams from users of the Roselands-Toronto bus line indicating that apparently some order has been issued by the local transport controller as a result of which users of that bus line are greatly worried. They do not know how they will get to and from Toronto. Perhaps the minister has some information which will relieve the minds of those residents.

Hon C. D. HOWE (Acting Minister of Transport): I have no information with regard to the situation that has been called to my attention. Of course an attempt is being made to eliminate unnecessary bus mileage. I will obtain information from the transport controller and advise my hon. friend.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

CONDITIONS AFFECTING MILK PRODUCTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I wish to direct to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture a question which I would have asked yesterday had I been here. The matter is of vital importance to my riding. In view of the threatened strike of milk producers, what action does the government intend taking to ensure a reasonable return to farmers in lieu of a milk subsidy?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be placed on the order paper.

[Later]:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I am quite sure Your Honour must have misunderstood the importance and the import of the question asked by the hon. member for Fraser Valley when you ruled that it was not of such urgency as to call for an answer by the minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to associate myself with the hon. member for Fraser Valley on this question. I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance, under whose department the wartime prices and trade board operates. There is an extremely urgent situation, particularly in the Toronto area, where a milk strike is threatened, and I think in the public interest we should have some comment from the minister with regard to a matter as serious as this. I would add my support to the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I wonder if the administration could not give some public enlightenment with respect to a matter so urgent and important.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Fraser Valley did not state his question quite in the form in which the hon. gentleman has put the matter. I did not gather that a strike was imminent, and I therefore ruled that the question was not properly one that should be asked on the orders of the day. If, however, the circumstances are as stated by the hon. member, and if there is in the Fraser Valley a situation similar to that which exists in the district to which the hon. member has just referred, I would consider the matter one that might require an answer from the minister now. I leave it to the minister.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I did not say that there might be a strike to-morrow in the Fraser Valley, but crossing Canada yesterday and to-day one could find in every newspaper—

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already left the matter with the minister. If he wishes to reply I have no objection.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): With regard to the Toronto situation, my colleague, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) brought to my attention the circumstances there. As regards these threatened strikes of farmers, I shall have to have some discussion with the food controller and the wartime prices and trade board. At the moment I am not in a position to make a further statement.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: When will that discussion take place?

Mr. SPEAKER: This is an illustration of the sort of question that is being asked on the orders of the day and which I have been ruling cannot properly be put at this time. Such a question necessitates consultation between the minister and officials and the minister is not in a position to reply at once. Such questions should be placed on the order paper.

GASOLINE

PRESS REPORTS AS TO PROBABLE REDUCTION IN VALUE OF RATION COUPONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): Would the Minister of Munitions and Supply care to make a supplementary statement implementing what has been said by the press of the country in connection with gasoline rationing? People are sending letters and telegrams, wondering what the new ruling is to be. The papers seem to have information.

[Mr. Graydon.]

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): To the best of my knowledge there is no foundation for the statements that have appeared in the press within the last forty-eight hours with regard to the gasoline situation. However, I have promised a statement, and I hope to be able to make it tomorrow, setting out the situation in full.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CASES DEALT WITH BY NATIONAL AND REGIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): In view of the interest that is being taken in the functions of the national war labour board and the regional boards, and the many inquiries received by the department, I thought it might be well if the number of cases dealt with were placed on record. The report of cases dealt with by regional war labour boards from December 1, 1941 to May 15, 1942, is as follows:

	Cases opened	Cases closed	Cases pending
P.E.I.	28	28	none
N.S.	140	130	10
N.B.	112	81	31
Que.	942	739	203
Ont.	1,392	1,380	12
Man.	383	369	14
Sask.	342	327	15
Alta.	363	203	160
B.C.	507	467	40
	4,209	3,724	485

In the case of the national war labour board, the figures are as follows:

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Monday, June 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) moved an amendment—

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I interrupt you, Mr. Speaker? I was wondering if this ruling could be postponed for one day. I was not in the house when the amendment was moved, and I have not had an opportunity to study it. I should be obliged if we could have a delay of twenty-four hours before your ruling is given. If it is asking too much I withdraw the request, but it would be a matter of some consideration to me if that course could be adopted.

Mr. SPEAKER: The request seems to be reasonable and I accede to it. I will give the ruling on the amendment to-morrow.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Since the beginning of the war it has not been my practice to take part in the debates of the house, apart from giving certain information about my department which seemed to be required in order to allow of decisions being reached. I have been entrusted with the task of mobilizing the activities of industry for war production, and I have concentrated all my time and thought on that particular problem.

I think that to-day we can claim that some progress has been made. I should like while I am on my feet to correct a statement that has been made frequently in the house, which I think conveys a seriously wrong impression. It has been stated that it is my job to accept such orders as are sent to me and have the munitions or supplies so ordered produced in Canada. That of course is wholly incorrect. My department is not a user, and we must find a user for the munitions that Canada does produce. However, we have studied the productive capacity of Canada; we have determined the things which could be made and which we think would be useful in the prosecution of the war, and we have set about finding the user who requires those things. By any other policy our munitions programme would not be nearly as far advanced as it is. I wish to make it clear that that has been our policy, and that if we have failed to bring industry into production in any particular, the fault lies largely with our department.

The reason I speak in this debate is that the discussion of the National Resources Mobilization Act is a discussion of Canada's man-power problem, and the man-power problem is vital to the work of my department, and to the carrying out of the commitments my department has made to the allied forces.

The real problem, as I see it, is how can we best use our total man-power towards the winning of the war, in the light of our responsibility to the united nations. This is not Canada's private war; Canada is one of a number of nations that are standing together to fight a war against a common enemy. We must of course have a balanced war programme, but we must give special emphasis to such matters as those in respect of which our geography and resources impose special obligations. For example the geography and climate of Canada are particularly suited to the training of airmen, and we have devoted our efforts very largely in that direction. Some 10,000 aeroplanes are now being used in that programme, and a steady stream of pilots and airmen is being sent from this country to the United Kingdom. There is no country among the allied nations to-day that is making an effort in the training of airmen such as that being made in Canada. That I regard as a special obligation of Canada on account of our exceptionally favourable geography and climate.

We have in Canada large water powers, and we have therefore become a principal source of aluminum for the allies. To-day we produce more than 40 per cent of all the aluminum being used by the allied nations. That is a task that I think is particularly imposed upon Canada because no other country among the allied nations is so well able to carry it out.

We have a tremendous responsibility in the production of nickel. Before the war about 95 per cent of the world's nickel came from Canada, and nickel to-day is a strategic metal in very short supply, one of the serious shortages of the war. Therefore there is an obligation imposed on Canada for an all-out production of nickel. The same thing applies to a lesser extent to the production of copper, zinc, lead and certain rare metals, carbon and certain alloys, and various other products that require large sources of hydro-electric energy for their successful production. Those are tasks I think that are particularly ours.

To a similar extent we have a task in the production of food. We have large agricultural areas and a climate suitable for the production of the types of food that are particularly required in the war effort.

We have a heavy responsibility, and one that we are having some difficulty in discharging, in the production of aeroplane spruce. Without the aeroplane spruce of Canada the production of aeroplanes to-day would be very difficult. Also coupled with that is the production of timber, a large part of which goes to the war areas.

I mention these particular responsibilities because it seems to me that our whole war effort is being distorted at the present time by the undue emphasis now being placed on men for the army overseas. We have an obligation to maintain an army overseas, an army commensurate with the importance of Canada as one of the allied nations. We are carrying out that responsibility, and have carried it out since the beginning of the war. The strategy of war has required that the Canadian army should stand as the spearhead of the defence of Britain. We all know that no more important military task than the defence of Britain could be allocated to any army. Theirs has not been the glory of battles that have taken place, but they have played their part; they have maintained an efficient army, trained to the minute, equipped to the last degree and able to give a good account of themselves.

But even in the matter of the army we have another obligation, and that is to provide a defence for Canada. This is not a war concentrated on any one battle front; it is a war of constantly shifting battle lines. Few of us can be so blind as not to see that those battle fronts are moving in the direction of our own territory. We are more than ever before in this war obligated to maintain a first-class army in Canada. That is being done. Our defences are being strengthened on both coasts; our armies are being trained to meet any situation that may arise, and that task is well under way.

To centre all our war effort on the single problem of conscription of men for Canada's army overseas is to me an attitude arising out of the last war. At that time there was a single battle front, with great armies entrenched on both sides of that battle line. It seems to me that those who now overemphasize the need for conscription of men for overseas service are taking the "Colonel Blimp" attitude, of which we have heard a great deal recently in several countries. Their minds are going back to the last war; they refuse to see Canada's obligation in relation to the obligations of our allies; they take no cognizance of the battle going on on a dozen or fifteen battle fronts; they simply believe that what was true at this stage of the last war must be true in this war, and they magnify the need for conscription for our army overseas out of all relation to the real situation.

So far we have raised our armed services by the voluntary method. It is the method adopted at the beginning of the war. It is the traditional method for Canada. It is the method that has been used in Australia and south Africa. It is the method that we understand, and a method suited I think to the character of the people of Canada. I doubt whether any country has raised a finer army, or raised an army more quickly, than has Canada under the voluntary system. The suggestion is that we should now immediately change that system to a compulsory system. Surely the only reason for changing the established system would be that the voluntary system had failed. But I see no evidence at the moment that the voluntary system has failed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have the compulsory system now, when this bill passes.

An hon. MEMBER: You have changed the system already for Canada.

Mr. HOWE: Do you want to make a speech?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, but be fair.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOWE: My own view is that natural selection is by no means the worst selection. We may say that the compulsory system is more scientific than the voluntary system. That, of course, is a matter for argument. I find it difficult to believe that arbitrary tribunals can be set up with sufficient wisdom to sort out this man for the army, that man for the navy, this man for industry and that man for agriculture. It seems to me that the natural selection is the best selection. The man who wishes to go into the army is likely to be the best man for the army. The man who chooses the navy is likely to be the best man for the navy, and so with the air force and with industry. I believe the man who chooses industry is likely to make a better mechanic than the man whose desire it is to take a more active part on the battle front. Therefore I say we should not discard the voluntary system simply because we know of another that may or may not be a better system. There must be other reasons, and later there may be other reasons, but those reasons have not appeared up to this time.

At this moment the need for munitions is at least as great as the need for armies. We are sending vast quantities of munitions, tanks, Bren gun carriers, artillery, guns and ammunition to Russia. We are also sending aluminum and other war materials. Surely it requires no argument on my part to show that the things we are sending would be more valuable than a large army of men sent to that particular battle front. We are sending guns, ammunition, artillery and other munitions to China. Surely the 600,000,000 people of China need those arms worse than they need our men. We are also sending tanks and motor transport to Libya in huge quantities. In a battle of the desert everything depends on mechanical transport, in adequate quantities. Surely we have a part in the battle of Libya that is not unworthy of this country. As I have said before in this house, Canadian munitions have been used in every battle of the great war since Dunkirk, even to the battle of the Philippines, the battles of the far east, the battle of Libya, the battles of Greece and Crete and the battle of Russia; and they have been available for the defence of Canada and the defence of Britain.

Surely in considering the man-power needs of Canada, as we are doing under the National Resources Mobilization Act, we must take some account of the importance of other activities as well as the needs of our armies overseas. It is the same in the other services. The pilots trained under our air training plan are fighting on every battle front in the world. We all know that conscription for overseas service would be quite useless in regard to our air force, and so it is in connection with the navy. Men with naval training are fighting in ships on all the seven seas, and Canadian-built ships are carrying a large share of the burden of convoy work which is so important to the movement of Canadian and United States munitions to the battle fronts of the world. Yet with some the symbol of total war effort is immediate conscription for the army overseas.

In deciding our man-power policy we must consider whether we can contribute more to victory by continuing to be a principal source of munitions and supplies for the united nations, or whether we can make our greatest contribution by limiting our production in order to send overseas every physically fit man. In arriving at this decision let us ask ourselves the following questions. Having regard to the capacity for war production created and to be created in Canada, would we contribute more to ultimate victory by reducing that production in order to make all men available for service overseas? Would not the additional army so raised by Canada be relatively small in comparison with the vast armies now engaged in the war; and would that not be a relatively smaller contribution to victory, as compared with the potential production which would be lost?

I think there is only one answer to these questions, in the light of military requirements as we see them now. Of course military and strategic requirements will change, and that is why the government must be freed from the limitations now placed upon the exercise of its powers. Nor am I contending that we should or can stop increasing our armed services. I favour and have always favoured the enlistment of every physically fit man, to the greatest extent consistent with a maximum war effort. I have warned our war contractors to be prepared to lose a large proportion of their men eligible for military service. I have encouraged the training and employment of women and older workers. That policy I will continue to pursue. However, we are approaching a point where we may have to decide the questions which I have raised; and if our decision is that Canada must continue to be a principal source of supply for our armed services and those of our allies, then I say to you that we must continue our balanced policy on man-power, unless and until the urgent requirements of the war situation compel us to change it.

This government has a system of national selective service which has already been introduced, and which is now being organized and put into operation. Further, the limitations which may now restrict the exercise of the powers of the government for the defence of Canada, or for the efficient prosecution of the war, must be removed. At the same time we must cease confusing the issues by magnifying one aspect of a man-power policy as compared with other all-important aspects.

I base my views on the fact that the supply of man-power for the armed services and for war production is not unlimited. We have already run into many shortages. Let me cite some figures compiled by the economics branch of my department. I wish to emphasize that these figures are prepared in my department and that, while I believe them to be fairly accurate, they cannot be taken as official government figures.

We estimate that some 800,000 persons, of whom about one-sixth are women, are now directly or indirectly engaged in war production. The figure used in this house up to now has been 600,000, which I may say was the figure arrived at based on the programme of last summer. Of course our production programme is constantly expanding, and the fact of the matter is that we now have about 800,000 persons engaged in war industry. This figure covers the actual manufacturing of war munitions and supplies, the construction of facilities for such production, the construction of national defence projects, and the persons employed in providing essential materials and supplies required in such production. We estimate that by the end of this year we shall require about 85,000 additional workers for production, and that at the peak of our programme as at present known, which will probably be reached early in 1943, there will be employed some 910,000 persons in war production, both direct and indirect.

The rate of increase in war employment has been estimated at about 28,000 per month since the beginning of this year. We estimate that the percentage of women now engaged in war employment is in excess of 20 per cent. All efforts are being made to increase this percentage still further. The utilization of women in war industry ranges widely, of course, in different urban industrial centres, and varies with the character of the industries located there. In one centre 52 per cent of the total war manufacturing employment consists of women. In another the figure is 43 per cent. In another it is almost 41 per cent. In two centres it is 35 per cent, and in ten others the figure is between 20 per cent and 30 per cent. There are now some 120,000 women employed in war manufacturing plants, and that figure is rising daily.

I could give the house many more figures to show the magnitude and significance of our war employment. For example, whereas the aircraft industry prior to the outbreak of the war employed a very small number of men, there are now engaged in our aircraft production programme approximately 50,000 persons, exclusive of many workers indirectly engaged in this programme. Our merchant and naval shipbuilding programme directly and indirectly employs some 60,000 persons. Our chemicals and explosives programme employs over 45,000 persons. Our programme for the production of tanks and mechanical transport employs approximately 67,000 persons, directly and indirectly. One government company alone supervises plants which employ more than 40,000 persons. One single plant which we constructed and which we are operating employs some 14,000 persons.

The figures which I have cited to the house indicate that we shall need approximately 110,000 additional persons between now and the peak of our programme as at present planned, which will raise our estimated war employment to some 910,000 persons. In addition, the man-power pool in Canada has already provided more than 500,000 men for the armed services, and this figure, under present plans, will be increased by approximately 100,000 men before the end of the fiscal year. War production and the armed services have, therefore, absorbed an estimated 1,300,000, and will require more than 200,000 additional persons between now and the first part of 1943.

In considering the demands on our pool of man-power and woman-power, however, there are two other principal factors. There is agriculture, which, to a very large degree, must be recognized as an essential war industry. The government has, in consequence, through the agricultural stabilization regulations, frozen agricultural employment. It has been estimated that there are approximately 1,350,000 persons employed in agriculture, exclusive of housewives.

There are also the minimum requirements of essential civilian industries and services, which must be maintained in war and in peace. In addition to the proportion of employment in public utilities, transportation, coal mining, and metal mining, already included as directly ancillary to war employment in the figure of 800,000 which I have given to the house, it may be estimated that there are approximately 300,000 more persons employed in these essential industries. The figure for transportation includes highway construction, and maintenance and repair of railroad right-of-way and rolling stock.

It has been estimated that there are over 3,100,000 persons engaged in non-agricultural employment in Canada. If from this figure we deduct the estimate of 800,000 engaged in direct and indirect war employment, and 300,000 engaged in essential utilities and mining, other than directly ancillary to the war, there remain 2,000,000 persons in other civilian production and services. A large proportion of these 2,000,000 persons are essential to the maintenance of the civilian economy, since they include those employed in the production of clothing and food products and other essentials. It is from this source also that war industries and armed services must draw their additional requirements of man-power, since it includes, for example, the very large employment in wholesale and retail trade, which rose some 35,000 between April 1939, and April 1942, as well as other civilian trades and industries, which have experienced a large increase in employment since the outbreak of the war.

It follows that if we add to the number of persons already absorbed in war industry and in the armed services, 1,300,000; the number of persons in agriculture, 1,350,000; others in essential utilities and mining, 300,000; and the number employed in civilian industries and services, 2,000,000, we have roughly 5,000,000 people in the armed services, in war industries, in agriculture and civilian industries and services. I need not tell hon. members that this is a very tight man-power situation for a country with a total population of less than 12,000,000 persons.

Of the 2,000,000 persons in civilian industries and services, it may be roughly estimated that, by rigid curtailment, some 500,000 persons can be diverted to war work and the services. It is from this number, and from the net annual increase in the available working population, estimated at about 100,000 persons, that the 200,000 I have stated as being required by the services and war industries, on the basis of present programmes, must be drawn. I do not hesitate to say that, without the National Resources Mobilization Act, such a withdrawal would be extremely difficult.

There is a small pool of man-power which can be drawn upon to some extent, consisting of married women, retired persons, and persons not working and living at home. The situation may be further relieved by postponing the age of retirement in industry. Many of this class of persons are available only for part-time work. In England this last pool of man-power is now being mobilized, and it is possible that we, in Canada, can expect some help from this source.

I am not suggesting to the house that we have exhausted our supply of man-power and woman-power. I am confident that if we continue to pursue a balanced policy as between the requirements of the armed services and the requirements of war industries, we shall be able to expand reasonably in both directions. Conversion from non-essential employment to war work is sometimes almost automatic, as plants engaged in production for civilian needs are converted to war production, and with this conversion their employees become classed as war workers.

In so far as there remain industries engaged primarily in non-essential production, we shall have no hesitation in converting them to the extent that is necessary, or in closing them down, and thereby making their employees available for war requirements. This is now being done, and will be done in accordance with the principles of compulsory national selective service which we have adopted.

But, as I have already pointed out our man-power pool is not unlimited. We have encountered many shortages as the gap between supply and demand has become narrower. With the additional demands, which are continuous, the gap is constantly narrowing further. It follows therefore that if we are to continue our vast programme of war production and at the same time meet the requirements of the armed services, it is essential that we maintain a sane balance, and that we do not adopt, on emotional rather than on logical grounds, any policy which will unnecessarily upset that balance, and hinder one or other of the all-important phases of our war effort. However, the fact remains that in time of war no policy can remain fixed indefinitely. Circumstances beyond our control may compel changes, and it therefore becomes imperative that the government be freed from limitations which might prevent the exercise of its powers, in order to meet changing conditions.

One reason that has been given for the necessity for an immediate change from the voluntary to the conscriptive system, is the fact that we are receiving unfavourable publicity in the United States and other countries. The opinion of Canada's war effort in informed quarters in the United States, and I think also in other countries, is far from unfavourable. This is being brought home to this country from day to day, as our production figures are made known, and as the fruits of our air training plan and other military activities become more obvious. It is being realized that we are making a magnificent effort. If there has been unfavourable publicity in other countries, and I am quite aware that there has, I think it is a reflection of what has been said in this House of Commons. The opposition have followed a consistent course of belittling the efforts of the government in its many war activities. The same is true of a large section of the press of this country. How many times do we read the editorial pages of our own newspapers without finding something critical of one or other of the branches of our war activities? These are the statements that are reflected in the press of other countries, particularly in the isolationist press. I find a familiar note in almost every article that is unfavourable to Canada and its war effort. I think it is unfortunate that it should be so, but, in looking about for a cause, we should try to find a reasonable cause rather than attempt to place the whole burden on the issue of conscription.

To illustrate what I have said, I have never seen unfavourable criticism of the war effort of Australia. Australia has made a splendid effort, and that effort has been made under a voluntary system. I have never met an Australian who was not prepared to say that his country is making the most magnificent effort of any country on the face of the earth. It is the attitude of Australians themselves and of the Australian press that has brought about this favourable publicity for Australia.

In this country conscription is really a political issue rather than an issue arising out of the needs of the war situation. It was first introduced on the scene in the by-election of York South. It was then stated to be a matter of immediate necessity. The candidate who introduced the issue went down to a defeat which was not only overwhelming but which must have been humiliating to him. Since that occasion conscription has persisted as a political issue, and it was to settle this political issue that the plebiscite was taken. The people were asked to decide the following question:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The answer was overwhelmingly yes. One of the past commitments undoubtedly was section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, and by the expressed will of the people this section must be repealed. In the face of that plebiscite result no member of this house should have any difficulty in deciding his position on the question at issue, that is, Bill No. 80.

I listened to the eloquent appeal which was made to this house by my old friend and former colleague, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchéres (Mr. Cardin). Much as I was swept away by his eloquence, I could not find myself agreeing that his appeal was logical. The hon. member took part in the by-election against the advice of his physician, and he advocated a yes vote in the plebiscite. Surely in doing that he believed that it was necessary for the government to have a free hand to decide that issue. Having made that appeal, it seems to me that he, like other members of the house, was bound to accept the verdict of the people of Canada as a whole.

The hon. member has objected because conscription may be brought in secretly by order in council, without any debate on the regulations. I would remind the house that the National Resources Mobilization Act is now in effect and that men are being called up from time to time under regulations with which all hon. members are familiar.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not like to oppose the will of the house, but I must point out that yesterday I had to interrupt another minister whose time had expired. There must be unanimous consent before an hon. member may continue beyond the time limit. If there is any objection, he cannot go on.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite interested in what the minister is saying and I should like to have him proceed, but I think if the rule is to be enforced, it should be enforced impartially.

Mr. MAURICE LALONDE (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, my first word is one of congratulation to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Howe). The speech he has just delivered is to my point of view the most striking evidence ever offered to this house that Canada is able to make a total war effort voluntarily, without any conscription.

I do not think it is necessary at this time that I should make a lengthy speech in order to state why I am opposed to Bill No. 80. I submit that the results of the last federal election and of by-elections in Quebec and in Ontario must be construed as an order to the federal government not to impose conscription for overseas service unless clear evidence is given to the people of Canada that this conscription is absolutely necessary. In substantiation of my opinion in this regard may I take the liberty of quoting a letter of the Conservative party leader at that time, Doctor Manion, when, on March 19, 1941, he scored his ex-colleague and said, as reported in the Montreal Gazette:

> After the election I wrote to all our candidates asking them for their opinion as to why the party was defeated. From two-thirds of more than two hundred candidates I received replies, and with two exceptions their opinion was that the electors feared there was much more danger of conscription under us than under our opponents.

We are forced, Mr. Speaker, to admit that the real significance of the vote given by the Canadian people at that time was that it was against conscription for overseas service. When the plebiscite was announced in the speech from the throne, although I approved in this house the principle of the plebiscite I reserved my freedom to give the appropriate answer on the question asked; and although I did not campaign either in my riding or outside of it, I found out that the scales of public opinion of my people were weighted more towards a negative answer; for more than 93 per cent of the voters voted "no." So I am bound by my pledges not to vote for conscription for overseas service.

May I say also that the government feared a negative answer when it refused to accept the fair suggestion made in this house by the hon. member for Beauharnois-Laprairie (Mr. Raymond), advocating the right to vote for those prospective conscripted men between eighteen and twenty-one years of age, but graciously granted the same right in the meantime to the same classes of people who had volunteered in the armed forces of Canada. If the government had given full freedom of expression and full liberty of action to those who intended to speak over the Canadian Broadcasting network to advocate their policy of a negative answer; if the Canadian people at large had had the opportunity to listen to both sides—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have never done this before, but I had the privilege of travelling in the train with a certain gentleman, Mr. Brockington, who recently gave a beautiful speech, and a prominent cabinet minister; they could have written for me an excellent speech, and I object to this hon. member reading every word of his speech.

Mr. LALONDE: I am glad that the hon. member makes the suggestion, but I do not care; I can speak my mind either in French or in English. I do not need to read my speeches.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the point of order, it is a well-known rule of the house, and has been generally applied since the beginning of the session, that an hon. member may not read his speech. An hon. member may consult his notes, but may not read his speech.

Mr. SLAGHT: Speaking to the point of order, I have observed the hon. gentleman closely, and I suggest that he has not been reading his speech. He has been referring to notes, which he has a perfect right to do.

Mr. CARDIN: In view of the observations which have just been made, may I point out that this is not the first example that we have had, since the debate began, of hon. members reading speeches; in fact we can count on the fingers of one hand those who have not done so. I think it would be unfair to apply the rule in the case of this hon. member alone. If a rule is to be applied it should bind every hon. member in this house.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: May I again speak on the point of order?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I will sit down when Mr. Speaker tells me.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken on the point of order. Does any other hon. member wish to speak on the point of order? I may point out that the rule has been applied with a great deal of latitude. If an hon. member states that he is not reading, but only consulting notes, it is usual to accept his statement, although it is sometimes difficult to assume that anyone is deceived. May I urge hon. members to adhere to the rules as closely as possible.

Mr. LALONDE: If the Canadian people at large had had the opportunity to listen to both sides I wonder if the returns would have been so overwhelmingly in favour of the affirmative viewpoint. This plebiscite in itself was supposed to be a free consultation of the people of Canada, and it cannot be otherwise according to its essential characteristics. But through the government's influence it became restricted to a unilateral proposition. I confess, in the light of the experience of the past, it would have been preferable in my own point of view to come before the people frankly with a referendum asking our constituents if they were in favour of conscription or not. We would have had at least—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman should consult his notes a little less freely.

Mr. LALONDE: We would have had at least the satisfaction of knowing that the people would have given a clear-cut and definite answer rather than an equivocal response.

One may object that the decision regarding the opportunity of enforcing conscription is a matter for the military authorities, that the members of the house and the common backstreet people are not in a position to decide whether or not conscription is to be applied. May I point out that such nation-wide politics—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must take notice that the hon. gentleman is reading his speech.

Mr. FLEMING: I am sitting right behind him, and he is not.

Mr. LALONDE: Mr. Speaker, I should like to abide by your ruling, but I should like to have a clear-cut ruling as to whether I am reading my speech or whether I am just consulting my notes. If I have not the right to read at any part of my speech, all right; I will sit down. If I have the right just to glance at my notes, I will go on. But I should like to be treated in the same way as any other hon. member.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: My desire is simply to apply the rule as impartially as possible, and to mete out the same treatment to all hon. members. However, the rule binds me. I must hold that it is not permissible to read one's speech, except, of course, with unanimous consent. When exception is taken to the reading of a speech, there is no option; the rule must be applied. While the hon. gentleman has the right to consult his notes, he may not read his speech.

Mr. LALONDE: I am merely consulting my notes, Mr. Speaker.

The question asked by the plebiscite was misleading, so much so that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself was bound to say to the Tory party, both over the radio and in the house, that a "yes" vote was not a vote of confidence in the government's administration; while on the other hand he ventured to tell his invisible audience that he would not carry on the administration of the country without being vested with the fullest confidence of the Canadian people. This, in the minds of our people, gave rise to confusion, and it is one of the reasons why I am justified in taking the stand I take now.

We have been told that the bill now before the house is not a conscription measure. I respectfully submit that while Bill No. 80 does not in its phraseology embody conscription, nevertheless, section 3 of the mobilization act being repealed under its authority, every obstacle is removed from the full conscription of men for overseas service; it means that this bill, enlarging the scope of the mobilization act, is in itself the embodiment of the principle of conscription for overseas service. When the bill is adopted, the government of Canada will have authority to impose conscription by order in council without being obliged to come before the house with that order in council, according to section 5 of the mobilization act. It is a form of dictatorship that I cannot approve. As a matter of fact, the cabinet has approved more than 25,000 orders in council, of which 300 have been passed against existing laws on our statute books.

If I were sure that the amended mobilization act would be applied by the present administration I would have less hesitation in voting against the bill? But who can say? Who can look into the future and tell me that the mobilization act as amended by Bill No. 80 will be enforced by this present administration? I urge hon. members to look with the closest scrutiny into the proposition. Who will use this formidable instrument, forged by this parliament, to apply conscription for overseas service? History repeats itself. One can read the memoirs of the late Sir Robert Borden and tell me whether the present political situation is not paralleled by the difficult situation that existed in 1917, when the military authorities urged the government, through the medium of the national defence department, to apply conscription; and if the controversy reaches the climax it did in 1917, when Sir Robert Borden proposed conscription to his cabinet, I have no hesitation in saying that this intensely feared union government will be formed and will have at its disposal the necessary machinery to impose conscription of its own making. When the Prime Minister urges his followers to give his government full confidence he is asking us to vest that confidence in any future government, either a union government or a Tory government.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, we are told that conscription is not necessary. We have heard official statements to the effect that it may never become necessary. This very afternoon, one of our most influential cabinet ministers declared that such a step was not at all required. Yet the cry for conscription goes on. The voluntary enlistment system is more than adequate. The tide of aggression is nearing our shores. The atmosphere of collective peace which had reigned in this country for a few years has now disappeared, and we are coming to realize that danger threatens us on every side. I do not hesitate to say that I would readily support any measure obliging Canadians to defend their American homeland, as well as the territories neighbouring our own, for such a measure would be based on the principle underlying the Mobilization Act we passed in 1940. But the bill we are now considering is simply a conscription measure in disguise. The solemn pledges which I have made and which were confirmed by my constituents, prevent me from adopting any stand other than the one I now adhere to.

It has been charged in certain sections of the country that our province is not contributing to Canadian unity. The protests that have risen and will rise in this chamber, Mr. Speaker, constitute a peremptory argument demonstrating the utter falsehood of this gratuitous claim. We have been striving for national unity ever since the first French Canadian set foot on Canadian soil. We were striving for Canadian unity when sacrifices of men and money were demanded of us in 1917-18.

We were striving for Canadian unity when we declared war in 1939 and accepted all the consequences thereof. That was the goal in view when we accepted the Mobilization Act, on condition that there be no conscription for overseas service. We strove for Canadian unity by voting record war budgets, on condition that there be no conscription for overseas service. We accepted and worked for the idea of Canadian unity by enlisting in numbers sufficient to prevent our being charged with cowardice, on condition that there be no conscription for overseas service. We agreed to lend to the government for war purposes millions upon millions of dollars drawn from the savings of poor and rich alike, on condition that there be no conscription for overseas service. We did not object to granting Britain a gift of one billion dollars, because these funds were to serve in the defence of ideals we hold dear, but the same condition applied that there be no conscription. We accepted the principle of the plebiscite following the most formal commitments made in the house and outside it, to the effect that conscription for overseas service would never be passed. And after all this, Mr. Speaker, we are asked to be false to our promises and we are accused of not having understood the real meaning of Canadian patriotism. I protest against this. We understand it as well as anyone else in this war, and we shall continue to pay the taxes required for the triumph of our cause.

It has been said that we are against conscription because we come from the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, I oppose conscription, not because I am a French Canadian and a Catholic; but because I do not think it is necessary and because I am pledged by my word of honour given to those people who have honoured me with their confidence.

Last Sunday, in every Catholic church in Canada, a letter was read, bearing the signature of every Catholic bishop or archbishop of Canada. What was the purport of that letter? Mr. Speaker, I wish I could put it on the record, so that our fellow citizens who do not share our faith and our racial origin would realize that the Catholic clergy of our dominion are the mainstay of our hopes in final victory.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude. I have stated my reasons for voting against conscription. It will be no pleasure for me to withdraw my support from the political party in which I have always set my fondest hopes. I do it without animosity. Mr. Speaker, I realize fully the difficult position of our Prime Minister. However, I feel that I am discharging my duty to my constituents and to all those who have honoured me with their confidence. Mr. Speaker, when the final curtain has dropped on the bloody conflict waging through the world at the present time, when this distressing period has ended, when dusk has at last spread its shadows on this agonizing day, when, on the morning of victory the people sing their hymn of deliverance and when from the blood-stained soil where our sons rest come forth promises of a new order founded on justice and charity, we shall all together, hand in hand, resume our victorious march towards progress and peace.

Mr. HUGHES CLEAVER (Halton): Before expressing my views on the bill which is now before the house for second reading I should like to make some comments with reference to the keynote speech delivered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) on Wednesday last. He read verbatim from a prepared typewritten statement which was handed out to the press before one word of his typewritten speech or statement was read to this house. In the opening remarks of that speech he made this very remarkable statement:

I have listened with undivided attention to the speech of the right hon. gentleman this afternoon, and I confess at once that it left me cold.

I ask hon. members to ponder for a moment the highly imaginative gifts of the hon. member, who in the quiet of his own room, at least two weeks before a word of the speech was uttered, could calmly dictate to his private secretary the words which I have just read. The Prime Minister's speech, he said, "left him cold". Obviously the chill must have occurred at least two weeks before the speech of the Prime Minister was uttered; so we are left to conjecture why the chill. On pondering the problem this occurred to me. We all know that the present Conservative party in the house is governed by remote control. If that part of the hon. member's speech was written by the Right Hon. Arthur, we can understand the chili; for he has been kept by the Canadian people and by his own party in cold storage for a long, long time.

However, last Wednesday afternoon was a very warm afternoon and the hon. gentleman soon warmed up. He then inflicted on this house some poetry from a musical comedy. Think of it! At a time when this house is discussing one of the most serious problems that will come before it during this war; at a time when racial feelings run high, is that the best leadership the leader of the opposition can give us? He read from comic opera, and he did not even read it well.

The leader of the opposition went on to announce grudgingly that he was going to support this measure, but he served warning that he would press for the immediate imposition of conscription. He went on to poke fun at and to belittle and misrepresent the stand of our war leader, a man who was elected Prime Minister of this country with the largest majority ever accorded to any prime minister in our history. In conclusion he made statements regarding Canada's war effort that I feel sure he will be ashamed of before he is much older. Listen to this, on Canada's war effort—and nobody knows better than the leader of the opposition what a magnificent war effort this country is making. I quote from Hansard, page 3252:

Shall he—

The Prime Minister.

—insist that we continue with interminable detours to victory? That is what we have had for thirty-two months. Shall he insist——that we plod wearily along a winding and unlighted road, in the pious hope that somehow, sime time, somewhere, we may grope, stumble and flounder into the open light of victory?

The Prime Minister again.

I ask hon. members, is this fair comment on Canada's war effort? It is not the duty of any hon. member of this house to make such slighting statements regarding Canada's war effort, much less the duty of the leader of a loyal opposition. No one knows better than he the wonderful war effort this country is making; and as I listened to those words I just wondered what General McNaughton and his gallant men overseas would think of that description, that gross slander, if you will, of Canada's war effort. I wondered how the boys in our twenty-five odd air squadrons overseas would feel when they heard Canada's war effort being described as a stumbling, floundering effort. And what about the boys in the Canadian navy, engaged in constant convoy duty on the Atlantic? How would they like to have Canada's war effort, their war effort, described and maligned in that fashion? Do they believe that we are "plodding wearily along an unlighted road, in the pious hope that we may stumble into the open light of victory"? Then coming to the industrial production in Canada, how will H. R. MacMillan, the friend of the leader of the opposition, and the forty odd thousand men engaged in the shipbuilding programme, take a statement of that kind in regard to Canada's war effort? And what about Ralph Bell and the hundred thousand odd Canadians who this year will be engaged in building aircraft for victory? How will they take that sort of description of Canada's war effort? Will they think it is fair criticism? I could go across the entire picture of Canada's war effort and challenge the leader of the opposition to name one person engaged in that effort who would dream of making such statements.

In the light of these comments I want to read again just what the hon. leader of the opposition did state, at page 3252 of Hansard:

> Shall he insist that we continue with interminable detours to victory? That is what we have had for thirty-two months.

Is that an honest statement?

> Shall he insist that we plod wearily along a winding and unlighted road, in the pious hope that somehow, sometime, somewhere, we may grope, stumble and flounder into the open light of victory?

Then the leader of the opposition goes on to say that what we need to-day in Canada is courageous national leadership. I now ask him a pointed question. What sort of national leadership has he been giving us? Has he done anything to improve Canada's war morale? Has he done anything to inspire in the hearts of Canadians pride in the war effort which this country is making?

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Coming now to his stand on the other question, that of conscription for overseas service, I should like to quote several further extracts from the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman last Wednesday. At page 3249 of Hansard the hon. gentleman said:

> . . . we cannot have total war effort without unlimited selective national service.

And again:

> As in the past, my position to-day is that a full, all-out war effort on the part of Canada is possible only if all the material resources and man-power of the nation are fully mobilized, without restrictions of any kind.

Keep in mind those words, "as in the past". And again I quote:

> Shall he insist that we continue with interminable detours to victory? That is what we have had for thirty-two months.

I think a fair summary of the quotations I have just read, Mr. Speaker, would be this. The leader of the opposition tells the house, "We cannot have a total war effort without conscription for overseas service. I have believed in conscription for overseas service all along." I think that would be a fair summary of those statements.

Mr. HOMUTH: Not very.

Mr. CLEAVER: Well, I expected to hear from my hon. friend; I have been disappointed that he has been quiet for so long. Now let us look at the record and see whether it substantiates the statement of the hon. gentleman. Before doing so, however, I should like to say with all the vehemence at my command that I sincerely believe that a majority of the people of Canada still feel that this country will make a better war effort and will raise better armed forces under the voluntary system than under conscription, and that conscription should be resorted to only when all else has failed. Now let us look at the record of the leader of the opposition and see whether he has been in favour of conscription during all these thirty-two months of alleged "detouring". I say at once that the record conclusively proves that he is either a new convert or that he did not have the courage of his convictions and did not voice them. Just a few months ago the leader of the opposition spoke at the head of the lakes, and is reported in the Port Arthur News-Chronicle of August 5 last as follows:

> Honourable R. B. Hanson, national Conservative leader, told a luncheon meeting of lake head and district supporters at the Royal Edward hotel yesterday he was not sure that public opinion is ready for a declaration for all-out national service.

He was not sure. It will be noted that at that meeting he was speaking to his own supporters. Did this great national leader tell his own supporters that this country could not have an all-out war effort without conscription for overseas service? Did he tell them that he had always been in favour of conscription for overseas service? No. Instead of that, what did he tell them? He said he was not sure that public opinion was ready. Then later in the year he spoke in Toronto, again to a group of his own supporters, the Albany club; he is quoted in the Toronto Telegram—and I hope he will not accuse the Telegram of misquoting him—of October 29 last. What did he say, this hon. gentleman who now says we cannot have an all-out war effort without conscription, and that he has always supported conscription for overseas? Here is what he told his own supporters at that time:

> I have been urged to declare for conscription of man-power. What would happen if I did? Immediately the Conservative party in parliament nailed conscription to its masthead we'd consolidate all those forces that have been opposed to us. . . . they would be marshalled against us. Some will disagree with this view. I have studied it from every angle. If it were put to a plebiscite, I don't know what would happen. I wish you could see the letters I have received, letters from mothers who didn't raise their boy to be a soldier.

Here we have the national leader of the Conservative party, who last Wednesday expressed in this house the views I have quoted, speaking to his own supporters in the city of Toronto less than eight months ago. Did he tell them, "We must have conscription"? Did he tell them, "We cannot have a total war effort without conscription"? No. He told them it would not be politically wise. He told them he had received letters from mothers who did not raise their boys to be soldiers. But I want to be fair to the hon. gentleman. It is quite within the realm of possibility that he did not compose that written speech that was read to the house. If the speech was inspired by Toronto I beg of him to tell those gentlemen in Toronto, the next time he gets advice from them, to get themselves elected by popular vote and then come to this house and make their own speeches. There are two constituencies vacant right now, one of which is Winnipeg North Centre and the other, Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I do not think the hon. member has a right to assume that this message came from Toronto, and then to quote from the message as having come from Toronto.

Mr. CLEAVER: I should have been surprised if the hon. member for Danforth had not objected. However I shall have a little of something for him in a moment or two. Probably he will then get up and answer it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I deny absolutely that anybody but myself wrote that speech, or that it was inspired from any quarter. The young man now speaking is drawing on his imagination—one which is much too fertile. What he has said should be withdrawn.

Mr. CLEAVER: I accept the hon. member's explanation. I should like now to deal with another point. I object strenuously to the organized effort being made in this country to misrepresent the whole situation and to light racial fires. In three editorials this year the Toronto Globe and Mail has stated that the promise made by Liberals and Conservatives alike in the 1940 election was made purely to appease Quebec. Fortunately through our newspapers we have a record of what happened in the past. As we know, before the election the political parties advertised their platform, and they stated in advertisements what they stood for. Those statements were made to attract votes. I hold in my hand a full page advertisement appearing in the Toronto Telegram the day before the election vote. This advertisement was sponsored by the "National Government" headquarters. Leading up to this there were three teaser advertisements—little five-column displays to attract the attention of the people, so that they would finally see the real advertisement. I shall read the one of these teaser advertisements which appeared on March 20:

> Vote for these National Government candidates in Toronto ridings:
> Parkdale, Doctor Herbert A. Bruce,
> Davenport, John R. MacNicol,
> Broadview, T. L. Church,
> Danforth, J. H. Harris—

The hon. member who interrupted a moment ago. Then follows a complete list of every National Government candidate in Toronto at that time. That teaser advertisement appeared in the issues of March 20, 23 and 25. Then followed the grand finale. I have made inquiries and I find that this advertisement would cost National Government headquarters between $400 and $500—so that they were not fooling. They really meant it.

This advertisement begins with the words, "Manion the man," and continues:

> National government or Liberal party, which does Canada want?

Then follow the planks of the platform, one of which reads: "I am against conscription." I ask the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who interrupted a few moments ago, and every other Conservative member from Toronto: Did these hon. members contribute their share of the $400 or $500 to publish those advertisements in the Toronto Telegram, telling the people of that city that they were opposed to conscription? Did they do that just to appease Quebec?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If the hon. member wishes an answer as to who paid, I can give it. It is a simple one, of only two or three words: it is none of your business.

Mr. CLEAVER: I thank the hon. member for Danforth, and I agree that is the only answer he could give me. That promise was made on practically every political platform across Canada. It was not made solely to please or appease Quebec. It was made because we all believed that this country would make a better war effort, would raise a better army perhaps, under the voluntary system, than we could ever have raised under conscription. Besides that, we had had a very unsatisfactory and bitter experience with conscription at the time of the last war.

The bill now before us for second reading has for its purpose the removal of territorial restrictions in connection with the services rendered by men raised under the National Resources Mobilization Act. The plebiscite vote was called to permit the people of Canada to release not only the government but every hon. member in the house from promises which most of us had given to the effect that conscription would never be enforced for service overseas. Everyone now realizes that the present war may be a very long one. Events move rapidly. The time may come when voluntary recruiting will dry up. No one knows what will happen. It is only a matter of good business judgment to come back to the people and, in the light of existing circumstances, ask for release from the pledge.

During the debate in the house on the plebiscite, and throughout the campaign in the country, the pledge was given by the leader of the opposition that this was not a vote for conscription. I read now an extract from his speech delivered over the national radio network on April 20:

> This plebiscite is simply to give the government and Mr. King release from a commitment not to enlist men for overseas service by compulsory methods. That primarily is the only issue involved. Emphatically it is not in this specific vote an issue for or against compulsory service for overseas. It is merely a vote to release, or refuse to release, Mr. King from a preelection pledge.

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Concluding the speech, he said:

> You are not called upon by this plebiscite to declare for or against conscription for overseas service. That may come; it does not follow from this plebiscite.

Note those words: "It does not follow from this plebiscite."

Let us now analyse the vote. There were 2,921,206 who voted "yes" and 1,608,609 who voted "no". At page 3245 of Hansard the leader of the opposition is reported in these words:

> We laboured unitedly to achieve an affirmative result.

And again:

> —and I believe we contributed mightily to the result.

The government did likewise; the government gave a similar assurance to the people that this was not a vote of conscription. The Prime Minister coupled with that the definite assurance that conscription would not be enforced until it could be demonstrated that it was necessary. On top of that practically every private member of this house campaigned his own riding for a "yes" vote. I spoke at eight meetings in my riding, and I sent out circular letters, signed not only by myself but by the defeated Conservative candidate, which asked the voters to vote "yes", and which assured them that they were not voting for conscription.

If in the final analysis the total effect of all that—the total weight of the Conservative party, the total weight of the Liberal party and the personal influence of all members of this house; if that combined effort caused only 700,000 voters to vote "yes", who would otherwise have noted "no", then the plebiscite would have been defeated had it not been for the assurance which was given. So I say to those who would lightly brush aside this assurance: Think well before talking that way any more. I could hardly believe my ears when I heard the leader of the opposition, at page 3245, state in the house last Wednesday, "any effort to make it appear that the affirmative vote was nothing more than a release of the government and of parliament is not facing the facts." On April 20 he said that it was merely a vote to release the Prime Minister from his preelection pledge, and on June 10, less than two months afterwards, he said, "If you consider the vote anything more than a release, you are not facing the facts." Did you ever see such a right about face in less than two months? I suggest to my hon. friend that the outstanding reason why the Conservative party does not hold the public confidence to-day is that they do not keep their promises. Further I say that this last episode proves conclusively to me that they do not even intend to keep their promises when they make them.

Coming to my own views on conscription, I wish to admit frankly that the vote in Quebec was a great surprise and a bitter disappointment to me. Nevertheless the taking of the plebiscite has served a useful purpose and has been of great assistance in the final solution of the problem, in that it has clearly indicated just what is our problem. Whether we like it or not, irrespective of who is to blame for the feeling, irrespective of the cause, we in Canada are faced to-day with the fact that 80 per cent of our French-Canadian population are bitterly opposed to conscription for overseas service until it can be demonstrated to them that it is necessary. This being so, it is quite apparent to me that nothing but harm could ensue to Canada's war effort were we to attempt to impose conscription at the present time before it is necessary.

Up to date French Canada has come along the full mile with us on a voluntary basis. We have had over 70,000 recruits from Quebec for service anywhere in the world. Quebec has gone over the top with the Red Cross campaigns, the victory loan campaigns, the war service and every other war campaign that has been put on. On top of that, the production of war equipment and war supplies in Quebec is equal to the production of any province in the country. If any hon. member doubts that statement, I ask him to visit the gun plant at Sorel, the aircraft plants at Montreal, and the great shipbuilding plants in the province. In the light of all this, is it wise to imperil all this voluntary effort on the part of one-quarter of our population by imposing conscription before the need for it actually exists?

Let us analyse for a moment the one and only reason which is advanced by anyone in favour of conscription. I have yet to hear any member of the house assert that the voluntary system is not raising the men required for our military programme. I have yet to hear any serious criticism of Canada's military programme. No one knows better than the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) what that programme should be. On February 10 of this year the minister outlined Canada's requirements for the following fifteen months. He told us that we would need 70,000 to 80,000 men for the air force, 13,000 men for the navy, and from 90,000 to 100,000 men for the army. Those were the requirements for the period January 1, 1942, to March 31, 1943. We have raised already by voluntary enlistment over 80,000 of those men. It is quite obvious therefore that our military requirements will be met by voluntary enlistments months before we need them. Even the Globe and Mail in a recent editorial admitted that voluntary recruiting is taking care of our military programme. It said:

> The real gravamen of the indictment against the voluntary system lies in the unfairness of its incidence.

It is not that there is any shortage of voluntary enlistments; it is that we have not equality of service. I do not believe that the present campaign for conscription was instituted by those who honestly believe in conscription. I believe it is purely political in its character. I cannot lose sight of some of the sources from which the present campaign started. You cannot collect $600,000,000 by means of the income tax, as we have done in twelve months, without treading on someone's toes. During the last war less than $10,000,000 in income tax was collected under the national government. Why would they not want national government? The only way to get national government is to advocate conscription.

There are some disgruntled politicians in this country who would sabotage Canada's war effort or do anything to gain their own selfish ends. If anyone could convince me that conscription would lead to equality of service, I would gladly revise my views. I think one example is enough to prove how illusory the term "equality of service" is. During the last week an air force officer, a boy from my community, was reported missing after a raid over Germany. He was a bright, healthy, clean living boy who had been a leader in sports at high school and who had graduated in agriculture from the Guelph agricultural college. He enlisted in the air force, qualified as a pilot, and went overseas a few months ago. Last week Tim was posted as missing. I ask you to place the sacrifice of this young man in the scales on one side of the balance; then on the other side pile on the contribution made by his chum in Canada. I do not care if he works twenty hours a day in a factory, I do not care if he gives all his surplus wages for war purposes, I do not care what he does; his sacrifice is not comparable to the sacrifice of the young lad who gave his life. There are superloyalists who drum up "equality of service" as an argument in order to try to divert French Canada from the war effort. I say to them: "Forget about equality of service; there is no such thing." I have heard other people say, "Let us slough off French Canada and get on with the war." Did you ever hear such a reckless statement?

Did you ever hear of a hockey team winning a game with 25 per cent of its team in the penalty box? Again, I admit at once that French Canadians are one step behind those of English-speaking Canada with regard to conscription, and why should they not be? Blood ties are stronger than any other ties. But what would you think of a cruiser convoy that would steam away from 25 per cent of its merchant ships simply because they were one knot an hour slower than the other ships in the convoy?

There is another point on which I should like to touch before I conclude. The fact that this whole conscription issue has been magnified far beyond its true import is another proof that it is politically inspired. It does not affect the air force, nor does it affect the navy. Great Britain, notwithstanding the fact that she is under constant threat of invasion, still holds to the voluntary system for both the air force and the navy. This fact speaks much more eloquently than any words of mine could speak in favour of the voluntary system.

Again, conscription does not affect the gift to Britain of one billion dollars' worth of planes, tanks, guns and foodstuffs, which in dollar value is three times the total effort of this country in the peak year of the last war. In 1918 this country spent for all its war purposes only $343,000,000, and inflated dollars at that. Conscription does not affect our war production of foodstuffs. Conscription does not affect our industrial production of planes, tanks, guns, shells and the like. This problem simmers down to about one-fiftieth of Canada's total war effort, because in the final analysis the problem is just the difference between the number of men you would raise by the voluntary process and the number you would raise by conscription.

There is one thought in closing which I think should be expressed. Some day the war will be over. When that day comes this country will be faced with a very trying reconstruction period. During that period we English-speaking people will have to unite with our French-speaking neighbours in an endeavour to build a nation where life will be worth living. Should we imperil that end by doing something now which will needlessly antagonize one-quarter of our population? Should we endanger the present war effort, the present sympathy of French Canada, by doing something just to please conscriptionist Tories?

I cannot do better than close with the following words uttered by the leader of the opposition on Wednesday last, as reported in Hansard at page 3246. I do not agree at all with his application of the word, but I do agree with the words. He said this:

[Mr. Cleaver.]

Have you thought this matter through to the end? I fear not. I beg of you while there is yet time to pause and think this thing clear through.

I commend that, Mr. Speaker, with all the sincerity at my command to my fellow English-speaking members of the house.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) some days ago, when introducing this bill, informed us that the conscription issue now before parliament is one of the most controversial issues raised in Canada since confederation. He furthermore went on to point out that political leaders of all parties and those interested in the unity of the people of Canada have tried to keep this issue in the background since the beginning of the war. The fact facing us to-day, however, is that the issue has emerged, has demanded attention, has demanded a solution. The glaring fact stands out that we have in one section of Canada a large minority group opposed to conscription for overseas service. We have scattered through all the other provinces more minority groups who also are opposed to conscription for overseas service. We have across the country an overwhelming English-speaking majority who are supporting, and vigorously supporting, conscription for overseas service. Out of this, Mr. Speaker, I see the alarming fact that French-speaking Canadians and English-speaking Canadians, after having lived together in the same country for nearly 200 years, have failed to become a united nation.

It is not a question of loyalty to Canada. No one questions the loyalty of the French-speaking Canadians to Canada. Our different attitudes toward this question are largely a matter of differences in our attitudes towards the British empire and the British flag. Those attitudes go back deep into our history, deep into the histories of our races. This is not the time or the place to examine the cause or to discover where the blame for that lack of unity lies. For once in my life I can agree with both Liberal and Conservative. I can agree with them each as each charges the other with the responsibility of the situation in which we find ourselves to-day. But as an educationist I would lay the blame not only on our political parties. I want to register my protest against the educational systems of every province in that they have failed to teach our boys and girls the essentials of a unified citizenship. In our schools in every province we have been teaching our boys and girls our differences. We have been emphasizing our differences. We have been failing to emphasize the points on which as citizens we are all agreed. I want on this occasion to register my protest against such a system of education.

The question before us must be examined in the light of the war itself and our war effort. This war is a life and death struggle to preserve human freedom, our institutions, our churches, our homes, our family life. It is a war to preserve our freedom of speech, our freedom of association, our free democratic institutions. It is a war to preserve our right to exercise our franchise. It is a war to preserve the freedom of our courts. These, Mr. Speaker, are freedoms which have been assured to all English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians for nearly 200 years under the British flag. Whether or not our heart is warmed at the sight of that flag, whether or not our emotions are stirred at the mention of that empire, the fact remains that under and within that empire and under that flag we have won and maintained freedoms that are vital to the existence of both French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians. They are of vital importance to all of us regardless entirely of racial ancestry. Those are the freedoms that are threatened to-day by a ruthless enemy who would impose upon all alike, English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, and upon all the peoples of the world, his will and his way of life, which would bring with it the destruction and obliteration of those freedoms and institutions which we should unite in preserving.

This war is no mere question of preserving or saving British territory or the territory of any other country; it is not even a war to preserve British capitalists or any other capitalists in their right to exploit the masses of the people in any part of the British empire or of any other empire. It is a war that is being fought to preserve the principles upon which our civilization is based. That is the first of our war aims. As we were told by Mr. Nash some days ago, we, too, like the New Zealanders, are fighting to hold what we have, what we have gained through the centuries. But we are fighting for more than that. We are not merely fighting to hold fast to that which we have acquired; we are fighting to make new advances, fighting for new freedoms, for those new freedoms which have found expression in the Atlantic charter —freedom from want and freedom from fear. We are fighting to assure to the working people of this country the simple elementary right of earning a living, the right to a job, the right to a decent standard of living, of which tens of thousands have been deprived in the past. We are fighting to give to the boys and girls of this dominion an equal opportunity to become educated and to develop into useful Canadian citizens.

This, I submit, is a programme on which both French- and English-speaking Canadians can unite. It is a programme which will call for the best in all our people. The question of where our men should fight, the question of how our men should be called up for service, must be determined in the light of that great issue. Personally I want to see the enemy defeated before he reaches our shores. I have no desire to see our shores invaded, our women and children bombed, if by any means, in cooperation with our allies, we can defeat the enemy abroad before he reaches us here in Canada. We must not make the mistake that the smaller nations of Europe made when they failed to cooperate with one another to meet the enemy, and went down to defeat one by one. We must give to the allied cause everything we can while our allies are standing against the enemy. We must not wait even to join forces with our neighbours to the south in the hope of defeating the enemy when he reaches this continent. On the contrary, we must join forces abroad with England, Russia, China, the United States and all the other nations; for on that programme and on that programme alone depends our hope of success in this war.

The whole question of a balanced war effort is brought to the fore by the introduction of this bill. The question for us to decide primarily is this: How can Canada make her most effective contribution to the cause of the allied nations? Can that most effective contribution be made by conscription of man-power for overseas service? Can it be made by voluntary enlistment? That is the vital question for us to settle; and in the light of that, other questions become minor ones. The conscription of man-power for overseas service is inextricably bound up with the whole question of our war effort. It cannot be separated; it cannot be isolated. It cannot be treated as a separate question, as a scientist would separate a disease germ and examine it in order to effect a cure.

In considering conscription for overseas service, we must of necessity take into consideration and carefully weight the opposition of a large minority group, largest in Quebec but not confined by any means entirely to Quebec. The relative importance of that opposition must be considered. The fact is there and it must be faced and faced intelligently. No immediate purpose can be served by trying to avoid it. The question that I as a member of the house must decide in relation to this bill is whether or not the government's measure is such that in the light of all the known facts it will enable Canada to put forth her most effective war effort. To-day, near the end of the third year of the war, we are brought face to face with this question, which must have seemed inevitable to every intelligent public person in this country since the day war was declared.

We have for three years dodged that issue, hoping against hope—and in that I think the opposition as well as the government members share—that time would eventually make the decision easy. Neither time nor the plebiscite has removed the difficulty. In my humble opinion both time and the plebiscite have served to intensify it. In the bill before us the government does not, in my opinion, face up to the question. In this bill the government asks to be given a free hand to decide this question in its own time and in its own way.

The Prime Minister assures us that conscription for overseas service is not now necessary. Other ministers and other supporters of the government have given us the same assurance; they assure us that it may never be necessary. Yet we have been told by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) and other hon. members that those of us who supported a "yes" vote on the plebiscite and whose constituencies voted "yes" on that plebiscite are under some form of obligation to our constituents to vote "yes" on this bill. With all due deference to the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Trinity and others, I cannot follow that logic. In the plebiscite the electorate was asked one question, whether or not it was willing to release the government from a certain commitment. I fail to see why, because my constituents voted to release the government from that commitment, I am bound to give the government a free hand to decide whether or not conscription shall be introduced, how it shall be introduced, and when. I may be illogical, but by no process of reasoning can I find that the one should be the result of the other.

Hon. members were not elected to give a blank cheque to this government or any other government on this or any other issue. If in the light of its knowledge of the war situation the government is convinced that conscription is unnecessary, and does not want to take the responsibility of bringing in a conscription bill, that is its responsibility. If on the other hand, in the light of its knowledge of the war situation it feels that conscription is necessary, then I submit that such a bill should be placed before this house; and the government in introducing that bill should be prepared to explain to the house not only the nature of the bill and the terms under which the bill is to be enforced, but also the necessity for such a bill. I shall vote against this bill, first as a protest against the undemocratic procedure followed by the government in relation to this vital matter.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) both expressed opposition to the six points introduced by the leader of our movement on the ground of what they called state socialism. The minister and the hon. member are both supporting this bill, which to me is the very essence of state socialism. The government is asking us to give it the right to decide when and how, if at any time, conscription is to be introduced. When we suggest that wealth should be conscripted, that industry should be conscripted simultaneously with and on the same basis as man-power, it becomes to the hon. gentlemen state socialism. Yet they suggest that this house should give over to the governor in council its prerogative to discuss, to decide and to vote upon this issue.

I shall vote against this bill for a second reason. This bill is not even a bill for the conscription of man-power. Even if it were a bill for the conscription of man-power only, I should be obliged to vote against it. I was elected to this house on a platform which called for total conscription for total war. I set before my electors throughout my entire campaign the programme that was placed on Hansard here the other day by the leader of this movement. If my constituents had wanted conscription of man-power only, I should not be in this house. That platform was set forth very ably by my opponent, and he had supporting him influential newspapers and a number of prominent public men. The York South electors were in no doubt whatever concerning the kind of conscription they wanted. It was conscription of man-power, wealth and industry for the duration of the war. There is no doubt in my mind that if such a programme were placed before the common people of this country, the people who make up our armed forces, the people who man our ships on the sea and in the air, the people who man our farms and factories, those people would to-day vote overwhelmingly for total conscription of man-power, wealth and industry, because that is the only policy which will enable Canada to put forth a maximum war effort that is worthy of the great cause for which we are fighting.

I wish briefly to discuss just what we mean by the conscription of industry. In that connection, with the permission of the house I should like to read one short paragraph from our leader's speech in which he dealt with that subject. I quote from page 3263 of Hansard:

> The third proposal we make is either government ownership or, where that is not feasible, complete government control of all war industry. Tied in directly with this is the next proposal, that dollar-a-year men should be replaced by national administrators paid exclusively by the state, and that labour and farm organizations be given a proper share in the control of war production.

That briefly sets forth our position with regard to the conscription of industry. When hon. members talk about state socialism or about disrupting our war effort by the adoption of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation programme, I would call their attention to the fact that we do not propose to disrupt the war effort by nationalizing all war industries during the war. Our leader's statement was, "either government ownership or . . . complete government control of all war industry". I realize, as I am sure every other hon. member realizes, that to attempt government ownership of all industry during the war would be suicidal, that it would disrupt our war effort. What we do insist is that there must be complete control; that complete control for the duration of the war is essential. Industrial plants and their policies should be entirely directed by a national production council. The last word in production should be that, not of the owner or manager, but of a government agency.

In any industry the direction concerns itself with some of the following problems, among others. There is the problem of what and how much is to be produced. There is the problem of when a certain amount of production is to be carried on. There is the problem of whether or not a plant is to be expanded. There is the relationship between one particular plant and others engaged in the same industry. There is the question of cost and the question of profit. There is the question of the relationship of labour to management in a plant, and the question of technical improvements and research. All these problems should be definitely and absolutely controlled for the duration of the war, in order to ensure maximum production, by a government production agency.

In the very nature of things private industry is bound, even in time of war, to consider the problems I have mentioned on the basis of its competitive position, both now and after the war. Investigating committees of the United States, such as the Truman committee of the senate and the Tollen committee of the house of representatives, have given us numerous examples of how private industry has hampered war production. We had the exposures concerning the aluminum industry, the rubber industry, the automobile industry, the aircraft industry, the steel industry and others. There have been deliberate monopoly hindrances to industrial expansion, and interference with the United States programme for defence. Does any member of this house imagine for one moment that International Nickel in Canada, for instance, is any different from International Nickel in the United States; that the Standard Oil subsidiaries in this country are any different from Standard Oil in the United States, or that the tactics of monopolistic industry in this country differ in any respect from those of its associates in the United States? The unfortunate thing is that we have not this knowledge in Canada. I am reminded of an article appearing in this week's Nation in which the writer, after deploring the shortage of nickel, makes this remark: "It is unfortunate that we can do nothing about nickel production because Canada has no investigating committee to look into the workings of International Nickel." Even if there were no interference, it is only natural that private industry should be concerned with its own position, and that it should come in conflict with the national production plan. We must say to private war industries that for the duration of the war industry must be entirely at the service of the nation. All the problems to which I have referred must be settled by an appropriate government agency on the basis of war needs, and on the basis of our national objective, which is victory.

I do not care whether the plant remains in the hands of the owners for the duration of the war. What we want is to have such government control exerted as to assure maximum production during the war. If at the end of the war the people of Canada are prepared to continue the capitalist system, then there will be no choice but to hand back these controls to the private owners. But if by popular vote the Canadian people decide that it is in their interests that these industries should become and remain publicly owned, that is for the people themselves to decide by ballot. In connection with the steel industry in Canada, for example, the proposition which I have put forth would mean that every rolling mill, every open hearth, every electric furnace, all the scrap and all the smaller plants would form part of one national steel unit, and each would perform whatever operation it was most fitted to perform in the interests of the nation.

No longer would there be competition for scrap, competition for orders, competition for production, with an eye to the non-war market. Nor would there be competition for returns.

That proposition can be applied to other industries. I need not emphasize the importance of production. I have here a clipping in which the deputy minister of munitions and supply is quoted as saying that a gun, a tank or a plane to-day is worth five next month and thirty next year. But we are not getting maximum production under our present system. I have travelled throughout the length and breadth of this province, in which many of our industries are situated, and I have yet to find any group of workers who are agreed that the industry in which they are working is putting forth a maximum production.

I hold in my hand a memorandum from a young man who for three months was employed in one of our industries. He was in the adjusting department of an organization producing range-finders, but at the expiration of three months he resigned because he had nothing to do. He tells me that, first of all, he put in three months training at one of our war emergency schools, and that at the expiration of that time he just sat on a stool. All he had to do was to sit, hour after hour, and hold in his hand a little three-foot stick. He grew tired of that, so he turned the flanges on a little piece of scrap metal, nailed it to the floor and made a permanent stick. But in doing that he lost his job. That was all that could be found for this man, who had had three months' training, in a vital war industry.

Over the last week-end I spoke to a group of men from one of our Toronto aeroplane plants. They told me that in that plant groups of men stand around day after day, with nothing to do. They spend their time in the washroom, and in making tools for themselves. They are told that there is no material. The contract is on a cost-plus basis, and the government pays the men's wages as long as they remain at the plant. There seems to be no necessity for production in that plant. These men, veterans of the great war, are now protesting against the type of thing taking place to-day in our war production factories.

I mentioned this condition to an engineer of twenty years standing in the Canadian General Electric plant at Kingston. He said, "If you were to say week on end instead of day on end, you would be describing the Kingston situation exactly".

Shortages have already developed. There is a shortage of copper because three companies which control 90 per cent of the world's copper have refused to mine it at the price set by the United States government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. L. P. LIZOTTE (Kamouraska): (Translation). Mr. Speaker, the last time I had the honour to address the house was during the debate on the plebiscite, February 5 last, when I opposed this referendum to the people which the government deemed necessary. I did not imagine that I might have to rise again a few weeks later to record anew my opposition to a government measure, and to vote against a bill authorizing the conscription of men for overseas service.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that I foresaw, as the logical result of this plebiscite, that compulsory service in any theatre of war would be resorted to, but I sincerely believed that the administration would wait a few months and give a fair trial to the voluntary system, which has furnished such excellent results, before introducing this grave measure, the stumbling block of national unity in this country.

The government's pledges at the time gave us no warning whatever of such a rapid climax.

The bill we are now considering and which was introduced only fifteen days after the plebiscite vote, fully justifies the stand taken at the very outset by a small group of Liberal members.

Truly, for once, I would have preferred being wrong. I am pleased to see now that a large number of our colleagues from Quebec, who claimed previously that we were on the wrong track, have the courage to admit they were in error.

We had guessed only too well the colour of the cat in the bag held out to the electorate. We had a thousand reasons for warning the voters of the province of Quebec and especially the people of our own constituencies. We were justified in telling them that the plebiscite was the direct road to conscription for overseas service, and that voting day, April 27, would be the last occasion given to them to pass on this grave issue. In this connection, I recall the observation made by a famous Canadian orator, whom the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) knew intimately: "There are times when it is right to be wrong, but it is never wrong to be right."

If Quebec, on her part, fully understood the issue at stake, how can anyone blame her to-day for frankly expressing her opinion in the matter, as she was requested to do?

Under our democratic system, it is true that the minority must yield to the majority and obey the laws of the country; however, the minority must be granted the privilege of stating its views. The province of Quebec could do no more, on plebiscite day, April 27 last, and it has done so peacefully, although courageously and eloquently. Who will deny to my fellow citizens the right to think independently and to express their thoughts in their own words?

It is hard to deny that the French Canadians are not newcomers in this country of ours. They have been bound to the Canadian soil for the last 300 years; they have conquered the vast forests and settled the greater part of the territories we now inhabit. Among their assets, they reckon their toil, their sacrifices, their struggles for the right to speak their own language, to profess their own religion and to keep their own traditions; all this confers on them the right at least to state their opinion on subjects of general interest to the country. They must have the right to resist sentimental appeals and judge this matter of conscription with great calm. I may state in passing, that, on plebiscite day, Quebec was probably the only province whose decision was based on a full knowledge of the question.

Indeed, in no other province had this subject been so fully discussed, before April 27. In our province the campaign has been waged both for the affirmative and the negative. In other parts of the country no one has stated the arguments in favour of the negative vote; the campaign was exclusively for the affirmative and the arguments never appealed to the intellect, but only to sentiment. In Quebec alone have the two points of view been expounded; the arguments in favour of a "no" vote have been as prominent as those favouring an affirmative verdict. And it is after such a controversial discussion of the whole subject, that I state that Quebec was in a better position than any other province to judge the matter intelligently.

After the war, when peace of mind is restored, it will be easier to realize that ordinary common sense has again taken refuge in the province of Quebec.

It was so evidently acknowledged that the French-speaking province constituted an important part of the Canadian population, that it was to that province that the government made the commitments from which they later asked the English-speaking provinces to release them.

In 1939, the following proposition was made to Quebec: support us in declaring war and we pledge ourselves never to adopt conscription for overseas service. The answer was: Yes.

Support us in participating in the bloody European war through our men, our supplies our munitions and we pledge ourselves never to adopt conscription. Quebec answered, Yes.

Support us in implementing a mobilization measure to train our men in our country and even to conscript them for the defence of Canada; we shall insert in the act a section—section 3 which we are now asked to strike out—which will protect you against conscription for overseas. Again the answer of Quebec was: Yes.

One day we were told: a moderate war effort is now out of the question; we must go the whole way in resources, munitions, armaments and finance, if we are to stop Hitler; we must resort to a total war; however, we shall not have conscription. Quebec's answer, again, was: Yes.

Another day we were told: your savings must be turned over to the state through a victory loan; you must contribute to the Red Cross fund; your daughters and wives must forgo their leisures to supply, free of charge, articles of clothing to our soldiers. Make these sacrifices courageously. We shall not have conscription for overseas service. Again, Quebec magnanimously answered: Yes.

Quebec was told that her sons were needed for the defence of the British Isles and to fight Hitler in foreign lands. However, we could rest assured that our sons could continue to enlist voluntarily and voluntarily lay their lives down for freedom and civilization. Quebec again, in a magnificent effort, answered: Yes.

Those, Mr. Speaker, were the happy days, the days where all provinces worked hand in hand, where the various races had faith in one another; those were the days when the perfect unity wrought by Lapointe and Cardin remained sacred.

However, once the great Canadian leader had departed, the Quebec people were told: We now wish to cancel the solemn pledges we made to you about conscription for service overseas. We therefore ask you to release us from our commitments.

That time, the Quebec people, who believed in the pledged word arose in a body and answered: No!

Quebec was told, at the time of the plebiscite, that conscription was not an issue; yet, a fortnight after the answer had been given, the government introduced in this house a bill authorizing conscription for service overseas under the pretext that such a reversal of policy is a logical outcome of the answer given in the plebiscite by a majority of the people in this country. Quebec—and there is nothing surprising about that—answers to-day even more emphatically: No!

Could a different answer logically be expected?

It should not be forgotten that the Quebec people were not the only ones who answered "no". In all fairness, it should not be overlooked that hundreds of thousands of citizens voted "no" in the English-speaking provinces. Outside the province of Quebec, 600,000 people gave a negative answer, which would represent the vote in the four provinces which have the smallest population. Yet, no one has, to my knowledge, charged with disloyalty our English-speaking fellow citizens who voted "no", and who thereby voiced their opposition to conscription.

Why have we refused to release the government from its commitments and why do we maintain our opposition to conscription for service overseas?

Let us overlook, if you wish, the doctrine that has been advocated for 25 years by our outstanding statesmen; let us overlook the formal and solemn promises that have been made to the Canadian electors for, according to the new political code now in force, it seems that the pledged word is no more the pledged word. These two words should, I imagine, disappear from the political dictionary according to the circumstances, the contingencies and the whims of the party in power.

We cannot understand why Canada, a small country with a population of ten million, which has given a war effort proportionately greater than the other allied countries and which is prepared to pursue the same course under the same principle, has to impose compulsory service for overseas while other countries and other dominions, as much interested as we are, refuse to adopt such a policy.

It has been said and I repeat that the Australian parliament has just voted against conscription. The dominion of south Africa has refused to impose this coercive measure that some people want to impose upon us.

Northern Ireland, a part of the United Kingdom, has also refused to adopt that policy. And I have not yet heard it said that the citizens of that country were to be considered as disloyal because they had not agreed to coercion being applied to send their sons abroad. On the contrary, it is unanimously admitted that they are waging a total war. Then I ask you, Mr. Speaker, why should Canada and the province of Quebec be treated in a different way.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Lizotte.]

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LIZOTTE: Mr. Speaker, indulging in a good habit of mine I will not tax the patience of the house too much, because, along with all other members, I am anxious to hear my learned colleague from the Quebec bar, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent).

When the house adjourned at six o'clock, I was motivating our opposition to compulsory military service for overseas and, particularly, our opposition to the present bill embodying the principle of conscription.

Is there anybody to assert to-day that the voluntary system of recruiting is inadequate? To believe such a statement, it would be necessary to ignore the declarations made by the Prime Minister and those made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) as well as the reports made by the officers in charge of recruiting. During the last few months, more men were enlisted in the active army than were necessary to fill its quotas, and the French Canadians responded more fully than other elements in this dominion. Let anyone contradicting this statement furnish the figures we have been asking for so long about the racial origins of the members of our active army, and we shall see!

And now, Mr. Speaker, what about national unity? In a speech broadcast on February 22, 1940, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe said:

> Did not our party succeed in convincing most members of parliament that to maintain unity in Canada our war effort must be and must remain on a voluntary basis?

That is still a requisite of national unity which must appeal to most hon. members.

On February 5, I said in this house that the plebiscite that was imposed upon us would jeopardize national unity and destroy the life-work of Messrs. King, Lapointe, Cardin and Power. Was I not right? Consider what has taken place since April 27.

There are some who, ignoring all our sacrifices and self-denials so far, would throw eight provinces against one. We are called isolationists, traitors, cowards, fifth columnists, and this solely because, although willing to contribute to the common cause, our opinions differ as to a method of carrying on the war effort that they suggest knowing it to be useless and detrimental to victory.

We are already making enough concessions, in my humble opinion, that this minor one should at least be granted to us, for the sake of national unity. But I am led to believe that national unity is not very highly prized in some quarters; they prefer to give way to feelings that have nothing evangelical about them.

If it must be, Quebec will submit to isolation, as we were isolated in 1917, but let my friends, especially those from Ontario, remember that Toronto is as far removed from Quebec as Quebec is from Toronto and that we can perfectly stand alone, if the two most important provinces of confederation must be isolated.

Any conscription measure for overseas service will necessarily impede the defence of Canada. If we admit that our country is threatened, we must also admit that its defence is our first duty. I fail to understand that the fact that our country is endangered; that German submarines are presently or have been in the gulf of St. Lawrence; that our coasts are exposed to enemy fire, could be turned into arguments in favour of a measure, the immediate effect of which would deprive Canada of all its defenders. I must admit that the logic of such a conclusion is beyond me.

If the enemy is already on our coasts, shall we make an appointment to meet him in the British Isles? He might not keep the rendezvous, and, on our return, perhaps we would find him comfortably entrenched in our homes.

We are told that it is imperative for us to search the enemy at a great distance, since it is impossible to defend our shores due to the vastness of the ground we have to cover. To me, this seems a good reason to keep all our forces within our boundaries, unless we are strong enough to trap the enemy on his own territory.

If we improve the means of communication within the country, we shall be in a better position to assemble, in due time, the necessary troops in the threatened area. To attain this end, we need all our men. If we are short of them, I feel that this is a sufficient reason to keep all we have.

I claim that, to draw our defenders from the coasts at a time when the enemy is at our doors is not only illogical, but an act of desertion for which, I am sure history will make us answerable.

In his speech of June 10, the Prime Minister admitted that conscription for overseas service was not required at the moment. I share the same opinion and that is one of the main reasons why I am presently opposed to any conscription measure for overseas service. In the same speech, the Prime Minister stated in substance that, by the plebiscite, the government requested the Canadian population to release them from previous commitments and that they had obtained this release. For this reason, the government is now asking parliament to give them the same freedom of action.

As for me, I must reply to the right hon. Prime Minister that the people of Quebec have refused to release most of their representatives from past commitments. The voters in my constituency have refused to release me from mine, and I who represent them here have no right to release the government and no mandate to support this measure.

I shall not take up the time of the house any longer. I merely wished to emphasize the reasons for which we oppose conscription for overseas service that the government desires to enforce.

I now feel justified in having obeyed the dictates of my conscience by adopting the stand I did at the outset of the session. And if I felt obliged to forsake, over this dangerous issue, the leadership of a man in whom I placed the utmost confidence, you may be sure I did so with regret. It is sometimes possible to come to terms with a government over fiscal issues, but never in the matter of a blood tax.

If Mr. King should ever enforce conscription for overseas service in Canada, he will betray his past and repudiate his best friends. In such an event, it is not Quebec that will forsake Mr. King, but Mr. King who will forsake Quebec.

I urgently request our leader, before he takes the supreme decision of enforcing this grave measure, despite the solemn pledges he gave our province and this country—and from which the province of Quebec in particular has not released him—to remember the substantial and generous support he has ever enjoyed from the solid Quebec bloc, for it is this bloc that has been the cornerstone of the Liberal party and has kept it in power.

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I had always hoped to deliver in the French language my first speech in this house, but as I began to jot down my notes I remembered that in 1920 I had the opportunity of speaking at a congress of the Canadian Bar association, before an audience made up of citizens from every part of the country. Now, I wish to quote to-night part of what I said at that time, and to make a few statements with regard to the relations between French-speaking and English-speaking citizens and I would not like to leave any of my English-speaking fellow-members under the impression that I would have made my remarks stronger in French than

I would dare make them in the language which is more familiar to them. Besides, all my fellow-members from the province of Quebec will understand me just as well in English as in French. Moreover, if any one outside this house, whether in the province of Quebec or elsewhere is sufficiently anxious to know what I said, he will find an accurate translation of my remarks in the French Hansard.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I had intended to make all my remarks in this debate in French, but I have some things to say about the relations between English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, which I should not like any of my English-speaking colleagues to feel that I would express more freely in French than I would wish to do in the language which they understand better.

This debate, and the agitation of which it has been the occasion in the country and in the press, may seem to a great many of us to be regrettable incidents in the life of the Canadian nation.

The bill itself is the logical consequence of the recent vote on the plebiscite, and the attitude of those who support the bill and of those who oppose it is probably also the logical consequence of the way in which the electors themselves divided on the plebiscite.

It is, of course, unfortunate that such divisions of opinion in the Canadian nation should occur, but these divisions are unavoidable, and may remain unavoidable for a long time to come. They are regretted by many good Canadians, but I do not think they should be looked upon as discouraging. They seem to be one of the unescapable consequences of the situation in which providence has placed the citizens of this nation. Although it is true that Canadians of the two major races usually act as realists, all too frequently, in their speeches, in their discussions and in their dissensions, they adhere to ideals and fancies which it is difficult to reconcile.

They are descended from two different stocks, stocks which for centuries were inimical, and whose social developments were different. These social developments remained different because of the determination, conscious or unconscious, of each person to assert apparent and well-characterized reasons for preferring his nationality, his mentality, his aspirations, and his social concepts, to those of the other race, and even at times to regard the very qualities of the other race as defects.

Providence has placed vigorous offsprings of these two races side by side in these new lands of America; and stern reality, without taking from them any of their racial traits, has forced them to work together toward the building up of a new nation. This paradoxical situation has always been evident to everybody, and even during peace time thoughtful Canadians have always sensed the necessity of taking it into account.

It was in 1920 at a meeting of the Canadian Bar association that I was called upon for the first time, here in Ottawa, to speak to a group made up of Canadian citizens from all parts of Canada. I ventured to say then that we were all of one country and though, had it been given to us to choose, some might have preferred less heterogeneous groupings, these groupings did constitute the mass of the Canadian people, the only material out of which the Canadian nation can grow. I added at that time:

> If we hope to see a broad national spirit weld our people more closely together, should we not be mindful that such a spirit must involve the pride of the individual in the well ordered state of social conditions throughout the whole of Canada, as well as in the natural beauties and incomparable resources of its far-flung provinces? A national spirit cannot attach to the soil alone; it must comprise men who dwell upon it, the institutions which make them a body politic, and also the private laws which crystallize their attitude towards each other and their methods of realizing human progress.

There has been some progress since 1920; and in spite of the difficulties of these times, in spite of all that has been said and written in these last months, yes, and even in spite of the vote that will be given on this bill, that progress will not be wiped out. Of course, further progress must still be made, and I need only refer to something which has been said in this very house in corroboration of the assertion. May I call your attention, sir, to the words of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), spoken in this debate on Wednesday last and reported at page 3246 of Hansard:

> I have only to refer to the letter written a few days ago by the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to an officer of a political association in his own constituency, in which will be found this statement:
> "There is no intention for the time being to bring in conscription for overseas service, and I am sure that the present government would bring in such a measure only if it were absolutely necessary for our own salvation."

And he continues:

> Note the words "for our own salvation"—not for world salvation, not for the salvation of the united nations, not for the salvation of democracy and Christian civilization and all the ideals for which we are fighting—no, for our own salvation. What a narrow, limited—I was almost going to say unworthy vision is there, my countrymen!

The words "for our own salvation" are a literal translation of those I used in French, "pour notre propre salut." In the French context it was quite apparent that they referred to the defence and survival of Canada as contrasted with interests overseas, and it is also perhaps sufficiently clear in the translation. In any event I have nothing to withdraw from even their English translation. I do not feel any unworthiness in asserting that the duty of citizenship to bear arms and fight and die is a duty which the citizen owes only to his own country and its interests. Of course the salvation of his own country and its interests may, as they do in this instance, involve full participation in all the joint ventures of his and the other nations banded together in the common task of overcoming the common foe. But beyond that there is no obligation. It may be great and glorious to fight and die for the world's salvation, for the salvation of the united nations, for the salvation of democracy and Christian civilization; but that is a privilege of each man, a privilege he has the right to choose for himself; it is not a duty which citizenship imposes as an obligation correlative to the rights which citizenship guarantees as a privilege.

I reassert that view with all earnestness, and I venture to inform you, sir, that this is not a view which I seized upon as an opportunist to make an apt reply to the secretary of the Liberal association in my constituency. I well remember discussing with a friend of the leader of the opposition on September 20, 1939, this very question, and I will ask the privilege of repeating now some of the exact language I used at that time. Speaking of the people of my province, I said:

> Our loyalty cannot be expected to be one of traditional affection and sentiment but it is one based almost solely on a utilitarian viewpoint.
> Because of that viewpoint it is felt that our first duty is to Canada, and that Canadian interests must come first. Some feel that Canadian interests were well served by what we did in the last war, but many others feel that we went in much sooner than Canada's interest required and because of that provided more than our share of the north American contribution.
> Though some would volunteer to fight for France for sentimental reasons, no one would dare to say that it was a national duty for Canadians to fight for France. Similarly, though some would volunteer to fight for the United Kingdom, people here would not feel that it is a national duty for Canadians as such to do so.

That, sir, was my way of thinking and speaking in September, 1939, when I had no other responsibility than that of a private citizen of French origin, proud of my race and proud of being able to assert everywhere and at all times that our real Canadian patriotism was not inferior to that of any other citizens of this country.

In my view, conscription or no conscription was not then a proper test of that patriotism. I still adhere to the view that it is not now a proper test. It is our conception of the rights and obligations of citizenship which is at the root of whatever opposition there is in my province or among the people of my race to what they understand by conscription. It is not a word they are opposed to; it is the thing which the word "conscription" has come to symbolize in their minds. In their minds, conscription is the theory that they can be forced to enrol, train, fight and die for some other cause than that of their own country.

Of course, when an issue becomes controversial, there is a great deal of confused thinking, and still more loose talking about it, but in reality this dispute is just one of the manifestations of the fundamental reason for most of our difficulties.

I stated to the electors of Quebec East, in my address to them in opening my campaign on February 2, that there were in this country two very different concepts with respect to the real patriotism of its people. One, which is that of practically all Canadians of French origin, and a great many I am sure, if not the majority, of Canadians of other origins, has found its expression in the famous phrase used by Lord Tweedsmuir in 1937:

> Canada is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain, or from the United States, or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British commonwealth of nations but to Canada and to Canada's King, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

The other conception seems to many of us in Quebec to be characterized by a blind, sentimental, proud and even arrogant attachment to England, not only as the mother country, but as the real homeland toward which all loyal British hearts should ever turn. Did not a former prime minister of Canada on abandoning his mantle of leadership say, "I am going back home"? And did not another former prime minister of Canada reply, "How I envy you!"

Before I came to Ottawa I did not often read the Toronto newspapers, but I happened to be in the latter city on September 10, 1941, and I cut out from one of them the following leader:

> Mr. King misstates Canada's attitude.
> In his speech in London, Premier King told the British people that while Canada was proud of her position in the empire, her position in the empire would not of itself have sufficed to bring her into the war, and that unless Canadians had been satisfied that Hitler planned to dominate the world they would not have backed Britain in her struggle. Mr. King, whatever his own views about entry into the war may have been, is quite wrong about Canada and the Canadian people. If he had tried to keep this country out of a war in which the safety of Britain was at stake he would have been swept out of office by a tide of anger which neither he nor his government could have withstood.

I cut that article out because it seemed to me so truly to reveal the true mentality of a certain number of my English-speaking fellow citizens. To them it would appear that Canada could never be anything but a conquered colony, and the constant evolution of the last century of Canadian history, and even the statute of Westminster, have remained absolutely meaningless to them.

Sir Robert Borden was not of that school; but there are still too many hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends and supporters in certain parts of Canada whose footsteps seem to have lagged in the path which the Canadian nation has been treading since the days of William Lyon Mackenzie and Joseph Papineau, and those of Georges Etienne Cartier and John A. Macdonald, of Wilfrid Laurier and Newton Rowell, right down to the right hon. Prime Minister and my own immediate predecessor in the office of Minister of Justice.

Colonialism is one of the obstacles in the way of national unity. Unfortunately the difficulty is accentuated by the way in which Canada's war effort is sometimes viewed and spoken of, even outside Canada. We Canadians, of my province at least, do not feel that our participation in this war is just a part of somebody else's contribution to the common cause. We feel that Canada is in this war on its own, in its own interests; and without detracting one whit from our unbounded admiration for the great and valiant leaders of the United Kingdom and the United States, we feel that the rightful leader of and spokesman for Canada in the councils of the united nations is the head of our own state, the Prime Minister of Canada. We deplore the too frequently apparent tendency to forget or to overlook that fact.

Another obstacle to national unity is the attitude of those who look upon this war merely as a resumption of the last war, who feel that it should be carried on in the same way, with the same number of infantrymen holding the same lines and suffering the same ghastly numbers of terrible casualties. The Canadian people, I think, generally realize that this is not the trench warfare on a single front of the last war. It is not warfare to be won by the concentration of troops at any one given point. It is warfare all over the face of the globe, warfare on the seven seas, warfare in every sky, warfare in the shipyards and in the docks, in the factories and on the farms. I will not further develop that point, which was so much better developed this afternoon by my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). No one denies that the whole of our man-power should be employed, but how and where it can most effectively serve is not a question to be determined by the memories and fancies of those who have been constantly advocating immediate and rigorous general conscription for overseas service.

Another obstacle to national unity, and even to the most effective prosecution of this war, is the attitude of so many Canadians who loudly assert that we cannot have a total war effort without that kind of conscription. The leader of the opposition has said that we cannot have total war without full compulsory selective service for any and every theatre of war. Do the hon. gentleman and those whose views he expresses really think that Australia is not at the present time waging total war? Do hon. gentlemen who have supporters who belong to the Orange lodges of Ontario seriously contend that the people of northern Ireland, the men of Ulster and Belfast, are not waging total war? Australia and northern Ireland have not had to resort to conscription to do the things that constitute their total effort.

Another obstacle to national unity is the accusation levelled against French Canadians that they and their leaders, and especially their clergy, are deliberately abstaining from greater participation in the armed forces in order to bring about an increase in their proportion of the Canadian population, an increase in what the Shieldses and the Silcoxes, and even the Globe and Mail, have been pleased to call "French-Canada's stranglehold on this dominion." My opponent in Quebec East, among several demagogic appeals which he made, urged that very thing; and I need not tell you, sir, what was the answer of the large majority of the sound, sensible, thinking Canadians of that constituency. Had they not spoken their minds about it in the way they did, I would not be here addressing you this evening. To impute such thoughts and motives to our clergy is an indignity against which I protest with all the earnestness I can command. May I call your attention, sir, to just one or two passages in a collective pastoral letter signed by His Eminence the Cardinal and all the archbishops and bishops of the Roman Catholic church in this country, fifty-nine of them, and read in all the Catholic churches of Canada either on June 7 or June 14, 1942:

Because of continued developments in the war zone, our hopes for a complete victory, together with a just and lasting peace, seem deferred to a future more distant than we had anticipated. Indeed, the danger is coming nearer home and is threatening more ominously every day.

And further on:

One has only to study the anti-Christian doctrines and principles of nazism in the light of the encyclical "Mit brennender Sorge" of Pope Pius XI, and of the statements of the German hierarchy, and of the record of oppression and destruction in every country which has come under the yoke of nazism, to realize the extremities of barbarism, persecution and irreligion, to which it would reduce all nations in the world conquest of which it dreams and towards which it strives.

Consequently, dearly beloved in Christ, we were not surprised but sincerely and deeply elated at seeing you, from the very beginning of the conflict, generously respond to the call of your country. Truly a glorious page in our history will recall the devotion, courage and heroism aroused in our people by this present war.

Dearly beloved in Christ, you have taken your place side by side with your fellow citizens of every class and creed, in this ready and generous response.

And still further:

We must acknowledge that this spirit of sacrifice and devotion finds its highest expression in those who courageously enter active service, on land, on the sea, or in the air. We owe—

That is, the Catholic church.

—a tremendous debt of gratitude to our fellow citizens who are bravely rendering such admirable service to their country and to humanity in general. Their heroic courage is a pledge of final victory; their loyalty is a credit to our country; their fidelity to duty is the bulwark of our freedom. Every day we become more proud of their constancy and courage in the face of obstacles and struggles. They are showing themselves worthy of the past history of our brave young nation.

And just a few more lines, though I would commend the whole letter to the attention of hon. members who want to know what leaders of my church are thinking and saying to their people:

However, we must remember that a modern war is not won by the fighting forces alone. The war inflicted on us by our enemies demands a combined effort on the part of all people. We must therefore be prepared to support our fighting forces also in a material way; by our labour in war industries and agriculture and by participating in the auxiliary services. Again, by investing in war loans, by readily accepting the regulations concerning the saving and rationing of our resources, by submitting to the thousand restrictions imposed on us by wartime production and civilian defence, by assisting in plans for rehabilitation after the war; in all these ways we can devote ourselves to the welfare of our country. It is a source of joy to us that you have grasped this truth and have responded generously.

That, sir, is the attitude of the clergy of my faith; and may I add that of the fifty-nine signatories of this pastoral letter, thirty-five are of my race.

Of course there are extremists of my race. You have no doubt been scandalized, as I have been scandalized, to hear it asserted:

(Translation) Despite any and all opposition, we shall have our French State; and it shall be young, strong, radiant and beautiful, a spiritual centre, the dynamic pole of French America.

I ventured to suggest in a recent broadcast that we of French origin would be well advised to lay aside that chimerical dream, at least during these times of war and, I think, for a long time afterwards, if not forever. I was quickly and severely taken to task by a young writer in a young newspaper which was publishing the ninth issue of its first volume. But neither you nor I nor any other sincere and thinking citizen of this country need attach too much importance to the assertion that this is the attitude of the youth of my race. I have talked with thoughtful leaders of the nationalist movement—and I believe them to be sincere—and they have assured me that none of them are looking to the establishment of a sovereign French state on this continent—not at least during the lifetime of anyone living to-day.

I said at the outset that we must be realists, and that in fact we are realists, though we speak and discuss and even bicker all too frequently on fanciful premises. We of French origin are now about three million units of the Canadian population. A hundred and seventy-five years of British connection have conclusively shown that we are not going to be assimilated. Our ancestors have been here for three centuries. Members of my own family have witnessed all the important events in Canadian history. Our roots have bored deeply into this land which our ancestors wrested from the forest primeval. This Canada is our country and our only country. It is here we are anchored by ties which cannot be destroyed, and it is here that we must stay.

There is no other land on the face of the globe to which we, Canadians of French origin, can go; but we are not alone here. We are less than 30 per cent of the Canadian population and less than 2 per cent of the English-speaking population of the north American continent. We know that we could not dominate Canada, just as we know that Canada could not dominate the north American continent; nor have we any wish for domination over anyone. But we do wish to be recognized as full partners and full citizens anywhere and everywhere in Canada.

We are Canadians, and we intend to remain Canadians. Canada has been for the last seventy-five years the "Dominion of Canada", organized by and governed under the British North America Act of 1867, and the amendments thereto. That act did not create an ideal situation. It is not an ideal situation for a nation to see its sovereignty split up between different governments and legislative bodies. It is not an ideal situation to have to resort so frequently to the courts of justice to have them determine whether or not a statute which has been passed by a parliament or a legislature is or is not a valid law entitled to obedience and execution.

But the problem which the fathers of confederation had to deal with was a real problem, and it had to be solved in a realistic fashion. That problem may or may not be as acute now as it was then, but it still exists and, if it had to be solved again, thinking Canadians, those who know how to face facts in a realistic way—and they are the majority everywhere—would still have to solve it in much the same fashion.

This war is another problem, and a very real problem. It may have appeared to some at the outset to have started out to be just another European war. But we were all very soon forced to recognize its true nature, and also recognize that it is a war which has to be won, or Canada will go down with the rest of Christian civilization. We are all determined that it shall be won, and I think we are all, or at least the very great majority of us all, resolved to do everything and anything that may be necessary so that it shall be won.

Of course there are a great many who are violently opposed to the thing symbolized by the word "conscription". During the recent plebiscite campaign they organized a vigorous movement to secure a negative vote. You possibly may think, sir, that they also, or at least a great many of them, are an obstacle to national unity. Be that as it may; does it not strike you as passing strange that in order to get a hearing among the people of my province they had to call themselves a league for the defence of Canada? It may be that they do not envisage the defence of Canada as you do, or as I do; but they recognized that the people to whom they wished to appeal were just as determined as you are or as I am that Canada shall be defended and shall be successfully defended.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

I do not think, sir, that this league portends any serious menace to the ultimate unity of Canada—and by "Canada" I still mean the confederation of all the Canadian provinces. Such movements may be sincere, but unless they deal with national problems in a realistic and realizable fashion, they are not movements that endure.

I wonder how many of our colleagues remember that in 1849 there was formed in Montreal a "League for the Separation of Canada from the British Connection and the Union upon Equitable Terms with the Great North-American Confederacy of Sovereign States"? I wonder how many know that an annexation manifesto was signed by 793 prominent citizens of Montreal, to offset the terrible catastrophe that resulted from the repeal of the corn laws in the mother country —a movement that was termed in the North British Mail of the time in the following rather illuminating language:

> It is not the tyranny of the Colonial Office, the partisanship of Lord Elgin, the predominance of the French race, the inconveniences of monarchy, or the superior advantages of republicanism which form the impelling force of the Canadian Annexationists, but the loss of protection previously afforded to Canadian products. The loyalty of these gentlemen begins and ends with a discriminating duty in favour of their wheat and butter. Give the merchants of Montreal a monopoly of the British markets, and they are red-hot Britons; place them on a fair equality with the merchants of the world, and they become true-blue Americans.

I wonder how many know that of the twenty officers of the annexation association, sixteen were English-speaking Canadians, and four were French-speaking Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, that was in 1849; and we of the generation of 1942 know that the British connection was not broken. We know that all that was achieved and all that remains of this movement is the fact that the descendants of those who signed the manifesto are none too proud of what was done, and that is why I have not mentioned any names in connection with it.

We know that all else which remains are a few copies of the manifesto and a few articles about it in the archives of our better-stocked libraries. I think we may confidently hope that what will remain of the present league for the defence of Canada will also be some stray pages of newspapers or pamphlets in the archives of the better-stocked libraries of future generations.

The real league for the defence of Canada, in so far as the people of my race are concerned, has no signed role of membership, or any specially elected officers to speak on its behalf. Its spokesmen have habitually been the leaders of my church. It is they who gave the real lead in 1775 and in 1812; it is they who also helped pacify the state after the troubles of 1837. It is they who facilitated the acceptance by Lower Canada in 1867 of the pact of confederation. It is they, again, who say to the people of my race and my religion at this time, "The danger is coming nearer home and is threatening more ominously every day," and who add that "love of country and devotion to duty finds its highest expression in those who courageously enter active service on land, on sea and in the air."

The people of my race sometimes speak in their legislature, the Legislative Assembly of Quebec. There has been some misconception about the purport and effect of a resolution adopted in that legislature by 61 "ayes" against 7 "nays" on May 20, last. I shall read just the first recital, and I would invite those who have entertained the idea that the Legislative Assembly of Quebec was pronouncing against an all-out war effort to listen to the text of the resolution. The first recital is:

> That whereas the province of Quebec, by the voice of its legislature, intends to reaffirm its unalterable determination to carry on, together with the other provinces of the country, the war effort made since the beginning of hostilities, until final victory.

Although I have spoken at considerable length, I have not yet adverted to the real problem raised by the motion for the second reading of this bill. This bill is to amend an enabling statute and to enlarge the powers conferred by that statute. Neither the original statute nor the bill determine what must be done to win the war. But they do empower the government to adopt all and any such measures as may be required to that end. I am convinced that we all want to win the war and that we are all prepared to submit to any measure which may be absolutely necessary for that purpose. One of the French papers which waged a most vigorous campaign for the "no" vote during the plebiscite, had this to say on April 16:

> The Canadian government would betray its duty if in the case of absolute necessity it did not resort to conscription for overseas service. Its moral undertakings can avail, the government is morally bound not to impose conscription for overseas service, only in the event that measure is not absolutely necessary to maintain the free existence of Canada.

No thinking person can, therefore, have any objection to the government resorting to conscription for overseas service in the event of absolute necessity. The question, therefore, as to whether or not this enabling legislation should be passed is one of confidence in the government to use it only if and when it may be necessary to do so.

I was surprised and pained to learn from my former colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) that he could not support this enabling legislation and felt that it was his duty to resign in protest against it. I shall not take time to examine the legislation; I shall not take time to examine the regulations; I shall not take time to examine the proclamations, nor shall I take time to examine the special regulations under the Militia Act; there may be other opportunities to do that. I was indeed sorry to part company with my hon. colleague; but in spite of the difficulties which the future may hold in store for the members of this government, I felt that it was my duty to carry my portion of whatever responsibility may be involved.

Others of my colleagues in this house from the province of Quebec have intimated that they, too, felt that they could not assume the responsibility of supporting this legislation. They say that they made promises to their constituents and that, just as the Prime Minister could not act until he had been relieved from his previous undertakings, they felt that they have not been relieved. This is a matter which each man must decide according to his own conscience.

I have had but little experience here, but I have had thirty-seven years experience at the bar of Quebec. Every time a client brought me a case, I conducted that case. If he was not satisfied with the measures I thought were useful and necessary to prosecute the case to a successful conclusion, he got another lawyer. I had to determine what was required; that was within my province. In this house it is not a case of Burke having said so. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that legislation is a matter of judgment and discretion, discerning determination, not a matter of will. It is not because Burke said so; it is because we have been elected to this Canadian parliament to conduct to the best of our ability the business of Canada in such a manner as will enable Canada to survive, that each one of us should exercise his own best judgment.

My time has practically expired, and I do not want to trespass on this my first occasion. I have had a flattering reception in public life. When the right hon. Prime Minister invited me to join his government and my acceptance was publicized, the press of the whole country was most flattering. You, sir, and all my colleagues in this house have been most kind to me. I accepted these responsibilities because I have always felt that it was possible for English-speaking Canadians and French-speaking Canadians to get along together. I still think that there is more in each group worthy of admiration, worthy of being conserved, than there are things which might make one group offensive to the other. It may not be easy to make that apparent to everybody at all times, but the attempt to make it apparent to all Canadians seems to me to be a task worthy of the best efforts of all true Canadians. My hope was and still is that I may be of some assistance in the accomplishment of as much of that task as is possible in our day and generation. I venture to suggest that some part of that task will be promoted if the citizens of both groups will put forth their best endeavours to avoid irritation and exasperation in those of the other group. I do not use the word "appeasement," because that word has fallen into ill repute. No Canadian requires to be appeased, but all Canadians require to have inspired in them a greater and ever-increasing measure of confidence in the sincerity and right-mindedness of their fellow Canadians.

I think this Canadian government, made up as it is of sincere Canadians drawn from all the principal races which make up the Canadian population, can be trusted, even in a time of crisis, to do the right thing at the right time and in the right manner. I will vote for this bill because I think its adoption is an expression of that confidence in ourselves and in our desire that Canada shall survive and that future generations of Canadians will still have, as we ourselves have had, the rights described by the Prime Minister in this language:

> The right of men, rich and poor, to be treated as men; the right of men to make the laws by which they shall be governed; the right of men to work where they will at what they will; the right of womankind to the serenity and sanctity of the home; the right of children to play in safety under peaceful heavens; the right of old men and women to the tranquillity of their sunset; the right to speak the truth in our hearts; the right to worship in our own way, the God in whom we believe.

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whom I should blame for having me follow the brilliant and able orator we have just heard. The predecessor of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) had become something of an idol to the Canadian people of every race and religion. If those people could have listened to-night to the words of the Minister of Justice, I am sure that he would now be enshrined in their hearts. After having listened to his address it is almost a temptation to me to take my remarks and throw them in the wastepaper basket. However, having become something of a nervous wreck from looking forward to this time, I am going to ask hon. members to bear with me for a few moments.

[Mr. St. Laurent.]

In a democracy the will of the majority is supposed to govern. Democratic government may have many faults, may at times appear slow and cumbersome, but many millions of people have believed and still believe that the democratic system of government is very much to be preferred to a dictatorship, where the word of one man is law.

The government of Canada asked Canadian citizens if they would be willing to relieve the government of a pledge given prior to the war, that, in the event of war, conscription for overseas service would not be put into effect. By a large majority the citizens of Canada replied in the affirmative. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has now introduced a measure and asked the sanction of parliament to remove sections two and three from the National Resources Mobilization Act, which in effect would leave the government free to do what in their view would be in the best interests of Canada, if and when the necessity should arise. It is true that we did have representatives of the people urging the citizens of Canada to vote "no" on the plebiscite. It is also true that we have representatives of the people in this house who will use their eloquence in an effort to defeat the proposal now before the house.

Personally I am going to support the proposal. One of my reasons for being willing to support it is that I have every confidence in the patriotism, ability and good judgment of the members of Canada's government. Having sat here for endless hours looking into the faces of the ministers, marvelling at their patience and self-control, and having some knowledge of the tremendous work they are carrying on in behalf of Canada's war effort, I repeat I have no lack of confidence in any one of them. In spite of the numerous times I have listened to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) cruelly, unfairly and adversely criticize the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), I still believe that in that minister we have the right man in the right place in so far as Canada's part in the preservation of civilization is concerned.

I have here a short report of the war record of some of our cabinet ministers which I think ought to be taken into consideration when weighing the experience and ability of the men who are conducting Canada's war effort.

The Minister of National Defence was seriously wounded; he won the D.S.O. and bar; he was mentioned in dispatches; and he now has a son in the army overseas.

The Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) was twice wounded during the last war; he was mentioned in dispatches; he has one son at Hong Kong from whom he has not heard, and another son is in the air force overseas.

The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) both served overseas in the last war.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) served overseas and was mentioned in dispatches.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) was seriously wounded during the last war, in 1915 and again in 1917; he won the Military Cross and the Belgian Order of Leopold, as well as the highest award of the French army.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) served in the British navy during the last war.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) served in Siberia and other places in that four years struggle.

The Prime Minister of Canada has had a long lifetime of training, and in my view is more fit than any other Canadian to hold the position he now fills in this awful struggle to save freedom and liberty from being extinguished from the earth. He has the faculty of finding the right man for the job. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) are good examples of his wisdom and good judgment in that respect.

Facing the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet who surround him, knowing something of their work and past record, I have no hesitation in following their lead and supporting this proposal.

Some time ago many of us must have had a disquieting feeling when we read of the pronouncement of Mahatma Gandhi that only passive resistance would be used against an army invading India. You know, Mr. Speaker, Mahatma Gandhi is the man who wears a loin-cloth, operates a spinning wheel and drinks goat's milk. India is a land of great wealth, a land of unbounded natural resources, an attractive target for a gangster. Recently, however, I was comforted to read an article in the Toronto Star Weekly of May 30, 1942, by Allan A. Michie. I intended to read a considerable portion of this article, but I realize that I must abbreviate it. The heading of the article is:

India breeds fighting men.
While party leaders disagree, India builds an army.
It's 1,250,000 strong, growing by 50,000 a month.

For your information, Mr. Speaker, I will read one paragraph:

Generally the men and officers of the Indian army take little interest in Indian politics and relatively few are Congress party adherents. Walking near Lahore with a British officer of the Indian army one day, I came upon a venerable old village headman followed by some fifty followers armed with copper-headed sticks. The headman, who'd retired from army service at the end of the last century, had hauled out a faded red uniform and donned it. He stopped us and inquired where the Lahore Congress party meeting was taking place. The British officer expressed surprise, and said, "What are you, a loyal soldier of the King, doing attending a Congress meeting?" "Attending nothing," snorted the old Indian, "we're going to break it up."

After reading that article, my mental comment on it was, "Thank God, in spite of the man who wears a loin-cloth, operates a spinningwheel and drinks goat's milk, India's army is on the march."

About the time of the taking of the plebiscite I was again disquieted because there were reports of rather riotous meetings being held in the province of Quebec addressed by the hon. member for Témiscouata and by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe). But in that same issue of the Toronto Star Weekly, I read an article by Gregory Clark. I assume that most of us know this well-known Toronto writer. I think he and his artist friend, Jimmy Frise, deserve a lot of credit for maintaining the humour which they display weekly in that paper. They have the ability to make people laugh—a rare gift and one which ought to be cherished and encouraged. We have a few, not many, in this house who do possess that gift. One of them is the hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario (Mr. Fraser), and it is not so long ago that there appeared in the Globe and Mail an editorial as a result of an incident wherein the hon. member for Northumberland made the members of this house laugh. Any attempt to kill the spirit of humour at a time like this either in this house or outside, anywhere in the country, appears to me to be little short of criminal. What would we do in this house if we had not such men as the hon. member for Northumberland or the Minister of National Defence for Air, or our hon. friend the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), to give us occasions to laugh. What would the British people have done had they not preserved their splendid sense of humour? Their Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Winston Churchill has consistently set them a very fine example in that respect.

Let me quote two paragraphs from an interesting article by Gregory Clark with regard to the province of Quebec:

For the first time since General Wolfe took Quebec from behind and captured the citadel guns, that, like Singapore's, never fired a shot, Quebec is to have a regiment of artillery. And you never saw a boy more proud of his first gun than the Quebec military men are when they tell you this piece of news. Too many things are left unsaid between Ontario and Quebec. If all the people of Ontario could meet all the people of Quebec in some sort of glorious garden party, no wedding could be more gay. But one of the things left unsaid until now is that Quebec has never had an artillery regiment of its own. Quebecers by tradition are footsloggers. Oh, they have a goodly number of French Canadians in all the services, artillery, signals, engineers and the medical corps. You will find plenty of them right in Toronto in the permanent as well as the active force. But a regiment of artillery, with a French name and French-Canadian officers and French-Canadian other ranks from sergeant-major to trumpeter, is something different. It is a matter of excitement to French Canadians and I tried to find out why. . . .

Ladies and gentlemen, nobody, Grit and Tory, has been much encouraged to be military this past twenty years less two. Maybe least of all Jean Baptiste. But he is in the navy by the thousand. And though the question has been asked scores of times in parliament and never answered as to the number of him overseas, my own impression from sundry visits abroad is that there are more than 30,000 of him long since in Britain or on the high seas.

That was a rather comforting article so far as I am concerned, after I had read about the riotious meetings of protest addressed by the hon. member for Témiscouata and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains. My comment was, "Quebec's army is on the march." But my happiness was enhanced by a speech by the premier of Quebec, published in the Ottawa Journal of June 5, 1942:

The premier spoke at the Bishop's College University commencement exercises after an honorary doctorate of law was conferred upon him.

"But those who know us deeply", he said, "are convinced that we are Canadians, united, resolute, organized, cooperative, ready for any test, any sacrifice, whether we are French or English.

"I do not make any distinction between Canadians of the two principal groups and I never made any. We are all Canadians and Canadian above all. As a Canadian of the French language, I have always exhorted my fellow citizens to act and think of Canada as a whole, as a North American nation in the British commonwealth. But above all we should be true Canadians—not provincialists, regionalists or cosmopolites.

That address savours of the address given by Abraham Lincoln at Gettysburg when he announced to the American people that there could be no north and south, but that they must be one people if they were to build up great nation. I would suggest that we in this Canada of ours cannot be Ontario and Quebec; we cannot be east and west, if we are to become a nation worthy of the name. We must work together cooperatively as one people. It is true that the majority of the citizens of Quebec voted "no" on the plebiscite; it is also true that three polls in my riding of Renfrew North voted almost unanimously "no" on the plebiscite. But that does not mean that those who voted no will fail to respond to any necessary call that this government deems necessary to make upon them. I believe they would be ready at any time to respond to whatever call might be found necessary, because they are no more anxious to be governed by Japs or by nazis than anyone else who voted "yes" on the plebiscite.

That brings me to another point. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in his address brought up the question again of union government, with the thought, I suppose, that it would tend to improve Canada's war effort if our cabinet were composed of some members of his group, some members of the Cooperative Conmmonwealth Federation group and some members of the New Democracy. I would ask the leader of the opposition this question: Since the beginning of the war, in the building up of our great army, where and how and when has Canada's war effort failed? As we look out, can we not all agree that Canada's great army from coast to coast has been and is steadily on the march? We have had all the recruits we could handle for the army, for the air force and for the navy; and if any member of this house would like to view some of the activities of Canada's war effort, I invite him to take a trip to Petawawa military camp in my riding, which I think I am safe in saying is perhaps the greatest artillery training camp in the world. On his way, travelling on highway No. 17, let him stop at Haley Station and go east a couple of miles and take a look at the magnesium plant that we have heard about in this house—a marvellous development. These are just samples of what is going on all across this great country.

What we might call a union government within this chamber might be a very weak government. The important point as I see it in this connection is that we have a united people working for one purpose all across this land. Our people have responded with magnificent energy. You find them, young and old, men and women, with their coats off, toiling and sweating in our laboratories, in our offices, in our factories, in our munition plants; you find them in every hamlet, in every town, on the farms, and you find on every battle-front the output manufactured by willing hands in thousands of plants. Our airmen ride the skies wherever the enemy can be found; our ships, manned by Canadian sailors, sail the seven seas; and our armies, to use the words of General McNaughton, are as a spear-head pointed at the heart of Berlin, perhaps the most highly trained army in the world, ready and waiting and eager for the privilege to go.

So, while union government may have its points, what can equal the spontaneous, united effort by all the people of very class without regard to politics, religion or race, a free people fighting for their own freedom?

If I may be permitted at this point I should like to put on record some figures just as an indication of what this great army of ours across this country has been accomplishing.

During the month of February, Canada sent to Russia $4,000,000 worth of arms. We sent $6,730,000 worth to India, $4,900,000 worth to Australia, $17,000,000 worth to Egypt, $3,297,000 worth to Iraq, $59,000,000 worth of arms and goods to the United Kingdom. Mark you, sir, this was for the month of February alone. This great work is increasing; this machine is growing in might and efficiency as the days go by.

I say again that I am going to vote for this measure, first, because I believe in democracy, and the majority of our citizens have already spoken; second, because I have confidence in Canada's cabinet. This confidence has been inspired partly because of the vast war machine created and operating across the country, and partly because of the spirit of unity which has been preserved so that our people from the Atlantic to the Pacific are working together with one purpose. I am persuaded that I can trust the wisdom and good judgment of this body of Canada's cabinet to do what is best, if and when the necessity arises.

Mr. WILFRED LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the speech in which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that the deletion of section 3 did not mean conscription, and that such conscription was not necessary. Now this section 3 is the sole guarantee we obtained at the time of the passing of the mobilization act, a guarantee given at the request of Quebec's representatives, against the compulsory drafting for overseas service of selectees already training under the provisions of the mobilization act. Again this afternoon I heard the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) declare that conscription is not necessary. A short while ago, I heard the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) repeat once more, in the course of a magnificent speech for which he is to be congratulated, that such a measure is not necessary. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said the same thing.

Why then, Mr. Speaker, if conscription is not necessary, are we asked to pass a bill establishing the principle of compulsory service? Analysing the arguments set forth in this house since the outset of the present debate, analysing each speech, one observes that the conclusion drawn is always the same. Conscription is not necessary. Why then ask us to adopt a legislative measure which establishes the principle of conscription by doing away with the sole statutory guarantee we possess at the moment? No, Mr. Speaker, I think all this is part of a manoeuvre designed to split the opposition vote at the end of the debate, to divide among themselves Quebec's representatives by convincing the members of that province that conscription will not be enforced and that the government will respect its pledges, even though the very principle of the measure clearly indicates that the province of Quebec is to be deceived once again.

For twenty-five years, Mr. Speaker, during its political campaigns in the province of Quebec, the Liberal party led by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King has denounced Canada's participation in foreign wars as well as conscription for overseas service.

At each election, they would state that if returned to power, they would keep their pledges whenever the opportunity arose. The Liberal party, through its leader, then asserted that our participation in any war logically led to conscription, and that this country did not possess enough resources from the standpoint of man-power or finance, to participate in another war.

Like many others, I believed in those pledges and I was even one of the delegates who, at the Liberal convention of 1919, played an enthusiastic, if modest part in the selection of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King as leader of our party.

Nothwithstanding my high regard for the Prime Minister and for his opinions, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that since 1939 I have witnessed with regret the discarding of the platform which had then been adopted and which had brought about the selection as leader of the party of the man who is now at the helm in this country. I observe with dread and sadness the discarding of that splendid platform which I have upheld for twenty-five years and which we were wont, in every electoral contest, to set off against the out-and-out anti-Canadian imperialism of the Conservative party, whose political principles I abhor. Pledges have been broken at a startling rate since 1939.

We witnessed the first of these violations on the 9th of September, 1939.

As a matter of fact on that very day, prior to the declaration of war by our parliament, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada, made the following declaration, which may be found on page 51 of Hansard. I quote:

I should like to make clear to the house the procedure which the government have in mind as to giving effect to the decision of parliament regarding Canadian participation in the war.

The adoption of the address in reply to the speech from the throne will be considered as approving not only the speech from the throne but approving the government's policy which I set out yesterday of immediate participation in the war.

If the address in reply to the speech from the throne is approved the government will therefore immediately take steps for the issue of a formal proclamation declaring the existence of a state of war between Canada and the German Reich.

On that same day, the 9th of September, 1939, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, speaking on behalf of the government of the day, which is still in power, made the following declaration, as reported on pages 68 and 69 of Hansard:

The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec—the veteran leader of the senate, my good friend and colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), my friend and fellow townsman and colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power)—to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it. Is that clear enough?

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it not worth while to the Canadian nation when the nation is at war, to preserve unity on the side on which Canada will be—this unity which is represented by the province of Quebec in the government—behind the measures being taken to help our mother country and France?

May I add that if my hon. friends and myself from Quebec were forced to leave the government I question whether anyone would be able to take our place. If my hon. friends in the far corner of the house opposite: if the Ottawa Citizen, which just now is waging a campaign for conscription, think they are serving Canada by splitting it at the very outset of the war, then I say they are gravely and seriously wrong.

Provided these points are understood, we are willing to offer our services without limitation and to devote our best efforts for the success of the cause we all have at heart. And those in Quebec who say that we will have conscription, in spite of what some of us are saying, are doing the work of disunity, the work of the foe, the work of the enemy.

Thus did the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe explain the arrangement arrived at between the French-speaking and English-speaking ministers, in an attempt to safeguard the minority's rights against encroachment by the majority; this explanation given by Mr. Lapointe was confirmed as follows by the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada, on January 6, 1942:

Every hon. member of this house knows that, except for the assurance that, in the event of a European war, there would be no conscription for service overseas, this parliament would never have decided, in the immediate and unanimous manner in which it did, to stand at the side of Britain in the resistance of aggression, and the defence of freedom.

Hon. members are also aware that if, at the time when Canada's participation in the war was challenged in an election in the province of Quebec by a government professing a different political faith, a like assurance with respect to service overseas had not been given in the name of the present government by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and other Liberal leaders and members of this House of Commons from the province of Quebec, the verdict of the people of that province might have been wholly different.

Due to this arrangement it was possible to gain the almost unanimous support of the French-speaking members at the time of the declaration of war. At that moment I did not have much faith in such an arrangement, because I knew perfectly well that once war is declared, everything is possible, even conscription.

I was well aware that once we were at war, it would be wiser to attack the enemy in his own country than to allow him to attack our own territory, thus maintaining intact our sources and lines of supply. I also knew that even if our army were recruited on a voluntary basis, its strength in the field would have to be maintained should it decide to attack the enemy on the European continent; consequently the declaration of war was bound to be followed by conscription for overseas service.

I would have preferred it if my country, with her small population of 11 million men, less than the combined population of the cities of New York and London, and with her territory as large as Europe, had not declared war but had used her small man-power to set herself up as the arsenal and granary of the British empire.

That is why I voted against the address in reply to the speech from the throne on September 9, 1939, notwithstanding the appeal made by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, whose words I quoted a few moments ago. I then supported the following amendment, as shown in Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Canada, on Saturday, September 9, 1939. That amendment, which was negatived, was drafted as follows:

That the following words be added to the address:

That this house regrets that the government did not deem it fitting to advise His Excellency the Governor General that Canada should refrain from participating in war outside of Canada.

The second violation of these pledges took place on June 18, 1940.

In fact, on that date, when the mobilization bill, which to my mind was a conscription bill in disguise, was under debate in the house, the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, speaking on behalf of the government, made the following statement which I find on page 877 of Hansard:

Mr. Chairman, I feel perfectly at ease to explain my attitude on this question. Somebody speaks of the pledges given. I invite all my friends to read the observations I made in this house when war was declared; I invite them to read my speech of the preceding session on the subject of Canada's neutrality. I then said to my fellow countrymen that the province, one of whose representatives I have the honour to be, was opposed to compulsory service overseas, and that we would fight it. . . .

And as if to outdo that statement, at the same sitting of June 18, 1940, the Hon. P. J. A. Cardin made the following observations, set forth on page 896 of Hansard:

Mr. Speaker, some hon. members say that they cannot come to a decision without consulting their electors of the province of Quebec. There is no need of consulting the province of Quebec. The electors of Quebec were consulted twice in the space of a few months and they rendered an unanswerable verdict. Quebec said what she thought; she expressed her approval in a most striking manner of the policy of Canadian participation in the war. When she declared herself opposed to enforced registration and to conscription, she was thinking of conscription for overseas service.

Having always kept in my mind that when we declare war everything can happen, even conscription for overseas service, I did not believe these last statements nor those made by members of the cabinet. I was satisfied at the time that we were taking a further step toward conscription for overseas service, which the Liberal party had condemned so vigorously during twenty-five years in the province of Quebec. Therefore, in compliance with the mandate my electors had renewed in March, 1940, I supported the following motion which, according to Hansard, page 924, was couched in the following terms:

That all the words after "whereas" in the preamble of the bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor: "the government's war policy must be free and voluntary".

And the vote having been taken at the request of the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, I voted against the mobilization act of 1940, because I was then satisfied, as the facts prove to-day, that the government was leading us inevitably to conscription for overseas service, in spite of the statement made the following day, June 20, 1940, by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King,—see page 966 of Hansard:

Those who were anti-conscriptionists were against conscription for service overseas, and as long as this government is in office we are going to maintain that position and see that effect is given to it. That is just one of the reasons why, in carrying out the will and the wishes of the people, we do not propose to take into this government any of those whose object in coming into the ministry would be to see that conscription overseas was again made one of the issues in this country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, you have only to examine every one of the ministers occupying the treasury benches on your right to see that they form a living synthesis of formal denial of the words I have just quoted. Have we not even a minister who has declared during the plebiscite campaign that "if, following the plebiscite, conscription for overseas service were not immediately passed, he would without the least delay, join a coalition cabinet whose platform would call for the immediate enforcement of conscription for overseas service."

What a long road has been travelled since then and how many disguised untruths have been told the good people of Quebec in order to persuade them to vote "yes".

The third violation of these pledges took place on January 22, 1942, when the government requested the Canadian people in the speech from the throne, to release them from their commitments of March, 1940, to the effect that conscription for overseas service would not be resorted to.

I do not know what mind concocted the idea of the plebiscite, but allow me, Mr. Speaker, to state that I had never heard of such a stupid measure, evidently aimed at putting the minority group of this country at the complete mercy of the majority. The compromise entered into at the inception of war, in order to obtain the approval of Quebec for the war declaration, was trodden under foot. The confederation pact being nothing but a series of compromise, who can assure us that, to-morrow, a plebiscite may not be held to decide whether we are still to enjoy the right of speaking French in this house? Indeed, having started on the road to repudiation of commitments and pledges duly made as between the minority and majority groups in this country, there is no reason why we should not march on in the same road.

The hon. members of the government said and repeated everywhere, before the plebiscite, that if they were released from their pledges by the people, conscription for overseas service would not necessarily follow. But the government, a few weeks after the plebiscite, hasten to break their fourth promise in resorting definitely to conscription for overseas service by striking article 3 out of the mobilization act, the only clause compelling the government to obtain the written consent of a selectee before drafting him for service anywhere.

That is the last step I had anticipated when war was declared. Those who have deceived us up to now show themselves under their true colours in establishing conscription for overseas service by deleting article 3 from the act, the sole guarantee of our small population, especially that of Quebec, where families are larger than in any other province. Families of four and five children between the ages of 19 and 25 are not uncommon in Quebec whereas, in the other provinces, the average is one child per family.

And all this for what result? To obliterate the sanest element in the country, the element most deeply attached to the soil. To send our sons to all theatres of war, in order to replace them after the war with immigrants who will keep alive the traditions of those, already too many in Canada, who are solely attached to Europe and who do not understand the meaning of love for our country, Canada, our only homeland.

This immigration which I anticipate for the post-war period will throw wide open the doors to our participation in another European war, recurring fatally every 20 or 35 years, because those immigrants who replace our young Canadians will never accept the principle of Canada first and always.

I wish to protest forcibly and declare that I shall vote against the repeal of section 3 of the mobilization act, for if ever there was a time when we should keep our men in this country, employ them to the building of corvettes for the defence of our shores, and to supply our army with food and munitions, it is indeed to-day when we are exposed to enemy attack. That Canadian army is three times the size of that of the American or English army, in proportion to population and other considerations, if we take into account the fact that our war and agricultural industries already are suffering seriously from the diversion towards the army of the best human resources of the nation. Did not the Minister of Munitions and Supply declare recently that our war industries were 4,000 men short at the moment?

Why were we attacked recently in the gulf of St. Lawrence if not because all the corvettes we have built are now being used for convoy duty on the Atlantic when we need them here for the protection of our shores. Corvettes, more corvettes; coastal defences, more coastal defences; that is the slogan the Canadian government should adopt definitely if they understand the problem that the defence of Canada represents.

British troops are not yet in action on the continent and Canada's contribution so far is relatively greater than that of England herself. Let us therefore put a stop to that dangerous tendency of almost totally neglecting our own defences in order to sacrifice everything to Great Britain. If the axis powers should succeed in their effort to crush that first line of defence, and God forbid that they should, we would not have enough men left to beat off their attack, and the very serious problem which is now confronting Australia would then become ours to solve.

If this house should delete section 3 from the mobilization act, it will mean the elimination of the last obstacle to Canada's being bled white, even before we give a thought to our own defence. The Prime Minister may claim is is not intended to enforce conscription for overseas service, but what does compulsory military service without any limitation mean if not conscription for service anywhere? Under the bill before this house the young men who are mobilized will not be told to go immediately to such and such destination, but that they are mobilized and can be sent anywhere, at any time, for the efficient prosecution of the war. All is arranged beforehand except for the date of departure and the final destination.

Yet, the right hon. the Prime Minister, during the plebiscite campaign, stated that conscription was not contemplated. Once again the solemn pledges made to the province of Quebec have been put aside, and once more has the minority group been thrown on the mercy of the majority, through the secret machinations of those who, since September, 1939, were manoeuvring our country, despite the example of northern Ireland whose territory is much closer to the theatre of war, into a declaration of war and thus were supplying that section of the country most unfriendly to our province and our race, the opportunity of drawing unceasingly on the wonderful pool of men that the flourishing people of Quebec had succeeded in forming in the very interests of the Canadian nation, without any help from French immigration but through a miracle proceeding from the best and most generous traditions of which a nation may be proud, that of births.

Mr. Speaker, we are deeply undermining our splendid traditions, and racing toward defeat on the home front, for on the very admission of Mr. James Mess, civilian director of recruiting, communists are systematically seeking to creep into every Canadian unit and, through some unaccountable tolerance on the part of authorities, their task of breaking down and poisoning public opinion is allowed to go on, not only in our army but among our working population.

Mr. Mess's denunciation at Saskatoon has been confirmed even in Montreal. High officials have recognized the infiltration of communists into the Canadian army. They have even added that bolshevist agents have gone over to England with Canadian contingents.

Guilty mostly of excessive tolerance, the authorities dare not intervene because Russia is our ally. Yet they will be responsible for the difficulties which we will necessarily experience in solving the many problems that will inevitably follow the war, for we must not forget that communism is and remains an atheistic doctrine, subverting social order, persecuting all religion, destroying family ties and private ownership, all precious liberties we are fighting to preserve.

To be sure, I admire Russia's resistance to the invasion of its territory and, since we are at war and must win the war, it is good policy to help her achieve victory, for in doing so we are helping ourselves. Even if I opposed Canada's entry into the war and failed to share the government's views in this respect, I feel that we must win this war for our own good. But, please, Mr. Speaker, let us not allow bolshevist agents to dynamite the foundations of our country, for this dynamite might cause us bitterly to realize, on the morrow of victory, that we have lost the peace.

Mr. JOSEPH H. LECLERC (Shefford): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I first desire to congratulate very sincerely the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) for his splendid speech of June 11 last. Since the inauguration of this debate, his was the most eloquent speech, I believe. My congratulations are also due to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for his magnificent statement of yesterday, and to the hon. Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) for his masterly speech of this afternoon, which has been the greatest utterance against conscription since the inception of the present debate.

On February 17 last, I stated that although I did not approve the stand taken by some of our friends who intended to vote against the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I was nevertheless opposed to conscription for overseas service. At that date, we had not yet discussed the plebiscite bill and, as a Liberal, I had promised my frends to support the King government so long as they would not present a bill to amend the mobilization act. Since then, on April 27, a plebiscite has been held to request the electors to release the government from their past commitments. I did not vote for the plebiscite as I considered it inopportune and I went only as far as advising my fellow-citizens to vote freely according to their own views on the subject. I also refused to join the League for the Defence of Canada, partly recruited among Conservatives and men who, in 1940, promoted the election of Tory candidates who would have implemented conscription long before now without plebiscite and without considering the views of our population. It was evident that these meetings of the League for the Defence of Canada, whose speeches were highly publicized in the other provinces by newspapers unfriendly to us, were such as further to divide our country, for I believe that all the "no's" registered in the province of Quebec have had an adverse reaction in the other provinces and have created a grudge the consequences of which cannot now be foreseen.

Harmony between people of different racial stocks is not a very hardy plant in this country and a mere conflict of opinion may sabotage the union that is so essential between the races of our country which, although sparsely populated has nevertheless achieved a wonderful war effort.

Mr. Speaker, the day before the plebiscite the Prime Minister told the Canadian people that he did not consider the plebiscite as a vote of confidence in his government, and it was moreover said to us that it did not mean conscription. Much to the surprise of all, no sooner had the votes been counted than the government introduced a bill to amend the mobilization act, so that they might be empowered to enforce conscription for overseas service whenever they found it convenient.

Mr. Speaker, I must say that if the majority of the people in this country have, through the plebiscite, released the Prime Minister from his commitments, that does not hold true in the case of the province of Quebec, where an overwhelming majority of voters have refused to release the government from their past commitments and from the pledges we had repeatedly given them ourselves for twenty-five years, especially at the 1940 election and this, with the endorsement of the government. Consequently, much to my regret, I shall have to break with my party's government on that amendment.

My present attitude is but the result of promises made to the voters of my constituency and if there is one thing I wish above all, it is that no one should ever be in a position to charge me with breaking my pledges.

I believe, however, that the Prime Minister will appreciate the situation and realize more readily than anyone that we are the servants of our fellow-citizens and that we cannot break the solemn assurances given them. I ask the Prime Minister and my fellow citizens of the other provinces if they would adopt a different attitude than the one I am now assuming, if the rest of the country had voted "No" on the conscription issue. I ask them, further, if they would feel justified in disregarding that expression of opinion and in enacting conscription. I urge them to remember what my province has consistently done in behalf of national unity. At the time of the last provincial election, the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, then Minister of Justice, as well as the Hon. Mr. Cardin staked their political future on that election, when the national union premier was seeking re-election on a non-participation policy. Both Mr. Lapointe and Mr. Cardin lent their assistance to the Godbout party; they managed to secure endorsation of participation just as the other provinces had done, and Mr. Godbout was swept into power with flying colours!

I quote the words of the Prime Minister on January 26 last, as reported on page 46 of Hansard regarding the Quebec provincial elections:

> At that time, the people of the province of Quebec turned out of office the government that had sought to thwart Canada's war effort, and placed in office under the leadership of Hon. Mr. Godbout, a government which was prepared to cooperate with the federal administration in furthering the national effort. I doubt if any service at the time meant more to the allied cause than that rendered by the people of the province of Quebec in thus demonstrating the unity of Canada in its war effort.
> When, three months later, the direction of the war effort of Canada by the present administration was challenged—though from an opposite extreme—by a resolution of the legislature of the province of Ontario, and the administration appealed to the people of Canada in a general election, the government gave the assurance that, if returned to power, it would continue to maintain the policy of no conscription for service overseas. Not only the government, but the then leader of the Conservative party—a party disguised it is true, for the time being, as the National Government party—took an equally strong stand in opposition to conscription for overseas service. The candidates, not of one political party only, but the vast majority of candidates in the general election gave their constituents to understand that they were opposed to a policy of conscription for overseas service. In so doing, reference was continually made to the effect of the adoption of conscription in the last war, and the serious wound which, at the time, its application had inflicted in the side of our country.
> As I look at the membership of this house which represents the will of the nation as expressed in the general elections, held during this very war, I say there are not a dozen members,—if, indeed, there are that many—regardless of party, who could rise in their places and truthfully say that, in the last general election, they had advocated a policy of conscription for military service overseas.
> Time and again it has been said by hon. members opposite—and I think my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said it oftener than anyone else—that the present government would not have had the enormous majority it has in this present parliament if it had not given the explicit assurance that, if returned to power, it would not adopt conscription for military service overseas.

When the result of the elections was known, the province of Ontario could not say enough in praise of the province of Quebec. I believe that the late lamented Mr. Lapointe and the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères were then the most popular men in the country, so much so that a few days after the elections I met on parliament hill, at Ottawa, one of my colleagues from Toronto who greeted me with open arms and congratulated me warmly on what the province of Quebec had just achieved.

Has not Quebec always shown herself as willing to participate in the war as any other province? Why should the province of Quebec be more anxious to accept compulsory service for overseas than the rest of the British dominions? For 25 years, the province of Quebec has believed in the promises made by the right hon. Prime Minister, by Mr. Lapointe and by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. As I just said, I have made the same pledge and I want to keep it in war time as in peace time. I have given my word to my fellow-citizens. I am not an opportunist concerned only with reelection. For a man of my age parliamentary life has no great attraction. We come here every year to spend four, five, six or seven months, the finest part of spring and summer. At my time of life, I would rather live quietly during the few remaining years Providence may grant me. Were I to take another stand, the statement made by the Prime Minister on January 26, 1942, when he was dealing with dictatorship might apply to me. Here is what the Prime Minister of Canada said:

I reject as still more unworthy the suggestion that the government should break the solemn pledges given and repeated time and again to the electorate. Let me repeat what I said at Vancouver:

"The present unhappy state of the world is, in large part, the result of broken pledges. Nazi Germany has erected bad faith and the broken pledge into a principle of action. Bad faith, broken pledges, and disregard of the popular will, are the forces against which Canada is fighting to-day."

I do not propose to erect bad faith and the broken pledge into a principle of action. I propose at all times to do all in my power to see that the will of the people, not that of any particular section or group or interest, however powerful or vociferous, shall prevail in the government of this country.

Mr. Speaker, the excerpts of the Prime Minister's speech which I have just quoted show clearly that we, the representatives of the province of Quebec, not having been relieved of our commitments, cannot take a different stand from the one which I have just indicated and, notwithstanding my personal friendship for the Prime Minister, I shall vote against this bill.

In concluding, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George on his speech and particularly because he recommended the adoption of a national flag.

This morning's edition of the Gazette shows great displeasure with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George's speech, but that is an indication that he has spoken wisely. I think that a Canadian flag would greatly contribute to the cause of national unity in this country. We have no flag of our own. We French Canadians respect the union jack, emblem of our liberties. We also respect the French flag, but neither one nor the other is truly our own. Let us do away with this colonial mentality. Why should we not have a flag which would be really ours and around which we could all rally and thus take a long step forward in restoring harmony in this country.

On motion of Mr. Thorson the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10.15 p.m.

Wednesday, June 17, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

MILITARY SERVICE

CALLING UP OF SINGLE MEN AND CHILDLESS WIDOWERS UP TO AND INCLUDING AGE 35

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, I desire to lay on the table copy of an order in council providing for the issue of a proclamation calling out men who were on the 15th day of July, 1940, unmarried or widowers without child or children, and who were born in any of the years 1921, 1920, 1919, 1918, 1917, 1916, 1915, 1914, 1913, 1912, 1911, 1910, 1909, 1908 or 1907, but that persons born in the year 1921 shall not be called out until after they have reached the age of twenty-one.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ASSISTANCE TO VICTORIA, N.S., FARMERS

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

Is the government prepared to assist the Victoria farmers so they can have easy access to the railway during the winter season and thus enable them to send their produce to the Sydney market?

Mr. HOWE: I find it difficult to answer the question in its present form. I wonder if the hon. member would clarify it a little. The difficulty is that the island of Victoria was cut off from the railway for the winter and has been to this day. I know of no way of giving the assistance asked for.

Question dropped.

PURCHASE OF LUMBER USED BY DOMINION CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria):

1. From what firms is the lumber used by the Dominion Construction Company at Edwardsville, Cape Breton, being purchased?

2. Is any of this lumber being purchased from the lumber mills in Cape Breton island?

3. If not, will the government give such lumber dealers an opportunity of tendering?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Lumber purchased by the Dominion Construction Company, Edwardsville, Cape Breton, is as follows:

	Board feet
Chappells Limited, Sydney, N.S.....	670,000
J. W. Stephens, Limited, Sydney, N.S.	190,000
John C. MacMillan, North Sydney, N.S.....	50,000
D. Porter & Son, Stellarton, N.S.....	97,000
J. J. Grant, New Glasgow, N.S.....	55,000
Spencer Bros. & Turner, Truro, N.S...	485,000
McCulloch & Hogan, Limited, Halifax, N.S.....	297,000
Moncton Lumber Co., Moncton, N.B.	505,000
King Wood Sales, Moncton, N.B.....	515,000
Ashley Colter Co., Fredericton, N.B..	275,000
Flemming & Gibson, Juniper, N.B...	175,000
H. E. Pelton, Saint John, N.B.....	50,000
Benj. Belliveau, Meteghan, N.S.....	62,000
	3,426,000

2. Yes.

3. Cape Breton island lumber mills are being given full opportunity for quoting on government requirements in Cape Breton, and dealers without milling facilities have been urged by the department to make their stock available to local mills for milling and delivery to the department.

DAIRY INDUSTRY—CANS FOR HANDLING MILK AND CREAM

Mr. LECLERC:

1. Have cans used in the handling of milk and cream been rationed?

2. Are farmers engaged in the dairy industry unable to purchase such cans?

3. Will the government consider the advisability of placing such cans in a special category?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. No.

2. They are still able to purchase these cans but there is a short supply.

3. Supplies of milk cans for essential purposes are receiving careful consideration. These cans are made from sheet steel for the supply of which we are dependent on the United States. Only a limited tonnage of such sheet steel is available.

[Mr. MacLean.]

STUDENTS AND TEACHERS FOR SUMMER FARM WORK

Mr. REID:

1. Has the federal government inaugurated any scheme of financial assistance to the provincial governments in order to secure the services of students and teachers for farm work during the summer school recess?

2. If so, what provinces have agreed to assist in the furtherance of this scheme?

3. Have any provincial governments refused to cooperate?

4. If so, which ones?

5. Were any reasons given by these provinces as to why they would not cooperate in securing help required on farms during summer?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Yes; the federal government is prepared to provide financial assistance for the purpose of assisting the provinces in executing a plan for recruiting, transporting to, and placing upon farms labourers—male and female—suitable for farm work.

2. The province of Ontario has entered into an agreement with the federal government to carry out such a plan.

3. No province, other than Ontario, has entered into an agreement regarding financial assistance in connection with farm labour.

4. See answer to 3.

5. The provinces, other than Ontario, have not signified their desire to enter into an agreement such as that existing with the province of Ontario.

PUBLICATION OF LISTS OF WAR CONTRACTS

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Has the director of public information definitely abandoned the practice of publishing the lists of war contracts awarded by the Minister of Munitions and Supply?

2. If so, does the government intend to place at the disposal of members of parliament other methods whereby they may learn of the awarding of war contracts and their nature?

3. Will the government publish, as formerly, a detailed report of the amount of each war contract and the persons or companies to which they have been awarded?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Information regarding specific contracts may be obtained by writing the deputy minister of munitions and supply or by placing the question on the order paper.

3. No. Please refer to the minister's statement, page 215 Hansard.

MONEY CIRCULATION PER CAPITA 1929-42

Mr. KIRK:

1. What amount of money was in circulation in Canada as at March 31 for each of the years 1929 to 1942, both inclusive?

2. What was the amount of same per capita during each of the abovementioned periods?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1 and 2.

March 31	Total amount of circulating media in the hands of the public	Per capita amount of circulating media in the hands of the public
1929	$222,786,258	$22 21
1930	199,127,293	19 51
1931	179,007,417	17 25
1932	176,140,084	16 77
1933	178,100,901	16 67
1934	184,791,612	17 07
1935	188,818,143	17 28
1936	195,954,265	17 77
1937	216,418,023	19 46
1938	226,162,864	20 18
1939	235,919,414	20 85
1940	285,781,556	25 02
1942	522,943,412	45 79

Note:—Circulating media in the hands of the public includes dominion notes or Bank of Canada notes in circulation, less amounts held by the chartered banks; chartered bank notes in circulation less amounts held by other chartered banks; and subsidiary coinage issued less withdrawals, less amounts (in the years 1929 to 1934 estimated) held by chartered banks and the Bank of Canada.

PURCHASE OF LAND AT GRAND LAKE, N.S., FROM G. W. TINGLEY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Has the government purchased any land or other property situated at Grand Lake, Nova Scotia, from George W. Tingley, of Halifax?

2. If so, what department made the purchase, what was the price, and what use is the property being put to?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

CANADIAN FORCES—ENLISTMENTS FROM QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. STOKES:

1. What is the total enlistment from the province of Quebec in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

2. Of these, how many are, (a) of French-Canadian origin, (b) of origin other than French Canadian?

3. Of each of the above categories, how many have (a) enlisted for actual flying duties as air crew, (b) enlisted as mechanics for ground crew duties, (c) enlisted for general duties?

Mr. STOKES:

1. What is the total enlistment from the province of Quebec in the Canadian army?

2. Of these, how many are, (a) of French-Canadian origin, (b) of origin other than French Canadian?

3. Of each of the above categories, how many have (a) enlisted for active service anywhere, (b) enlisted for service in Canada only?

Mr. STOKES:

1. What is the total enlistment from the province of Quebec in the Royal Canadian Navy?

2. Of these, how many are, (a) of French-Canadian origin, (b) of origin other than French Canadian?

3. Of each of the above categories, how many have (a) enlisted for active service anywhere, (b) enlisted for service in the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) how long it will take to get the answers to these three questions, which have been allowed to stand? I realize it is quite a job but perhaps he could give me some indication.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot answer categorically. I would have to consult my colleagues the ministers for air and navy. With regard to the army, as has already been pointed out, we have no record of racial origin of those enlisting. The suggestion was made to me in the house that at least we might take the names of those who appeared to be of French origin and make a compilation in that way. That can be done and, as a matter of fact, it is now completed, but that would not give entirely accurately the information which is asked for. I can only say that if the information is asked for in the present form—that is, French-Canadian origin—I know no data from which it can be given.

Questions stand.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HOUSING—PORT ARTHUR AND FORT WILLIAM

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

What provision is the government making for an adequate supply of low cost houses to be made available for families of low income in the cities of Port Arthur and Fort William?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

TURNER VALLEY OIL FIELDS—STANDARD OIL—APPLICATION OF GASOLINE RATIONING TO ROYALTY SALESMEN

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Have the Standard Oil interests or subsidiaries any proven wells capped in the Turner valley oil fields?

2. How many 40-acre undrilled oil sites have the Standard Oil interests or subsidiaries in the Turner valley oil fields?

3. How many of these are situated on acreage in which it has been proven that oil exists?

4. How many of the wells being operated by the above mentioned interests are offset wells?

5. What percentage of oil produced in the Turner valley in 1941 came from wells operated by independent royalty companies?

6. On what grounds does the oil controller consider it to be in the national interests that royalty salesmen be limited to category A gasoline ration?

FUEL OIL AND GASOLINE

CONDITIONS WITH RESPECT TO HOUSEHOLD HEATING—REDUCTION IN VALUE OF GASOLINE RATION COUPONS IN CERTAIN PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, I promised to make a statement to-day on the oil situation, and I will do so now.

On May 20, as reported in Hansard, page 2845, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) I stated that no fuel oil would be available for heating in private residences during the coming winter. On the following day I amplified this statement somewhat, by indicating that every effort would be made to provide fuel oil for heating purposes in private homes where conversion to coal burning equipment was impossible. Since that time we have given very thorough study to the problem, in an effort to determine a definite line of policy, in the light of existing and prospective supplies of oil.

There are many thousand private residences now heated by oil. We find that conversion on a large scale would involve the use of materials, particularly steel, which are in very short supply. There is the further difficulty of transporting coal in sufficient quantities to ensure that the converted units will have sufficient fuel to see them through the winter. Consequently, we have had to explore ways and means of making available more supplies of fuel oil from existing and prospective supplies of crude.

There is no reasonable hope that we can augment our existing supply of crude oil. Therefore if we are to refine more fuel oil we must do so at the expense of automobile gasoline. Accordingly, refiners of crude oil have been ordered to change their refinery runs so as to make more fuel oil, and less gasoline. By doing this, we hope to build up sufficient stocks of fuel oil between now and October first to provide for household heating equipment during the winter months. It must be understood, however, that even after these steps have been taken, no guarantee can be given that fuel oil for domestic heating equipment will be available to meet normal requirements, because it is impossible to say at this time whether sufficient tankers will be available to maintain a continuous supply of crude. If there is a decrease in the anticipated supply through a loss of tankers, we shall have to draw on these reserves of fuel oil to take care of the armed services and war and essential industries. Therefore, my advice to those who heat their houses by oil is to convert their equipment if at all possible. Those who are in a position to convert, and do not do so, run the risk of having no fuel in the coming winter.

In so far as the commercial and industrial user is concerned, it will still be necessary for all those using fuel oil for the heating of commercial and industrial buildings, including apartment houses, hotels, institutions, stores, et cetera, to give up the use of fuel oil for heating as of July 31, 1942. This also applies to all those using fuel oil for the production of steam.

As I have pointed out, the building up of reserves of fuel oil for the winter months means the refining of less automobile gasoline. Accordingly, it has been decided that in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia, the value of the unit must be cut from five gallons to four. The unit will remain for the present at five gallons in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, and at two gallons in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. We hope to be in a position to raise the unit to three gallons in the maritimes as of midnight June 30. The changes in the value of the unit in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia will become effective at midnight to-morrow night.

After the ration system had been in operation for a short time the gravity of the supply situation made it necessary to re-categorize many thousands of those who were originally placed in higher than A categories. Many of these were reduced to category A. We also found that many of those originally in category A were owners of more than one car, or were using their cars almost entirely for pleasure purposes. It is obvious that these motorists should not receive as much gasoline as those who use their cars mainly in the earning of their livelihood. It has therefore been decided to establish a lower category, to be known as category A-A. The setting up of a new category takes time and I am not now in a position to state what the gasoline allowance for category A-A will be, or when it will become effective. This will be announced in due course.

Because there are many thousands of farmers, industrial workers and business men now in category A, the quarterly restriction of the coupon in this category will be abolished from midnight to-night. This means that the category A coupons, in any quarter, may be used at any time, regardless of the date printed on them.

Mr. REID: Regarding the rationing of gasoline and the categories in which owners of motor cars are placed, will the Minister of Munitions and Supply state whether there is a court of appeal other than the local court in each province to which those who believe that they have been unjustly dealt with may apply?

Mr. HOWE: The court of appeal is the oil controller himself. If the reply of the local officer is not satisfactory, an appeal can be taken to the oil controller.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

EXTENSION BY ORDER IN COUNCIL OF CONTROL OVER LABOUR IN INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I notice in a press bulletin this afternoon an announcement that the control over labour in industry has been considerably extended. I wonder whether the minister is prepared to make a statement, or if not, will he say whether or not these regulations have been made by order in council, and will the order in council or the regulations be tabled?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The regulations were approved by myself under the authority of an order in council. I shall be glad to have them tabled immediately.

MILITARY SERVICE

VALCARTIER CAMP—REQUEST FOR LEAVE OF ABSENCE FOR BUTTER MAKER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence to a serious emergency which has arisen in my county. I believe that the reading of this short communication, which I translate, will explain the whole matter:

Ottawa, June 16, 1942.

Mr. Jean Chaloult, Lt.-Colonel,
Assistant-Commandant of District No. 5,
Post Office Building, Quebec.

Subject: E600448 Gagnon Omer
Montmagny Regiment, Camp of Valcartier

Butter factory syndicate of Cap Chat county of Gaspe is asking a leave for the above mentioned who is their butter maker. This butter factory receives daily six to eight thousand pounds of milk and is still closed at this late date.

Can you make diligence.

J. S. Roy, M.P.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question, I think, which should be placed upon the order paper.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) moved an amendment to Bill No. 80. I did not deal with it at the time, and I was requested by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to deal with it to-day rather than yesterday. I have been considering the amendment, and I should like now to give my ruling.

On the motion of the Prime Minister that Bill No. 80, an act to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, be now read a second time, Mr. MacInnis moved, seconded by Mr. Noseworthy:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that the principle of the bill before the house is inadequate and inequitable, permits the governor general in council to conscript men for overseas service without reference to parliament and is, therefore, contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

It will be noticed that the amendment, apart from the declaratory statement that "this bill be not now read a second time", takes the form of a resolution "that the principle of the bill before the house is inadequate and inequitable, permits the governor general in council to conscript men for overseas service without reference to parliament and is, therefore, contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada."

This question is somewhat analogous to that discussed in connection with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar on Thursday last, June 11, which I ruled out of order, as reported at pages 3281 and 3282 of Hansard. Before giving that decision I was referred to citation 775 of Beauchesne and also to citation 760, and if there had been no other feature than the principle laid down in citation 760, strengthened as it was by the same principle stated in May 391, I would have felt obliged to rule the amendment out of order, but as hon. members will recall there was another objection to its relevancy which admitted of no doubt that the house had already decided during this session on the same principle, and in support of that I quoted citation 304 of Beauchesne.

It is an accepted principle, both in this house and in the British House of Commons, that an amendment cannot deal with the provisions of the bill upon which it is moved, nor anticipate amendments thereto which may be moved in committee, and this amendment infringes upon that principle.

The amendment states that "the principle of the bill before the house is inadequate and inequitable". The word "inadequate" is a general term which may in committee cover proposals in amendment of the clauses of the bill, but such proposals cannot be made at this stage of proceedings. The same observations will apply to the use of the word "inequitable". If amendments are contemplated by these words, they can only be moved in committee on the bill. This emphasizes the principle which I have already stated that amendments on the clauses of a bill cannot be anticipated on the second reading of a bill.

As reported in Denison's and Brand's Decisions, with respect to the British House of Commons, 1857 to 1884, we find reported at page 47 a statement by Mr. Speaker with respect to an amendment being made to the Franchise Act. I need not give the details in connection with that amendment, but in effect it dealt with certain regulations with respect to the Franchise Act. Mr. Speaker then said:

> Before the hon. member moves his resolution I wish to point out to him that it exceeds the limits prescribed for such motions by the rules of the house. It is a resolution which, in reality, anticipates discussion on every clause of the bill, and on some points with respect to which notice of amendment has been already given. It seems to me to go beyond the rules laid down by the practice of this house.

That is the practice and procedure which has been followed in this house. It is, I am of opinion, a proper practice. To do otherwise would give rise to difficult and embarrassing situations. On an amendment in general terms such as this, if the house rejected the amendment and the house went into committee of the whole on the bill, the committee would be bound by the decision of the house and it would be deprived of its freedom of action in dealing with the clauses of the bill.

[Mr. Speaker.]

If the committee of the whole decided upon amendments to the bill within the terms of this amendment, the house would not be able to concur in the committee's report because the house has already decided against such amendments. The house should not approve and disapprove the same questions on the same bill in the same session.

For these reasons I rule that the amendment is out of order.

Mr. COLDWELL: I understand that that is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and I realize I would not be within my rights in discussing it now. Therefore I accept Your Honour's ruling, regretting very much that I did not know it was going to be made. I had thought I would have had an opportunity of discussing the ruling before it was made.

Mr. SPEAKER: It has always been my practice to ask the opinions of hon. members before making rulings. In this instance however there was an opportunity for discussion of the very same principle on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. On that occasion the principle was exhaustively discussed before I gave my ruling, and I did not think that on the same principle it would be necessary to have further submissions from hon. members of the house.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, I shall not deal with the question of the plebiscite except to repeat the statement which has already been made, that the plebiscite was not on the issue of conscription. I personally sought to make that clear in speeches I made in the course of the plebiscite campaign. At Toronto, in a speech delivered to the Canadian club on April 13, I said:

> The government is not asking the people of Canada to vote "yes" or "no" on the issue of conscription itself. That is definitely not the purpose of the plebiscite. The people of Canada are not being asked whether there should or should not be conscription. That responsibility is not being placed upon their shoulders. We are asking the people to permit us to exercise that responsibility freely, in the light of the facts and the needs of the situation, according to our judgment and subject to our responsibility to parliament.

I made similar statements to the Laurier club of Winnipeg and to a mass meeting in my own constituency at Selkirk. There is therefore no mandate for the imposition of conscription for service overseas at the present time, either as a result of the vote on the plebiscite or as a result of the repeal of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act.

When section 3 has been repealed the government will be perfectly free, subject always to its responsibility to parliament, to take such action as it may deem necessary. The government will take such action as will in its judgment most effectively enable it to carry out its duty to parliament and to the Canadian people, namely the conduct of the war in such a manner as will result in a total war effort for Canada and the Canadian people.

In pursuance of its freedom to act in this important matter, the government has decided that it is not in the best interests of the Canadian war effort that conscription for overseas service should be imposed at the present time. I submit that this decision will bring Canada closer to its real objective than if the government were to act otherwise. In my opinion the imposition of conscription for service overseas at the present time would definitely be hurtful to the war effort. The people of Canada are much more concerned with the achievement of results than with the application of theories; and the action of the government will be governed accordingly.

When Canada entered this war, of her own free will, she pledged her national honour that she would give her maximum aid to the cause of freedom, liberty and humanity. Canada committed herself to a total war effort. What does "total war effort" involve? As I see it, total war effort means the most effective use of all the material and human resources of the nation. That is our aim, and to that end we must shape our policies. In making progress toward a total war effort we must keep in mind certain objectives, and not, under any circumstances, allow ourselves to be diverted from them.

There are three primary war objectives for Canada. May I be permitted to state them with care, not necessarily in the order of their importance, for that order may change from time to time according to the exigencies of the war. First, we must produce ships, planes, tanks, guns and other essential munitions and materials of war, equipment and supplies to the fullest extent of our productive capacity, for this is a war of machines as well as a war of men, and Canada is one of the main arsenals of the united nations. Second, we must produce as much in the way of essential food supplies as can be transported overseas, for Canada is the greatest storehouse of the united nations. Third, we must raise and equip as strong armed forces as it is possible for us to do, on land, at sea and in the air, both as to the number of their personnel and particularly as to their quality, so that they will be as effective as possible in defensive and striking power both for the defence of Canada and to meet and help defeat the enemy wherever he may be found. It would be the height of folly to wait for an attack on Canada itself if we can keep the enemy from our shores. Both overseas and home defence forces are therefore essential. In addition to these three primary war objectives we must maintain such national services as are essential to the life of the nation and its productive capacity, for as man-power is withdrawn for the unproductive purposes of war, a heavier burden is thrown upon the man-power that remains.

If we are to make a maximum war effort we must not lose sight of any of these objectives. We must attain them concurrently, as far as that is possible to do. Each step that is taken must be carefully considered in the light of its effect on the totality of our war effort, for it is the totality of our war effort rather than any one aspect of it that counts in our country's contribution to the victory of our cause.

The Canadian war programme for the present year, ending March 31, 1943, has been set with all these war objectives in mind. It was set in the belief that it would strain our resources to the limit. The government believes that this programme can be carried into effect, and every possible effort will be made to achieve it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Objection was taken, when I was not in the Chair, with regard to the reading of speeches. In the beginning I indicated to the house that the reading of speeches was not allowed, and I hoped that hon. members would follow the rule in that regard. It does happen, as I have noticed, that hon. members will place their papers on the desk and, being gifted with keen eyesight, will read them from there, and assume that they are not reading their speeches. But irrespective of whom it may be, if we are to conform to the rules they will have to be applied rigorously and impartially. I do hope, therefore, that hon. members will not force the Chair to do what is very unpleasant for the Chair to do, that is, call attention to the rule again. Therefore I would again ask hon. members to live up to the rule in that regard.

Mr. THORSON: Mr. Speaker, I am making a careful statement of government policy, and I am not reading my speech, although I am paying close attention to what I have written. I shall be making reference to facts and figures which will require very close attention to what I have prepared, but I am not reading my speech in violation of the rules of the house.

The Canadian war programme was set for the year ending March 31, 1943, with the objectives I have mentioned in mind. That programme involved the establishment of a Canadian army overseas consisting of two army corps with three infantry divisions, two armoured divisions, two tank brigades, ancillary troops, corps troops and army troops. Subsequently the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced the authorization of the formation of two additional divisions, the 7th and 8th, primarily for the defence of our east and west coasts. The man-power requirements of our armed forces programme were stated by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) on February 10 of this year. He set the additional man-power requirements for the army at from 90,000 to 100,000 additional men up to the end of March, 1943. He set the additional man-power requirements for the navy, for the same period, at 13,000 men, and for the air force at from 70,000 to 80,000 men. When this programme has been completed the voluntary enlistments of Canadians for service anywhere in the world will amount to more than 600,000 men. In terms of the population of the United States the Canadian armed forces programme would mean the enlistment of about 7,000,000 men.

Furthermore, our war industry programme contemplates and involves heavy man-power requirements. So does the programme for essential agricultural production. I shall not deal in detail with either of these programmes, except to say that the man-power necessary for their performance cannot be withdrawn from these essential purposes of war without hurting such purposes.

It is the duty of the government to allocate man-power in accordance with the needs of the war purposes of Canada and the war objectives that I have mentioned. The totality of our war effort will not necessarily be increased merely by putting additional men in the army, if that is done at the expense of some other essential war purpose. The man-power reserve of Canada is strictly limited. It must therefore be used to the best advantage for all the purposes of war. Unfortunately, controversies have arisen over methods, and such controversies have beclouded the objectives themselves. There has been much confusion over methods. The most outstanding controversy has been with regard to the best method of raising men for service overseas. An attempt has been made to identify conscription for service overseas with total war effort. There is no necessary connection between the two. If conscription for service overseas had been imposed at any time up to the present, it would not have made for a total war effort, but would have tended to lessen the war effort that we have achieved.

I should like to point out that while the National Resources Mobilization Act recognizes the principle of compulsion, and the repeal of section 3 will remove any restriction upon the exercise of such compulsion, the government has not adopted the policy of conscription for overseas service as the best method of raising our overseas forces. In that regard the policy of the government remains a policy of voluntary enlistment. That policy has not changed, and there will be no change so long as that method of raising our overseas forces remains adequate and effective.

I have frequently spoken on the subject of conscription for overseas service, and I have not hesitated to express my opinion that from the point of view of the effectiveness of our total war effort, the merits of conscription are outweighed by its demerits. Speaking to the Canadian club at Toronto, I said:

> Thus far I have seen no need for conscription and little if any value in it.

I also said:

> In this rapidly changing world no one can foretell what steps may have to be taken. It may happen that the imposition of conscription will be necessary. In any event, the government should be free to decide upon the question of conscription or no conscription in the light of its knowledge of the facts and according to its judgment of the needs of the situation as it may exist from time to time.

I have not put my objection to conscription on the basis of necessity, but rather from the point of view of its effect upon the total war effort. In my opinion conscription for service overseas does not mean the same as total war effort. I am convinced that the imposition of conscription for service overseas at the present time would not make for progress toward a total war effort. I am further of opinion that if we do have to resort to conscription, which I hope we shall not have to do but which we will do if it is necessary, it will be only a second best method of fulfilling our armed forces programme.

After all, what is the actual place of conscription for overseas service in our whole war effort? It occupies only a limited place. Conscription could not aid our production of ships or planes or tanks or guns or essential munitions and materials of war. Indeed, by an overemphasis exclusively upon man-power for army purposes, it would lessen our success in that production. Certainly conscription for overseas service could not have helped our agricultural war purposes. Even for home defence purposes we felt that it was wise to adopt a policy that would not call on men if on March 23 they were wholly or mainly employed in agriculture. This was done so that our agricultural position should not deteriorate beyond its then state and in order that this country should be able to carry out its commitments for essential agricultural production.

To come to the armed forces themselves, how could conscription for service overseas help the air force? We could not conscript young men to fly and expect them to be the fliers that we have, fighting in the skies over every battle-front in the world, with no superiors anywhere in the world. No airman can be compelled to fly; he must have the will to do so. It could not be otherwise. The whole of the Royal Air Force is composed of volunteers; so is the Royal Canadian Air Force. Indeed, all services requiring special skill and initiative can best be performed by volunteers.

The situation is quite similar with regard to the navy. I am quite certain that the work of the Canadian navy, with its great devotion to duty, with the wonderful record of troopships convoyed without the loss of a single man, could not have been carried out in the same efficient manner if it had not been done by volunteers.

The only place, therefore, for conscription, if it is of any value at all, is in connection with our army. There, too, I am convinced that it would not make for as effective an army as the Canadian overseas army is at the present time.

Let us pause for a moment in order to take pride in certain facts with regard to the Canadian army overseas. The Canadian overseas army will have a larger proportion of armoured troops than any other army in the world. It will be, indeed, it is now the most highly mechanized and most mobile army of any of the British nations. Its superior in hitting strength cannot be found anywhere in the world. It has proved its valour and importance in the defence of the island fortress of freedom, Great Britain, and it will prove its power of valiant attack when the time comes. Furthermore, Canada has the largest volunteer armed force of any nation in the world. That is something of which Canada might well be proud.

It may be urged that since we have adopted conscription for service at home, we ought to adopt conscription for service abroad. However, let me point out one essential difference. Compulsory military service for the defence of Canada has always been the law of Canada. It was not introduced as a principle for the first time by the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940. Military service for the defence of Canada is the duty of every able-bodied citizen. It is the ordinary duty of citizenship in time of peril to the homeland. That has been the law of Canada ever since the Militia Act of 1868, with its provision for a levée en masse of all male inhabitants from sixteen to sixty years of age. Indeed, that was the law also of French Canada during the period of the French régime under the militia act of 1758. It was the law of French Canada even before that under the feudal law of fiefs. Similar legislation was in effect in Upper Canada and in the maritime provinces; so that no new principle for the defence of Canada was introduced by the mobilization act.

Having indicated the limited place that conscription for overseas service occupies in our total war effort, I must also express the opinion that from the point of view of effectiveness of the army, as far as quality of personnel is concerned, there can be no comparison between the voluntary system and conscription. I submit that there can be no dispute about this. If the maximum effectiveness of our war effort is the objective of our country, as I think it ought to be, it then follows that the voluntary system ought to be continued as long as it remains an adequate and effective system. It ought not to be abandoned for a system which not only is less effective but would carry with it great danger to national unity and be definitely disruptive of our war effort.

Is it necessary to change the present system of voluntary enlistments? It is clear that it would not help the air force; it is likewise clear that it is not necessary in connection with the navy. Is there any necessity for its adoption in connection with the army? Thus far there have been no visible signs of any such necessity.

The situation is quite different from that which existed in 1917. The Military Service Act was introduced on June 11, 1917, and one of the reasons urged for the passing of that act was that there had been a falling off in the number of recruits and a very large increase in the number of casualties, and that in some months the number of casualties was larger than the number of recruits. In the year ended May 31, 1917, only 77,634 men had enlisted—an average of 6,469 men a month. In the same period of time there were over 79,000 casualties.

No situation even remotely similar to that exists at the present time. The amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act was introduced on May 11, 1942. For the year ended April 30, 1942, voluntary enlistments for services overseas in all the forces, army, navy and air, amounted to 197,158, or an average of 14,763 men a month. No sign there of any collapse in the voluntary system. Furthermore, fortunately, the casualties thus far have not been very heavy. If we take only the army figures for the same period, we find enlistments totalling 112,881, or an average of 9,407 men a month. Furthermore, enlistments for May, 1942, showed the highest number since last July. They totalled 11,918. In addition to these figures of voluntary enlistments during the same year, over 33,000 men were called for four months training and service for the duration of the war in the active army for Canada, and over 13,000 of the thirty-day trainees were recalled for further training and service for the duration of the war with the active army for Canada. So that after making allowance for the number of those who have enlisted voluntarily, we find that our total number of enlistments and enrolments for the year ended April 30, 1942, for all the services, is well over 240,000, and for the army alone, well over 140,000.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister the figures on discharges?

Mr. THORSON: May I be permitted to proceed, because my time is limited?

Another set of figures may be of interest. Voluntary enlistments up to the end of the thirty-third month of the last war, that is, up to the end of April, 1917, totalled 417,371, whereas voluntary enlistments for the army, navy and air force up to the end of the thirty-third month of the present war totalled 505,574, not including May enlistments for the navy, and with the figures for the air force not quite complete for May.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister worked out the figures relative to Canada's population then and now?

Mr. THORSON: I would ask my hon. friend not to interrupt in view of the limited time at my disposal.

May I also say that up to the present time at the end of the thirty-third month of the war, the number of voluntary enlistments in all our armed forces, exceeds the total of all voluntary enlistments in the last war, and in addition we have raised 56,000 men for home defence in the same period of time.

We believe in the system of voluntary enlistments. As the house knows, it is one of the duties of the Department of National War Services to call men for military training for four months and subsequent service in the Canadian army in Canada for the duration of the war in accordance with requisitions coming from the Department of National Defence. Up to the present time only single men or widowers up to the age of thirty years without child or children have been called. The June call reveals that this class of men is close to full mobilization and that no very substantial number of men will be available from these age groups for any kind of military service, unless inroads are made upon the man-power requirements of war industry, or of agriculture, or of other essential national services.

The Department of National Defence has announced that 15,000 men will be required to report to training centres in the month of July. It will not be possible to raise these men and comply with that requisition without a new proclamation calling up additional men. Authority has therefore been given for the issue of such a proclamation. This afternoon I tabled a copy of the order in council providing for the issue of a new proclamation calling out single men, and widowers without child or children up to the age of thirty-five years.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, we are much closer to the total mobilization of our man-power resources than most persons in Canada imagine. Over 505,000 men have enlisted voluntarily for service overseas in our armed forces. In addition, we have raised over 56,000 men for active service in Canada for the duration of the war. Over 800,000 persons are engaged in war industry and about 1,350,000 men are engaged in agriculture.

We are approaching the time when no more single men or widowers without children will be available for service with the armed forces, whether for home defence or overseas, unless we take them from war industry or agriculture or some other essential national activities. When we reach the limits of the single men and widowers now subject to proclamation, we shall have to give consideration to calling up men of other ages, both above and below the ages now subject to proclamation. We may also have to give consideration to the calling of married men.

The supply of man-power in Canada is not unlimited. For the last year we have added approximately 20,000 men a month to our armed forces. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated yesterday that since the beginning of the year, war industry had been adding 28,000 persons a month to war production. This monthly deduction of persons from the production of the nation cannot continue indefinitely, for the supply of man-power is definitely limited.

When we reach the full state of complete mobilization of man-power for all the purposes of war, which will happen in the very near future, we shall then have to consider what, if any, changes may have to be made in our war programme. Should we, for example, increase our army overseas at the expense of essential war production, either of essential munitions of war or of essential food supplies? Will this make for an increase in the totality of our war effort? If it will, then the step should be taken; if it will not, the step should not be taken. Again I repeat that we must look at every step that we take from the point of view of maximum effectiveness of our war effort.

When we entered this war we did so in aid of the two great democracies, Britain and France. The indomitable spirit of Britain still lives; the spirit of France will revive. The character of the war has changed. This is a world war. This is not Britain's war alone. This is not a European war. This is a world war. This is Canada's war as well as that of the other united nations. This is the war of all free peoples and of all free nations. It is a world war for liberty for all the world.

We played an essential part in the dark days in the avoidance of collapse, but the avoidance of defeat is not enough, and Canada, as one of the united nations, must continue to make her full contribution to the cause of victory, as she has done in the past.

It is the duty of the government to keep constantly before its eyes the war objectives that I have outlined. It must not allow any portion of the war programme to be expanded at the expense of any other portion if the total war effort of the country is lessened thereby. It must face realities and not theories. It must not allow pressure on the part of anyone or any group to deflect it from the attainment of these objectives, by any controversy over any particular method, unless it is fully satisfied that such a method is the one that will most effectively bring our nation closer to a total war effort.

May I conclude with a plea for national unity and with a plea for the united effort of all Canadians and a sympathetic understanding by all Canadians of the points of view of all other Canadians. This is no time for needless controversy.

We can be proud of our Canadian war effort thus far, and though much remains to be done, we are getting closer day by day to the attainment of that total war effort to which our country pledged itself.

After this war is over, Canada should be the greatest of the smaller nations of the world. That can happen only if the cause of freedom and liberty throughout the world is saved. In the last war Canadians responded to the call of duty and Canada held a high place among the nations of the world. I am confident that when this war is over, Canada will hold an equally high place among the nations of the world, with pride in her soldiers both at home and overseas, with pride in her sailors, with pride in her airmen, in her munitions workers and agricultural producers and in all the men and women engaged in the countless activities made necessary by the total war effort, with a feeling of duty well done, freely and voluntarily done, with only such a minimum of compulsion as may be necessary, so that Canadians may be able to hold their heads high and say to all the world: "Canada entered this war as a nation of free men and free women, of her own free will, and Canada played her full part in the struggle for freedom and liberty not only for herself but for all the world. Canada took her full share in the war for humanity."

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, on the 11th of June, 1917, legislation was introduced in this house for the purpose of conscripting men for military service overseas. On June 10, 1942, lacking but one day for an interval of exactly twenty-five years, a second measure purporting to establish conscription of men for military service in any theatre of war was introduced in this same house.

Whether it was the irony of fate or a measure of justice it belonged to a Liberal Prime Minister to present this compulsory legislation as if to commemorate the anniversary and to celebrate what can rightly be termed the silver jubilee of conscription.

In his speech on June 11 last, the former minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) made the following remarks:

> Listening yesterday to the able and well prepared speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and also to the prepared speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Hanson), and closing my eyes I could call to memory the words and arguments presented in parliament in 1917 when Sir Robert Borden and Mr. Meighen presented legislation for conscription. There was no difference. The same arguments that I heard in 1917 have been presented in this house by the Prime Minister and by the Leader of the Opposition. No difference—no change!

And later, in the same speech, on the following page of Hansard, you have the hon. member putting the following words in the mouth of a French-Canadian Conservative candidate in the province of Quebec taking part in a by-election prior to the conscription measure:

"You see, gentlemen, in what position you are placed. You have the guarantee of the Prime Minister of to-day. . . .

who, at that time, was Sir Robert Borden.

. . . "that you are not going to have conscription from the Conservative party. Beware," said he, "lest you might have conscription from the Liberal party if you turn your back on Sir Robert Borden at the present time."

No, Mr. Speaker, there is no difference. Such utterances have been made by Liberal speakers in the 1940 election and on the occasion of the plebiscite. The same bugbear was trotted out all over the province of Quebec where the people were told that if they did not support the Liberals, conscription would be enforced by their political opponents. No, there is no difference, the same talk is being heard. The same parts are being played again. But a slight difference might perhaps be found in the fact that, this time, the actors are recruited among the supporters of the party which was opposing and criticizing those who enacted the 1917 drama. In 1917, the cabinet resigned rather than accept conscription; in 1942, a minister resigns for the same reason. In 1917, all French-Canadian members, save a few, proposed an amendment and voted against conscription. This year, the French-Canadian Liberal members, save for a small group, are preparing to vote against the measure. No, there is no difference. It was fitting that the opening speech in the celebration of the conscription jubilee should be delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I wish to quote the following excerpt from his remarks:

This demand for conscription in Canada has been made right along and continues to be made, notwithstanding the fact that, for all Canada, conscription has been the law of the land since June 21, 1940, and that, under the special powers conferred upon the governor in council by the National Resources Mobilization Act, compulsory military training, in other words "conscription", has been in operation since October, 1940, and compulsory service, for the duration of the war, since February, 1941.

I find this further statement at page 3243:

I doubt if any of us begin to realize how grave the responsibility has become of determining the disposition of the country's armed forces, as a consequence of the changed conditions resulting from the entry of Japan into the war. Immediate danger no longer threatens Canada only from the east. It threatens equally from the west. Let that danger assume formidable proportions, and I ask what will be said of a government, or for that matter, of a parliament, or of a press, that continues to look only across the Atlantic to one enemy against which this country has to be protected, and fails to recognize that the strategy of the combined enemy forces may well involve an attack at any moment from across the Pacific.

[Mr. Roy.]

Toward the end of his speech the Prime Minister further said:

But if conscription is ever needed for Canada's sake and for Canada's future, I will not oppose its application.

Those are the facts, Mr. Speaker, which we must keep in mind during this debate. The Prime Minister is both for and against conscription. He sees arguments which may lead him never to enforce such a measure. The cabinet has been actively represented in this discussion by no less than five ministers, I believe, and all of them have taken the same stand. They are absolutely against conscription. They seem to say: "I would not be surprised to hear this bit of sophistry one of these days: We are against the draft and if we enforce it, it is only to spare you from having it enforced by the conscriptionists."

I return now to the magnificent speech delivered in this house by the former Minister of Public Works, whom I congratulate on his eloquence. To us, French Canadians, he has all the characteristics that set apart the French orator, the orator of French culture, which are ever to us, French Canadians, a motive of pride and satisfaction. However, I wish to review a few passages of his address. On page 3276 of Hansard, one may read:

"According to the needs of the situation we will adopt a policy—later on". That is what the Prime Minister said on February 25 last. "Later on, when the need is apparent, when the necessity is clear to everyone, in the light of the information that will be given to us by the military authorities, the government will take its stand and will come before parliament with the reasons that justify the stand taken by the government." "Later on", has become to-day.

When I am told I used the wrong expression in my letter of resignation in saying that a new policy had been adopted, I am justified, I claim, in saying that this is a new policy.

The Prime Minister is perfectly right in saying that the hon. member used a wrong expression. He has not adopted a new policy; his attitude is marked by constant evolution. Had the hon. Minister of Public Works been in the shoes of the electors of his province, he would have known, long ago, the value of pledges made by the Liberal party, and he would also be at a loss to interpret them. He would not have been fooled by such vague statements, by promises as ambiguous as those uttered in this house and later on credited to the Prime Minister. "Later on", this expression does not apply to any definite period of time. To-day is later on with regard to the day of the plebiscite.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères added:

Yes; we have been released from pledges by those to whom the pledges had no meaning at all and no effect on the election.

However, Mr. Speaker, this condition, now realized by the hon. member could be anticipated; others have foreseen it. During the plebiscite debate, in February last, I spoke as follows at page 653:

These are the ghastly straits into which the Liberal party's opportunism has enticed the Canadian nation by promises and pledges from which it now requests a release. Before imposing conscription on Quebec, we shall grant it a plebiscite. As the government will not be released from its promises and commitments regarding conscription by Quebec, but rather by the other provinces, this, in itself, evidences the opportunism and trickery of the Liberal party.

And then, as recorded on page 654 of Hansard of February 17, 1942, I added:

It would be useless to speak against conscription and then vote for the adoption of the speech from the throne announcing the holding of a plebiscite to grant the government the freedom they wish for imposing conscription when they please. We should fear, if this threat ever becomes a reality, to be accused of complicity and hypocrisy.

That is what I then stated, and that is what the whole Canadian people thought about the holding of a plebiscite. On the one hand, those who were favouring conscription supported the plebiscite because they considered that it would enable the government to enforce conscription, and on the other hand, the province of Quebec opposed that plebiscite because it recognized also that this was the last barrier. The right hon. the Prime Minister told the house in his speech of January 26, last, that he was going to proceed by stages, and we have now reached the final stage. I was quite surprised to hear the former minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) state that he had found out too late that those vague promises meant nothing. He, along with the right hon. members, told the people they would support this measure, because they had confidence in their leader, and were Liberals. But why such an unbounded confidence in the Prime Minister? He should long since have known the meaning of promises that were always vague and indefinite.

Mr. DENIS: Was not the hon. member also taken in by the Conservatives?

Mr. LALONDE: He will not admit it.

Mr. ROY: I would ask the hon. member not to interrupt.

A little further on, the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères had this to say:

But we have never been able, even to this moment, to know definitely how many French Canadians have enlisted in English-speaking regiments. A member of the administration of 1917, after he was out of politics, complained that even in his day, in 1917 and subsequently, he could never get information as to the number of French Canadians who had enlisted in so-called English-speaking regiments. We cannot get that information. We have never been able to get it; and when you start to compare the enlistments in other sections of Canada with the enlistments in the province of Quebec, you should be sure of your figures. We cannot get them. There are many factors that have to be taken into consideration before condemning the population of the province of Quebec or before we sustain the censure of certain military men who are mixing in politics instead of fulfilling their duties. This is a point that needs to be emphasized, and the point upon which many details should be obtained and given before condemnation is passed on the race which was the first established on the land of Canada.

Now that the former minister of Public Works has left the government, he is protesting against the unjust treatment meted out to French Canadians; there also, others have anticipated him while he was a member of the government and stood—as he himself likes to put it—as the representative of all his fellow citizens in Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: He is.

Mr. ROY: To my knowledge, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) has twice brought up the question during the last two years. Why then did the former Minister of Public Works not have this anomaly removed, why, Mr. Speaker, did he not do away with these injustices?

Further on in the course of his speech, the hon. member, discussing in a general way the conscription of men for home defence, criticized the present method of enforcing this measure. Yet at the time, Mr. Speaker, we too had opposed this legislation. I had stated that I was ready to accept the principle involved, and I also declared that it was the first step toward conscription for service in any theatre of war. This has now come to pass. The former Minister of Public Works claims to be surprised at the present trend of events. The mobilization of Canadian man-power, that alleged conscription for the defence of the country, was just so much bluff. There was less real danger, there was less need to prepare the defence of Canada in 1940 than there is to-day when the enemy is invading North American territory, invading Alaska our neighbour to the north. That there was less danger at that time, the following fact amply proves: After our youth had been drafted into the army, they were victimized in every way until they consented to join the active force and serve overseas.

The house will recall that the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) who, at present, is an officer, a lieutenant-colonel in the army, I believe, and who is stationed at a training camp, has proffered this charge in this very house. He stated, on that occasion, that all the means by which trainees were forced to enlist for overseas service were disgraceful. I quote his own words: "They are even submitted to the third degree." Forty-five per cent of them have yielded to this pressure and have enlisted as volunteers. As for the others, the 1940 act is hastily amended, in order to send them overseas also, although there is greater need for them in Canada now than in 1940. Consequently, they were not drafted for the defence of Canada.

All that was taking place while the former Minister of Public Works represented his people in the cabinet, while he was a member of the government. No excuse will hold to-day, Mr. Speaker; it is too late to complain. No one can take seriously the excuses that his tardy repentance suggest to him.

The former Minister of Public Works further states:

> No wonder that we did not then get the response that I myself expected; although I may say I participated in that campaign at the risk of my own life.

However, the press is astonished that the hon. member did not state the exact nature of the risks he had to face. We know that the former Minister of Public Works was seriously ill some short time ago.

Mr. BRADETTE: The reason is sufficient.

Mr. ROY: And that a strong constitution alone made his recovery possible, but we also know that at the end of January or the beginning of February, the former minister of Public Works was again in harness.

Mr. LALONDE: He was and is still a sick man.

Mr. ROY: When he took the floor on April 25 last, he was perfectly able to speak. In any case, he has offered no explanation. This statement, however, is an admission that he made serious efforts to obtain a different answer to that given by Quebec. Here is another excerpt from his speech.

> You want to respect that vote; you want to say, "I am going to obey the will of these people and vote according to their wishes"; so why do you deny me the same privilege of respecting the will of the population of my province, after I have done all I could to have them see the question otherwise?

Such are the facts, Mr. Speaker. We are perfectly justified in concluding that, had the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères obtained a different answer from his constituents, had their answer been in the affirmative, he would still be a member of the government.

Mr. LALONDE: I raise a point of order. The rules of the house forbid imputing motives to an hon. member. The hon. member for Gaspé, under pretext of giving a fictional interpretation of his colleague's words, is imputing motives.

Mr. LACOMBE: On another point of order. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Lalonde) is now imputing fantastic motives to the hon. member for Gaspé. In order to keep the record straight, I would ask that the hon. member withdraw his last words, as they are entirely out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does any hon. member wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. LACOMBE: I wish to point out to the hon. Liberal member for Labelle that he is caught in his own trap. He has just imputed fantastic motives to the hon. member for Gaspé and I would ask him—

Mr. LALONDE: I am surprised to see the hon. member for Gaspé call the leader of the Canadian party to his help.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The rules of the house are quite clear. In his Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Beauchesne, quoting May, says in rule 297 that it is absolutely out of order to impute to any hon. member of the house dishonourable or false motives or bad intentions. I would ask the hon. member from Gaspé to withdraw his last words, because he is clearly imputing reprehensible motives to the hon. member from Richelieu-Verchères.

Mr. ROY: I will substitute the following words—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member must first of all withdraw the words objected to.

Mr. ROY: I withdraw them.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is something.

Mr. ROY: I wonder what would have happened if the electors of the ex-Minister of Public Works had answered yes to the question put at the time of the plebiscite.

He might not have made that final concession which he himself has termed a treachery, that is the concession of accepting conscription for military service in all theatres of war. It may be that he would not have made it, but great doubt still exists as to what might have happened. The former Minister of Public Works has acknowledged that he has made one concession after another. We have agreed in 1939, he said, we have again agreed in 1940, we have accepted the plebiscite, we have made every possible concession in order to maintain national unity, as the Liberal party conceives it. It should be called liberal unity. Everyone will admit that one principle of the Liberal party is that things should never be called by their true names, that things should never be shown in their true light. Never—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is dealing with remarks made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. He says that the hon. members who belong to the Liberal party are in the habit of never calling things by their true names. This also is against the rules of this house. It is said at page 100 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

. . . to impute want of straightforwardness or courage to him . . .

The remarks of the hon. member imply that the statements of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères lack frankness and straightforwardness, and I believe the hon. member should withdraw these remarks.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, I have imputed no motives, I have named no hon. member—

Mr. LALONDE: On a point of order. You have given your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I call upon the hon. member to withdraw his remarks.

Mr. LACOMBE: On the point of order—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I have given my ruling. I say that the hon. member for Gaspé must withdraw his remarks.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the hon. member for Labelle has raised a point of order.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that expression.

Mr. LALONDE: Very well, thank you.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw this statement. It is a recognized fact that, to follow the Liberal tradition, things are never represented in their proper light. Well, in the name of national unity, concessions were made and it is claimed that they were made in the name of French Canada, if I remember correctly the utterances of hon. members. Never would French Canada have subscribed to concessions in the matter of the sacred rights conferred by pledges made to us and of the privileges guaranteed by them, for these pledges and privileges have been earned by our ancestors, in 1787, 1812 and 1849, as well as by our glorious volunteers of Vimy, Mons, Amiens, et cetera, during the war of 1914 to 1918, and they continue to be earned by our heroic young men, Robillard, Morin and others. The French Canadians would never have made such concessions, which were not to their own advantage, but solely to the benefit of the Liberal party. These concessions were made in order to retain power and the advantages that go with it.

Mr. LALONDE: Seek power for your own sake, but you will never attain to it.

An hon. MEMBER: He is absolutely alone.

Mr. LACOMBE: And soon, you will be out of office.

Mr. ROY: The facts must be set in their true light so that history may record them faithfully. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères, in the course of his speech, has made this further statement:

The people of Quebec, the minority in Canada, as I have said, have no reason to be ashamed of the attitude its members are taking. So far as I am concerned I have a quiet conscience as a result of the course I have taken in resigning the two portfolios which the Prime Minister was kind enough to bestow on me. . . .

If we refer to another statement made over the radio on April 24 last by the ex-Minister of Public Works, we may well wonder if the minister has enhanced or lowered his prestige in turning against the members who campaigned against a yes vote during the plebiscite.

Here is what I find in Le Canada of Saturday, April 25, 1942:

Address delivered last night, April 24, over the C.B.C. network, on the plebiscite.

Strife was stirred in the province of Quebec, in order to oust Laurier from power! How many statements of so-called independence, self-seeking denunciations from political partisans, accusations of weakness and treason, appeals to prejudice, did we hear at the time? It was exactly the same as to-day, except that the leaders of the movement were then more eminent and better endowed.

A few of the so-called saviours of that time are still to be found in to-day's agitation. They are a little older, but they seem to have learned nothing, no doubt because they did not suffer from what they helped to create. Those agitators said that Laurier had turned coward and traitor; that he wanted power at all cost and that he was sold to England.

Everyone knows at whom this pun is directed, for he is none other than Mr. Henri Bourassa, of Montreal. Mr. Bourassa has certainly no lessons to receive from the former Minister of Public Works—

An hon. MEMBER: Nor from you.

Mr. ROY: —because of the well-known purity and constancy of his patriotism. This clear-sighted gentleman has no lessons to receive from the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères who, toward the end of his life, is beginning to learn what Mr. Bourassa knew long ago. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères now advances the very arguments used by Mr. Bourassa in 1911. The latter never made any concessions nor did he ever change his policy. He never had to explain his stand, nor to complain that he had been misled, that he had let himself be led into error. Wherever he spoke, be it in Ottawa, in Quebec, in Toronto or at the Eucharistic congress in 1910, he always propounded the same arguments. Never did he allow his patriotism to change or falter because of political considerations or a lust for power.

Mr. LALONDE: He has changed in his old age.

Mr. ROY: The former Minister of Public Works has nothing to teach that great Canadian patriot, who never compromised. Mr. Bourassa would never have allowed anyone to lay hands on that precious national asset I mentioned a moment ago, which was granted to us by fair and generous-hearted Englishmen such as were the McNabbs, the Macdonalds, the Baldwins, and such as would have been the present Prime Minister had he not gone back on his policy of 1939. This national asset we hold from such men as we find in this great race, when there are no Shields to stir up passions, religious and racial prejudices, or deter them from their natural straightforwardness and common-sense through all kinds of deceptive and erroneous statements, and when there is no exploitation of prejudices by fanatics or gain by an infamous international finance which, at the moment, is standing at the keyboard of the infernal carillon whose sinister echoes blend with smoking ruins and blood-soaked battle fields.

He certainly would not have made any such concessions, and perhaps we would not find ourselves faced with the critical situation which endures to-day.

Mr. Bourassa has certainly no need of me to defend him, but we, his juniors, wish to seek inspiration from his life of devotion, and we know that the seed he has sown will produce better results than that which the former Minister of Public Works and the Liberal party as a whole are reaping to-day. These attacks against him, whatever their source, deeply wound us, and that is why I protest. And as for that great orator of past campaigns —1917, 1921, 1925, 1926, that is every one of them including the plebiscite campaign—in vain would we seek in the sound of his voice sufficient emotion, strong enough pathos to inspire belief in his sincerity, in his ability to stir up once more—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member may not contest the sincerity of an hon. member of this house. When he contests that of the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères he is out of order. I call this once more to his attention in order that he may avoid a repetition of the same mistake.

Mr. ROY: I take back the word "sincerity." I rather meant to say that "he will not convince me that the flower of hope will ever bloom again on the remains of the political massacre which we are witnessing to-day." We shall be guided by other voices and inspired, we of the young generation, by other principles. We shall forever banish these electoral methods based on misleading promises, prejudices and expedients. Our doctrine, the fundamental points of our programme, will take their inspiration from Christian social justice and ethics and will have for cornerstones the family, the basic industries and the respect for others. This is how we are going to organize our national economic and social life and I hope that it will give better results and that peace and prosperity will flourish in this country. Mr. Speaker, I know that I have given more time than I intended to these considerations, before proposing the following amendment—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he has exceeded his time by two minutes and a half.

Mr. ROY: I have been delayed by calls to order and I think I should be allowed a few minutes in order to submit the amendment I have in mind.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have to go by what the Clerk tells me. The hon. member has spoken for forty-two minutes.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Notwithstanding the vote of April 27 last, the government is still bound by its previous commitments never to impose conscription. The result of the plebiscite is not conclusive, because the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues asserted time and time again over the stations of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that it was not a matter of voting for or against conscription. What were the means employed to obtain a "yes" vote? There was a complete mobilization of the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which were placed at the service of the proponents of a "yes" vote. With very few exceptions, all the newspapers of the country were in favour of the government and supported those who requested a "yes" vote. Why were we unjustly refused the use of the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Certainly it was not in the name of liberty, justice and right for which our soldiers, airmen and seamen are sacrificing their lives. It was done in order to favour party interests. All available means were used, and the population of the country was shamefully deprived of its sacred right to free and honest debate.

From personal experience I know that otherwise the result of the plebiscite would have been different from what the protagonists of the "yes" vote desired. The government is misled if it thinks that it is now freed from its solemn pledges. A small group of busybodies induced the government to hold this plebiscite to the detriment of national unity.

I know that many hon. members do not share my views concerning the best way of defending Canada, but at least they have to admit that I never hit my opponents in the back, not even on the side. I always attack from the front, as I do now by asserting that the result of the plebiscite is not at all conclusive and the government is still bound by its sacred commitments. Therefore the government should be careful not to enter upon the long road which leads to danger. It should pay no heed to the pernicious advice of those who in the name of liberty are ready to sacrifice liberty itself. Let it not trust those who, supposedly to defend democracy, would ruin and disorganize the defence of Canada. Let it repudiate as enemies of this country those overexcited persons who in their enthusiasm are determined to sacrifice our last man and our last cent in this great adventure far away from our first line of defence, which must remain here on our very shores. Let it always bear in mind that the first duty of Canadians is toward their country, whose defences must be organized before all.

There is great danger from political cancers. It is only recently that a certain man held a prominent diplomatic post. Why does Mr. Herridge refer to the province of Quebec as a cancer attached to the north American continent? Like everyone else he knows that Quebec is loyal and faithful to His Majesty the King. Our province is fulfilling its duty in connection with Canada's war effort. Thousands and thousands of its sons have enlisted voluntarily, and all victory loan campaigns have been oversubscribed. What was the first Canadian regiment to complete its establishment for overseas service? It was Le Regiment Maisonneuve, which was raised in Quebec and made up of Quebec soldiers. There are many other compatriots in the army, the air force and the navy who answered spontaneously the call to the colours.

If ever Canada is attacked—and God forbid that it ever is—they will rush with all true Canadians to the defence of their country. They will dispute every inch of ground against the enemy. Our compatriots of English, Scotch, Irish and other extractions will then see a revival of national unity. Despite what may be said about it, national unity is not dead in Canada. It is only the defeatists and fifth columnists who claim it is. If it is necessary to defend Canadian territory, the whole population of this country will claim the supreme right of fighting the invader.

Let us examine the means employed by the government to obtain a "yes" vote. On March 24 last the Prime Minister asserted in this chamber that farmers, farmers' sons and farm hands would be exempted from compulsory military training. For many months and many years I had never ceased requesting this exemption, and on the same day I told the government how grateful and satisfied I was over the measure. I cannot express how surprised I was when I returned to my riding and became aware that the registrar was following his previous practice and calling up farmers and even the only sons of farmers whose occupation had always been farming. I could give to this house a long list of young farmers who have been called to the colours, such as the Guindons from St. Augustin, the Lauzons, the Ethiers, the Filiatreaults from Ste. Monique, the Gauthiers, the Godards from St. Eustache, the Pages from St. Hermas. The complete list would be much too long.

The reaction of the agricultural population which believed the word of the Prime Minister was quite widespread. It was even more so when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) stated subsequently that farmers and farmers' sons would be still liable to military service and compulsory training, except that they would have the privilege of asking for a postponement of training. How do you explain, Mr. Speaker, those statements, so formal and explicit, made by the Prime Minister upon such a capital question and then contradicted a few days after by his colleagues in the cabinet? From these contradictory statements part of the rural population quite naturally concluded that farmers and farmers' sons and farm hands were not exempt from compulsory military training, while others remained confident that they were.

As I said a while ago, if we had not been denied the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation during the campaign on the plebiscite we could have enlightened the population of the whole country upon such a far-reaching matter as the flagrant contradiction between the statements of the Prime Minister and those of his colleagues. But it does not seem that the owners of radio receiving sets, who pay the government a high fee for their licence, as well as tremendous taxes, are entitled to know the truth. The Canadian population which sacrifices its sons and its income for the war was denied the right to hear the truth. The Canadian party was refused the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, and you will see on what a poor pretext, Mr. Speaker, when I read this letter which the Prime Minister wrote to me on April 13, 1942:

Office of the Prime Minister
Canada

Ottawa, April 13, 1942.

Liguori Lacombe, Esq., M.P.,
Ste. Scholastique,
Quebec.

Dear Mr. Lacombe:

I wish to acknowledge your letter of April the 10th regarding the use of the radio in the plebiscite campaign.

As you are, of course, aware, the government has no authority to give orders to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The policy worked out by arrangement with the corporation is set out in the statement given to the press yesterday by the Hon. W. P. Mulock which reads as follows:

"My attention has been drawn to a report in the press of to-day under the heading, 'Three Members to give addresses on Plebiscite,' and as acting Secretary of State, I wish to correct this statement immediately.

"The use of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's English and French networks, in dealing with the plebiscite, is restricted to use by the Prime Minister, members of the cabinet and the leaders of the recognized parties in the House of Commons.

"They are given free time similar to that received in election campaigns and are speaking by reason of the positions they hold and not by reason of the fact they are advocating a 'yes' or 'no' answer to the question.

"Any private members or other persons who desire to speak, provided they comply with the necessary regulations and either pay for the time themselves or have it donated to them, can, of course, speak from a local privately-owned broadcasting station."

The Prime Minister's letter continues:

The question as to whether a party is recognized from the point of view of broadcasting, I understand, is one which is settled according to a formula worked out by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in consultation with all the political parties prior to the last general election.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. Mackenzie King.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

The night before I had received the following telegram from the director of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, Mr. Augustin Frigon:

Montreal, Quebec, April 11, 1942.

I am not authorized to rent stations or network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to anyone or to loan others the networks indicated to me. The instructions I have received are explicit and final. You may use private stations.

Augustin Frigon.

Where is the truth, Mr. Speaker? Is it in the Prime Minister's letter or in the telegram sent to me by Mr. Augustin Frigon, a director of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? Mr. Frigon states that his instructions are formal and definite. Who gave him those instructions? One sentence in the Prime Minister's letter will provide the answer:

The question as to whether a party is recognized from the point of view of broadcasting, I understand, is one which is settled according to a formula worked out by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in consultation with all the political parties prior to the last general election.

That is nothing but a cynical joke. And so the various political parties united in violation of their solemn pledges and sacred commitments to deny the use of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's facilities to the Canadian party and its founder. Where are now these political parties which existed prior to the last general election? Where is the official opposition in this house, the so-called National government candidates in the election of the 26th of March, 1940? Where is the Social Credit party, now the New Democracy? Where is the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party since the loss of its distinguished leader, the late Mr. Woodsworth? Where are the other parties?

Mr. LALONDE: Where is the Canadian party?

Mr. LACOMBE: Yes, the Canadian party, my dear friend. I ask you, where is the Liberal party?

Mr. LALONDE: Right here.

Mr. LACOMBE: It is merged forever with the Conservative opposition, and you know it. It is merged with all the parties who advocated a "yes" answer in the plebiscite vote. Union government? Why create one? We have one right now, and it is more united than ever. The Conservative opposition, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, the Social Credit party or the New Democracy, and the government itself, said so to the Canadian people during the plebiscite campaign. Let them pull together, and in these sacred and inviolate precincts let everything continue to run as smoothly as in the past. But let these gentlemen forgo their dictatorial methods with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The Canadian people are tired of hearing over the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's network synopses of speeches delivered by the pro-nazi Laval, and the proclamation of the fifty-third anniversary of Hitler. The people of Canada sincerely hoped for a free and honest debate during the plebiscite campaign but they were deprived of it by the dictatorship of the "yes" people. This situation cannot continue in a country which is fighting to save whatever good elements are still left in democracy.

The Canadian party, which secured a considerable number of votes in the last two by-elections, when it had two candidates, was denied the use of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation's facilities, while a second party, which had only one candidate, and a third party with no candidate at all in the four last by-elections, were both given free time over the corporation's network, the upkeep and maintenance of which are paid for by every one of us. This tragic joke has lasted long enough. In the name of the Canadian party I request that the government recognize our rights and give us that equitable treatment to which we are entitled, which we have a right to expect from the authorities. Let the government respect the clear and specific mandate it received from the people of Canada in the general election of March 26, 1940. The obscure plebiscite campaign, with its obscure result from the vote of April 27, cannot be substituted for the vote given to members of this house, whose mandates remain the same, no matter what anyone may think. The government is still bound by all its commitments to the people of the country. The result of the plebiscite campaign most certainly cannot repeal such a mandate, and that is why I ask the government to abide by the almost unanimous mandate it received from the Canadian people on March 26, 1940.

The government must remain faithful both to the object and to the results of this mandate. Let us maintain the previous position which we adopted in accordance with the clearly expressed wishes of the people of Canada. I assert that the government, in order to grant all possible freedom to the Canadian voters during the plebiscite, should have ordered a revision of the electoral lists, as we requested in this house. I know of many voters whose names were omitted by the enumerators and who refrained from voting—why? Because they felt reluctant, particularly in the rural districts where they are well known, to ask friends to identify them. Moreover, why did the government refuse to print bilingual ballots? Why did they not grant the right to vote to young men from eighteen to twenty-one years of age, as I requested several times in this house? The "yes" vote had to be secured, no matter at what cost, even against the most elementary principles of justice, against the rights of the people of Canada and of our young men who are generously and heroically shedding their blood. In these extremely serious times, just as in any other time, no power on earth can disfranchise our voters without laying itself open to the disapproval and contempt of the whole country. During this plebiscite, which henceforth will be famous, our good people, in the very studios of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which they own, and can demand that they use in order to enlighten the voters on political problems, were the victims of a radio racket set up by the government and the opposition party, whom the people had honoured with a very explicit mandate. The first duty of the government was to allow the opponents of the "yes" vote to use the facilities of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The government did not do so, and in the eyes of the Canadian people they will bear forever the responsibility for their action.

The day is not so remote when the great majority of the citizens of Canada will free themselves from trusts of all kinds, from the extreme inequalities of wealth, from the war profiteers of the country, from electoral moneylenders and from commissions such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, whose servile officials ursurp the functions of the people's representatives. Such a democracy is worse than dictatorship. What an ugly reversal of policy on the part of a government which formerly was so democratic! What detestable methods, worthy of Hitler, which deny to the people of the country the exercise of a sacred right, that of knowing the truth!

During my whole life, and many times in this house, I have condemned conscription for overseas service, and no one can tell me that I am reversing my political beliefs. My stand on this capital question has always been firm, clear and precise. It remains so. Fighting incessantly for an exclusively Canadian policy, I request that the government organize the defence of Canada before all. Once more I beseech the government to exempt farmers, farmers' sons and farm hands before starvation sets in in our army, among our civilian population and in our dear country. I implore them to cease tearing away from their farms young farmers who own their lands, using brute strength to do so, as happened at Sainte Monique and Saint Augustin, in Two-Mountains, during the night of the 9th of June. Is that the exemption promised by the Prime Minister on March 24 last?

If we adopt such a measure as this we shall give to the government and the opposition a free hand to destroy at a single stroke the work of Laurier, who devoted his long and brave career to the welfare of the country, and who at the end of that career fought with the energy of a lion the conscription act introduced by Borden in 1917. If we adopt such a measure we shall be taking an active part in insulting by means of this conscription issue the memory of that great Canadian. If we reject this amendment the nine provinces of the dominion will be given an opportunity to respect once more the illustrious name of Laurier. If we reject this amendment we will save in our dear country the national unity symbolized in our local cemetery by Laurier's glorious tombstone.

Mr. Speaker, we have many good reasons to fight this bill. Would we leave the protection of our sons against conscription in the hands of the present government, which has just rejected the mandate which it received from the people of Canada on March 26, 1940? Would we commit our dearest possessions to the charge of a government that was elected upon a policy condemning formally conscription for service everywhere and at all times, and that is now ready to pass conscription? Personally I am determined to fight with all my strength this infamous measure which more than sixty thousand soldiers defending this country urge us not to adopt. In the name of more than one million, six hundred thousand Canadians from all parts of the country I am determined to fight with all my strength this pernicious amendment. Why? Because the freedom and sovereignty of this country, as expressed by the statute of Westminster, urge us to do so. Why? In order to do away once and for all with this deplorable colonial mentality which still persists in Canada. Why? In order to recall the government to the true meaning of facts, and remind it that Canada is still Canada, that our first line of defence is here and must remain here, on our own shores. Why? In order to tell the government that we refuse to migrate to Europe with the last shred of our homeland, the last cent of our public moneys, and the last son of Canada. Why? In order to protest against this project of raising en masse all our young men, all the inhabitants of Canada, all our natural resources, all our vital strength, unless it be for the defence of Canada. Why? Because we must, before all, organize the defence of our territory, because Canada is our country, our homeland, the only one we have, and because we are more than ever determined to defend it.

One last word. I listened with great interest to the speech delivered last week by the former Minister of Public Works and Transport (Mr. Cardin). This speech from the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères would have been more practical and more effective if it had been delivered last February, during the debate on the dominion plebiscite bill. It is most unfortunate that such a piece of eloquence is given us at a moment when all hopes seem lost. How much more precious the intervention of the hon. member would have been for our province and our country if it had occurred when the government introduced its famous plebiscite bill! One might object that too late is better than never. To this I reply: Indeed, let us save what we can still save if, however, there is still something that can be saved. But I fear it is too late unless the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères and his followers concur in the doctrine I have always advocated—an exclusively Canadian policy.

Mr. Speaker, can we accept a condition under which hon. members who never ceased to assert their anti-conscriptionist feelings still continue to sit beside the Prime Minister who is getting ready to raise all our vital strength, all our youth, all our sons, by repealing section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, our last safeguard against conscription for overseas service? If my hon. colleagues are really against conscription, will they agree to be party to what the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères termed with such energy "the treason of the Prime Minister"? Personally, I never played upon words or upon the future of my country. He who violates his pledges, plays upon words and imperils the future of his country. The speech delivered by the former Minister of Public Works and Transport is the solemn assertion that actual events are proving that I was right. Furthermore, because the Canadian party does not proclaim the doctrine of one man, of one class or of one race in particular, but that of one nation, I invite the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères and his colleagues who share his views to join our ranks, in the next forty-eight hours, because afterwards it will be too late. Do not forget that.

Time presses. Hon. members may laugh. They will not laugh after the next general election if they do not join the ranks of the Canadian party; be sure of that. The interest of Canada orders you, orders them to sever the last links which still bind them to this government which the former Minister of Public Works and Transport branded so thoroughly and which will carry to the eyes of future generations the responsibility of having deceived and betrayed the Canadian people who honoured this government with a confidence never before equalled in the political history of this country.

I have the honour to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy):

That all the words after the word "that" in the principal motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

this house is of the opinion that the ministers and most of the members from "Quebec" do not have a mandate allowing them to modify the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940; that the voluntary contribution of soldiers for overseas service is satisfactory because of the dangers which are now threatening Canada and of growing difficulties arising from shortage of labour for production of food and other war necessities; that it is essential to maintain national unity; also that if there is a compulsory measure, the survey of which may be necessary, it is not conscription of men for overseas service but rather compulsory mobilization of accumulated wealth for the purpose of lightening the burden of the cost of war that lies so heavily on those in the lower income brackets of society.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, this amendment is obviously out of order. If you will refer to a motion moved by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) on June 18, 1940, at that time it was ruled by Mr. Speaker that the motion, which was similar to the one now before the Chair, was a substantive motion which did not seek to amend the main motion. The amendment now moved by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) does not seek to amend the main motion, and on that count alone is out of order. In the second place it mentions again the issue of the conscription of wealth, which has been twice disposed of in the judgment of this house during the present session of parliament. On that ground also it is definitely out of order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. LACOMBE: I want to know first on what grounds the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) bases his point of order. I did not understand his objection, and I would ask him to repeat it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to do so. The only way in which my hon. friend could move such a resolution would be within the terms of citation 755 of Beauchesne. A motion similar to the present amendment was moved on June 18, 1940, and was ruled out of order by the Speaker, which ruling was sustained by the house, on the ground that it was a substantive motion and did not seek to amend the main motion. There is nothing in the resolution now moved by my hon. friend that seeks to amend in the slightest way the motion for the second reading of the bill now before the house. The second point is that my hon. friend mentions an issue already twice disposed of by the house during the present session, once as an amendment to the address in reply and once as an amendment to the plebiscite bill.

Mr. LACOMBE: I submit respectfully that the case mentioned by the minister absolutely does not apply in the present instance.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If no other hon. member desires to speak, I shall give my ruling on the amendment. I find the amendment out of order because it covers a subject matter already discussed and dealt with earlier in the present session. Further, for the reasons suggested by the minister, namely, that it is a substantive motion, and that it anticipates possible amendments which may be made when the bill is in committee, I must also find this amendment out of order.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I regret I am obliged to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member being alone to appeal from my decision, his appeal fails.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, although I have the honour to speak after the Canadian party has spoken, and after receiving an invitation to join that exclusive club, I do not anticipate that I shall belong to it in the near or even distant future. Anyone listening to the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Lacombe) will realize now more than ever before how hard it is to govern this country. It is a big contract in times of peace; it is a much bigger one in time of war, times like these when every nation in the world seems to experience a certain anxiety and a certain amount of nervousness. It also shows that no matter what a government may do, no matter what a prime minister may do to try to satisfy every section of our population, geographically, racially or religiously speaking, the thing is humanly impossible.

I make that statement now because I want to ask the house to act as the Canadian people generally act in times of crisis—to be indulgent, to study fully and try to realize the situation we are facing at the present time, not only as it relates to Canada but as it relates to the whole of the civilized world and to Christianity; to face it in a cool-headed way, so that whatever we decide here may be in the interests of the things we cherish the most. As we have seen in this house, it is absolutely impossible to bring in any policy relating to the present war which will satisfy all the parties here, including even the Liberal party itself. In his remarks the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) came out immediately for a total war effort, with which we can all agree. That is one common ground on which the people of Canada are in full accord, namely the necessity for a total war effort in order that we may achieve the victory as soon as possible for the principles we cherish. But again the hon. gentleman brought to this house the bogy that was raised during the election of 1940, the suggestion of a union or national government, something which was severely rejected by the Canadian electorate at that time. Again the hon. gentleman made that appeal; and I have never doubted his sincerity for a single moment, even when he made that appeal. He did not name any of those he intended to have in his government, but I well remember that last session the talented young member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), during the course of one of his speeches, mentioned with fervour the name of a distinguished Canadian now in the British House of Lords, Lord Bennett, a man wonderfully gifted, who was at the head of this government during one of the most difficult periods in our history, the great depression. However, that fell flat, like a frozen pancake; it was not mentioned again in the newspapers or anywhere else, though this outstanding gentleman was mentioned as a possible member of that superman cabinet.

Who were the men the leader of the opposition had in mind? I know the first one who would go from this side of the house; it would be the Prime Minister of this country. So far as I am concerned I am going to stand by him through thick and thin, because he has done a wonderful job, in connection with Canada's war effort, in maintaining national unity. In making that statement I believe I am voicing the sentiment not only of my own constituents but also of the great majority of the Canadian people. The leader of the opposition received an answer to his suggestion only a few days after he made it, from Mr. J. M. Macdonnell, who is a potential leader of the Conservative party in Canada. Speaking before a Conservative business men's club at Toronto on June 11, 1942, Mr. Macdonnell is reported as follows:

> The party system, he said, was one of the chief institutions on which freedom depended. A national government, one which faced virtually no opposition, was an evil thing, the negation of all free institutions, and if it had to come it would have to be made as brief as possible.

That should settle the question of national government, or the so-called superman cabinet to run this country during the present period of stress. Again, to indicate how hard it is to please every section of this house, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group tried, during the course of this discussion, to sell us state socialism. By a well-worded document, well prepared and well delivered by their leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) they repeated the old cliche of socialism. I do not for one moment doubt his sincerity, but I would ask some questions at this time, just to know exactly what is meant. Are they going to socialize industries only during war time, or for all time? Do they want to socialize the farms? An hon. member from western Canada asked them a few days ago if they were not going to socialize labour. One thing that has impressed me is this: They want to take —to confiscate, because that is the only proper expression—the savings of the Canadian people.

Mr. MacINNIS: Who said that?

Mr. BRADETTE: It was said in so many words.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, it was not "said in so many words".

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes, it was; and I will quote what was said.

Mr. MacINNIS: Confiscation was never mentioned.

Mr. BRADETTE: That is what it would amount to, after all. This is the platform of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation:

> Compulsory interest-free loans, levied according to ability to contribute, as one of the means of war financing.

I can only say that my interpretation of that would be that it would give authority to the federal treasury to go out and confiscate at will, in whole or in part, the savings of the people.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is done in New Zealand now.

Mr. BRADETTE: Well, this is Canada. I am not worrying about New Zealand; I am worrying about our own people, the older ones and the younger ones, the people who want to put away a nest-egg of savings who still believe in thrift. But the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would have the government take that money. They would put a premium on not saving a cent. The person who would not have the foresightedness to put away some savings would go scot free. They pat him on the head and say, "Oh, you are a good fellow; don't think of the future; we will do that for you. You are just going to let things go." If the people do save something, then this party will come along and attempt to force the hand of the government. They will say, "We are going to expropriate that money, against your will"—and there is no other interpretation to be placed upon it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that not what they are doing—taking the people's savings?

Mr. BRADETTE: No, there is a great difference.

Mr. MacINNIS: Of course you are.

Mr. BRADETTE: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is only a life; it does not matter.

Mr. BRADETTE: Call it what you like. I am not at the moment dealing with life. Then they draw again, or try to draw a picture, trying to confuse the minds of the Canadian people, when they say:

> Replacing all dollar-a-year men by full-time national administrators paid only by the state and working in conjunction with war boards on which labour and farm organizations are properly represented.

I hold no brief for the so-called dollar-a-year men. I do not know any of them. I have never had any connection with any of them, directly or indirectly, either in private or in public life. But can anyone make me believe that most of those men, sometimes the heads of their own organizations, both industrial and financial, men who have added something to our Canadian life, are not honest and sincere, and doing something for the country? They came here to help the government to do yeoman work, and yet these people are going to throw them out, holus bolus, without giving them a chance to go before the public, to receive public opinion. Oh, no; those men cannot be forgiven because they happened to work for big corporations.

If we follow that mentality in this country, an attitude which means that men who have succeeded in their professions, in farming, in finance or in industry must be outcasts from our Canadian society, then I do not want to live in Canada under those conditions. Why do we find this condemnation? Why does that party try to make the Canadian people believe that these men are unjust and unfair in their activities? I say that in this country most of the big men—and I shall not call them by name—are acting fairly. The so-called dollar-a-year men come here well qualified in certain lines of endeavour, and I am sure, without knowing them personally, that they are honest and sincere. The idea in their minds is to see that we come out victorious in this terrific conflict, and to that end they are giving the best they have in them. They love their country as any other Canadians do. If my hon. friends opposite have their way, their names will remain infamous for all time to come. So far as I am concerned I will not be a party to that kind of thing.

As I have pointed out, I have been told that at least eighty per cent of those men were followers of the Conservative party. I have read about, heard about and know something about their actions. I have been convinced and I sincerely believe that each one of them is working as hard as he possibly can—not for the Liberal party, not for any particular government, but for Canada, our allies and the British empire.

In a well-prepared and well-delivered speech, the sincerity of which I do not doubt, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) tried to fix war guilt. He went back in history, and because he did so I suppose I may be allowed the same privilege. Referring to what happened in England at one time he used these words:

> We saw the reactionary Tory government of Great Britain making concession after concession to the dictators of Rome and Berlin.

This is not fair to British politics; it is not fair to what happened in England. No matter what we say now, the fact is that we were all Munich men, when Mr. Chamberlain went to Munich.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let the hon. member speak for himself.

Mr. BRADETTE: I will come back to that again. Chamberlain went to Munich because he knew that Great Britain was not ready.

Mr. GILLIS: Why was she not ready?

Mr. BRADETTE: Why? I will ask the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr.

Gillis) to look at the history of Great Britain. I would ask him to go back to the time when they had a near-socialist government in England that pretty nearly scuttled the British navy, and wanted peace at any price. If he does that he will find the answer to his question. We must keep the record straight.

Mr. MacINNIS: Let the hon. member go back to his own party.

Mr. BRADETTE: I am speaking about the hon. member's party now.

In my opinion that is not a very good record either—by a long shot. In 1937, 1938 and 1939 we fought here for national defence. Our Prime Minister had the foresight to see what was developing on the European horizon. He was thinking of the safety and security of Canada, and the development of national defence. He could see the dangerous war clouds rising on the European horizon. Were there any greater opponents to increases in expenditures for national defence than hon. members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation?

In my own constituency in 1939 they held an organization meeting, and they asked these questions: "Whom is the Liberal party going to fight? Whom is Canada going to fight? Are they going to fight Japan? Surely they do not intend to fight Germany?" It just happened that they were close to Moosonee, and they said they were "probably going to fight the Eskimos." Those are the things they were trying to say in those days. Let us keep the record straight. The condition of the world was not due to the Tory party in Great Britain; it was not due to any party. It was due to the state of mind of civilized people, of the democracies—nothing more or less than that. They all wished for and wanted peace. This is no place to try to besmirch the reputation of the British people or their government.

And now a word about social credit. They always have a wonderful bargain counter, but there is only one article on it, and that is social credit. They will cooperate with anyone or with anybody—not the New Democracy, of course, because they threw that name away a few days ago. I have nothing to say against the Social Credit party or its leader.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. BRADETTE: Yes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have never refused a question from anyone in the house. If hon. members will not permit me the same privilege, then I say shame on them. The hon. member for Cochrane has just said that we had thrown away the New Democracy name. That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. BRADETTE: I said—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Martin): The hon. gentleman has asked permission to put a question and the hon. gentleman who has the floor has consented. Will the hon. member put his question?

Mr. BRADETTE: I withdraw anything I said against New Democracy. For five or six years these people in Alberta have tried out their theories. However, we will leave that aside for the moment. What puzzles me is that the leader of this party is in favour of female civil servants in his province going out and buying farms which cost $4,000 to $5,000 in some cases, and then bringing in chinchillas, mink and other fur-bearing animals. He said that to do this would increase our foreign exchange. Time after time the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has risen in his place to attack the gold mining industry in my section of the country and apparently he wants to destroy it. This industry produces $200,000,000 of new wealth a year, which helps to maintain the ratio of the Canadian dollar to the United States currency. What is the sense in making such an attack? Nearly 500,000 Canadians, miners, farmers and workers, are fruitfully employed in producing a commodity which has a ready market in the United States.

I want to speak now on national unity.

Mr. MacINNIS: It would be out of order.

Mr. BRADETTE: Is the hon. member against national unity? I seldom interrupt the hon. gentleman when he is speaking. I have never doubted his sincerity, and I ask him to treat me in the same way.

Mr. MacINNIS: A little while ago the hon. gentleman said that what we were saying—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: —was said just to poison the minds of the people.

Mr. BRADETTE: I was referring to the policies of his party, not to the hon. member individually.

Mr. MacINNIS: Our party is sincere; we are not poisoning the minds of the people.

Mr. BRADETTE: I will say yes definitely. The hon. member has said worse things at times about the Liberal party.

We have just heard two hon. members from the province of Quebec. They represent an important section of the country that voted a definite "no", but I must tell them that there are other sections of the country where the Canadian people voted a definite "yes". If the extremists of our country can find a common ground then it will be possible to maintain Canadian unity. I believe it was last session that a member on the Conservative side stated that the majority should not be governed by the minority. I never heard a more sinister statement made, because I never knew that minorities could govern majorities.

In the British empire we have a marvellous spectacle of a small British minority, as far as the British people are concerned, doing one of the finest jobs the world has ever known. This result has been achieved by their endeavouring to understand every section of that empire. Only a few days ago one Hindu leader made a statement that three out of four people in the British empire are Hindus. The fact that that little island has become one of the great institutions of the world is due to its ability to listen to the problems of the people, to understand and respect the aspirations of all its people. Here in Canada we have the descendants of two great races, the French and the English, as well as the descendants of other European races, living together and working to make a greater prosperity and a happier Canada. It was my good fortune to be born and raised in Quebec. That is my second country within my country. When I go back to the French-speaking part of Canada it is like making a pilgrimage. However, I am living now in Ontario and I must give this message to you. To you in Quebec who are an integral part in our national life, to you who have done so well in your own province, remember that the Laurentian mountains are not the border of your country. The whole of Canada belongs to you, to the French-speaking Canadians as well as to the English-speaking Canadians, indeed, as well as to all Canadians.

If we can move forward, if we can eliminate the rough spots in this time of crisis, then there is no reason to doubt the future of this country. But to run roughshod over the minorities is un-Canadian and un-British. As a loyal son of British institutions and of Canada, I believe it is my duty to repeat what has been said so well by previous speakers and by several members of the cabinet. We are not satisfied with what has been done in our war effort, we want it to be accentuated still more. This effort should not meet with derision, and Canadian unity must be maintained at all times. Would any Canadian have the audacity to say that they are not loyal to their institutions in south Africa because their mobilization act states definitely that there will be no service required outside the African continent? No one will dare say that they are not loyal or are not ready to fight for Christianity or civilization.

Australia has been mentioned time and time again. Her sons are fighting in every section of the civilized world, but I do not think any one will dare criticize them because they have not passed legislation for service overseas. We have many things to learn from the present conflict. Anyone who has watched events in Burma during the last three months must come to the conclusion that certain racial and social problems must be dealt with.

To refer again to the Indian empire, only a few weeks ago Great Britain found it possible to send one of her greatest statesmen, a progressive in every sense of the word, to that country to attempt to deal with questions that had arisen. Sir Stafford Cripps had a mandate from his own government, and he stayed on the ground in an effort to comprehend the aspirations of every section of the population of that great Indian empire. I well remember when a newspaperman on the Ottawa Journal went to England last year to attend a press conference. When he came home he wrote a series of very fine articles. It was his good fortune, probably because his ancestors came from Ireland, to have had a personal interview with the Prime Minister of Eire.

This newspaperman wrote a series of articles in which he did not beg, because there was no need to beg, but in which he asked the Canadian people to try to comprehend the position of Eire, to realize what she had done so far and what could be expected of her. It was not necessary that those articles should be read in the province of Quebec, or, for that matter, anywhere else in Canada. So far as I know, there has not been a single adverse comment in the province of Quebec over the attitude of Eire in this war. If it is possible to analyse coolly the actions of any peoples of the British empire, surely we the Canadian people, who have had the good fortune to live together for so many years, should try to understand each other and achieve national unity in a time of crisis. We do not want indulgence; we do not want mercy. All we ask is that every section of our population take the trouble to try to understand the mentality of the Canadian people and its different racial groups.

I listened attentively last evening to the masterly address of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). He spoke as a true Canadian and a true statesman. His appeal was addressed to reason. A previous speaker has referred to Doctor Shields, and although we may have one or two men of that type in the province of Quebec also, who would try to arouse one section of the population against the other, I have been highly elated at the general feeling of good understanding there is between our people. It shows how easy it is for us to cooperate harmoniously in a common cause when only we try to understand each other.

I want to speak now on the plebiscite. For three solid weeks I spent all of my time in my constituency, working in cooperation with the Canadian Legion and with various political organizations. I worked almost day and night to get a "yes" vote in my constitency, and I received the smallest "yes" majority given in any riding in Canada. It was almost next to "no". But I am proud of my work and of that "yes" majority, and I believe that if I had had more time at my disposal the majority would have been much greater. I was appealing to a section of the country in which we have no war industries of any kind but one in which we have always gone over the top with a vengeance in raising money for war activities, one in which I can say, without boasting, there have been the largest enlistments in proportion to population of any riding in Canada. Our young Canadians in that part of the country, regardless of their racial origin, have joined the colours of their own accord—Finnish, Polish, Russian, French speaking, English speaking, and so on. For them all there was only one common cause. Indeed at the present time our supply of man-power is so short because of the great numbers who have enlisted, and I say that with pride, that our industries are hampered.

I have here two issues of the Daily Press of Timmins, Ontario, of the 11th and 12th of this month, and each contains a picture of the latest recruits to join the armed forces from that part of the country. I should like to read their names. The first picture shows one of the largest groups to be dispatched to headquarters in Toronto within the last month, and in the front row, left to right, are: Fernand Carriere, Harvey Kenty, Jean Belisle, Elmo Pissonnette, George Miller and Hector Madon. In the back row, left to right, are: Private J. P. McFarlane, member of the local recruiting staff, Charles Laahanem, Mansfield Francis, Alexander Gauthier, John Daly and Patrice Mone. Another recruit who had left the night before, Marcel Tichette, was not present for the picture.

Hon. members will see from those names a representative cross-section of our people. The recruiting generally represents every section of northern Ontario. North Bay, Sudbury, Kapuskasing, Timmins, Kirkland Lake —everywhere there is the same answer to the call of duty, regardless of race or creed. They enlist freely as young Canadians, ready to make the sacrifice so that we may be victorious. In that section of the country it has been possible to create a huge melting pot in which Canadian aspirations are given full sway, and if that be possible in one part of the country, it is possible elsewhere in Canada.

Strong and injudicious statements were made by some speakers in the plebiscite campaign. One gentleman in addressing a meeting said that if we had had conscription in the fall of 1939, the war would be over by now. Such a statement did not help our cause in any way, shape or form. At another meeting a speaker said that Canada should have one million men overseas. These sweeping, far-fetched statements were no help to me in getting out a "yes" vote. But I want to say that our people, when they voted "yes" in my section of the country, were not voting for conscription. Following the lead of the Prime Minister, the leader of the opposition and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, I emphasized the importance—I used the very words of the Prime Minister—of a balanced war effort, the necessity for which has been so well pointed out by the cabinet ministers who have spoken in this debate. I also said that so far as I personally was concerned I would never take the responsibility upon my own weak shoulders of sending one single Canadian soldier over to Europe unless he was completely equipped with all the weapons that modern warfare demands. Nor would I take the responsibility of putting men in uniform if I believed that it would diminish the production of vital supplies that are sorely needed at the present time by dear old Great Britain. I also made it very clear that this was not just a war of infantry, but a balanced war, and my people understood.

But, and I say this in no spirit of criticism, I want no more Hong Kong. I want our young Canadians who have enlisted for overseas service anywhere in the world to be, as General McNaughton so well said, a real striking force, thoroughly equipped with modern weapons, so that, as was so well expressed by the Minister of National War Services this afternoon, human life may be spared as much as possible.

To-day is to me, as it is to every Canadian, a very sad anniversary indeed. It is the second anniversary of the defeat of my old motherland, France. But mind you, Mr. Speaker, it was not lack of man-power that destroyed France. It was not lack of courage, or lack of valour. It was purely and simply a lack of modern equipment—of tanks, of planes, of guns. Wherever we have met the enemy on equal terms in the matter of equipment, we have beaten him. I would not think for a single moment of sending human flesh, unprotected, against a German panzer division. I believe that our soldiers should have the very best in weapons, in food and clothing, and in equipment generally. I should be remiss in my duty if I urged anything less.

On motion of Mr. Bradette the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 18, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SASKATCHEWAN SHEEP PRODUCTION PROGRAMME

Mrs. NIELSEN:

1. Has the provincial government of Saskatchewan applied to the federal government for financial assistance to launch a programme for increased sheep production in that province?

2. If so, (a) what sum is to be granted to Saskatchewan, and (b) what is the proposed increase?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Following a conference held with representatives of the provincial departments of agriculture, plans for a cooperative effort to increase sheep production in Canada were outlined, as follows:

(a) The dominion undertook to supply provincial departments of agriculture with certain pamphlets to be used in connection with their sheep campaigns;

(b) The dominion agreed to pay freight charges from points of origin to points of distribution on ewes or ewe lambs purchased for breeding;

(c) To the extent that they may be available, the dominion agreed to loan to farmers starting new flocks of sheep containing a minimum of fifteen females, rams for the first two seasons.

The above forms of assistance have been authorized, distribution of publicity has already been made, and the freight assistance and ram loan policies will be available from August 1, 1942, to December 31, 1942.

2. (a) The amount that may be expended in Saskatchewan for freight assistance in transporting female breeding stock and for ram distribution will depend upon the extent such assistance is used in that province;

(b) We have no information on the proposed increase in sheep in Saskatchewan.

PRICE CEILING—DOMESTIC AND IMPORT SUBSIDIES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. What is the total number and amount of claims that have been filed for, (a) domestic subsidies, (b) import subsidies, since the commencement of price ceiling operations to date?

2. Of these how many have been, (a) examined, (b) allowed at the amount claimed, (c) reduced, (d) disallowed?

Mr. ILSLEY:

As of the close of business, June 8, 1942—

1.	Number	Amount
(a) Domestic	10,038	$4,674,474 69
(b) Imports	2,789	2,524,350 39
Total	12,827	$7,198,825 08

2.	Claims examined and paid (a)	Allowed in full (b)	Reduced (c)	Disallowed (d)
Domestic	8,733	8,477	255	1
Imports	1,355	639	557	159
Total	10,088	9,116	812	160

INCOME TAX—ALLOWANCES FOR BRITISH GUEST CHILDREN

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What are the regulations governing deductions of dependent's allowance from foster parents' income tax in cases of British guest children brought out by private auspices and in cases of children brought out by government assistance?

2. What action is the government taking to make these regulations uniform?

3. What are the income tax exemption regulations with respect to foster parents generally?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. Section 5(ee) of the Income War Tax Act provides an exemption for each child maintained by the taxpayer in Canada under a cooperative scheme sponsored by the governments of the United Kingdom and of Canada or any of the provinces of Canada.

No exemption is given under the Income War Tax Act to taxpayers supporting British guest children brought out under private auspices. Section 5(ee) applies only to children brought out by the children's overseas reception board of Great Britain with the assistance of the British government. Foster parents of such children should claim the amount which the law allows them when filing their income tax returns. The inspector of income tax for the district in which they file will examine a list received from the Department of Mines and Resources showing the names of the guest children and the names and addresses of the foster parents with whom they are living. If the name of the guest child claimed by the taxpayer is shown on a list thus supplied, the exemption will be granted. If the name is not on the list, the exemption will not be granted. These lists are kept up to date from month to month as new names or changes of addresses are received from the Department of Mines and Resources.

2. The uniformity of the regulations and the applicability of the law as to procedure is stated in the explanation to question No. 1.

The government is taking no action to grant exemptions to taxpayers supporting guest children brought out under private auspices.

3. There is no exemption granted in the Income War Tax Act to any foster parent on account of any child supported by him, other than his own children or grandchildren (save in the case of persons maintaining self-contained domestic establishments and supporting therein one or more individuals dependent upon them and connected with them by blood relationship, marriage or adoption) unless such taxpayer has legally adopted such child. The exemption given for children brought out under the British government scheme is therefore an exception to the general rule and in so far as it has not been extended by statute to embrace children brought out under private auspices, the law now applying to all Canadian taxpayers in respect to Canadian children must also apply in respect to British children.

OFFICIAL WAR HISTORIES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Where and how can the official history of the war 1914-19 be obtained?

2. If it has not been published, why not?

3. Is the history of the present war currently being recorded and prepared?

4. Who is the appointed historian and what steps is he taking in the preparation?

[Mr. Gibson.]

Mr. RALSTON:

1. Volume I of the official history of the "Canadian Forces in the Great War, 1914-19", bound in two parts (i) text and (ii) appendices and maps, covering from the outbreak of war to September 1915, can be obtained from the King's Printer, or through any bookseller. The price is $2.00 for the text and $1.50 for the appendices and maps.

2. Volume I was published in June 1938; no other volumes have been published. Work on the subsequent volumes was in progress in 1939 but was interrupted by the outbreak of the present war.

3. Material for the Canadian history of the current war is being recorded, assembled and indexed.

4. No historian for the army has yet been appointed. The director of the historical section (general staff) is responsible for the recording, assembling and indexing of material. He is represented overseas by a historical officer at Canadian military headquarters.

Historical material relating to the Royal Canadian Navy is being dealt with by the Naval historical section, and for material relating to the Royal Canadian Air Force by the director of staff duties.

REVENUE AND EXPENDITURE

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. How much is the dominion government budgeting to spend during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1943, (a) on war account, (b) on ordinary account?

2. How much is expected to be raised, (a) by taxation revenues, (b) by non-tax revenues, (c) by borrowing?

3. What percentages of total war and ordinary expenditures are being raised by taxation revenue and by borrowing during the present fiscal year, (a) by Great Britain, (b) by the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to suggest to the hon. gentleman who asks this question that the first two parts of the question are not in order, because they anticipate the budget and are questions which necessarily would be answered in the statement which is made to the house on the presentation of the budget. That objection does not apply to the third part, but it is so bound up with the other two that I suggest that the whole three be dropped; the third part can be asked, at some later stage.

Question dropped.

RESTRICTIONS AFFECTING PURCHASES OF MATERIAL BY WAR CONTRACTORS

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Are contractors working on contracts for the Department of Munitions and Supply restricted to making purchases of material from certain companies only?
2. If so, what are the names of the companies?
3. Why are these companies the only ones from whom the contractor may purchase materials?
4. Is this creating a restraint of trade and a breach of the Combines Act?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.
2, 3 and 4. Answered by No. 1.

CAPE BRETON COAL—WATER TRANSPORTATION TO CENTRAL CANADA

Mr. McGARRY:

Can the minister give information relative to any considered plan by the Canadian National Railways, to transport coal by water carriers and rail to the central Canadian markets and thus to adequately supply these markets and stabilize production in the Cape Breton mining fields?

Mr. HOWE: After consideration by the transport controller, director of shipping, the coal administrator, the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, and the Canadian National Railways, a recommendation was made to the dominion government to proceed immediately with the construction at Point du Chene, New Brunswick, of coal discharging facilities from ships to cars, and the provision of a stock piling area, together with the necessary railway yard and trackage. Authority has been given to proceed with the work, which is actively in hand, under the supervision of the Canadian National Railways. It is anticipated these facilities will be completed in time to handle a substantial tonnage of coal before the close of navigation this year, which coal will be moved by rail to central Canadian markets from Pount du Chene.

MARRIED WOMEN ON NIGHT SHIFTS IN GOVERNMENT-OWNED WAR PLANTS

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What steps have been taken by the government to prevent married women from working on night shifts in government-owned plants?
2. When will such measures be put into full effect?

Mr. MITCHELL:

First: 1 and 2. The government has arranged with provincial authorities to inspect dominion government-owned plants in order that regulations which are in effect in each province in respect to employment of women are complied with and in addition the Department of Pensions and National Health has organized a staff to check working conditions. The enactment of regulations is a provincial matter

Second: 1 and 2. The government has not fixed the maximum weight which women or girls may carry in government-owned plants. This, and other matters affecting the comfort and welfare of women, are receiving attention.

WOMEN OR GIRLS IN GOVERNMENT-OWNED WAR PLANTS

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What steps has the government taken to fix the maximum weight of loads which women or girls are compelled to carry or handle in government-owned plants?
2. If such measures have been taken, when are they going into effect?

Mr. MITCHELL:

First: 1 and 2. The government has arranged with provincial authorities to inspect dominion government-owned plants in order that regulations which are in effect in each province in respect to employment of women are complied with and in addition the Department of Pensions and National Health has organized a staff to check working conditions. The enactment of regulations is a provincial matter.

Second: 1 and 2. The government has not fixed the maximum weight which women or girls may carry in government-owned plants. This, and other matters affecting the comfort and welfare of women, are receiving attention.

*CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. Will a sitting of the house be reserved this session to permit the second reading of Bill No. 3 which has been on the order paper of the house since January 26, 1942?
2. If not, is it the intention of the government itself to introduce a bill having for its object the establishment of a Canadian flag?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I should answer this question verbally. As to the first paragraph, it is impossible for me to give any assurance at the present time as to what may or may not be possible at subsequent sittings of the house. With respect to the second paragraph, I should say that the intention of the government with respect to any government measure will be made known in the usual manner, at the appropriate time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Answered.

Mr. CHURCH: There is only one flag, the union jack.

*DISTURBANCE AT PLACE VIGER HOTEL, MONTREAL, JUNE 14

Mr. DUROCHER:

What steps does the government intend to take to prevent a recurrence of the brawls which took place on the 14th instant between the longshoremen and boarders at the old Place Viger hotel, Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I may answer this verbally. Brawls of the kind referred to are matters for the local police. The government does not intend to take any steps.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CAPE BRETON COAL MINING INDUSTRY—LACK OF SHIPPING

Mr. McGARRY:

Has the government, either directly or through the fuel controller, urged the British admiralty to release more ships to relieve the transportation bottleneck which is alleged to be the cause of the greatly lessened production of coal in the Cape Breton mines, and a consequent hard-time employment of the men engaged in that industry?

BUTTER

Mr. BLANCHETTE:

1. The consumption of butter has increased in Canada by how many pounds during the past five months as compared with the same corresponding months of last year?

2. During the first five months of the present year, the production of butter has decreased by how many pounds in Canada as compared with the same five months of the previous year?

3. In the event of a substantial increase in consumption and a substantial decrease in production, is it the intention of the government to bring in remedial measures before the heavy production season shall have passed in order to avoid a serious shortage of butter in Canada?

AVAILABILITY AND USE OF HUMAN RESOURCES

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. What is the total available supply of (a) man-power and (b) woman-power in Canada as of March 31, 1942?

2. How many (a) men, (b) women are engaged as of March 31, 1942, in (i) the armed services; (ii) industries making the finished tools of war; (iii) essential manufacturing industries; (iv) agriculture; (v) non-essential industries and services?

3. How many (a) men, (b) women, does the government expect to assign to the above classifications, (i) as of December 31, 1942; (ii) as of December 31, 1943?

[Mr. Church.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO RESULTS OF RECENT SURVEY OF UNEMPLOYED EMPLOYABLES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Recently a registration of the unemployed employables in Canada was ordered, and I understand that it was completed several days ago. I desire to learn from the Minister of Labour what that registration shows in terms of totals, males and females, and if that compilation has not yet been completed when may the house expect to receive the information?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As soon as the compilation is completed I shall be quite willing to give it to the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know; but when?

Mr. MITCHELL: I shall make inquiries.

CLOSING OF REGISTRATION OFFICE IN EARLY AFTERNOON

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have received several letters in regard to a matter which I think should be brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour. In one letter the gentleman complains that according to law he was required to register at 174 Spadina avenue, Toronto, on June 2. He went there at 1.30 p.m. to comply with the request and was met with a notice on the door saying "Back in an hour". I should like to ask the minister why that should be so.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

CONDITIONS IN NOVA SCOTIA COAL MINING AREAS

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour based on a telegram, or several telegrams, I received to-day with reference to the coal situation in Nova Scotia, which is a serious one. The minister has copies of these telegrams, and I should like to know if he is prepared to make a statement as to what the government is doing in order to remedy the situation.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): As soon as the telegram was received steps were immediately taken, in cooperation with the coal controller, to investigate the situation; and I hope I may be able to make a statement to-morrow. With reference to another part of the telegram,

I should say that employees of the mine who wish to seek employment elsewhere may make application at the public employment office and be transferred to other available employment. They are not required to have a release from their former employers.

BEEF

SHORTAGE OF SUPPLIES IN TORONTO DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I wonder if I could get an answer to the question I asked of the Minister of Finance on Tuesday with regard to the wartime prices and trade board regulations affecting the shortage of beef in the Toronto area?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman; I thought he was bringing the situation to my attention and asking that steps be taken to assure a supply of beef, rather than asking for specific information. The beef policy, if I may put it in that way, was very fully covered by a statement of the wartime prices and trade board a week or ten days ago. It involved the setting up of a food purchasing corporation and a very carefully thought out arrangement which was designed to meet all requirements of the situation from the point of view of the farmer, the consumer and the price ceiling policy. I cannot add anything to that statement. I could get a copy of it and give it to my hon. friend, or take any other reasonable step in that regard that the hon. gentleman may suggest.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I put it definitely in the form of a question on Tuesday last. The policy is not working out; there is a serious shortage of beef in the Toronto area for the consuming public. If the minister will read my question, he will see that I wanted to know what steps are to be taken, apart from those already announced, in order to relieve this serious situation.

BUSINESS OF PARLIAMENT

REALLOCATION OF WORK OF COMMONS AND SENATE TO MEET WAR CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can make a statement with regard to the negotiations he has had with the leader of the other chamber as to war work. The other chamber has now adjourned until July 12 because, they say, they are without any work. Could the Prime Minister make any further statement?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sorry I cannot oblige my hon. friend to-day.

PRIVILEGE—MR. ROY

QUESTION AS TO TIME ALLOTTED UNDER FORTY MINUTE RULE IN SPEECH ON MOBILIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): I rise to a question of privilege. When I was speaking on Bill No. 80 yesterday I was, no doubt by inadvertence, forced by the Deputy Speaker to conclude my remarks. I quote from the English translation of my speech:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that he has exceeded his time by two minutes and a half.

Mr. Roy: I have been delayed by calls to order—

I read here "calls to order," though that is not what I said. My words can be found in the French report—"points of order."

—and I think I should be allowed a few minutes in order to submit the amendment I have in mind.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have to go by what the Clerk tells me. The hon. member has spoken for forty-two minutes.

According to the figures of the officials keeping the time, I had been speaking only for thirty-seven minutes, including the time taken on long points of order. On one of those points the Deputy Speaker asked, "Does any hon. gentleman wish to speak to the point of order?" and some hon. members did so. In this way I lost quite a few minutes, and it was noticed by some hon. members that my time had been curtailed, one of whom was the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who came to my room to report that fact. Therefore, I should like to ask Your Honour if you would grant me the privilege of moving my amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps I should point out that the hon. member spoke to me this morning respecting his proposed question of privilege. I took occasion to look at Hansard, and it is true that when the hon. member spoke yesterday there were very long interruptions. Many of the interruptions were in connection with points of order, and certainly they did consume a great deal of time. I would not wish the house to understand that I should be willing to extend the forty-minute rule simply because of interruptions alone. But when points of order are raised in large numbers, and a considerable period of time is taken up by hon. members in discussing them—and besides, there seems to be some doubt as to the correctness of the time allotted to the hon. member—I believe some special consideration might be given. He was not allowed to move his amendment, and he is now asking the consent of the house that he be extended the privilege of having the three minutes to which he says he was entitled.

I should imagine that, inasmuch as there is some doubt in connection with the time, it would be the sense of the house that in fairness to the hon. member—for, after all, all hon. members are equal before the Chair, subject of course to the rules—he might be allowed that time. My own inclination is that the house should agree to permitting the hon. member to speak for three minutes when the debate is resumed. The hon. member will wait of course until we reach the order for the day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think the house would have any objection to giving the hon. member his three minutes, but I do believe it would be the sense of the house that the hon. member who adjourned the debate last night should have permission first to complete his address.

Mr. SPEAKER: That would seem to be the sense of the house. It is understood the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) will have his opportunity to speak after the hon. member who adjourned the debate last night has completed his observations.

FARM LOANS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REFERENCE TO RETURN BROUGHT DOWN IN ANSWER TO QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Has the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) had time to procure the information he promised to get a week ago?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): If the hon. member is referring to the information he desired to obtain from the Canadian farm loan board, I would reply that I have looked into the matter, and I am not yet in a position to make a statement about it. I believe the information can be obtained. It has never been presented to the house, and my purpose was to find out how much time and trouble would necessarily be expended in obtaining the information, and then to see the hon. member privately about it. Perhaps I could supply it to him privately.

Mr. REID: There is a principle attached to the question. Returns are made every month from district farm loan board officers to the head office at Ottawa. These reports should be made available to hon. members, if asked for.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote in favour of the passing of Bill No. 80. I came to that conclusion without any hesitation, and after giving thorough study to the situation and to our activities since the beginning of the war in the fall of 1939. This is a momentous decision for me to make; nevertheless, I repeat, I make it deliberately.

I do so for several reasons. First, I believe implicitly that the leadership which has been given by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) since the beginning of the war has been good. I am also convinced that the war cabinet and members of the government generally have done a good job so far as our war activities are concerned. I am not here to say that everything we have done has been perfect, that we have not made some mistakes, or that our war activity could not be accentuated or in some departments run differently. But I am convinced that this government will continue to wage a total war without the necessity of conscription of our man-power for service overseas. I have sat in the house for sixteen years. During that time I have always followed my party—not blindly, but loyally. I have been logical in my demands, both departmentally and personally. I have taken everything in its stride. Sometimes I may have had personal grievances, but I never voiced them.

I have, however, a request to make at this time. In my constituency during the campaign on the plebiscite I told my people, with all the sincerity I possess, that if the time ever came—I hoped it never would come, if we used the proper methods and there was a well-balanced war effort, and that conscription would not be necessary—if the time ever came when the government, with the information in its possession, decided that conscription for overseas would be necessary for the preservation of this country and of civilization, that decision would not be left to the government, but would be left to parliament. Those words they heard from my own lips. So far as I am personally concerned, knowing the statesmanship of the Prime Minister of Canada and recognizing his great knowledge of parliamentary procedure and the prerogatives of parliament, I should hope, as I said a moment ago, that if ever the day comes when we must decide the matter of conscription, it will be done by parliament. That is all I want to say in connection with this matter. I repeat the plea I made during the plebiscite campaign; and those words were used also by other members and leaders of this parliament on several occasions.

I should like to deal briefly with a very delicate matter. I read with great care—I did not have the good fortune to be present in the house to hear him speak—the words of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). His resignation from the cabinet is a national loss. We all know the courteous treatment we always received from him and the officers of his department. I think one thing was shown by his eloquence and forcefulness, and that is that he has regained his health. His services are still required by all of Canada. He knows how I feel about his resignation. He knows how sincerely I pleaded with him to stay in the government. However, that is past history. I believe one of the reasons why he resigned was that he felt he had suffered a personal defeat in the province of Quebec. I am sure it was nothing of the kind. As I view the plebiscite vote in Quebec it was not a vote for or against conscription; it was a vote of protestation against the way they had been treated by some sections of Canada. The population of Quebec felt that they had done all they possibly could ever since the beginning of the war in connection with all war activities, including sending their sons to fight. Certain newspapers of this country and certain organizations tried to besmirch the reputation of Quebec. The fact is that there are very few families in that province which have not representatives in the fighting forces in Great Britain or elsewhere who are shedding their blood and losing their lives for the cause. We all should realize the poignancy there is in the hearts of the people of that province under such unfair criticism.

As I said before, I have the honour of having been born in Quebec. I say to the members from that province: Think well before your vote may defeat the government and involve this country in the throes of a general election. There are things that are worth remembering; there are things that we cannot get away from. Are you ready to believe in the principles of a national government? Are you ready to follow what was said in all sincerity by the leader of the Conservative party? I do not think many of you believe in the principles of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. Yesterday a vigorous appeal was made by the representative of the Canadian party, but I did not see any hon. member cross the floor to the other side. I make my appeal as a Canadian. There are times when we must hit the stream and face the wind. That is all I want to say on that score.

Yesterday the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) intimated that the Liberal party had been responsible for the declaration of war in the fall of 1939. The whole Canadian nation, all of parliament, were behind the decision made in the fall of 1939 to participate in this fight on the side of civilization. Just the other night the city of Ottawa gave a marvellous reception to two young French-Canadian airmen in recognition of their great bravery. I was present on that occasion. Every time one of those men made a statement he was cheered by everyone. There was no question of race or creed on that occasion. Everyone was in full agreement; everyone gloried in the achievements of these heroes. I should like to quote the words spoken by one of those men in Montreal on May 27 last. I refer to Pilot Officer Laurent Guillaume Robillard. He said:

(Translation):

Dashing at the enemy, in the sky of England or France, I knew that I was fighting for my country, my family and my fellow-citizens. My comrades are instilled with the same ideal and they are fighting for the same cause. On their behalf, I wish to urge my compatriots to keep that fact in mind and to remember that they are the worthy representatives of a race which has always risen in defence of a just cause.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, before reading my amendment to the house, will you kindly allow me to offer my most sincere thanks for the fairness of your decision. I take great pleasure in saying that the fair play shown by the Chair and its dignity offer one more reason for me to be proud of my country and its institutions.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe):

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that the policy of the government respecting mobilization, instead of drawing closer the union of the two races in Canada has fostered dissensions which might cause an internal war, thus destroying the ideal set forth by the fathers of confederation."

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that many hon. members of this house have visited the city of New York and while there have seen at the entrance to that splendid harbour the statue of liberty. I am equally sure that there are many who are not familiar with the inscription that appears on that statue; therefore I should like to read it to the house. It is as follows:

Not like the brazen giant of Greek fame,
With conquering limbs astride from land to land,
Here at our sea-washed, sunset gates shall stand
A mighty woman with a torch, whose flame
Is the imprisoned lightning, and her name
Mother of Exiles. From her beacon hand
Glows world-wide welcome; her mild eyes command
The air-bridged harbour that twin cities frame.
"Keep, ancient lands, your storied pomp!" cries she
With silent lips. "Give me your tired, your poor,
Your huddled masses yearning to breathe free,
The wretched refuse of your teaming shore.
Send these, the homeless, tempest-tost to me.
I lift my lamp beside the golden door!"

This poem was written by an exile from Europe, one who had come, like hundreds of thousands, yes, like millions of others to seek liberty and freedom and opportunity in a new land.

I have read this little poem for one reason. A few weeks ago I had the pleasure of being one of a small party who met a distinguished Englishman, whose name I shall not mention, but who is known throughout Canada. He had spent a considerable time in the United States, not only in these days but in years past. Discussing the isolationist feeling in the United States, he said that the key to it could be found in the little poem I have just read to the house. It was because people from the old continent of Europe wanted to get away from the wars and the quarrels and the rumours of wars to a land where they thought they would have peace and security that they came to this continent. It was the feeling that they did not wish to be embroiled in any of the conflicts of Europe that led, he said, to the development of this isolationist feeling in the United States, and I thought it was a very true observation. I could not help reflecting that it might be applied with almost equal force to the province of Quebec, a province, let me say, which has not been understood by the rest of Canada.

One of the tragedies in this situation, Mr. Speaker, is the fact that the rest of Canada does not understand Quebec and that Quebec does not understand the rest of Canada. But I can understand the feeling of our French-Canadian fellow-citizens who have been here, they and their ancestors, for almost three hundred years. They were the people who laid the foundations of this country, who tamed the wilderness and built a civilization here in the earliest centuries of our growth.

Those who think that our French-Canadian friends are lacking in courage were never more mistaken in any view they ever held in their lives. When I look back over the history of this country and the part that the French Canadians have played in building it up, I recall that a little over three hundred years ago they founded the city of Montreal, and some years later, when that city was threatened by invasion from the Iroquois, Adam Dollard, Sieur des Ormeaux, and twenty of his brave companions, well aware that they were going to their deaths, went to a little fort on the Long Sault rapids and there perished to a man in checking the Iroquois hordes. They died a glorious death but they saved what was then the little community of Montreal. Incidents such as this have been repeated time and again in our history.

To-day, as we debate this question in the house, French Canadians are serving in our armed forces, on land, on the sea and in the air. No, Mr. Speaker, it is no lack of courage. It is something else which we in English-speaking Canada would do well to try to understand. But at the same time may I offer this admonition to my French-Canadian friends, that there are some things in English-speaking Canada which they should try to understand. This is not an imperialistic war. I have been surprised at the attitude taken by some hon. members from the province of Quebec who have spoken in this debate and in previous debates and given the impression that this was an imperialistic war. It is not. If it were an imperialistic war I have no hesitation in saying to this house that so far as my influence and power in this country goes, and I admit that it is not very great, I would be opposed to such a war.

May I mention a little incident, if the house will pardon me for doing so? A few months after the outbreak of the war in September, 1939, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) honoured me by asking me to represent Canada at an imperial conference which Mr. Chamberlain, then Prime Minister of Great Britain, had called in the old historic city of London. A few days after my arrival in London Mr. Chamberlain gave a luncheon in my honour. After luncheon he asked me if I would be good enough to tell him and half a dozen of his cabinet colleagues and about a half-dozen other gentlemen who were there what the attitude of Canada was in this war and generally how we regarded the whole thing. I explained to them as best I could that Canada was in this war primarily because she recognized in the German menace a threat to her freedom and her liberty. I went on to say that if this were the South African war over again I would not be for it, nor would I be taking any part in it, nor would there be any volume of support in Canada for such a war. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not an imperialistic war, and I think many of our French-Canadian friends are profoundly in error in thinking so.

This brings me to a comment I wish to make on the moving speech made by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) the other day, a speech which touched the feelings, I believe, of all members of the house. My former colleague in that speech described the motives which actuated French Canadians. He pictured how the people of Canada came from English descent and French descent, and how there was a tie and a pull of sentiment between the English-speaking people in Canada and Great Britain that was absent in the French-Canadian section of our population. He went on to indicate how he had to reach his conclusions about participating in this war. He said:

> Because I have to reason in my mind why I have to support the British flag and spend my energies for the defence of British rule in this conflict, or perhaps elsewhere.

In this war, Mr. Speaker, we are supporting the British flag. Why? Because the British flag is the emblem of freedom and liberty. But equally we are supporting the flags of other countries which love freedom and liberty. We are supporting the flags of conquered Belgium, and of Holland, Poland, Denmark, Norway, and France, whom we all wish to see restored. We are supporting the flag of the United States, the stars and stripes, in this struggle. Why? Because these are all emblems of freedom and liberty throughout the world. Never, Mr. Speaker, since Satan was cast out of heaven have such terrors and evils been loosed upon the world as now.

I should like hon. members—and may I direct this particularly to my hon. friends from Quebec—to reflect on what the condition of the world would be if Germany were to triumph. If Germany triumphed in Europe and Britain were crushed, what hope would there be for Europe? Europe would come under the evil despotism of nazi tyranny. What hope would there be for Asia and for Australia if Japan, one of the axis partners, should triumph in that part of the world? In a short time the whole continent of Africa would be under the domination of the tyrants. We can throw our imagination forward a little; in south America powerful influences would be at work to turn those countries to the side of the tyrant, and freedom, liberty and Christian civilization would be preserved for the time being only in the north American continent. If that happened, what would be the position of Canada? I ask myself that question because I want to see Canada develop her own national spirit; I do not wish to see her become part of the United States. But inevitably under those conditions forces would be created which would make Canada a part of the United States. May I ask my French-Canadian friends what their position would be under those conditions?

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): Not so bad.

Mr. CRERAR: The French people in Canada have certain privileges and certain rights. They acquired those rights by treaty, and so far as I am concerned every right that they have in that respect should be recognized and should never be challenged. I believe that is the sentiment of every hon. member. But those rights would not be preserved very long in this country if Germany triumphed in Europe and Japan in Asia. In my opinion it would be only a matter of time, and a comparatively short time, before we would have to fight not only on the Atlantic coast but on the Pacific coast as well. There is no richer prize in the world to-day for the tyrant countries than Canada, with its lakes and rivers and rich valleys, with its minerals and its forests and its fish and its fertile agricultural lands. Because this danger seems to me to be outstanding, I am willing to go to any length to defeat Germany now—not when she comes to our shores, but now, while she is three thousand miles away. For that reason I have no hesitation in saying that if I had believed, a year ago or six months ago, or at the outbreak of war, that conscription would have added to the effectiveness of Canada's war effort, I would have been for it. I will say further that if the time comes when in my judgment conscription would add to the effectiveness of Canada's war effort, I would be for it. I want to make that clear. I shall have something more to say about that a moment later.

In this great danger which confronts the world and which confronts us it is not merely a misfortune but a tragedy that disunity is showing its ugly head in Canada. Where does this come from? I say very frankly that those who raised the conscription issue in this country will carry a serious responsibility when the story of these times comes to be written, and I say with equal force that those who agree with my friends the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) and the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) will carry an equally heavy responsibility before the searching eye of history. These two opposing forces become more and more inflamed with the passage of time—the one, which would conscript men for overseas at once, regardless of the consequences to our national unity; the other, which would not send a man from Canadian shores to carry on this struggle. They typify two forces which are as diametrically opposed as the poles, and it is a sad reflection that our Canadian effort in the war—and I am proud of it—is in danger of being ground between these two opposing forces. Does that make common sense in our war effort? Does that feed the flames of a pure patriotism for Canada? I cannot see it.

May I remind the house of the value of unity in a struggle of this kind. The men you put into uniform in the army and the air force and the naval services are not the only factors in conducting this struggle. One of the greatest factors is moral and psychological, and I aver that no nation can conduct war effectively if it is riven by disunity. Why did the nazis organize disunity in every country they sought to overcome? In Norway they had their quislings. There was not a country in Europe that nazi Germany attacked successfully wherein she had not operated and expended millions to promote and create disunity. Why? Because psychologically it weakened the power of resistance of those countries. To that end Germany spent untold millions. It is a sorry reflection that, with intentions which, let me concede, may be the best in the world, we have in this country those who will do that job for Hitler for nothing. The importance of this should not be lost upon the people of this country.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. According to standing order 41 I would ask the Minister of Mines and Resources to withdraw his statement. He has no right to compare me to Hitler; I am as good a Canadian as the minister is.

Mr. CRERAR: I hope Your Honour will take this interruption into account when checking my time.

It is to maintain unity that the Prime Minister who heads this government has sought by every means in his power to bridge these differences. There may be differences of opinion as to what he has done, but I know, and every one of his colleagues knows, that the thought that has been uppermost in the mind of the Prime Minister has been to keep this country united, because by keeping it united we can best accomplish a maximum war effort. Sometimes, if it could be done, I think it would be an excellent thing if we could take the leaders and the sub-leaders and the sub-sub-leaders in these two camps and put them together on some comfortable island for the duration of the war. I think it would be a good thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this a free country any longer?

Mr. BRUCE: You cannot stand criticism.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the first I would nominate as a candidate for this mythical island would be the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. I ask a decision from the Chair. A moment ago I raised a point of order and I did not get a decision from the Chair. The minister must withdraw his statement. It is contrary to the rules of the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not understand that the minister compared the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains to Hitler. I think that is an exaggeration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What he did compare him to was a quisling; that was the fair inference from what he said. I hold no brief for the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, but that is undoubtedly the interpretation.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite mistaken.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member again raises a point of order as to something the minister is now saying. He has not completed any analogy so far as I have yet heard.

Mr. CRERAR: I hope this will not be charged against me when you come to look at the clock, Mr. Speaker. I say it in the best of good temper.

I think I would nominate my hon. friend for a place on this comfortable island. He has announced that he is the leader of a party, and I think probably his deskmate, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), might be described as the tail of the party. I see the head and the tail, but I do not see any body in between; it is a sort of disembodied party. Then I think I would perhaps nominate my friend the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) as the medical director general of this island; I am sure he would make a good job of it. I hesitate to say it, because I would not want to send my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to this island, but if I were looking for a monitor who could caution and advise, and at times chastise, I think I would select the leader of the opposition for that job.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Thank heaven the minister has not the power to do anything. I do not know anybody in the government of this country more impotent than the hon. gentleman who is now speaking.

Mr. CRERAR: I am willing to be judged by the country. My hon. friend should not get so touchy at a little banter, because he frequently hands out some himself.

I come now to another criticism that has been directed against the government in this debate, particularly by our friends opposite—the criticism that the government has done too little, that it does it too late, and that it lacks leadership.

Mr. BRUCE: So it does.

Mr. CRERAR: And that the country lacks leadership.

Mr. BRUCE: You are a poor example of a leader.

Mr. CRERAR. That is a fine criticism to come from my hon. friend.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not the minister think he called for it.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister is inviting such remarks.

Mr. CRERAR: Let us look at the record and see where is the weakness and vacillation and procrastination referred to so often by hon. members directly opposite and by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) the other day. Let us see what this "time-serving" government has done.

Mr. BRUCE: Brought disunity throughout the country.

Mr. CRERAR: Three years ago this country was not at war. It had no dream of ever being at war. We were going about our peaceful pursuits. I would ask hon. members to note the transformation that has taken place in less than three years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Driven to it by public opinion.

Mr. BRUCE: Absolutely.

Mr. CRERAR: If I am to be interrupted in this fashion I wish to point out that I make it a practice not to interrupt hon. gentlemen opposite when they are speaking.

Mr. BRUCE: The minister brought it on himself.

Mr. CRERAR: I ask them to be good enough to show me the same courtesy.

That is the sort of criticism they have levelled against us. What has been done in the defence services? Take the department of my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston): an army of a few thousand people at the outbreak of war; to-day a well-equipped army of over 350,000. What has been done by my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), who has given a leadership that has been almost inspired? Before the war we did not have an air force. Two and a half years after the outbreak of war we have over one hundred air training centres in Canada, and we are training pilots, air crew, gunners, by the tens of thousands every year. Is not that an achievement worth something? Look at what has been done by our young navy, which scarcely existed at the outbreak of war, in patrolling our shores and convoying ships across the seas.

What has been done in the field of production by my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe)? Three years ago we were not making a gun in Canada—or very few. We were not building a ship—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or tanks, and you said they could not be built.

Mr. CRERAR: —or a tank or an aeroplane. To-day we are producing all these and much more, in ever-growing quantities. What is the position to-day? In the field of production we have challenged the admiration of Britain and the United States, and you do not need to take our word for it. What has been done in the field of finance by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)? Did he shrink from imposing heavy taxation? Have the people responded to our appeals for war loans? I admit that every citizen of Canada and my hon. friends opposite helped in that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And every other war effort.

Mr. CRERAR: What about price control? What about agricultural production? We are producing in this country many times over what we were producing in concentrated foods three years ago. What about our good relationship with the United States? And all this, according to our friends opposite, comes from weak, vacillating, procrastinating, time-serving leadership in the government.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Absolutely.

Mr. CRERAR: The sense of perspective of my hon. friends is badly off centre if they cannot see anything else. But with our critics all this goes for naught. The unit by which Canada's war effort shall be measured is the one factor of the conscription of men for overseas service in the army.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Conscription for every field.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, conscription for everything; and I venture to say there is a great deal more of it in effect to-day than my hon. friend is aware of, or he would not make an observation like that. There is one thing to be kept in mind. This emphasis on the conscription of men, I say to the house, has distorted the outlook on our war effort. What is the important thing to-day; what has it been since the outbreak of war? It has not been men alone; it has been production. This very day and hour there is being waged on the desert sands of Libya one of the fiercest struggles of this war. Who will win that struggle? I cannot say, but I venture the prediction that the side with the most guns and tanks, the side whose tanks, guns and planes last the longest, will be the victor in that struggle.

Mr. BRUCE: With somebody to operate them.

Mr. CRERAR: They have the men to operate them. If we had been deficient in getting men for these services there would be some point to the argument of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce). Nearly a year ago, and certainly at the beginning of this session, the hon. member for Parkdale pictured the plight of our men overseas, and he appealed: Are you going to leave them there without any support? Have they been without support? My hon. friend knows they have not been.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have not been in action. They may be without support when they go into action.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CRERAR: I am enjoying myself immensely, Mr. Speaker, and I hope all other hon. members are enjoying themselves too.

One aspect of our war effort which must not be overlooked is that it is many-sided. The allied nations depend largely upon Canada for copper and zinc and nickel and aluminum and lead. Britain depends almost entirely upon us for timber, of which she requires large quantities. She depends upon us for the production of foodstuffs. We have to keep our transportation system functioning effectively; and may I point out that all this vast field of enterprise, of building ships and nearly all the other activities included in our war effort, requires just as able-bodied men as are required for the army. The significance and importance of that fact have been overlooked by a great many critics of the government. If our production of copper and nickel and zinc and lead and aluminum ceases or diminishes, we take the chance of losing the war. If we cannot maintain our production in all these other fields, that is equally the case. So that while it is easy to criticize the government, I would ask those throughout this country who are not partisan-blind to take account of the efforts of the government in all these fields and to recognize that the one factor of the conscription of men for overseas is not the most important thing necessary to enable Canada to prosecute an effective war effort. That must fall into its proper perspective, together with everything else; and if it does not, then we are weakening rather than strengthening our effort.

I should like to conclude with a simple illustration which I have used once or twice before. One summer a good many years ago I was in a little valley in northern British Columbia, at a wayside station on the Canadian National railway. When I arrived there in the evening an impenetrable fog hung over the valley. This fog continued for several days, and I never felt so much depressed in my life as I did at that time. But one morning we came out to find the sun breaking through the mist, and shortly after that the mountain peaks stood out in all their wondrous beauty; the mist dissolved, and the majesty of the forests and mountains was revealed to all who cared to look. I sometimes think that to-day we are in a somewhat similar situation. Doubts and suspicions and angry words make a fog around us. We have these differences of opinion, but I wish to say to my hon. friends opposite that if any of my words to-day have been too close, I did not intend them to be so. We have here a great heritage which a kindly providence has given into our care. We have various elements in our population, those of French extraction, others of English, Scotch and Irish extraction, those of Ukrainian extraction and many others I could mention. If we are ever to build a country with a soul and a spirit, these different elements of our population must be brought into harmony. I have sufficient faith to believe that while to-day we have the mists and fogs of uncertainty and doubt, of angry words and suspicion, in time they will disappear as did the mists of the mountains, and the real virtues of our Canadian people will be realized and appreciated by each element of our population. I hope that then we will realize what a great country we have in Canada and that we will not be French Canadians, or Irish Canadians, or Scotch Canadians, or English Canadians or Ukrainian Canadians; we will be Canadians, proud of the stock from which we come, not forgetting its virtues and its greatness, but Canadians, with our eyes fixed on the development of this our country, united in spirit. Then, I venture to hope, we will build the sort of society that was pictured by the Hebrew prophet of old, where every man may sit under his own vine and fig tree, enjoying the fruits of his own labour, and where none dare molest him or make him afraid.

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, when war was declared in September 1939, there were two different schools of thought, one of which favoured participation, while the other opposed it. The province of Quebec, especially, remembered that our participation in the European war of 1914 had led us to conscription, with the unfortunate results that we know.

Taking part in the debate, I had then voiced the fear that our participation, once again, would lead us to conscription. Unfortunately, events have already borne out my forecast.

The Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, wishing, as he said, to prevent disunity, suggested the following compromise on behalf of the province of Quebec: "Participation without conscription".

I wish to quote the statement he made on September 9, 1939:

Sir, I believe that at this time there are two extreme sides of opinions which we should avoid and which would make for the disunity of Canada at a time when we need the very opposite. First, there are those who . . . say that Canada can and should remain neutral. . . .

The other school consists of those who . . . are promoting courses which would disunite Canada—because such measures will never be accepted or enforced by and in a most important section of the country. The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec . . . to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it. Is that clear enough?

Then he added:

Provided these points are understood, we are willing to offer our services without limitation and to devote our best efforts for the success of the cause we all have at heart. And those in Quebec who say that we will have conscription in spite of what some of us are saying, are doing the work of disunity, the work of the foe, the work of the enemy. (House of Commons Debates, second session, 1939, page 68.)

I shall now quote what the Prime Minister said, on February 25 last, about the pledge given at that time:

When the war came in Europe and this parliament met to decide whether Canada would enter the war or not, a declaration was made by the government of the day that, if Canada did enter the war, there would not be compulsory service for overseas, but that service for overseas would be by voluntary enlistment. That declaration was made when this house was deciding whether Canada should go into the war or not. And that statement was made not by the government to hon. members of parliament only, but by members of parliament of all parties speaking to the people of the country, and assuring them of the position that would be taken. I submit that no more solemn undertaking could possibly have been given to the people of Canada than that which was given to them by their representatives in the House of Commons at that time. (Hansard, 1942, page 824).

This compromise was then agreed upon by parliament and ratified by the entire Canadian people at the general election of March, 1940. And the present administration gave the most solemn assurances that it would respect it. Therefore was it binding upon the government and parliament, as well as upon the political parties of Canada and the conscriptionists, for the duration of the war, because Mr. Lapointe had taken care to specify that:

The province of Quebec would never accept conscription for service outside Canada.

Later on when the government introduced the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940, an act which parliament passed on June 20, 1940, the 1939 agreement was explicitly acknowledged. A special provision was inserted with a view to fulfilling the terms of that agreement, that is section 3 which excluded conscription for overseas service.

On this occasion, the Prime Minister and the Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe made the following statements:

The Prime Minister:

Recruitment for service overseas will be maintained on a voluntary basis. . . . The bill to be introduced to-day in no way affects the raising of men to serve in the armed forces overseas. Once again I wish to repeat my undertaking, frequently given, that no measure for the conscription of men for overseas service will be introduced by the present administration. (Hansard, June 18, 1940, page 854).

. . . We have in the present bill purposely by a special clause in this measure kept a pledge which we on this side of the house made before and at the beginning of the war, that we would not, while this administration was in office, enact a law for the conscription of men to be sent overseas. We have kept that promise by a clause which is specifically set forth in the bill that is before the house to-day. (Hansard, June 18, 1940, page 900.)

Mr. Lapointe, on the same day:

Somebody speaks of the pledges given. I invite all my friends to read the observations I made in this house when war was declared. . . I then said to my fellow-countrymen that the province, one of whose representatives I have the honour to be, was opposed to compulsory military service overseas, and that we would fight it . . . that I would fight it; that if it were proposed by my government I would resign from that government.

That is what I said and that is what I repeat to-day. (Hansard, June 18, 1940, page 877.)

If Mr. Lapointe were here to-day, I have no doubt he would fight this bill.

As a further reassurance to the province of Quebec, which had been the object of the anti-conscriptionist agreement, three days after the adoption of this measure, on June 23, 1940, on the occasion of the feast of their patron saint, the Prime Minister sent the French Canadians a special message from which I quote the following paragraphs:

Message from the Prime Minister to the French Canadians on St. Jean Baptiste Day.

On this festival of the patron saint of French Canada, I wish to address a message to my French-Canadian compatriots. . . .

In order to put the government in a position to meet the growing menace, parliament passed last week the National Resources Mobilization Act. . . . The mobilization of our man-power is limited solely and exclusively to the defence of Canada on our own soil and in our own territorial waters. Recruitment for service overseas will be maintained on a voluntary basis. The solemn assurance, which I have frequently given to parliament, that no measure for the conscription of men for overseas service will be introduced by the present administration has once again been placed upon the record of parliament.

I appeal to my compatriots of French Canada . . . to give to this measure of national defence their whole-hearted support.

The province of Quebec, ever ready to defend Canada, has, on the faith of these definite pledges, granted its loyal support to this measure. Now, the government propose to amend it by striking out the restrictions concerning conscription for overseas service. Thus, the Mobilization Act of 1940, applying for military service in Canada only, would become a conscription act for overseas service in any part of the world.

Consequently, the proposed amendment to the Mobilization Act, is moved in violation of the agreement of September, 1939, approved by the Canadian electorate in March, 1940, and incorporated in the Mobilization Act.

It is claimed that the result of the plebiscite has been to release the government from past commitments. Who could release the government from this pledge regarding conscription? Not the conscriptionists; they had made the pledge; not the Prime Minister who, on April 27, registered his vote to release himself from his own commitment; not the other ministers and members of the house, who had made the same pledge; but only those in favour of whom the commitment was made. This commitment was made in favour of the province of Quebec, in whose name Mr. Lapointe was speaking when he proposed a compromise, when he stated the conditions of our participation. These conditions were unreservedly accepted; they have been acknowledged in the Mobilization Act of 1940, which it is now proposed to amend; and the Prime Minister, on behalf of his government, guaranteed its fulfilment three days later, in a special message sent to the French Canadians, on June 23, 1940.

Therefore, only the province of Quebec could release the government from their commitments. Since it has overwhelmingly refused to do so, the government are not released. No one would dare to move an amendment to the confederation act of 1867, which would deprive the province of Quebec of certain rights granted therein, without the consent of the interested province, even though it were the wish of all the other provinces. This would be applying the principle that might is right.

I would go further. Were the government convinced that the majority vote given by the provinces released them from the commitments taken towards Quebec, they still would not be justified in adopting a conscription measure for service overseas.

Has the 1939 agreement been proved faulty? No, the results prove the opposite.

Have the two reasons which brought about the anticonscription agreement of 1939 disappeared? No. They are even more cogent to-day, for past experience has proved, since the very beginning of war, that the voluntary system has amply fulfilled the needs of the army, and nothing shows that it may be less efficient in the future. The two reasons alluded to were the following: the need of maintaining national unity and the inefficiency of conscription.

What is the position after two years and nine months of war?

Canada is more profoundly divided on the subject of conscription than ever before—the plebiscite proves this—and we know that conscription will mean disunity with its train of consequences. Moreover, neither the efficiency, nor the necessity of conscription have been demonstrated. The Prime Minister has even stated, on moving the second reading of the bill, "that it was not necessary now and that it might never become necessary".

Here is what the Prime Minister stated on February 25 last concerning conscription:

During the last war the question of conscription came up near the end of the conflict. I will not go into what took place at the time except to remind hon. members of the fact that nothing in the political history of Canada since confederation has given rise to so much bitterness, so much ill feeling, or has done so much in the way of dividing the peoples of this country, setting one lot against another, as did the conscription issue at that particular time. . . . . (Hansard, 1942, page 823.)

Shall we repeat the experience?

The statement made on May 12, 1941, by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) proves that the measure is not opportune:

I understand that my hon. friend has been advocating what he calls national compulsory service. Last night, in an address to the people of Canada, I issued a call for 32,000 men in the next two months. I want to say to my hon. friend that if he could do anything to interfere with that call, possibly to interfere with a full response to it, it would be the advocacy of the measures which he proposes at this time. . . .

We went into this war a united people. . . . The National Resources Mobilization Act was accepted by this house and by the whole country. The thirty-day plan for compulsory training was accepted by every province including Quebec. The four-months compulsory training plan was accepted by every province. I may say that young men in the province of Quebec have come to the camps in larger surplus numbers perhaps than in any other province. The announcement which I made the other day that men who were in camp for compulsory training would be required to take their places in the coastal defence garrisons or in other duty in Canada has met with a like response.

I cannot understand why at this time, just after I have launched a recruiting campaign, my hon. friend should interject this discordant note into our national unity. . . .

I say to my hon. friend in all seriousness that at this time there is no need of advocating a system such as he suggests. . . .

If the method which the hon. member has suggested were adopted, it would be a method different from what the commonwealth of Australia has adopted. . . . I point out to him that this country in 1917 was seared, was divided, by the very issue which he mentions. We have unity in this country, and I ask my hon. friend to try to help us preserve it, rather than attempting to drive a wedge of disunion into a war effort of which I think Canada ought well to be proud. . . .

I deprecate in public men and in others the attitude of advocating something different for which no need has been established, because I believe it interferes with our war effort. (Hansard, 1941, pages 2729 and 2730.)

This statement of the Minister of National Defence is truer to-day than a year ago. During the present debate the Prime Minister has stated that the programme of the Minister of National Defence for the fifteen month period from January 1, 1942, to March 31, 1943, provided for the raising of 90,000 to 100,000 men and, according to an official return brought down in this house on June 9, it appears that during the first five months alone 52,615 men have already enlisted, of which 11,918 were in the one month of May.

Why then should we be asked to vote a legislation which is not only not necessary but harmful?

Allow me to quote again the words of the Minister of National Defence:

Why at this time interject this discordant note into our national unity?

In advocating something different for which no need has been established, it interferes with our war effort.

It was the duty of the government, before thinking of introducing a conscription measure for service overseas, to obtain from the province of Quebec release from the anti-conscription pledge which they had given to her and to undertake afterwards to prove the efficiency and necessity of conscription.

What could be the avowed purpose of those who demand conscription? I can conceive only one, the purpose of increasing the war effort. Now, the Prime Minister said last week:

There is nothing to indicate that application of compulsion now would add anything to Canada's total contribution to the winning of the war.

There are two methods of raising men: the voluntary system and conscription. In the last war, we resorted to conscription, which was a failure; while in this war we have followed the voluntary system, which has given splendid results. The facts are there to show it: "More men are offering themselves for training to-day than the administration is able to train", the Prime Minister has said. "Our training camps are full for months to come", the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has stated. "There is no lack whatever of recruits for the navy; there is still a very considerable waiting list", as we have been told by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). And according to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), recruiting is six months ahead of schedule.

To-day food and munitions are what we need most to win the war. This has been stated time and time again.

In March last, a British correspondent, Harold Guard, wrote that "the defeats hitherto suffered are due to the lack of armaments". The reverse in Java was not due to the lack of men but to the lack of fighter planes.

As regards food, farmers are constantly being urged to increase their production. Since the defeat of Holland and Denmark, her main sources of supply, England is more and more dependent on Canada for her food. The demand is for more bacon, eggs, cheese, and butter, but some people would reduce the number of producers at a time when farm labour is already inadequate.

The following is a convincing statement to be found in the April 23, 1942, issue of The Patriot, a paper published in London, England:

For us, food is the crux of the war. Our food supply is not a matter of greediness, it is a matter of winning or losing the war. . . . If our food supply fails, we join the conquered.

Our farmers cannot produce enough food for our own people; yet we are feeding armies of Canadian and American soldiers we have shipped here. These soldiers hamper our war effort by needing extra food cargoes. . . . Our ships ought to bring raw materials and food instead of bringing hearty-eating Canadians and Americans. . . . It would greatly help our war effort if all Canadian and American soldiers here were sent back to Canada and America.

The Prime Minister has stated:

If the bill is amended as proposed, it is not the intention of the government to resort to conscription for service overseas unless circumstances should arise which would render the use of compulsion imperative.

Why then this eagerness to have written into our statutes legislation which there is no intention of putting into force, particularly when this measure is a source of deep disunity in the country and constitutes a breach of a formal undertaking?

The Prime Minister did state that conscription was not an issue in the plebiscite and, once the plebiscite vote had been taken, there was no delay in introducing the conscription measure. Moreover, he forgets what he told us on June 18, 1940, when this legislation was adopted. Allow me to remind him of it.

The Prime Minister, replying to what had been said by some hon. members on the mobilization bill, said:

. . . Another point raised by some hon. members was expressed by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), in the following words: "We support what the bill purports to stand for, but we would like to know if it will be used for what it purports to be?" Well, I must say that that is a singularly odd question to ask at this particular moment. . . . What is the sense of introducing any legislation in this parliament if what appears in black and white and in type as a statute of Canada does not mean that the government intends to give effect to what appears in the statute? I tell my hon. friend that so far as the government is concerned, we have put in this bill what we think is necessary, and we intend to administer it in accordance with what we think is necessary. It must be apparent that the bill will be carried out in accordance with the purport of its provisions. (Hansard, June 18, 1940, page 902.)

[Mr. Raymond.]

The 1940 legislation provided for limited conscription for service in Canada; once this amendment is adopted, it will be conscription without reservation, of all wealth and of all men, women and children, without any age or other limitation, anywhere and at the discretion of the government. We shall then have in our statute books the most thoroughgoing conscription legislation possible, without any age limitation, without exemptions, or exemption boards contrary to that of 1917 which affected only men between nineteen and forty-five years of age, and provided for various exempted categories with boards to hear the applications. The 100,000 or 125,000 men conscripted for the defence of Canada in Canada shall automatically become conscripts for overseas service. As to the application of this measure, one may judge from the Prime Minister's statements at the time it was adopted:

What is the sense of introducing any legislation in this parliament if what appears in black and white and in type as a statute of Canada does not mean that the government intends to give effect to what appears in the statute?

And we are told to-day, that there is no intention of enforcing the measure.

Mr. Speaker, we are leading up to the gravest crisis of mistrust during the post-war period that any government has ever had to face.

Before 1939 we were told that the day of expeditionary corps to Europe was past, yet war had barely been declared in September, 1939, than the departure of a first contingent for overseas was announced. Our participation in this war was to have been moderate and according to our means. It is now without limitation.

The Mobilization Act of 1940 was enacted supposedly to train our men for home defence, but it has served mostly to prepare them for overseas service. Our training camps have become recruiting centres for the active force, and we are not unaware of the means employed to force trainees to join up. What is known as the voluntary system of recruitment has turned into a disguised conscription plan. A great many men between the ages of seventeen and forty-five, even married men with families, have no alternative other than to enlist or go destitute, for the simple reason that they are barred from employment and can enlist for service overseas only.

Legislative measures are passed whose avowed meaning is revealed to be quite different in the light of subsequent facts. A conscription measure for overseas service is termed a national resources mobilization act. We play upon words.

Our young men are mobilized with the assurance, pledged in the statute book, that they will be trained for home defence only, and once their training is completed we pass an amendment authorizing the government to send them without notice to any theatre of war. In order to obtain the consent to participation of an important section of our people, or to win elections in the province of Quebec, solemn pledges are given that conscription will not be enforced. Yet once their consent is obtained or the election won, a conscription measure is introduced. To obtain an affirmative vote on the plebiscite, the administration tells us that conscription is not the issue on which the people are required to pass. Yet hardly have the results been published than it introduces a conscription measure, claiming it to be the logical outcome of the plebiscite vote. While the most solemn pledges are being broken in the name of the rights of the majority, we are asked to fight for the rights of minorities.

Truly the post-war period will be worse than that of the war itself. The people will have lost faith in governments whose equivocal methods during the conflict have accumulated such bitterness and rancour, and God knows what trouble is brewing for the future.

The conscription voted in 1942 will appear infinitely more odious and revolting than that of 1917, and it will have much more serious results. When war was declared in 1914, no anti-conscription pledges had been given such as in 1939. When Sir Robert Borden introduced the conscription act in 1917, it was because the voluntary system of recruiting was no longer adequate and conscription was judged necessary, while in 1942 the voluntary system is admittedly adequate and conscription unnecessary.

In 1942, we proceed to train young men on the pretext that we are preparing the defence of Canada in Canada, and once they are trained, they become conscripts for overseas service; in 1917 we knew nothing of conscription by our own experience, but in 1942, we know what disastrous consequences it entails.

If, in 1917, we could be misled as to the consequences of conscription, the same mistake would be unpardonable in 1942.

The Prime Minister, while moving this conscription measure, has referred to national unity.

Who are those who, at the present time, are putting national unity in jeopardy? Those who insist that pledges should be kept or those who break them?

May I be permitted to quote the words of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, broadcast in February, 1940, and May, 1941, and to compare them to the utterances of the Prime Minister on January 21, last:

On February 22, 1940, Mr. Lapointe stated over the radio:

> The maintenance of Canadian unity demands that our military effort be voluntary and remain such.

On May 15, 1941, he spoke the following words over the radio:

> Those who favour compulsory service for overseas are impeding our national war effort and the great cause of Canadian unity so essential in this great crisis.

On January 21, 1942, Mr. King, as recorded in Hansard, while speaking in praise of Mr. Lapointe, said in the House of Commons:

> With nothing was he so profoundly concerned as with the preservation of national unity.

And he added:

> I pray that the spirit of Ernest Lapointe will continue to be a guide and an inspiration to all Canadians.

Surely, Ernest Lapointe's ideal did not give birth to this conscription bill, to which Canadian unity is sacrificed.

Unity will never be attained by the strength of number or by orders in council.

We are willing to show regard for the opinions of conscientious objectors or to abide by the agreement entered into with Mennonites and Doukhobors, recently come to our country, but we refuse to recognize agreements entered into with French Canadians, who have always inhabited the country.

If the majority, in spite of previous commitments and in spite of the success of voluntary enlistment, persist in enforcing on the minority an enlistment system known to be inefficient, this minority will submit to the majority, but will not forget. The province of Quebec, whose motto is "Je me souviens" has not forgotten the conscription act of 1917; it will have still stronger reasons for not forgetting the similar measure of 1942.

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to vote for this bill, and when the bill has become law and the government is clothed with all the powers which a government ought to have in time of war, particularly when the war is coming so close to us, I intend, as a citizen who is anxious to see this war ended successfully as quickly as possible, to accept every measure of compulsion which the circumstances may demand and this government may think it necessary to enforce. And when I say compulsion, I mean the compulsion of persons, of industry and of finance.

It is my intention to deal a little later with the question of conscription itself, with the lack of unity which it is alleged exists to-day and on which we are embarking, it is said, because of the course of action taken by this government since the commencement of this war. The only respect in which I would differ from that is this: I should not say the course of action taken by this government since the commencement of the war, because the complaints against this government with respect to so-called lack of unity go back before the commencement of the war. There was a complaint because the government decided to have Canada participate in the war. But before I deal with conscription and these other things may I say a few words directed chiefly to those who for a long time have been trying to throw the question of conscription for overseas service into the field of combat, and also to those who are going out of their way to enter into an internecine struggle with those who are so anxious for conscription. My word is a friendly one, but at the same time it is a very serious one.

The Japanese are now virtually upon the coast of Canada. We in this house and people in Montreal, or Toronto, or any other place in Canada may continue to be protagonists of a dispute and may continue to argue; but my word of warning is this, that we from British Columbia and Alberta and the Yukon are not going to sit down and wait while that question is argued and permit the Japanese devils to raid and rape and slaughter and torture us; and that is the condition which this country is facing to-day.

I am not trying to be over-serious, but some of you will remember that for a long long time I have been calling the attention of this parliament and this government to what was approaching on our western coast. We have to-day a word of warning from the chief of staff who has taken over active command at Victoria, correcting a wrong impression arising from a statement which he made yesterday, and which was interpreted by the newspapers to mean that the presence of the Japanese on the Aleutian islands did not mean very much, that it was only a diversion. We have to-day an official statement by the army heads that the occupation of some of the Aleutian islands by the Japanese is a matter of definite seriousness.

Let me call attention to the timing of this assault upon the Aleutian islands. We have known for a long time that Germany and Russia were going to get to death grips in the Caucasus, and we have also seen a clear trend of the struggle in the direction of Murmansk and Archangel and Leningrad. I have here a clipping:

> Arctic regions loom as next allied front. Highly important operations seem imminent around top of Norway and Murmansk coast where control of Upper Scandinavia would give united nations link with Russia and place them in position to strike at Germany.

While these preparations were taking place Japan was making her initial thrusts in the south Pacific, and to-day, just at the moment when there might be a final assault either at Murmansk or the Kerch peninsula, Japan has come northward into the Bering sea and has taken possession of part of the Aleutian islands. It is an interesting fact that the best description of Alaska ever published was written a few years ago by a German; every bay, every indentation of Alaska, is set out in that book. It is another singular thing that the man who wrote the book is one of the military advisers of Hitler, who is conducting the war against the world.

This is June. From June to September the Arctic ocean is open. The whole northern coast of Russia from Murmansk and Archangel on the west to the Bering strait on the east is traversable by ships properly equipped with ice-breaking apparatus. There may be nothing whatever in the combination of facts that just about the time that northern sea is opening Japan has taken possession of some of the Aleutian islands. It may be a series of accidents that it has happened at this particular hour, that this particular hour coincides so wonderfully with what is taking place in other parts of Russia as I mentioned a few moments ago. I talked in this chamber some time ago and I showed hon. members what all of them know now, but which I venture to say only a very few knew a few months back, because we have accustomed ourselves to look at the Mercator maps which show only lines allegedly north and south. I used my arm some time ago to show how the Pacific coast lies. I said my elbow was Vancouver, and what people do not realize is that there is an hour's difference in time between Vancouver and Yukon territory. Here is Vancouver, here is Yukon, here is Alaska. Forty-seven miles away is Siberia, and all along that Siberian coast are some of the best air fields in the world, built a while back by Russian labour with the aid of German skill and German direction. Those airports are there, ready to be taken possession of by the Japanese. I am of the opinion —I may be altogether wrong—that before long we shall find Japan attacking Russia, and that this is the cause of her first move into the Aleutian islands. If in addition to what she has taken from the United States she secures control of some of these airfields along the Russian coast, then Alaska, the Yukon, northern Alberta and northern British Columbia will be at the mercy of the Japanese hordes, except to the extent that we shall have prepared ourselves to meet the onslaught.

It is owing to the splendid work done by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), dating back, as I said once before in this house, to his meeting with President Roosevelt in Ogdensburg when the joint defence board was set up, that we have a series of airports running from Edmonton and Vancouver and Prince George on to White Horse and from there to Alaska. Originally intended as a line of defence, the time has come when this series of airports must be made a line of offence. I am just as serious as I can possibly be in once more informing the Prime Minister and the government, and you, Mr. Speaker, that the only possible chance of saving northwestern Canada from the kind of assault that has overrun European and Asiatic countries is for us to take offensive action against Japan. If we can secure the consent of Russia, or if Russia and Japan become embroiled, as I feel certain they will, then we shall have to send our armies into Siberia. If we cannot get the consent of Russia, then we shall have to go across the Bering sea or directly across the northern Pacific from Prince Rupert.

But unfortunately the Japanese are already ahead of us, because they have gained a foothold in the north Pacific only a few miles from Bering strait. If the northern coast of Russia is open from June to September, lying west of Bering strait, the northern coast of Canada is open from June to September lying east of Bering strait. It is possible that the Japanese could encircle Alaska and attack both Alaska and Canada from the north, with practically nothing between their objectives and their armed forces. That is why for a long long time I have been urging upon this government two things: first, the appointment of a minister for war; because the time has come when we must wage war. I have been urging that since last year. For some time I have been urging also that we should amend the mobilization act at least in such manner as to make it legally possible for our soldiers to be sent across the Pacific or into Siberia as the case may be. Once more I urge that upon the government.

Let me now leave the Japanese situation and come for a few minutes to other fields that are natural ground of debate in this chamber.

I wish to say a few words about conscription. Unfortunately this particular legislation is being interpreted as a direct application of conscription for overseas service, and therefore the debate has turned almost entirely on subjects relating purely to conscription for service overseas.

There has been some discussion about what was meant by the plebiscite. I am going to read two paragraphs of the statement that I made to my constituents in connection with the plebiscite. I said:

> A vote on the plebiscite is not a vote for me or against me. It is not a vote for the government or against the government. It is not, in the ordinary sense, even a vote for or against conscription.
> An "X" in the "Yes" column is a vote telling the government of our urgent desire for an all-out war effort to the full limit of our resources, both human and material, in whatever manner our military and civil leaders require, and the circumstances of the war demand, no matter what the cost may be.

I do not think there is any confusion about that statement. But that is not my justification for supporting this bill, or for the statement made by me a little while back that I would follow this government in any action that the circumstances of the war forced them to take. My justification is, first, that I am a citizen of Canada; second, that I am a member of this Canadian parliament. I made that announcement in this house before the plebiscite was held. At best the result of the plebiscite was only an indication to us of what the people wanted. Quite frankly—I say it here and put it on the record and it can go back to my constituency—I do not regard the vote in my constituency as an instruction, an order, a command to me. It was not so meant, and I am not accepting it as such. I am taking the stand I do to-day because of a viewpoint that is mine as a member of this house and as a citizen of Canada who realizes how close to us the war is coming.

There are two forms of opposition to this bill, based entirely on the ground of conscription. One comes from our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, who contend that the bill should not become law, that the government should not be given a clearance for action until they have told us and the country, in advance and in detail, just what every financial and industrial measure is to be, or until we twist up our whole constitution into a socialistic state or state capitalism. I know that most hon. members would take clear exception to that statement. But I have here the appeal made by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in connection with the plebiscite. It is a very good appeal—and may I digress for a moment to say a word of thanks and appreciation to the different political associations in my riding for the way in which they cooperated to bring the plebiscite question to a successful issue. The statement, I say, is a good one, and that is why I wish to read part of it now, because I should like our Cooperative Commonwealth Federation friends to say whether the statement that was made by them during the plebiscite is their present stand. After calling attention to some bad things done in connection with the war, as they had every right to do, the statement says:

> Nevertheless the plebiscite is being held, and we feel that the government should not be able to point to any real or imaginary obstacle to an effective war effort. In the present critical situation, the Canadian government should be free to act in the best interests of Canada and her allies. The plebiscite should therefore be answered by a "yes" vote.

Then they append the six proposals which they would like to see enacted. First, however, they ask the people for a "yes" vote, so that the government of Canada may be free morally, and then become free legally, of any restrictions that might have been hampering effective action.

The other objection to the passing of this legislation has been referred to on several occasions during this debate. It is that this is the action of the imperialists. As far as I can see there is not the slightest tinge of imperialism to this legislation. I cannot speak so directly to my French-Canadian colleagues as could the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), who was able to say that he was born in the province of Quebec. I was born in New Brunswick, but my father is still living, and he was born in the province of Quebec. A moment ago I saw here the hon. member who represents the constituency in which my father was born and in which his family lived for over two hundred years before his birth. My father would not object to the action I am taking to-day, and I am certain that the remainder of his family still living in the province of Quebec would not object, either. But they would object, and would have every right to object, if they thought that action was taken because of the nature of the appeal or demand that has been made in certain parts of Canada since shortly after the beginning of the war, and certainly since the election of 1940, in connection with conscription for overseas service. As was so eloquently pointed out the other day by the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), with whom I also have the greatest sympathy, there is a great deal in what he described as the difference between the instincts of the French Canadian and the emotional instincts of the English-speaking Canadians. I have a little of both in me, so perhaps I can understand each better than either can understand the other. I know exactly what the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères meant, and I know that he is right. But he is not right in feeling that the appeal which is made to him, to me and to all hon. members whether from Quebec or British Columbia, is an appeal based upon the imperialistic instinct; and when I speak of the appeal now, I mean the appeal to give this government complete freedom of action so that the Prime Minister and those associated with him may be able to perform, at any given moment, whatever action the circumstances of the war may demand. That is all this bill is asking. If this were an imperialistic war; if this were similar to some of the wars which took place in the past, that might not be so. I think it was the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) who spoke to-day of the Boer war. There is no doubt that the Boer war had no other objective than imperialistic expansion; there is no question of that. But there is also no question whatever that the present war is not an imperialistic war, except from the point of view of Germany. Germany is the nation that is trying to expand its imperial possessions. Germany is the nation that is trying to destroy the world so that it may build another world more suited to its own natural instincts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And Japan.

Mr. TURGEON: And now, as is pointed out by the Prime Minister, Germany has been joined by Japan, which is coming very, very close to us now. So we have a combination of complete imperialism, German and Japanese, trying to break down all opposition in the world so that whatever may happen in future will be as a result of their dictation. I have here a statement issued in the United States before that country entered the war, a statement which I assume was made in reply to what we call the isolationist movement in that country. This statement was made by the Right Reverend John A. Ryan, D.D., one of the greatest Catholic theologians on this continent; and, mind you, he was appealing to a country that was not at war when he said:

If Hitler conquers Russia, his power will be immensely increased to carry through the devastating outrages which he has already planned: first, to defeat Britain and then inflict immense damage upon the United States; second, to continue in subjection the various peoples that he has already enslaved; third, to destroy Christianity and Christian civilization.

That is as clear a description of the German objective as it would be possible to frame. In his appeal to Americans, not then at war, the reverend gentleman went on to say:

Americans who look upon these injuries and calamities as of little or no importance, so long as actual invasion is not imminent, may consider themselves patriotic, but they are not intelligently patriotic. Americans who assert that we should await the near menace of invasion before we use military measures against Hitler may consider themselves patriotic, but they are not intelligently patriotic. Americans who oppose military aid to Britain, even as a means of averting the danger of actual war on our own soil, may consider themselves patriotic, but they are not intelligently patriotic. American Catholics who assert that we have no moral obligation to use military measures outside the United States, in order to prevent the destruction of the Christian religion and Christian civilization by Hitler in Europe, are, wittingly or unwittingly, subscribing to one of the propositions condemned by Pope Pius IX in the "Syllabus of Errors".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What is that quotation from?

Mr. TURGEON: I have not the heading, but it is from the Voice of Austria of August last, and, as hon. members know, Doctor Ryan is one of the greatest Catholic clerics in the United States.

I read that quotation with this end in view. There is a feeling, which was referred to by the ex-Minister of Public Works, that no matter what action might be taken by this government to bring the war to a successful conclusion, such action was being taken either at the dictate or as a result of the whispered voice of the imperial government. It is not necessary to say here that that is absurdly wrong.

Mr. CARDIN: I desire to interrupt the hon. member, because he is not repeating exactly what I said. I never said what he has just referred to. He is misinterpreting my observations entirely.

Mr. TURGEON: First, I take the hon. member's statement at its full value and, if I said anything that offended him, I withdraw completely and immediately. But what I was saying, or meant to say—and perhaps I did not express myself correctly—was not what the hon. member said, but rather what he referred to. I was saying there is a feeling that every action taken in connection with this war is taken as a result of some instructions or some advice given to us by Great Britain. As a matter of fact—I do not intend to turn it up—I have before me an issue of the New Commonwealth, the Cooperative Commonwealth newspaper, published in Toronto. The issue I have is one which appeared just a few months before the outbreak of war. In that issue practically the same statement is made, and it is attributed to the United States magazine Time.

To return to my original thought, that feeling has prevailed in many parts of Canada—and not only in Quebec, because the paper to which I referred is published in Toronto. I say that feeling is absurdly wrong, because the two things implied by it could not exist together—first, the desire of Great Britain so to act and, second, the willingness of Ottawa, in its present surroundings, to carry out and obey instructions of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has any responsible person or party, aside from the source from which the hon. member has just quoted, made that assertion in Canada? Has any such party or person made the assertion that we are being dictated to by the British government in our war effort?

Mr. TURGEON: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never heard it.

Mr. TURGEON: But what do people mean when they talk about imperialism dictating our actions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have not said that.

Mr. TURGEON: No, and I am not criticizing my hon. friend, in the least, in that connection. However, there is a criticism which I shall direct to him, if I have the time. As a matter of fact, I appreciate the action the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and his party are taking on this particular occasion.

The criticism I would make of the leader of the opposition arises from an editorial appearing in yesterday's Ottawa Journal. The other day he talked about strangulation of unity, and referred to the Prime Minister's oft-repeated declaration that he wanted unity. In that connection the leader of the opposition said, "He does not want national unity; he wants party unity." I would ask this question: If the Prime Minister was thinking only of party unity, would he bring into this house a measure which he knew was going to be opposed by men who had been his greatest and most loyal party followers? The Journal editorial, which I was going to criticize, states that all this casuistry and all this caucussing meant only one thing, that we are not going to have conscription. Then the editorial continues:

> We would like to ask this question: If Quebec had voted "yes", would we not have had conscription immediately?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We certainly would not.

Mr. TURGEON: The Prime Minister says we certainly would not, and I agree with him. May I point out to the Ottawa Journal that the bill now under debate was introduced in the house by the Prime Minister before any Liberal caucus was held after the adjournment of the house for the Easter recess. The bill was introduced purely as a government measure, and without any caucus being held until after it came before this chamber.

I was going to say something about unity, but perhaps I have spoken too long on other matters. I may not have sufficient time at my disposal to deal with the subject of unity in the manner in which I had intended. But this I will say: we are not, as has been stated, in the greatest state of disunity that this country has ever seen. There is not an hon. member who will not admit that on several occasions in our past history the disunity has been much greater than it is to-day. I think of 1917, and even of 1910 and 1911.

At this time we are having a difference of opinion. One of the greatest opponents of the measure from Quebec—I believe it was the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lizotte)—when speaking the other day said two things. He said, first, "It is true that the majority must rule; but, we the minority, until final action is taken, have a right to state our views." Nobody can object to that. No one has any right to accuse hon. members opposed to this measure, or opposed to the stand I take, of bringing about disunity.

The second statement made by the hon. member was that if the Prime Minister ever brings in conscription he will be false to his past history and false to Canada. That was the keynote of the thought of those who have opposed the bill on the ground that it is conscription for overseas service. The hon. member for Kamouraska laid his finger on the point at issue, and he has a perfect right to feel, if he wishes, that if in the future the Prime Minister takes the action the hon. member does not want taken, the right hon. gentleman would be acting falsely. But I say, with all respect, that the hon. member has not the right at the same time to say that this particular bill is in itself the imposition of conscription for overseas service. It is not the imposition of conscription for overseas service. It is a measure to give to the government the power to act, a power which the people of Canada generally said they wanted the government to have. Speaking not only as a member from British Columbia, but also as a Canadian who was born in the east and has travelled across this land until he has reached the Pacific coast, I say it is clearing the way for basic, positive and militarily offensive action by Canada against the Japanese, before they encroach upon this land and are able to spread across the country that awful web which has been extended over so many parts of Asia and Europe.

I know—I just know it myself, by instinct—that none of the hon. members from Quebec who take a stand different from the one I take will feel the least bit offended by anything I have said to-day. I should like to conclude my address with the hope that, because I did not make myself clear a few minutes ago, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères will not feel hurt by anything I said.

I thank hon. members for the courtesy they have extended to me during my remarks.

Mr. R. W. GRAY (Lambton West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to follow the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) in this debate. For five years we were associated together as chief whip and deputy whip of this house. During that period we worked together with the definite purpose in mind of establishing a better understanding between party and party and between member and member as it related to the conduct of the House of Commons. The hon. member is one of a long line of public men who bore and still bear his name, men who have served the state and the dominion. Reading their speeches and watching their actions makes it easy to understand that my hon. friend and former associate should express the tolerant views he has to-day and at the same time make such a vigorous statement as to where he stands. I should like to refer also to the statement of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). Canada needs more men of the type of the hon. member.

The moral obstacle to compulsory service has been removed, and the amendment provided by Bill No. 80 now before the house is the logical first legal step. In introducing this bill, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is simply following the mandate given to him on April 27 last. In the interpretation of the question asked of the electors the Prime Minister was quite right in saying that it was permissive, not mandatory. The question was purposely phrased in the way it was.

On the other hand, if the government are under any illusion as to what the great majority of the "yes" voters meant, what they believed would follow once the hands of the government were freed, then I say to the government, and particularly to the ministers from Ontario: You have not been among the electors since that day.

I am not going to refer to the successive experiments that have been made in connection with the man-power question. Suffice it to say that we have fumbled the ball with too many passes. While it must be admitted that we have recovered the ball, we have left the spectators, in this case the Canadian public, in a state of bewilderment and daze as to what we shall do on the five-yard line. That line has been reached; we are in the crucial year 1942. That is not my opinion; it is the opinion of the military experts of the united nations. Having this knowledge and facing the fact that the war remains to be won, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked in the house on Monday last; as reported at page 3343 of Hansard:

> What we as a people expect to get out of the war.

I am amazed that a responsible member of this house, a member of a party aspiring to leadership in this country, should ask that question. I can tell the hon. member in a sentence what we expect to get out of this war. We hope to get the privilege of living as free men. We may lose all that we have built for the future; we may lose all that we have built in this crucial hour. That matters not; what is important is that we may be able to build for the future, that we may have the privilege of starting again. On January 1, 1942, Canada signed a declaration and became a member of the united nations. In part we said:

> Being convinced that complete victory over their enemies is essential to defend life, liberty, independence and religious freedom, and to preserve human rights and justice in their own lands as well as in other lands, and that they are now engaged in a common struggle against savage and brutal forces seeking to subjugate the world.

We are discussing the methods of fulfilling that obligation. The question turns on the advisability of continuing two systems, two armies: one, a voluntary army for service anywhere; the other, a conscript army for service in Canada alone. How can it be said that we can defend freedom up to the limit of those who are willing, or, in other words, up to the limit of those who are willing to volunteer. How can we take our proper place at the council table until we have shown that there is no limit in our participation?

The ink had scarcely dried after we had signed that declaration before the congress of the United States removed the restriction upon service contained in their national service act of 1940. I should like to quote part of the preamble of that act because, as one reads it, he realizes that we in Canada have the same possibilities for the future. Congress had this to say:

> The congress further declares that in a free society the obligations and privileges of military training and service should be shared generally in accordance with a fair and just system of selective compulsory military training and service.

Their act contained a territorial restriction similar to the one contained in our National Resources Mobilization Act. The restriction in their act read:

> Persons inducted into the land forces of the United States under this act shall not be employed beyond the limits of the western hemisphere except in the territories and possessions of the United States, including the Philippine islands.

There are members in this house who would agree with that restriction, who would contend that it should remain on the statute books in its present form. Nevertheless, on December 13, 1941, or five days after the United States of America declared war upon her enemies, congress enacted a measure which removed the territorial restrictions I have mentioned and made it possible for United States soldiers to serve in any part of the world during the period of the war and for the six months immediately following its termination. That was definite and positive action which has placed thousands of United States soldiers in the British isles and throughout the empire. We are told that with the enemy approaching from the east and the west we are now prepared to move immediately men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act to Newfoundland and other islands and territories including the United States.

With that stand I am in full accord. But I might say, in passing, that we might be accused of having broken a pledge in requiring, under the legislation as it stands to-day, that the men called up shall serve elsewhere than within the confines of Canada. But that is an academic point, and Canadians with whom I have been in contact are in no mood for academic discussions in this country. They see in this new approach, extending beyond the boundaries of Canada our jurisdiction over the men called up, the old, discredited policy of appeasement creeping back into our national life. That policy should have no place among the united nations, and least of all within the British empire. Let us put a stop to these subtle retreats from one position to another. Let us, if necessary, be brutally frank with the Canadian people and especially with those who believe that Canada can be defended on Canada's shores. The place to defeat the enemy is where you find the enemy—and before he reaches Canada. If it is good to go out and meet him in Alaska and Newfoundland, it is better to go out and meet him in France, Holland and Germany. In case there may be some who still doubt this, let me put upon the record a message placed before this country by the Prime Minister on the eve of the plebiscite. In a signed statement published in all the leading Canadian papers under the caption, "The Plebiscite As I See It", these two paragraphs of the Prime Minister's statement appeared:

> A part of our forces should be kept in Canada to protect us against attack; a part of our forces should be sent overseas to help defeat the enemy and thus prevent him from attacking Canada. Both tasks are equally essential to our safety. Anyone who tells you that only one of these tasks is necessary is deceiving you. Unless we continue to do all we can to help others, we shall have no right to expect them to do all they can to help us. Until the present tide of conquest is turned into overwhelming defeat for the enemy, no country —and assuredly not Canada—can consider itself secure.
> Here surely is the most powerful of reasons why every effort should be made, as it is being made, alike by the United States and Canada, to help the other united nations to engage the enemy and try to defeat him where he is to be found to-day. We cannot defend our country and save our homes and families by waiting at home for the enemy to attack us. Every country that has stood behind its own defences in this war has sooner or later been attacked. To remain on the defensive is the surest way to bring the war to Canada.

With that statement I am in full agreement. We differ apparently only with regard to the method by which what is desired can be accomplished.

It has been stated by the government that the voluntary method of obtaining men has succeeded and will suffice for the March, 1942, to March, 1943, programme. How can we say that the voluntary method has succeeded when it has never been tested? How can we say that we have sufficient man-power entering into the army when we do not know what we may expect during the period 1942-43? To say that we have sufficient man-power coming into the army is to say that the year 1942 will remain just as it is in this month of June, 1942, and this, sir, in spite of the fact that on every side we hear of a determination to establish a second front, in which second front Canadians will undoubtedly be in the vanguard. To say that we have enough men is to say that we know with some degree of certainty the number of casualties we shall suffer in battle. Turn for a moment to world war No. 1. Let me give a few figures of Canadian casualties in that war. On the Somme Canadians had, in round figures, 23,000 casualties; at Vimy Ridge, 13,000; at Passchendaele, 24,000. Let us study well those figures, and look at all the possibilities for 1942 before we say that the voluntary system has succeeded. But whether the voluntary system has succeeded or not, whether it will supply enough men or not, I ask the house this question: Is the voluntary system a scientific, business-like way of making sure that we have total war through total effort? Is it a fair method? Is it a sure method? Is it a just method?

Hon. members who oppose conscription may say that those of us who favour it exaggerate its military value. Perhaps that is true. I doubt whether anything can fill one with more pride than the fact that he has volunteered to serve his country wherever he may be sent, and as far as I am concerned I never will retreat from the fact that I volunteered to serve my country wherever I might be sent. At the same time, is it fair, is it just, that we should have a voluntary system under which whole families have offered their all, while other families have offered nothing? Is it fair that residents of Canada who are not citizens should be waiting to step immediately into jobs opened by reason of our own boys having volunteered for active service? I ask the house that question because that problem exists to-day. It is true that the Prime Minister on March 24, if I remember correctly, promised that that would be remedied, but we have not yet had anything resembling a corrective.

Answer, if you will, that we are getting enough men. Then answer this further question: Is not a comprehensive, all-embracing selective service system the fairest and surest way to see that each and every one of us will pull his fair share of the load? Unlike some members of the government I care not what liberties I surrender during the period of the war. I am prepared afterwards to come back and demand that these liberties be restored to this house, but in the meantime I am prepared to surrender them as long as I am sure that we are giving to this country the fullest measure of support in the war effort.

I urge, Mr. Speaker, as I have urged before in this house, that after this bill is passed—and I propose to support it—that we immediately—and by that I mean now, not six months or a year hence—take such action as may be necessary to bring into operation compulsory selective service, unrestricted as to geographical limits, with regard to the army, and combined with it a scientific allocation of the man-power of this country to industry, to the farm and to the forces.

It has been urged that an unrestricted scheme of selective service can be put into effect in an emergency. Every nation that waited to put its house in order until the emergency arose, has fallen. With a great and powerful neighbour ready to come to our aid that would not be our fate, but do we desire to depend on that neighbour? Certainly not. We must be prepared to sacrifice according to our ability, having due regard to our population and resources. We may be lacking in numbers owing to the size of our population, but let it never be said that we are lacking in the equality of our sacrifice.

We complain that our splendid war effort is not appreciated in the United States. Anyone who has visited in the United States since the first of January, 1942, will realize that that is all too true. How can we succeed in overcoming the insidious propaganda campaign now being used against us throughout that land unless we are prepared to admit that we are willing to send men wherever the necessity arises? At the risk of being told that I am the mouthpiece of the premier of Ontario, I say this, that that changing, as he said, from "I can't" to "I won't" is what we are doing to-day here in this house.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot and must not wait for an emergency. Again I repeat, with all the emphasis at my command, let us take positive action now. When that action is taken, and not until then, will the words in the united nations' declaration, that "each government pledges itself to employ its full resources, military or economic against those members of the tripartite pact and its adherents with which such government is at war," attain its true significance, and Canada with head erect take her place by the side of the united nations, satisfied that, come what may, we have given our all in the great cause for which we freely entered this war. In the words of Kipling:

> For all we have and are,
> For all our children's fate,
> Stand up and take the war.
> The Hun is at the gate!

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. C. ABBOTT (St. Antoine-Westmount): I am afraid that what I have to say this evening will be to some extent a repetition of what I said when I last spoke in the house on January 28, but that is inevitable because nothing has occurred since that time to cause me to change the views which I then expressed concerning the matters that are at issue in this bill.

I do not very often indulge in prophecy, but I did say at the end of my remarks on that occasion that I felt sure that in my constituency the result of the plebiscite would be an overwhelming "yes" vote to release the government and give it a free hand to conduct the war as it saw fit. That prophecy was fulfilled. The constituency of St. Antoine Westmount gave an 87 per cent "yes" vote the highest I think in the province of Quebec and comparing favourably with any constituency in the country. What was of equal interest to me, over 80 per cent of those eligible to exercise the vote did so. As hon. members know, my constituency is predominantly English-speaking; nevertheless there are many thousands of citizens of French origin who live in that riding.

During the last week or so there has been a good deal of discussion as to the effect of the plebiscite and the action which should be taken by the government as a result of the affirmative vote. The question on which the people were asked to express an opinion was a simple one. They were asked:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The result we all know. Unfortunately, in my own province of Quebec the majority of the voters said "no." They were asked to express their opinion; they did so, and that was their right. But there can be no question in the mind of any hon. member that the vast majority of the people of Canada wish that the government should be freed from any past commitments in respect of the method of raising men for overseas service, and should be free, if the situation demands it, to send men raised by the compulsory method anywhere in the world. I believe that the bill now before the house is the inevitable sequel of that verdict.

There are some in this house and outside who are urging that the government should go very much further and should now impose conscription for overseas service. Let me say at once that I do not agree with that view. Among those who take that view appears to be my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and certain members, at any rate of his party. Unfortunately, I was not present in the house when he made his speech on June 10. I was in Toronto with the members of the war expenditures committee, on which committee I am serving. I read his speech carefully in Hansard and, from all I have heard, it was delivered in his usual able and forceful manner. But I was surprised to read one statement which he made, because I remember clearly another statement made in his broadcast address on April 20. I listened to that broadcast; it was extremely well done and delivered, as I am sure his address in the house was, in a convincing manner: This is what he said on June 10 in the house, as reported at page 3245 of Hansard:

> Let there be no mistake about the will of the people as reflected by the plebiscite. Any effort to make it appear that the affirmative vote was nothing more than a release of the government and of parliament is not facing the facts as expressed at the polls. When the government is freed from its pledges, which release has been secured on the terms which the government itself defined, the very act which frees the government and makes compulsory service at home and abroad the law of the land.

And then a little later:

> It is not what we thought but what the people thought when they voted "yes".

That statement was made a few minutes after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had concluded his address, in the course of which he quoted the words used by my hon. friend in his broadcast of April 20, and I should like to quote those words again. My hon. friend said:

> This plebiscite is simply to give to the government and Mr. King release from a commitment not to enlist men for overseas service by compulsory methods. That, primarily, is the only issue involved. Emphatically, it is not, in this specific vote, an issue for or against compulsory service for overseas. It is merely a vote to release or refuse to release, Mr. King from a preelection pledge.
> You—

That is, he is speaking to the people of Canada.

> You are not called upon by this plebiscite to declare for or against conscription for overseas service. That may come; it does not follow from this plebiscite.

As I said, I find it hard to understand that rather amazing volte face on the part of my hon. friend. I do not know whether he is gifted as a mind-reader or whether he has sources of information which are not available to the rest of us, but I cannot help feeling that he is confusing the opinions expressed by certain vocal groups in this country and certain editorial writers in certain newspapers with the opinions of the majority of the Canadian people.

As far as I am concerned I have not changed my views. I think the question appearing on the ballot paper was very clear and meant what it said, and that as a result of the vote the government has been released from commitments, moral or otherwise, not to impose conscription for overseas service.

But I do not think we are justified in assuming that that vote means anything more. I am perfectly conscious, of course, that a great many people who voted "yes" on the plebiscite would like to have conscription for overseas service imposed immediately. But I am sure that those people are not in the majority. I feel that the repeal of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, the measure now before the house, is an inevitable consequence of that vote, and that the government should be free from any limitations, legal or otherwise, free to exercise its judgment as to whether men raised by the compulsory method should be sent outside the territorial limits of Canada.

As I said when I spoke on January 28, I am one of those who would like to have seen a system of selective service, along the lines of that in force in Great Britain and in the United States, imposed in this country from the very outset of the war. But as I also said at that time, I was convinced from the outset that any attempt to impose such a system would have been disastrous and that we should not have attained anything like the results in our war effort that have been achieved. Nothing which has occurred since September, 1939, has in any way caused me to change my views on that point.

The government have said through the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and some of the other ministers that conscription for overseas service is not at present necessary. I accept that statement. I believe it is correct; no one is in a better position to know than the government. The question is primarily a military one and can be decided only by someone in possession of all the information, information which, of necessity, cannot be known to very many people, and certainly not to all members of this house.

Since July, 1940, we have had a statute which permits the raising of men by the compulsory method in Canada. That power has been exercised. I believe that those steps should be continued. I heard the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) say in the house the other day, and saw in the newspapers a day or two before, that we proposed to call up 15,000 men, I think it is, in the month of July under the act. These men go into training; under the regulations now in force they are in for the duration of the war; and, as far as the training is concerned, I assume they will receive exactly the same training as if they had enlisted voluntarily for overseas service. It is perfectly obvious to any hon. member that if circumstances arise in which voluntary enlistments are not sufficient, if our troops get into action overseas and there are casualties, those men may have to be sent overseas. I have no licence to speak for the province of Quebec or the French-speaking members from that province, but I venture to say that if such circumstances should arise, we would find there would be no objection from Quebec. The chief difficulty is that the people of that province are not satisfied, for reasons which I do not propose to discuss now, that conscription is necessary; but if it is shown to be necessary, I believe that province would not only accept it but accept it readily.

Canada having raised a large army on the voluntary basis, I think something over a quarter of a million men, I am personally opposed to any change in that method unless it is absolutely necessary. There are a number of reasons which have caused me to hold that view. There is the traditional temperament of the Canadian people, to which the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) referred in one of his speeches. There is the admitted opposition, particularly of the province of Quebec, but also of certain other sections of the country. There is, however, one other difficulty which has been touched upon, but with which I should like to deal for a moment, and it has influenced me because I have had a practical demonstration of this particular reason for not changing from the voluntary system. I refer to the difficulty of combining a volunteer force and a conscript force. I can speak from experience in that regard, because in the summer of 1918 the battery with which I was serving in France received a certain number of conscripts, though not very many. I am afraid the rules of parliamentary decorum do not permit me to give the house in actual terms what the volunteers called these conscripts, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that they were treated with contempt. That situation does not make for a good army, and I am satisfied that there are very few men in the active army to-day who want to serve with men raised under the compulsory system.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may ask the hon. gentleman a question, have we not that situation to-day in Canada?

Mr. ABBOTT: I will answer that question by saying that perhaps that is the very reason why we should not change from the voluntary to the compulsory method, so far as our overseas army is concerned. I am not able to say whether men raised under the compulsory method are serving in the same units with men who enlisted voluntarily. If that is the situation, my personal belief is that it should not be.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Minister of National Defence says they are.

Mr. ABBOTT: I have stated only my own view. But be the situation as it may, I have seen with my own eyes the practical result of trying to combine the two classes of recruits. I readily concede that under certain circumstances, if we were suffering heavy losses and so on, such a system would have to go by the board, but I suggest that when conditions such as I have described arise on active service, it does not require very much imagination to realize how much more difficult it would be when troops were in garrison or in training, as the bulk of our troops are to-day. I believe, as I have already said, that we should continue to enlist and train all the eligible men in this country who can be taken without hampering our production of food, munitions and the maintenance of other services essential to the conduct of the war. But I also believe that we should continue the system of voluntary enlistment as far as the overseas army is concerned. When this bill passes, the government will be placed in the position of being completely free to act at any time the circumstances should require it, and not only free to act, but charged with the responsibility of so acting, should the voluntary system prove inadequate.

In the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which like that of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I did not have an opportunity of hearing, a phrase was used which struck me when I read it. As reported at page 3228 of Hansard the Prime Minister said:

> The real nature and extent of Canada's war effort has, for more than a year past, been obscured because of a persistent effort to make conscription for overseas service the symbol of a total war effort, regardless of whether or not the voluntary method was proving wholly adequate.

I agree entirely with that statement, and I think it extremely unfortunate that such an effort should have been made. Nothing was heard of it until about a year ago, but since that time there has been a persistent attempt in certain sections of this country and in certain sections of the press to use conscription for overseas service as a symbol for total effort. I do not particularly hold with the practice of quoting editorials in the house, but I wish to make reference to an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of June 16, in which the writer dealt with the sentence I have just quoted, "conscription for overseas service being used as the symbol of a total war effort." The gist of the editorial was that it was one of the favourite arguments of government apologists that the people who were urging conscription are obsessed by it as a symbol, confuse it with total war. I am not going to read the whole of the editorial, but I wish to make reference to the last paragraph:

> Quebec's opposition to conscription is perhaps understandable. What is harder to understand is the intellectual contortions of those in English-speaking Canada who, believing in conscription, yet think they must accept the party line first, last and all the time—the while salving their consciences with loud cries of independence over things that rarely matter.

Again, Mr. Speaker, when I spoke on January 28 last I again had occasion to refer to this matter of party loyalty and the like, and I do not propose to repeat now what I said then. Let me say, however, that the views which I then expressed, and which I am expressing to-night, represent my own sincere and considered opinions as to what is best in the interests of Canada and of our war effort. I expressed those views not only as an individual but also on my responsibility as a member of this house and not, may I say, under the umbrella of the editorial "we".

Before I sit down I want to make brief reference to the attitude taken by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group and some of his supporters with respect to this bill. The address of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was, too, one of the speeches I had not the pleasure of hearing. However, I read it. As usual, it was an able and, I assume, a carefully prepared speech. My hon. friend outlined in sufficiently broad and general terms his solution for the various national problems arising out of the war. I do not propose to discuss those proposals now, because I think a more suitable opportunity will be accorded at another time. I simply wish to say that I do not think my hon. friend is justified in opposing this bill because the parliament of Canada is not prepared to put into effect the particular social and economic measures he and his group believe would be better for the Dominion of Canada.

As I have said, the bill is to remove restrictions which I believe the people of this country, including those in my hon. friend's constituency, have clearly held they wish to have removed. I cannot believe that he or his party is justified in voting against the bill simply because parliament is not prepared to adopt the economic measures for which he asks.

There is one particular feature of his remarks, and those of the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) to which I should like to refer, and I am sorry the hon. member for Weyburn is not in the house, but I understand he has gone to camp with his reserve unit. I refer to the statement that huge and excessive profits are being made out of this war. Such statements are not only untrue but definitely harmful to the war effort of the dominion.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar followed the practice, one I have seen him adopt before, of quoting figures and percentages of one kind and another. Later, in the evening, the hon. member for Weyburn produced elaborate tables, which he placed on Hansard. Those tables purported to show the profits made by certain selected companies in 1941, as compared with the profits made in 1940 and the average profit between 1936 and 1939. Those statements prove absolutely nothing, so far as establishing the point my hon. friend had in mind was concerned, namely that unreasonable and excessive profits were being made as a result of the war. They were only selected lists containing the names of certain companies. There was no reference whatever to the thousands of other companies and industries the profits of which not only have not increased but are probably substantially diminished. I have no doubt that in a great many instances companies have sustained losses. There was, however, no attempt made to set out the names of such companies.

No indication was given as to the increased taxation these companies have paid. There is no indication given as to the dividends paid. As hon. members are aware, industrial profits and business profits, in the case of companies, are taxed twice. They are taxed in the hands of the company, and when distributed among the shareholders they are taxed again in the hands of those shareholders. The rates now in force are pretty substantial. Perhaps I would not be going too far afield if I were to say that after next Tuesday we may find those rates still higher.

I protest against this system of using simple and plausible catch-phrases, such as that of "taking the profits out of war", with which principle we all agree, in order to appeal to masses of people who have no opportunity of checking the accuracy or otherwise of the statements made. I do not know what experience my hon. friend has had in business, but my understanding is that his experience has been rather limited. Had he had any experience, I think he would realize that, in order to eat, the business man has to make a profit. Otherwise he would have the same difficulty some of us here would have in performing that very necessary function if we did not receive our indemnity cheques at the end of each month.

I repeat, I protest against the general statement that business and industry are making huge and excessive profits out of the war. I am satisfied that that is not so. While statements of that kind may be useful in getting votes—and as to that I am not prepared to speak with any degree of authority—one thing is certain: they do not help our war effort.

I have endeavoured to make my position with respect to the bill now before us as clear as I can. I intend to vote for it. The repeal of section 3 is, in my opinion, the necessary sequel to the vote on the plebiscite. I do not want the present method of raising men for overseas service changed, unless it is absolutely necessary to do so. I believe the responsibility for making that decision should rest with the government, because it alone can have the information necessary to the making of such a decision. I believe, too, that in time of war we must trust our government. So far as I am concerned, I do trust it. If I might conclude my observations by paraphrasing a statement made by the Prime Minister in one of his broadcasts just before the plebiscite, I would say to the members of this house and to the people of Canada: If you are not prepared to trust your own government, whom or what are you prepared to trust?

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to make such remarks as I wish to make with respect to the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act, I should like first of all to take this opportunity of expressing my pleasure and appreciation of the new pacts which have just been signed between the three great powers in the world to-day, Great Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States of America. These new pacts are of world-wide significance, and I believe that in expressing my pleasure I am joined by the great majority of the Canadian people who see in these pacts the cementing of friendship and understanding among those who together are fighting a common enemy. These three great world powers, besides working together for the defeat of their common enemy, are now pledging themselves to work together for that enduring world peace so much desired by all the peoples of the world.

I should like also on this occasion to express my appreciation of the government's action in now opening diplomatic relations with our allies, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, after a whole year of their gallant fight. I welcome these changes in government policy by a government which, a few years ago, was following so strictly its policy of isolation. I noticed in the Journal of to-day a short editorial with regard to the exchange of ministers between Canada and the soviet union. I think this idea is, in the main, agreeable to our people. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read this, because I believe it is worthy of our notice, representing, as I think it does, the opinion of a great many Canadian people. It states:

> Whether they have communism in Russia to-day, or ever had much of it, we do not know (though we doubt it), but what we do know is that Russia is to-day showing herself worthy of a high place in the comity of civilized nations, and that all of us should be proud of the decision of last week bringing diplomatic relations between this country and the Soviet republics, with an exchange of ministers. Coming on the heels of the momentous mutual aid pact between Russia and Great Britain and the scarcely less vital agreement between Moscow and Washington, it is a heartening thing.
> Russia is not merely playing a glorious role in this war; she is destined to play a mighty role in post-war reconstruction and peace. In that happy day, when fear of tyrants will have passed and nations once more return to peaceful pursuits, trade between this country and the Russian republics may well be a great and beneficial thing.
> There will be a warm welcome in Canada and in Ottawa for Josef Stalin's representative.

I believe that is in accord with the sentiments of the Canadian people. Those of us who follow closely the press of the allied nations realize that among those people the slow tide of public opinion has been gaining momentum and has now reached the peak in its flow in the direction of offensive action in the immediate future. Meetings which have been held in Great Britain, in the United States and in this country have showed that the people are voicing their opinions and have expressed the need of offensive action and the opening up of a western front. The great air raids which have been carried out by both British and Canadian airmen have received world-wide applause from the allied peoples and have been taken as the beginning of an offensive which must be carried on by the land forces to the continent of Europe. I believe the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) was correctly voicing the opinion of the Canadian people when he said before the Rotary club of Montreal, as reported in the Journal of June 16:

The people are calling for action and so are the Canadian troops in Britain.

In this country at meetings of trade union groups, meetings of farmers and meetings of other citizens, this sentiment has been voiced repeatedly. When Mr. Churchill spoke over the air recently he expressed great appreciation of the voicing of public opinion which had occurred at a huge meeting of the British people in Trafalgar square. He said that in his opinion it was a good thing to see the aggressive spirit of the British people expressed in demanding the immediate opening of the western front and the carrying of the offensive into Hitler's country.

As I listened to the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in opening this debate I was sorry that he had not voiced more strongly his approval of the Canadian people's wish and desire to see a stronger and ever-continuing momentum to our war effort. I may have been wrong, but it seemed to me that I could sense more of a negative tone in the words of the Prime Minister. At a time like this, when all the allied nations are solidifying and unifying their efforts, I cannot help feeling that a debate such as this is out of tune with the rest of the world. It is behind the times; it is completely out of step with things. As I listened to the Prime Minister it almost seemed that by the very volume of his words he was seeking to escape facing the responsibility of this situation which is peculiarly Canadian.

I want to impress upon the members of the house that there can be no escape from reality with honour. We must face up to the realities of our own particular situation. To delay facing up to them is to make the breaches ever wider. There can be no escape from the fact that we must have an army ready and prepared. We have in Great Britain an army which is, as the Minister of National Defence has said, ready and waiting for action. Those soldiers are anxious to know that there is in Canada an army equipped and trained and ready to fill the breaches in their ranks as they occur. It takes time to train men and to make them acquainted with the methods of modern warfare, so that they may be able to use the equipment and machinery which the workers are preparing for them.

When we approach a crisis such as the one we are approaching in 1942, we cannot afford to neglect one item which constitutes total war. I cannot agree that any condition should be imposed upon our support of a total war effort, as I believe has been done by the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I am in favour of doing everything which will make a more efficient and stronger effort, and I will support to the limit everything which can be done and everything which must still be done to make an all-out war effort. I believe that the wages of our working people must be increased so that they may have the virility and strength to carry on with their jobs. I believe that further measures must be taken to protect the health of the Canadian people. I believe that we must go on to limit the high rate of interest on our borrowings and that we must tax more those who are able to pay. We must place further limitations upon profits. All these things we must do, and this government which is pledged to total war must see that they are done.

Conscription alone is not total war; it is only one component part of total war. I do not feel that we should limit our total war by imposing any conditions. I admit that the government have done some things to make total war, and I am ready to support them in any other measure which they may take to make total war possible. They have already gone a long way in the taxation of corporations and higher incomes. Recently they did something which, I believe, will be most valuable. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) suggested that labour-management committees should be set up to further the efforts of the workers in our factories for a more efficient and greater production. All these things are part and parcel of total war, but conscription is also one component part of that effort.

I do not see how any government or any group committed to total war can omit conscription from that effort. If we fail to face the issues that are confronting us to-day the breaches which exist already because of differences of opinion on conscription will widen still more. The tide of war will not wait; it flows on.

I am going to support the government's amendment for the deletion of section 3 of the mobilization act, because I believe it is a step in the right direction, although I am not satisfied that it is going sufficiently far.

During this debate many speeches have been made on behalf of the French-speaking people of our nation, and I want to compliment the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the address he delivered the other evening. It was a splendid speech. He has a wise and great understanding of the people whom he represents, and I hope that, as time goes on, he will take increasing leadership in bringing together his people with the rest of us. We all of us have a love of tradition. We all have a love of our heritage of the past, of the things which are dear to us because they have been handed on to us by our forefathers. It is true that we must preserve all the best of the past and bring it along with us. But to-day stands between the past and the future. To-day stands between yesterday and to-morrow. If to-day we are going to allow ourselves to be bound and shackled by the prejudices of yesterday, I feel that we shall fail to go forward and place our feet upon the threshold of to-morrow as a free people should. We cannot afford to be bound and shackled by the past.

It is true that the French-speaking people hate the idea of conscription, and they have good reason to do so. They have been forced against their will to support imperialism, in which they had no interest, in which they had no voice, and to which they had no adherence. But because of these wrongs of the past there is no need to keep alive and rekindle prejudices now, under such different circumstances.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) claims to have been a leader of his people. Why, then, did he lead them to support the arch-imperialist Chamberlain in 1940, and why now, when imperialism is choking to death in the whirlwind of its own making, does he separate us on this question of conscription? The French-speaking people of this nation to-day need a leader, someone who has the courage to come out boldly and tell them that there no longer exists the reason for their antagonism to conscription, that it is finished, that it is gone and belongs to the past. Maybe the Minister of Justice is that man. I hope he will be. To give leadership to people does not mean to take advantage of their prejudices and, by playing upon those prejudices, seek to ingratiate yourself. That is the work of the demagogue. The demagogue uses the feelings and the emotions of the people to whip them into hysteria. But the demagogue is not concerned with the lasting work or peace of the people. The word of the demagogue is, as my old friend Omar Khayyam said:

> Like Snow upon the Desert's dusty Face,
> Lighting a little hour or two—is gone.

What we want in this country is leadership, not demagoguery. This is a time when it is necessary to speak the truth to the people, now more than it has ever been necessary before. We need leaders to-day. Leaders step out ahead of the people. They do not just say what the people are thinking. They step out ahead of them and show what is necessary to be done. They speak the truth, even if it is not agreeable at the present time, even if it is not pleasant, even if it is not immediately acceptable; for truth will prevail, and truth alone will save the people not only of this nation but of the world.

This is not the last war—it is not like the last war or like any war that has gone before. It is different, and it must be fought in new ways and with new means. Total war alone will save the people of the world from the menace which is before them.

I could not help deploring the statements made the other evening by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). He was not willing to admit that conscription was a part of total war, although he admitted there were several other parts of total war which the official opposition was sometimes apt to overlook. As I was listening to him I found it was quite natural for him to take the line which he did, because the Minister of National War Services has a record for appeasement. Away back when collective security might have spared the world some of the slaughter of to-day he was for isolation, and when aggressive action might have done something to avert disaster he was favouring appeasement. I cannot believe to-day that the people of Canada will listen to the Minister of National War Services in what he is saying on the question of conscription. I cannot believe that this government is willing to let a man with a record such as that voice the opinion of the government on this question of conscription.

I would appeal to the Minister of Justice and to the Prime Minister to speak to the people of Quebec now, boldly, and tell them the truth which they must know sooner or later. It would be a very fine gesture and a great thing if the Prime Minister would go to them and honestly admit some of the mistakes of the past. Perhaps it would be even better if he went to them and admitted that for years the people of the province of Quebec have been a depressed minority. Take the question of their labour and their wages. It has been lower than that of most of the other provinces. The small farmers of Quebec have an inadequate income. The social services and the health standards of the province have been away below the rest of Canada and a blot upon our whole nation. It was not any fault of theirs alone. The fault has been with us, that we have allowed one province to suffer in this way. I would say that a part of total war would be to raise those standards and bring the people of Quebec up to an equality with the rest of the Canadian people. Admit to them that these things have been unjust and wrong; and when you give them equality and bring them up to the level of the rest of the Canadians, then ask them to accept equal responsibility with the rest of us. Then I believe that thousands of them would respond and would recognize that even conscription was a component part of total war and would accept it on that basis.

There are others in Canada besides the French-speaking people of the province of Quebec who are opposed to conscription. During the Easter recess I spent three weeks, a great deal of time and money and energy, in trying to get around my own huge constituency. I travelled over roads which were almost impassable. One day I spent nine hours in going thirty-five miles in a car, trying to get around among the people of my constituency to present a viewpoint which I thought they should hear before they cast a ballot in the plebiscite. The Saskatchewan farmers have not yet been in a position where they have been able to feel they are giving all that they can. Total war has not come to them yet. They have not been assisted enough to change over from peace-time to war-time production of food. They have not felt themselves taking their share, and for that reason, perhaps, some are hanging back a little from taking a responsibility that they should take. If only the government would realize how wide and how broad all these things are, how intimately concerned they are with total war, I believe that much more could be done.

To-day our Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have an opportunity before them such as never occurred before. I believe that in the year 1942 we can write a record on the pages of history which would be similar to that which was written in the year 1837. In those days Mackenzie and Papineau turned their backs upon the past and faced the future. They had faith in the people and their idealism, and they believed in Canada. To-day, in 1942, if the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice would gather again in their hands the ravelled edges of the two great peoples of this country and bind them together in a stronger knot, turning their backs upon the past and facing the future, confident in the people and in their ability to win, this year would go down, not only as a year of victory, but as a year of greater and deeper unity than the people of Canada have ever known.

It needed courage in 1837 to go ahead against opposition. It would need great courage to-day on the part of the Prime Minister, but it could be done. We could do these things the same as those who have gone before us if we had the courage. Personally I would pledge myself, although I am but one small entity, to tell the truth to the people in this country, that conscription and all the elements of total war must be faced and must be accepted because there is only one thing for us, to fight or to die.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères belongs now, because of his actions, to the past. But that is no reason why the younger of the French-speaking members of this house should naturally follow him. It is their job to accept new responsibilities. It is their job to fight for the equality of their people among the rest of us here in Canada. It is their job to try to strengthen the ties of unity, by accepting equality of sacrifice and all those things which are necessary for a nation which is going forward. The tide of war and aggression rolls on in a mighty wave. Those who now speak and act against total war will find themselves, like the king of whom we read away back in history, Canute, who thought he could stay the waves. Those who to-day speak against one aspect of total war and refuse to accept any one portion of it will find themselves engulfed as the people of the world sweep on to victory. Those who are afraid of all that total war implies; those who fail to wage total war, will find only annihilation. The challenge of 1942 to all Canadians is to fight or to perish. The two great peoples which make up this nation must decide here and now to stand side by side and to fight and to live, because the future belongs to us.

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier): During the debate on the plebiscite I listened very carefully to the speeches made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the members of all parties, and I was at times surprised to see how a simple issue could be obscured to such an extent.

The plebiscite in its simplest form is a prayer to the Canadian people. It means this: Please allow the government to do whatever necessary whenever necessary to attain the best war effort possible. I have no doubt that this measure was arrived at after due consideration by a government which has shown in the conduct of the war and of the problems incident thereto, far-sightedness, good judgment, absolute integrity and high courage, in the sense of being opposed to thoughtless undertakings. One has to remember that the plebiscite was decided when Japan was heading south, sweeping everything before her, and nobody knew where she would stop and when she would stop. An army able to conquer the Philippines, Hong Kong, the formidable base of Singapore, and the Netherlands East Indies might as well have conquered Alaska and established itself along our western coast. After the conquest of France and of so many neutral nations by the nazis in Europe, the Japanese thrust was certainly a climax of a situation unprecedented in the whole history of the world. The wisdom of asking our Canadian people for a plebiscite might have been doubted by some people, some good-thinking people, at the time, but to-day I think it the only thing which gives this government absolute freedom to meet any situation whatsoever.

This country is difficult—very difficult—to govern. Though powerful, it is a very young nation. In the life of a nation calendar years do not mean so much; it is periods of time that count—centuries, half-centuries, or similar periods according to whether the historical life of the nation is intense and important during those periods. When a nation has gone through crucial times; when its citizens have to suffer in common great calamities which test to the utmost its heart, nerves and sinews, the experience undoubtedly helps to cement the national unity. In Canada we have had very few of these periods of intense national life. The nation was built by the common sense of the two races headed by such great statesmen as Baldwin, Macdonald, Sir Oliver Mowat, Lafontaine, Cartier and Laurier. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, their work has often been marred by the influence of men who have been unable to grasp situations of national scope and have been content with easy and passing popularity. If one goes around this very building he will notice monuments erected to men of the first class; but whether he goes around this building or any other legislative building in this country he will not find any monuments erected to the second class.

On the 28th day of May, reading the Montreal Daily Star, I found at page 19 two different news items. One is the report of a speech by Mr. René Chaloult, of Quebec, on the treatment being given to my compatriots of the province of Quebec; and on the very same page, on the right-hand side, is a protest by Mr. J. W. Carson, Orange leader, about the status given to the French language in this province. That is, I think, a very good example of how difficult it is to govern this country.

May I give the house a few illuminating paragraphs. I am quoting Mr. Chaloult's speech. It was made in the Quebec legislative assembly, probably to cover another speech of which I do not want to speak now but which the criminal courts in Montreal will have to study very carefully in the near future. Mr. Chaloult said that after going through the province he had found much discontent and lack of enthusiasm among the people, because, said he, French Canadians have become aware that their rights as citizens of Canada are not respected in either the army, the navy or other war services as regards employment and salaries.

From what we read of his statements made in Montreal, Thetford Mines and many other places, I take it that Mr. Chaloult did not try to appease the discontent of which he is speaking. I quote:

> Continuing, the member for Lotbinière claimed that in the various government commissions and in war industries, French Canada is far from receiving its rightful share. "As regards war industries, especially those for the construction of heavy machinery, they are kept outside of Quebec."

Surely, in his trips around the province, Mr. Chaloult should have known that in Sorel, for example, Sorel Industries are manufacturing 25-pounder guns and that other industries at the same place are building corvettes and 10,000-ton freighters. These industries happen to be in the hands of our compatriots the French Canadians. If there were any more of these industries able to do the same work, I have no doubt that they would also be loaded with work and would have all they could do. But Mr. Chaloult says, as regards war industries, especially those for the construction of heavy machinery, they are kept outside of Quebec. He should have known that Vickers in Montreal are building 10,000-ton freighters and aeroplanes; that the Canadian National Railways plant in Point St. Charles is manufacturing heavy naval guns, and that many other plants in the province of Quebec are manufacturing very heavy machinery. Noorduyn, Fairchilds, the Angus shops; Dominion Engineering Company and many others; there is not a large plant in Montreal that is not working on war orders, and mostly heavy machinery.

Let me quote further:

> It has been said that, if this were the case, it was due mainly to the lack of a proper training in technical education. If this were true, the government would have to shoulder its responsibility, for it is proved that, given a proper chance, French Canadians can stand their own against any other nationality.

Mr. Chaloult was speaking in Quebec. I do not know whether he was referring to the government of Quebec or the federal government; but since he was making a speech against this government in the Quebec legislative assembly, I take it he was talking about the responsibility of this government. Technical education and any other branch of education are within the jurisdiction of the province. Mr. Chaloult is a member of the very legislature that can cure that situation.

I admit that technical education in my province is not as advanced as it should be, but to impute the consequences of this shortcoming to misunderstanding between French-speaking and English-speaking citizens is absolutely wrong. It does, however, give good food in speeches made especially to inflame one race against the other, and it also gives good food to the newspapers that are reporting such speeches.

On the other side of the page I find this:

Quebec stand deplored by Orange leader.

I will quote some of these pearls, they are pearls indeed:

J. W. Carson, London, Ont., the grand master, yesterday told the 83rd annual meeting of the Grand Lodge of Ontario west, "It is almost unbelievable that many leaders in the province of Quebec are still opposing a total war effort."

He is again confusing total war effort with conscription.

He is reported further as saying:

Mr. Carson read a resolution adopted by the Orange order at the outbreak of war urging conscription of wealth, industry and man-power. "It is the same to-day," he said, adding that conscription is fair to all; "Let us have no special privileges for any group or province."

We shall see a little later how funny Mr. Carson's ideas about privileges are.

Further down he says:

The unwarranted obtrusion of the French language is further aggravated by the announcers and artists of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

Not only the announcers but the artists! Mr. Carson does not even want to hear Faust, Carmen, Manon or any other operas in the language in which they were written. But I am sure he would be ready to hear Tannhauser in German or Cavalleria Rusticana in Italian. If he does not want to hear opera, or if he wants to limit his pleasure of hearing it to opera in the English language, so much the worse for him.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the city of Toronto—which is the musical centre of Canada—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Yes, it is, and a place where good music is very well received, whether written by a German, Italian, English, French or any other good composer, including Russian composers who are very much in demand these days.

Mr. GRAYDON: What about the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid)? You have left him out.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Well, I suppose that would be very popular in Toronto. It is even popular in Montreal.

I quote the last paragraph of Mr. Carson's speech:

Mr. Carson said the order—

That is the Orange order.

—must feel the deepest concern over the fact that people of British extraction represent less than 50 per cent of the total population. Census figures, about to be released, would show that Quebec's population increased 17 per cent since 1931, while the increase for the whole dominion was a little below 10 per cent.

Surely this cannot be laid at the door of the French race in the province of Quebec. This complaint has been repeated very often; it is laughable, but I wonder if in these days Mr. Carson is a racialist. If he is, he should remember that Hitler is one, too, and that the war to-day is the result of the theories propounded by Hitler in his "Mein Kampf". A passage like this would be in its place in "Mein Kampf", and the only thing we would have to change would be "British extraction" to "German stock".

This shows how difficult it is to govern this country in time of crisis. Similar speeches are being made in both sections of this dominion. Well, Mr. Speaker, every time a citizen indulges in remarks of this kind and tries to gain the applause of his people by condemning, or saying anything unpleasant and very often untrue about the other race, he does not render a service to his country. Untruths, half-truths and generalized statements which are apt to create resentment on the part of one race as against the other, hurt the war effort and should be condemned by all good-thinking citizens. I would say that there should be more demagogues in the Petawawa internment camp, and personally I think there are newspapers that should have been banned or at least censured long ago. Speaking for myself, I say it does not matter whether these newspapers have long English names or short French names; if, day after day, they publish vicious and destructive criticism in a time of war like this, they should be stopped.

The government is facing two fronts in connection with Bill No. 80. We have to face people who are bound to enforce conscription, whose speeches, whether or not they are clothed in mild language, mean one thing only: "We want conscription, whether it is necessary or not." They are trade-marking their request under the name of "selective service," but it does not mean anything but conscription. For them the plebiscite means conscription immediately. Whatever was written on the ballot, whatever was said by the ministers of this government, did not count. It was not what was written or what was said; it was what they had in their own mind that counted. Well, after three years of war I am told that 90 per cent of our active army has not yet had the chance of shooting at German soldiers. Our farmers are clamouring for help. Our manufacturers are in great need of technicians and other help, but it does not matter to the conscriptionists. They would regiment our whole population. They would Hitlerize our country, and they alone would be the masters to do it.

Then, on the second front we have those who want no conscription, even if it ever becomes necessary. In passing, let me say that we know now that these latter members are going to vote with those who want not only conscription of men but at the same time conscription of wealth, and both immediately. Politics makes strange bedfellows, they say. There might be an argument as to whether conscription may be necessary at some future time; but no one will dare carry the argument to the point of saying that we do not want conscription at any time, whether or not it ever becomes necessary. The last part of the sentence is carefully left out; it is brushed aside with a wave of the hand. These people claim that our war programme was set out in 1940. They say that all parties pledged themselves to no conscription for service outside Canada and that, therefore, we have to stand by those pledges given to the Canadian electors. They do not even admit that unforeseen changes have taken place in the war situation which require changes in the programme. They close their eyes to the forthcoming threat. In a word, they are more afraid of conscription than of the war itself.

Between these extremists, those favouring immediate conscription whether necessary or not and those favouring no conscription even if it ever becomes necessary, we have the programme of this government: "Give us complete liberty of action. We will not impose conscription unless it becomes necessary." How reasonable such an attitude appears to me when compared with the other two. I challenge the suggestion that the overwhelming majority for the affirmative in the plebiscite vote was given with the idea that it meant immediate conscription. I credit the citizens of this country with more intelligence and reasoning power. They read and understood the ballot. They voted to release or not to release the government from previous pledges, and that was all. After the plebiscite there still was a barrier to liberty of action. This time it was a legal barrier, and the government took the first opportunity to remove that barrier. This repeal, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) said yesterday, is the absolute, logical consequence of the affirmative vote on the plebiscite; and if this government was not taking this step, it could be said that it was either remiss in its duty or childish in submitting a plebiscite to the Canadian electorate.

If we do not adopt Bill No. 80, no soldiers except those who enlisted voluntarily could be sent to Alaska, to the Hawaiian islands—from which we could be attacked—to the west coast of the United States, or to Mexico. That would be so also on the eastern coast; we could not send any soldiers to Newfoundland, Labrador, Greenland, Iceland, Bermuda, the Panama canal or the eastern coast of the United States. However, if our own coast, either east or west, were invaded, how loudly would we clamour for the help of United States troops. Is this a situation that any member of this parliament, proud of his country, can tolerate? I say it is not; and this, I believe, is the thought of the best citizens on this subject. If any hon. member is ready to say that his constituents do not understand such arguments, he pays them no compliment. I have faith in my constituents, and I am sure they do understand. We have not been elected as messenger boys. I have another idea as to members of parliament. We have been chosen as members to direct policy according to the best of our judgment and ability. How many of the Liberal members from Quebec who are voting against the government today have been elected by the nationalist vote? How many have been supported by Le Devoir, and how many are going to be supported by this newspaper when the next general election comes round? I do not want to indulge in flattery. I hate flattery and have always had respect for any man who speaks his mind outright. I may say, however, that the name of our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is going to be a banner for generations to come, not only in Quebec but in the whole of Canada. I for one am not going to wave this banner in easy-going days, and hide it or drop it in days of difficulties. I have faith in him.

The Conservative party have not brought forward any amendment, and reserve their rights to propose one in committee. We have no doubt as to where they shall stand, when we remember the applause they gave to certain hon. members who spoke this afternoon. We will await that amendment.

What will be the practical results for Quebec of voting against the repeal of section 3? Apart from being wooed by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, which is in favour of immediate conscription of wealth and manpower, what is Quebec going to gain by it? These hon. members claim that the province does not want conscription, and think it is not necessary and might never be necessary. I grant this, for the benefit of discussion; but from this very point of view, voting against the government on this bill is bringing conscription nearer to them. These hon. members have to take into consideration that they are joining with those who are at the very extreme—conscription of wealth and man-power. If they are sincere, which I do not doubt at all, they would want all other members to vote against the bill, which would mean the defeat of this government.

What would then be the result? We would then have an immediate union government, with conscription as the first article of its programme. There would not be any discussion as to whether conscription would be necessary or not. We would get it right away. Has this phase been explained to their electors? I doubt it. When I hear hon. members saying that they have confidence in the Prime Minister, but that they are bound to vote against this bill, in so serious a matter, I cannot help thinking of Rostand's play L'Aiglon—"Je ne suis pas prisonnier mais." Il y a un mais—j'ai confiance mais.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us that no government, except a union government, would be able to impose conscription. I believe that. If hon. members from Quebec do not want immediate conscription, why then open the only road that would pave the way for it? Many Liberals of my district who voted "no" on the plebiscite have seen that danger, and have since warned me about it. I thank them heartily. I had seen this danger right from the start. I am sure many deep-thinking citizens in every district also see the danger. Reasonable people, however, are not noisy and still less vociferous, but they should let their member know what they think of this situation.

I have confidence in our Prime Minister, and know that any change to-day would be for the worse. We never had a Prime Minister more deeply rooted in the very soil of Canada. He belongs to three generations of Canadians who have lived and fought for free institutions. And nothing shall ever come out of his mind which is not going to be in the best interests of Canada. He has spent his life in studying the history of political affairs throughout the world. Ever since the war started, his policy has been persistent, free of undue influence and of false manoeuvres. Up to this issue he has kept the country united so that its war effort has been highly praised by the two greatest statesmen of our time, namely, Churchill and Roosevelt. When his work is finished, I am sure we shall have reached a point never yet attained, where it will be fashionable at last to boast of being first, last and always a true Canadian.

I heard the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) and was surprised at the picture she painted of the province of Quebec. I might tell her that in Quebec people are just as happy as they can be, under present circumstances. I might add that when the hon. member came to Montreal and spoke at the Atwater market she was not meeting the farmers of Quebec. The large audience there was composed mainly of people who were born far away from Canada—not even in any of the other provinces of Canada. She cannot judge the population of Quebec by these people who, although they are good citizens, do not represent the true spirit of my race in Quebec.

Mr. RAYMOND EUDES (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill we are now considering will shape, in a measure whose exact scope we are unable to determine, the future of the two main racial groups in this country. Their disagreement over the plebiscite issue has stirred wide popular feeling.

The French Canadians are charged with shutting their eyes to a danger that is imminent and with refusing their fellow citizens of Canada the cooperation required to safeguard the precious interests at stake. Setting apart from the French-Canadian mass the handful of fanatics whose influence, be it said, is non-existent, I maintain that the attitude of this mass is essentially a Canadian and patriotic one.

This attitude is explained and justified by certain characteristics of the French-Canadian mentality, of which it would take too long to give a detailed account. However, a review of the facts from which that mentality derives will simplify our task. These are manifold, stemming principally from the varied conditions that have regulated the existence of French Canadians in this country.

The first to set foot on this continent, our forefathers were fired with the ambition of founding here a new France wherein would flourish the tongue and the faith of their ancestors. In the pursuit of this ideal, we see them struggle for a century and a half against nature and the elements, against hostile natives, often without the support of the mother country. Through this struggle they become deeply attached to the soil of new France, on which they have sweated and bled. Their dream has barely begun to take shape when they pass under British rule. France having left them to their own devices, the French Canadians elect to remain on Canadian soil. Henceforth Canada will be their only homeland.

Now opens the period of struggle for the maintenance of their language, their faith and their traditions. Their uncompromising stand and the understanding which has always shown them a section of the conquering race, enable them to resist with success the attempts made by another section of the English element to assimilate them. Struggling side by side with their English fellow citizens, they finally obtain from Britain recognition of their parliamentary, economic and political rights.

Briefly, their history is the history of their struggles, of struggles which rooted their soul deep in the soil of Canada and gave them a thorough aversion for any kind of compulsion. Historic and cultural ties bind the French Canadians to France, and they are deeply sympathetic and grateful to their erstwhile conquerors for the broadmindedness they have shown. But they have only one homeland and that is Canada.

To be forced to fight outside their country is something the French Canadians abhor. There are many reasons for this: the 1917 conscription measure with its injustices; the pledges given over a period of twenty years by a government in whom French Canada had placed the utmost confidence, to the effect that conscription would never again be enforced.

It is now established that the French Canadians have kept Canada under the British crown. They will always fight heroically in defence of their country. One must recognize that this defence may entail fighting outside the boundaries of Canada. If help for England has been preached since the outbreak of the war, no one seems to have remembered that Canada must see to her own defence and it has not yet been proven that to safeguard their country, Canadians must fight in Europe or in Asia.

No one therefore should be shocked at the attitude taken by the French Canadians. A feeling which three centuries have rooted into the hearts of a people cannot disappear overnight. Through failure to understand the French Canadians, hostility is seen in an eminently patriotic and Canadian sentiment that could have been used to great advantage.

There exists a further obstacle to complete agreement between our two racial groups. In its dealings with the majority, a minority never gives more than it receives. The history of Ireland, Czechoslovakia and India furnishes ample proof of this.

Now the British North America Act guarantees to the French minority rights equal to those of the majority. Yet since July 1, 1867, we have never fully enjoyed in practice that justice and equality promised in our constitution. And so the existence of a Canadian nation must remain a dream until such time as French Canadians throughout the dominion enjoy the same fair and equitable treatment which is granted to the English minority in Quebec by the French majority.

This principle must govern in the field of education and religion, in the civil service and in our economic life. For a few years now, a praiseworthy but timid effort has been made along this line in certain fields. A military career, for instance, has been made more readily accessible to French Canadians who have long requested a military college. Good understanding as between our two racial groups generally, was growing stronger. There is the danger to-day that this structure may break down entirely.

These brief remarks, Mr. Speaker, are an explanation of the attitude of French Canadians on the present bill. Those who consider the repugnance shown by French Canadians for conscription as a lack of appreciation of the gravity of the hour and as a refusal to cooperate in a common cause, fail to recognize the part played by French Canadians in the present conflict, even in the armed forces overseas. I marvel, for my part, that such conditions notwithstanding, the French Canadians should have so generously borne their share of the burden. And we are still far from that participation which had been promised, a free and voluntary participation, moderate and in keeping with our means. Like their fellow citizens, the French Canadians desire an allied victory and work with all their might towards that end. In the provincial election of 1939, in the federal election of 1940 and in the recent by-elections, the province of Quebec clearly made known her desire to remain united with the rest of Canada and her unswerving determination to win this war.

In the light of these observations, Mr. Speaker, I now undertake a brief analysis of the legislation before the house.

Let us study the nature and the scope of the measure. Its purpose is to delete section 3 from the Mobilization Act. Now this legislation gives the governor in council the power to require persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty for the efficient prosecution of the war. Power is therefore vested in the government to coerce citizens of Canada into military service. If military service is no longer restricted to the boundaries of Canada and her territorial waters one must conclude that the government will have power to coerce Canadians into fighting outside of their country.

Such is the exact meaning of this bill. As to its nature, opinions differ. Some contend that the amendment will turn the mobilization act into a conscription measure. Others maintain that it merely removes an obstacle which deprived the government of their complete freedom of action. In other words, it is not conscription but the power to extend compulsory military service beyond the limits of the country.

Now, when taken as the people generally understand it, conscription is precisely this coercion with regard to military service outside the boundaries of the country. Therefore, if the Mobilization Act, so amended, does not make conscription enforceable at once, it recognizes the principle of conscription and its enforcement will necessarily follow. How, indeed, will the government be able to resist the pressure which has already been brought to bear upon them for the enforcement of conscription? We are told that there will be no conscription unless it should become necessary. Would it not be more logical not to pass a legislation than to pass it in the secret hope that it will remain a dead letter? For, once a measure is written into the statute books, through the very essence of things a psychological factor comes into play which prompts the mind to believe that its enforcement has become necessary. This bill which establishes the principle of conscription must unavoidably lead to its enforcement.

Now, conscription has two inherent defects. Being a compulsory measure, it interferes with personal liberty. Under it, a man becomes a soldier against his will. He does not dedicate himself wholly to the higher interests of the nation. His soul lacks the enthusiasm, the sacred fire with which battles are won. He is less a soldier than a civilian bearing arms against his will. A volunteer places himself entirely at the disposal of his country. Such a sacrifice is his pride, it sets him apart from the conscript and is derived from the enthusiasm which inspires heroic deeds. To put him on the same footing as the conscript would create in both a psychological condition whereby the army's efficiency might be impaired.

However, conscription has one advantage. It increases the number of men in the land forces ready for service anywhere, since, in the opinion of experts, it cannot be applied with regard to the navy or the air force.

Let us consider the approximate strength of our armed forces. There are over 115,000 men in the air force; 33,000 in the navy and 320,000 in the active army, a total of about 470,000 soldiers ready to serve outside the borders of this country. Our reserve army includes about 130,000 men. Thus, Canada has under arms 600,000 men, or about 5·2 per cent of its total population of approximately 11,500,000. There are in Canada about 1,365,000 men between the ages of 16 and 60. The proportion of men in that age group who are now under arms is then about 46 per cent. On the other hand, nearly 80 per cent of our armed forces, or 4 per cent of our total population, are willing to serve outside the country. Applying those percentages to other countries, we note with surprise that our army, relatively speaking, compares favourably with all. Thus, if the United States had the same proportion of men under arms, with their population of about 150,630,700 they would have an army of over 7,800,000 men.

Canada has had to keep at home a large number of soldiers ever since our country has been under the threat of enemy attacks.

A study of the above basic facts shows that the advantages of conscription are purely hypothetical. In fact, conscription will send a few thousand men overseas, men who are already needed by agriculture, industry and commerce. As the disadvantages of conscription far surpass its sole and questionable advantage, this method should be used only in case of absolute necessity.

Such is the opinion of the government, of the majority of hon. members and of the people of Canada, since before the government considered themselves even morally entitled to debate the matter, they held a plebiscite.

This absolute necessity does not exist. On the strength of official statements of the government, voluntary enlistment is satisfactory and conscription is not and may never become necessary.

However, Mr. Speaker, a bill has been introduced which not only sanctions the principle of conscription, but fatally leads to its enforcement. Therefore, the government recognize a principle, the enforcement of which they reprove. The only logical attitude is to condemn the principle itself.

Nevertheless, we are urged to adopt this bill, which is essential to the common good. The common good is the public interest of the country. It is the law that transcends all individual interest. Let us seek the exact nature of this common good

Some claim it to be the aim sought by the majority. Because the plebiscite vote was affirmative, the adoption of this measure would be imperative and the minority should accept it.

First, I must state that this affirmative vote has no power of law. It is a mere expression of opinion. The minority must submit to the law, but it retains the democratic privilege of expressing opinions at variance with that of the majority and of discussing the opinion of the majority.

I do not agree that the aim sought by the majority necessarily represents the common good and, furthermore, I claim that the majority of our people, in spite of the affirmative vote cast on the plebiscite, do not desire conscription.

This conclusion is clearly inferred from the very nature of the plebiscite question, from the debate on the plebiscite bill, from the statements made by opposition party leaders during the plebiscite campaign and finally from the statements of the Prime Minister and his colleagues before, during and after the plebiscite. This campaign has doubtless seriously influenced the vote. For a number of our citizens, the affirmative vote was a token of confidence in the government and even a means to avoid conscription. Therefore, the true significance of the vote is not that which it is endeavoured to attach to it.

The supporters of the bill claim that the public interest demands that our soldiers fight the enemy wherever he may be and consequently, demands that this bill be passed. Let us, for the moment, suppose that this point of view is reasonable. Is Canada powerful enough to defend all fronts, to watch over all the oceans? She is not alone in the fight. She has many powerful allies as determined as she is to make logical and reasonable sacrifices for victory over the enemy. We have a strong army of volunteers entirely composed of first-rate soldiers every one of whom will fight bravely in defence of their country. Every day this army grows stronger in proportion to our reserve of man-power. In what measure would conscription add to this army? These volunteers are willing to fight wherever their presence is required. The common good is thus better served than by conscription.

By repealing section 3 of the mobilization act, Canada's war effort would be placed in its true perspective. Such a measure would constitute an answer to the impassioned demands of those who refuse to believe in the efficiency of that effort, because it excludes conscription. According to them, the government close their eyes to fundamental realities lest some of their supporters be displeased.

In my opinion, too much attention is paid to this criticism. A sincere man who puts prejudice aside and takes the trouble to consider what progress has been made since September, 1939: the quantity, quality and variety of our production in many fields; the number and worth of our troops and auxiliary services; the great sacrifices made by all classes; the contributions to war services and war loans; the earnestness of the government to see that those sacrifices are shared equally and that inflation is checked; such a man will say with Churchill and Roosevelt that Canada is doing her duty, her whole duty.

If our war effort is inadequate because conscription is excluded from it, then Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and all our allies who have not yet adopted conscription for service outside of their territorial limits would stand accused of not doing their duty. And what of those sections of the empire that remained neutral?

Efficient propaganda is the best means of placing our war effort in its true perspective. Our propaganda has improved but there is still a great deal of room for improvement.

I wonder if the repeal of section 3 will open the eyes of the government's critics. Do they want conscription in order to win the war or to embarrass the government and get back in power?

This bill will not open the eyes of those who do not wish to see. It sacrifices the majority of the people who believed in the present government because they were sure that conscription would never be imposed, to the interests of a minority that will always be adverse to this government, no matter what it does.

All these vain and clever excuses are contrary to public interest, Mr. Speaker. It is in the public interest that we be victorious and that we prepare a brighter future. Victory will be achieved through the coordinated action of the allies. Each and every one of us should contribute to the common cause according to his ability. It has been shown that the Canadian war effort should be directed four ways: (1) the production and transportation of war materials, of goods and commodities which our allies cannot produce in sufficient quantity; (2) the maintenance of an army, an air force, and a navy ready to fight outside the country; (3) the maintenance of adequate forces for home defence; (4) the supply of essential civil needs.

Conscription, in theory, and in the feeble measure which I have indicated, may increase the number of men for service outside the country. That would be its only effect, undoubtedly of secondary importance.

On the other hand, Canada will never be able to make a total war effort and at the same time prepare a brighter future for her people, if justice is ignored and if national unity is disrupted. A house divided against itself shall perish. Canada is the result of a covenant freely entered into by her two main racial groups and by her nine provinces. If the sacred union of her citizens is torn asunder, Canada cannot survive.

It has not been proved, and it shall never be proved that conscription can help our country to attain victory and a real peace. On the contrary, it is certain that through its enforcement Canada will be torn asunder, and who knows if the wound would ever heal?

Mr. Speaker, it is because I wish to serve the public interest and my country and because I respect the sincerity of my compatriots that I cannot approve of the principle of this bill.

It is in adversity that a nation finds the energy from which a powerful national life is born. I sincerely hope, Mr. Speaker, that the present period of adversity will be the source of a better understanding among my fellow citizens, enlightened by a true sense of justice and real Canadianism. In such an event, our sacrifices will not have been in vain.

Mr. MAURICE GINGUES (Sherbrooke) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as I wish to comply with the rules, I have scribbled only a few notes with the help of which I shall endeavour to explain briefly to the house and to the country at large my attitude towards the bill now before us.

To understand the present state of mind of the population of my constituency and of my province, it would be well to review concisely the events which have taken place since September, 1939. In 1939, Hitler, the worst gangster the world has ever known, launched his country into a conflict which was to spread all over the world. Almost at once, Canada took her place at the side of the mother country against the common foe. A few weeks later, in the province of Quebec, some people hoping to be returned to power brought about a general election. It is on that occasion that some of our statesmen, who had so well represented the province of Quebec for so many years in the federal arena, came to our people and asked them to accept the principle of participation in the war.

During that campaign, we saw neither the chairman of Club of the Two Hundred of Toronto, nor the leader of the official opposition. The Liberal leaders of our province were the only ones who came, not like demagogues, but like real statesmen and patriots, to face the people and sell them the idea. But we achieved success, Mr. Speaker, because our people were told that we were to have a free, moderate and voluntary war effort. A few months had elapsed when in 1940 parliament was dissolved and we went once more to the people of Canada from one end of the country to the other. We met our electors, met them face to face and stated our policy. Every party leader, even the leader of the opposition at the time, expressed his opposition to the principle of conscripting men for overseas service. We also, from Quebec, expressed once again our opposition to the principle of conscripting men for overseas service. If we have come here, if we have been chosen to voice in this chamber the opinion held by our constituents at home, it is, I repeat, Mr. Speaker, because we told the people that our war effort would be free, moderate and voluntary.

A few months later, however, we went on with the national registration. It was accepted by the province of Quebec as well as by every other section of the country. Some time later, the 1940 Mobilization Act was put into the statute books. The province of Quebec submitted to it as did all the others and responded to the call. It had been understood, however, when this legislation was voted into the statute books, that military training would last thirty days.

A few months later, by order in council,—and I was one of the hon. members of this house who received this information through the newspapers,—training was extended to a period of four months. Another few months later, by order in council again, military service was decreed for the duration. The province of Quebec, Mr. Speaker, the young men in my county gave a generous answer to the call of their country, and yet we are told that we have not done enough and that we are afraid of this conscription measure. If we oppose conscription it is not that we fear it, but rather that we do not believe in the method. We believe in voluntary effort. Our young men's contribution to victory will prove much more efficient than any effort given under coercion.

Mr. Speaker, when I consider the events which have taken place in this country during the last two years, I am forced to conclude that the present government, led by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenize King) had wrought a great miracle, for less than three years ago Canada, an extremely peaceful country, was refusing to vote even a few paltry dollars for its own defence or toward participation in any conflict whatever.

Hardly two years have gone by and Canada is now on a war footing. The youth of the country is up in arms before the foe. They have answered the call everywhere and the government which has accomplished such a feat in our land can be said to have wrought a miracle, Mr. Speaker. We had recourse to a plebiscite a few months ago, we asked the people if they were disposed to release the present government from their commitments to the people as regards conscription for overseas service, so that the government might be responsible only to parliament, to the representatives of the people. I supported this measure at the beginning of the session. I had faith in my leaders and I felt it was my duty to support the legislation. And I am proud of it, not ashamed. I am still less ashamed to have gone before my electors to ask them to give an affirmative answer on the plebiscite. I was satisfied, that evening, when I found that I had obtained very nearly 7,000 affirmative votes. But here again, Mr. Speaker, there were five or six thousand electors in my county who voted "yes" because they had confidence in their representative, because they felt confident that the only vote to be given on conscription would be given here, in the House of Commons, by their own chosen representative, and also because they knew that in voting "yes" they were releasing the government from their commitments as regards conscription and that the latter would then be responsible only to parliament where the question was to be discussed in the light of our needs.

I shall vote against the bill. I shall do so with regret, Mr. Speaker, but I will vote against the bill because it calls for the conscription of men for overseas service. Whenever I have had the opportunity to address any gathering in my province and my constituency, I declared that I was opposed to this measure. My leaders heard me say this and did nothing to stop me. That occurred, I repeat, every time I have had occasion to address a meeting. I said I would never vote for such a measure, not because I fear conscription, but because I do not believe in that method. I want to say to the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen), who was born in my constituency of Sherbrooke, that when I return home, perhaps sooner than I think, and when I meet my fellow workmen in the shops where I was working when the Liberal party selected me as its official candidate, I intend to do so without losing their respect. I wish to spend the rest of my life in my native town. Although I have asked my electors to vote "yes" at the plebiscite, I want to be able, Mr. Speaker, to greet my people, to meet them and to work hand in hand with them in the interests of my constituency, of my province and of my country. I thank you.

Mr. MARTIAL RHEAUME (St. Johns-Iberville-Napierville) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at great length on Bill 80. I shall oppose the measure, for I sincerely believe that the willingness to resort to conscription denotes a lack of confidence in the patriotism of the young men of this country.

When war broke out, in September, 1939, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, stated that we were freely entering the war at the side of England on one condition that there would be no conscription for overseas service. When, in the provincial election of 1939, I visited all the towns of my constituency, which extends over two provincial counties, I asked my constituents to cast their votes in favour of the Liberal party and to lend their whole support to the views outlined by the hon. ministers who had taken part in that campaign, the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe, the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and the hon. Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power).

In the 1940 election, the hon. Prime Minister clearly set out his policy to the electorate and sought approval of his attitude in dealing with the country's war effort. I stated at the time that we had entered the war of our own free will and that there would be no conscription. I also undertook to oppose conscription for overseas service if such a measure was ever passed by any government. The constituents whom I have represented in this house since 1930 honoured me with their confidence and I think I would break my promises to them in supporting this bill. In further justification I need but recall the statements of the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who stated in recent weeks that, since November last, voluntary enlistments have increased from month to month and even beyond his expectations. The hon. Minister of National Defence for Air has likewise stated that this arm of the service had all the men it required, despite the restrictions applied on such enlistments. Then again, the hon. Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) admitted on the floor of the house that over 4,000 sailors could not be taken on strength through lack of training facilities.

Since the outbreak of the war, the Conservative party has been content to accuse the government of inactivity and to level criticism at the various departments of national defence, not excepting that of national war services, and has failed to make a single suggestion of a constructive nature.

Australia refused to enact conscription; yet is there an hon. member of this house who can say that the war effort of that country has not been as efficient, if not more so, than that of any of our allied nations now engaged in the conflict?

During the 1940 elections, the two political leaders pledged themselves not to establish conscription for overseas service. Judging by the attitude taken by the Conservatives of my own riding who supported me during those elections, I understand they did not have any faith in the declarations made by the Conservative party for the purpose of obtaining votes and as a means of getting into power. The Conservatives in the province of Quebec, as well as in the other provinces, gave their support to the Liberal party because they believed in the policy and programme of the right hon. Prime Minister, if I may judge by the three counties on the island of Montreal: St. Lawrence-St. George, St. Antoine-Westmount and Mount Royal which gave the Liberal candidates overwhelming majorities and which had always been Conservative strongholds since their beginning. From what has happened in these three counties, I am in a position to assert that in the province of Ontario and elsewhere a similar change took place, owing to the fact that they believed the right hon. Prime Minister more capable of administering the affairs of the country than the Conservative party.

The Liberal party came into office with a majority never attained by any of the previous governments and I believe that that meant an approval of their platform. In my opinion, the Prime Minister, with such a majority, has a mandate which should give him a free hand in the conduct of the war without his accepting the political suggestions of the opposition.

Many hon. members have declared in this house that the vote of April 27 was a vote for conscription. I agree with the ex-Minister of Public Works when he declared in his speech of June 11 that if it had been asked clearly: Are you for or against conscription, the vote would not have been the same in the other provinces as well as in Quebec. I know that I have obtained over 2,500 "yes" votes in my riding because my electors were convinced that a "yes" vote meant a vote of confidence and not a vote for conscription.

I am sure that if the question had simply been put thus: Are you for or against conscription, there would have been many members outside Quebec who would not have been relieved of their commitments. For my part I have not been relieved of my promises and, even if I had been, I would still vote against the bill. I knew that the electors of my county were against conscription, if I can rely on the vote given in my riding in 1917 when I spoke for the Liberal candidate, who was then sick, during the whole electoral campaign. Only 311 votes were given for the candidate in favour of conscription.

The Liberal party has been accused of raising the conscription issue at every election during the last twenty-five years, but I would say to my hon. friends of the opposition that it was first brought up by the Conservatives during the by-election which was held in Drummond-Arthabaska.

In November, 1910, some political canvassers were going around the country, wearing a sailor's uniform, with a writing-book under the arm, stopping at every house and taking down the name of every boy who was of military age and telling them that if they voted for the Liberal candidate, their sons would be forced to fight in the war and would become cannon fodder. That campaign was financed, as was the 1911 campaign, by the Conservative party. I well remember that some hon. men who now sit in the upper house and on the bench were then saying that shooting holes through the British flag was necessary in order to breathe the air of freedom. The Liberal party has always been too loyal to the British crown to utter such words. I disapprove all extremist policies in Quebec as well as anywhere else. There are some extremists in Ontario also and among them are the chief of the Orange lodge and the minister, Shields. These two men spoke of the province of Quebec in terms of greater violence towards the French Canadians of Catholic faith than the French Canadians themselves would use against the English-speaking people. In Quebec the religious issue has never been raised against anybody in Canada.

Happily, their opinions are not held by all our English fellow-citizens and I am proud to have among my friends many English members of this house. In my division, the English-speaking Canadians are not fanatics, thank God! and live in good understanding with the French-speaking citizens. But why does the Grand Master of the Orange Lodge, relying on calculations of his own, based on the last Canadian census, contend that the Catholics will form the majority in this country in 1975 and that necessarily they should be exterminated? Is it because our forefathers were the first settlers in this country and because our missionaries shed their blood in their courageous devotion to the task of civilizing and evangelizing the Indian tribes? Can Mr. Shields say as much of his ancestors?

Mr. Chairman. I believe that the Catholics of this country are as loyal to the British cause as the head of the Orange lodge. At the time the King and Queen visited Canada, the province of Quebec had no reason to be ashamed of the way the people greeted them. The French-Canadian people of the province of Quebec have welcomed their majesties with as much enthusiasm as the people of any other province.

With regard to pastor Shields, who says that the Roman Catholic church is a racket, I must say to this gentleman that if he were devoting all his energy to stimulating recruiting and good-will between the two races, he would promote national unity to a much higher degree than he has done these last years.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) quoted in the speech he delivered yesterday, a letter signed by all the bishops and archbishops of this country, of which thirty-five are French Canadians, urging Catholics to do their utmost to win the war. I believe that our Catholic clergy has accomplished much more for victory than this pastor Shields with his offensive statements against the Catholic people of this country. Judging him by his writings, he is, in my mind, either a maniac or a lunatic. French Canadians should not be subjected to such insults; they have contributed to victory much more than this idiot will ever do. May I, Mr. Speaker, point out that the publicity that this man is seeking for himself, by exploiting in his neighbourhood prejudices against Catholics, is insulting not only to Catholics in Canada, but to Catholics in England and in every other allied country.

Can it be said that the province of Quebec has not done her share in the present war? Each time the government has appealed to this province, either in connection with a loan or with enlistments, they have met with a ready response.

The report tabled on May 11 last by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) and recorded in Hansard, shows that 24,283 men were called for the four months training period in Ontario, 37,117 in Quebec, 4,920 in Nova Scotia, 3,898 in New Brunswick, 602 in Prince Edward Island, 6,884 in Manitoba, 5,783 in British Columbia, 6,771 in Saskatchewan and 6,695 in Alberta. It is therefore evident that the number of men mobilized in Quebec is greater than that in any other province. The figures show that out of the total number of trainees, 35 per cent join the active force.

Moreover, according to a report published in the press last April, four provinces out of nine had passed their quota. As regards the number of trainees sent to camps, Quebec has 1,336 over her quota, New Brunswick has 260, Saskatchewan, 192, and Nova Scotia, 153, while the other provinces did not provide the required number.

This goes to show that the province of Quebec generously responds to the calls of the war services department. Compared to the number of calls, the proportion of postponements requested and granted in the province of Quebec is lower than in some other provinces. In two provinces only, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia, is the proportion inferior to that of Quebec. The percentage of postponements requested and granted for the province of Quebec is 70·2, while for Ontario it is 77·7, for Prince Edward Island, 84·1, for New Brunswick, 91·7, for Alberta, 93·2, and for British Columbia, 93·5. Would the conscription measure, so highly favoured as the only means to attain a total war effort, give much better results?

All the members of the cabinet, as well as the majority of the hon. members, acknowledge that conscription is not necessary at the present moment, and that it may never be necessary.

Since voluntary enlistments yield all the recruits needed and more than are required to bring the various units to full strength, it is evident that there is no need to resort to compulsory measures in order to increase our war effort in this regard.

The Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Naval Services and the Air Minister have all declared that we have enough recruits to take care of our needs for many months to come. Why then do we need coercion or compulsory service? The government admit themselves that voluntary enlistments are sufficient; they even say that most probably they will be sufficient for a long time according to the man-power still available. Voluntary enlistments are rapidly exhausting the reserve we draw on for our armed forces and, according to the statement of the Prime Minister himself, there is now in the country a shortage of men for our various essential war industries. How then could conscription further our war effort? Neither could it bring up to strength more quickly our various armed forces. Therefore it is a measure which cannot have any effect whatever on our war effort. Its only effect would be rather to create bitterness and dissensions, which would certainly be likely to hamper considerably our war effort.

Nobody can maintain, as I have already said, that conscription of men for overseas service can be a useful and efficient means of saving our country.

Knowing that the people of the province of Quebec are patriots and being certain that this measure is only a symbol forged in the imagination of citizens who think of England before they think of their own country, I cannot blame my province and my constituents because they are opposed to this bill. They know that it is not only useless but detrimental to national unity, which is so necessary to attain a total war effort and to achieve success in the struggle which we have willingly undertaken.

The province of Quebec, as it has been said and repeated, is ready to throw all her energies, all her resources in an effective effort to achieve victory. Quebec is ready to sacrifice everything to save our country and christian civilization from the dishonour which menaces it. To that end she rallies to the rest of the country and, in union, harmony and peace, she will make a truly total effort not through compulsion and force, but through her wise patriotism and her good-will, to bring the tragic struggle which threatens our liberties so seriously to a successful end, so that God may surely crown our efforts with victory.

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Mercier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, much good will come from the present debate on whether the principle of conscription for overseas service should be adopted.

True, we are not all of the same opinion on that question. But the views exchanged during that discussion will, I am sure, dispel a lot of misunderstandings and will contribute to bringing closer the different groups of our population, if practical conclusions are arrived at.

Many believe that conscription of men for service anywhere outside Canada is the only prerequisite of our war effort, and they demand its immediate adoption.

Others believe that this measure is only incidental to our participation in the war and that it is not necessary for the present but that the government must be authorized to put it into effect soon, if circumstances were to warrant it.

Still a third group, also numerous, believe that conscription for overseas service is a useless and vexatious measure detrimental to Canada's war effort and that it should never be imposed.

Arguments, more or less valid according to the views on the matter, are put forward by all sides. And to choose between those conflicting opinions may appear difficult at first for impartial and unprejudiced minds.

The time at my disposal does not allow me to review the arguments so ably developed by both sides. Neither do I intend to discuss with those who would accept either point of view, on condition that their doubtful economic theories be recognized.

The moment is ill chosen to try and upset our whole economic system, and to seek the favour of the people, at this critical hour, with formulas perhaps attractive but in no way reliable, is to say the least out of place.

I would like, however, to correct a wrong impression which the outcome of the plebiscite, held on the 27th of April last, has left in the mind of many persons and which has more deeply marked differences of opinion, as I just said. Since Quebec was the only province to vote negatively on the plebiscite, there seemed to exist a feeling in some quarters that Quebec, or rather the Canadians of French origin, are opposed to the total war effort of the present government.

For those who believe that conscription is a symbol of total war, the fact that Canadians of French origin oppose conscription leads them to doubt our loyalty. I could quote many unkind remarks from articles published in reviews and newspapers with a view to give countenance to the legend that my own people are not as loyal as the other citizens of this country. But that would not improve the good relations which must exist between the different racial groups. Nothing is more unjust, more detrimental to our war effort than the accusations, the insinuations and even the threats levelled against us, particularly since the plebiscite. This suspicion of one section of our population against another is one of the weapons used by our foes in this war, and that weapon is not supplied to our foes by the French Canadians. We French Canadians do not need to dim the loyalty of other people so as to show ours.

So far, in the present war, we have maintained an attitude which is in no wise discreditable; it compares favourably with the stand taken by any other group in this country.

Although we have often been treated unfairly and discriminated against,—I will not say since confederation, but since the beginning of the war—we have nevertheless done our whole duty and proven our determination to play our part in the present conflict, with all the means at our disposal.

During the course of two elections, one provincial and the other federal, the province of Quebec has indicated most clearly its intention to cooperate with the majority.

We voted unanimously for participation in the war; we did so, not for sentimental reasons but after a thorough study of the matter, as the former Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) so eloquently put it the other day.

We have consented to our troops being sent overseas and, if I am not mistaken, a Quebec regiment, made up mostly of French Canadians, was the first to be brought up to strength and to journey to England.

Our young boys are enlisting and they will continue to enlist until final victory, if we only recognize and appreciate the value of their sacrifice. I do not claim glory for what those of my family are doing in this war. But I must say that I have only two sons. They were both students and were preparing a brilliant future, and they both enlisted for service overseas, thus risking their future, because they thought it was their duty toward their country and their fellow citizens so to do. And there are many families in the province of Quebec that could say the same thing I am saying to-night.

But that is not all. War work in all its forms and war loans have met in our province with a warm and enthusiastic welcome. We have complied without murmur with the restrictions and orders contained in some 25,000 orders in council passed since the beginning of the war, most of them having been prepared in good faith, I hope, by officials evidently ignorant of the laws and customs of the province of Quebec.

After the downfall of France, we did not hesitate in the face of additional dangers threatening our country from closer at hand, to support the principle of conscription of wealth and men as applied to the defence of Canada.

Surely it is not the French-speaking members in this house who, by causing obstruction, have delayed the government in their attempt to adopt the necessary measures in connection with our war effort.

Up to the present our manner of behaving has left absolutely no ground for the charges, insinuations and threats directed against us.

We have done our share willingly and generously; nevertheless it must be admitted that we were not invited to participate in this war as partners. I wonder if those who suspect our loyalty would have been willing to do as much under such circumstances.

Knowing the difficulties encountered daily and which we must overcome in order to vindicate even the least of our rights; having in mind our lack of influence and importance in every field of activity; comparing the sacrifices we have already made with the unfavourable treatment given us, unconsciously perhaps, by the majority; no one has the right to cast any doubt on our loyalty, and I claim, Mr. Speaker, that no one can teach us anything about patriotism.

Notwithstanding the remarks made by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand), finance, industry and commerce are practically closed to us. Civil service and army positions are distributed to us with disconcerting niggardliness. If we check the list of all those occupying key positions in the war industries, at the head of government departments and on the staff of new boards organized for the efficient prosecution of the war, I am convinced that our well-meaning English-speaking fellow-citizens will not feel proud when they realize what a small share is allotted to us. Such is not the case in Ottawa only, for the same condition obtains even in the province of Quebec.

You may not believe this, Mr. Speaker, but in certain parts of the province of Quebec, the mass of our workers were required to learn a language foreign to them so as to understand the orders of their unilingual bosses. Not very long ago, signs were posted at the entrance to certain war plants of the province of Quebec and advertisements appeared in the press stating that French-Canadian workers need not apply for employment. "No French-speaking needed" was the notice printed on those posters.

It is claimed that we are neither competent nor qualified to fill important posts in the army, the war industries and the various government bodies specially employed in organizing our war effort. This argument is worthless. I wonder where, in 1939, could be found men skilled in the arts and trades of the present war. All the methods obtaining in this war are new and we all had to acquire our experience from September, 1939, on. The French Canadians were as able as their fellow-citizens to adapt themselves to these new duties.

Much also has been said of these so-called experts who give their services free to the government for the duration of the war, and it seems that we are to be blamed for not having provided such men. One should not fall for that kind of camouflage. All these supermen who carry self-abnegation to such a degree as to be working apparently for nothing are not making such a great sacrifice. Most of them, if not all, are loaned by companies who get war contracts, and until the contrary is proved, I am positive that their salaries in the company books are charged to war contract accounts and that, finally, they receive more from the government than if they were directly employed by it. At any event, on the same terms, the province of Quebec would be able to provide a great many such experts.

I could add indefinitely to the list of these grievances, but what I said of them is, I hope, sufficient proof that our attitude up to now deserves something better than malevolant insinuations. Like the rest of this country, we want to contribute to the extreme limit in this effort.

Let there be an end to the mistrust of which we are the victims; let us be considered as associates and all misunderstandings will disappear between us. National unity and the effective prosecution of the war require good-will and harmony between all the citizens of the country. We shall all fail to do our duty if we do not try to understand one another better. After all, it is our common country that is in danger. We are all called to defend it. If we carry our internal dissensions to the battlefields, we shall certainly endanger the issue of the conflict. A certain degree of good-will and a little more frankness and logic would easily bridge these differences.

I believe the results of the plebiscite are being misinterpreted. The meaning which certain people seek to attach to the "no" and "yes" votes is illfounded. In the mind of certain voters the vote given may have been meant as a vote for or against conscription for overseas service. But that was not the issue placed before the people.

Those of my hon. colleagues who have secured a "yes" vote in their constituencies have not thereby received a mandate to vote for conscription.

[Mr. Jean.]

They have simply been authorized freely to study the subject on its merit without being bound by the promises all parties made during the election campaign of 1940.

I might, for my part, argue that I do not enjoy such a privilege, since the majority of my electors have given a negative answer. But, for the purposes of this discussion, I shall accept the argument of those who contend that we were released by a majority of the people in this country, and I shall avail myself of that liberty to vote as a free man, according to the dictates of my conscience and in furtherance of what I deem to be the interest of the country as a whole.

It has been said time and again that conscription of men for overseas service would be unenforceable in Canada at this time for the following reasons:

1. It has been possible to bring our armed forces up to strength through the voluntary system of enlistment;

2. Military officers who have been consulted in this regard do not want conscripted men in the army recruited for service overseas;

3. The enforcement of such a measure would sow the seeds of discord, destroy forever national unity and wreck our war effort;

4. The need of men at home, for the defence of Canada and the production of munitions and foodstuffs is more pressing than the sending of men overseas.

I could adduce against conscription no better reasons than those which have been given by the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and most of the cabinet members since the opening of this debate.

If I am to judge by all those statements, the government's policy in this connection is well defined, and the government must know the situation after two years and nine months of war.

This discussion has clearly shown that the policy of the government is to refrain from conscripting men for overseas service.

I entirely agree with that policy, Mr. Speaker, and that is why I cannot vote for this bill.

As every one will admit, the only power which the government will secure if Bill No. 80 goes through is the power to enforce conscription for overseas service.

How could I logically agree to the introduction of such a power into our statutes when the government do not wish to use it and tell us that its enforcement would be detrimental to our war effort?

I urge the government to withdraw this bill which they consider as unnecessary. Let them not introduce into our legislation a principle which is questionable to say the least and which others might be tempted to apply should the occasion arise.

Mr. AZELLUS DENIS (St. Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, after the brilliant oration of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), nothing more can be said in evidence of the fact that the bill now before the house is a full and genuine conscription measure for overseas service. But, most amazing to me, not only is this baneful law useless, but it is harmful to our war effort. Rather should the present government bend all its efforts to correct wrongs and breaches of existing laws and regulations, which wrongs and breaches are the true causes of disunion, misunderstanding and apathy. After hearing the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères who, with his customary eloquence, gave a memorable improvisation which will go down in history as a masterpiece of logic and courage, parliament has just realized that it has lost as a minister of the crown one of its wisest counsellors. Man of experience and of good judgment, of duty and of honour, he went so far as to sacrifice his health in claiming the rights of his fellow-citizens of the province of Quebec whose undisputed leader he remains in this house.

The views of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères had been anxiously awaited in all parts of the country and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that no one has been disappointed. Since he has so ably interpreted the feelings of his province and other sections of the country, tokens of admiration have come from every direction. I am pleased to speak in the name of the electors of Saint Denis to tell him how proud we are of him and to declare once more that he enjoys our fullest confidence.

In spite of the conspiracy of silence waged against him, in spite of the flagrant and mysterious reversals of opinion of certain newspapers, his name, his sincerity and his courage will ever remain engraven in the hearts of his grateful fellow-citizens. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenize King) has not yielded to the advice of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères; I regret that he has fallen in the trap set by the imperialists, the Tories and the high finance magnates. I regret that he has been swayed by a press campaign which has induced him to introduce such an inopportune measure. If he expects gratitude from the Tories, imperialists and financiers for this action, he greatly deludes himself. He was wrong in preferring the advice of those who have always been and always will be his adversaries to that of friends who have so frankly helped and supported him throughout his public life.

This measure is premature, Mr. Speaker, for, so far, its necessity has never been demonstrated; on the contrary, every effort has been put forth to prove that it is unnecessary.

A useless measure, the Prime Minister having stated that it will not be enforced.

A useless measure, in view of his statement that he can always invoke the War Measures Act of 1914. How then may we explain his apprehension, lest the summoning of parliament should prove too slow a method in case of an emergency?

I am told that this measure would tend to correct a false impression prevalent among the united nations as to the extent of our war effort. Would they be satisfied with a measure which will not even be enforced? On the other hand, there will be grounds for such an impression once they discover that we are trying to pull the wool over their eyes by adopting useless measures, laws which tend to divide our people. This false impression will become a true impression if the government persists in allowing the newspapers to print what they please, without control or censorship, and to be so bold as to cast doubt upon statements made by allied military leaders, even to belittling the successes of their armies in the eyes of the Canadian people.

Let us read together a statement, chosen amongst a hundred others, which appeared in the Ottawa Evening Journal of June 9, 1942. It is entitled, "That Midway Battle".

I quote from the Ottawa Morning Journal of Tuesday, June 9, 1942, an article under the heading "That Midway Battle":

> Saturday night and all day Sunday the radio proclaimed a great victory by the United States fleet in the vicinity of Midway island, some 1,300 miles from Hawaii.
> This was completely justified by the official statement of U.S. Admiral Nimitz. "Our citizens", he said, "can now repoice that a momentous victory is in the making—Pearl Harbour has now been partially avenged. Perhaps", he added, with a mild pun, "we will be forgiven if we claim we are about 'Midway' to our objective."
> That statement, with a table of enemy losses —two or three Jap carriers sunk, battleships and cruisers damaged—had right of way in the week-end. Then Sunday evening Admiral King held a press conference in Washington, and discussed the Pacific battle cautiously. He would not say the Japanese had been "defeated" although they had withdrawn from the battle.

The outcome "might" decide the course of the war in the Pacific, but the full extent of damage to Japanese ships was not known. American losses, in any event, were relatively light. Monday's dispatches threw little additional light on the affair. The Japanese had suffered heavily, but it was not clear that their plan of campaign had been thrown out of gear, and the battle had been broken off.

We can say, because critics in his own country already have said it, that there was a certain regrettable flamboyancy about Admiral Nimitz's declaration—and let nobody suggest, after Libya, Hong Kong and Singapore, that we aren't competent to detect the flamboyant.

Admiral Nimitz, from the thick of the combat, invited his fellow-countrymen to ring the church bells and hang out the flags, to rejoice in a momentous victory. That was plain enough, and nobody can wonder that the broadcasters "went to town" on the news. But it seems that after a very successful opening phase the battle did not go quite the way of his optimistic prediction—such things have happened before. The enemy got away and contact was lost.

What remains is, however, a substantial victory. The Japanese lost at least two carriers, with their aeroplanes and a destroyer. We are told of no American losses except a destroyer sunk. If the Japanese fleet was headed for Hawaii or Alaska, and now is "limping home" for repairs, as one commentator put it, the affair may turn out to have momentous consequences. But it does appear the language of Admiral Nimitz might have been a bit more restrained, because he built up expectations which events could not sustain.

I wonder if the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) should not examine this statement, instead of presenting useless acts for adoption.

Such a statement, Mr. Speaker, is far from favourable to us, and it does not come from Quebec. In my humble opinion, it should never have been made public, even if punishment is meted out.

The Prime Minister speaks about national unity and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) about the defence of Christianity. How could the government authorize the publication of a speech delivered in Toronto on May 7, 1942, by the Grand Master of the Orange Lodge, Mr. J. W. Carson, and in which he insulted the French-Canadian race and the Catholic church? That statement does not come from Quebec. Such statements and publications are not designed to stir up the enthusiasm and the patriotism of millions of our allies who speak French and profess the Catholic faith.

Instead of presenting useless and detrimental acts for adoption, the government should strive to prevent such statements and publications, if our population is to be encouraged to rise in defence of Christianity, to live in harmony and good understanding and to maintain good relations with our neighbours. I am afraid the harm is done, Mr. Speaker, even if punishment is meted out.

Somebody from Toronto, a man by the name of Shields, who is president of the Canadian Protestant League, said recently in Winnipeg that the Roman Catholic church is the worst "racket" in the world and the most dangerous fifth column that has threatened any country in this war. (Canada, June 12, 1942.)

And it is not the only statement of this nature he has made. Do you think those statements and publications are to be recommended as a means of promoting patriotism and a friendly understanding among our people and among our neighbours and allies, a considerable proportion of which profess the Roman Catholic faith? And I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that those statements are not from the province of Quebec; harm is done even though a penalty be imposed.

Mr. Speaker, since the beginning of this war, I have a feeling that in Canada we have signed an illegal contract; I say illegal, because of the two contracting parties, only a small group shares in the profits, while the remaining Canadians are allowed only the losses. For instance, I can hardly understand how it is that in military district No. 4, almost entirely a French-speaking district, there are at headquarters 148 officers of which only thirty-four are of French-Canadian descent.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame!

Mr. DENIS: I must add that nine out of those thirty-four French-Canadian officers do not speak French.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame!

Mr. DENIS: And that out of those 114 officers of English descent practically all of them speak English only. I find it odd also that very often a stranger has been assigned as commanding officer in the case of regiments that have been mobilized, when in these respective regiments may be found officers capable of fulfilling such duties.

That, and not section 3 of the Mobilization Act, is what hampers our war effort. You cannot, for example, achieve a total war effort by letting dollar-a-year men become all-powerful in the administration and distribution of war contracts, when thousands of small industries, manufacturers and plants are systematically eliminated because they are not big enough to tender for those contracts always extremely large and that only important companies can fill.

It would be so easy to help those small industries in view of the rationing and restrictions, if the government would distribute to them directly small contracts that they can fill or make them participate in some other way in our war effort.

The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) mentioned the other day the deplorable situation of our Canadian hostelries. I would say that garage keepers are also affected, as are automobile dealers and all the manufacturers and producers of non-essential goods. They are all going to be ruined if the government leaves them to the mercy of big contractors who give them work only when they cannot do otherwise.

Instead of following such a course, the government have introduced a conscription measure which is unnecessary, a measure which may mean the sending, unheralded, to any theatre of war, of thousands of mobilized men to whom the solemn promise had been made that they would not be compelled to serve overseas.

That is a direct provocation not only to the French Canadians, but also to the English-speaking Canadians who have been mobilized. The Prime Minister leaves the sword of Damocles hanging over the heads of Canadians, and I do not want to incur the risk of helping him in that, lest another should cut the thread from which it hangs.

I suppose with the utmost energy this measure which, should it go through, may overnight fall into other hands and the enforcement of which would eventually confront me with an accomplished fact, and this without my being aware of it early enough to discuss and oppose it.

If this government want a total war effort, I would suggest that they should remedy whatever defects may now exist rather than enact a conscription measure which instead of remedying those defects will certainly make them worse.

On motion of Mr. McLean (Simcoe East) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 19, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

SITUATION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter which I consider to be of extreme public interest, that is, the Japanese question in British Columbia.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member would move the adjournment of the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, to wit, the Japanese question in British Columbia. I would point out that an hon. member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the nature of the matter. If I consider it in order and of sufficient public importance I ask if the hon. member has the leave of the house. The hon. member has handed me a written statement. It is a matter which I think is of sufficient public importance; therefore I would ask: Has the hon. member the leave of the house to present the motion he is now making?

And leave being granted:

Mr. O'NEILL: Several days ago, Mr. Speaker, I rose in the house to ask a question with respect to the Japanese situation. At that time I was ruled out of order, which ruling I accepted as gracefully as possible; for I believe I was out of order on that occasion, though I had submitted the questions to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and the minister was quite prepared to answer them. I did not receive the written answers to those questions until to-day, and I find them very unsatisfactory.

I might direct the attention of hon. members to the fact that the people of British Columbia are extremely disturbed about the way the Japanese question is being handled, and when I say extremely disturbed I mean just that. I should like to quote from an editorial which appeared recently in the Kamloops newspaper, which, by the way, though not holding the same political beliefs as the government, is quite a friendly paper. It carried a long editorial with respect to the Japanese question, which concluded with these words:

> Are Canada and Japan at war? We thought so in British Columbia, but Ottawa is a long way away. What kind of explosion in British Columbia is it going to take so that it may be heard all that distance?

That is the feeling of the people there. I receive communications all the time to the effect that the Japanese camps in northern British Columbia are not properly guarded. They say, for instance, that there is only one gun in a tent in which there are several guards. For that gun there are twelve rounds of ammunition, so that even if you got a Jap with each round of that ammunition there would still be plenty of them left to outnumber the guards in the camps. Things like this do not tend to allay the anxiety of the people, especially since the landing of the Japanese on the Aleutian islands.

Recently when the 2nd battalion of the Rocky Mountain Rangers were on parade in Kamloops and were being instructed by their officer, Japanese were sitting there, listening to the instructions being given by the officer to the men in his battalion. I say to the house that that is not a proper condition to exist. The Japanese in those camps in the northern section of British Columbia are becoming more arrogant every day. As a matter of fact one cannot fire those fellows as he would a man in an ordinary camp who refused to do something he was told to do. In an ordinary road construction camp the foreman may fire a man, but he cannot do that in a Japanese camp. The Japanese have now got to the point where they say they will not do something, and the foreman cannot force them to do it. Then they insist upon removal of the foreman, and in one instance, the foreman was removed.

We want a man at the head of the security commission in British Columbia of the type of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who, speaking the other day in the house, said, "If I had my way about it, and a man refused to do what he was told, I would intern him." Some 300 of them are now interned at Petawawa. That is the kind of man we need in British Columbia to handle the Japanese situation—someone who is prepared to do what he thinks the situation demands.

I am told, on what I consider to be most reliable authority, that Japanese are now on strike in the North Thompson area. They are on a sit-down strike. That is not a proper condition to have in this country. How long would you and I last if we were in Japan, and carried on like that? How much longer are we going to pussyfoot with those yellow devils in the west? That is what I would like to know.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I think it is a good thing the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) has raised this question, if only for the purpose of ventilating it. Hon. members will recall that on several occasions since Japan entered the war I have discussed the Japanese situation in the house. I have asked questions, and I have warned the government, particularly in the earlier days of this movement of Japanese, that they were running the greatest risk of trouble if they looked upon the whole area of British Columbia east of the protected area as a district into which the Japanese might percolate at will. It is true that those warnings gradually had some effect. But the people I represent, particularly those in the Okanagan and in the valleys contiguous thereto, are still looking with a considerable amount of apprehension to what may develop at any time because of the truculence of some of the Japanese who are being allowed to reside for a time in those areas.

Two or three hundred of them have been placed in camps along the side of the Hope-Princeton road. When they first took up their residence in those camps the people of the locality, going out to see what they were doing and whether they were accomplishing anything, were shocked to find one guard lying on the side of the road—within touch of his rifle, true, but the rifle not being in his hands. So far as I am aware that guard was the only one at the camp. At that time work was supposed to be under way for the purpose of completing the road. There was no road machinery, and the Japanese were there with long-handled shovels, taking a shovelful of dirt, walking several yards with it and throwing it over the edge. I do not emphasize that point particularly because there are difficulties in connection with providing road machinery. From the answer to the question I asked the Minister of Labour the other day I presume the government has in hand the acquiring of all available road machinery in these difficult days. But several times over, during the earlier part of this difficulty, I was told by ministers that the interior of British Columbia must bear its share of this trouble. The inhabitants of the interior fully realize that; but what the government has apparently been unable to realize is that through that area, the fruit-growing section of British Columbia, there has been for years past a collection of Japanese. These were people of Japanese origin, some of whom were born in this country and some who were not. When the trouble broke out I believe a certain number of them were removed for internment. That matter however has been treated secretly, and I cannot assert it with confidence. I believe there were some 750 Japanese in that interior part with which I am connected. The inhabitants living up there did not see any reason why the Japanese should be allowed to leave the protected area and wander in by day, by night, by automobile, by bus and by train, and take up residence within that area. That they have done so there is no doubt whatsoever, but what their numbers are is hard to come by.

When I was home at Easter I made all possible inquiries to endeavour to ascertain how many had so come in. I found it was quite impossible to do so, because of course the Japanese are not desirous of making known how many came in. But there are so very many more Japanese faces seen on the streets of those towns and villages, and seen on the roads and the farms, that it is quite obvious that a very considerable influx took place at that time.

The desire of the government has been to deal as best it can with the 24,000 or 25,000 Japanese which it was their purpose to remove from the protected area. As no other part of Canada in those earlier days showed any great desire to receive these Japanese residents, the people I represent could not see that when they already had placed about 750 of these people they should have others numbering four figures—and if this had not been stopped it might have been five figures—forced upon them. Because to the oriental mind the Okanagan valley and the industry carried on therein is a desirable haven.

The difficulty in that connection is now in the hands of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and to that point I shall allude for a moment. For many years past it has been the custom for a farmer growing truck or vegetable crops to enter into what is known as a crop share agreement with those who are ready to do the labour. Those labourers have to a great extent in past years been Hindus, Chinese, and Japanese. No difficulty was experienced with respect to the crop share agreement between a white farmer and a Japanese who in past years had entered into such an agreement. But when these newcomers of Japanese origin showed their desire to enter into crop share agreements with the white farmers, it became evident that they could do so only if they received permits from the Minister of Justice under order in council 4657, I believe it was. When I had primed myself with certain information with regard to these crop share agreements I asked the Minister of Justice how many permits he had issued. His answer was "none". My information is that crop share agreements have been entered into by Japanese who were newcomers, contrary to the order in council, and in considerable numbers. At the moment the Minister of Justice, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is making an investigation.

In the constituency of the hon. member who raised this question there have been alleged instances—I use that word because I have not definite proof—where intermediaries have acquired land which has subsequently been occupied, though it may not be owned at the present time, by Japanese who have come in from the protected area. If that be true, and it is being looked into, it is a definite infraction of the order in council that is being administered by the Minister of Justice.

These are things at which the people I represent look with a great deal of concern. At the back of their minds there is the thought that if these people are allowed to enter, to occupy, to lease and perhaps eventually to own land, there will be a repetition of what happened in the state of California in connection with foreign labour. The Italians came into their fruit valleys in an insidious manner, and now they own the valleys completely. There will be a repetition of what has occurred in another part of my constituency where the Doukhobors are located. They acquired a piece of land here and a piece there because of their habits they frightened white possessors of land away from the neighbourhood, and the areas are becoming more and more Doukhobor year by year. That is the fear at the back of the minds of the population of my riding. I think it is high time the matter was discussed in this house and that the government definitely recognized this real fear which exists.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminister): Mr. Speaker, in view of the introduction of this subject into the house this afternoon I consider it my duty to warn the government with regard to some aspects of the Japanese situation. My views regarding the Japanese have been well known for many years. In 1933 I warned the country and the government of that day that the Japanese had the best maps of our shores and harbours, but I was looked upon by some as being just a racial hatred monger, if I may use that word. Apparently there are many in this country who do not yet realize the exact situation. There should be no pussyfooting about this question of moving Japanese from the coast. The United States, I believe, moved over 110,000 Japanese from their coast in a few weeks. In my opinion it was a mistake to put this matter in Canada under the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). We should have taken drastic action and put it in the hands of the military.

I know there are those who will say that repercussions will occur in Japan. I do not know how many realize it, but in Japan there are really two governing bodies, if one may use that expression. There is the emperor and his government, and then there are the naval and military. The military are on their own. Anything that may happen to Japanese in this country—and I would have them handled kindly—will not be taken note of by the military of Japan. As a matter of fact, knowing the Japanese as I do, I think we should warn the emperor now that he and he alone will be held responsible for any atrocities committed on our soldiers, our nurses and others. The emperor is the only one who has any authority over the Japanese, military or otherwise; in fact he is looked upon as a god.

The other day two Japanese were picked up on the streets of Vancouver while in possession of murderous weapons, and they are still there. My chief reason for speaking at this time is to warn the government as to the situation in the labour camps in the interior. Outside of flying, there are only three ways to get into British Columbia—the two single line railroads and the one highway. At night there are no guards whatsoever at these camps. You may say that there is a curfew law, but who is going to enforce it? I believe it is unsafe to leave these camps in charge of just a foreman. The government should inspect them now and see that sufficient guards are placed there in case anything should happen in the future, and so prevent possible sabotage

Some time ago there were those who laughed at the statement that attempts might be made to invade this continent. No one knows what is in the minds of the Japanese, or what may happen. If anything should happen, however, I am one of those who believe that some of the Japanese in British Columbia will be made aware of it in advance. There is not a great deal to prevent them from going out from the camps and destroying the railroads, thus cutting off communication with the province and preventing the sending in of men or ammunition to the Pacific coast, except by air.

This condition is too serious to leave as it is. I am not going to advocate the method adopted by Mexico, but that country certainly went about it in a very practical way. Mexico simply put up notices in the different areas on her coast to the effect that any Japanese found there after ten days would be shot, and in eight days none were to be found. There are still many Japanese on the streets of Vancouver, in the Fraser valley and at other places in British Columbia. The government should take a more serious view of the entire situation, especially with a view to preventing sabotage.

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, for once the British Columbia members do not seem to be working together.

[Mr. Reid.]

I am sorry I had no idea that this matter was coming up, because having just returned from British Columbia I have enough information upstairs in my office to convince even this government that they should take some action in connection with the Japanese. I wonder if Prime Minister Churchill has come over here to inquire if we know whether we are at war with Japan. When we from British Columbia brought up this matter some time ago we were scoffed at, even by members of the government. It was intimated that we did not know what we were talking about. Probably these gentlemen have changed their minds by now. General Stuart, one of our outstanding military men, has been sent out to the coast. We told you what would happen in the Aleutian islands, but it would appear we were not listened to attentively enough.

Last week I was driving along Hastings street in Vancouver and I stopped my car to go in to buy a package of cigarettes. When I came out a friend who was with me asked me why I did not get the cigarettes. I cannot say to you, sir, what I said to him, but I did tell him that some member of the so-called security commission must have had an interest in that building, because the store was still being operated by a Jap. They are to be seen every day on the streets of Vancouver. There were over 700 Japanese on Lulu island that day, which is in the immediate vicinity of the only two airports in Canada which are available to defend the Pacific coast.

There was another member from British Columbia with me on the train coming back. At Schreiber, Ontario, they picked up a carload of Japanese. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was taking a trip out west his car would be placed at the front of the train. About three weeks ago the Governor General had the same experience when travelling across Canada. A carload of Japs was picked up and placed at the rear of the train behind the observation coach. I am just mentioning this to show that something ought to be done to take care of these our most dastardly enemies. Do we realize or not that these people are of the origin of a country at war with us? There was a whole carload coming back to work in sugar beet production somewhere in Ontario. Their average age was twenty-two. We have been in the war with Japan since the seventh of December last, but just on Monday and Tuesday of this week these same Japs were permitted to take pictures all along the railroad, of any of our defences, and of anything being shipped as part of our war effort, and we watched them take those pictures. Do we realize that we are at war with Japan?

We are dependent upon the security commission which we have in British Columbia to act as guard for us. Just to-day I got a letter by airmail in connection with the strikes there referred to by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill). One lonely old temporary mounted policeman, over sixty years of age, armed with a rifle and ten shells, acted as guard when the Japs went on a two-and-a-half-day sit-down strike. They are openly defying us. I am told that the security commission has this matter in charge. We begged the national defence department to see that proper guards were put over these Japanese.

There is not a military man, so far as I am aware, and so far as the people of British Columbia are aware, taking any interest whatsoever in this situation in British Columbia. We have not a military man attached to the three-man security commission. We have a spruce maker. I do not like to admit it when I am wrong, but I commended the appointment of the gentleman who is chairman of that commission. He is an excellent Canadian, and a splendid business man, I presume, because he has acquired a good deal of this world's goods, but he knows no more about how to handle the Japanese or to remove them than he does about flying an aeroplane, and I regret to say that I commended his appointment. I am sure the government does not realize how serious conditions are in British Columbia or it would not permit them to exist. We have heard a great deal about unity in Canada, but unity does not consist of keeping only one province in unity. The situation in British Columbia is very serious, and as the hon. member for Kamloops said, we are not going to permit it to continue much longer.

The Ottawa Journal of Wednesday, June 17, says that the federal government is ready to bring Japanese from British Columbia to Ontario. It is very kind of Ontario to agree to accept them. The Ottawa Journal goes on to say that the minister has given a guarantee that on the cessation of the war these Japanese will be removed from Ontario. We people of British Columbia are not asking; we are demanding, where these Japanese are going to be removed to. I am not blaming Ontario or any other province for not wanting them, but I am warning this government that it will never put those Japanese back in British Columbia. The government might just as well face that. We are through asking and requesting. We are now demanding, and when a minister of the crown states that these Japanese will be removed from Ontario on the cessation of the war we are entitled to know where they are to be removed to.

We have had to fight and fight even to get these Japanese moved out of the defence areas in British Columbia. Last Friday there were at least forty Japanese families living within eighteen miles of the main power plant on the Pacific coast. This so-called security commission tells us that it is doing its best, that it has to provide a proper place to send these Japanese to, and then it puts them alongside the two trans-Canada highways mentioned by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). As another member and I were coming from British Columbia last week I saw these Japanese working right along the railroad—no, not working, leaning on the fence and watching us go by. Of course, they are not working. They know that to date they have had us bluffed. But there are not enough yellow men in the whole of Japan to bluff the people of British Columbia. If they can bluff this government, they cannot bluff us in that province. We are demanding action.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, for many years members from British Columbia have been fighting an up-hill battle on this Japanese question. I realize that the members of the house at large know fairly well the picture at the present time. There is no doubt that the situation is extremely difficult, difficult for the government and difficult also for the people of British Columbia. It has become much more critical recently because the Japanese have made their first landing on north American territory, in the Aleutian islands. No one knows whether this means an attempt to invade the western coast of Canada and the United States, or whether it is merely a nuisance attack on these islands.

Just a week ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) was good enough to give me—and I presume it was given to all the members from British Columbia—a statement of the situation at the present time, and it will help the house to get the complete picture if I give some of these figures. They show that at the beginning of this exodus from the protected coastal area in British Columbia there were 23,480 Japanese in that province, and that of these, to date only 4,362 have been moved outside that province; that is about one-sixth of the total. Of the 4,362, 2,053 have gone to Alberta, 920 to Manitoba, and 162 to Ontario—a total of 3,135—to work on sugar beet projects. Then 862 have gone to various parts of Canada under special permit. I presume that includes the Japanese who have gone to Premier Hepburn's farm and to other places to do domestic work, and so on.

Incidentally it is hardly fair for the cities of eastern Canada to take the stand that they will not allow any Japanese to come within their boundaries, yet that stand has been taken by the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and I do not know how many others. The councils of these cities have passed resolutions that they will not allow any Japanese whatsoever to enter their cities.

Then eighteen Japanese have gone to a mission school in Assiniboia, Saskatchewan, fifty to industrial projects at Nicholson, Ontario, and 297 have been sent to internment camps.

In addition, the Minister of Labour told us the other day that an additional 4,000 were to be sent to Indian schools, although I believe that even one of these schools is situated in British Columbia.

This statement also shows that last week, on June 12, there were still in greater Vancouver just about half the number of Japanese who were in British Columbia when this movement started, the figure being 11,563.

Various plans are set out as to where some of these Japanese can be moved, but even when all those plans have been taken into consideration the statement shows that no plans whatever have been worked out yet for 2,930 of these Japanese. In other words, unless there is some explanation, it would appear that they may remain on the coast.

It is easy to criticize the British Columbia security commission. I do not agree with all that they have done, and I know they have made mistakes, but at the same time I suppose they deserve at least some credit for what they have accomplished to date. They have undertaken a very difficult job, a job of a type that has never been done in Canada before, and they deserve credit for what they have accomplished. At the same time I think it was unsound for the government to wash its hands of responsibility for this job and turn it over to civilians. The government should have remained in actual charge of the movement of Japanese from the Pacific coast rather than delegating citizens to do the work for it, and I suggest that from now on the government assume the actual management of the movement of these Japanese people.

In conclusion, I have two suggestions to make. I think the government will have to set up towns for these Japanese people. That has been done in the United States; and it was obvious to me from the beginning that sooner or later Canada would have to establish towns to which Japanese who are not placed otherwise could be removed. The sooner this is started, the sooner the problem will be settled.

[Mr. Green.]

The other suggestion is this. It is neither safe nor is it fair to keep these Japanese in British Columbia. Under present plans by far the larger number will remain there. They have spilled over from the protected area into the ridings of Yale and Kamloops, the hon. members for which have spoken to-day. Japanese nationals—not British subjects—are working on highway projects beside the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways, astride both main lines through the mountains of British Columbia, where, if there should be an attempted invasion, they could do a great deal of harm. To me it has always seemed poor business to have so many of these Japanese nationals working in these vital spots. So I urge upon the government that the objective be to get every person of Japanese origin right out of British Columbia just as quickly as possible.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I had not intended to take part in the debate this afternoon, but when the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) mentioned that last week the Japanese had cameras on a train and were taking pictures along the route, I looked up in Hansard of January 29, 1942, page 131, the question I asked on this point. I said:

I should like to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health a question which I understand comes under his department. Has the government taken away all receiving and transmitting sets, cameras and firearms from all the Japanese residing in Canada?

The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) replied:

That would not come under my department. The only connection I have with that matter is the fact that I acted as chairman of a conference between certain gentlemen who came down here from British Columbia and a number of permanent officials of various departments in Ottawa. The question of firearms, cameras and receiving sets was discussed at the conference and a recommendation made to the cabinet. The Prime Minister issued a statement in regard to receiving sets and cameras, but whether or not actual action has been taken by the mounted police upon that enunciation of policy I am not able to say at the moment.

I think the Prime Minister should tell us whether any action has been taken, and if so, what action.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Long ago.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then why have they got the cameras? That is what I want to find out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So do I.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I am glad that the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) brought this matter up, but I am sorry he did not give us some notice in order that we might have prepared the data which many hon. members from British Columbia have and would have been glad to put on the record. I can only speak casually, out of recollection, instead of having the proven facts before me.

A good deal of trouble was caused in the earlier stages of this situation by the long delay in handling it. There was too much—as one hon. member called it—pussyfooting. There was considerable ground for the suspicion that the Japanese had friends at Ottawa that accounted for the long delay in, and the reluctance to do anything as regards moving them. It has even been suggested that the fishing boats would not have been seized had it not been for the action of the Americans who, if they did not actually do it, at least poked up the Canadian authorities to do it.

Then the question was, what to do with these men, a great many of whom were fishermen and thoroughly informed on the coastal situation. As I say, there was considerable delay. One hon. member has stated that United States authorities moved over a hundred thousand Japanese in short order, but we have not got all ours away yet, and he wondered why. Does he really not know? If not, I will tell him. It is time that the public and the house were told. Because there are two officials at Ottawa, deeply entrenched in the government offices, whose souls seem to be bound up in the prosperity and happiness of the Japanese in British Columbia. I think I should even name one of them who was brought here from British Columbia and has been given a prominent position in an office here. His name is a byword and a reproach in British Columbia for his open and passionate advocacy of the Japanese, their rights and their wrongs and their privileges. He was a member of a faculty of the university there and he has been lent by them to give instruction and information—first-hand information—to the Department of External Affairs, where he is in the very best position to have early information of any steps likely to be taken against his friends, the Japanese.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend is alluding to a member of the Department of External Affairs—he has not mentioned his name but he has said everything else it is possible to say—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Two of them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Two of them, very well—I wish to say this, that so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned, I will take complete responsibility for everything that is being done there in relation to the Japanese. There are gentlemen in the Department of External Affairs—fortunately—who have humane feelings in their breasts, which they are entitled to entertain, but I wish to say to my hon. friend that the possession of these feelings has not in any particular adversely influenced their judgment, nor has any members of the department dictated its policy.

Mr. NEILL: I am sure that the Prime Minister as Secretary of State would not allow anybody to dictate his policy to him, but I do say that his advisers are biased—I think he will permit me to say that—the men to whom he naturally turns for information about the oriental situation in British Columbia are biased.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that all the circumstances to which he has alluded have been taken into account by myself and others of the department. The gentlemen whom he has in mind are not in the department as advisers on the Japanese question. They have their own views, but our judgment is formed independently.

Mr. NEILL: Well, then, what are they doing there? Why were they brought from British Columbia?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They were not brought for the purpose of advising on Japanese affairs. They were brought here because of the many questions which have to be dealt with in the Department of External Affairs, because they were men with trained minds, to whom important matters could be entrusted.

Mr. NEILL: I am not going to bandy words with the Prime Minister. I am not in a position to do so. Perhaps I had better confine myself to saying that that is a very generally held opinion in British Columbia. This man was always ready, in letters to the press, and speeches, and one thing and another, to boost the supposed necessity of certain rights for the Japanese: "Why not give them votes," and so on; "they are British subjects". I can only repeat that unfortunately there is that coincidence between his being brought here quite recently and the knowledge that he does hold these views of the situation. As to the other man, the Prime Minister does not refer to him, but the situation is nearly the same as far as he is concerned.

I want to pay a tribute to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Although working under a considerable handicap, he has done his part in this matter as far as he could; and as the hon. member for Kamloops said, whenever there was occasion to put his foot down he put it down, and when these people staged an incipient revolt he said, "They will be interned", and they were interned next morning. That is the kind of bold policy that we require. But he has been handicapped by the officials over there as well as some of those here. It is a hard thing to handle, because these chaps about whom we are talking have not been interned, except, of course, a number of them who became rebellious.

Under the labour commission they were paid 25 cents an hour, but they had to pay their board and contribute something toward the keep of their wives, so that by and large they figured that they did not have much left, whereas if they went on a sit-down strike, or if they were insolent to their guards, they were liable to be interned. So that the worst that could happen to them would be to be interned, and then they would get 20 cents a day and would not have to work at all. When they are interned they can devote their energies to making representations to whatever nation represents them—I am not sure whether it is Spain—submitting their complaints to that representative, and if they do not get the treatment and the food to which they think they are entitled under the Geneva convention, they have an excuse to grumble. They can say that they do not care whether they go to school or not, because the worst that can happen to them is to be interned and therefore they are better off. That, I admit, has handicapped the minister.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) said that there was considerable discontent in British Columbia with the gentleman who has been handling the security commission. I have not the time to look up the facts now, but a few weeks ago I quoted a case where the Japs had engaged, not in any sit-down strike, but in open revolt in the immigration buildings in Vancouver. They tore away everything that was tearable and threw it out of the windows; they broke windows and threw out the frames and everything else that was movable. The disturbance had to be suppressed by soldiers, who came out with their bayonets, and when the Japs saw this they collapsed. But when the matter came to be commented on by the chairman of the commission he merely dismissed it with a wave of his hand and said that it was nothing more than a demonstration of a spirit of good humour and playfulness—exuberance, he called it. I suppose, if they had dropped bombs on the place, or if they had inflicted injury on the guards, it would have been regarded as playfulness just the same. He pooh-poohed the whole thing as if it were merely a spirit of good humour and raillery. That is the way he described it, but that was not the way it was described by the people in British Columbia.

There are three things that I should like to urge upon the government at this time. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will correct me if I am wrong; but he wrote to me the other day to the effect that in view of complaints which I, in common with others, had made with regard to the inadequacy of the guards and the handicap under which they were operating, the whole matter would be looked into. There was no earthly hope of maintaining proper supervision with three men bearing rifles having to look after 300 men. These Japs could easily get round these men, ask for a match or something of the sort, and stick a knife into them. What control would three men have over 300 under such circumstances? I brought the matter to the attention of the minister, and he said he would endeavour to have a senior official of another department sent there to investigate the situation, because these guards do not care to talk. If the situation gets abroad, the first thing you know, a newspaperman comes on the scene and asks the guards questions. He will ask a guard what he knows about the situation and, if the guard is not a fool, he says, "I know nothing." That is easily understood; his job is at stake, and while he may talk to someone else, he will certainly not discuss matters if he is afraid that he may get into trouble. It was proposed that a senior official be sent out to talk to these men, to get them by themselves and elicit the actual facts. If that was done—and I hope it was—then I suggest it is about time we had a report on what took place.

The next suggestion I wish to make is with regard to the police force. I submit that a larger police force should be placed in these camps. It is altogether inadequate to have three men guarding 300—300 men wandering about loose. I suppose the guards sleep sometimes, and that would mean that if they worked in three shifts, only one would be on duty at a time. If this were a guard of honour it would be all right, but this is war, and these are brutal, cruel people. There may be some good ones, but we do not know which is which. There may be some men there who mean us no harm, but there are undoubtedly others who are there for a deliberate purpose which is injurious to the country. We cannot therefore afford to play with the thing. It would be all right if we were not at war, but under present circumstances, where these men are less than a quarter of a mile from a bridge which could be blown up, cutting British Columbia off from the east, the matter becomes one of very grave importance.

Following the remarks of other members, the third point on which I wish to speak for just one moment is this. I have already referred to it, but I cannot too soon reiterate it now so that it will not be said afterwards that the government did not know about it. It is the feeling of the people in British Columbia, and it would be the feeling of the people in the rest of the country I am sure, if they were wise and informed, that at the close of the war these men should not be sent back to British Columbia but should be expatriated. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) talks about feelings of humanity, but I suggest that our duty is first to the people of Canada. This has been a canker all along, and it will become worse and worse—it is nothing but a canker in the heart of the country. These people are breeding rapidly, and they have but one mind: first and last they are Japanese. This is the time to take the necessary action in regard to them, when there are but 22,000 or 23,000, and not when we are overrun with 200,000 or 300,000.

I would impress upon the minister the importance of looking into these three points that I have brought up: first, a definite report on conditions; second, with regard to increasing the police force; and, finally, the question of disposing of these Japanese at the end of the war. I suggest that we should make up our minds now and prepare for the post-war situation, because I do not think we should contemplate for one moment sending these Japanese back to British Columbia. We should expatriate them to Japan at the end of the war.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I would say to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) that had I known the discussion was to come up this afternoon, I would have had more facts before me.

Mr. GREEN: None of us knew.

Mr. MITCHELL: Nevertheless I am not ashamed; in fact I am proud of the progress we have made in removing the Japanese from British Columbia to other parts of Canada. The problem is directly under the jurisdiction of the British Columbia security commission. I do not know the politics of the members of the commission; I do not even know the politics of the advisory council, but I think hon. members will agree with me that it was a sound decision, when the movement of Japanese had to be made, to set up a commission on the ground, 3,000 miles away, with the necessary power to undertake major policy in this regard for the government. I think time will vindicate that decision. Of course, we may reach the stage where it will be more practical, when the movement is completed, to have it under the direction probably of the Department of Labour or of some other department with a senior civil servant in charge, but I think credit should go to that commission. It was a job which many would not like to undertake, and as I sat here this afternoon I wondered that we had moved a single Japanese.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why?

Mr. MITCHELL: For this reason, that everybody takes a parochial point of view. When we first started to move the Japanese no province wanted them. What would my hon. friends in British Columbia say if we wanted to move all the Germans in eastern Canada to British Columbia?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If it were for national defence it would be undertaken.

Mr. MITCHELL: Wait until the time comes, but do not forget this: it will not be said about me that I did not act in the traditional British way with regard to these Japanese. It is not going to be written on the pages of this country's history that I treated these Japanese in any way different from the treatment that is accorded persons in the same situation throughout the British commonwealth. Let the Japanese do what they will; let the Germans do what they will; but I hope that this government and this country will uphold the true traditions of the British people in matters such as this.

The hon. member for Kamloops said that the men were dictating the policy of the camps. While I have anything to do with the matter, as long as the foremen act decently they will not be dictated to by the men in these camps. Only the other day we had a strike in one of the camps because they wanted a foreman removed. That was the camp where they were put on two meals a day—two good meals, might I say—and through that policy we were able to straighten out the difficulty.

I am not going to say to the House of Commons that we shall not have trouble in these camps. You can not have large bodies of men, whether Japanese, Canadians or what have you, without having occasional outbreaks. I think I should say also that of course we have had difficulties. Only the other day four thousand German prisoners came to New York to be interned in this country, on very short notice, and we have been confronted with difficulties of this kind. At the moment we have not sufficient space in our internment camps, though within the next few days we hope to have accommodation available to take care of another seven hundred men.

I am just answering these points as they were brought up. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) said something about seeing men going to the beet fields in western Ontario, and that some of them had cameras. With regard to these people I would say that they volunteered to go there, and according to my reports they are doing a good job. Let us be fair and decent about the matter. Goodness knows there is a terrific shortage of labour in the beet fields of this country; and if these men behave themselves and work as they should, I do not think we should raise any objection to things like that. I might also say how difficult the removal of these people is made when they are painted in the colours in which some hon. members painted them this afternoon. When my department and the security commission go to the provincial governments in order to arrange the removal of the Japanese from British Columbia to the other provinces, things like this make it difficult not only for them but also for ourselves to carry out this policy. At the moment two members of the British Columbia security commission are in conference with the government of Ontario endeavouring to arrange to remove Japanese families from British Columbia to the farms of this province. For my part I hope that can be worked out; it will be a constructive step. The hon. member for Fraser Valley laughs, but I want to say to him that any fool can spend money. This government could have put these people on a rock pile in Alberta, we will say. That is not clever. Again my hon. friend laughs. I would rather see these people spread over the country, working at productive employment; I should prefer that even to have them working in the road camps which British Columbia wanted to build in order to complete their road system. You cannot have it both ways. You cannot have your roads built with the Japanese in Ontario; they must be in British Columbia. That is the only way you can build roads there. You cannot argue both ends against the middle, as some hon. gentlemen have been trying to do this afternoon.

I think I have covered the matter sufficiently. There was a point raised by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) with respect to the Japanese having intermediaries purchase land for them. At the moment an investigation is being made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to see if this is being done; and, if it is, steps will be taken to correct the situation.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

In conclusion, I just want to say that I am informed by the British Columbia security commission that they hope the movement will be cleaned up within the next six weeks. I want to say also to the Japanese government that we welcome any investigation by the representatives of the Spanish government in this country, who at the moment are looking after the interests of Japan here, or by the International Red Cross. I think, after that investigation is made, our treatment of these people will be found to compare favourably with the best treatment of any interned aliens in the world, and we should be proud of that too. I hope that may be written into the pages of our history, because, after all is said and done, we have some of our own flesh and blood in Japan, and we must not forget that. As I have said before, I know the Japanese; I fought with them in the last war. When it comes to ruthlessness there is not a nation on the face of the earth that can compare with the Japanese. But let it be said of us that at least we set them an example, so that our young men in the Straits Settlements and in Japan may get the treatment we think they should get. Let it never be said that an excuse for the ill-treatment of those young men of ours might be made of the way in which we treated the Japanese in this country. I think that is a practical approach to the problem; I believe what I have said is sound, and I think we might well be proud of the way we have undertaken this very difficult problem, under extremely severe and sometimes might I say, unfair criticism.

Mr. GREEN: Some time ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced that he hoped negotiations might be carried through for the exchange of Japanese and Canadian nationals. Has any headway been made in those negotiations?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the Prime Minister could tell us.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): It is with some hesitation that I intrude into this discussion any views I hold with regard to this matter. In the first place, we are all more or less unprepared to discuss an important matter such as this at short notice, especially those of us who have no official information. Let me say at once to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that with respect to the humaneness of the attitude of this government, I think the people of Canada will sustain him in the principle he is endeavouring to enunciate. It must not be said that we departed from the spirit of British fair play with respect to a matter of this nature, not so much because of fear of reprisals, which must be an important and almost a dominant factor in dealing with a matter of this kind but, if I may say so, for our own self-respect. I do not think it should be ever urged that because the Japanese are brutal, because they do not obey the laws and instincts of humanity, we should descend to the same level.

Having said that, let me say that I do believe the administration approached this problem with a good deal of hesitation and delay. I do not believe even the boldest spokesman for the government would say that they adopted a great deal of courage in dealing with this matter at its inception. There must have been in the minds of the administration, those who had studied this question, the knowledge that once Japan was at war with the united nations, we would have to be prepared for the worst with regard to what might happen on the part of Japanese nationals within our own territorial limits. Nevertheless I think the administration dallied with the matter. Finally a policy was established. I do not know who gave birth to it, but at the start it gave promise of developing into a method whereby a solution might be reached. That policy was the establishment of a security commission on the spot; and, looking at the matter as dispassionately as one can, I think the basis of the policy was sound, nor up to the moment have I heard anything which would merit condemnation of the theory behind that policy. But I will say that from the information which has reached me and from all the information that has been placed on record by hon. members from British Columbia, the security commission either found it difficult to act promptly and effectively or did not so act for other reasons.

I suggest to the government that there should be given to the people of British Columbia, our own flesh and blood, a feeling of security with respect to the possibilities that may eventuate from the presence of these Japanese there. This just cannot be done by the methods which I understand are in vogue. For instance, I am told there are three guards in a camp of 300 men, one guard on duty at a time. He carries one rifle and twelve rounds of ammunition. Why, simply to state this is to bring ridicule on the means adopted by the security commission to attain the ends sought.

Let the Minister of Labour, in whose charge this matter rests—although I believe five different departments of government have had something to do with it—set up a force sufficiently large and strong, and sufficiently capable to enforce order and discipline, and to see that these men work while they are within the jurisdiction of the security commission. Not only that; let it be a force large enough to see that no sabotage is carried on. That is an important point raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and other hon. members. They have pointed out that these Japanese are left in a position whereby, with one stick of dynamite and lacking proper care, they could disrupt the transportation systems between British Columbia and the prairies.

Surely this is evidence of weakness. I am not condemning the government. They acted slowly at first. I believe that at least in theory the principle of the system they set up was sound, but it has not had power enough in its elbow. It has not used the power in its elbow to a sufficient degree. I suggest that a force of men be put in there, at the country's expense, to see that there is no sabotage, that there are no sit-down strikes and that discipline is maintained. All that can be done, and done humanely, too. My suggestion to the government is to strengthen the force they have there, and to see that when an order is given it is carried out.

I am not saying anything about expatriation after the war is over. I have no doubt that every white man in British Columbia would like to have that policy carried out. It may be a right policy, but I do not like to express an opinion upon it without further information. However, I could certainly visualize the difficulty of carrying out such a policy.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is any limit placed on the amount of money the British Columbia security commission can spend in connection with the disposition of the Japanese? Must the security commission, in dealing with any given group of Japanese, first have reference to the amount of money available?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not understand the hon. member's point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How much money is at the disposal of the British Columbia security commission in dealing with the Japanese situation?

Mr. MITCHELL: There is no restriction. I thought at first the hon. member was talking about individual Japanese.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no limit.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have to face up to each problem as it presents itself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Has any proposal of the commission for the disposition of Japanese been rejected by the dominion government, for reasons of finance?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; we are not in committee.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say no.

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): There are many observations I could make in rebuttal to some of the statements made to-day. It is my understanding, however, that the rules of the house do not permit of that procedure.

All I wish to do is to thank the house for its indulgence, and to thank those who have taken part in the discussion. I believe my purpose has been well served. If the government were not alive to what was going on in British Columbia, they will be alive to it now.

I say, in apology to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) and others who voiced their regret that I had not given a little notice, that I am not built along those lines. When I decide to do something I believe that now is the appointed time to do it. I decided when I was entering the house that now was the time and now was the hour.

I move for the withdrawal of the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Kamloops moves for leave to withdraw his motion. Is it the pleasure of the house that he shall have leave to withdraw the motion?

Mr. GREEN: I should like to know if the Prime Minister is ready to answer my question?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister ought to say something.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) asked a question with respect to the repatriation of Canadians from Japan, to be exchanged for Japanese from this country. As the hon. member is no doubt aware, I made a statement in the matter on the 12th of this month. At that time I mentioned that negotiations had resulted in an arrangement for an exchange of officials, to begin with, and private citizens thereafter. The ship which was bringing some of the officials is now also bringing to Canada some of the private citizens. Arrangements have been made to give priority to women and children.

I cannot tell the hon. member just whether or not the ship has sailed or when it sails. I have been unable to get any information in addition to what I gave on the last occasion. I can say, however, that the negotiations have resulted in the arrangement to which I refer, and that those arrangements will continue—that is to say, as rapidly as ships can be secured for the purpose our citizens will be repatriated, and Japanese will be taken back.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the hope to exchange all Japanese nationals, because they constitute over one-third of the total number of people of Japanese origin in Canada?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot say as to that.

Mr. SHAW: Did the hon. member close the debate when he spoke?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He withdrew the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member asked leave of the house to withdraw the motion.

Mr. NEILL: Your Honour omitted to say that he closed the debate. It is open now for anyone to speak.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a motion before the house.

Mr. NEILL: But it is invariably the rule for Mr. Speaker to say, "If the hon. member speaks in reply, he will close the debate." Mr. Speaker omitted to do so, and therefore the debate is still open.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. The hon. member has a motion. The motion is to adjourn the house. The adjournment of the house is the close of the debate. The hon. member is not entitled to reply to such motion, because the logical result would be, if the motion were carried, that the house would adjourn. The hon. member now moves for leave of the house to withdraw his motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, I think it should be made clear that any hon. member who did not speak before the hon. member for Kamloops made the present motion, is still entitled to debate the question. If the hon. member for Red Deer wishes to speak, he may do so.

Mr. SHAW: I should like—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. There is a motion before the house. It is made by the hon. member, who has a right to make it—that he asks leave of the house to withdraw his motion.

Mr. NEILL: But he is refused leave.

Mr. SPEAKER: All in favour.

Mr. NEILL: It is not unanimous.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is that motion not debatable?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. All in favour of the motion will say Aye.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: All opposed to the motion will say Nay.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the ayes have it.

Motion (Mr. O'Neill) withdrawn.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Thursday, June 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. C. W. G. GIBSON (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, hon. members have already spent nearly two weeks in discussing the provisions and merits of this bill. A great deal has already been said both for and against with respect to the measure. I see no need to prolong the debate by a long speech, but I should like to express my views respecting the necessity or desirability of immediate conscription for service overseas.

Under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act we already have authority to call up or conscript all the resources of this country, with the single exception of the calling up of men for overseas service. The bill under consideration removes that single exception and enables the government to make the most effective uses of all our resources as the exigencies of the situation may at any time dictate. I am supporting this bill not because I feel that conscription for overseas service is immediately necessary, but because I realize that should the necessity arise we must be in position to be able to put it into operation without delay.

I do not intend to reply to those who are opposed to the calling up of men for service beyond the territorial limits of this country, as I think it would take longer than the forty minutes that I am allowed to bring about any change in their point of view. Nor do I wish to deal with the suggestion that has been made that conscription of man-power should be automatically coupled with conscription of wealth. Under the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act we already have authority to conscript wealth, and I consider that any discussion on the subject may well be postponed until we come to the budget debate. What I do intend to discuss to-day is the suggestion that has been made so often that conscription is essential to total war, and we cannot have a total war without conscription.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has appealed for selective national service in every sphere of home activity. The other day the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was asked if he believed it was desirable at the moment to have conscription for overseas service and he replied, "I say that the time has come when there is only one mobilization that will assure equality and fairness and unity in Canada." He then went on to say, "and that is by establishing selective service for overseas immediately."

I do not doubt that all those advocating immediate conscription are anxious that this country should develop the greatest national effort of which we are capable—and to do so at the earliest possible day. With that I am in complete accord. Where we differ is not in the object to be attained, but as to the means of attaining that object. It by no means follows that the introduction of conscription automatically means an increased effort or more satisfactory results, particularly in this country where we know that a considerable portion of our population is definitely opposed to it. I am not an anti-conscriptionist, but I have served under both systems, and I do not agree with the view that conscription is necessarily the best method of producing an effective fighting force.

In considering the question of conscription, or selective national service as my hon. friends prefer to call it, many arguments have been advanced in its favour, particularly the argument that it is the fairest method of securing men. It is claimed that by forcing all classes and groups to bear their share of the dangers and the sacrifices that are entailed, the bravest and best will not be sacrificed for the benefit of those who are unwilling to serve. On the face of it that is a sound argument, and if our man-power consisted of standard units where every man was of an identical pattern, moulded in the same mould, that method would prove to be not only fair but also equally effective. What that proposal does not take into consideration is the difference in effectiveness between men who are willing and those who are unwilling to serve, between the volunteer and the unwilling conscript.

Just at this point I should like to make it quite clear that I do not suggest for a moment that because a man has not volunteered he is necessary unwilling to serve. I realize quite well that there are probably many men throughout the country who would willingly offer their services, but who consider that for one reason or another, owing to various obligations, they are not justified in doing so. But it is also true that there are other men who have no desire to serve, who have no intention of volunteering and who, on the contrary, have every intention of avoiding all service if possible. Those are the men I have referred to as unwilling conscripts; those are the men whom the advocates of immediate conscription hope to sweep into the army in their desire to secure for this country an all-out effort.

They fail to ask themselves whether or not the inclusion of those men would serve to strengthen or maintain the present morale and efficiency of our fighting forces. To my mind there is little doubt what the answer would be if a commanding officer of an overseas unit were offered his choice of being reinforced by volunteers or conscripts. The man who has enlisted has voluntarily decided for himself to enter the service, knowing well the risks involved, and is prepared to face the dangers that he will be called upon to meet. That man has joined with a purpose, that of playing his part in our effort to destroy the enemy. But what is the outlook of the unwilling conscript? He has not undertaken to undergo hardship; he has not undertaken to face danger and possible death—quite the contrary. He has tried to avoid them. That is the man who will be called up under conscription. I wonder how valuable his contribution will be to our total war effort. What some people seem to forget is that warfare to-day does not consist of hurling huge masses of men against each other, with the balance in favour of the greatest number. To-day war is mechanized, highly technical, and demanding individual initiative in the use of the weapons that are provided. The best weapons in the world will be useless unless the men using them are prepared to use them bravely and intelligently. Under these circumstances it would seem to be obvious that so long as a volunteer force can be maintained in the field it will be a more effective fighting force than one partly or wholly composed of conscripts.

We sometimes hear the question asked, "why should the best go first?" That is a reasonable question. It is obviously unfair. But the fact remains that if we are to win this war we require the services of our best, and the best services of our best, without, if possible, having their strength diluted and their efficiency reduced by having in their ranks those who have had to be forced to serve. It is difficult to understand the attitude of some people when they apologize for the fact that our overseas forces are purely voluntary. We hear no such complaint in connection with the air force or the navy, although both these forces are raised on a purely voluntary basis.

I do not think I have ever heard it suggested that conscription should be applied either to the air force or to the navy. Does anyone consider that it requires less skill and courage to operate a tank than it does to fly a plane, or that higher qualities of initiative and daring are required by the parachutists than in the commandos? I certainly would not say so. And yet we have the demand for conscription confined to service in the army only.

Our overseas force has often been referred to as the spearhead of the defence forces of Britain. We are proud of that title, and it is our duty to keep that spearhead keen and reinforced as far as possible, by men who are up to the present standard.

The leader of the opposition, referring to the impressions abroad as to our war effort, said:

> These impressions exist because of the fact that we do not send men outside of Canada.

I disagree with him entirely as to this, because such impressions are certainly not based upon the facts.

When this country, with a population of under twelve million people, while employing 800,000 persons in war production, as well as over a million engaged in agriculture, can, by voluntary enlistment, raise over 500,000 men for our fighting forces, one would almost expect to hear the people of Canada boasting of the fact.

I have in my hand an item appearing in this morning's issue of the Ottawa Journal which is a fair sample of the publicity that creates the impressions referred to. It is a report of a speech by Lieutenant-Colonel T. A. Kidd, a veteran of the last war, at a meeting held in Toronto. Colonel Kidd is reported to have said:

> We as a nation want to walk step by step with the United States. Conscription has produced an army for them to send to Ireland and England while our government calls for volunteers only. It is a thoroughly disgraceful situation and must react upon our national influence in the future.

That is what was said, instead of indicating to our American allies that when they have raised forces of approximately six million men, by compulsory means or otherwise, they will have proportionately equalled the record of Canada, a record that we have accomplished on a voluntary basis. In saying that I am not in any way belittling the effort of our great neighbour the United States. But instead of giving out that picture the impression is given out that we have something to be ashamed of, that we are ashamed that our volunteers have not been conscripted.

Instead of taking pride in the fact that over half a million Canadians have freely offered their lives, that the whole of our overseas forces have been raised and maintained on a voluntary basis, we have a section of our people, and of our press, apologizing for our contribution because it has not been compulsory.

I have no hesitation, Mr. Speaker, in saying that if it remains possible to continue to reinforce our voluntary forces overseas with further volunteers from this country, I am strongly in favour of doing so, and I may add that I feel perfectly sure our troops overseas will be of the same opinion.

But it must be realized that this country has undertaken a tremendous war programme, a programme that entails not only the maintenance of our fighting forces, but also the production of huge quantities of war supplies and foodstuffs, and our resources in man-power, as well as in material supply, will undoubtedly be taxed to the limit. Up to the present, voluntary reinforcements have been forthcoming well up to the estimates of all our requirements. But it is possible that a time may come when the voluntary system may fail to supply the reinforcements equal to the demand, and that is a contingency that we must face and be prepared to meet. In such circumstances, I am certainly in favour of the immediate adoption of conscription of men for overseas service, and the government is asking to have section 3 eliminated to enable it, when necessary, to adopt the same method of raising men for our forces abroad as is now authorized for home defence.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say this, that Canadians are proud, and have reason to be proud, of the forces which represent us beyond our shores, and those men are entitled to our assurance, and to know, that we in this country are prepared to support them to the very utmost limit of our power.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for this bill in order to remove the last obstruction which, the government believes, prevents it from initiating compulsory service in any field of war.

On the tenth of this month, with all the other members of the house who were present, I listened very attentively to the address of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he introduced Bill No. 80 and opened this debate. The bill calls for the removal from the National Resources Mobilization Act of section 3, which imposes the only limitation in the act upon enlistment for overseas service. I am of the opinion that when section 3 is removed, the act being then in full force, the government will have authority to introduce national compulsory selective service for any field of war.

But when the Prime Minister sat down I must confess that I was not just sure what the exact policy of the government is or is going to be. I remember very well that the Prime Minister suggested three views. There was first the view of those who want immediately all-out compulsory military service for any theatre of war, and there was the view of those who did not want all-out compulsory military service under any circumstances. The Prime Minister said, at page 3236:

> Each of these is a very extreme view and attitude. Neither extreme, I believe, should be permitted to prevail.

Then he went on to say that there was a third view:

> —a view which I believe, accords with the opinion most generally held throughout the dominion. It is that conscription for service overseas should be inaugurated only if and when, in the opinion of the government, it becomes necessary to the security of our country and to the maintenance of its war effort. That view is the one which is held by the government. It represents the government's policy with respect to conscription for service overseas.

He added:

> In a word, that policy may be described as not necessarily conscription but conscription if necessary.

So that when he had finished I was just where I was when he began. I could not put my finger on the policy of the government, and I doubt if anybody could. Am I not right in my view of the Prime Minister's speech? Evidently the house agrees that I am. Last week, following the Prime Minister, we had speeches by six of his ministers, each one of whom spent a good deal of time trying to persuade our compatriots of Quebec that this bill does not really mean anything, that it does not mean conscription, that in any event it does not mean that the country is going to have a compulsory all-out effort. Certainly not in my time has there been such an array of talent. Each day, except last Friday, as the first speech of the day we had the fortune of hearing a capable minister debate the question whether this bill meant anything or not. I am sure every hon. member will admit that so far as the province of Quebec is concerned —I speak kindly of that province, and have always held myself to be one of its warm supporters—the voters believed that when they voted "no" they voted against conscription. Will anyone doubt that? I see a number of hon. members from Quebec nodding their heads. I agree that when the province of Quebec voted "no" its people were sure they were voting against conscription. I believe I can say also that in the other eight provinces the great majority but not all of those who voted "yes" voted for national compulsory service in any theatre of war. I have as much right to say that as others have to assert that Quebec voted "no" against compulsory service in any theatre of war. I know that in Ontario, and specifically in the capital city of Toronto, the general impression during the plebiscite campaign was that an affirmative vote was a vote for all-out compulsory national service in any theatre of war. At the very commencement, a group of men, headed by Colonel Reynolds, of the Canadian Corps Association, and Major Everett Bristol, organized a meeting in Toronto, which was held in the Royal York hotel, and which I attended. Under the direction of a committee which was formed there to support the "yes" vote, quite an advertising campaign was carried on. I have some of the advertisements here. They are good. One of them shows Adolf Hitler pinning an iron cross on a non-voter, and represents him as saying, "Thank you for not coming out to vote". In Toronto we thought that not to vote was equivalent to voting "no". Later on we find this, "If you don't want to earn Hitler's praise, vote—and vote yes!" This was published in all the Toronto papers, and, I assume, in the papers around about.

The next cartoon I have here depicts, in really good caricature, Mussolini, Hirohito and Hitler, and says "Let's wipe the smirk off these mugs! Vote 'yes!'." A well-written article follows:

"Divide and rule"—this is the plan of Hitler & Co. Can't you imagine the smirk on Hitler's moronic mug when the people of Austria—Czechoslovakia—Yugoslavia argued amongst themselves until too late and the hun hordes walked in? Don't you remember the newsreel picture showing Hitler doing a jig on receiving news on the fall of France? And now we have the spectacle in India—a people divided. Monday, April 27th, will give the unholy trio—Hitler, Hirohito and Mussolini—Canada's answer. That day we have our opportunity to prove that on the question of an all-out war effort we are a united people. And, remember, a skimpy majority isn't much better than a negative vote. It would indicate that we, too, are a divided people. We must vote—and we must vote "yes" in such numbers that our enemies and our allies will know where we in Canada stand in this all-out fight for freedom.

Then another cartoon—I will refer to just one more—portrays a sailor, a soldier and an airman, and represents them as saying:

Don't fail us! Vote "yes"!

Place yourself in the position of our fighting men. You are taking a tank into battle. You are flying a bomber over Germany. You are riding in mid-Atlantic on a storm-tossed corvette. You hear suddenly that Canada has failed to ring up an overwhelming "yes" vote on April 27. What would be your feelings as you rode into battle with the enemy who seeks not only your destruction but the enslavement of your country?

[Mr. MacNicol.]

And so on. Now, Mr. Speaker, those advertisements and write-ups, repeated daily, had a lot to do with bringing about the affirmative vote in Toronto and in Ontario generally. What was the trend of that vote?

So far as I can find out, the riding of Eglinton, in North Toronto, registered the largest "yes" vote in Canada—96 per cent "yes", 4 per cent "no". Toronto itself voted 93 per cent "yes". Over 90 per cent of the voters in my riding, and 92 per cent in the constituency of Dufferin-Simcoe, voted "yes". Two ridings in Ontario voted "no". Russell gave only 37 per cent "yes", and Prescott only 32 per cent in the affirmative. In both ridings the vote was against conscription, or against all-out compulsory service in any theatre of war. In like manner the rest of us voted for national selective all-out service in any theatre of war. In the dominion the total "yes" vote was 2,921,206, and the "no" vote was 1,608,609.

I think I have said enough, Mr. Speaker, to prove that in eight of the provinces, in any event, the majority vote was for all-out compulsory service. I do not say that 100 per cent of those who voted voted that way, but the vast majority did. That vote, we are told, cost $1,600,000 including what was spent during the campaign itself, and I wish to compare that $1,600,000 with another $1,600,000 which was raised by a great newspaper that supported the "yes" vote. I refer to the Toronto Telegram. For the last two years that newspaper has been carrying on at its own expense the British war victims campaign fund whereby it has raised the sum I have mentioned, $1,600,000. There has been some support from outside the city, on the part of about a hundred weeklies and dailies, but the Telegram itself and its 700 employees all participate in the conduct of this campaign, and there are eight employees in the office who devote their whole time to this work, directing the British war victims campaign fund. They use one-tenth of their zinc in placing such cuts as I have here in the paper. I have in my hand as an example pictures of twenty-eight children, three from Norwood, Ontario, and twenty-five in the city of Toronto itself, who have been carrying on this work. Children will be seen on the street-corners selling all kinds of things to get money for the fund. They deny themselves; they do not go to shows, and they give all the money they can get together to the fund. They may have a party and give the proceeds to the fund. These twenty-eight children raised on this particular day, June 13, the sum of $60.15.

I congratulate that patriotic gentleman, Mr. C. O. Knowles, the editor in chief of the paper, and those associated with him upon the splendid work they have done in raising the money they have got together. But I want to touch further on another side of this matter. It seems to me that in addition to the money, they have done something incomparable in the patriotic fervour which they have instilled into thousands of children throughout Ontario. They have instilled into these children a love for Canada and also a love for the empire. We hear too much in this house and outside about Canada as a sovereign nation, but so far as I am concerned I say clearly that the block in which I live in Toronto cannot be separated from ward 6; ward 6 cannot be separated from Toronto; Toronto cannot be separated from Ontario; Ontario cannot be separated from Canada, and Canada cannot be separated from the British empire.

I will now take up the views expressed by the several ministers who have spoken. First of all I would refer to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I have always had, and I still have, a warm feeling for that hon. gentleman, but in the course of his speech he made one statement to which I will now refer, in regard to which I disagree with him, a statement which I do not think he would have made had he given more thought to the question. He was replying to something that my leader (Mr. Hanson) had said in reference to national government. Perhaps that rather stirred him up a bit, and he made this statement, as reported at page 3329 of Hansard:

> The only kind of government which could bring that kind of policy—

That is, the policy my leader had mentioned, an all-out national selective service policy of men and resources.

> The only kind of government which could bring that kind of policy into effect in Canada at present, the only kind of government which would undertake to do so, would be the government with no political past and no desire to have a political future.

Those words are far below the opinion I have of the minister, and I say to myself that they were spoken rather hurriedly and do not express his inmost feelings.

Mr. GARDINER: May I suggest that they did not have to do with conscription of manpower for overseas.

Mr. MacNICOL: If they do express the minister's opinion, then in the name of heaven, if and when conscription is to be brought in—and the minister who has just taken his seat (Mr. Gibson) said he was in favour of it—how can conscription be put into effect except by a national government? How can it be done if you are to attain the end the minister suggests?

Mr. GARDINER: My hon. friend will agree that that statement does not refer to conscription of men for service overseas. It refers to a discussion of policy in which the leader of the opposition said that he was not talking about that question.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I read four lines to the minister and express the hope that he will keep them before him on every occasion in the future when he feels inclined to make any statement associating political activities with the conduct of this empire's war, in this life and death struggle, when politics should not be entering into it at all.

Mr. GARDINER: I have a much higher conception of politics than the hon. member appears to have. If I thought there was anything wrong with politics, I would not be in it.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the minister will keep these lines before him he will not make that statement again. These are the words of J. G. Holland taken from Scribner's magazine, 1883:

> God give us men! A time like this demands
> Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;
> Men whom the lust of office does not kill;
> Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy.

For my part I would rather stay in opposition if I lived 1,000 years than be associated with a government that would conduct a war on the basis of party politics. That is all I have to say about the minister's remarks.

I come next to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who told a very fine story from his point of view. A great deal has been said about what Canada has done. Well, I am proud of what Canada has done, but I am one of those who believe that Canada could do a great deal more, and I think Canada should have done a great deal more. The minister said something about Australia. What has Australia done? The population of Australia is only 7,000,000, and our population is 11,420,000. Australia has enlisted in the active armed forces, serving either away or at home 8 per cent of the population. That is to say, 572,000 have enlisted, in addition to ancillary forces. The figures I have quoted are from "Keesing's Contemporary" of September 20-27, 1941. Had Canada enlisted 8 per cent of its population, Canada would have had 913,000 men instead of 505,000, as the minister said. Of course, someone will say that Canada is doing so much more than Australia in the manufacture of munitions.

Well, I do not know about that. Australia too has done a magnificent job in the manufacture of munitions. The fact is that this year they are spending $5,000,000,000 on the manufacture of munitions, according to March 15 "Vital Speeches of the Day." That is a creditable turn-out. I have no doubt they have many more men to-day in the armed forces, because since these figures were printed, Japan has moved into their orbit.

New Zealand has a population of 1,336,000. What has little New Zealand done? It had 66,500 in its expeditionary force, ready to be sent to wherever the fighting was going on; 133,000 at home, 33,000 in the air force and 6,000 in the navy, or a total of 238,500. That amounts to 14½ per cent. If Canada enlisted in its armed forces as many men as New Zealand has enlisted, in proportion to population, we would have 1,656,000 men under arms. And take South Africa, which has a white population of only 2,000,000, about one-sixth the population of Canada. South Africa has enlisted 190,000 men for overseas service and 43,000 men for home service, or 11½ per cent of her population. In proportion to population, Canada, with 11,420,000 people, at the same rate would have enlisted 1,313,000 men. The figures for South Africa were taken from the Canadian Geographical magazine for January, and the New Zealand figures from the same magazine for February.

A good deal has been said about England, and often I have heard remarks made about that country which were not very complimentary. I do not like remarks of that kind. The British people have done the most marvellous job of any nation in the world, bar none, in this war. In the Ottawa Citizen of this morning I read an article which stated that the total figures were impressive. Of a total population between the ages of fourteen and sixty-five, amounting to 33,000,000 people, some 22,000,000, or 66 per cent, are in the armed forces, civil defence or industry, leaving 11,000,000 for other work. That is a tremendous enlistment in the armed forces and in industry in the old country. In addition they have just reached the total expenditure of $44,000,000,000 in the prosecution of the war. Canada has done well, but Canada has to do a lot better to match these other countries to which I have just referred.

I want to say a word or two about the speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who certainly excelled himself in delivery, in diction and in choice of language. In those three characteristics, and perhaps others, his speech was brilliant, but I should like to refer to something he said appearing at page 3391 of Hansard:

> I do not feel any unworthiness in asserting that the duty of citizenship to bear arms and fight and die is a duty which the citizen owes only to his own country and its interests.

I should like to ask the Minister of Justice this. If in 1776 the people of Great Britain had adopted that attitude toward the Canada of that day, what would have happened to the people of the province of Quebec and where would their language be to-day? I am absolutely in agreement that everything given them under act or treaty should be carried out. If we are to have harmony in this country we must recognize the rights of others. But if the British had not come over here in 1776 there would have been no French spoken in Quebec to-day; and had they not come again in 1812 there would have been no French spoken in Quebec to-day as an official language, any more than there is in the state of Louisiana.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Quebec saved Canada in 1812.

Mr. MacNICOL: They did a grand job in that war, as no one knows better than I do. They certainly fought heroically at Chateauguay and elsewhere; but do not forget the western division, that fought in western Ontario and over into the state of Michigan. I give the French all the credit they deserve; they did magnificently, but on the other hand I am not going to discredit our own people.

Mr. GARDINER: They still speak French in New Orleans and in Louisiana.

Mr. MacNICOL: I can tell the minister that some forty years ago French, as a language of instruction, was abolished in the state schools of Louisiana. I am not in favour of abolishing it in Quebec; do not take that out of what I said. I am in favour of granting French Canadians every privilege to which they are entitled. All I am pointing out is that if in 1776 and 1812 the British had not come here and done what they did, Canada would have been part of the United States to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: That was not what the hon. member said. He said they would not be speaking French, but to-day they speak French in Maine and in Louisiana.

Mr. MacNICOL: No, I said it would not be the language of instruction, any more than it is in the state of Louisiana. I am in favour of its remaining the language of instruction in Quebec, as long as they want to keep it there. Do not try to put words in my mouth. I am only pointing out what would have happened if certain things had not been done in 1776 and 1812.

During the recent Quebec by-election certain speakers made some very unkind statements. I do not know by whom they were made, but I read one denouncing our participation in the war because, it was charged, the British always got others to fight their battles for them. That is not true. Up to November last United Kingdom soldiers suffered 71·3 per cent of all casualties, while soldiers from the dominions suffered 18·2 per cent, colonial troops 5 per cent and Indian troops 5·5 per cent, while in Norway and France troops from the British Isles outnumbered those from other parts of the empire by seventy to one. I believe fair statements should be made about everyone. Certainly I would be the last to make an unkind statement about anyone, and I do not like to see such statements made about the people from whom I am descended. Many times we have heard about enlistments in this country. Major-General LaFleche, D.S.O., a very brilliant soldier with a wonderful record, recently gave the figures of enlistments in Canada, which were published in the Edmonton Journal and again in the Peace River Record, from which newspaper I clipped them. The figures were as follows:

Total Voluntary Enlistments
Quebec	66,133
Ontario	158,691
Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island	33,005
New Brunswick	21,861
Manitoba	39,384
Saskatchewan	32,437
Alberta	35,391
British Columbia	39,254
Enlistments per 1,000 Population
Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island	49.5
Manitoba	49.0
British Columbia	48.3
New Brunswick	42.8
Alberta	44.4
Ontario	42.6
Quebec	20.4

I do not know up to what date these figures go, but they are worth taking as a guide. I am not finding fault with Quebec at all. I want to be fair; I think the rest of us should enlist more than the province of Quebec. Someone said here the other day that Quebec should not be expected to enlist as many men, and I agree. I think they have done magnificently, considering everything, and they are as good fighters as we have anywhere. I am not disparaging them in any shape or form, but surely I should not be criticized for being fair to the other provinces.

I want to pass on to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), and I shall be very brief with him. At page 3413 of Hansard he said:

> Furthermore, Canada has the largest volunteer armed force of any nation in the world. That is something of which Canada might well be proud.

Well, if the figures which I have quoted with respect to New Zealand, Australia, South Africa and Great Britain are correct, the minister said a lot more than would seem to be shown by the facts. Because if we have enlisted only 505,000—and I am not discrediting that, because it is a big enlistment—it does not compare in percentage, with what we would have enlisted had our enlistments been at the same ratio as those in New Zealand and Australia.

The minister made a comparison between what happened at the time of the great war and what is happening to-day. He said that by 1917 Canada had enlisted 417,371 men. It will be remembered, however, that our population in 1916, on which those figures are based, was only 8,035,000. On the other hand the enlistment figures given by the minister for 1942 are based on a 1941 population of 11,420,000. On that basis we should have in the army to-day in Canada about 593,000 men, not 505,000.

I know it will be said that another hundred thousand are being called up. But we are now speaking of the men actually in the army, and comparing that number with those who were in the army at the time of the great war.

Mr. GARDINER: Then there is the air force and the navy, in addition.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am taking the figure of 505,000 given by the minister a few days ago.

Mr. GARDINER: In the army.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the air force not in the armed forces? Are sailors not in the armed forces?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think they were included.

Mr. MacNICOL: I just took the figures that were given.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly they are included.

Mr. MacNICOL: In 1918 our population was 8,328,382. Toward the end of the first great war, in 1918, Canada had 628,964 in its fighting forces. On the basis of this year's population, taking the figures in the same ratio, Canada should have in its fighting forces next year 875,000 persons. Perhaps it will have; I do not know. All I am trying to say is that Canada's war effort has been good, but it could be a good deal better.

I turn now to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and I quote from his observations at page 3438 where he is reported as having said:

> If it were an imperialistic war I have no hesitation in saying to this house that so far as my influence and power in this country goes, and I admit that it is not very great, I would be opposed to such a war.

I have heard statements of that kind before. I have always thought I was fairly well posted in history, yet I cannot recall any imperialistic war. Was the South African war an imperialistic war? I do not think so. Was the Russian war an imperialistic war? I do not think so. Can anyone name an imperialistic war, having in mind the background of that war?

I do not like to hear any man discrediting the history of the British empire. That is not a proper kind of talk. I am a Canadian and a Britisher. I cannot picture separating Canada from the empire. To maintain it within that empire I am convinced that our armed forces will have to be greatly enlarged. I do not see how it can be done in any way other than by national compulsory selective service both for men and for resources, as advocated by the leader of this party. The government must have some such idea as that, because if it had not, why would it have gone to the expense of holding a plebiscite and introducing Bill No. 80? It must have some idea that in order to raise the necessary number of men it will have to bring in compulsory selective service.

I believe I have referred to some observations of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) who spoke immediately prior to me. Perhaps I have completed my discussion of the subject matters in hand. I feel, like all other hon. members, that we are in very serious, perilous and dangerous times. It is not a time when any of us should do anything to stir up strife. I would refuse to be a party to the stirring up of strife in any shape or form, nor do I believe anything I have said to-day would cause strife. Referring to the ministers, I believe I have spoken fairly, nor can it be suggested that I have criticized them unduly. I have taken only a few words from what each has said, because the time is here when it is unity we want above everything else.

I believe every hon. member is as sincere as I am in his desire to win the war. But how are we going to do it if we spend our time in matters which do not count? We cannot win unless we concentrate on every effort required to push the war to a successful conclusion. That is our bounden and our imperative duty. I am not going to find fault with the government because of its carrying on in war as a political government. The problem is theirs. Perhaps they are doing it as well as can be expected, from a government organized along political party lines. But I keep asking myself whether or not the time has come to organize some other plan. I am not going to advocate national government. I am not interested in whether national government is preached or not. But certainly it will require all the intelligence, all the effort and all the ability not only of Canadians but also of Britishers and our allies to win the war. I keep saying to myself: If all Canadians do not get behind the winning of the war, by making an all-out effort, and if we lose the war, will any of us have any privileges after the war? Will we have anything left if the Germans and the Japanese dominate this country? Only to-day we heard what hon. members had to say about the Japanese.

I should like to close with something I read a day or two ago with respect to the second invasion of Britain, as it was known in those days, by the Romans in 43 A.D. Those who are familiar with history will remember that Emperor Claudius launched an invasion. He stayed a short time, and took a great fancy to the country—so much so, in fact, that when he returned to Rome he sent his best generals and his best troops. But even in those days the British were tough. They fought like tigers, and they made up their minds that they were not going to be beaten without a real struggle. After ten years of war their great leader Caractacus appeared in the western part of England. He had been driven into the mountains of Wales. He continued to fight where he had only enough ground for his army to stand on. In the end his resistance was overcome by force of numbers. On the day before his capture he said to his followers something which I think is equally applicable to-day, something which would apply to every hon. member and to each of us who lives within the empire and who loves it—and I love the empire, as much as any man can love it. He said:

> This day, my fellow warriors, decides the fate of Britain. The era of liberty or eternal bondage begins from this very day.

And can we not say the era of liberty or eternal bondage begins from this day? The Prime Minister of Great Britain is to-day in Washington. Why did he go to Washington? Because he is going to give all that is in him to save this empire. That is what we must all do. It will take all in each of us to save the empire.

For my part, if we lose the war I do not want to live. Politics is nothing to me. I should much rather die than lose the war and be under eternal bondage. We will remember that at that time Caractacus was defeated. He was dragged through the streets of Rome—my memory fails me as to whether he died immediately thereafter—and for 400 years those tight little islands were under Roman domination. Pray God that this empire and its most beautiful and greatest dominion, Canada, will not be under the Rome of to-day, with its Mussolini, the Germany of to-day with its Hitler, or the Japan of to-day with its Hirohito. Let us together do our utmost to save this country. Let us try to have harmony. If they are having trouble in the province of Quebec, as has been mentioned, why not let the best people of the country sit around the table with our friends and compatriots and try to solve the problem? They are fine people, and they have been here for a long time. Some of my own people first came here in 1758 as soldiers.

Mr. GARDINER: Why not forget the only thing that divides us, this talk about conscription?

Mr. MacNICOL: We should be able to sit around a table and straighten out our difficulties. The minister refers to national compulsory service. You are offering a bill to allow you to put it in. The minister who just sat down said he is for it if it has to come; the Prime Minister said that he was for it if and when it has to come. Is the Minister of Agriculture the only member of the government who is not for an all-out effort to win this war?

Mr. GARDINER: I said the same thing.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, when the National Resources Mobilization Act was before the house very few members took part in the debate thereon. The resolution was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on Tuesday, June 18, 1940, and by Thursday, June 20, the bill had passed its third reading with the unanimous approval of the house. Since that time great changes have taken place in the international situation. The Germans have completed their conquest of continental Europe and have attacked Russia and seized a large portion of her territory. The Japanese have swept through the Philippines, Hong Kong, Malaya, Singapore and Burma. The United States has entered the war on the side of the allied nations. Ships have been sunk within the territorial waters of Canada. The enemy has landed on the western hemisphere.

When the act was passed in 1940 all the world expected that the Germans would enter upon a major attack on Great Britain. Canadians volunteered in large numbers to go to the defence of Britain, and had I been a younger man I would have joined up in that defence. At that time many in Canada felt that this was a war to defend Great Britain, but conditions have changed to-day. The war has come to our shores, and everyone must realize by now that we are marching side by side, not only with Great Britain in the defence of Britain, but with the united nations in the defence of Britain, Canada and all other democratic nations, and to preserve our very existence. It is no longer a British war, no longer a foreign war; it is Canada's war. As the Prime Minister has said so often, it is a war started by imperialistic Germany, now joined by imperialistic Japan, to destroy Christianity for all time to come.

The mobilization act provides for the conscription of all our resources, both human and material. Under that act our material resources may be sent to any part of the world in defence of Canada or for the efficient prosecution of the war. At the time of the passing of the act many hon. members of whom I was not one, felt that since this was, in their opinion, a foreign war, men should not be sent beyond the shores of Canada unless they volunteered to go. Accordingly a section to that effect was inserted in the act, and I would remind hon. members that every member of this house voted for the insertion of that section in the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the theory that half a loaf was better than no bread.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I do not know what theory governed the vote of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) for the insertion of that section in the act, but the fact remains and Hansard records it that every hon. member voted for the insertion of that section. When certain members of this house state now that this was never anything more than a half-way measure, I would remind them that they voted for the so-called half-way measure. No act ever passed this house with greater unanimity of approval.

Now that it is evident that this is Canada's war and not a foreign war, the government proposes to strike out the section which restricts compulsory service to Canada, so that, if necessary, men may be compelled to go beyond the shores of Canada in order to defend Canada or to prosecute this war efficiently. Since the entry of Japan into this war it has been my considered opinion that men called up for military training should receive the same training as volunteers, so that every man would be trained and, if necessary, could be compelled to go anywhere in the world in the defence of Canada or for the efficient prosecution of the war.

Hitler has avowed that he will conquer the world, and Canada has a definite place in his plans for world conquest. If we would save the world from his domination; if we would defend Canada from his tyranny and brutality, we must go beyond the shores of Canada and fight Hitler wherever nazism can be found. In that way, and in that way alone, can we successfully defend our native land. In this great world conflict it will be of no avail for some men to say that they will not go beyond the shores of Canada to defend our country, to say that some of our forces will go only to the forty-ninth parallel or to the imaginary line that runs through the great lakes or to any other imaginary line and wait there for the enemy to attack; to do that would be to invite disaster, and it would contribute in no effective way to the defence of Canada.

Placing a territorial limitation upon men called for military service is, to my mind, unrealistic. Canada is being defended in Libya, in the far eastern Pacific, in China, in Russia and in Britain just as much as she is being defended at Halifax or Vancouver. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act as it now stands, men are called up for training and are given the option of choosing whether they will defend Canada only from within Canada or whether they will go beyond the shores of Canada in order to defend this country. By that method we have, as the leader of the opposition pointed out in his speech, actually two armies within one army. But the Prime Minister has assured us that that method of training does not now prevail. Let me quote his words, as they appear on page 3241 of Hansard:

> Men are being called up for compulsory training and service as fast as they can be trained and equipped. These men receive the same training, in the same camps, as volunteers.

[Mr. W. R. Macdonald.]

That is as it should be. All the men are in the army for the same purpose, namely the defence of Canada. As I have stated already, I am firmly convinced that we should have only one army in which every man would be trained to defend Canada at home or abroad, wherever Canada can be defended. Within the last few days it has been said in this house that the proposed amendment will have no practical effect upon the status of men called up for training. That is definitely a misconception of the change now being proposed. The moment the act is amended, the government can say to any man in the service or to any man who may enter the service hereafter, "You must go here or you must go there, either within or without Canada, for the defence of Canada or for the efficient prosecution of the war". Some hon. members say that the government will not make that order.

Let me quote the words of the Prime Minister in an address delivered by him in this house on national selective service and repeated by him in his address on the amendment:

> In those aspects of our war effort in which voluntary methods are working satisfactorily, voluntary selection including a measure of choice by the individual of the appropriate field of service, has been and will be continued. The more expensive and complicated methods of compulsion have been employed, only where it is felt that compulsory selection is necessary in order to increase efficiency in the prosecution of the war.

The words which I ask hon. members to note particularly are these:

> Compulsion, however, will be applied without fear or favour whenever in the opinion of the government its use will aid in the achievement of a maximum war effort.

That is a clear statement; that is definite. The Prime Minister could not have been more outspoken, and as far as I am concerned I am going to be just as outspoken to the young men in my constituency. I am going to tell them that as soon as they are called for military training, it will be for the duration of the war, that it will not necessarily be for service in Canada, but that when the government deems it necessary it may be for service anywhere in the world.

Another question now arises. It is, when should the government compel men to go overseas? That is a question which only our government can determine. When the military leaders deem that step necessary or advisable they will advise the government, and the government should then take the advice of its military leaders or else get other military advisers. No one in this house is competent to say how many men should be kept in Canada or how many should be sent abroad. For myself I do not even suggest that large additional numbers of men should be sent overseas at this time. I do not know and no one here knows the likelihood of a possible attack on the western coast or how serious such an attack is likely to be. No one here knows how vulnerable the enemy may be in some territory beyond Canada and where and when an attack might result in his complete defeat. Our military leaders should know since they are in constant contact with the leaders of the united nations, and from the sources of reliable information at their disposal they and they alone can determine where defence and where attack are most likely to bring ultimate victory. The main thing is to make sure that every man is properly trained so that he can defend in Canada or attack beyond Canada when the day and hour of battle arrive.

At the present time we have large forces in Britain. The Prime Minister has assured us that we have adequate reinforcements. This is in accordance with the wishes of the people, for one thing which, above all others, the people demand is that our forces overseas should be kept up to strength and that our gallant soldiers should be assured of adequate reinforcements in men, guns, tanks and other necessary equipment. Our Prime Minister has assured us of this; the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has assured us of this, and I hope that before the debate is over, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will renew the assurance which he gave us and which was received so heartily on May 4 last when he stated that reinforcements are actually in Britain and that there are additional reinforcements in Canada which could be sent to Britain when necessity arises. Nothing could be more encouraging to our gallant sons who have volunteered for service abroad than to know that, whatever may happen, there are adequate reinforcements to relieve them and take their place in time of stress.

Let me now refer to the part which Canada should play in this war. There are two viewpoints. The first viewpoint is that we should be an arsenal for the united nations and supply large quantities of guns, ships, planes, tanks, explosives and all manner of implements of warfare, including food and other supplies, and that we should drastically restrict the numbers of men who actually do the fighting. The other viewpoint is that we should have large numbers of men for the three fighting services, and that since our men proved such gallant fighters in the last war, we should concentrate on raising men for the armed forces rather than on providing materials. Without doubt Canada has a part to play in both these fields of service, in supplying both munitions of war and food and also large numbers of men. Just what proportion of our man-power should be allotted to our munitions plants and what proportion to our armed forces only our government can determine after consultation with the leaders of the democratic nations. These nations have had successive conferences at which Canada has had a place. A plan for victory has been drawn up, and Canada also has a very definite place in that plan. It is the supplying of both men and materials. Let no one think that our armed forces are playing only a secondary part in this war.

It is foolish and, I often think, cowardly to say that our job is essentially to supply tanks and that it is the job of somebody also to supply the men to operate them. Saul stood by and held the coats of his companions while they stoned Stephen. We must do something better than Saul. We must be better than coat-holders. Britain, Canada, the United States, Russia, and Australia are all turning out large quantities of munitions of all kinds; and if each of those countries said, "We'll turn out the munitions and some other country can supply the fighters", I do not know from where the fighting men would come.

No doubt at the present time we have a greater need of munitions than of men, but with the ever-increasing output in Canada, and more particularly in the United States, and with the ever-changing ebb and flow of battle it is possible that within a comparatively short time we may need men to fight with the munitions rather than men to make the munitions. No; we cannot hide behind our munitions plants. The men and women in those plants are working long hours at hard and tedious work. Canada now has over 900,000 men and women in our munitions plants turning out tanks, aeroplanes, ships, guns and shells. But that is not enough. We must remember that tanks are of no use unless we have men to operate them. The same thing is true of guns and ships and aeroplanes. Shells are of no use unless we have well trained soldiers, sailors and airmen to hurl them against the enemy. Without doubt our munition workers are doing a magnificent job, and I am proud of what our working men and working women are doing for Canada at this time, but I am sure that they would be the first to agree with me when I say that a far greater service is being rendered by the soldiers, sailors, and airmen who actually do the fighting and daily risk their lives for their country. I wish it were possible to determine how many workers we can put in munition plants and on farms and at other necessary services, and how many in the armed forces. We could then have a goal toward which to strive, both on the home front and on the battle front. Both fronts must be kept up to strength if we are to win this war. But never let it be said that Canada wanted only to supply the munitions. A neutral country could do as much. My hope is that when the history of this war is written it will be recorded that Canada played an important part as an arsenal for the allied nations, but that she played a greater part by the heroic deeds of her soldiers, her sailors and her airmen.

From the debate which has taken place in the house thus far it would appear that the objection to the present amendment comes from three sources: first, from those who think the amendment does not go far enough; second, from those who think the amendment goes too far and is altogether unnecessary; third, from those who approve the principle of the amendment but are opposed to the method by which it is suggested that compulsory military service for overseas should be put into effect should that ever become necessary. I have dealt either directly or by implication with the first two objections. There remains the third, namely, the method by which it is proposed to put compulsory service for overseas into effect should that ever become necessary. The government proposes to do it by new regulations through order in council rather than by act of parliament. Generally speaking, I am opposed to government by order in council. But, as the leader of the opposition pointed out in his address on this measure, this is emergency legislation. In fact, in the preamble of the bill itself the word "emergency" is used. Let me quote:

> Whereas by reason of developments since the outbreak of the present war a special emergency has arisen and the national safety of the country has become endangered. . . .

And again:

> Whereas it is, therefore, expedient to confer . . . special emergency powers to permit of the mobilization of all of the effective resources of the nation. . . .

The act goes further. It actually provides that its provisions shall become operative by order in council. Let me again quote from the act. Section 2 reads:

> Subject to the provisions of section three hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, . . .

And then, again, section 6 reads:

> The governor in council may prescribe the penalties . . .

It is therefore evident that when this act was passed in 1940 everyone agreed that its provisions should be put into effect by order in council. All the provisions of the act which are now effective have become effective by order in council. By order in council we called men for thirty days' training. By order in council we extended that to four months' training; by order in council we extended it for the duration of the war, and no one has objected thus far to the orders in council. The amendment will merely extend the government's power so that it can compel men to go overseas for the defence of Canada. That will be an emergency. Parliament may not be sitting. Imagine the cry which would go up in at least eight provinces of the dominion if it were suggested that, after striking out the clause which restricts service to Canada, another clause should be inserted which would make further legislation by parliament necessary before compulsion could be applied! If such a clause were added, the present amendment would make no effective change in the act, and the hands of the government would still be tied.

It has been argued forcibly in this house that because the electors in some particular constituency voted "yes" on the recent plebiscite, the member for that constituency should vote for the amendment in this house. If such an argument is sound, it is equally logical to argue that because a constituency voted overwhelmingly "no", the member representing that constituency should vote against this amendment. To my mind that is the wrong basis on which an hon. member should determine his actions in parliament. In all matters we should bring to parliament the viewpoint of our electors, both the majority electors and the minority electors in our constituencies, and we should listen to the viewpoints of other members, who likewise should express the opinions of the majority and minority electors in their ridings. Then, having heard and considered all the viewpoints, we should do those things which we think are in the best interests of all Canadians.

The question on which the people voted was:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The people voted by an overwhelming majority to release the government. But the government is responsible to parliament. Therefore parliament, after having sought the advice of the people, should, provided they feel that it is in the best interests of Canada to do so, carry out the wishes of the people and release the government from past pledges so that it can administer this act in accordance with its provisions. These, as I have pointed out, provide for the administration not by parliament but by order in council. Surely no one in this house wants a second debate on this issue. Let us debate it now. Let us decide it once and for all time now, and leave it with the government to bring in compulsion for overseas service when it is necessary to do so.

If, however, some hon. members feel that parliamentary government is being disregarded, there is a simple way in which the government could, if it thought it desirable, ensure effective parliamentary control in this matter. If and when it reaches the decision that the voluntary system is no longer adequate and that men serving compulsorily should be sent overseas, the government might come to parliament, announce its decision and the reasons therefor, and stand or fall on a vote of this house. There need be no debate; there should be no debate in such an emergency.

By following this course, the government would know it had the backing of parliament, and members of parliament would know the true situation and be in a position to explain it to their constituents.

This was the method followed when Canada decided to declare war. No time was lost; no time was wasted; and yet the supremacy of parliament was maintained.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. We will all admit that as yet war has brought little hardship and suffering to many people in Canada. There have been casualty lists, and our hearts go out to those who have lost loved ones and to those whose loved ones are daily risking their lives on land, on sea, and in the air. But for the vast majority it has been a comfortable war, and we have gone unconcernedly along our way with the implicit faith of a child in ultimate victory. In fact, some of us have thought that we could win this war without fighting it, and for that reason many view as unnecessary any proposed amendment to the act. We may as well face the fact now that it will be necessary for us to fight this war and that we shall be forced to take the offensive. We must open up a second front. We cannot win the war without it. When or where a second front will be opened up, I do not presume to say, but I do say that we must begin to think in terms of offence rather than in terms of defence. In the early days of the war it was natural that we should have been satisfied with the old British slogan, "What we have, we'll hold"; but surely, after seeing our possessions passing one by one into the hands of the enemy, we must begin to realize that if we would hold what we have, if we would hold our own beloved Canada, we must start thinking and planning and acting on the offensive rather than on the defensive.

At the outbreak of war we dreaded the years which were before us because of the many horrors war would bring. Many of us had fought and had miraculously lived through the last war, and we knew what a terrible hell war was. However, we were soon to be told that it was to be an economic war, that we would slowly but surely starve the enemy into submission and that comparatively few soldiers, sailors and airmen would be killed; in other words, that it would be a comfortable war. Accordingly our armed forces sat down in the comparative quiet and comfort and safety of the Maginot line. I do not need to tell you, sir, what a rude awakening was in store for us. I do not need to tell you of the gallant defensive action which our troops carried out. No men ever fought with greater courage and no generals ever showed greater defensive strategy than in the retreat of 1940, and then came the miraculous and providential delivery from Dunkirk. Mr. Churchill said:

> We shall defend our island whatever the cost may be. We shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing grounds, we shall fight in the fields and in the streets, we shall fight in the hills. We shall never surrender.

The British people worked like Trojans and surrounded their island with what we and they hope will be invulnerable defensive works, not jumping-off places from which they can attack the enemy, but defensive barriers which the enemy cannot surmount. Then the British people went to work in the factories. They forged the necessary defensive weapons and, secure behind their barriers, said, "Let 'em all come!" And you and I sat back here in Canada and said "Let 'em all come!" We said, "They can't get into that great British island, that great island fortress." We said, "They can't get through the British fleet to our shores," and we sat down on what we thought was the security of the defences built by someone else for us.

To-day, when ships are being sunk along the Atlantic coast and in the gulf of St. Lawrence and along the Pacific coast, we find that war is at our very shores and immediately the cry from our defence-minded population goes out, "Send no more men out of Canada"; "Bring back to defend our shores all the Canadians in Britain." I am sure the Prime Minister; I am sure this government will never yield to this defensive, defeatist short-sighted attitude. This war will never be won or lost on Canadian soil. The enemy may not make any landings on our shores; but if the enemy, without having attempted to set foot in Canada, wins a complete, ultimate and decisive victory abroad, then Canada will be lost to you and to me and to our children and to our children's children.

We have heard a great deal about psychological warfare. The first psychological change which we must make is from the defensive to the offensive state of mind. This does not mean the armed forces only. It means all the people, because, before this war is over, we shall all be in it, either on the home front or in the battle front, and this applies not only to Canada, but to the United States, to Britain and to all our allies. It is hopeless to think that any one of them can do it alone. We all must be ready to give our all, not only our money, not only our property, but also our very lives in this titanic struggle. There are many things worse than death, and one would be life under Japanese taskmasters. If we would preserve our way of life; if we would preserve our democratic institutions; if we would preserve our very freedom, it may be necessary for many of us—and all of us must be prepared—to lose our lives to save our way of life, our democratic institutions and our freedom.

In conclusion, I would appeal to all hon. members, irrespective of party, province, creed or race to rally behind the government at this time of national crisis. Under our democratic form of government it is impossible for the Prime Minister to be the political leader of all Canadians. It should, however, be remembered that he is the Prime Minister of all Canadians. Some hon. members would prefer a Prime Minister of their particular political stripe, but for the time being at least that is not possible. Why not then accept his leadership and give him whole-hearted co-operation. Hon. members as individuals might prefer another Prime Minister, but let us be frank about the matter; let us face the facts. Is there another man in Canada who would be as generally acceptable to all the people of Canada as the present Prime Minister? For sixteen years he has guided the destinies of our people and kept us united as no other leader could have done. Give him the support which he so justly merits, and I am confident that under his leadership Canada will play such a magnificent part in this war that generations of Canadians yet unborn will forever glory in the accomplishments of our farmers and working men and working women and in the heroic deeds of our soldiers, sailors and airmen.

On motion of Mr. Macdonald (Kingston City) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 6 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—J. K. SMITH

Mr. RAYMOND:

1. Is J. K. Smith an employee of the wartime prices and trade board? If so, what is his position?

2. When was he appointed, and by whom?

3. Is he bilingual?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes. He is regional director of highway transport control (goods).

2. Mr. Smith commenced duties on May 1, 1942, and is on loan from the Montreal board of trade, and was appointed by order in council.

3. No, but Mr. Theberge, the associate director, is bilingual.

GASOLINE RATIONING—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. PURDY:

1. What representations have been made to the government or any of the ministers thereof to the effect that the reduction in the value of gasoline coupons in the maritime provinces has interfered with the existing methods of transportation?

2. (a) What is the number of people in the maritime provinces affected as above; (b) the number of such who would be assisted in their occupations if the passenger services on railroads were reinstated?

Mr. HOWE: My officers report that they cannot answer this question in its present form. It is suggested that if the competing routes were mentioned it might be possible to do something with regard to it.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the meantime, dropped.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—MILL WORK COMMITTEE

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Have the Wartime Housing Limited established or arranged what is known as a millwork committee?

2. What millworking establishments in Ontario are represented on this committee?

3. Is it a stipulation that contractors whose tenders are accepted for the erection of houses must confine their purchases for doors, windows, interior and exterior trim to these particular firms at a set price?

4. Does this action exclude the participation of others in supplying such material and eliminate competition?

5. Could not lower prices be obtained by purchase in the open market?

6. Has the Wartime Housing Limited authority to set prices for such material?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.
4. No.
5. There is no restriction which prevents any contractor working for Wartime Housing Limited to purchase in the open market provided that the price at which he wishes to purchase is lower than the price approved by the timber controller's office. No contractor has yet stated a desire to purchase above the price approved by the timber controller's office. Permission would not be withheld could he furnish an adequate reason for such an unusual procedure.
6. In the interest of low cost, Wartime Housing Limited sets a ceiling price at which millwork can be purchased, this ceiling price being the price that Wartime Housing Limited itself, through the timber controller, can purchase the millwork and deliver it to the contractors. If a contractor can purchase the millwork at a lower figure than the ceiling price approved by the timber controller's office, then upon his application in writing to purchase at a lesser price, he is granted the privilege. No contractor yet has ever been refused the right to purchase his millwork at lower costs than the approved ceiling price. There have been only two or three cases that contractors have asked for permission and permission was not withheld.

WARTIME HOUSING LIMITED—CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES AT WELLAND

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Was a contract recently awarded by the Wartime Housing Limited to the Russell Construction Company Limited of Toronto, for construction of houses at Welland, without tender?
2. If so, why were not competitive tenders called?
3. What are the prices being paid or to be paid to the Russell Construction Company Limited for each type of house and how many of each?
4. What building contractors have built or are building houses at Welland for the Wartime Housing Limited to date, and what was the price paid or to be paid these contractors for each type of house and how many of each?
5. Is it the practice of Wartime Housing Limited to invite tenders from a preferred list of contractors or to call public tenders?
6. If invited from a preferred list, on whose instructions was such action taken?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.
2. Tenders were taken twice in the past year on Welland projects. The results of handling these projects in that locality by this method was unsuitable for the present project. Previous projects have been much too slow. The presence on the grounds of the present contractor makes calling tenders even more difficult at this time.
3. There are no fixed prices on these houses. The house types are as follows:

Type H1 and H2....	62 houses	—A finish
	64 "	—B "
	62 "	—C "
	62 "	—D "
	250 houses
Type H11 and H12..	12 houses	—A finish
	12 "	—B "
	14 "	—C "
	12 "	—D "
	50 houses

4. (a) Russell Construction Company, Toronto; R. Timms Construction Limited, Welland.

(b) Projects at Welland are as follows:

Project	Scope	Unit Prices
No. 1	80 H1 and H2..	$1843 00 A finish
		1843 00 B "
		1843 00 C "
	20 H12.....	$2468 00 A finish
		2468 00 B "
		2468 00 C "
No. 2	35 H1 and H2..	$1773 00 A finish
		1773 00 B "
		1773 00 C "
	15 H12.....	$2350 00 A "
		2350 00 B "
		2350 00 C "
No. 3	43 H1 and H2..	$1758 30 A finish
		1758 30 B "
		1758 30 C "
	17 H12.....	$2332 75 A finish
		2332 75 B "
		2332 75 C "
No. 4	75 H1 and H2..	$1806 24 A finish
		1791 59 B "
		1791 59 C "
		1825 96 D "
	52 H11 and H12	$2326 63 A finish
		2306 98 B "
		2306 98 C "
		2340 47 D "
	23 H21 and H22	$1983 07 A finish
		1973 19 B "

5. Wartime Housing Limited welcomes tenders from qualified bidders and solicits them. In a great many cases, tenders are advertised for.

6. There is no such thing as a preferred bidder or a preferred list in Wartime Housing Limited. The difficulty is to get bona fide bids from qualified bidders and Wartime Housing Limited is constantly endeavouring to widen the competitive field rather than restrict it.

*"O CANADA"

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Will the discussion announced in the house by the Minister of National Defence for Air, and, according to the Minister of National Defence, still going on in the council for national defence, regarding a national anthem, be soon concluded?

Mr. RALSTON: The matter is being referred to the government for consideration.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—PERSONNEL

Mr. BLACKMORE:

1. Is there a Mr. Carswell employed in the shipbuilding section of the Department of Munitions and Supply? If so, what does he receive for, (a) regular duties; (b) as chairman or secretary of any war board; (c) for work in an advisory capacity to any board or department; (d) from the United Kingdom government operations in Canada and the United States; (e) for any other work?

2. Is Mr. Goldenberg of Montreal employed in the Department of Munitions and Supply? If so, what is his salary for, (a) regular duties; (b) as chairman or secretary of any war board; (c) for other work in an advisory capacity to any board or department; (d) from the United Kingdom government operations in Canada and the United States; (e) travelling and special expenses?

3. Has Mr. Goldenberg severed his connections with his legal firm in Montreal?

4. How much legal business is that firm getting from the Canadian and United Kingdom governments?

5. Is Mr. John Dobbie of Port Arthur employed in the Department of Munitions and Supply? If so, what was his initial salary? What is his present salary? How long has he worked in this department? What experience did he have in this line of work when appointed? What educational qualifications has he? Give reasons for increases in his salary, if any?

6. Was a Mr. Max Speller of Winnipeg appointed by the civil service commission to work in the Department of Munitions and Supply? Did he have a college degree? How long was he employed? What was his initial salary? Did he receive any increases in salary while employed in this department?

[Mr. Howe.]

7. Was a Mr. Nick Skhloev of Flin Flon and Winnipeg, Manitoba, appointed by the civil service commission to work in the Department of Munitions and Supply? Did he have a college degree? Was it with honours? Is it true that he was a student instructor for one year at the University of Manitoba while studying for his M.A. degree? What was his initial salary in the Department of Munitions and Supply? What salary was he getting when he resigned from that department? Why was no use made of this man's ability and specialized training?

8. Give reasons for Mr. Dobbie's promotion and increases in salary in the light of Mr. Skhloev's record?

RATIONING OF FOOD, CLOTHING AND GASOLINE—COSTS

Mr. CHURCH:

What is the total number of persons employed by the government in connection with the rationing of food, clothing and petrol, respectively, and at what aggregate cost?

RATIONING SYSTEM

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has a system of national rationing been sanctioned by the government?

2. If so, when, on what commodities and for what purpose?

3. What minister of the crown authorized it and will any statement be made as to its cost, staff, plan and reasons for this policy?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN FORCES—ENLISTMENTS JANUARY-APRIL, 1942

Mr. GREEN:

For a return showing by military districts or provinces, the enlistments in each of the months of January, February, March and April, 1942, (a) in the navy, (b) in the army, (c) in the air force.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked my hon. friend to allow this motion to stand. I assume it refers to enlistments which have taken place in the different districts or provinces. There has been some difficulty in answering questions which relate to residence in the different districts, but I assume that this applies to enlistments taking place in the districts. The information can be furnished with the qualification that in the case of the air force and the navy it will be by commands and naval districts rather than by military districts.

Mr. GREEN: Now that it has taken so long to get a reply to the question, would it be possible to have the figures for the month of May included?

Mr. RALSTON: I think so, yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried, with the qualification stated, and with the addition that the figures for May will be included.

Motion agreed to.

SPALDING, SASK., RURAL MAIL SERVICE

Mr. NICHOLSON:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, contracts and other documents in the possession of the Post Office Department regarding the carrying of the mails over the rural mail route out of Spalding, Saskatchewan, during the years 1941 and 1942.

MIDDLE EAST

FALL OF TOBRUK—PRESENT POSITION IN LIBYA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if in view of the distressing circumstances which have come to the notice of the whole world in the last forty-eight hours he has any additional information to give the house and the country as to the present position in Libya and elsewhere.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reply to my hon. friend I would say that the information which the government has received confirms the reports which have appeared in the press of this country. Nothing further has been received. It is as critical a situation in the middle east as has arisen since the war commenced. There have been as well evidences in the past forty-eight hours that in this world-encircling conflict Canada is coming more and more into the zone of immediate danger.

SOVIET UNION

ANNIVERSARY OF GERMAN ATTACK UPON THE U.S.S.R.—TRIBUTE TO RUSSIAN RESISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This being the anniversary of the declaration of war upon Russia by the Germans, it would I think be appropriate for me to say on behalf of this House of Commons and on behalf of the people of Canada how great has been our admiration of the magnificent fight which the Russians have put up during the whole of the past year, and of the powerful resistance which they have sustained throughout; also how anxious we are to have Russia know how wholeheartedly we are with her people and her forces in this world conflict. Any means by which it is possible for our country to continue to lend assistance to the Russians for whatever period there yet may be will be adopted. Having regard to existing commitments, assistance will be given to the utmost of our ability.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): In view of what the Prime Minister has just said, may I ask what method he intends to adopt to convey to the government of Russia the appreciation which he has just expressed and which I think will meet with the wholehearted approval of this house?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the moment I am speaking offhand, but if my hon. friend feels that a formal communication should be sent, I shall have pleasure in seeing that it is sent through External Affairs to the foreign office in Russia.

VANCOUVER ISLAND

ENEMY ATTACK UPON ESTEVAN POINT TELEGRAPH STATION—CONSIDERATIONS AFFECTING RELEASE OF INFORMATION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has some information to give the house with respect to the attack which was made by the enemy off the coast of Vancouver Island on Saturday last. It was the first attack upon Canadian soil that has been made since confederation. There have been attacks upon our ships off the coasts of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and in the gulf and river St. Lawrence, but Saturday night's attack was the first time in this war that our country has been attacked on land. It only goes to bear out what has been said so often that no one can take too seriously both the immediacy and the extent of the danger with which all parts of the world are confronted, and at this time our own part in particular.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): A statement was issued yesterday afternoon to the following effect: The commander in chief, west coast defences, reported that the dominion government telegraph station at Estevan Point, Vancouver island, was shelled by a submarine at 10.35 p.m., Pacific time, on Saturday night. No damage resulted. Regarding this incident, a report has been received from the superintendent of the wireless station to the effect that the shelling continued for about forty minutes and that about thirty or more shells fell. From the rate at which the shells were fired it would appear that there were possibly two enemy craft involved. The information also is that Canadian naval and air units operating in that area were ordered to the vicinity at once.

With regard to this matter of the time of release of the information, inquiries were made of the press bureau and the matter was taken up with the intelligence branches of the services, I should like to indicate for the information of members of the house the considerations which are kept in mind in connection with the time of release of information of this kind.

There are always questions with regard to the time of release of information like this, and I should like the house and the public to know that the inclination of all the defence services is to publish the information just as soon as possible after the event. There is, however, this consideration to be kept in mind: as was pointed out by my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) some little time ago, the publication of these reports by our own services means that we give the enemy news of the operations of their ships, which save those ships reporting direct and thereby risking the giving away of their position. It is, therefore, necessary to determine in each case what time should elapse between the event itself and the public announcement of it. This determination will have to rest to a large extent with the intelligence branches of the services involved. One of the important factors, of course, would be whether the enemy craft was near enough to land to enable its location to be ascertained by the interception of messages. No hard and fast rule can be laid down, as is apparent, and all I can say is that all the services will do everything consistent with security to publish information at the earliest moment practicable.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA COAL MINING AREAS—QUESTION OF PROVISION OF SHIPPING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): On June 18, as appears at page 3434 of Hansard, I inquired whether the Minister of Labour was in a position to give the house any information as to the seriousness of the coal situation in Nova Scotia, and he promised a statement as soon as possible. I wonder if the minister could make that statement now.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I had intended to reply to my hon. friend on Friday last, but the matter slipped my mind. An investigation was made through the director of shipping. As my hon. friend is aware, since I believe he has been so informed, the difficulty is purely one of shipping. Every effort is being made to see that ships are provided, and it is expected that within a short time the situation will be to some extent alleviated. That is as far as I can go at the moment.

[Mr. Ralston.]

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO TIME OF PRESENTATION ON TUESDAY NEXT, JUNE 23

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think I should inform the house that the budget will be presented to-morrow night at eight o'clock instead of to-morrow afternoon at three o'clock.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Friday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): Mr. Speaker, without any doubt or hesitation or reservation whatsoever, I support Bill No. 80. I believe that the repeal of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act is a wise step in itself. I believe, further, that if the vote on the plebiscite question is to be given any meaning, if the efforts and the speeches of many members of this house and of thousands of other good and loyal Canadians during the plebiscite campaign are to be held as anything more than wasted time and meaningless words, section 3 should be repealed. We must remember that the people of Canada, by a majority of more than 1,300,000 votes, have said that, to use the very words of the plebiscite question, they wished the government to be free "from any past commitments restricting the method of raising men for military service". The people having said that they wished the government to be free, the government now must take the necessary steps to free itself, and that is what the government is endeavouring to do in this bill.

If this bill is passed and the government is thereby freed, I believe that the government should then accept the responsibility for which it asked, by implication at least, in the plebiscite question, and for which it asked directly in the speech from the throne. The words in the speech from the throne which are now relevant are these, with some of the intervening words omitted in order to give perhaps a clearer sense of the meaning:

The government is of the opinion that . . . the administration, subject only to its responsibilities to parliament, should . . . possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

Those were the words of the speech from the throne; "the administration should possess complete freedom to act". I think that only one interpretation can be placed upon these words: the administration should have freedom, freedom to apply conscription for overseas service whenever the occasion should demand. But we must remember this, that true freedom, real freedom, involves the right of choice. Let me illustrate what I mean by a simple figure, to show the government's position. The highways of our country are free and open to all travellers. A wayfarer plans to journey along a road, and on his map he sees a point where that road branches or forks in two directions. Across one of these branches is an insurmountable barrier, and he says, "When I reach that fork I wish to have freedom to take either branch. Therefore remove the barrier, so that I may have freedom to travel as I think best. I cannot say at this moment which road I shall take. That decision will be made when I reach the junction, and will depend on several factors, some of which are largely beyond my control." Now the people of Canada, by their vote on the plebiscite question, have removed the barrier that lay across the road of government policy. They have removed the barrier of past commitments against conscription for overseas service. It must be taken that they wished the government to have power to follow the road of conscription if the government so wished. That much, at least, is implied in the plebiscite vote. And if the plebiscite result did not mean that the government should be free to take that road, then the plebiscite result meant nothing. It represented a waste of time and effort and money.

Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the plebiscite result may not have meant that the government must take that road. On this point there has been much discussion. It is a point which perhaps can never be settled, unless, indeed, by the taking of another vote on the question of conscription or no conscription.

But surely it must be agreed that those who voted "yes" in answer to the plebiscite question contemplated and accepted the possibility of conscription. An hon. member behind me says "that is not so." Then I ask him: "from what did they relieve the government?" They relieved it from past commitments against conscription. Therefore they must have said to the government, "If you wish at some future time to impose conscription, you shall have that right so far as it is within our power to grant it."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the very minimum.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Many of them may have said to themselves, and no doubt did say, "We do not order or direct you to apply conscription." I think many people said to themselves, "We cannot settle these great questions. Let the government settle them. Let the government be free to settle them according to its best judgment. Let it take the road of conscription or the road of no conscription, but let it be free." That is what I think was in the mind of the overwhelming majority of those people who voted "yes".

I must say that some of the statements made in this house and elsewhere on this question in the last few months and weeks are very difficult, for me at least, to understand. One who listened to the debates in this house last week and the week before or who read the reports of these debates might well gain the impression that the majority of hon. members were against conscription in any circumstances whatever. That impression might well, I say, have been gained by reading or listening to those speeches. Some speakers, indeed, have openly stated that that was their view. Others, while stating that they would support conscription if it became absolutely necessary, proceeded to damn conscription with the faintest possible sort of praise. Still others discussed the wisdom of applying conscription now, at this particular moment. They talked as if conscription were likely to be applied to-morrow. I should like to deal with some of these points and with a few others which have arisen from time to time in this connection.

I take, first, the argument as to the efficacy of conscription for overseas service. It has been said that conscription has no value or very little value, that it will not increase in any appreciable degree the number of men available for overseas service, that it has only a very limited, a very small place, in the totality of our war effort. Now, if these arguments are valid; if conscription is no good or of very minor good at any time, we have wasted much valuable time in discussing conscription. The reference in the speech from the throne to the government being free from past commitments was a wholly unnecessary reference. There is not much sense in asking to be free to do something which in the long run will amount to nothing. Similarly, the introduction of the plebiscite bill and the holding of the plebiscite were wholly unnecessary moves. If conscription is of no value and cannot be of any value, then the plebiscite was of no value.

It was worse than valueless. It had a definite minus value, because it cost money, required time, required energy, stirred up feelings, and created bitternesses that had much better never have been born. If conscription is of no value it was foolish to seek release from a pledge against it.

In the second place it is said that conscription will be useless so far as the navy and the air force are concerned, that you cannot force a man to be a sailor or an airman. Now in Great Britain, as I understand the situation there, every man between the ages of eighteen and a half and fifty-one years is subject to conscription. Once conscripted, he is asked which branch of the service he prefers—navy, army or air force—and so far as is possible his wishes are gratified. I should hope that the Royal Navy is not altogether forgotten by those men who are conscripted, nor the Royal Air Force; and I should further hope, and my hope has been justified by events, that when these men get into the Royal Navy or the Royal Air Force they are able to acquit themselves worthily. There is, of course, complete conscription in enemy countries, and their air forces and their armies and their navies have done, I regret to say, somewhat too well for my liking in many instances. Furthermore, I think my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will agree that it is an unjust and unwarranted reflection on the army to suggest that men may not be good enough for the navy and the air force but still good enough for his service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were good enough for Nelson at Trafalgar.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is pointed out in the third place that Northern Ireland, South Africa and Australia have not adopted the system of compulsory service overseas. I observe with considerable interest that our sister dominion of New Zealand is not on that roll: she is not there because for nearly two years that dominion has had conscription for overseas service, and I would remind my hon. friends of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation—what they already know, of course—that New Zealand in those years has had a labour government. It is quite correct to say that Northern Ireland, South Africa and Australia still follow the voluntary system so far as overseas service is concerned. But what about our other allies? What about Great Britain? What about the United States? What about Russia? There is conscription in every one of those countries. What about our enemies—Germany, Italy, and Japan? They all have conscription. In fact, it can be said truthfully that practically every European country when it became engaged in war adopted the compulsory system; and it seems to me that the example of Northern Ireland and of our sister dominions of South Africa and Australia is hardly an infallible guide against such a weight of contrary evidence from those other great countries.

In the fourth place, Mr. Speaker, it is said we should not have conscription for overseas service because it would interfere with our industrial production and our agricultural production. Somewhat similar was the argument advanced by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation at the beginning of the war. His party wished to see a sort of economic war by Canada with no men going overseas, either voluntarily or by conscription. The general argument as to industry and agriculture can be answered in many ways, but I shall refer to only two.

First, even if we were to adopt the principle of overseas service now and put it into practice later, we should not, we must not, strip our factories and our farms of workers. War industries of course must continue; agriculture must be maintained if the war is to go on, and I think it is merely raising a weak sort of bogey to say it would be otherwise.

The second answer is one that was presented on Friday last in this chamber by the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald). It was advanced two years ago in the debate on the National Resources Mobilization Act by my hon. friend the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), who said he thought it was a very low sort of patriotism, a very poor sort of patriotism, that said: "We will confine ourselves to the economic side, to agricultural and industrial production, while others do the fighting." My hon. friend from Brantford City says the same thing, and he made this point, that if every nation took that attitude there would be no one to fight. If Russia said: "We are a great agricultural country; we can produce wheat; we also have great industries here, and we can produce implements of war; let the United States and England do the fighting," and if the United States and Britain and the rest took the same attitude, nobody would be left to fight. Tanks are necessary, of course, in this sort of war; planes are necessary; ships are necessary. But tanks in a factory, planes in a hangar, ships on a shipway, guns in a plant, never yet won a war, and they never will. You must have men to operate these before they become effective.

The real truth is that successful warfare involves the work of both civilians and members of the armed forces. Some men must work on the farms, some men must work in the factories, and others must fight; and the two sorts of effort must be properly coordinated. What is needed in warfare is what the Prime Minister has properly described as a balanced effort. You will not have a balanced effort in this country if you devote all the energies of your people to industrial and agricultural production, and certainly you will not have a balanced effort if you put all your men into uniform, whether for service within Canada or outside.

Then it has been argued that if conscription is to be enforced, its actual imposition should come about only by direct action of this parliament. As I understand the argument, it comes to this, that what we say or do now amounts to very little. Here and now in this debate we are merely deciding some sort of philosophic principle, the practical application of which cannot be made until this parliament meets again or until this parliament has had a second discussion and decided that the moment has come to apply conscription. That view has been set forth by the member for Rosetown-Biggar, the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), and by some of his followers. They argue that it is undemocratic to leave to the government the power to decide by order in council at what moment conscription should be imposed.

It must be remembered—and this has been pointed out before many times in this house, a few days ago by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself—that this government now has the power to conscript persons, their services and their property. It has complete power in the matter of conscription except in one respect, and that is that it cannot conscript persons for military service outside Canada and Canada's territorial waters. That is the only restriction upon the powers of this government, and that is the restriction which Bill No. 80 seeks to remove.

Members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and some other members of this house profess to find in this bill a principle that is undemocratic. For some reason or other the theory has been spread abroad, or has grown up by itself, that there is some peculiar difficulty or some particular obstacle involved in troops crossing the water or at any rate over any considerable body of water. There was an old superstition that if you were pursued by a witch the wise and cautious thing to do was to get a running stream between you and the witch. The witch could not cross the water. I hope that many people read Burns in these times, because he was the prince of the poets of the people. He was one of the greatest of democrats. He has immortalized this superstition in his poem "Tam O'Shanter". It will be recalled by Burns' readers that Tam O'Shanter, after a drinking bout with his old soldier friend in the tavern, was returning home when he was pursued by witches, one of whom outsped the rest. Tam spurred his mare in order to reach the bridge which spanned the river Doon. The witch of course was equally anxious to catch Tam before he reached the bridge, and in one frantic leap she seized the grey mare's tail and carried it off, but the grey mare carried Tam safely across.

There seems to be general agreement here that it is all very well to send troops to Alaska or to any other point in the United States, but when it comes to sending troops across the water, across the Atlantic, you are going into an entirely new field. I would say to my hon. friend of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that in 1940 they raised no objection to the National Resources Mobilization Act in so far as conscription of men was concerned. I will agree that they said that if you are to conscript men you must first conscript industry and finance.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is still our position.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Yes, that is your position.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have not changed it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): In 1940, though, when the bill before the house provided for the conscription of men, my hon. friends in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation raised no objection to it on that point. Indeed, they wanted even greater conscription than the bill provided for. They did not then oppose the idea of giving the governor in council power to require every person in Canada to place himself at the service of the country, but they are not prepared now to give the governor in council power to conscript men for overseas service.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have had two years' experience.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is not all my hon. friends say. The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have declared themselves ready to resort to other measures of conscription, certain other types of regimention, and these were outlined by the leader of the party not later than a few days ago in this house. He said his group believed in nationalizing all financial institutions. It believed in compulsory loans, interest free; it believed in government ownership or government control of all essential war industries; it believed in a 100 per cent tax on all profits, and it sought to establish what is called a maximum-minimum income. All these proposals represent very considerable measures of compulsion or regimentation, and it seems to me that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, when it speaks now of the undemocratic spirit which is manifest in this bill, is merely straining at the gnat of compulsory service overseas while it swallows the camel of those other far-reaching measures of compulsion to which I have just referred.

It is said now that we should come back to parliament even after this debate is concluded and submit to parliament the direct question whether we should have conscription at that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who has raised that question? We have not.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I agree that my hon. friend has not raised it, but it has been said and he knows it has been said both in this house and elsewhere. I regard a second debate on this question as unnecessary. The question has been before the people in one form or another for nearly three years. It has been before the house directly since January 23 last, when the speech from the throne was read. We have had a plebiscite on it, and I must confess that I felt that if the vote on the plebiscite were in the affirmative, there would be very little further debate on the matter. The people would have registered their verdict and parliament would endeavour to give effect to that verdict. That was my view.

We talk a great deal about democracy in these days, and it is well that we should; but I wonder whether democracy is doing itself any service by spending the greater part of five months in the discussion of a question of this sort in times like the present. For my part, on this point of going back to the house a second time I take my stand on the words of the Prime Minister, spoken in this house on June 10. First he quoted from his speech of February 25 in which he had used these words—Hansard, page 3234:

> When we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision, present it to parliament and have it discussed on its merits.

[Mr. A. L. Macdonald.]

After making that quotation from his February speech the Prime Minister went on to say:

> Unless the question of conscription for overseas service is to be twice debated, that, as I see it, is the stage we have now reached. The government is making its policy with respect to the raising of men for service overseas fully known. We are presenting that policy to parliament.

That is the stand I take now. There should be no second debate on this question. Those who say that parliament should be consulted again put themselves in rather a curious position, it seems to me. Let us suppose there should be a second debate in this parliament, and that the debate should determine that the time had come when the application of the principle of conscription for overseas service should be made; is it to be expected that even at that stage every detail of the plan would be laid before parliament? Is it to be held that every time a unit is to be sent overseas the matter will be referred to parliament for decision as to whether or not it should go? It seems to me that the proper function of parliament in these as in other cases is to decide general principles, leaving such matters as the time of application of those principles, the numbers of men involved and other details of the kind, to be decided by the governor in council, the decisions of the governor in council, being of course later submitted to parliament, as is required by the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Again there are some who say—not so many now as there were at one time, but still there are some—that this war is an imperialistic war, that it is England's war, a war in which Canadians who are not of British birth or origin can be expected to show only little interest. How can it be truly said that this is an imperialistic war, whether you take the word "imperialism" in its territorial or its financial sense? What evidence is there that the government of the United Kingdom in September, 1939, had any territorial ambitions when it declared war? It did not wish to acquire any territory; indeed it has had a hard enough time during recent months in dealing with some of the territory it already has. No; the United Kingdom government went to war because it was bound by treaty to Poland, just as it was bound by treaty to Belgium in 1914; and the government of Britain made good its bond in 1939 as it had done twenty-five years earlier. Imperialism! Did France want territory, or Belgium, or Holland, or Norway, or any of the other countries that have been overrun by Germany? Did the United States hunger for more land? No; the United States took up the sword because it had been attacked treacherously and in the worst possible faith by the empire of Japan.

On that point as to whether this is an imperialistic war, let me quote three paragraphs from the Atlantic charter to show what is the real policy of Great Britain and the United States:

Their countries—

This is the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States speaking.

4. Their countries seek no aggrandisement, territorial or other.

5. They desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labour standards, economic adjustment, and social security.

6. After the final destruction of the nazi tyranny, they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

That is the Atlantic charter. I follow that with a passage from the agreement entered into by the twenty-six united nations as published at Washington on January 1 of this year. The united nations state that—

. . . complete victory over their enemies is essential to defend life, liberty, independence and religious freedom and to preserve human rights and justice in their own lands as well as in other lands, and that they are now engaged in a common struggle against savage and brutal forces seeking to subjugate the world.

Then every one of the twenty-six governments pledged themselves to "employ its full resources, military or economic, against the members of the tripartite pact and its adherents with which such government is at war". Now, under that agreement—and Canada is a signatory to it—we must employ our whole resources, military or economic. We are to supply not merely munitions, not merely food, but men as well, to the common task.

No; this is not an imperialistic war. This is a Canadian war, a war which we entered as a free nation by the free vote of this parliament. It is a Canadian war just as truly as it is an English or a United States or a Russian war.

If anybody has any doubts whatever as to whether this is a Canadian war, let him remember the news that has come to us within the last twenty-four hours. Our territory has been attacked by a hostile power. The Japanese evidently regard this as a Canadian war. So do the Germans. So do the German submarines that sank ships at the very entrance of the river St. Lawrence, and so do the German surface craft that have attacked Canadian ships, both merchant ships and ships of war, on the high seas. Further, if the axis powers should be victorious in this struggle, the people of Canada would very soon discover whether this is a Canadian war or merely an English war.

No; the imperialism, the lust for power—military, economic, territorial—abides in the hearts of the axis rulers and nowhere else. It is they who began this war; it is they who have pursued it with a savage ferocity and brutality unknown since the days of the barbarians. It is they who took up the sword. It is they who will perish by the sword. And it is their leaders and those other men responsible for the atrocities that have been committed who must be brought to book and who will be brought to book in God's good time.

On our part and on the part of our allies this is a war of defence, defence against unprovoked aggression. Where that defence can best be carried out, where the enemy can be best met and subdued, is a matter that should be decided by those skilled in the art of war. This is Canada's war, and I believe that all Canadians are coming to realize this fact.

War is never a pleasant business. War always involves hardship and sacrifice and difficulty. In these grave times every man should speak his mind frankly and contribute whatever he can to the solution of the great problem now before us. I believe, as I said in the beginning, that this parliament should give to the government the power which it seeks, the power to apply conscription for overseas service, whenever the government thinks that step is necessary. I do not say that the moment is now or to-morrow or next week, but I do say that the moment may come, and may come suddenly. The government, in coming to its decision on that important point, will of course give every consideration to the needs of agriculture, to the needs of industry, and to the needs of Canadian defence. Let it never be thought that if this power is given to the government the result will be that every man in Canada will be hauled away overseas. No; we must maintain our farms; we must maintain our factories; we must maintain the defence of our own shores and our own soil.

But these things having been done, and there being still available some men for overseas service, and the need for conscripting these men having arisen, I say frankly that in my judgment the government should have the power to apply conscription. I say further that if it is demonstrated to the Canadian people that the need does exist, then those people will desire to have that need met.

And when I say "the people of Canada" I mean all the people of Canada, and not the people of only certain parts of this country. I believe that when that need is seen and understood, Canada will meet it and still continue to be a united country. When our people realize that our existence as a nation is threatened, there is no Canadian who, seeing that condition, will not be willing to put forth every effort to meet it, and to meet it manfully.

I have only a moment more to speak, and in that time I wish to make one more reference. I remember that forty years ago Sir Wilfred Laurier some time after his return from a visit to England where he attended the Queen's Jubilee, made in the little Nova Scotia town of Arichat one of his most beautiful addresses. He said to those people—mostly French Acadians, sturdy loyal people as they were, have been and are—that when he was in Europe he had seen a beautiful cathedral. It was built of oak and marble and granite and glass, each of these elements retaining its own individuality and its own appearance, but each contributing its share to the beauty and symmetry of the whole. Then he went on to say, "That cathedral is the image of the nation I wish Canada to become. So long as I live," he said, "I shall repel the idea of changing the nature of any of the constituent elements of this country. I want the Englishman to remain the Englishman. I want the Irishman to remain the Irishman. I want the Scotsman to remain the Scotsman and the Frenchman to remain the Frenchman. But I want to take all these elements and weld them into a nation which will stand among the foremost nations of the world."

For myself, I adhere to Laurier's view; I hold to Laurier's vision. Let the races that people this country maintain their individuality; let them cling to their own traditions. But let there be running alongside of and in no way interfering with that loyalty to their own race, a loyalty to Canada, a willingness to defend Canada, a pride in the romantic and stirring story of her past, a hope for the bounty and beauty of her future.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, before I express my thoughts on the important bill now before the house may I congratulate the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) upon the splendid speech he has just made. There was very little in that speech with which a member of His Majesty's loyal opposition could not heartily agree. I only wish the minister were in the position of having associated with him in the cabinet, and behind him among the private members of his party, those who would give him the same support as he has here to-day in the ranks of the opposition.

To-day, Monday, June 22, 1942, is one of the grim days of a very grim war, because during the week-end the fortress of Tobruk has fallen, with the loss of 25,000 prisoners, and vast stores of equipment, including no doubt much equipment made in Canada. One cannot help thinking that if there had been Canadian troops with that Canadian equipment, this tragedy might not have occurred to the British empire and to the united nations. Further, during the week-end a wedge has been driven into the defences of our gallant Russian ally at Sevastopol. It looks to-day as though that great fortress, too, will fall within a very short time. To the west, out in the Aleutian islands the Japanese have taken their second stride toward our Pacific coast by seizing Kyska, some 270 miles nearer Dutch harbour than Attu, which they seized less than three weeks ago, and as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said this afternoon, a Japanese submarine has shelled the Canadian coast at Estevan Point, halfway up the western coast of Vancouver island. This is the first time, I believe, in over a century that the shores of Canada have been under fire. I repeat: This is a grim day, and I hope the House of Commons will face the realities of the situation. I hope there will be less looking back, less reviewing things done decades or generations ago, less fanning the fires of old prejudices, and more facing of present day ugly facts, more looking fearlessly into the dark and yet challenging days ahead; less talk about national unity and more concern about national survival.

As hon. members are well aware, we are debating Bill No. 80, described as an act to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940. This is a bill to repeal section 3 of that act, which section restricts the very wide powers of mobilization given the cabinet by section 2. It provides—and I quote from the section to be repealed:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

The provisions of that restriction have been narrowed to some extent by the government in that they have been taken as not applying to territory adjacent to Canada. I approve heartily of this bill and I shall vote for it. I believe it is necessary, and I believe also that it is very late. It should have been introduced into and passed by this house a long time ago. But I deplore the policy announced by the Prime Minister in connection therewith, which is in effect that although the restrictive section is to be repealed, the government will carry on as if the section were still in the act. We have been told and told quite clearly that the government believes that no change in policy is necessary yet, that it is merely removing this restriction in case the cabinet should decide that a change in policy is necessary at a later date, which later date the ministers have shown by their speeches during the present debate, they fervently hope will never come. Obviously the very thought of it gives them the jitters.

Apparently the Canadian cabinet believe that nothing has happened in the last few months to warrant a change in position. It makes one wonder whether they see the realities of the war at all. In recent months Great Britain has lost an army in Malaya, I believe the largest British army ever captured. Britain has lost thousands of men in Burma, and she has been forced to create a large new army in India. She has been forced to occupy Madagascar, and now she is planning to open a second front on the continent of Europe which will involve hundreds of thousands of men. Our Australian brothers have lost a division in Malaya, and they have been forced to recall their first-class fighting troops from the Mediterranean in order to protect their homeland against the Japanese. The United States have lost an army in the Philippines, the largest United States army ever captured. The Netherlands have lost their forces in the East Indies, and Russia has lost hundreds of thousands of her troops. Yet our cabinet believes that there has been no change in the situation in the last few months to justify any change in policy.

In actual fact the position to-day is that everyone in this house knows and the Canadian people at large know that we are not winning the war. It is a question whether we are holding our own. Let me warn the government that this is the time to throw in every ounce of our national strength without reservation. Let the cabinet do what is set out in the preamble of the National Resources Mobilization Act which confers upon the governor in council special emergency powers to permit of the mobilization of all the effective resources of the nation, both human and material. I warn the government further that a large majority of the Canadian people believe that the hour has come for all-out action, and called for such action by their vote on the plebiscite. In fact from the very start of the war the majority of the people in this country have been far ahead of the government in wanting to wage a total war.

This debate has drifted steadily away from the real issues brought forward by this bill, and I propose to state four of those issues as I see them. The main issue is not whether we are to have conscription, although one might think that that was so from the speeches that have been made in this debate. That issue was decided on June 21, 1940, when the National Resources Mobilization Act became law. There has been compulsion for over two years. The main issue now is whether men conscripted are to be available for service wherever they are needed. I repeat those words—wherever they are needed. They are not so available now, and will not be so long as the government continues its present policy. These men will be used only in Canada or in adjacent territories. That is the policy of the government at this present time. Unless they are needed to fight in or near Canada, they will never do any fighting. Minister after minister has risen in his place in the house during the present debate to emphasize the importance of keeping the enemy away from our shores; yet these young men serving under the terms of the National Resources Mobilization Act will have no part in keeping the enemy away from our shores. It may mean the waste of thousands of the cream of our young men by not making full use of them because they are tied down here in Canada under the present government policy. There can be no doubt that the present policy means that there is and that there will be no equality of sacrifice among our young men, because a young man may choose whether he will serve where he is needed or at home in Canada. I submit to the house that that is the main issue brought up by this bill.

Then there is a second issue—whether or not Canada is building up or can build up an efficient army in this country under the present government policy. Several ministers have placed a very low value as soldiers upon these young men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I think that has been most unfair. Many of these men simply are not interested in the army because they consider it is the responsibility of the government to decide where they are to serve. In the meantime they are doing what they are ordered to do, in some cases with not a great deal of enthusiasm. Many of them have been under pressure from the time they were called up. Other young men who have seen fit to join the active forces receive extra leave, or considerations of one kind or another, such as being kept off fatigue duty. The men who will not join the active forces are not allowed to wear the badge "Canada" on their shoulders.

The man who volunteers for the active army is allowed to wear this badge. I remember that in the last war nothing gave me more pride, nothing did more to raise my morale, than the fact that I had on my shoulder that badge "Canada." Yet under the present system these young men are not allowed to wear the badge of their country, and this will continue under the present government policy.

There are two types of troops in every unit except those that belong to the fourth division. The Prime Minister said in his speech the other day there were some 30,000 of these home defence troops and the number of these men who have not volunteered for service abroad will increase greatly from time to time.

That all means one thing, and one thing that is very serious; it means friction in the units in Canada. As a result it is difficult to have efficient units. As a result we are asking the commanders of these units to do the impossible. It is like asking a man to fight with one hand tied behind his back. I repeat that under this present policy we cannot build an efficient army in Canada.

The third real issue is whether or not Canada is developing or can develop the spirit of the offensive, the will to wage war, without which there can be no victory. Under the present government policy we are developing a home defence complex. The talk, of which we had some this afternoon from the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), is all to the effect that the place to fight the enemy is where you can find him, that the place to fight is beyond Canada. But that is not the government's policy under the National Resources Mobilization Act; the policy under that act is to build an army for Canada only, and the result is to focus the attention of the Canadian people on home defence when it should be on attack. Canada should be building here an army with which to strike out. For example, we should be building an army for the purpose of eventually striking out in the Pacific, perhaps into Alaska, perhaps to Siberia or Australia and finally into Japan. This war will never be won on the north American continent unless it is won by the Germans and the Japanese.

The fourth and final real issue is whether or not the present policy is lowering the prestige of Canada, whether or not it is wounding the pride of the Canadian people in their nation—and probably this is the most serious issue of all. You know, it gives certain people the opportunity to rave —I use the word "rave" advisedly—about imperialism and colonialism and all that sort of thing. This foolish talk, to which very few people here pay much attention, is apt to be taken seriously beyond our boundaries, and unfortunately this debate has brought out talk of that sort. It comes largely from the same people who talked the most and the hardest against Canada preparing for this war, who are mainly responsible for the tragic state of unpreparedness in which we found ourselves when war broke out. The fact is, and this cannot be overemphasized too much, that the vast majority of the Canadian people in every province are proud to be in the British empire and intend to stay in it.

Then consider our relationship with the people of the United States, the great and friendly nation to the south. The American boy, under American policy, is called up and can be sent wherever he is needed, anywhere in the world—Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia; there is no limit. He goes where he is needed, and goes willingly. Under our present policy it is not so with the Canadian boy. It is very difficult to justify this to an American. The result of these differences in policy is that the American feels that Canada is not waging total war, and his Canadian friends feel deeply hurt by that attitude. Yet that is the position, and I do not think any hon. member of this house can deny it. Therefore I say that this policy is bad for Canada's prestige and bad for the national pride of our people.

In conclusion let me say again that these four issues are real; each is of vital importance, yet judged in the light of any one of them, the present policy of the government is wrong. That policy must be changed and changed quickly. It can never, never, never hold the respect or arouse the spirit of the Canadian people, because they are an intelligent, forthright, courageous people, and they know instinctively that it is a policy of doing things by halves. They know that the government is holding back. I urge upon the ministry, with all the force I can put into it, that they change their policy at once. If they do not feel that they can do so as a party ministry, let them set up a non-party government in this country. I urge them to lead the Canadian people from the present so-called "balanced war effort"—and oh, how they gloat over those words!—into the only thing that really matters, and that is an all-out war effort. For it may be that only by so doing can our nation of Canada survive.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the last two speeches, and I wish to make only one comment with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) just before he sat down. The hon. member said, "If you cannot do so and so as a party government, then set up a non-party government and do it that way." I confess I am occasionally in disagreement with the government, as I am in disagreement to a certain extent to-day. But when I consider what might be done in the way of change—just supposing that were decided upon—and I look at the opposition benches, I am bound to confess that the situation becomes completely hopeless. My view in that regard is the view that was expressed by Lord Wellington when he saw some of his army. He said, "I don't know what the enemy will think of them, but my God, they scare me!" When the hon. member was suggesting a non-party government I could not help thinking that it hardly lies in his mouth to make a proposal of that kind; for when anything like that comes from what might be called an interested party it is bound to carry less weight than it otherwise would.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is not fair. That is cheap politics.

Mr. MAYBANK: I am just pointing out that it is always a factor.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is unbecoming to the hon. member; it is cheap politics.

Mr. MAYBANK: Well, after what I might term this impetuous interruption, I must say that it is my intention to be perfectly frank, and I invite the same frankness from others. In what I have to say to-day I intend to speak with the utmost candour. I do not make remarks for the purpose of wounding any person, but simply to express the situation as I see it, and as I might talk about it personally with the hon. gentleman himself.

A few days ago I was struck by a remark or two made by the hon. gentleman who until a short time ago was ably bearing the burden of the portfolios of public works and transport. He adjured us at that time to be frank in all our dealings. I agree with him. We had a further reference to it this afternoon. I think candour is what we most need in all our dealings with each other. All of us have been guilty of saying less than the truth. I repeat that I do not wish by any sharp word or acid expression to injure or wound anyone. I would not be making any reference to the former minister with such an idea in mind, particularly in view of the fact that he is not here this afternoon. We all know why he is not here; he is not a well man, and no doubt that accounts for his absence. I speak in no spirit of recrimination or in order to cast blame when I say that he himself, it seems to me, has been guilty in the past of some lack of candour. At the time the plebiscite vote was decided upon, the hon. gentleman had before him the whole vista which he can see to-day. He must have known—at any rate he could have known—of the change of law which is now proposed. It does not seem to me that he made his position as clear then as he should have. However, in that regard lack of frankness is not to be found solely in that quarter. It has been evident over the last couple of years, this political lack of frankness, on the part of the government and of the various oppositions, and supporters of the government, among whom I include myself, and of the opposition parties. I do say that we have to get down to talking cold truth to each other. We must, to use Tennyson's words, "Cut prejudice against the grain." In doing so, we need not forget that, "Gentle words are always gain."

The domestic history of Canada since the beginning of this war has been a striving after unity, and I do not think the government can be denied a great deal of praise for the degree of unity which has obtained in Canada ever since the war started. To some it seems as though the unity we have had thus far is to be destroyed. Personally I am entirely unwilling to subscribe to any such idea, but we have to look facts in the face in order to avoid disunity. It would appear that in the controversy that is agitating Canada to-day there are eight provinces ranged on one side of the argument, with one province—old Quebec—standing alone on the other. Many people in parts of those eight provinces are angry with the people of the other province. Most of our colleagues who come from Quebec are opposed to the change in this law which can, and I think probably will, introduce the principle of compulsory service overseas. Most of English-speaking Canada is in favour of the law change, and, I believe, also in favour of the adoption of the compulsory service principle.

My views respecting compulsory service are well known. I favour the adoption of that principle, and in that respect I find myself in disagreement with my colleagues from the lower province. Further, when I think of the course the debate has taken, I confess to an impatience with the government itself, particularly in view of some of the remarks which have been made by supporters of the government. While such are my views, I should be sad indeed if any person supposed I have any animus or any other feeling than deep affection not merely for all my colleagues from Quebec but for the people they represent. Some of my closest and dearest friends are those representatives. I have been the recipient of many services, many acts of friendship from them. Although my views as to what should be done in this matter may differ from theirs, I have no emotions other than amity and respect for all my colleagues from that part of Canada and for all the people of Quebec.

There may be small and unimportant groups in various parts of Canada where criticism of Quebec from time to time is rife. For my own part there never has been a time when I looked askance at the people of that province. None of my friends ever did, nor is it the usual thing in my community. I believe I have always had some appreciation of the difficulties of the Quebec situation. I remember a description of the people of Quebec which was given in this house by a Conservative member who is not now here; I refer to Mr. Héon, of Argenteuil. His remarks were a guide to me because I always felt that they were a pretty good description of the people of his province. I should like to read them to the house, because they lead to certain comments later. Speaking in the short war session, the hon. member said, as reported in Hansard of September 9, 1939, page 80:

May I now be allowed, on behalf of my own people, to make this urgent plea to my English-Canadian friends? Never have I striven to be more sincere or convincing in all my life than in the appeal I am about to make. An immense majority of my compatriots have never concerned themselves with foreign affairs. They have never kept track of the sinuous courses of European diplomacy, nor have they taken time out to look up the meaning of "putsch" and "anschluss" or seek on a map of Europe the strategical value of Memel and Pomorze, Warsaw and Lodz, Lauterbourg or the Saar basin.

The French Canadian has been mostly concerned, as were his ancestors before him, with clearing the forest, tilling the soil and providing food and shelter for the children with whom providence has blessed him from year to year. The practice of the golden rule, the presentation to the nation of stalwart intelligent sons and daughters, the defence of their territory against aggression, have been to my compatriots their main expressions of patriotism. The church, the little village, the large family, the soil enriched with their sweat, the peace and restfulness of the Quebec countryside, have drawn and kept their attention for three hundred years. The sons of French Canada have not been brought up in an atmosphere of militarism, nor have they spent their young days in playing with toy cannon and soldiers. Most of them have never shouldered a gun except to provide game for the family table. Very few have ever had even elementary military training. It cannot be expected then that in three days every one of them will be clamouring for a one-way passage to the western front, or that, like some of us, their hearts will skip a beat at the mention of peace in Europe and the independence of Poland. Yet their honesty of purpose, their love of freedom, their devotion to Christian institutions, their loyalty to their king cannot be challenged. It may well be that this passionate love for their own land has somewhat obscured the wider, the more international outlook on the welfare of mankind which we are now being asked to uphold and defend; but let me assure hon. members, that when Baptiste discovers that his freedom, institutions, and essential rights which he prizes so dearly are really threatened there will be no one who will fight more savagely than he to defend them.

[Mr. Maybank.]

I wish to make just two comments on that passage. First I would remind hon. members that such a passage helps greatly or ought to help the Anglo-Saxon in apprehending the character and personality of the man of Quebec. The second comment I would make is that those who could have done it have not been making clear to these people the danger to the freedom, insititutions and essential rights which are prized so dearly, as Héon says. I desire a little later to come back to that passage, but just at the moment I wish to move on to other matters for the purpose of indicating to the house the disquietude to which I referred a little while ago, and the reasons for it.

What is disquieting to me about this law and the debate upon it is the nature of the statements that are being made. One statement seems to suggest that the law is being amended for a purpose, that it is being amended for use, and another statement seems to suggest that it is not being amended for any purpose at all and will never be used, and that there is no occasion for using it. I feel that at this time the government could be much more simple and direct than it has been thus far. I know you cannot have the government name the date on which a certain act or policy will be put into force, but it does seem to me that we could do better than have speeches one day which indicate the utter improbability of the law ever being used, and another day the distinct probability that it will be used. I notice with considerable disquietude certain statements that have been made. Take this for instance. It is said that compulsory service for overseas is not necessary and that reinforcement needs are already well in hand. To my way of thinking, to base any policy upon a statement of that kind is not wise. That is a quite unimportant statement. Reinforcement needs are apparently about 1½ per cent. When one says the situation is well in hand for the army, then by implication one is saying that there will be no change in the army's position. It means that a second front is eyewash. It means there will not be any attempted invasion, or if there is, it will be in a place where Canadian soldiers are not. Or perhaps it means that if there is a second front they will not be there. It seems to me that to lay plans on any such assumptions as these is unwise. I think that such assumptions themselves are invalid.

Reference has already been made to the present situation of our army. At the present time no person can deny, I am sure the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will not deny, that we have an illogical and unsystematic condition in the army. Volunteers and draftees are called in together. If reinforcements are demanded, the odds have to be separated from the evens, the V's from the D's, and if a large reinforcement draft is needed it cannot be got from one place. Reinforcement drafts have first of all to be picked out from here and there, and pieced together afterwards. If there is virtue in men working together, it is lost under that system. It does not seem to be good business. It may be necessary; it may be that we shall never get away from it. I should like to see a definite statement on the question as to probabilities. I believe a change from that sort of thing is inevitable, and if it is inevitable we might as well face it, although perhaps it is not necessary to-morrow morning. I do not say it is. I believe that what should be done is to indicate the probability now in order that people may become accustomed to it.

Now, upon the general question of necessity for compulsory service, I believe that has not been the test in the past. No person, for example, would say that compulsory service was instituted for Canada upon the grounds of necessity. It is patently absurd to say that conscription for overseas service is not necessary, that volunteers will do, that there are plenty of volunteers, but that when it comes to defence of the hearth and the home on this very soil, resort must be had to compulsion. Obviously we never instituted compulsory service in this country with any such idea in mind. When men were called for thirty days training we did not call them with the idea of forming a defence-of-Canada army; that was patently absurd also. We called them up for other reasons, partly I think in order to get the principle of compulsory service accepted and to get the people accustomed to it. That was what I believed at the time, and I blame myself for not having said so. Likewise, when it was extended to four months, that was not done with the intention of forming an army for the defence of Canada, nor yet again when the men were continued for the duration of the war was it for the defence of Canada. We have never had compulsory service in Canada with that idea in mind.

If anyone has any doubt whatever about that proposition I ask him to consider three points. The first is that we never expected a military attack from the east. The second is that we did not expect a war with Japan, and consequently we did not expect an attack on the west coast. Since these propositions are true, obviously we were not creating an army for the defence of Canada. But if these reasons are not enough to convince one that the draft was not for the defence of Canada, there is a third reason which settles the point conclusively. This third reason is that we took no steps to equip the army for combat under modern warfare conditions, and I doubt very much whether we are doing so yet. No; we decided long ago in favour of compulsory service for overseas, but the manner of doing it was to institute compulsory service at home with the object of getting recruits in the overseas forces.

There cannot be any doubt about that. I think we ought to be perfectly frank with each other. Now another statement is made, which to say the least, is disturbing. It has already been dealt with this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Affairs (Mr. Macdonald), with whose views I agree. The statement is that men brought into the army as draftees do not make good soldiers. Why this should be said I do not know. I think sometimes people say it simply to make a point, to win an argument. There has not been any Canadian or world experience to support it. So far as the last war was concerned, the time was too short, and the circumstances under which the policy was instituted were such as pretty well to vitiate that experience as an example to use in coming to a conclusion. Most of the armies in the last war were composed of draftees. I remember reading Lloyd George's comment on the defence of Verdun—all by draftees. I think it is generally admitted that that was the greatest defence ever put up in the long history of warfare in the world up to that time. And again we have only to mention Dunkirk, Libya, Crete, Greece, in regard to British military service, and Moscow with reference to Russia; and Bataan might be added in order to show that there is no natural inferiority in men who are called up. Of course if you wait until you have a large percentage of thoroughly unwilling people, then you may have a bad soldier through the draft, but it is not native to the case itself.

I mention Bataan. I think the fact is that at Bataan there were some United States volunteers and some draftees; but that they were all heroes no one would for a moment deny. There you had draftees mixed with volunteers, so that the difficulty referred to by some, I think by the Prime Minister himself, about mixing one kind with another, does not hold, at any rate does not always hold. I do not doubt that the people of Britain are resting a great deal easier by reason of the fact that they have there a fine volunteer army from Canada. I do not doubt, either, that they rest easy by reason of the fact that, in addition, they now have a large United States draftee army. I have no doubt that they feel just about as well pleased with the one as with the other.

Let me make one other comment on that subject. Some of those who say that the draftee will not make a good soldier forget that they are practically sending a cable to the axis to this effect: "If, as, and when Canada undertakes to raise soldiers in that way, do not worry; she will only be introducing second-rate men. Well, it strikes me rather like crying "stinking fish" on one's own doorstep.

I began by referring to the difficulty in this country by reason of the division of eight and one. I have a practical proposal to make to the government, and I make it in all sincerity and with emphasis. I said that I thought we had not been as frank as we might have been. I take my share of the blame in that regard. I do not think we have been always as frank with the people of Canada as we might have been, nor have we looked to the people of Canada for help as we should have. I can quite understand the difficulty, almost insuperable at the moment, which faces the government, but that difficulty will have to be surmounted. The change will have to be made; the logic of events is forcing it. I would say that if the government feel they cannot follow the course which pure reason dictates, they should go direct to the common law provinces and say to them in simple and direct language, that, because of many historical facts, because of differences in education and environment, the lower province is not yet ready to go along with the rest of Canada in the plan which seems to be most reasonable and would appear to be most efficient. It would be right to say to the people of the common law provinces that the people of old Quebec have done much more than has ever been realized by Anglo-Saxon Canadians, and to show what those things have been.

The former minister of transport (Mr. Cardin) was quite right when he said that satisfactory figures on French-Canadian enlistment have never been given. I say, do not present the difficulty with a whole lot of statistics and involved arguments; you can prove almost anything with figures. It would not have been at all difficult at the beginning of this war to prove conclusively by statistics that we could not possibly accomplish half of what we have actually accomplished up to this time. At the beginning it could have been shown that if we sent 100,000 men overseas it was about all we could do if we were to make munitions in any large way. I say, do not go to the people in that way. Make them see that the French Canadians for three hundred years have been engaged in clearing the forests and tilling the soil and raising children and practising the golden rule with their neighbours rather than in acquiring an international outlook. Present these facts to the people of the common law provinces and tell them you want more time because of these difficulties. I do not guarantee success with this plan, but I think the government would get somewhere with it. The recommendation should not be dismissed too lightly. The very novelty of it should make it attractive, because such frankness has never been tried in the world by any government. No harm can come from the Canadian people to any government as a consequence of their being simple, straightforward and honest.

But do not stop there. That is not the place to stop. Turn to Quebec; put the problem into the hands of the people there. The method might have to be different; probably it would. We all know this is no imperialistic war, but it seems from what has been said here that there are some men in the lower province who are not fully convinced of that fact. We know that everything that is being done is being done for the defence of Canada, and it is necessary to bring that home to all our fellow Canadians, including those in that province as well. Make them appreciate that there is no imperialism about this war, but that it is solely a war for the defence of Canada. Let this be brought home to every village and farm. What would be necessary would be the carrying on of a campaign of truthful, virile, systematic and emphatic education throughout the province. The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) strikes me as being just about the man for the job. I am convinced that if the people of his province could have heard and seen him as he spoke, there would be no doubt of their being convinced as to the serious predicament in which we find ourselves.

In other words, what is necessary there is the achievement of that which I read this afternoon. Hon. members will recall this passage:

> Let me assure hon. members that when Baptiste discovers that his freedom, institutions, and essential rights which he prizes so dearly are really threatened, there will be no one who will fight more savagely than he to defend them.

This is the point that needs to be brought home. The difficulties of the situation with respect to Quebec have to be made known to the people of all the provinces, and there is a hope for a continuance of the unity of races in Canada if a policy of candour something along these lines be adopted.

Mr. G. J. McILRAITH (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) upon his speech of this afternoon. Both as to clarity of expression and quality of content it seemed to me outstanding, and will, I believe, serve a useful purpose not only within but outside the house.

In adequately discussing the subject before the house to-day it seems to me some difficulty arises by reason of the fact that two of the major considerations entering into any decision lie peculiarly within the knowledge of the government. To arrive at a proper conclusion in the matter one would need to know more adequately, and, indeed, would desire to know more adequately the programme of the united nations as a whole. One would need to know the relative programmes of each of the united nations, and their requirements of men and munitions. In addition, one would need to know not only Canada's munitions programme, which is generally known throughout the country, but the programme with respect to and the nature of any projected military operations.

Those are matters which for obvious reasons cannot be made known to the public at large, or, indeed, to individual members of the house. For these reasons, in conducting a full or adequate discussion of the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act we are handicapped, and allowances must be made accordingly. The result of the present procedure in dealing with this measure is that we are now having a full discussion of the subject of conscription for overseas service. In addition, not only do we have that discussion now, but we have it only once—not repeated, as some would have it. In my opinion, the decision to have the debate only once is one which will commend itself to all hon. members and to Canadians generally. It commends itself not only because the time at which a measure of conscription may become necessary is something peculiarly within the knowledge of the government, but also because of the bitterness and the opening of old sores which any argument on the subject engenders. I must confess frankly that at times I have found myself unable to understand the bitterness and prejudices which rear their heads when this subject is mentioned. I was too young to remember the time when those prejudices originated, but I have lived to regret that they were ever created or permitted to exist.

On the one hand, to-day we have those who oppose conscription for military service overseas saying that the hands of the government should be tied, that Bill No. 80 is a conscription measure and that because they feel conscription for overseas is not now necessary, we should not free the hands of the government. It seems to me that this argument completely ignores the element of speed in the changing military situation. In ignoring that element and leaving the hands of the government tied, the persons who would follow this procedure place themselves in a most dangerous position.

It is well known that there can be some delay in taking action of this kind by legislative action. Surely, when time after time in the last two years, and particularly in the last week, it has been demonstrated that the whole military picture can change with a rapidity which is positively startling, the government should have a free hand. For that, among other reasons, I for one most wholeheartedly support the bill now before the house.

On the other hand, there is another group in the community who say not only that we should have conscription for military service overseas, but that we should have it now. And not only that; they reinforce their argument by saying that an affirmative vote on the plebiscite was a vote for conscription. It may be true that the majority of those persons who voted in the affirmative voted that way because they believed in conscription for overseas service. It is equally true, however, that a very large number voted in the affirmative, not because they believed that conscription for overseas service at the present time was a proper measure, but because they desired the government to be free. They felt that the question asked meant precisely what it says. Taking a serious view of the war, they felt that notwithstanding their anti-conscription feelings of the moment they should free the hands of the government and leave it in a position where it could meet a situation, as it saw fit. They also felt they would have their remedy in the usual democratic manner.

I mention this phase of the matter to-day, not because I think it has any importance in deciding whether or not we should have conscription now for overseas service, but for another reason altogether, one which so far as I am aware has not been covered in this debate. It seems to me that view tends to carry with it the inference that the question put to the people on April 27 did not mean what it said, but rather meant something else. In view of the fact that the plebiscite was placed clearly before the house, and debated in what I thought was an adequate, thorough, and sometimes too full a manner; in view of the fact that it was discussed and decided upon by the house, and in view of the fact that the leaders of the major parties, and indeed all the leaders, who canvassed for an affirmative vote, asserted that the vote was not a vote for conscription, it seems to me that the inference to which I have referred tends to reflect upon the sincerity of the house. It tends to cast reflection upon the leaders of our democracy at this time. Surely at the moment we cannot afford to advance any argument or to take any position that would tend to undermine our democratic institutions, especially at a time when they are being attacked so violently by our enemies on the outside. Speaking in the plebiscite campaign the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had this to say on April 7:

> The issue at present is not conscription; it is whether or not the government, subject to its responsibility to parliament, is to be free to decide that question itself in the light of all national considerations. The government is not asking you to say whether or not conscription should be adopted. That responsibility the government is asking you to leave to itself and to parliament, with entire freedom to decide the question on its merits.

In his address during the campaign the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) had this to say on April 20:

> That, primarily, is the only issue involved. Emphatically, it is not, in this specific vote, an issue for or against compulsory service for overseas.

I worked in this campaign as hard as I possibly could to obtain an affirmative vote, and I had this to say:

> The issue you are being asked to vote on on Monday is not conscription but it is whether or not your parliament should be free to decide that question in the light of all national considerations. We are not being asked whether or not we favour conscription. Such responsibility must be assumed by parliament.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

On another occasion I said:

> Voluntary methods of enlistment in the armed forces for service overseas have succeeded up to the present but there is much argument as to whether this condition will continue. No one can tell what methods may be required in the months and years to come.

When I said that I meant precisely what I said. I assume that the Prime Minister of Canada meant precisely what he said. Judging from his long record in public life, I believe it is perfectly clear that he meant precisely what he said on that occasion, but the leader of the opposition leaves my mind in some doubt as to whether or not he meant precisely what he said. I am sorry that his speech on Bill No. 80 delivered in the house on June 10 leaves some doubt on that question. I am sorry not because of any great concern for the political consequences to him, but rather because one occupying the high position he does in our democratic institutions should leave himself open to the inference that in the vote taken on April 27 there was something involved other than what was stated by the leaders. The consequence of any such inference is, as I have said, positively dangerous and harmful to the country. The doing or saying of anything to belittle our democratic institutions at this time is a luxury which we can ill afford. Possibly at some future time on some happier occasion we may be able to indulge in that luxury, but at the present moment I feel we should do without it.

As far as I am concerned, there is only one test of the necessity of conscription for military service overseas, and that is: Will the adoption of such a measure add to the sum total of our war effort? That test and that test alone is what should determine the necessity of the measure. Some say that the test of the necessity is that conscription will bring about equality of sacrifice. However desirable equality of sacrifice may be—and I am sure all Canadians desire it—it is not an end in itself. I ask hon. members, where in war is there any equality of sacrifice? Where is there any equality of sacrifice in taking the fit and leaving the medically unfit? Where is there any equality of sacrifice in excluding older men who are desirous of serving in the armed forces? There is no such thing as equality of sacrifice in war, and, indeed, I do not think there ever will be. If it were possible to achieve that state, I assume that there would be no war.

Those who assert that equality of sacrifice is their only reason for desiring conscription for military service overseas forget that it is applied only to the army. They do not suggest that it be applied to the air force or the navy. There is no equality of sacrifice in applying conscription for service overseas to one branch only of the armed forces. Surely that fact indicates the lack of belief on the part of those persons who suggest it as their sole reason for wanting conscription for military service overseas. As I have said, however desirable equality of sacrifice may be—and admittedly it is desirable—it is not the only test nor is it the major test which must be kept in mind. The real test is whether or not conscription for military service overseas will add anything to the sum total of our war effort.

As I stated at the outset, the facts which will decide the time of introducing conscription for military service overseas lie peculiarly within the knowledge of the government. They and they alone are the ones to decide when such a measure should be brought in, but it has been made perfectly clear that it will be brought in if necessary. I take the view that it will be necessary immediately it becomes clear that it will add anything to the war effort. If at any time I come to the view that it will add to the war effort, I shall devote all my energy and ability to bring it about.

On February 10 last the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) outlined our programme for the coming year with respect to the army. We must assume that programme was arrived at after consideration of all the elements, that is, the programme for the other armed forces, the programme with respect to munitions, and the whole programme of the war. We know that up to date this programme has been more than met by the voluntary method, that the voluntary method has worked exceptionally well so far. That this may stop suddenly, or that there may be some change, is quite possible; but until there is some change, as long as the voluntary method continues to succeed as it is succeeding at the moment, I intend to support it.

In discussing the whole matter of the National Resources Mobilization Act and its relation to the army, it seems to me that we have missed a major factor. Admittedly we have dealt with the army in the active sense only. We have completely overlooked the smaller, less important part known as the reserve army. Perhaps this has been because of the mentality with respect to these matters which arose as a natural consequence of the trend and outline of the last great war, when an expeditionary force was the only force required and all the fighting took place well away from this continent. The present situation is entirely different. This war has become truly a world war in every sense of the word, including the sense that we are likely to have fighting in any theatre, our own coastal areas as well as any other. I often wonder if some of our military authorities have not overlooked that fact to some extent. We have in Canada a reserve army whose functions in the early stages of the war and for some time prior to the war were set out as: (a) The defence of Canada in Canada; (b) The supply of reinforcements to the active army; (c) Aid to civil power. The second function of course, received nearly all the attention at the outbreak of the war. The reserve army provided the skeleton for the whole active army, and it has done a marvellous job since then in supplying reinforcements of partly trained men and officers. But it has become clear that we may have fighting on this continent. That being so, we should have as many as possible of our men trained for military service and equipped for actual operational warfare.

Holding that view, I have argued the matter at some length with the Minister of National Defence. I fear that at times I have been rather persistent with him, to the point where I must have tested his patience. But as a result—or possibly not as a result; it is of very little consequence—on February 7 national defence headquarters announced a change in the functions of the reserve army, in that it would stress home defence; that its training would be changed to include operational training; that it would be substantially formed into eleven reserve brigade groups, with a brigade group for each military district, and that the age groups eligible for enlistment in it would be changed so that it would enlist only men under nineteen, men between the ages of nineteen and thirty-five with a medical category lower than B, men over thirty-five and up to fifty years of age and married men from thirty to thirty-five years of age. In other words, it would not be competing with the active army for manpower, and its function generally would be changed. That, I thought, was a major step forward, particularly in view of the fact that we have a very large area to defend and a very small population with which to defend it. Those factors being borne in mind, if we are to successfully defend it, then it becomes essential that in addition to our full-time soldiers we should have at least a reserve that would be of some assistance in case of an invasion attempt.

But there was one particular in which the announcement was disappointing. In view of the fact that the National Resources Mobilization Act had been in operation, that it had met, generally speaking, with the approval of all parties in this house and did not encounter any opposition from any section of the community except with regard to military service overseas, it seemed to me that it should be used and used at once with respect to these reserve brigade groups. To my disappointment I find that this has not been done. I have not the exact figures to give the house at the moment with regard to the strength of these reserve brigade groups, but perhaps I can convey some idea of the situation when I say that the strength of these groups is equal to about four divisions. So it will be seen that it is a rather sizable and important item in our defence scheme. It will be seen as well that it would be of importance also in releasing some men, full-time soldiers, for service elsewhere when they might be needed. I, for one, hold the view that the place to defeat the enemy is as far from our shores as we can meet him.

I have some knowledge of the reserve brigade group in this military district, No. 3. The strength of the group should be approximately 6,400. The actual strength some two weeks ago was about 2,700. Some 3,700 recruits were required to bring it up to strength. In other words, this reserve brigade group is something less than one-half the strength it should be. If this force, which should equal about four divisions, should be called out in case of an attempted invasion, the necessity would arise very quickly. It would come like a whirlwind, and there would be no time to train men. Then, instead of having a force of some four divisions, are we to go out with an actual strength of some two divisions and say to the enemy attempting to invade our shores, "We have other men in Canada who have been kept at civilian work because they were doing necessary war work. We did not give them any military training. This force now meeting you should have the strength of four divisions, but it has only the strength of two divisions." That position, of course, would be absolutely absurd; yet in our treatment of this subject, while looking at the more important and more distant matter, having the old war mentality, we have completely overlooked a smaller, supplementary matter right at hand. The reserve brigade groups should be brought up to strength by the use of the National Resources Mobilization Act. The necessity for taking such action I think has been clearly shown in recent weeks by the visit of enemy submarines to the mouth of the St. Lawrence. Those submarines were not there on any friendly mission, nor were the Japanese on the west coast there for any nonsense. As far as I am concerned, we should have no illusions as to why they were there, or as to what we may expect in future.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

The policy of the government with respect to the matter is clear. The principle of this act has been accepted and enforced. Not only that, but in his address on June 10 the Prime Minister had this to say, as reported at page 3241 of Hansard:

> And make no mistake about it, the government is determined, as far as is humanly possible, to make sure that every able-bodied man undertakes some form of direct war service.

Here is a form of direct war service suitable to the able-bodied men who have been retained in civilian occupations. The administrative machinery to put it in force is in existence, but as yet our military authorities have not put it in force. I respectfully submit, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come to put it in force, and that the time is now. I do not believe our views on the matter should be obscured by any other views with respect to the major, more important part of our army, the active part, or any views that we may hold with regard to conscription for military service overseas.

In closing, in view of the fact that I have not been inclined to say a great deal in this house, I should like to point out that the constituency I have the honour to represent has more than nine units on active service for overseas. That is a record which, I believe, not only has not been equalled but has not been approached in any other part of Canada. This representation of the active forces from my constituency, of which I am very proud, typifies, I believe, better than anything I could say the views of the people I represent with respect to the war and matters pertaining to it.

Mrs. CORA T. CASSELMAN (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few observations on Bill No. 80. I have listened with pleasure and profit to speeches made by hon. members in this house, and have agreed with a great deal and disagreed with some things that have been said. I was particularly interested in the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and members of his cabinet, setting out the case as they see it at the present time. Sometimes I think that the men who bear the burden and heat of the fray do not receive sufficient praise for what they do, for it must take tremendous courage, initiative, perseverance and patience to carry on at this time.

We see the war becoming more and more dangerous. It will be won finally by the young men and women of the belligerent countries fighting either on their own soil, within their own boundaries, or outside. I hope and pray that it will be won by the youth of our own allied countries, fighting beyond our borders. I hope it will never come so close that we have to fight on Canadian soil.

There is an urgency now for Canada's sake. There is an urgency for the sake of our allies and for humanity's sake. How can we look at our young people here, so free and gay and fair, without thinking of the young people of the occupied countries of Europe and Asia sitting in darkness and the shadow of death? It is bad enough for us to see our people in uniform ready for the conflict. How much worse it must be for these others to see their fellow citizens, civilians, young and old, in danger from the ever-present and ever-vigilant enemy; how much harder still to witness the outrages, the massacres, the executions and the bombings, even to read of which makes our blood run cold. Therefore there is need for haste; we must set aside all differences which may impede the war effort.

Conditions have changed a great deal since the war began. At first the United States hoped to stay out, and Canada believed that no more than limited participation would be necessary. But world events have forced on us a greater and greater participation in this struggle. I think our yardstick should be, not what others are doing but what I myself am doing, in fighting or working or saving; not what somebody else is doing in another province or another community but what we ourselves are doing to contribute to the success of the war measures. If we put it on that ground; if we are driven by that urgency, we see that the inexorable pressure of world events have made it necessary to advance step by step along this line of participation which has been deplored by some hon. members who have spoken in this house. Not politics, not something else, but world events have forced this condition upon us. There has been a tremendous change. In the beginning it was thought that the war would be one of machines, with comparatively few men engaged. But more and more men have been called. The geographical area has extended vastly, and with savagery and brutality the enemy have made those of the occupied lands work for them on factories and on farms, freeing millions of their own men for the battle front.

These are the considerations which have forced us in the direction of greater participation in the war effort. Some there are who do not want to free the government, who would not give it power to increase its effort and to put more men in the field should this become necessary. I cannot see the justification for that attitude so long as we are a democracy. This is our own government. It is the decisions which our government will take which will involve greater participation if and when it becomes necessary. One of the reasons why Canada is at war is to preserve our right to make our own decisions, to maintain our democratic ways of life, and surely it is the democratic spirit which inspires the discussion we are now holding; for policy is hammered out by the meeting of many minds. Discussion precedes decision, which is followed by loyal support and then by action to carry out those decisions. We thus preserve our right to make decisions.

We all build Canada: those in the field; those here at home, in the factory, and on the farm and in the home. But it is not what we have contributed, valuable though that may be; it is not entirely what was done in past years; it is what we do now which builds Canada of the present and the future; for all our to-morrows are built on to-day. Each part of the country shares in the government; its constitutional rights are set out in the British North America Act. Individuals, too, have their rights, not necessarily set down in the constitution, but exercised by the ability they can display, through what they themselves can contribute. The men who are here in the house representing different parties are here partly because they kept Canada as Canada in the great war. The hon. member for Renfrew North (Mr. Warren) has listed the names of some of the men who served in the great war and who, because of that service, are here now. He might have named many more. The men of 1942 are earning their right, now and for the future, to build Canada. For example, I have here an enumeration of honours in the king's birthday list, and I find the names of three Edmonton fliers who have won distinctions. Two of them are mentioned in dispatches—Flight-Sergeant R. J. Majeau and Flight-Sergeant P. A. Rogers. We can tell from their names something of their racial extraction. Also Sergeant E. Gowda has won the British Empire Medal. I should like to read briefly from the newspaper account:

> Sergeant Gowda was awarded the Empire Medal for work contributing to the efficiency of his squadron and for "great gallantry" in extricating companions from a crashed, burning plane while with an eastcoast bomber squadron.

Sergeant Gowda is a Canadian of Ukrainian extraction, the second generation, I believe. I know his mother well. The best of every race, French, British and new Canadian stock, are taking their part in the present conflict and earning their right to build up Canada now and in the future. I hope, therefore, for unity; I hope that we shall set aside those divisions which may exist among us and that we shall have the privilege of building Canada one in soul and strength and sword. Furthermore, I think those very principles that we carry out here in our national government, the principles of democracy, discussion, decision, support and action, are the principles that must underlie any international organization which may be built up at the end of this war if we are to save the world from a recurrence of wars such as this. It seems to me that therein lies our hope for a world free from the ever-recurring curse of war. We survived one war and we hope to survive this one; but can civilization survive a succession of wars that bleed it white? Canada must play her part in the war and in the peace that will follow, in whatever organization seems best fitted to carry out the policies that we ourselves put into force here in our own country; for it seems to me that these democratic principles are what will have to be carried out on a world scale if we are to avoid such a conflagration again.

Fifty per cent of my reading during the last thirty years has been along this line. It is something to which I have given a great deal of consideration, because I, too, lived and worked and thought through the last war. The problem has to be worked out together in some way, just as we ourselves in Canada must work out our lesser problems. It will need a combination of effort, and we see at the present time the allies getting together and outlining their policies for the post-war period. We see this in the treaties that have been signed between Russia and Great Britain and in the attitude of the united nations as indicated in the Atlantic charter and the agreement of the twenty-six nations signed early this year. The future is already taking shape, and our policies will have to be hammered out just as we hammer out our policies here where we hear the noise of the hammer and the din of conflict of opinion, the decisions that are taken, the support given and the action following. Canada then may show the way, by her policy here at home, whereby a world organization can live and survive with better success than the League of Nations did twenty years ago. Of course, it will depend on the individual members of any league.

I love Canada instinctively, as the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) said, but I love Canada with the head as well as the heart. I love Canada because here we have a country in which we work out the principles of decent equality between men, a country in which we have the four freedoms, not 100 per cent, though the tendency is in that direction more and more as the years go by. I love Canada for its history. I believe I have taken as much pride and pleasure in the history of French Canada as any French Canadian, and I was taught in Ontario schools, where the history of Canada included not only British history but French Canadian history as well. I believe I have as much pride as anyone in French Canada. The history of Canada for me began when the first French explorer placed his foot on Canadian soil. Those explorers were to me heroes as they were to French Canadians—Madeleine de Verchères, Father Breboeuf, Dollard, LaFontaine, Laurier and others coming down to our own times. So that Canada means a great deal to me even though perhaps we have not had the centuries on the soil that the French Canadians have had. Again, I love Canada because she has learned to live in peace with her neighbours. I love her because of her undefended boundary line, because on both sides of that line we have had the frame of mind that allows people to live in peace. We have approached the consideration of our problems without prejudice; we have hammered out our policies, and have stood by our decisions, and so we have avoided war along the boundary.

I love Canada also because it is the world in miniature. In Canada there is no single blood or race or religion, but a combination of all these; and therefore, as it works out its internal problems, it shows how the external problems of the world can be worked out. It would be a great pity if anything happened now to destroy that sense of unity, that sense of oneness which we have right across Canada. As the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe said, we have two languages and one soul. In fact, we have more than two languages. We have English and French and we have the new Canadians of different stock, but we have one soul throughout Canada. Therefore I vote for this measure, willingly giving to the government the power it needs, to use that power as it sees fit, when and if it is necessary; for a government without power is no government. It is anarchy. I hope that out of these troubled waters Canada will emerge stronger, one in soul and strength and sword.

Mr. GASPARD FAUTEUX (St. Mary): Mr. Speaker, it is with apprehension that I rise to address the house on this very important bill, No. 80, first, because I am a new member, and second, because I have decided to speak in the language of the majority of this house. If I dare to speak in your language, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the fact that my vocabulary is poor and my pronunciation inadequate, it is because I wish to pay a tribute of gratitude and of admiration to the English-speaking members who have been so kind and generous toward the province of Quebec in the speeches they have delivered.

It is not my intention to analyse all that has been said in the house for or against the bill, or to analyse the bill itself. My intention is simply to say how I shall vote and why, and to make a few suggestions.

The government has already said that if this bill has been introduced it is simply to comply with the wish expressed by the majority of the Canadian people through the plebiscite, namely, to release the government from the promises which they or any members of this house may have made to their electors, with regard to the mobilization of man-power, during the election of 1940, when the military situation was absolutely different from the one that exists to-day. If we had that plebiscite it was because the government felt that during this war, when we are fighting for a principle like the sanctity of treaties and contracts, we should at least hold to our own promises made to the people of Canada. The great majority of the people having voted "yes" on the plebiscite, the government feels obliged to abrogate section 3 of the mobilization act in order to have no restriction on the mobilization of man-power.

In a few hours or a few days we shall have to vote "yes" or "no" on the motion for the second reading of this bill. What am I going to do? How am I going to vote if I believe in the democratic form of government, in a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and if, like the government I believe in the sanctity of treaties and contracts? I do not need to go back as far as 1940; I have only to refer to February last during the by-election, when I asked 50,000 electors of St. Mary to place a contract with me, a contract that has since been accepted and executed by the party of the first part representing the majority of the electors of Montreal-St. Mary, in electing me and the party of the second part, the one who is called to execute the condition sine qua non of the contract, with the mandate that has been given to him by the party of the first part.

What was the important clause for which I was responsible in that contract? Let me read just a few lines of an article written in the newspaper La Presse of Montreal under date of April 30 and signed by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot):

(Translation)

Their new member, who was supported by a majority of people who were surely against conscription, has of course, stated his opposition to conscription for overseas service. But he has bound himself to vote against the plebiscite not in the House of Commons, as the member for Saint Mary, but only as a citizen, as an elector of the constituency of Westmount. The electors will no doubt be interested to know what he will do if a conscription measure is ever introduced in the house. We will make it a point to keep them informed.

In a few words, all that means is that the hon. member for St. Mary promised to his electors during the last election to vote for a plebiscite when it would be introduced in this house by the government, but that he would vote "no" as an individual whenever the plebiscite would be held. The hon. member for Témiscouata said, "I wonder what the new member will say when he will have to vote 'yes' or 'no' on conscription when conscription is introduced in the house." Let me tell this house that I will carry out my engagement and that I will vote against this bill. To my hon. friends who may be scandalized by that clause in my contract with my electors or inclined to call that demagogy, whether they be Liberals who will vote for the bill, to be logical with their attitude on the plebiscite, or whether they be Tories with imperialistic instincts, let me tell them immediately that I am not and never was a narrow-minded nationalist or separatist. Let me ask them if they would have preferred to have in this house, instead of a true democrat and a Liberal, who believes that this war is Canada's war, who is glad and proud to belong to a country privileged to have two civilizations, which I hope will remain united in one soul, and one who has three children, all of them in English schools in order to become perfectly bilingual and true Canadians, an extremist like the one who ran against me as a candidate for the party "à sens unique" of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe).

Let me ask the right hon. the Prime Minister and hon. members of this house not to blame the electors of my county, the same people who voted for Mr. Camillien Houde as mayor of Montreal, and elected him as their representative in the legislative assembly of Quebec, the same who is now in a concentration camp, whom they used to consider their "lucky boy", if they asked their candidate to be against conscription, but praise them because at the same time they refused to send to the parliament of Canada an extremist. I am really convinced that they believe in that latin phrase, in medio stat virtus. This does not mean that they want only a moderate effort in this war. No. They want, like all of us, to win the war, and they will do everything possible for the defence of Canada.

Let me read what Professor F. R. Scott of McGill university said about the province of Quebec, which would apply also to my constituency:

The French Canadians mean what they say when they say they will do everything necessary for the defence of Canada. They have already accepted conscription of man-power for this purpose, and they do not mind whether this means going to Alaska, Greenland or Panama. It is a good deal farther from Quebec city to Alaska than from Quebec city to London.

Further on he says:

The same people who voted "no" so overwhelmingly in Mr. St. Laurent's constituency, only a short time ago preferred Mr. St. Laurent to a nationalist candidate who posed as the de Valera of Canada.

Mr. COLDWELL: Whom is the hon. gentleman quoting?

Mr. FAUTEUX: F. R. Scott, professor at McGill university, who is, I believe, a good friend of the hon. member.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. FAUTEUX: Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I had just given some reasons why Quebec is against conscription for overseas service. I may point out that those were only some among many reasons why they are opposed. The main one is that, like most of us, they believe it is not necessary, and that total war effort does not necessarily mean conscription for overseas service. They think they are right, like most of us; and I may say that both of us are in good company with Australia, South Africa and Northern Ireland.

The people of Quebec believe in a total war effort to win the war. They have listened to Mr. Churchill and have applauded his courage and determination. They have listened to the fireside chats of Mr. Roosevelt, and they are not only ready to let their sons join the army voluntarily for overseas service, but to answer to the demand of Mr. Churchill, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job," and approve Mr. Roosevelt's statement that America—and that means Canada and the United States—is the arsenal of democracy. Yes; let us give tools to Mr. Churchill. Let us ask our people to work night and day to produce tools to avoid more defeats like Greece, Crete, Singapore, Hong Kong and Libya.

What we should do for a total war effort is to keep Canada as a real arsenal of democracy for the nations who fight with us, nations which have large populations but have not the industrial strength of the United States and Canada. I said a real arsenal, because we need tools for that unfortunate China with her 420,000,000 inhabitants; tools for that gallant Russia with her 120,000,000 inhabitants; tools for that unhappy Poland with her 32,000,000 inhabitants, and tools for those millions of inhabitants of the northern part of Europe, as well as those in the centre, who are only waiting for the right moment to be armed and to start a revolution.

We need tools—tools and all kinds of armaments for land, air and sea, in order that those heroic British and Canadian commandos, and de Gaulle and his gallant free Frenchmen may land on the soil of France, to hand those tools to the people of France; tools with which they will be able to invade and conquer the European continent, tools to destroy the beasts, both the one which invaded her soil, killed her sons and destroyed her monuments, and the other which stabbed her in the back during her agony; and, finally, tools for our beloved Canada. Yes; tools for our shores on the Atlantic and on the Pacific, to protect and keep our beloved land colonized by France, so well developed by Britain, and transformed into a nation by our Canadian statesmen.

I believe that in order to do that we do not need to abrogate section 3. The government has only to exercise the power given it under the National Resources Mobilization Act to get more money by the following means:

1. By nationalizing the war industries for the duration, with the understanding that a reasonable interest will be paid, and a reasonable power of amortization will be given.

2. By mobilizing all the savings frozen since 1939, with the understanding that a reasonable interest will be paid.

3. By establishing a reasonable ceiling for annual revenues of the individual, the remainder being remitted to the government.

In offering these suggestions, I humbly believe that if they were accepted Canada would make a total war effort in a spirit of total national unity. That, in my opinion, is the best way to win the war, to win the peace, and to assure the future of our country. In doing so, we shall confirm what has already been said by Mr. Graham Spry, former secretary of the Association of Canadian Clubs: "One nation, two cultures; one loyalty, two races; two glorious pasts but only one future."

Mr. P. E. COTÉ (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, in the time at my disposal to-night I assume the very serious responsibility of expressing myself in a language which is not my mother tongue, one which I must confess I am far from mastering. I wish to pay tribute in their own language to the spirit of good-will and understanding of the English-speaking citizens in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. I shall also speak in this language with a certain amount of pride and pleasure, because it will enable me to address myself in a direct, if not a perfect way to my colleagues of British descent in the house, and to tell them most sincerely how much I have appreciated the friendships with which they have honoured me during the two years I have sat in this chamber.

In passing, I wish to point, with great pride as a Canadian and with no less hope for the future of Canada, to their sincere attempts to approach and to discuss in a comprehensive and courteous manner the internal difficulties our country has not been spared in this critical day. The better I have come to know my colleagues, the more I have appreciated them. I realize that there is one main condition which must be met before complete and lasting unity is achieved in this country. There must be a better knowledge of each other's history, traditions and ideals in order to justify our claim to true citizenship in this country. True Canadians must love not only the soil of their country but also the inhabitants of that soil, irrespective of their racial beliefs; they must respect the institutions which regulate each other's social, religious and political life.

Such a result cannot be achieved in a short period of time. Canada has a population of only 11,500,000 people, but its area is equal to the whole of Europe or to the United States with its territorial possessions. As with a human being, the impulse of life of a nation must come from the heart. Ottawa, the capital city, where meet the representatives from all the provinces, is the heart of Canada. Therefore we as members have a definite responsibility to discharge in furthering national unity. We must take back to our constituents a better picture of the other parts of Canada which most of them have never visited, and of the people living in those different districts. In my province there are villages and even municipalities peopled with those of French descent which seldom see visitors of any other extraction. Is it any wonder that my compatriots have such a vague knowledge of their fellow citizens in other parts of Canada and that campaigns of prejudice led by extremists of all sorts result in discontent and mistrust.

I am told by my colleagues from other provinces that the same situation exists in their constituencies. A great number of citizens there have never met a French Canadian, and the only knowledge they have of French Canadians is from the newspapers. If the one they happen to read is of the type whose supreme ambition is to disunite the country, one should not be astonished at the bad feeling that arises from time to time between the different races whose destiny it is to build a strong and prosperous nation. The main and vital link between the two racial groups in our dominion must be forged here in Ottawa by the members of this house. If they discharge that duty as they should, the cornerstone of national unity will be laid and will last forever.

On April 27 the dominion government asked the population of this country to release it from past pledges. The question was in the following form:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

This was a special occasion indeed. The public was invited to take a direct share of the responsibility of administering the affairs of this country. It was with that thought in mind that I approved the principle of the plebiscite, as will be seen from my remarks made in the house on February 12. Nevertheless, the question was ambiguous, and the members of this government have been the first to admit that. Perhaps that fact has accounted for the great number of those who developed that particular theme during the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as well as those who repeatedly addressed the public over the radio and through the newspapers during the few weeks which preceded the vote when an effort was made to explain the true meaning of the question and predict the results of an affirmative or a negative vote.

On February 12, when I addressed the house for the first time, I supported the policy of the government in connection with this plebiscite. I considered that policy to be a most democratic procedure and I did not hesitate to endorse its principles. Following the magnificent speech delivered by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) over the radio on April 7, I went to my constituency and opened a campaign in favour of an affirmative vote. I appealed to my fellow citizens to release me from the pledge which I had given during the last election campaign and which I had repeated on several occasions afterwards. Following the worthy speeches which had been made across the country by outstanding members of this house, I promised my constituents that conscription was not directly related to the issue of the plebiscite. I asserted that an affirmative vote would not be a vote in favour of conscription. I gave them to understand that the circumstances of this war were such that it had become necessary and imperative in order to maintain the unity of the country that members of parliament be released from any past commitments made with regard to the method of raising men for overseas service.

I told my constituents that parliament should be allowed to consider any appropriate measure without any restriction, should be completely free to act if circumstances developed which made it necessary to bring in such a measure for the furtherance of our war effort. I was greatly honoured on the evening of April 27 to learn that my constituents had listened to my plea and had responded to the call of the Prime Minister. They had given a majority of over 8,600 affirmative votes. That meant that two-thirds of the total vote of my constituency was affirmative. During my first speech in this house I said that the constituency of Verdun seemed to me to be a miniature Canada because of the various racial and religious groups to be found there. The result of the plebiscite would seem to confirm that statement because the final returns for the whole country showed the same two-thirds majority in the affirmative.

The plebiscite was held with a view to learning the will of the people concerning the pledges which had been made and which prevented the government and the members of this house from having a free hand in carrying out our war effort. It is most important that a correct interpretation should be given to the results of the plebiscite. As far as I am concerned as the representative of Verdun, I consider myself released from the obligations I had assumed in the past when I promised my constituents that I would never favour conscription, that I would oppose any bill which would bring in conscription for overseas service. Moreover, in view of the appeal I made for an affirmative vote in the plebiscite campaign and the interpretation which was generally given to the statements made over the radio and through the press by outstanding members of this house who took a very active part in the campaign, I am bound to consider that the will of the majority in Verdun has given me a special mandate to withhold from debating conscription until such circumstances have arisen as would render it necessary for the furtherance of our total war effort. If such events should present themselves, I would feel authorized to endorse such legislation after having carefully studied the alleged necessity for it and on the condition that I as a member of this house be permitted to debate the principle as well as the regulations for the enforcement of this new form of compulsory service.

However, contrary to what happened in the other provinces, in the constituency of Verdun as in most of the other Quebec constituencies the campaign for an affirmative vote had a counterpart in the strong opposition which was organized and led ever since the plebiscite was announced in the speech from the throne. Radio broadcasts and mass meetings, supported by several of the daily newspapers and by most of the weeklies, appealed for a negative vote on the ground that the question put to the people of Canada, meant conscription, that this was the one and only opportunity the electors had to express an opinion on this very important question, and finally, that the Prime Minister left the people entirely free to express their personal and sincere view about it, because he had declared that no vote of confidence was involved in voting on the plebiscite, and he particularly insisted on that in his reply to the telegram which had been sent to him by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) two days before the voting on the plebiscite.

The plebiscite has made known the will of the people of the province of Quebec, but not that of the people in the other provinces, on the very question of conscription for overseas service. It is most unjust and unfair to compare the results of the plebiscite in the province of Quebec with those in the other provinces, because in Quebec there was an organized opposition to the "yes" vote, while in the other eight provinces there was not the slightest organized attempt to show that the vote on the plebiscite was or might be construed as a vote for or against conscription. All the members for the other provinces spoke in the same way to their constituents; and all the newspapers, political clubs, veterans' organizations, trade unions and various social bodies were unanimous in appealing for an affirmative vote on the ground that it did not mean a vote in favour of or against conscription.

The 27th of April was a voting day throughout Canada. It was a real election day. In the eight English-speaking provinces the official candidate of that election was a "yes" vote. Its candidature before the electors was unanimously supported by all organized and public bodies. The candidate did not have any opponent, and so got elected by acclamation.

The victory of April 27th in the other provinces was a victory for the demand of members of parliament and the government for a free hand to deal with conscription should the necessity arise, while in Quebec it was a free expression of opinion on the very question of conscription.

If the plebiscite issue had been contested with as much vehemence in the other provinces as in Quebec—and it could have been to judge by the number of negative votes which were cast—the question submitted to the people might have had a different meaning for those electors, and they might have had in mind to vote for or against conscription, as the great majority of the people did in the province of Quebec. In that event the results then might have been very different.

I therefore conclude that if the campaign led in the province of Quebec by the supporters of the negative vote brought the result that we know in most of our constituencies, and if this result is construed as strong opposition in that province to any measure of conscription for overseas service at this time, it does not follow that the results in the other provinces are to be interpreted as a vote on behalf of conscription. I still believe that at this very moment the proportion of our population that would favour this measure even in principle would represent but a minority in the country. I am sure that that is the opinion in my own constituency.

The bill now submitted to the house for second reading is brought down for the purpose of amending the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940. Section 2 of that act is suggested to be amended to read as follows:

> The governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

I now quote the last few lines of section 5 of the act, because they relate to the publication of orders in council:

> . . . provided that any of the steps specified in this section may be omitted or deferred if the governor in council considers such omission or deferment necessary in the national interest having regard to the special circumstances.

We all admit, Mr. Speaker, that this is enabling legislation. It empowers the governor in council to deal from now on, and without any consultation of parliament, with this very question of conscription for overseas service. It will enable the governor in council to decide whether coming events in this war are such that the people of this country will subscribe to a measure of conscription for overseas service. This amendment gives the governor in council full power to make such decision. The governor in council will also be the only authority to enact compulsory service and to determine the principles and regulations under which this compulsion shall be enforced. Above all, he will not even be bound to make these orders and regulations known to parliament and to the people of the country if he considers that such an attitude on his part is necessary in the national interest under the circumstances.

All hon. members will agree that this bill has been intended by the government and is an attempt to put into effect the affirmative result of the plebiscite. The will of the majority must prevail in this country. I myself will admit that. Knowing the will of the majority of this country, I would be the first to make mine the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1917 and abide by such will. But is it certain that this piece of legislation does not go beyond the will which was expressed by the people on April 27?

Of course the repeal of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act does free the hands of the government. But if this amendment is approved, the mobilization act will have a new bearing which, I submit, will exceed the powers granted by the electors of this country.

Who in this house can say, from the affirmative vote given in the country, it is the will of the people to insert in our statutes at this very moment the principle of conscription without waiting to see whether new circumstances will arise to render it necessary?

Who can say that the affirmative vote was a demand upon members of parliament to yield to the governor in council their privileges as regards the most vital problem that has ever existed in the country in relation to our national unity, and this, before any new circumstances in the nature of those mentioned to the people of Canada during the campaign preceding the plebiscite, have arisen to justify any such surrender to the governor in council?

If the question asked on the plebiscite had been in the following terms, for example, "Do you favour the repeal by parliament of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940?" and if it had been explained to the electors that an affirmative vote would grant to the governor in council full power to put conscription for overseas service into force without any consultation with parliament, at any time that he found the measure to be absolutely necessary, and to enact any regulations to govern the enforcement of that measure of conscription without resort to the advice of or any consultation with members of parliament, I wonder what the result would have been in the country. I am sure, knowing my constituency as I do know it, that the affirmative vote on the evening of April 27 would not have given a majority of over 8,600.

In order to get from the country a full expression of its will on this bill, supposed to be the necessary conclusion of the plebiscite, I submit that we should have used the question I have just quoted instead of the one which was indicated on the ballots on April 27. This bill would not then have exceeded the meaning of the plebiscite. As I have just suggested, it would have been a direct sequence of an affirmative vote on the plebiscite.

As a result of the plebiscite we have witnessed a campaign of prejudice and race cries against the province of Quebec, coming from groups of citizens of this country who know the least about Canadians of French descent. They may have come into the province on business purposes, but never have they gone through the experience of a close contact with our French population. Yet these extremists of all sorts have not ceased since April 27 to accuse Quebec of all possible evils in connection with our war effort. I will not insist on the records which Quebec has already set of her will to cooperate in this total war of ours and to contribute to the final victory.

I wish to state that in my opinion this bill before the house has another major aspect. It will help to satisfy and might eventually encourage the feelings which have been developed since April 27 against Quebec by a group of unpatriotic Canadians. This bill in view of its particular implications appears to me to be supported by sentiment rather than by the result and meaning of the plebiscite. Our war effort up to this time, on both the industrial and military fronts, has been a total and well-balanced war effort, since it would not have been possible to do any better had conscription for overseas service been put into effect a year or two years ago. What is the reason for this change of policy? Our voluntary system is meeting the requirements of the active army in a satisfactory way. Logically, there is no need and no reason for the adoption of this principle at this time. Yet it is proposed to this house to answer the threats of those who want conscription because it is conscription and for no other reason—because in their eyes conscription is the symbol of a total war effort. If we let sentiment overcome common sense and reason in the settlement of such an important problem as that of conscription, we shall render unity impossible in this country. As long as there is not a sincere and deep Canadianism in this dominion, it is not the particular feeling of a minority part of a racial group that will serve to unite the country in such a tremendous effort as she is making in this war.

Since the outbreak of war about 25,000 orders in council have been passed by this government to regulate our economic life, war production and military services.

The representatives of the people in parliament have not been consulted about these orders in council, although about three hundred of them were in conflict with some existing statutes. No serious reaction was caused in the country by their enactment, because these regulations were based on logic and not on emotions, and thus the Canadian people have welcomed them in their strong desire to contribute in a total war effort.

I believe, on the other hand, that in my constituency, if not in the whole dominion, my fellow citizens expect that conscription, which has been the vulnerable point of Canadian unity for the past twenty-five years, will remain the exclusive privilege of this parliament to debate and to decide upon whenever circumstances shall arise to render necessary its introduction in this house.

Being a citizen of a free country, I have spoken my mind very freely on this matter of Bill No. 80. In spite of the attitude which I sincerely feel I shall have to take when the bill is put to the vote, let me assure the house that our country is actually making a total war effort and if possible, as circumstances develop, it will be increasing that effort without any objection in my province and in the constituency of Verdun. Moreover, our people in Quebec realize that this is now a Canadian war; that we are fighting for Canada; that we are fighting for our own traditions and creed; that we are fighting for our own salvation. We believe, I for one certainly believe, that the future of Canada being at stake in this war, we cannot ask anything better than that the true Canadian at the head of this country should continue to lead our war effort, with the same success that we have achieved in the past. In spite of the attitude that I shall take on this bill, I wish to convey to our Prime Minister my sincere admiration and to assure him of my everlasting support notwithstanding that, being a free citizen, I shall again speak my free mind in order to express the opinion of the majority of our population in the constituency of Verdun.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): It is with some hesitation that I rise to take part in this debate, and were it not for the fact that some of our hon. friends opposite utilized the time at their disposal to make an analysis of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, its programme and its policy rather than the measure before the house, I might not have decided to take up the time of the house now to discuss this question. But certain things have been said with respect to this group which, in my opinion, require an answer.

The measure before the house is somewhat beclouded. In the discussion to date—and I have listened quite attentively to it—some of our hon. friends have talked exclusively about the plebiscite. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) definitely told the house that this was a conscription bill; he did so without any equivocation. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) this afternoon agreed with him to some extent. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) went to considerable length, with some convincing arguments, to show that the measure was not a conscription measure. Anyone with average intelligence, listening to members of the cabinet, listening to the arguments pro and con, must have had some doubt at times as to what the measure really is. Personally I draw my own conclusions, and regardless of what the programme and policy of this particular group may have been in the past, I am independent and free to exercise my own judgment in this matter or in any other matter that comes before the house.

As one of the members coming from the east coast I wish to point out certain things to the house, instead of discussing simply one phase of the conscription issue as we are doing now. The plebiscite was merely a convenient political trick to offset propaganda coming from political opponents. It was purely and simply a matter of government responsibility. I went out and advocated an affirmative vote, and I did so because I believed in total conscription of everything in Canada necessary to fight the war. An affirmative vote on the plebiscite meant that the road was still open, as far as we were concerned, to push forward in that direction, and I made it absolutely clear to our people that that was our stand then and would be our stand in the future.

As I see it to-day, what we should be driving home to the Canadian people is the fact that our situation is not merely a matter of conscripting men for military service or of taking over industries to be utilized in an all-out war effort. We should be thinking in Canada to-day in terms of the question whether every man and woman should be seeking some means of learning how to defend themselves. It is not a matter of having to go to the people and requisition them for that service. If they were alive to their own interests and to the seriousness of the international situation, they would be coming, as they should, to the responsible authorities in the country for the formation and organization of means of defence in every section of Canada. Anyone with average intelligence, reading the press to-day, must realize the significance of the statement made by the Prime Minister of Australia on Saturday. He must realize the significance of what is happening on the west coast, where the Japs have a foothold in the Aleutian islands. We have but meagre information on this matter. We do not know where they are. Anyone with average intelligence, I say, must realize the significance of the shelling of Vancouver island, or a section of it, and the shelling of a section of the California coast. This little Jesse James street paper, the Trend, definitely points out—I do not know what its authority is—that within the next ninety days we may expect raids on the east coast. It definitely establishes the fact that German planes a year ago made photographs and a blueprint of everything in that section of the country. That may or may not be true, but as one of the elected representatives of the people I realize—much more I think than they do in central Canada—the seriousness of the situation on both coasts and the necessity for a complete understanding on the part of the people. They will not have that understanding unless they get a lead from their elected representatives. Unfortunately at the present time the complete control of our war effort is in central Canada. While the danger is on both coasts, the control of the machinery necessary to fight the war is in central Canada.

With that background I want to make it clear that as far as the members of this group are concerned, they are not seizing on the war situation as an opportunity of bringing about in this country a socialist state, as some of our hon. friends opposite accuse us of doing. The programme and policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in the light of the war situation is not a political programme; it is a recognition of the fact that if we are to have an all-out war effort to meet those who are waging an all-out war, the complete organization of all the resources of this country is necessary. That is a programme of organization of these resources on the same basis as man-power is expected to be organized under the bill before the house at this time.

On June 11 the leader of our group presented and described in detail a six-point programme of total war effort. Hon. members opposite, instead of discussing the programme on its merits, started calling it names, seeking in that way to frighten the people. They declared that what we are proposing is state socialism, and that this means regimentation. The habit of referring to our programme as state socialism comes either from ignorance or from deliberate distortion. I want to tell my hon. friends opposite that, after an association of two and a half years with this group, there is no one in this house or outside who is more opposed to state socialism than the members of this group. It ill behooves those on that side of the house to characterize the programme and policy of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation as state socialism, when in reality the government as constituted at the present time is the nearest approach to state socialism of anything we shall ever have in Canada without actually having it.

I am not going to attempt to make an analysis of socialism; there are vague and distorted ideas; but I want to make this clear, particularly to the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) and the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham) that what we are fighting against to-day, that totalitarian system, is state socialism. If they succeed in winning this war, the first people that will go to the axeman's block are the members of this group.

An hon. MEMBER: That would be good.

Mr. GILLIS: Hitler or Mussolini would not be fooled as far as state socialism is concerned. My hon. friends over here who say, "that would be good", could very well fit into the councils of state socialism, whether they realize it or not. There is at the present time in the government a complete and bewildered bureaucracy. There are controls of all kinds. These controls are selected from one class of society only, which makes it state socialism. The government have taken in the heads of every big industry in Canada, have made them the lumber controller, the steel controller, the oil controller, the bacon controller; they control the complete economic set-up of Canada at the present time. The only thing they have not done yet is to stand up one man. As I see it, they are planning to-day Canada's war effort mostly for their own ends. I will prove that in a little while. Hon. members opposite do not watch the situation as closely as we do. The only degree of success that we have had in our war effort so far has been because of the fact that the government, or some members of the government, recognizing the necessity for planning and control, have seen fit to institute as far as they can some methods of organization of the resources of the country. The only section of industry in Canada to-day that I have seen that is making a real contribution to the war effort is composed of the industries that have been set up under government control and supervision. I have seen some of these plants; they are doing a real good job, and they are a credit. What would we have got under private enterprise? What did the Minister of Munitions and Supply get with his 5 per cent profit limitation on the outbreak of the war, or when the British army was on the beaches of Dunkirk and not one private contractor in Canada would accept a war contract unless the 5 per cent limitation was removed? They staged one of the biggest sit-down strikes in the history of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that right? The hon. member should prove that statement.

Mr. GILLIS: That is correct; the Minister of Munitions and Supply made that statement in the house, that he could not let a contract with the 5 per cent profit limitation in it, and it was removed by order in council.

Mr. McLARTY: If I might ask the hon. member a question, does he know that contracts are being let every day by the Department of Munitions and Supply on the 5 per cent basis?

Mr. COLDWELL: You are letting them now, yes.

Mr. McLARTY: And have been right along since the outbreak of the war. I will give the hon. member a specific example: the Ford Motor Company of Canada at Windsor is receiving 5 per cent and 5 per cent only; it is turning out, I think, the largest amount of mechanical equipment of any city in this empire and is still doing so.

Mr. GILLIS: That is not the point; I am not arguing that point with the minister. I made the definite statement that at the outbreak of the war the government of Canada endeavoured to let contracts to the industrialists of Canada with the 5 per cent profit limitation in those contracts. That was legislation, and it had to be removed before the government could let contracts. I have the word of the Minister of Munitions and Supply for that. Ford may be taking contracts now on that basis—

Mr. McLARTY: And has been ever since the war commenced.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not think there is any ceiling on it to-day. The ceiling was removed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can tell the hon. member of a contract that has been let to the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company on which there is absolutely no profit, and they are not asking for any profit, and are doing one of the best jobs in Canada without any profit.

Mr. COLDWELL: But their aggregate profit this year was much greater than it was last year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not out of the war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Out of something. They are not doing much but war contracting just now.

Mr. GILLIS: From the beginning of the war members of this group have asked that workers, farmers and consumers be given proper representation on all boards. Such representation makes the difference between statism and democracy. But the government refuses to adopt the democratic way. That is the difference as I see it. I have no objection to the government of this country setting up boards that they are setting up, organizing and planning the industries of this country to the best advantage, but I do insist that the great body of the working people, farmers, workers and consumers generally, who in the final analysis will fight this war and will produce the sinews of war—

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think the hon. member should single out a special class. Is not everyone fighting the war?

Mr. GILLIS: Not in the way in which the soldiers fight it. I do not say I am fighting it as they will have to fight it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Let us be fair about the matter.

Mr. GILLIS: I am fair about it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Which class is doing the fighting?

Mr. COLDWELL: These people are the majority of the people.

Mr. GILLIS: They have the right, but they have no representation on these boards. That is the difference between the kind of organization or society visualized and described by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the kind set up by the government. I say these people are entitled to representation on the controls, and they have not such representation at the present time—with perhaps one or two very anaemic exceptions under the Department of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: If that is anaemic, then those "anaemic exceptions" number over 400.

Mr. GILLIS: I would be very glad if the minister would put them on record.

Mr. MITCHELL: If that is anaemic, then God bless anaemia!

Mr. GILLIS: I would ask the minister to put them on record. If that is true, then it is news to me, and it is news to the great majority of the people of Canada.

Mr. DUPUIS: That is why you are still in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation.

Mr. GILLIS: The minister would help his own department to a great extent if he put that on record.

The war policy presented to the house by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is a people's war policy. It is a policy by which the material and human resources of the country would be placed at the service of the nation. Naturally this means central planning, central control and direction. But the people, as industrial workers, farmers and consumers would be represented with power in that central control. I am going to assure the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) that before he comes through this war, and comes through it successfully, he will come to that kind of organization.

Let me draw to his attention the words of a man for whom I think he has great respect, a man whom I have heard held up in the house many times as being the saviour of the British people in the crisis they face at the present time. This is what he says:

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Churchill. These are his words:

> The spontaneous and sustained good-will of the labouring masses of this country is the sole foundation upon which we can escape from our present difficulties.

He recognized that in England when he brought Bevin and those other men into his cabinet. He recognized it still further when he brought in Cripps as house leader. I am very sceptical—and I do not care with what group the person sits—when I hear slighting remarks about the contribution that those people can make. I said a moment ago that they will fight this war. Go to your air force, your army and your navy; find the boys who man your ships on the sea and in the air, and the boys who one day—before long I hope—will cross that English channel on barges and face Hitler's hordes over there, and you will find that the greatest majority of those men will be men who have very little to fight for.

You will find men who had little to fight for in the past, but who recognize that the framework of democracy in which there was freedom to work forward to a better order of society, is worth fighting for. But they expect, while they are making that contribution toward the future, that we in Canada who are their representatives and who have the power in this parliament are building an order of society which they are fighting for over there, against the time they may come back.

I believe if I were over there to-day I would be looking back at Canada, and I would be very closely scrutinizing the controls being set up. I would watch the representations on those controls, and see if they were of the class of people from which I came. Upon that would depend my morale. The fact that I was being directed, guided and dictated to by people who planned an order of society in which I was unemployed for fifty per cent of my time, or where I was a slave when I had a job, with no future and no security, would not be much incentive for me to lay down my life or to chase the Hun back to Berlin.

When we speak about the building of morale, those are the terms in which we must think. It is not enough to wave a flag in a worker's or soldier's face. Do not forget that to-day we are dealing with a generation of people who went through one war, and whose memories are not short. They remember what they did go through. Let us not lose sight of that fact. We are not fooling anyone but ourselves when we think in terms of waving the flag, and saying that everything is all right. We are in a situation different from any ever before faced by the British empire. Words are not going to bring us through it; action is what we need. We have to demonstrate to the people, if we expect to come through this war successfully.

At the outset I stated that the programme put forward by this group is not offered with the idea of seizing upon the present situation to bring into effect the policies designed to make effective the aims and objects of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. If we look around sensibly we shall find that same programme and policy being followed in practically every country making any kind of fight to-day. I would point out, too, that we of this small group are in very good company.

For instance, I believe it is generally recognized that Mr. Donald Gordon is a bright fellow, so bright in fact that the Department of Finance called him in to make him czar of the price-ceiling programme. What does Donald Gordon say about the mobilization of the resources of this country, under the competitive system? I quote the following:

Mr. Donald Gordon, Chairman of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board, in his speeches has said:

"Selfish and private interests must be ruled out completely and the competitive system must be replaced with one which is based entirely upon the criterion of maximum production. . . .

Anyone who regulates his effort by reference to a profit motive is a menace to the safety of the state. It is not the profit motive which sends men into battle against odds so overwhelming as to mean almost sure death and it is not the profit motive which brings men to the public service to work sixteen hours a day and forget that Sunday used to be a day of rest. . . .

Regimentation is the system of total war and we must be regimented before we can produce the machinery of total war. I would like to think however that we can develop a democratic version of regimentation."

Hon. members in this group agree with that statement. Others in the house term our programme as defective, and state socialism. If that is true, then I point out that one of your brightest men in Canada is making exactly the same statement we make.

For the benefit of my hon. friends to the right, may I say this. Your leader not so long ago—

An hon. MEMBER: What leader?

Mr. GILLIS: The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen—had this to say:

Mr. Meighen said: "Mr. Coldwell (M. J. Coldwell, C.C.F. leader in the House of Commons) has said his party will accept conscription of men if conscription of wealth and industry is imposed on an equal basis. I accept his offer. I speak for myself and the Conservative party."

The Conservative leader said he always had favoured the type of conscription of wealth now advocated by the C.C.F., and would accept any measure of conscription that would assist in winning the war.

Mr. DUPUIS: He was feverish that day.

An hon. MEMBER: When was that?

Mr. COLDWELL: Just before the York South by-election.

Mr. GILLIS: That was February 4. Then, let us turn to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And when was that?

Mr. GILLIS: May 17.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And with his tongue in his cheek.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): 1925.

Mr. GILLIS: This is what he said:

A constitutional reform of democracy itself is to be necessary. Its imperfections must be abolished, its lack of organization must be ended and all these new reforms must be founded upon the spirit of a new religion of brotherhood. "There would be a need of comprehensive economic reform," he said, "not tolerating either monopolistic capitalism or materialistic communism."

If he had his way, the first conscript in Canada would be money. I believe the Minister of Pensions and National Health means that. In my dealings with him for the past two and a half years I have found him to be a pretty reliable person, and he states definitely what he would do if he had his way. That is a clear indication that the Minister of Pensions and National Health is not free. Perhaps he is afraid of the hon. member for Cochrane, or he may be afraid of the hon. member for Swift Current, both of whom rise in their places in this house and defend a reverse policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He ought to resign.

Mr. GILLIS: No; perhaps he will be of more help to us over there when the proper time comes. I do not think any apology is needed for the programme and policy advocated by this group when we find ourselves in that company. Wallace R. Campbell is another. Is government intervention effective at any time?

I have another letter here before me. We reach our hands into a basket and just pick out the evidence; the country is flooded with it. A few days ago a letter was received from the International Association of Machinists in Montreal, which states:

Irrespective of what the Hon. C. D. Howe may have said in the house to the effect that no layoff was to take place, some 182 men had already received their notices to become effective June 13.

Private enterprise was laying off 182 men in an essential war industry. The Minister of Munitions and Supply exercised his authority as a member of the government and told them that they must not do that. The result is that 182 men are still making a contribution to Canada's war effort who would otherwise be on the streets. Just last month a brief was presented to the city council of Oshawa which contained the following statement:

At Oshawa in the past three months, more than a thousand workers have been laid off. The questions uppermost in their minds are, "when can we expect to get back to work?"

Mr. MITCHELL: There is a reason for that.

Mr. GILLIS: The point I am trying to make is that if Canada's industries were so organized and we were making an all-out war effort, there would be no necessity for our advocating the policy we are.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think a statement like that should go out to the country without being answered. That condition in General Motors was caused by something over which neither my hon. friend nor the government had any control. It was due to the fall of Singapore which made necessary a shift from the production of peace-time cars to war-time cars, with the necessary tooling up.

Mr. GILLIS: I say that if the government had been exercising the authority they should have been for the past two and a half years, such a situation would not have existed.

Mr. MITCHELL: The fall of Singapore?

Mr. GILLIS: No; the change-over in that industry. I have no desire to start a controversy with respect to this matter, and I do not want to go to the trouble of putting this brief on the record. I have quoted merely the pertinent part of it which shows that in that community there were a thousand workers whose services were not being utilized. The brief sets the condition out in detail, but I have no desire to hold up the house by reading it.

However, there is something over which the government has control—the coal industry, an essential war industry. After two and a half years of war it is completely paralyzed, working one or two days a week. I saw a statement in one of Friday's papers quoting a statement that had been made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), I presume in the house, with reference to the Nova Scotia mining industry. I am speaking from memory but, as I recall, he said that steps were being taken to remedy the situation by arranging for rail and water transportation to some point in New Brunswick.

Mr. MITCHELL: And the United States. My hon. friend knows the story as well as I do. It is one of those things that, in the public interest, cannot be divulged. It is clearly one of a loss of shipping, and I cannot go any further than that.

Mr. GILLIS: I realize that, but I realize also that two and a half years ago warnings were given to the government. Eighteen months ago I spoke in the house and recommended the elimination of the bottle-neck at the strait of Canso. The minister has commented on that himself. Since then I have dug up engineering reports which were made in 1906 and 1908, as well as copies of surveys. Plans were made to bridge that strait at that time at a cost of about $5,000,000, whereas it will cost $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 to bridge it to-day. That job could be done in a year. Had we started a year ago and spent some money, we could have removed that bottleneck and we would not have this industry in that end of the country paralyzed as it is at the present time. The point I am making is that there is ample justification in the disorganized state of industry across the country for the programme and the policy enunciated by this group. We are not doing this merely for political purposes; we realized that these things were necessary if our war effort were to be an all-out effort. The quicker we get them done, the better for ourselves. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar directs my attention to a statement by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, as reported on page 179 of Hansard of September 12, 1939. He said:

> The provision of 5 per cent was put in the last act after a good deal of consideration as a minimum return for the service rendered, but it was one which men of considerable experience believed to be unworkable. I can say to my hon. friend that from that day to this the defence purchasing board has done its very best to place contracts on that basis and has used every pressure that could be brought to bear in the form of patriotism and so on, but to date it has not succeeded in placing a single contract on that basis.

Mr. McLARTY: I gave a specific instance of the Ford Motor company which was then, has been since and is now accepting contracts on a 5 per cent basis.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to examine their capital structure and see upon what basis they are working.

Mr. McLARTY: That is on a cost-plus basis. Their capital structure would not enter into it at all; it would be purely a cost-plus 5 per cent basis.

Mr. COLDWELL: That would depend upon how the cost was made up.

Mr. McLARTY: Do not let us get into an unworthy argument.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has the floor.

Mr. McLARTY: It is subject to a specific audit.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister can speak to-morrow.

Mr. McLARTY: I do not want to give a speech; I just want to correct an impression which might go out. This is subject to a definite audit by auditors appointed by the government of Canada. If we are going to get anywhere, we must assume that it will be an honest audit.

Mr. GILLIS: I have no desire to delay the house any longer. I am merely trying to make clear my position and the position of this group in connection with the question now before the house. I shall be compelled to vote against the measure because, in my opinion and in the opinion of this group, it falls far short of what is necessary at the present time. The government has had the power to organize the resources of this country under the National Resources Mobilization Act for the past two years, and it certainly has done very little in that direction. It merely asks us by repealing section 3 of the act to give it authority to conscript men for overseas service if and when it deems that to be necessary. We feel that unless that is accompanied by legislation guaranteeing to the people of this country that the government is prepared also to mobilize and utilize wealth, industry, and finance on the same basis, at the same time, and to the same end as manpower is mobilized and utilized, we are not in a position to support what would be but a partial measure of conscription. We feel that in the present international situation nothing short of everything in this country should be conscripted that can be utilized to the end of defeating totalitarianism.

Mr. J. E. MATTHEWS (Brandon): Mr Speaker, I desire to make a few observations on the bill now before the house, even though I am following some of the ablest speeches in the present debate that I have ever heard in this chamber. I include in that remark representatives of all the different parties. I trust that hon. members will bear with me if for a few minutes I treat of matters more or less local.

Owing to a serious attack of flu I was not able to leave Ottawa during the plebiscite campaign, but I was very much gratified to find that in my absence the constituency of Brandon which I have the honour to represent polled a larger than normal vote and had also the distinction of polling one of the highest percentages of affirmative votes in all the constituencies west of the great lakes, Brandon's percentage being around 92 per cent. I should like here and now to thank a number of the good workers in that constituency who without regard to party or other affiliations got busy and did such a splendid job in the plebiscite campaign. Fifteen thousand or more voters in that constituency marked their ballots in the affirmative and, by so doing, said to the government and to the country that they were at least willing to have conscription introduced into this country. I would not say that they all desire conscription. No; but their ballots indicated their willingness to have conscription if conscription were necessary. That was the message, Mr. Speaker, that came to us from eight of the nine provinces of Canada, and came with overwhelming force. From the other province there came a message with equally overwhelming force, and with equal emphasis, expressing their unwillingness to have conscription. I think that is a fair interpretation to be placed upon both votes.

We are living as is often said, in a democracy. We are living in Canada, not in Germany, and it was the privilege of those millions of voters all across Canada, as free-born citizens beneath the British flag, to mark their ballots in any way they pleased. I cannot, however, close my eyes to the fact that had Hitler been in control in Canada as he is in Germany, the number of ballots marked in opposition to his wishes would have been very few.

The passage of this bill will place before the cabinet the whole responsibility for conscription. In that cabinet I have every confidence. It seems to me that a great many people in this country are not aware that eight of the members of the cabinet are returned men, men who saw service in the last war, men some of whom are paying a heavy price for the freedom which we enjoy to-day. I see in that cabinet as returned men, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). I am told that some of these men bear upon their bodies to-day the scars of conflict waged in our behalf. Some of them have sons overseas in the present war and are extremely anxious these days as to the safety of those sons. Others in the cabinet who were not overseas in the last war have ever since carried sad hearts because of loved ones who went and never returned. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, if we cannot trust the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and those eight men of military experience, yes, of battlefield experience, and their associates, I would ask, who is there in Canada that we can trust?

Viewed from a local angle, it matters little whether this amendment carries, or whether conscription for overseas service is adopted or not. Let me make my meaning clear. In the Brandon constituency, the town and country are practically stripped of their young men of military age and physical fitness. There are cases where farmers seventy years of age and over are left to operate their farms, having one son, two sons, and, in some instances, three sons in the king's uniform on overseas service. Let me remind my hon. friends that these men are operating, not small farms, but farms of three hundred, five hundred or six hundred acres. Too much credit cannot be given to the farmers of this country for the way in which they are tackling the situation. It is a war situation; they realize that, and they realize also the position in which they would find themselves and in which we would all find ourselves if we were slaves of Hitler.

I have before me a copy of the Souris Plaindealer, published in Souris, a town of about 1,500, in the southern part of my constituency. In this paper is a list of over three hundred men from that town and district who have enlisted for service overseas, their names, addresses, and units are all given. Many of these men have been overseas for a good while. They are waging grim warfare on every battle-front. They are represented in the prison camps of Germany, and in the tragedy of Hong Kong, of which it has been said that it represents one of the most gallant episodes in the history of Canadian arms. What is true of that community is, I believe, equally true of a great many communities all over this country. But of course I have not the figures for the others.

I want to pay a word of tribute to the valiant war services of many thousands of young Canadians whose parents came to this country not so long ago from continental Europe. Those parents are aware of the treachery and the perfidy perpetrated upon their own flesh and blood in their homeland. Along the north side of Brandon there is a strip of city populated almost entirely by those of European ancestry. They own their own homes, neat, clean, well-built; they have their vegetable and flower gardens, looked after with a care and a thrift that would put some of the rest of us to shame. They are Canadians, these people, and good Canadians, ready to take their share and play their part in the life and citizenship of our country. Some hon. members may ask, "What are their sons doing in this war? Are they playing their part?" I say, Mr. Speaker, that they are, because I have here another list containing the names of one hundred and forty enlisted men from that little corner of the city. Scan that list of names and addresses, and you will find that nineteen names out of every twenty are those of stalwart young Canadians whose parents came to us from continental Europe.

Having a fairly intimate knowledge of enlistments in a good many constituencies, I am reminded of an incident quoted in this house a few weeks ago by my good friend the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean). He told of a conversation which he had when overseas in the last war with an old Highland shepherd. The talk turned upon conscription. The old Highlander, trying once again to square his shoulders and stand erect, said to the hon. member for Simcoe East, "Over in yon village, laddie, and a' up the glen we are not subject to the draft." So in a great many constituencies in this country the young men are not subject to the draft because they are already in the fight.

I am one of those who like to give credit where credit is due. I care not to what race, creed or party it may apply. Listening, however, to some of the speeches in this chamber, one senses some reluctance to recognize and honour the hundreds of thousands of young men who have already responded to the call of duty—young Canadians still held in England who are straining at the leash to get into action, the type of action their fathers knew when they were overseas. Our Canadian boys in the navy are sailing the seven seas in proud defiance of enemy warships. Young men from Canadian air schools—"the aerodrome of democracy," as President Roosevelt called Canada—are night after night raining destruction on targets in Germany and in the middle east. I say that these young men are deserving of every recognition. I say that their parents and friends are deserving of recognition. And I say that there are young men in this country who have had technical training and are specialists in certain lines who are being urged to stay here, against their will, because of the importance of the work which they are doing here, and they also should receive the recognition which is their due.

On the other hand, I cannot quite understand the position of those Canadians in Quebec or elsewhere who, for reasons best known to themselves, profess to see no wisdom in Canada entering the war until the war reaches our shores. Well, the war has reached our shores, both east and west. Enemy shells have fallen in Canada for the first time, and enemy torpedoes have done their deadly work in the St. Lawrence. These two treacherous attacks are indisputable proof that the government should have absolute control as regards sending our troops elsewhere or holding them in Canada, and should lead us to expect that the vote which is soon to come would be practically unanimous in favour of the bill.

I do not think the present is any time for hair-splitting as to where help should be given and where it should be withheld. Let the responsible ministers of the crown who know the facts make those decisions. Our isolationist friends say they are ready to fight in defence of Canada, which means, let the other allies take care of themselves. That may sound very well, but just how does it work out? Supposing the German army were sailing up the St. Lawrence, shelling the towns and villages as they came, and killing the inhabitants, our friends would certainly then be ready to fight; but I am afraid—and I say this with no thought of sarcasm—that at that time their fighting would be "too little and too late." Then, suppose for argument's sake that the other provinces took the same attitude. Suppose Ontario remained indifferent, saying, "we don't like this war, we will let Quebec do the fighting, and we will have nothing to do with it unless the Germans invade Ontario". Then I can hear another voice, saying, "We are not interested in Ontario as a province; but let that German army"—I will not repeat the adjective I was going to use—"ever dare to invade Huron and Bruce and we will annihilate them". That is where the argument with regard to isolation leads, to an absolute absurdity.

Some of the countries of continental Europe had the same idea. What happened to them? One by one they were subjugated by Hitler. One by one many people of those countries were ground to death beneath the iron heel of German despotism. What happened in Europe could happen in Canada. Surely it must be increasingly obvious to all our people in every province that in this titanic struggle Canada is expected to stand side by side, shoulder to shoulder with the other allies, just as Canadian provinces would be expected to stand shoulder to shoulder with each other if Canada were attacked. In this war the allies are all members of one body, and no one of them can afford to let the others down.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, I do not often speak in this house, but I say to-night with all the earnestness and sincerity at my command that the time has arrived and is overdue when some of our people should forsake the realm of fantasy and get over into the realm of reality. In saying this, I share in no inferiority complex as regards Canada's part in the war. The rifle, the bayonet, and the machine gun are not sufficient in this war. It is a war of mechanized equipment of most intricate design and enormous quantity, and highly trained young men are necessary to operate and maintain that equipment. I understand that in this war ten men in the air force, and eighteen men in the army, are necessary to provide for the requirements of one man in the line of battle. I am not sure that that is correct, but I think it is approximately so.

We have at present almost half a million men in our fighting forces for service overseas. We have a Canadian navy of more than 400 ships, practically all built since the outbreak of war, a navy that has convoyed across the ocean 9,000 ships carrying 52 million tons of cargo. We have a delivery of more than 250,000 armoured vehicles to the united nations. We have produced nine types of gun carriers and mountings going from our shores in one unbroken stream to every theatre of war. Munitions are pouring across the sea, with Bren guns and guns of different makes. Food supplies, not in millions of pounds but in hundreds of millions of pounds, are going steadily to the old land; we have made an outright gift of one billion dollars' worth of supplies to the United Kingdom, not a loan but a gift, together with an interest-free loan of $750,000,000. With all this and with other enormous contributions I feel that Canada has no reason to be ashamed of what we are doing in this war.

I would hope that we might never be compelled to adopt conscription in Canada, even as Australia has never been compelled to adopt it there. I would hope that for the honour of our country it should never be said that we had to force our young men to fight in freedom's cause. But no matter what our personal views or preferences may be, we must make up our minds that this war has to be won, and every man or woman enjoying civil and religious liberty in this country should be expected to do his or her part. If conscription would accelerate our war effort, then conscription it should be.

The majority, a great majority, 1,300,000 people in Canada, have spoken, and in due course the bill now before the house will be voted upon. What an accomplishment it would be, what a milestone in Canada's history, what a cementing factor in the future progress of Canada if that vote could be made so unanimous that word of its unanimity would ring around the world!

I realize the difficulties in the way of some; I realize those difficulties with an open and sympathetic mind. There are members from the province of Quebec whose ancestors planted the tree of civilization in this far-flung country; members whose love of Canada is deep-rooted and sincere; members who would shed their last drop of blood in behalf of the land they love so well; members whom to know is to like; and with whom to associate is to respect. May I suggest to them in all kindness and sincerity that in my judgment, humble though it may be, this is the day of their opportunity, the day when a public man may make a lasting contribution to the future of our country and to its good feeling and unity, an opportunity to my mind without parallel since the days of confederation.

I have heard some wonderfully fine addresses in this debate by our French-Canadian friends. In fact, they seem to have a gift of eloquence and a spirit of animation that are peculiarly their own; but no speech gave me a greater thrill than the one I heard about a week ago delivered by my good friend the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), himself a French Canadian. I shall not soon forget his impassioned appeal for national unity, his appeal to forget the past and to think of the present and the future, and I join with him in saying, in the poet's words:

> Let the dead Past bury its dead!
> Act, act in the living Present!
> Heart within, and God o'erhead!

I can visualize in years to come the children and the grandchildren of the hon. member for Athabaska turning back the pages of Hansard to June 15, 1942, and saying to their assembled friends that in a dark hour of our nation's history, when the fate of Canada was at stake, when the fate of the empire was at stake, when the fate of democracy and the fate of our Christian civilization were at stake, that was the speech their father made in that crucial hour on the floor of this dominion parliament.

After all, there are very few members here who were here twenty-five years ago. "A new generation hath arisen" in the public life of Canada. Therefore let us bury the mistakes and the bitterness of the past. If there be any members in this house who have never made a mistake themselves, let them be the only ones to refuse to attend the funeral. Let those of us who have made mistakes and admit it stand together at the open grave and, gathering up from all parties the shreds of bitterness and the mistakes of previous years, let us bury them so deep in oblivion that only the plummet of history will ever find them.

I have been thrilled with pride on more than one occasion to hear the loved and late lamented minister of justice, to hear his successor, the present brilliant Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), to hear the ex-minister of transport (Mr. Cardin) and other gifted sons of the province of Quebec dilate with eloquence and spirit upon the proud traditions of our beloved Canada. Following a somewhat similar reference made by a previous speaker may I say that now, with the voice of a great majority still ringing in our ears, I sincerely trust that in this parliament, rich in traditions and lustrous with the glory of the past, there may descend upon us the spirit of that great statesman, the greatest in all Canada, who in 1917, when urging a referendum on the then proposed military service act, said that, whatever the result might be, the minority would abide by the will of the majority.

I have hopes that the brilliance of that honoured statesman of the past may serve as a guiding star on this occasion and that the tolerant and glorious mantle of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, worn with such regal dignity, twenty-five years ago, may adorn his successors in this parliament of 1942.

In no part of the world was there ever a greater demonstration of love and loyalty than in the province of Quebec when their majesties visited us three years ago. The depth and spontaneity of that demonstration will remain a standard in all history in the hearts of the Canadian people and the people of the empire. I am sure that Quebec's prayers and Quebec's blessings in this time of national peril are expressed in these lines of a Manitoba poet, a good friend of mine, which were published at the time in the Montreal Star:

God bless the King of Canada,
And bless our Queen so dear.
Long may he live to rule our land;
Lord, now Thy people hear.

God bless the King of Canada,
Through all the years to be.
Grant him Thy strength that he may keep
Our land forever free.

Mr. T. ADELARD FONTAINE (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks to-night, I wish to state that I feel myself in duty bound to oppose the bill that is now before the house.

Before discussing the provisions of the National Resources Mobilization Act which it is desired to amend through this Bill No. 80, may I, Mr. Speaker, state briefly a few of the reasons why, in my humble opinion, I must vote against a bill whose object is and whose result will be the enforcement of conscription of men for service overseas.

In my humble opinion, those reasons may be summarized as follows:

[Mr. Matthews.]

First, it is now recognized, as was clearly shown by the Right Honourable Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and as was also stated by all the honourable ministers who have spoken in this debate, that not only is conscription unnecessary at this time, but it may never become necessary.

Such a measure would destroy peace, unity and harmony in this country at a time when they are greatly needed. It was indeed for that reason that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of the greatest Liberal leaders in this country, always opposed conscription. It was for that very reason that he stated in the House of Commons, on January 17, 1916, that there should be no conscription in Canada.

Conscription would hamper our war effort, as was rightfully stated by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) in the splendid speech he delivered and for which I congratulate him.

The province of Quebec is now opposed to conscription for overseas service as much as she was in 1917; and it is for that reason—as has often been said and cannot be said too often—that the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, on September 9, 1939, speaking here in his own name as well as on behalf of his colleagues from our province, declared that the province of Quebec would never accept conscription for overseas service, that he was himself firmly opposed to conscription and that he would never be a member of a government that would attempt to enforce it.

The government of the province of Quebec, during the session that closed a few weeks ago, adopted a motion which concluded as follows:

This house reiterates the unswerving will of all its members to support the best possible war effort, but expresses the wish that the dominion government abide by its policy of voluntary enlistment and do not enforce conscription for overseas service.

The premier of Quebec, in whom we have the utmost confidence, gave expression to the same views in a telegram addressed, on May 21 last to one of our colleagues, the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fournier), in which he said:

You are no doubt aware that in a resolution presented before the Legislative Assembly, the very large majority of our members, having reiterated their firm determination to support a total war effort to final victory, have voted against conscription for overseas service, thus adopting the attitude which is that of the majority of our people and corresponds to the opinions which we have always expressed on the subject.

During the plebiscite, our people were not consulted on the merits or the principle of conscription; if such had been the case, possibly the results would have been different.

The people of the St. Hyacinthe-Bagot constituency whom I have the honour to represent in this house, are opposed for the most part to conscription for overseas service; I have always opposed such a measure myself and my views remain unchanged.

The passage of a conscription bill for service overseas would be, in my humble opinion, an absolute denial of this profound truth stated in 1937 by possibly the most Canadian of our governors general, Lord Tweedsmuir, when he said:

> She (Canada) is a sovereign nation and cannot take her attitude to the world docilely from Britain, or from the United States, or from anybody else. A Canadian's first loyalty is not to the British Commonwealth of Nations, but to Canada, and those who deny this are doing, to my mind, a great disservice to the commonwealth.

Moreover, we must not forget that we have absolutely no proof that it would be to Canada's true advantage to forego the voluntary system and resort to conscription for service overseas.

Finally, since the enemy is drawing closer to us and since the situation is becoming more and more threatening on the Atlantic as well as on the Pacific coasts, we should, as much as possible, look to the defence of our shores and our own territory.

No better proof of this statement can be found than the following news item which appeared in the evening papers to-day, after being a broadcast from Tokyo.

> The radio broadcast from the Japanese capital announces to-day that a Japanese submarine shelled Vancouver Island, British Columbia, on Saturday night. It said: "This is the first attack against the Canadian mainland. Canada has thereby been shown that she is being attacked by axis naval forces both from the east and the west at one and the same time."
> The Tokyo station called attention to the fact that the attack against Vancouver Island followed within less than twenty days upon the raids made against Dutch Harbour and Midway. It recalled the shelling of the California coast on February 23, "which caused such consternation among the American people".
> The Japanese station also added that, despite all statements to the contrary, the shelling of Vancouver Island has clearly shown that the United States and Canada are directly exposed to the danger of attack from the axis powers, both east and west, since German U-boats had attacked the Atlantic coast and even penetrated within the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The National Resources Mobilization Act, passed by parliament on June 18, 1940, restricts to Canadian territory and to the territorial waters of Canada compulsory military service in the army, navy or air forces.

Under the terms of that measure, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

But under section 3 of the act, it is definitely stated that the powers thus conferred upon the governor in council may be exercised, as far as compulsory military service is concerned, only to conscript young Canadians for service within Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

When this measure was enacted two years ago we were told that the invasion of France and many other European countries placed our country in immediate danger, that the following weeks were to be a crucial period, that the time had come to mobilize to the utmost the resources of the nation, that it had become strictly necessary for the government to seek special powers from parliament and that the greatest possible dispatch was essential.

In such a case, the government could have proceeded by order in council, under the War Measures Act, because it gives them very wide powers. On the other hand, they could have turned to the sections of the Miilitia Act, authorizing them to put conscription into force, under the first paragraph of section 8, which says:

> All the male inhabitants of Canada, of the age of eighteen years and upwards, and under sixty, not exempt or disqualified by law, and being British subjects, shall be liable to service in the militia: provided that the governor general may require all the male inhabitants of Canada, capable of bearing arms, to serve in the case of a levée en masse.

Respecting the principles of our democratic system, the government did not want to resort to either of these two methods, but preferred to submit to parliament a very clear and explicit measure which would be in force for the duration of the war.

The government has shown us, and properly so, that this Mobilization Act of 1940, precisely because of section 3, constituted, not an extension but a restriction of powers with regard to conscription in our country.

Therefore, the government, while declaring once again that they would not impose conscription as long as they remained in office, did not go any further, under the Mobilization Act of 1940, than they were authorized to do so by means of a measure which has been in our statute book since confederation.

Such were the circumstances and the conditions under which the Mobilization Act was adopted in 1940. Such were the reasons and the considerations which led us to consent to the adoption of that measure, subject to the formal restrictions of clause 3, that is for the defence of Canada, but in Canada only. The right hon. Prime Minister declared, in 1940, that the introduction of a bill conscripting men for overseas would divide public opinion in this country as it had not been, fortunately, for a great number of years.

The situation in this respect is still unchanged, and public opinion is still strongly divided on whether this is the proper time to impose conscription for overseas service.

The purpose of Bill No. 80 which is being considered by the house, is to abrogate the positive restrictions which are to be found in section 3 of the Mobilization Act and which I have just mentioned, and such will be its result.

It should be added and made clear at once that, without this section 3 restricting compulsory military service to Canada, the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, might not have been endorsed by a majority of this house or, at least, by the very great majority of members from the province of Quebec; nor again, probably, by some hon. members from other provinces.

For the first time since the outbreak of this war, we are now facing a measure which, in my humble opinion, entails the acceptance of the principle of compulsory service overseas.

In the speech which he delivered in this house on November 12, 1941, the right hon. Prime Minister again stated the following in no uncertain terms:

> I wish to make it clear that I am in favour of national selective and compulsory service for Canada, in Canada. I never took any other position. I have always held this opinion.

Mr. Speaker, sharing as I do the views of my leader, I cannot support the present measure nor could I subscribe to the principle of conscription for overseas service.

To my mind, in a country such as ours, the adoption of a measure directly or indirectly implying endorsation of the principle of compulsory service for overseas constitutes the main obstacle to the preservation of that unity and good understanding which are essential to victory and the maintenance of peace within our own country.

It was through disregard of this basic truth that, during the last war, the enactment of conscription for overseas service led to misunderstanding and resentment between the various provinces of this country. Yet I feel that the sad experience of 1917 and the wretched times that followed should serve as a salutary lesson. But this unity, Canada's essential requirement, especially in war time, cannot exist unless the majority is prepared to respect the views of the minority and to reckon with its opinion. Such respect, regard, sacrifices and concessions must be mutual. Every citizen must contribute to this understanding by a fair share of good-will and sacrifice, out of regard for the common good and the rights of his neighbours, of whatever race, language or creed. Such is the treatment that the French-Canadian and Catholic majority of the province of Quebec generously and whole-heartedly grants the English-speaking and Protestant minority of that province. There is no other way of coming to an understanding and remaining united in case of danger, and it is the way to do our duty as patriots and good Canadians. The government, by way of compromise, and through a plebiscite, attempted to maintain unity in Canada, and this legislation was passed with the sole object of attaining that end. However, we must ask ourselves if the new bill now before the house is liable to restore peace, confidence and order in Canada.

Let us note, in passing, the observation made on the 18th instant by the right hon. Prime Minister in this house, concerning the result of the plebiscite in the province of Quebec. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) was criticizing an article published in the Ottawa Journal and had just quoted the following paragraph:

> We would like to ask this question: If Quebec had voted "yes", would we not have had conscription immediately?

"We certainly would not," interjected the right hon. Prime Minister. In my humble opinion, it was in anticipation of what is happening to-day that the former minister of public works (Mr. Cardin) made this most important remark to the people of our province during the plebiscite campaign:

> It may well be that the negative reply urged on you will bring you the opposite of what you are seeking.

That interjection by the Prime Minister, which I have just alluded to, seems to imply that the former minister of public works was right.

Every one knows that the province of Quebec has always been against conscription. She opposed it in 1917, and has done so to this day.

It would be useless to seek out and analyse in detail the strong reasons for this stand. As for myself and all my French-Canadian colleagues, we have always stood against conscription for overseas service.

However, it would be wrong to assume that the French Canadians are the only ones who oppose this legislation. I say without hesitation that a very large section of the English-speaking population of this country fully shares the views and feelings of the people of Quebec in the matter. I claim that the results of the plebiscite—this has already been stated in the house—would have been entirely different had the question borne directly on the merits of conscription. In any event, in accepting this plebiscite legislation we have made a concession for the purpose of maintaining harmony and national unity in the country.

However, all this happened after promises were made and guarantees given that conscription for overseas service was out of the question. No one, at that time, stated that, immediately after the plebiscite results would be known, the National Resources Mobilization Act would be amended in such a way as to put on the statutes the principle of compulsory service for overseas. No one, at that time, warned us that, immediately after the holding of the plebiscite, we would be called upon to make the distinction between the adoption in a legislative measure, of the principle of conscription, and the ultimate enforcement of this legislation through orders in council which might or might not be submitted to parliament. We have been told that this plebiscite was held to release the government from moral obligations, from verbal commitments, but no one has ever warned us that it was intended to repeal parts of an act and thereby do away with statutory guarantees. If, in 1940, we consented to pass the mobilization act, it was because it contained this formal, explicit and clear guarantee of section 3, which states that the measure may apply only to Canada and not outside of its boundaries. The text of section 3, which the bill now under discussion proposes to strike out, is very clear. It reads as follows:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

It is now argued that the new measure submitted to parliament through this bill is only the logical consequence of the plebiscite. I cannot support that point of view. The object of this bill is indeed to have the principle of compulsory military service outside Canada recognized, accepted and approved through an act of parliament.

It is obvious and clear to me that such is the purpose of this bill. The issue is accordingly the acceptance of the principle of conscription, if not its immediate enforcement. Consequently this measure has no connection with the plebiscite and is no consequence therefrom: first, because it was represented to us that conscription was not the issue, and second, because the question asked in the plebiscite did not imply the acceptance or rejection of the principle of conscription for overseas.

Mr. Speaker, by whom is the immediate enforcement of conscription for overseas service actually demanded in this country? In the first place, by the Conservative party, which has ever advocated conscription, a party whose main leaders are recruited among imperialists and which, in this house, has no longer any representative from the province of Quebec.

Conscription is also demanded by the high finance group, which includes the Toronto "Two Hundred," but I assert that neither those groups, nor the Orange order, reflect the feelings of the majority in this country.

But, even if we consider those people only, we may well inquire into the reasons on which they base such a demand, and try to ascertain why they advocate so strongly the immediate enforcement of conscription for overseas service. In my humble opinion, they have so far adduced no reason which might be considered as acceptable, good or valid.

The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said that a total war effort cannot mean anything but total and unlimited conscription, and he has stated that we entered the war because Canada was a British country.

The hon. Minister of National War Services has rightly answered that argument in stating that we entered the conflict for a principle and on our own account.

At all events, I cannot see how a measure like the one that is now submitted to us could help the cause of our allies and also help our country's war aims, because we know that our present system of voluntary enlistment is more efficient than the form of conscription adopted in the United States and also because England herself is more than satisfied with our war effort which, after all, compares favourably with that of any other dominion.

The highest authorities in the old country, the British prime minister himself, Mr. Churchill, as well as Lord Beaverbrook and other eminent men in public life who have honoured us with a visit, all said that Canada was doing her duty and contributing her full share in this war, and that her war effort—that was the term used—was simply magnificent.

Why then, I repeat, should there be in our country a group clamouring for immediate adoption of total conscription for overseas service? This overzealous and highly vocal group is clamouring to-day as they did in 1917, and presumably for the same deep-seated motives. They crave power, they want to profit by the war and accumulate profits and wealth, and a few of them are resentful and bitter toward the French-Canadian and Catholic minority.

I know of nothing more stupid and ridiculous than those periodical appeals coming from a small group of extremists against a so-called danger of domination by the French and Catholic population of this country. In time of peace, such appeals may be nothing but stupidity but, in time of war, they become persecution and provocation and constitute a very grave threat to national unity.

We had several examples of that state of mind only recently. Since other members have already mentioned the matter, I shall quote as briefly as possible.

In a speech delivered in Toronto, Mr. J. W. Carson, grand master of the Grand Lodge of Western Ontario had this to say:

It is almost unbelievable that many leaders in the province of Quebec are still opposing a total war effort. How can loyal citizens, aware of the acts of cruelty of the enemy, persist in closing their eyes and try to prevent others from doing their duty and helping in the defeat of so barbarous an enemy?

According to a Canadian Press dispatch sent from Winnipeg on the 11th instant, Mr. T. T. Shields, of Toronto, who is president of the Canadian Protestant League, is reported to have stated in a speech he delivered in that city, that "the Catholic church is the most dangerous fifth column in any country in the present war", and to have added:

The Roman Catholic Church is the greatest and most profitable "racket" in the world; it is responsible for the opposition shown by the French Canadians of the province of Quebec to conscription, and it enjoys in Canada a privileged position.

According to another dispatch from the Canadian Press, the same reverend gentleman is reported to have made here in Ottawa, very recently, a speech in which he repeated substantially the same charges he had uttered against the Roman Catholic church a few days previously in Winnipeg, adding further, according to the report, that, to his mind, the Catholic faith is the most powerful force of evil in the whole world, and that . . .

The real prime minister of Canada is Cardinal Villeneuve, the archbishop of Quebec, and that is why we have no conscription but only a partial war effort.

[Mr. Fontaine.]

Finally, he is reported to have added that, "Roman Catholicism is not a form of Christianity but the negation of all Christianity."

According to another Canadian Press dispatch, dated June 17, from Toronto, Colonel A. T. Kidd of Kingston, supreme chief of the Grand Lodge of Orangemen in America, is reported to have said at the 112th annual convention of this lodge, held in this city, that the policy of the order of Orangemen was based on total conscription of wealth, industry and men. He is quoted as having said:

We have always taken the stand that Canada's future is linked with that of the British empire, and to-day we demand total participation in this war of the British empire. Canada's war effort is not sufficiently imperialistic and I regret to say that this war effort does not go beyond certain limits dictated to the government by the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it necessary to answer in detail those assertions and statements made by sectarians, by men who are evidently, in the majority of cases, suffering from a disease which Le Canada recently termed cases of religious mania. But it may be advisable, since one of those assertions mentioned Cardinal Villeneuve and since we are to celebrate in our province, day after to-morrow, our national holiday of "la Saint-Jean-Baptiste",—and I hope you will allow me to do so, Mr. Speaker, for the enlightenment of that pastor who spoke such words about a person highly respected and venerated in the province of Quebec—it may be advisable to call the attention of this house to the fine definition of patriotism given a few years ago by Cardinal Villeneuve, when he wrote in the official bulletin of the Saint-Jean-Baptiste society:

Patriotism is such a many-shaded virtue that its practice is difficult. Some fail to recognize it, others misconstrue it. It should be understood to consist in an enlightened and generous, unrestricted yet well ordained love for each and every one of the many and varied constituent elements of a country. In times such as ours, when wild nationalistic doctrines have followed upon a pernicious internationalism, a patriotism born of faith should be fostered. It stands midway between those two extremes, not through a combination of excesses on the one hand and cowardice on the other, but by establishing the lofty dominance of justice and love over egotism both racial and individual.

It might be well to quote, incidentally, another authorized representative of the Catholic church, not from the province of Quebec this time, but from England. Cardinal Hinsley, primate of the Roman Catholic church in Great Britain, commenting upon the interests at stake in the present conflict, stated not long ago:

Totalitarianism, whether in its Italian or in its nazi or its communistic form, is diametrically opposed to the Catholic doctrine of the individual value of the human soul. There can be no peace between those who believe that the individual is a child of God and those who teach that he is but a slave of the state.

And on September 29, 1941, the feast of St. Michael, the same Cardinal Hinsley sent a message to the French Canadians:

To my Canadian friends and brothers.

I greet the spirit of Canada! That spirit is made of loyalty to the cause of freedom, for in faith lies the true freedom of true democracy. There lies the bond that unites us in this world conflict. I had the pleasure of seeing your soldiers, strong and faithful men, true sons of a great nation. I had the privilege of speaking to them.

We are fighting for the defence of the faith against the powers of paganism, that is to say against the beast condemned by St. John—against the spirit of the sovereignty of hatred. Victory will be achieved through love, through the gospel of Christ. Canada claims her heroic share in this victory—the victory of love-inspiring faith.

Long live Canada—long live the Canadian people! May God bless you all and reward you for the generosity of your nation in her steadfast practice of Christian duties.

A. Cardinal Hinsley.

After such statements, Mr. Speaker, I feel it unnecessary for me to answer, as regards both the French-speaking Canadians and the Roman Catholic church, those stupid and ridiculous outcries heard recently in a rather disconcerting chorus, from people apparently imbued with a narrow and sectarian disposition, who spread insults and abuse directed at the French-Canadian and Catholic minority in this country.

So far, the voluntary system of enlistment has given, in this country, very satisfactory results. Our population is a mere eleven and a half million inhabitants. At the end of 1941, according to figures given in this house, our army was 500,000 strong, and the volunteers numbered 430,000. The government estimates, and it has consistently repeated this statement, that it will be possible during the current year to enlist about 100,000 men; this would bring our army, at the beginning of 1943, to a strength of 600,000 men, or 6 per cent of the total population of the country. Assuming that, in accordance with official estimates, an average of 20 civilians is required to maintain a soldier in the ranks and if, besides, we take into account the men who are physically unfit for military or various other services, it is amply proved, by these figures, that Canada is doing as much if not more in proportion to her population, than the other allied countries. Furthermore, what practical results would follow conscription? Needless to say that such a measure would be absolutely useless unless it were implemented; but supposing it were enforced, how many men would it yield for our army? How many men would be drawn from agriculture, munitions factories and essential war industries? It is always imperative to revert to the view that, in the present circumstances, conscription, far from being necessary, would be harmful. It would have practically no effect on the strength of our army. It would only serve to raise great obstacles and difficulties in the way of its enforcement. It would destroy national unity and seriously hamper our war effort.

These are the reasons why, Mr. Speaker, although remaining true to my party, its best traditions, its programme and principles, I feel compelled to vote against the bill now before the house.

A few days ago, the hon. Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) stated here:

I would ask those who are not partisan-blind to take account of the efforts of the government . . . and to recognize that the one factor of the conscription of men for overseas is not the most important thing necessary to enable Canada to prosecute an effective war effort. That must fall in its proper perspective, together with everything else; and if it does not, then we are weakening rather than strengthening our effort.

I think that the hon. Minister of Mines and Resources was indeed right when he made that statement in the house. What is most important and most necessary to-day, what is essential to our war effort, is not the conscription of men for military service overseas; it is production in all the spheres which are in any way related to this war effort; farm production, foodstuff production, aircraft plant production, shipbuilding yard production, gun and munition production for war purposes, forest production, mine production. All this can be summed up in the appeal made last year by the hon. Prime Minister of England, Mr. Churchill, when he exclaimed: "Give us the tools, and we will finish the job."

Nobody in the province of Quebec is willing to give up the freedom and the democratic system under which we live in this country.

Whilst she remains strongly opposed to conscription for overseas service, Quebec, since the beginning of this war, has made and will continue to make her share of sacrifices, and she will continue to fulfil her duty in order to defend Christian civilization, maintain democracy, smash the aggressor and attain the final victory which will guarantee us peace, happiness and liberty.

We have been told during this debate—I think it was the hon. member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) who said so—that French Canada had no leaders at the present time. I deem it my duty to protest against such an erroneous statement. We French Canadians are proud to have as leaders and representatives such prominent statesmen, such sincere patriots as Cardin, Godbout and St. Laurent; men of courage, of talent and of devotion, who are in no way inferior to their predecessors and whose names also will rank among the greatest in our Canadian history. They have, in their respective fields, the ambition, the energy and the will to properly represent their fellow citizens in this war, to lead them wisely and honestly, and they have the firm determination conscientiously to fulfil all their obligations as faithful patriots and true Canadians.

Canada entered this war because she was forced to take up arms to safeguard her rights and privileges unjustly violated and to guard against unprovoked aggression.

Our young Canadians without distinction of race, language or creed, are ready to do their duty loyally, courageously and generously by their country threatened with invasion.

Since the outbreak of war, we have offered up to the Almighty our humble prayers for those who, on land, on sea and in the air, have given their lives for this cause which we hold dear, for the triumph of peace and justice. We pray and will continue to pray that divine Providence may grant us an early peace, a favourable and lasting peace, based on understanding not hatred, on mutual respect not contempt. Let us hope that this gospel of harmony, peace and charity will be put into practice in our country by all the elements of our population. Only on these terms and through this means will it be possible to make Canada a greater, more united, more prosperous and more beautiful country.

Mr. MAURICE BOURGET (Lévis) (Translation): While I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the debate on this bill is drawing to a close, I feel it would be very difficult for a member from the province of Quebec to keep silent at this time especially in regard to legislation of such great moment. Besides, I gather from the statements of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), that this is the last opportunity we shall have of dealing with this unpleasant question of conscription. I don't fail to realize that my remarks will not meet with the approval of all the hon. members of this house. However, a member who expounds his deep convictions always deserves the respect of his colleagues. On the strength of this, I propose to make a few comments on the bill before the house.

During the debate on the address in reply, in February of this year, I said with regard to the plebiscite:

> May we not believe, under the circumstances, that we are treading on dangerous ground in proposing such a measure? Are we not going to play into the hands of our opponents? I am inclined to believe it, for if we give way on one point of our programme, we may later have to give way on another.

Let it be acknowledged that those remarks of mine were justified. I was against the plebiscite because I could foresee that in the event of the government being released—and that is really what happened—of its promises regarding compulsory military service for overseas, we would quite logically be called upon to discuss, sooner or later, the problem of conscription.

I was among those who campaigned in the province of Quebec for a negative vote. I submitted frankly and sincerely to the people of my constituency the reasons which, in my estimation, justified our refusing to release the government from its promises. And I may say, Mr. Speaker, that I made it a point to always speak with moderation and justice. I did not have to resort to other methods, because I had too much respect for those who had done me the honour of choosing me as their representative and knew them to be patriotic and intelligent enough to grasp the merits of my arguments.

I might add that my electors were left absolutely free to vote according to their conscience and what they believed to be in the best interests of our country. The result was clear cut: 91 per cent of the voters refused to release the government from its pledges. I wish to emphasize that such a vote does not mean that my fellow citizens are opposed to our war effort nor that they do not desire an allied victory as all other Canadians do. Knowing as I do the excellence of their patriotism, I cannot suspect for a moment that they were inspired by any other motive than their definite and formal opposition to conscription for overseas service.

I wonder if, in certain quarters, people understand perfectly what the adoption of such a measure would mean to French-Canadian members. Do they know what these members are being asked to abandon in voting for this measure? Do they know that, when these members are requested to give the government a free hand, they are being asked to surrender the rights for which their forefathers fought during more than two centuries?

They are being asked to acknowledge once more that this country is a colony which must, now as always, obey the orders and bow down to the requirements of an outside nation, whatever our interests and our legitimate ambitions may be.

We have long been told in glowing terms about British fair play. It seems to me that if that fair play truly exists, as I am still willing to believe, there is now a splendid opportunity of putting it into practice by recognizing the rights which have been bestowed to an important minority in this country and confirmed in an agreement which was termed a "sacred contract" by the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. It seems to me that our English-speaking fellow citizens now have a splendid opportunity to honour that claim and recognize that suppression of the rights enjoyed by a minority, in whatever way and through the use of whatever force it may be done, is a glaring injustice.

It seems to me that if we consider the important part played by the citizens of Quebec and the excellent results obtained since the opening of the conflict, it must be admitted in all fairness that Quebec has displayed a great deal of generosity and has willingly agreed to equality of sacrifice in every possible field.

In certain sections of the country, there are people who entertain false ideas concerning equality of sacrifice; French Canadians are accused of not participating as much as they should in our war effort. But do they not understand that equality of sacrifice implies equality of rights? I do not think it necessary at this moment to cite, in support of this idea, examples proving beyond all doubt that in certain fields we have not always obtained and are not yet receiving our just due. Certain newspapers have brought out this point on several occasions. As far as I can ascertain, I do not think that a single one of those newspapers which have launched important publicity campaigns based on equality of sacrifice, has ever requested, whenever it had the occasion to do so, the granting of our just share.

Even if the number of voluntary enlistments is not as large as amongst our English-speaking fellow citizens this can be explained by reasons as important as the ones I have mentioned and that were so brilliantly stated by the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) and by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent).

I listened very carefully to the speeches made by the right hon. Prime Minister and the majority of the cabinet and I have even read them over. As I understand it, they realize as well as we do that conscription is not necessary. But what strikes me is that after having pronounced eloquent speeches against conscription, they want us to agree to its principle.

We have been taxed by many with having failed to understand the interests of our country in opposing the passage of this bill. Well, Mr. Speaker, in the course of conversations with some of my colleagues from other provinces I learned that during the last election campaign, the late Minister of Justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, had been warmly applauded wherever he made a speech. He said very frankly, however, that he was irrevocably opposed to conscription for service overseas, a statement that would bring frenzied applause from his English-speaking listeners.

No one, to my knowledge, whether in this house or outside, has yet accused the former Minister of Justice of lacking in patriotism. He knew, as indeed the right hon. Prime Minister himself knows, the reactions and problems they would have to face when they accepted to govern a country in time of war. Both had witnessed the events which took place in 1917. Both nevertheless gave pledges even as we did ourselves, and we are asking to-day that those very pledges be kept.

We Canadians from Quebec have no reason to be ashamed of our sacrifices; we have made them generously; we have made them mainly for the purpose of preserving national unity. It is with that same purpose in view that we now ask our English-speaking fellow citizens to recognize our right to vote against conscription.

I contend there is no lack of patriotism in thinking first and foremost of protecting this country. Are the events which occurred over the week-end not sufficiently convincing?

Our coasts are under attack and it is thus our duty to organize our defence. From information received to date, it is evident that our country is not adequately protected against the attacks to which it is exposed. I believe the urgent and basic duty of the government is to shoulder at once that responsibility and do its best to avoid being accused, some day, of having been taken by surprise or of having helped other countries at the expense of ours.

It should be evident that if we continue to send our men overseas and do not keep a sufficient number of them here for the defence of Canada, we are deliberately inviting disaster and defeat? Once our men are overseas, it is almost certain that in case of an attack against Canada, it will be impossible to recall them to this country. Sir Ronald Cross himself said early in April:

I cannot foresee, during this war, the day when ships carrying troops will be in a position to travel from Great Britain to Australia.

These words of the British high commissioner in Australia must therefore warn us of what to expect if the government is authorized to give way before the pressure that is applied in favour of conscription for overseas service.

On the other hand, did we stop to consider that this conscription measure will do more harm than good? We must admit that it would bring grave dissensions and no doubt paralyse our war effort.

I understand well enough that those who, for the last two years, have clamoured most for conscription are moved by other reasons than the ones they would have us believe. I realize very well that this question of conscription is after all a purely political one, because everyone admits it would be illogical to claim that the adoption of such a measure will bring a complete change in the present conflict as well as in its final result.

Let us try to-day, in this critical hour of our national life, when every citizen must bend himself to the carrying on of our war effort, let us try to think as Canadians and in every way to strengthen national unity.

Let us bring into play the principles of liberty and equality set out in the Atlantic charter by respecting the rights and privileges of minorities.

It is shameful and revolting to proclaim that "might is right". Rather should we respect solemn commitments. The best thing to do for the moment is to defeat every attempt to enforce conscription for overseas service.

I have uttered these remarks, believing it to be my duty, in the interests of my fellow citizens and of Canada.

Paraphrasing Tennyson's poem "You ask me why" and applying it to Canada, I may say in conclusion: It is the land of free men, the land of freedom, calm and moderate, where a man may say what he pleases whether he be with friends or enemies. A land with steady government, a land of just and ancient renown, where liberty flows slowly from precedent to precedent, where factions seldom raise their head, where the might of all fertile thought, maturing by degrees, has time and space for its development.

On motion of Mr. Taylor the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

[Mr. Bourget.]

The house met at three o'clock.

GASOLINE

LACK OF SUPPLY FOR MAGDALEN ISLANDS FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Munitions and Supply. A few minutes ago I received a telegram which reads:

Grindstone, Magdalen Islands,
June 23, 1942.

J. S. Roy, M.P.,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Carload seventy drums marked gasoline consigned to myself left in Pictou Monday on instructions government inspector. That is what is being done to relieve shortage situation. This carload must be loaded Thursday as there is no other means transportation. Please get matter cleared in time and wire.

Oscar Delaney

Will the minister take care of this situation if possible?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I drew the attention of the officers of the Department of Transport to the needs of the Magdalen Islands, and I suppose that this is an effort to relieve the situation. However, I shall see that the situation is relieved as adequately as possible.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Monday, June 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I may say for the edification of the house that I hope not to take too long in my discussion of the bill which is before us this afternoon. There has been a long debate; most of the points have already been brought out, and it seems to me that the discussion ought not to be prolonged if that can be avoided. Having said that I may disappoint myself, and you, Mr. Speaker, as well; but I hope for the best.

The bill is the result of the plebiscite which was held on April 27. There has been some talk and discussion as to the meaning of that vote. I myself have no doubt about what the vote meant. I do not say that it was a mandate for conscription for overseas service. I do not say that it was a direction to the government to put into effect compulsory service for overseas. But what I do believe, and what I think the vast majority of the people of this country believe, is that the voters considered and expressed themselves to this effect to the government: Raise the men in any way you think necessary to help win the war. And underneath that declaration was a definite indication of a green light to the government to go full speed ahead.

I want to express my profound appreciation of the unmistakable response which three millions of the citizens of the dominion gave in authorizing the government to do everything it considered expedient to prosecute the war effectively. I recognize that it was not a vote of confidence in any government, and it was not taken as such, but I do believe that it can be regarded throughout the world as a resounding declaration by the people of Canada that they are heart and soul in the war. The government is immediately following that up by introducing this bill to ask parliament to give to the government the legal freedom of action which the moral freedom of action given by the plebiscite would indicate.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this debate has helped us all to get a clear view of the troublesome and inflammable question of conscription. For a long while conscription was something that was talked about almost in whispers. There is nothing sinister about conscription. It is only a method of raising men for service in the armed forces, or in any other activity, for that matter. We have conscription in Canada now. We have had it for over a year or more; there are between 30,000 and 35,000 men training or serving in Canada at this minute who were conscripted, if you want to use that term. There are about 50,000 men, including that 30,000 or 35,000, in the army, navy and air force who came in through the call-up. Nobody suggests that it is a bad method or an inefficient method for service in Canada. The only question is whether we should have power to widen the area of service in order that these men could be sent overseas if necessary. I think the real question is not whether conscription is an efficient method but whether there are considerations which override its efficiency.

Speaking of men for overseas service, I stated in February that I preferred the voluntary system if it worked, and I gave my reasons: first, because it provided volunteers for a voluntary army; and second, because of the division in this country which conscription would produce. These, I think, were substantial reasons. I would always prefer to see our Canadian army overseas purely a volunteer army. But if to maintain and reinforce and strengthen it, it should become necessary to require men to serve overseas, then obviously so far as I am concerned there can be no alternative, because we cannot let the army down, and, what is even more important, we cannot let Canada down.

On the other point, regarding disunity, that—and we might as well face it—is the toughest problem in government to-day. We do not want disunity. But the price of unity must not be too great. We know that there is a deep-rooted antipathy to compulsory overseas service in certain sections of this dominion, and it is quite probable that that antipathy springs from a failure to realize that it is Canada's battle overseas just as much as it is in Canada. No one has explained that situation and that feeling in clearer and more informing terms than my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who made that excellent speech a short time ago. I am sure that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and the Minister of Justice; our former colleague the member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) and many other members from Quebec, have tried to bring this fact home—that it is Canada's war overseas as well as in Canada. I am sure too, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, that those in my department have spared no effort to bring home to our fellow citizens in the province of Quebec the importance of our overseas effort. While there will be those who doubt it, I have myself been fairly earnest and reasonably industrious in recognizing and trying to remedy the handicaps and difficulties that exist.

When the recruiting campaign was on a year ago, I took strong grounds when some members on the opposite side of the house insisted on raising this question of conscription. I urged that it should not be raised before the voluntary system was given a real trial and before the need for conscription was established. As a matter of fact, I believe I was the only member on this side of the house who did make that appeal, and I made it because I remembered what took place in 1917. I want to afford every reasonable opportunity and every possible help to those who have an aversion to compulsory service overseas, or to overseas service in general, to enable them to realize that overseas is Canada's front line. I hope most fervently that this realization will come very fast in the midst of the ominous events of these days. We are having it driven into us every day that this is a fight to a finish, and that we have to think of even more than our unity. We are facing the possibility of fighting for our very existence. If considerations of national unity should come into conflict with measures for our national security and existence, then surely it is the security of the nation which must count—and by that I mean the security of all the nation, both the majority and the minority. It may be that if that test comes we shall find our national unity in the mutual support which we shall have to give each other and which will be imperative by reason of the instinct of self-preservation itself.

So that this bill, Mr. Speaker, gives the government the power to require men to serve in any military, naval or air force of this country outside of this dominion whenever in the opinion of the government, to use the words of section 2, it "may be deemed necessary or expedient for the defence of Canada or the efficient prosecution of the war."

Now, why is that power required? In the speech from the throne, which has already been quoted, there was no mistaking the attitude of the government at that time. In the words of His Excellency the Governor General, which had first been prepared by the government:

> The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

That, Mr. Speaker, was after Pearl Harbour, after December 7, after the flames which broke out in Europe had spread to Africa and encircled the globe. It was about the time of Singapore and Manila. Since that time the Japanese have come back again to Midway, badly crippled; they limped back home; but since that time the Japanese have set foot on the far end of the bridge which connects Asia with north America, and the day before yesterday we had reports of the Japanese shelling Vancouver island.

Canada has three fronts. But I consider, notwithstanding all that has taken place on the Pacific, that for us in the long run the English channel is probably the most vital point in the strategy of the war. Over there the forces of Britain, the forces of Canada, and, not far away, the forces of the United States stand ready to beat off an attempted invasion. They stand ready also to attack in an offensive which must come and which must succeed if the cause of the united nations is not to perish. Over there Canada has naval units, army units, air force units: the naval units taking part in the Atlantic convoys and in the patrols; the air force fighting not only in Britain, not only in Europe, but in the middle east and the far east as well; the army standing guard, as it has for two and a half years, doing grim vigil, sometimes in the line and then out again for training, doing boring work, waiting for the time when that training can be put into effect. Canada at the present time has in Britain three infantry divisions, an armoured division, an army tank brigade, thousands and thousands of corps, army and divisional troops; and this year we expect to send over another armoured division and another army tank brigade. Those are the commitments we have on that front. That is what we are doing with regard to the English channel.

I will not trouble to-day, because it is probably not important in connection with this discussion, to detail the extent of our forces in this country. I will only say that we have the sixth, seventh and eighth divisions mobilizing or mobilized; we have the fourth division for the time being, until it goes overseas; we have coast defence artillery and infantry, searchlights and signals and all the services that go with them; we have ninety training centres across Canada, and we have internal units guarding vulnerable points and for the purposes of internal security. In Canada the air force is patrolling this country and guarding both our coasts, as it is doing in England, and the navy is working day and night in its ceaseless patrol, not only of our coasts but in connection with the convoys which leave our shores.

That, very quickly, is a review of the man-sized job which the armed forces of Canada are doing at the present time. No Canadian need apologize for the extent of the participation of the armed forces of Canada in this war. At the same time—I have said this again and again, and I repeat it, that whatever we have been doing should simply inspire us to search our hearts to find out if we cannot do more. We are now working on the 1942-43 programme, which calls for 90,000 to 100,000 men during the fiscal year. During the first two and a half months of this fiscal year we have enlisted just under 30,000 men; that is, at the rate of 12,000 a month. That number has to be cut down to some extent because a portion of these men are enlisted in units which are designated for home defence. Nevertheless they are of course available for reinforcements overseas if need be. Leaving them out entirely, we find that about 8,000 men a month have been enlisted, so that in the result voluntary enlistments have been coming in in sufficient numbers to provide what we were advised was necessary to take care of the overseas programme announced in January.

That, Mr. Speaker, is just the beginning, because new demands are coming in. The Prime Minister mentioned in January that we expected to mobilize in Canada probably another division, at the time of the dispatch of the fourth division overseas. As a matter of fact we are mobilizing the seventh and eighth divisions as well as the sixth. We have mobilized a very substantial number of additional anti-aircraft units. Since I spoke in January we have called up no less than 45,000 men. That includes the requisition for the month of July, which has already been sent to my colleague the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). We have enlisted in the army since that time another 45,000 men, and we have expanded our training facilities so that we are now training men not only in these ninety training establishments across Canada, but in units as well.

Under the intensified activities we have in the army, under what might be referred to as the forced draught under which we are proceeding, we feel, and the government feels, that neither the government nor anybody else knows nor can know what is ahead—how many men are needed, how many may be required, what casualties will be suffered, what new commitments may have to be taken on, how the system will work as the drain increases on man-power and on administration. I have the responsibility of the raising and the organization of the army, and I am asking this house to face up to these possibilities and to other possibilities—I have not mentioned them all —by voting for this amendment.

In a word, Mr. Speaker, this amendment, as I see it, will empower the government to make and to keep the Canadian army the best and the strongest army we can provide. I agree, and we all agree, that in measuring the size of that army we must take account of the vital needs for men in other war activities. I shall have a word to say about that before I sit down.

But in connection with this amendment and with the authority which will be conferred if this amendment is passed, I say to you and to this house that I shall take at its face value this freedom of action which is being given. I am not going to advocate the use of this authority to compel men to serve overseas simply for the sake of exercising power; far from it. I recognize at the same time what a heavy responsibility that authority creates. I do not want to see this country divided. If I may say so, I think I have worked as hard as a man can to preserve the good understanding and unity of our homeland. Though a lot of people may not believe it, that has been one of the dominant aims in the administration of my department. It has permeated all our plans and efforts, as our officers will testify. I say seriously and sincerely that I would make any personal sacrifice to keep this country together.

At the same time, Canada has a war on its hands. The fight, as I said a minute or two ago, is a fight for our existence, and I at my post cannot escape the definite responsibilities which I have. I say now, and you will expect me to say it, that so far as I am concerned compulsory service for overseas will have to be applied without fear or favour whenever its use will aid in the achievement of a maximum war effort, and that does not necessarily mean just to maintain what we are doing; it means, if we can do more, to do it. I do not believe that even those who oppose compulsory service could expect me to say otherwise.

Let me mention something else in that connection. While, as I have said, we have been engaged in these intensive efforts we have been training everybody who has come in, whether the man enlisted voluntarily or was called up for service. All of them have been getting the same training, and they will all be qualified to serve anywhere. That applies to men already called up; it applies to men who will hereafter be called, and if section 3 is repealed, then, whenever it is necessary, the government can immediately act to have these men serve wherever they are needed to fight Canada's battle. No time would be lost, because the men will have been in training. All the government would have to do would be to widen the horizon of service, and that would make every man in Canada, whether he enlisted voluntarily or was called up, available to serve wherever the need might require.

Now there are two or three points which I think I should mention, in view of the fact that they have come up in the debate. First, my hon. friend and former colleague the member for Richelieu-Verchères took what I thought was a rather distorted meaning from the provisions of section 5 of the National Resources Mobilization Act. His suggestion, in a word, was that the government might act under this statute and, as he said, put the order in council in the drawer and a man would be on his way overseas before anyone would know anything about it. I wish to say to my hon. friend that orders in council of that kind will not be put in the drawer. Orders in council of that kind will be laid on the table at the earliest possible moment, and if parliament is not sitting they will be, as the statute directs, immediately published in the Canada Gazette and mailed to all members of the House of Commons.

There is only one exception in that section—it is the exception to which he was referring—and that is that publication may be deferred when it is considered to be in the "national interest". Knowing my hon. friend as I do, I do not think that he or any of those around him would for a single instant desire to be a party to jeopardizing the national interest. He knows perfectly well why that reservation was made. Section 2, which gives the government power over persons and property in the dominion in the widest possible way, has compulsory service for overseas only as one of its many objects. There are many cases I could imagine—cases of alien enemies, civilian cases, cases of highly secret devices and highly secret property—which might come under the act, in respect of which it would be extremely desirable in the national interest that publication of particulars should be deferred. That does not apply with regard to the sending of men overseas for service. As my hon. friend knows, we publish particulars of the men and of their liability for service. We do so every day, and I want to say to him and to anyone else who asks about the regulations with regard to conscription, that regulations have already been laid on the table of the house by my colleague the Minister of National War Services, and they have been in force. They are subject to change from time to time, and I have no doubt they will be changed from time to time. These regulations are already drawn in connection with the system of conscription for service in Canada which is in force in this country. My hon. friend can assure himself, therefore, that there is no danger of anybody's son being sent overseas without his knowing fully that he is liable to such service, and knowing in plenty of time before he goes.

Another point that came up which my hon. friend touched upon, although he did not make the point quite in this way, was this. He suggested that these regulations should be referred to parliament. He said that the matter of actual action in connection with conscription should come back to parliament. I do feel that those who make that suggestion have a wrong appreciation of the situation and of what has taken place. Let me remind the house what happened. A plebiscite was held, and the government asked the people of the country to give it the responsibility of deciding the question as to conscription. It was expressly said by everybody that conscription was not the issue which the public were to decide. The people of Canada voted on the question. I have the figures here: 179 constituencies voted "yes" and 65 constituencies voted "no," which is equivalent to pretty substantial representation in this House of Commons. That responsibility was given to the government by the people. What happened? The government now comes before parliament and says, "You have given us power over persons and property in this dominion in respect of everything, but you have missed one thing. You have put a limitation in the fact that we cannot send men to serve overseas in the armed forces of Canada. We are asking you to repeal that section."

What is left? What is left is that the government has full responsibility and full power when that section is repealed. I say to you therefore that, the government first having had the plebiscite, asking for a release from its pledge, with regard to compulsory overseas service, and having been granted that release, and, second, having come to parliament to have that release confirmed by the repeal of the very section which mentions compulsory overseas service, obviously when the section is repealed nothing is left for parliament, and the proper course is that the government should not shrink from the responsibility for which it has asked, but should act on that responsibility and act as it deems best in the light of the power given by that section. My hon. friend and those who advocate the reverse are suggesting that the government should ask for a repeal of the section which ties their hands and then the next minute decide to go back to parliament before using the power conferred. I say that that would be the same as the government at one moment having its hands untied and then the next moment having them tied again. In other words, it would be exactly the same as if we were to insert a proviso at the foot of the bill to this effect: "Section 3 is hereby repealed, provided however that none of the powers of section 2 shall be exercised until parliament is consulted once more."

It seems to me that the people of Canada would not understand anything of that sort. It would be regarded as evasion; it would be regarded as a shrinking from responsibility. All we are doing in this debate, having spent weeks at it as it is, would then be merely an idle gesture, because we would then have to come back once more to debate the whole question before exercising the power which we had expressly asked parliament to confer upon us, and which had been so conferred. Without hesitation, therefore, I say that I shall not shrink from the responsibility which has been conferred upon me as a member of the government, but shall act under the statute as amended.

I wanted to mention two other matters which have to do particularly with the army and with man-power. I was afraid that this house had the impression, from some of the speeches which were made, that somehow or other the army was cutting into the man-power of the country at the expense of the production of munitions and of food, and was therefore unduly hampering our war effort and disrupting our man-power. That certainly was the impression left by one or two speeches that were made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some of the minister's colleagues left that impression.

Mr. RALSTON: Not only my colleagues; others as well. I think I am right in saying that the army—I am within hearing of my colleagues the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), and they can correct me if I am wrong—is the only service which makes provision for giving leave to men who are indispensable or who are key men in industry or agriculture. The army from almost the very beginning, certainly from the time I have had anything to do with it, has had a rule—it is part of the general orders—that a man who can be shown to be a key man in connection with munitions, even though he has enlisted, even though he volunteered, may be given leave to go back to munitions work if he so applies. That was followed by the national war services regulations, which I have before me, and which by section 14 expressly provide, not that the army is to take men at the expense of munitions or at the expense of agriculture, but that boards shall be set up under the national war services department to decide, with regard to any man who is called up for service in the army, whether it is in the "national interest" to grant an advancement or postponement of that man's training.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But always on his application.

Mr. RALSTON: Always on his application.

An hon. MEMBER: Or his employer's.

Mr. RALSTON: The point is that on that board sits nobody from the army and properly on that board sits no one representing the man. It is a judicial body established by the Department of National War Services. Whoever says that the army cuts into the supply of man-power for munitions or for agriculture has not read the regulations, because the regulations expressly provide, not that the army comes first but that if it is shown that a man is indispensable in agriculture or industry, the army comes last. If to-morrow I requisition my hon. friend the Minister of National War Services for 5,000 men, I do not get them automatically just because the army asks for them. They are called up; any man who claims he is essential in war industry has a right to make his application to the board, and all the army gets are those who are not excused by the board. In other words, priority is given to agriculture and industry. I think that ought to be made clear because there has been too much of the suggestion that somehow we have built up a big army at the expense of munitions or at the expense of industry.

Another suggestion made was that we are closer to exhaustion in mobilization of man-power than anyone realizes. I admit that we are close to the calling up of the thirty-year class of single men. But the thirty-year class of single men is not the only class; there are still those from thirty to forty-five, still those from nineteen to twenty-one, and still the married class of all ages from nineteen to forty-five. I submit it is needlessly timorous to suggest that simply because we are approaching the exhaustion of the thirty-year class, there must be some question, some very serious consideration, as to where men for the army are to be raised.

Another situation mentioned was that 1,350,000 men are in agriculture at the present time, 300,000 in mining, 900,000 in munitions and industry, and 2,000,000 in civilian occupations and that the man-power situation was tight or difficult. We are not approaching the full mobilization of man-power for war purposes simply because everyone happens to be employed; the question is, what are they employed at, and can they be got out of those particular employments and either put in the armed services or made available for munitions or agriculture or some other activity which is more necessary for the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the principle of selection.

Mr. RALSTON: Of course; that is exactly what the Department of Labour is doing at the present time. That is why I have said, and I repeat here, that Mr. Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, and my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), have tough jobs. They have. But I do not think there are any men in Canada who have tougher jobs than my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), and Mr. Little, the director of national labour services, in trying to take human beings and put them where they will be most useful in carrying on the war.

Those are the things that we have to work at and work hard. Take the 1,350,000 in agriculture. What I am about to say may not be very popular, but of those 1,350,000 men there are many who come within what is called the subsistence class, that is, the class who are perhaps not doing much more than simply raising enough for themselves and their families. The question is whether those men ought to be left in that occupation, or whether some farmer with capital and greater productive capacity and a sufficient establishment for the purpose would not better be raising the food for that man and let him go into construction work or munitions or some line of work where he could be used to the best possible purpose.

Take munitions, in which 900,000 are employed. Of that 900,000, one-sixth are women. That makes quite a sizable army—150,000 men released by those 150,000 women. In civilian occupations there are 2,000,000. Mr. Little has to work and work hard to see that many of those men in civilian occupations are made available for the armed services and for war occupations. How does he do it? Production is cut down. In order to relieve these men you and I have to tighten our belts and do without some of the ordinary civilian commodities which we can do without. You and I have to help him to find other men for civilian occupations, men who are above or below military age, or men who are physically unfit for military service. You and I have to see to it that there is a great movement, into the factories and industry and civilian occupations generally, of women to take the place of men, as there has been in the old country.

These things are just beginning. It seems to me, therefore, that at this stage the ultimate gross supply of man-power does not enter very much into the question whether we can keep up an army.

Let me say that I am not advocating the cause of the army simply because it is the army. I am advocating the army's cause because it is Canada's army, and because it has a job to do, and because without the army we cannot win this war, no matter how much we might hope to the contrary.

Now, I have mentioned these points very briefly. I did want to deal with one other matter—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the consent unanimous?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. RALSTON: This is perhaps a small matter, but I did want to mention it. I have the greatest respect for the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères but he said something which cut me rather, because I felt it was something regarding which he was perhaps not informed but regarding which he might have taken the opportunity to get information. He said that trainees were scattered all over Canada among regiments composed of volunteers. He said that we have English-speaking soldiers in Montreal and that French-speaking soldiers are sent outside the province of Quebec to be trained. Let me point out that in the province of Quebec there are basic training centres for all the men to be trained, except in some special situation.

There are advanced training centres there as well; two infantry advanced training centres and as a matter of fact, in addition, Quebec has a machine gun training centre and a forestry training centre, and no other province has either. But we do not have advanced training centres for special arms of the service in every province, and it is therefore necessary in connection with training that the boys go from Quebec to other provinces, to Petawawa for artillery training, for example, and to Barryfield for signals, just as it is necessary for boys from other provinces to go to Quebec to take machine gun training or forestry training and in some cases infantry training as well. There is no sinister purpose whatever in the sending of young men from Quebec to some other province; it is done simply because the facilities are located where they are. Neither is there any sinister purpose in sending boys from Ontario or Manitoba or some other province to the machine gun training centre at Three Rivers.

With regard to service, I am sure my hon. friend knows perfectly well that we are not keeping active units in Montreal for the purpose of defending Montreal, and that the French Canadian boys in active French Canadian units go to the coasts or other vulnerable points, wherever they may be, in exactly the same way and for the same purpose as their English speaking compatriots. I am sure the hon. member would not have them kept in Montreal when he knows there is a job to be done on the Pacific or the Atlantic coast. I feel that it is due to these boys that I should say this and that it is due to the administration of the department and due to my hon. friend himself. I would add that every possible consideration is extended in connection with training and service to give these boys the opportunities for service and the posts for which they are fitted. At the same time I want to say that no exception is made; men are posted where they can best serve and where they are needed at the time, regardless of race, creed or class.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to conclude with just a word with regard to something I mentioned at the beginning, but which I feel cannot be impressed upon us too much; I refer to this thing called overseas service. That word "overseas" gives the idea of something far away, something in the nature of a crusade to help other people. I wonder if we cannot get it into our heads that "overseas" just means Canada's front line. It is Canada's war which is being fought overseas and by far the most important bulwark which has stood between us and attack on our own shores, long before this, has been that fortress in the British isles, which is not just a British fortress but a Canadian fortress as well, which is manned not only by Britishers but also by the Canadian navy and army and air force. They talk about educational campaigns. I submit that the education we need in Canada is a lesson in geography, to show how easy it would be for Hitler to hop across here if he were not pinned down by the constant dread of the British isles. If he could get that thorn out of his side we in Canada would then learn something about the real terrors of war. The fact we have to get into our heads, and those of our fellow citizens, is that this is Canada's war wherever it is being fought. We thought Hong Kong and Singapore and Java were a long way off. Those successes paved the way for the Japanese landing in the Aleutian islands, and those same successes made possible the shelling of Cape Estevan on Vancouver island the night before last. We have to protect our own coasts of course; and we are doing everything we possibly can in that direction. But what we want to do is help defeat the enemy before he gets here, or the last battle of this world conflict—and this is no idle dream—will be fought on Canadian and American soil, in Canadian and American towns, villages and countrysides. I emphasize what I believe to be sound doctrine, namely, that we cannot defend our country and save our homes and families and everything that is dear to us simply by waiting here for the enemy to attack us. Every country that has tried those tactics has been attacked sooner or later.

While we are strengthening our forces and our equipment in our own country, we must, as part of our defences, take our full share in the combat abroad. We must be prepared to meet Canada's enemies where Canada's war is being fought. That is part of Canada's programme; that is what we are trying to do. We have overseas an army of strength and spirit and courage; we have overseas an army to be proud of, and this measure gives the government power to go the limit to see that that army is reinforced and strengthened for the task of defending Canada wherever that task may call them.

Yesterday my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services closed a very able speech with a reference to Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his picture of a cathedral, —the component parts of which he visualized as the various races in this dominion. I could show my colleague and hon. members of this house not a mythical cathedral, not an allegorical one, but a cathedral of flesh and blood, composed of the young men of the Dominion of Canada, French and English; and I would not have to take you any further than the officers' training camp at the city of Brockville. This month there was a graduating class of 329, of which no less than 127 were French Canadians, and there are in attendance at the school at the present time 1,106 officers of which 305 are French Canadians. I want to say to my colleague and to this house that I should like hon. members to go there some time and see that school. I believe that there they would get a lesson in and a practical demonstration of Canadian unity that would do their hearts good. There, in spite of all our argument here, they would find a true cross-section of Canada: young men of both races, neither submerging its individuality, no thought of assimilation, but everyone contributing his best from the traditions, the heritage, the character and the personality of his own race for the good and in the service of the Dominion of Canada. Those men would inspire you to believe that it is out of this material, fashioned in the hard workshop of war and seasoned by comradeships which I am certain will never dim and never fail, that the edifice of Canada's nationhood will be built, to endure for all time.

Mr. L. A. MUTCH (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, I am not insensible of the difficulty which confronts one in attempting to follow the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), particularly in view of the fact that some of the things I desire to say closely touch his department. I should say in the beginning that on the plebiscite I personally voted "yes," and the constituents of Winnipeg South also voted "yes" by twelve to one. So that on my own and on their behalf I support this motion, and I now declare that if and when the time comes that it is found necessary by the government to exercise the power which the passing of this legislation will give them, I will support conscription for overseas service or the conscription of the man-power and woman-power of Canada for any purpose whatsoever.

In this debate, as in every other debate into which there enters the element of sentimentality, there has been a considerable amount of nonsense talked. In that respect it is my desire to mention one or two things which I think have not helped in deciding this issue but which have rather had the effect of disillusioning our citizens, when they consider what is being done here. We have had various descriptions of what a conscript is and what may be expected of a conscript. The general consensus, whether you take the viewpoint of the red-eyed conscriptionist or that of the dyed-in-the-wool anti-conscriptionist, seems to be that conscription is all right for the army; the implied suggestion is that the army is a disreputable conglomeration of people anyway, but that conscription is thoroughly impracticable for the air force or the navy, this in spite of the fact that the traditions of the navy which is described as the mother of our navy have been built up on the success of naval battles fought by sailors who had been shanghaied from every port of the island. The conception seems to have got abroad that we are still operating with a sort of bow-and-arrow army, for which any sort of mentality is sufficient.

I cannot understand why the belief is generally held that conscription is all right for the army but no good for the air force or the navy. The fact is that when a call is issued by the Department of National War Services, recruiting in the Royal Canadian Air Force, in particular, jumps by leaps and bounds. If the definition of a conscript is one who has been called by his government to do his duty, I cannot see where there is any substantial difference between a man so called up who answers the call and the man who enlists in the R.C.A.F. or the navy, or a special branch of the army, a few days before he is due to report for training. Advertisements have recently appeared in the newspapers to the effect that if a man is called up for service in the defence of Canada he will not be able to transfer to another service. The young men of Canada were told that if they had any idea of getting into the R.C.A.F. or the navy they had better do it right away. That was the type of propaganda put out by at least one of the other services. I am a little tired of this attitude, and I rather fancy that the public of Canada are somewhat disillusioned. The idea is abroad that the man who is conscripted would be of no use to these services. If that is so, then there must be more than a few thousand of them who could be released with advantage to the army so that soldiers could be made out of them. However, my purpose is not to introduce any recrimination into this debate.

For a moment I should like to speak for the people of my constituency in connection with the motion now before the house. The majority of the people of Winnipeg South are in favour of conscription now, and I have no doubt that almost all the people of that constituency would favour conscription at any time that the government regarded it as necessary. Knowing that, I could not, even if I wished, refuse to support the motion simply because it fails to satisfy all. Those in that constituency who cry "forward" with respect to conscription, and even those who cry "back", if there be any, would turn with a unanimous voice to rend either me or anyone else who might by his attitude on this question seek to overthrow the government at the present time.

There is another matter about which I think all the people of that constituency, perhaps all the people of the province, are in agreement. We do not want any more debate on the subject of conscription. In 1935, in 1940, and again in 1942, the people of Canada asserted their confidence in this administration and in the policies of this government. Nothing that can be said or done will add anything to the authority which this government has now. Once this motion carries, the responsibility will then lie fairly and squarely upon the shoulders of the government. Any further discussion would be regarded as temporizing or evading responsibility, and in my opinion it would merit that criticism. I welcome the assurance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the government on their own responsibility will act when and if it is necessary and stand or fall by the result. That is the practical working out of the democratic system.

In connection with man-power I should like to draw to the attention of the Minister of National Defence and of the government generally, the fact that considerable wastage is still going on in that because of lack of education or inability to take the training required to-day for troops, volunteers who have come into the service although physically fit, have had to be discharged or used in the home establishments. They have not been able to assimilate the training which is essential if they are themselves to have a chance of survival or if they are not to endanger their fellows with whom they will serve. When we consider the man-power of Canada we must take into consideration the not inconsiderable numbers who, although physically fit, have not been assimilated into the armed forces. Those who have thought that men with superior education could be used in the navy or the air force and the remainder used to fill out the ranks of the army must realize that it requires just as good physical condition and just as good education to be an operator of a tank or other motorized or mechanized equipment as it does to qualify for the other services. I know of at least one man who was refused once for the army, and another one who was refused twice, who are now training as aircrew.

Before sitting down I should like to address a word to the government as a whole with respect to Canada's war effort. Canada's part is not being adequately played up in the news of the war. The responsibility to see that Canada and Canadians are played up in the news of the war is a responsibility of the government itself. The jumble of the Royal Air Force and the Royal Canadian Air Force in England has deprived Canada and Canadians of a knowledge of what our boys have been doing in the last few weeks or months. Had this information been given to us, and I think we had a right to expect it, it would have proved an inspiration to the people all across Canada.

Canada's navy is known everywhere but in Canada. I should like to suggest to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) that he discard this tradition of the navy being a silent service, that he leave that to those who coined the expression. This is a new navy in a new world. It may be well to keep the traditions which have made the British navy what it is, but we should discard some of the snobbish ideas, one of which is that the navy should be the silent service. We should be told what is being done. No matter what happens in England, or on the continent, in north America when you have something to sell, your best idea is to advertise. This is one thing the administration has failed to realize, both in time of peace and in time of war.

We in the Dominion of Canada do not seem to have grasped the significance of nationhood, and so when we argue with each other in the house, and English-speaking Canada attempts to explain to French-speaking Canada what their conception of French-speaking Canada is, and French-speaking Canada gives up the almost hopeless task of explaining to English-speaking Canada what their conception of Canadian life is we are overlooking the fact that if, instead of having so much explanation, we were living and practising the idea of all being Canadians in Canada, particularly at this time when all our energies are centred upon the war, it would no doubt have more educational value than all the speeches which have been made on this subject.

I should like to make one or two suggestions to the Minister of National Defence. It is no sign of a lack of confidence in him or a lack of appreciation of what the Canadian armed forces are doing if I take a minute or two to examine one or two things which I think are important.

As I listened to the able speeches which have been delivered by the ministers who have spoken, I found myself sitting back in my chair with a comfortable feeling that perhaps everything is all right, and that scares me worse than anything else on earth. Consequently if I suggest to the minister, having followed his speech with close attention, that I am still in a questioning frame of mind, not only with respect to some of his decisions but with regard to some of the advice he gets, and certainly with respect to some he takes, he will understand that I am trying to keep myself from getting into a frame of mind where I shall be convinced that the Germans will be stopped before they get to Alexandria, and that they can never get to Vancouver or Seattle, and that if we just keep rolling along, the good Lord will raise up somebody to lead us to victory.

History shows that very few of the great conquerors of the world were professional soldiers. We need only go back to the last war. I remember as I am sure the minister and many other members do, those anxious days when we did not know just what was happening before Paris, and when we learned afterwards that the man whom the French called the little tiger, with his hard hat, was riding back and forth behind the French lines in an old taxicab, saving the day, although he gave the credit to Petain. We remember these things, and also the situations that arose in Great Britain. We remember when Lloyd George was working miracles with the civilian population, and, thank God, helping to win the war, although his actions were regarded by the military men as unwarrantable interference in the administration of the army.

There is a little disquiet in my mind when I hear the expression so often used in this house, that the government will act on the advice of their experts. Experts is a word I am suspicious of, perhaps because I come from the west, where some of our people believe that an expert is somebody in Montreal or Toronto who knows somebody in Ottawa very well indeed. Another definition of an expert is somebody who is a considerable distance away from home. The war situation is too serious for one to feel quite content if he thinks that the strategy which is guiding the war effort of Canada is coming from the ranks of those who were satisfied with the crumbs from the table of Canada's militia during peace years. One wonders whether men with that mentality who were content with the environment of those years are capable of being transformed all of a sudden so that they can conceive of modern warfare in global terms. The senior ranks during the period of peace had become, I am inclined to think, pretty much civil servants all dressed up, and the changes which have been made in the selection of the senior officers who are overseas to-day is a healthy indication of the recognition of the fact that it is not enough to leave the devising of strategy solely to men who are professional soldiers.

I should like to feel more than I do now, that the leadership of Canada's war effort from a military standpoint was being more largely directed by the ministers in council. I would be happier if I felt to a lesser extent than I do, that the ministers in council too often concern themselves only with the point of view of the professional soldier. There is no doubt that men trained in technical military proficiency should be those charged with carrying out the military policies. But if I could arouse in the minds of members of this house, and especially in the mind of the government, a sense of the danger of leaving the concept of what we might call global warfare to those limited professional minds, I would have more assurance that when the day comes that Canada's sons stand in some future Tobruk or Singapore we shall not have recriminations in Canada to the effect that those in charge of directing our military effort lack the vision to think in terms of a war which is newer and vastly different from any we have had before. I hope that we shall not find ourselves looking about as this people of England are looking about to-day for some explanation of another unfortunate set-back, with the half-formed and ill-expressed thought in the back of their minds that they have left the problems of to-day and the security of the future too often to men whose minds belong to yesterday.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that I would not be fair if I did not give expression to a thought of mine with regard to the speech delivered this afternoon by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I wish to congratulate him on its conciseness, and if I am able to judge the reaction to it among the various groups in this house I would also congratulate him upon its effectiveness. With many of the things he said I am quite in accord.

My participation in this debate to-day is undertaken with two important facts firmly established in my mind. The first has to do with the critical international situation, and in that connection I can do no better than to quote the words in which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to it yesterday afternoon. He said:

> It only goes to bear out what has been said so often that no one can take too seriously both the immediacy and the extent of the danger with which all parts of the world are confronted, and at this time our own part in particular.

One needs only to reflect upon the situations which exist in four different theatres of war, if I might characterize them as such. First, we have only recently been advised of the fall of Tobruk and Bardia, and the consequent threat to all of North Africa and our position there. It has been reported, whether correctly or not, that we lost 25,000 troops in the fall of Tobruk. Second, according to a recent report the Japanese have extended their influence in the Aleutian area. Third, the Germans have driven a wedge into the defences of Sevastopol, and, fourth, and probably of greater significance to us, there is the shelling of Vancouver island. All these serve only to emphasize the seriousness of the world situation at the present moment.

In the second place, I believe I am quite fair in saying that there is strong evidence that Canadians generally are becoming very impatient with parliament, and witness with growing dissatisfaction the apparent disregard which we are showing for time and events. When I say that I have in mind the fact that for five long months we have been toying with the man-power problem in this country. I do know, as a result of discussing the man-power question with men on the street, that they wonder what in the world is the matter with us here that we are not accomplishing something definite in that regard. I am not asserting for one moment that the man on the street knows all that goes on in here or the difficulties with which we are confronted. But I personally feel that five months is too long a period of time to devote to this particular issue. The need of the hour is far too great for that. Only a day or two ago one gentleman characterized it in this way, as nearly as I am able to recall his words: "The whole thing is like a great poker game, with the government reluctant to bid and afraid to lay down their cards". I feel that I am able without a great deal of difficulty to concur in that comment. I think we have been doing a great deal of stalling, and the man on the street also feels that we are stalling. So that if I confine myself to a few facts and occupy less than the time at my disposal I may be setting an example which the man on the street wishes us to set.

Since the Social Credit party first became an influence in the national political life of this country we have invariably advocated a policy of construction, not destruction. Therefore I propose to be constructive and not destructive. I know I am correct in asserting that ours is the only party in the house which has not had to trim its sails according to the political winds. We get a great deal of satisfaction out of that, and I propose to show during the course of my remarks that it is a fact.

Furthermore, consistency has been the characteristic feature of our attitude towards the question of conscription, and we may go back to pre-war days in order to determine that and establish it as a fact.

With respect to the question of conscription I am afraid—I believe the Minister of National Defence made reference to this—that conscription is misunderstood. I know that it conjures up in the minds of some people the same reaction as does the word "politician." Possibly conscription is misunderstood because it has so long been steeped in politics and juggled by politicians for purposes of political expediency that the average man to-day is, and has justification for being, fearful of the implications of the word. Conscription, whether applied to the financial, the industrial, or the man-power resources of the country means nothing more nor less than the effective organization of those resources, and there is nothing sinister about that. If I go back to pre-war days and make one or two references to the stand which we took at that time and the stand which certain others took, I wish it to be known that it is only because a deliberate attempt is being made in various parts of this country to distort and misrepresent the stand we took then, which is exactly the same stand as we take to-day.

I have in mind an English-speaking cross-section of public opinion which believed firmly in a policy of isolationism. I believe I am correct in saying that the present Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) was the leading light in that particular group. In browsing through Hansard of the short war session of 1939 I find that the present Minister of National War Services spoke as follows at page 52:

> There has been a great body of opinion in Canada to the effect that we should not participate in any extraterritorial war, and should keep ourselves free from any external commitments, whether direct or indirect, which might involve us in such a war. Those who have held this view have had the best interests of Canada at heart.

I do not question that, Mr. Speaker. They may have been sincere.

> I have been one of the spokesmen of that body of opinion, and have not hesitated to express my views on this subject whenever the need arose, both outside and inside this house, with such vigour as I could command. I conceived this to be my duty as a Canadian whose first and undivided loyalty is to Canada.

It seems that the present Minister of National War Services, as I said a moment ago, was at that time a recognized leader of a certain cross-section of public opinion who were definitely opposed to conscription and all the implications of it, and I have not the slightest doubt that he was responsible for building up among his followers a definite prejudice against the idea of conscription.

Then of course we have our French-speaking friends from the province of Quebec. I do not undertake at this moment to condone or condemn their attitude with regard to this matter. Personally, with my limited knowledge, I would say that they have been taken advantage of for so long, that conscription has been made a political issue there for so long, that it is more a state of confusion with respect to the whole thing than anything else. The late minister of justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, was the recognized leader of that particular cross-section of public opinion. On September 9, 1939, he stated, as reported in Hansard, page 68, these words, which have been quoted here many times before, but which for the purpose of my argument I shall repeat:

> The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them. I am authorized by my colleagues in the cabinet from the province of Quebec—the veteran leader of the senate, my good friend and colleague, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), my friend and fellow townsman and colleague, the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power)—to say that we will never agree to conscription and will never be members or supporters of a government that will try to enforce it.

And he asks: "Is that clear enough?"

I read that because the late minister of justice was definitely the leader of a certain cross-section of public opinion, and undoubtedly—I say this with all due respect—he must have been to a very great extent responsible for fostering and developing that attitude of mind among that cross-section of our Canadian public opinion.

Then we have the Prime Minister himself (Mr. Mackenzie King), speaking in the house on September 8, 1939, when he said, at page 36:

I wish now to repeat the undertaking I gave in parliament on behalf of the government on March 30 last.

That would be 1939.

The present government believe that conscription of men for overseas service will not be a necessary or an effective step. No such measure will be introduced by the present administration.

Again he was expressing the view of another cross-section of public opinion. I well recall that during those pre-war months and years he did his part, if I may say so, towards the development of what I call a distorted attitude to the whole question of conscription.

Then we move on to our Conservative friends, and while I have no quotations at hand at the moment, goodness knows there are many that could be given. They collaborated most fully with the Liberal party prior to the election of 1940 with respect to this question of conscription. They too must accept full responsibility for what they did in the way of giving the Canadian people a wrong slant, if I may use that expression, on the question of conscription.

It is a well-known fact, of course, that our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation were also definitely opposed to the conscription of man-power and the sending abroad of an expeditionary force. I quote all parties because it would not be fair to quote only one.

I come to the stand of the party with which I am associated. At the very time that such phrases as these were the slogans of certain groups in this country, we of this party and all those associated with it had the courage, in spite of what many suggested was political suicide, to be honest at least with ourselves and with the people, to evaluate the picture as we saw it, and to make known to the people of Canada exactly what we thought. And that is no different from what any representative of the people should do. These were some of the catch phrases found on banners and pamphlets, on walls and so on throughout the country prior to the election of 1940: "No Canadian troops to be sent overseas to take part in any hostilities, whatever the professed purpose of such hostilities may be." Here is another: "Canada must declare herself strictly neutral in the event of another war, no matter who the belligerents might be." And still another: "Money appropriated for national defence will surely lead to war." That was a catch phrase back in 1936, 1937 and 1938. Here is another: "We shall not fight any war proclaimed to make the world safe for democracy."

These were some of the things that were being said at the very time that we of this party, looking into the future with vision and courage, correctly determined what was going to take place within a few years. I will go back first and give the foundation of our stand, and to do so I will read part of a statement which was published in the Edmonton Journal of January 18, 1936, if you will. This is part of a statement given by the leader of this group:

The increase of armaments that is in prospect is a most disappointing development to all who want to see the reign of law established in international affairs and an end put to war. But where the responsibility lies is quite clear. No matter how peace-loving a nation may be, it has to consider the conditions which exist in the world to-day and act accordingly.

If I may interject a comment at that point, Hitler was coming to the front very rapidly at that time. He had made known his intentions, and surely any intelligent man should have been able to see what those intentions were. I continue:

Britain has been exceedingly anxious to avoid adding to their armament burdens, but in its present situation has no alternative. Nor can Canada be content with merely expressing the desire for peace. Mr. Blackmore stated that his group favoured "such steps on Canada's part as will render her powerful enough in all respects to plan an effective part in any world crisis with which the league of nations might be called upon to deal." That was why expenditures on military, air and naval forces were urged. "Is it right or just", the Social Credit leader asked, "that we should depend upon Great Britain to defend us, or on the United States?" Surely there could be only one answer to that question.

As I say, that was printed in the Edmonton Journal on January 18, 1936. I come now to 1939. In the short session following the declaration of war by Britain against the axis, speaking in the House of Commons at that time, the leader of this group made the following statement, as recorded in the proceedings of the session of September 8, 1939, at page 48:

Therefore New Democracy declares that justice, equality and effectiveness depend upon conscription of finance, industry and man-power.

Let me make an assertion here. If anything was ever torn to pieces and put together again to suit the purposes of the one who tore it to pieces, that statement was. We went through the campaign of 1940 and we know what the members of all parties tried to do with that statement, and it is true they were successful in taking seven of our men. But we retained our honour just the same. Speaking in the same debate the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) clarified that statement somewhat as reported at page 99 of Hansard of that session. He said:

> On the other hand, we have advocated conscription of, first, finance; second, industry, and third, man-power. By conscription we mean a process of effective control and direction.

I well recall the vicious type of propaganda I was confronted with in that regard, but as I have said, we have nothing to be ashamed of to-day, and I dare say there are men sitting in other parties in this house who would like to be able to refer back to similar assertions as having been made by them. They did not make them, but they wish they had done so.

When it came to the election of 1940 we still stood for the conscription of finance and industry and then the conscription of man-power. It was clearly and definitely explained that the first two were to precede the third. Those who opposed us did everything they possibly could to create another impression. On September 12, 1939, this group moved in this house that a special committee of the house be set up to determine ways and means of conscripting the financial system to make for greater equality of sacrifice and service. Hansard records the fact that every party in the house voted against that motion. We were the fathers of the idea that if we are to make a maximum contribution in this war the financial resources of the country must be conscripted. And that does not mean, as we have clearly indicated time and time again, that we ever did or ever shall advocate the conscription of bank balances. It has a far broader meaning than that. Therefore when we hear people talking about conscription of finance, about a total war effort, about the organization of our maximum resources, they are doing what they should be doing, but doing it about three years too late.

Very few people will give this group any credit for the stand they took. Few, if any, will approve it publicly, although one or two Liberal members of this house have said to me in the corridors of this building within recent days that it was the only sane and sensible stand to take.

Last January we were advised in the speech from the throne that a plebiscite would be taken in this country. It is a matter of record that while we in this group believe in the general principle of plebiscites, we could not see much that was commendable about the one that was then proposed. It is a matter of record that we condemned the wording of that plebiscite, contending that it meant nothing. We moved to have it clarified by adding the words "in any theatre of war," so that the people of Canada would know definitely what they were voting for or against. But our effects in that direction were futile. We also moved that the conscription of finance and the industrial resources of this country be incorporated in that measure, but once again the house saw fit to defeat our suggestion. We were completely dissatisfied with the various arguments that were advanced by many hon. members on the government side who presumed to know all about the implications of the plebiscite. We contended that it was strictly political in nature. Reading the words of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) I am satisfied that we were correct in making that assertion at that time. These are his words as reported at page 3373 of Hansard of June 16:

> In this country conscription is really a political issue rather than an issue arising out of the needs of the war situation.

Later he said, referring to the York South by-election:

> Since that occasion conscription has persisted as a political issue, and it was to settle this political issue that the plebiscite was taken.

It is most unfortunate that the Minister of Munitions and Supply should have made this assertion. It only adds to the dissatisfaction which is prevalent in so many parts of Canada with regard to this whole man-power question that we are supposed to be discussing and to have been discussing during the plebiscite debate. There are some in certain parts of Canada—I may make definite reference to a certain gentleman who broadcasts from Calgary and whose voice reaches my constituency—who says that we did not show leadership by not giving as a party a clear-cut direction as to whether the people should vote "yes" or "no". Well, leadership is of several kinds. I have never advocated that anybody should take my advice if I were not satisfied in my own mind as to where that advice would lead him, and if that principle were more generally adopted there would be fewer people in this country calling themselves leaders.

I can do no better than quote the words of the hon. member for Acadia with regard to our attitude in relation to this Bill No. 80 to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act. Speaking on June 15 last the hon. member said, as reported at page 3352 of Hansard:

> In passing I should like to stress the fact that this group has consistently advocated the control of industry by government.

To-day it is so obvious that unless we defeat the enemy overseas we shall have to defeat him at home on the American continent, that no sound argument can any longer be presented that Canada ought not to participate to the greatest possible degree in the overseas conflict. That conclusion having been reached, it becomes a question of what is the most equitable way of calling up men for military service. The voluntary system to-day as imposed by this government is a policy of flogging the willing horse. It is neither just nor efficient. A continued appeal is made to a person's sense of patriotism, to his conscience, with the result that the entire personnel of some families is wiped out, while other families make no contribution whatsoever. This policy has been maintained largely no doubt as a matter of political expediency. I would call it appeasement in its very worst form, and appeasement invariably fails. If the objective is, as we have been told, national unity, I think we can say that the government has failed to achieve its objective. If the objective has been unity within the Liberal party, I think one can also say, after listening to some of the speeches that have been made in this house, that appeasement has failed even in that direction.

If the war were a minor operation, or if we had many men wishing to volunteer for foreign service, then I would say that the voluntary system would be satisfactory. So long as we had plenty of men in this country clamouring to be allowed to go overseas I would say that the voluntary system was satisfactory. But as soon as you had a situation where you had to badger men and resort to various questionable practices in order to induce or coerce men to enlist. I would say that the voluntary system had failed and that the time for conscription had come.

The hon. member for Acadia expressed his views in unmistakable terms when he spoke thus.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, to take the very strongest exception to some of the methods now being employed to drive men into the service by means of what we call the voluntary method. It is a fact that thousands of our young Canadians have willingly volunteered to join the various branches of the armed forces, and I say all credit is due to them. On the other hand thousands have joined the active forces for other reasons. To begin with, under the National Resources Mobilization Act we called up men by age groups for compulsory military training. In my own province we have two of those training centres, one at Camrose and the other at Grande Prairie. These boys are not taken there and trained by themselves, as trainees; mingled with them are recruits in the active forces. Several months ago I asked in this house why it was found necessary to send to these particular training centres men who had volunteered for active service, and I was told that it was because of the lack of training facilities elsewhere. I accepted that explanation, but since then I have been told by an officer, one whose word cannot be readily questioned, that at one of these training centres definite instructions were given to the active force men to mix with the trainees, to talk about joining for active service, to shame them into it if need be, but above all not to let them gather together in small groups. If that is what we mean by the voluntary method of enlistment, when by such methods we compel our boys who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act to join the active force, then I say we have very little of which we may be proud.

In the second place we have throughout this country thousands of businesses which have been slowly closing up. I have in mind the hundreds of garages throughout the country employing from five to ten young men working on the floor. Restrictions were placed on the manufacture and purchase of automobiles, on the use of tires and gasoline, and finally parts were rationed. I am not complaining about that, but hundreds of these boys were forced out of work because their employers no longer had work for them. Then a long list of restricted occupations was established, in which they could not be employed; so that in many cases where these businesses were closed up the boys have had to apply to the local office of the unemployment insurance commission, where they may be given authority to take another job or where they may be told definitely, as has happened, "You join the active force." Is that a voluntary system? I say definitely it is not. I had a letter just a few days ago from a town in my constituency. According to the letter the three boys of one family have been taken into the service, either voluntarily or otherwise. Another family has four husky sons, none of whom has taken one day's training. It is hardly fair or proper that, as the hon. member for Acadia has said, some families should be entirely wiped out while others make no contribution at all. I question some of the methods that are employed to secure men for the so-called active force, yet I do not want to leave the impression that I am for a moment questioning the patriotism or motives of any young man who enlists for service.

There is one other matter to which I should like to refer. A few days ago I happened to read a magazine in which I noticed a pertinent statement by Doctor Padilla, the foreign minister of Mexico, who was the representative of that country at the pan-American conference. The article stated that when Doctor Padilla, representing Mexico, stood up to address the gathering, not very much attention was paid to him until he had made two or three statements which I should like to read; for I think they are worthy of consideration by certain people in this country who still feel that the place to fight the enemy is in the streets of your own town or in your own back yard. I commend these statements to their consideration. Doctor Padilla said:

> All our ideas are in imminent danger of perishing. We may no longer cherish the illusion that we are living in a quiet backwater where we shall be safe from world catastrophe. Blood flows on every side and suffering lacerates all the continents. The men who gloriously fell on Wake Island have not fallen in the defence of the honour and sovereignty of the United States alone. They have, also, met their deaths in the defence of human liberties and the free destinies of the Americas.

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that we can no longer cherish the illusion that we in Canada are living in some quiet backwater far removed from world catastrophe. We know that the vicious Jap is howling at our western gate. We know that any day the roar of his planes and the thunder of his bombs may be heard over any of our towns or cities. I hope we shall not wait until that fateful hour to bestir ourselves. This afternoon the Minister of National Defence said, and said correctly, that any country which waited until it was invaded before putting up resistance in its own defence was subjugated, and that in short order. When I think of our boys whose blood coloured the water within the shadow of Dunkirk; when I think of the blood that is flowing to-day on the hot sands of Libya; when I cast my eyes upon the other theatres of war and see the sacrifices that are being made by thousands of our young men and thousands of young men from other countries, in defence not only of their own particular territory but in defence of the territory of all the allied countries, I say that should the day ever come when they require reinforcements it would ill behoove us to say that because of certain restrictions, self-imposed if you please, we will not give them the reinforcements they need. If that should ever happen, we will live to rue that day.

In conclusion, may I say that as a member of this house I feel called upon to assume a very grave responsibility. I do not feel that it would be proper for us to attempt to escape any of our responsibilities. The parliament of Canada engaged the people of Canada in this conflict, and we must exert every ounce of energy of which we are capable. We must so organize our resources, whatever their nature may be, as to guarantee that if victory is at all possible, it shall be ours. I trust that I shall never live to see the day when any government of Canada will again declare war and at the same time burden itself to the point of strangulation with self-imposed limitations, be they moral or legal. There is only one kind of effective war effort. If you declare war you must do as you would if you undertook to engage in any contest—put everything you have into it. I am not saying that that could be done at once, but it could be done under a proper system of organization.

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to speak at any great length in this debate. At the time of the plebiscite I took a definite stand in this house. I thought out the matter to the best of my ability, and I supported the motion for a six months' hoist. At the time I said that that measure constituted a breach of trust, since it was giving the majority the means of withdrawing a solemn pledge made to the minority. I campaigned in my province for a negative vote. I condemned the plebiscite as being a measure something in the nature of Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. It was stated in the English provinces that an affirmative vote would bring conscription. but in Quebec it was said that there would be no conscription. In other words, it meant nothing but chaos. It is needless to say that the man in the street immediately saw the nigger in the woodpile, and irrespective of the efforts made by a majority of the members from Quebec the people of Quebec refused to give an affirmative vote.

This vote meant not only that the people of Quebec did not want conscription; it meant that Baptiste was fed up with broken pledges. He recalled the pledge made that the amounts voted for armaments for the defence of Canada were to be used exclusively in the defence of Canada, yet when he looks around to-day he asks himself where are those armaments. He recalled also the references made to the declaration of the Prime Minister of Australia that the day when we would be called upon to send an expeditionary force overseas was past history. He recalled also that he accepted the mobilization act with a smile because he was told that it was for the defence of Canada. He recalled that he was brought into the military camp for a one-month training period in order to give him an idea of what military life was like. Then he was notified that he would be a better soldier for the defence of his country if he stayed there for four months, and he accepted that change with a smile because it was for his country. He recalled also that after four months he was told that he must stay for the duration of the war, but that there was nothing to be alarmed about, because he was protected by section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act which guaranteed that no man would be sent away from Canada unless he was willing to serve of his own free will.

From these facts you will understand why it was not difficult for the eleven Liberals who voted against their party to bring home the fact that the plebiscite meant a change in the views of the government with regard to the sending of men overseas. It was not simply a case of untying the hands of the government; the fact is that there were influences in the cabinet which were so strong, even though they were in the minority, as to influence the government to a point where it had to amend this act and send overseas those men who had been brought into the camps under the solemn pledge that they would not be sent overseas against their will. This is why the people in the province of Quebec went to the polls and voted "no". Their own common sense told them what was behind this plebiscite.

I should like to pay a tribute to the former minister of public works (Mr. Cardin). We fought against him, but we realized that he was sincere. He was appealing to the people of his province, but from my experience in this house since early in 1935 something told me that he was so near to the picture that he could not see the wall. It sometimes happens that in a classroom a student at the back is able to point out an error which the professor has made on the blackboard, but that does not take away at all from the qualifications and ability of the professor.

We are here being called upon to amend a solemn pledge that was given, not under menaces at all, but through cooperation and understanding, and that understanding was ratified by the people of Canada in the election of 1940. The then Minister of Justice carried the flag of unity from one coast to another. He spoke not only in the province of Quebec, but in Ontario, British Columbia and, indeed, throughout the whole dominion and said that because of national unity there would be no conscription in this war. That pledge was renewed time and time again. Furthermore, in Australia, when Prime Minister Curtin defeated Mr. Menzies, his first declaration when he took office was that the question of conscription would not be raised in Australia in this war because it would mean disunity in Australia. If such a declaration was good in Australia why should it not be good in Canada? Is it because there is a province of Quebec?

[Mr. Parent.]

Conscription is a national issue. It concerns not only the province of Quebec. Other countries do not have conscription. Africa does not have conscription; India does not have conscription; Ireland does not have conscription. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) told us that those countries were comparatively insignificant. But the principle remains the same. Those countries rejected conscription, and yet we never hear the people of Australia called quislings or quitters. We do not hear anyone call the people of Northern Ireland quislings or quitters. Those are words which one hears only in reference to the people of the province of Quebec, but be sure that no inferiority complex is being created by such slanders. Far from it. We are, on the contrary, stimulated by such slanders to fight on. The fight will go forward and to a better end. We will take our hats off to no one; be sure of that.

I am pleased to say, Mr. Speaker, that I shall vote, and if I had two votes I would give two votes, against Bill No. 80. Stripped of all the Prime Minister's eloquence in his three-hour speech, this bill is a measure for conscription. We are told that only the province of Quebec is against conscription, but let me remind the house that for the first time in the history of England the word "conscription" was brought before parliament in 1915 by Lord Middleton in the House of Lords, and although Great Britain was then at war, the mention of conscription created an uproar. It meant imposing on the liberty of Englishmen something they had never thought of, and although France, Great Britain's ally, had had conscription for over 125 years, and almost every other nation in Europe had conscription, conscription was not introduced in England at that time.

When the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services says that they had conscription in these other countries, we are not told how conscription works there, because that would be giving out military secrets.

In 1938, at a time when the European volcano was rumbling and smoking, when Hitler was marching into one country after another and France was calling for help, when her armies and air force and navy were not considered sufficient, Prime Minister Chamberlain had to reaffirm, and reaffirm time and again in order to satisfy British opinion, that never would conscription be imposed if Britain went to war. That is history. The reason was that conscription would have destroyed national unity at that time in Great Britain. But afterwards Prime Minister Chamberlain had to fall into line, and introduce conscription, although we do not know with what success. No one has ever accused England of being quitters or quislings, because for hundreds of years they did not have conscription.

We are told now that conscription is not an end in itself but a means to an end. We are also told that it may not make better soldiers and that probably they may never be sent overseas, but that conscription would mean equality of sacrifice. Equality of sacrifice! Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec average five children per family, as compared with one to one and a half in the other provinces. Equality of sacrifice! Again, wages and salaries in the province of Quebec, which are governed by the dominion government, are from 20 to 30 per cent lower than in the other provinces. Equality of sacrifice! Although Quebec represents one-third of the population of Canada, we have only from 15 to 19 per cent of the positions under the federal government and only 11 per cent of the total salaries paid by the federal government. Yet we hear talk of equality of sacrifice!

Mr. Speaker, may I ask that, if this principle of equality of sacrifice is to be adopted, it be applied in a spirit of British fair play. Raise the standard of wages in my province to compare with that of the other provinces. Give up, to those who are entitled to them, a fair proportion of the positions in this dominion, and do not ask that they be qualified 99 per cent in order to occupy a position when you are satisfied to give the same type of position to others who are qualified only 60 per cent.

I believe it is necessary that these remarks be made after all that has been said against the province of Quebec. I was reading lately in the Ottawa Journal, wherein, referring to the recent speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) they extracted from it a declaration which is absolutely untrue, namely, that the province of Quebec would be satisfied to defend its own borders. Let me state in this forum once and for all that we of Quebec consider the Dominion of Canada, the whole dominion from Vancouver to Halifax, the sacred soil of Canada; that we are ready to help and to fight on the shores of Vancouver island or British Columbia as well as on those of Nova Scotia; that the land of Canada is sacred to any Quebecker as well as his own province. The declaration made by this newspaper is the most unfair and untrue that could be made by a journal of its standing.

We are ready to defend our shores. We are also ready to help in the war overseas, but to do it of our own free will, because we have been told, we have been educated not only in our province but in this House of Commons, in the presence of every hon. member, whether of English, Irish or Jewish nationality, that our effort in this war was to be a free effort in so far as it was concerned with sending men overseas.

Yesterday morning, while reading the Montreal Star, my attention was attracted to a cartoon showing a man on the cliffs of Canada's seashore. He was holding a gun aimed towards the sea; in the clouds were written the words "invasion threat," and above the sketch were inscribed the words, "Look at it this way." That means, Mr. Speaker, think of Canada first; the danger sign is ahead, defend and protect Canada. "Look at it this way." That is the way in which all the people of Quebec are thinking and doing.

Mr. ARMAND CLOUTIER (Drummond-Arthabaska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I followed with attention the splendid speech delivered by the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent), and in the name of my electors, I wish to congratulate him warmly.

I also listened most attentively and, I may say, not without some emotion to the speech delivered in this house on June 11 by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). A descendant of that proud line of pioneers who brought civilization to this country, he spoke as a true Canadian should. The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères is the very symbol of French Canada. He is a loyal gentleman, respectful of laws, but the law which comes first with him is that of his word of honour.

I consider him as the prototype of the French Canadian, Mr. Speaker, and here is the reason why. Although I have had neither the benefit nor the honour of sitting in this house for long years, I have been interested in politics for over a quarter of a century, and the hon. member's various campaigns always held my attention. He knows the mentality of his people, he knows their rights and has always defended them. His responsibilities do not escape him and he has often stated them. Canadian in his very soul, Canadian first and always, the problem of national unity has commanded his constant care. A noble ideal shaped his words and deeds. He can be said to represent the true Canadian spirit.

Mr. Speaker, each time a great national problem or a difficult situation has arisen, the French Canadian has given ground, often in spite of his legitimate and admitted rights. He has given an example of generosity and patriotism in order to ensure the maintenance and strengthening of the bonds uniting the two main racial groups in this country.

But however much one may cherish a principle as important and vital as that of national unity, there comes a time, a tragic moment when it is no longer possible to give ground without abdicating. For the individual, abnegation may take the form of an almost divine generosity, but in a nation it can only be construed as cowardice or treachery.

A great deal has been asked of French Canada since confederation, and a great deal received. But it must be understood that her racial survival is a thing she prizes above all, that national pride fills her heart, and that in her veins runs the blood of heroes who sacrificed everything save honour.

The French Canadian is loyal, faithful to his principles as well as to leaders who do not betray him. Long since has he recognized in the Liberal party that spirit of justice, of harmony, of Canadianism and of unity, embodied in the confederation pact. French Canada has pinned her faith, her hopes on the Liberal party, because to all appearances its leaders had never betrayed her.

The province of Quebec has willingly participated in the present conflict. She has accepted in many fields, and without grousing, the principle of compulsion, because her leaders had promised that such compulsion would never apply to military service overseas.

She had faith in the future of this country and every confidence in her political leaders; she believed in democracy and firmly relied on sacred pledges. Such has been the background of the French-Canadian effort, about which many people were dubious at the beginning of the war, but which can only be questioned by fanatics to-day. The character of the average French Canadian will never change. No shirker, he insists on being treated with frankness, honesty and respect. The French Canadian is smart enough to realize that if national unity means sacrifices on one side only, it is no longer unity but tyranny. He has never felt that the association of a rider with his horse can be unity. He will never accept to be led like a tamed animal.

In relinquishing the important post he held in the government, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères exemplified the spirit of the French-Canadian people. Ever loyal to his leader, giving ground, sacrificing some principles in the interest of national unity, he had to withhold his cooperation when there arose the tragic question of breaking his pledged word.

Such is also my own stand and no French Canadian will ever do otherwise.

Since 1938, the imperialists in the government have been proceeding very gradually. There was first our rearming which was accepted though reluctantly by all Canadians. From session to session, the nilitary estimates were increased. I do not wish to criticize that policy, Mr. Speaker, for in that field the democracies made a mistake in failing to prepare early enough and on the same scale as Hitler and Mussolini. But, good heavens, why proclaim on every side that Canada would not participate again in outside wars while larger and larger estimates were being voted for military purposes.

The French Canadians accepted the principle of rearmament along with the policy of non-participation advocated by all political leaders at the last election. War came in Europe and without any hesitation those same imperialistic leaders launched Canada into that adventure.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to criticize Canada's declaration of war on the axis powers, but why should there have been such eagerness to foster a pacifistic state of mind while preparations were then being made for war, and to-day, for total war?

In order to ward off popular resentment and to keep the confidence of the electorate, those same leaders suggested a compromise: "We will wage war, we will accept many sacrifices, but conscription will never be enforced".

Came 1940 and national registration followed by conscription for home defence. That was a logical move but why should it have been taken while opposite principles were being advocated?

A further compromise was suggested: "The conscription of national resources for the purpose of a total war effort, with the understanding that conscription would never be enforced for overseas service".

The French Canadian already felt, indeed quite deeply, that he had not been treated frankly, but the danger threatening his country brought about a unity of purpose and silenced a feeling of indignation which in normal times would have surely become vocal. Even though he hated constraint, he accepted it because it was intended for the defence of Canada. And believe me, Mr. Speaker, conscription is useless, unnecessary and futile. History is there to prove it. If Canada has remained under British rule, it is due to the loyalty, gallantry and military valour of the French Canadians. Once conscription for military service in Canada had been accepted, everyone sincerely believed that the government's policy in that field had reached its extreme limit.

The voluntary system of recruitment was tried out, and Quebec did more than her share. French Canada supplied the first regiments which went to the assistance of European democracies. Our young men overseas have shown heroic courage in every theatre of war and they continue to do so.

Our men are fighting for the principles of freedom, the respect of minorities and the sovereign right of nations. Those principles for which their forefathers so staunchly fought, are inherent to all French Canadians.

While the voluntary system was proving fully adequate, imperialistic stooges were heard demanding conscription for overseas service. The people became uneasy for it seemed that the limit had not yet been reached. It became necessary once again to reassure them and to adopt indirect methods. Then came the plebiscite! I do not oppose consulting the people on an important issue, Mr. Speaker, but why spend millions, open the door to bitter argument, trouble the population in the midst of its war effort, when the question cannot be put to them frankly?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this very house, and his ministers over the radio and elsewhere, throughout the plebiscite campaign or before, stated in evident good faith: "There is no connection between the plebiscite and conscription." It was merely a matter of releasing the government from a pledge to which our allies seemed to take exception. United in a common belief in a sacred principle, French Canadians throughout the country refused to release the administration; to allow the government to break a solemn pledge.

I could not have said that the government would construe a "yes" vote as favouring conscription for service overseas since I had faith in my leaders, but I had my doubts and could not urge my constituents to release me from a solemn pledge taken at election time. I was fully aware of my duty and responsibility as I went to meet my electors, despite the handicap of illness from which I suffered throughout the plebiscite campaign, and to explain that this was a free and popular vote, that they were free to hold whatever opinion they wished on the matter, but that their member could not take the responsibility for an affirmative vote and that he would vote "no". My personal opinion was the same as that of nearly 98 per cent of the people in my constituency. The province of Quebec, by an overwhelming majority, refused to release the government from its given pledge.

But the plebiscite was hardly over when a bill was introduced in this house calling for conscription for service outside of Canada. We are told that this is the outcome of the plebiscite vote. This faltering explanation does not agree with the meaning given to the plebiscite by the Prime Minister himself, to wit that the question of conscription was not an issue. But suppose conscription had been the issue, how could the government feel released from their pledge when the very people to whom this pledge was given definitely refused to allow it? Thus spoke Quebec.

Bill No. 80 is intended to delete section 3 of the act. When that is done, compulsory military service for any theatre of war or, in other words, conscription for service outside of Canada will be the law of the land. But it is explained that conscription is not necessary now and that it may never be. For my part, I refuse to be led blindly in this direction on the question before the house.

The principle of this bill is the enforcement by order in council of conscription at any time it is deemed necessary to do so. But the people were given the solemn assurance that never would this measure be enforced without first consulting parliament. If section 3 is repealed never again will hon. members of this house have the opportunity of expressing their views on the question of conscription. I cannot agree to the principle of governing merely by order in council in a matter of such vital importance.

In opposing this bill, I am simply adhering to the political will of the great Canadian statesman who was Sir Wilfrid Laurier: "Ever against conscription." The original of this testament is in the hands of the right hon. Prime Minister who, in accepting Sir Wilfrid Laurier's successorship, pledged himself to respect it. For the last quarter of a century, every Liberal candidate received a copy of the political will of that great patriot and it was used as a guide to every speech made in all election campaigns. The repeal of section 3 would mean destroying this precious document. Never shall I have anything to do with the imperialists in the government and be a traitor to the memory of Laurier, and to my constituents who elected me on the basis of that platform.

To my mind, we have gone far enough along the lines of compulsion when we consider the size of our population. Since the voluntary system admittedly gives satisfactory results, why risk dividing irrevocably two main groups of Canadian citizens by passing a conscription measure for overseas service.

The voluntary system is already far from being such. Judging by the means employed to force our young men to enter either the active force or the war industries, I refer to the order prohibiting the employment of men between the ages of 17 and 45, which has seriously affected war production and may even have disrupted it in certain cases.

How is this problem to be solved? Where are we to look for a palliative? Female labour night and day? This is now being attempted. No public man, no citizen having at heart the welfare of his fellow human beings and actuated by patriotic feelings can thus countenance the destruction of a whole race by ruining the health of its young girls. The factory girl of to-day is the mother of to-morrow and if she has to overwork herself, the very vitality of the race is threatened thereby. No doubt this will please Mr. Carson and his fellow-members of the Grand Lodge of Orange who view with alarm the "miracle of the cradles" in French Canada. But no one who is the least bit scrupulous will accept the responsibility for such a crime by either encouraging or tolerating night labour for young girls. I take the liberty of drawing the attention of the government to this matter.

Mr. Speaker, if, in spite of everything, we continue to long for the fullest cooperation, particularly with a view to national unity, knowing the price we have paid so far for that unity, it is for the sake of our native land and because we are of good heart. Because of this price we paid for national unity, I cannot allow it to be sabotaged and threatened with destruction through the enactment of conscription for overseas service.

If the question of the plebiscite had been squarely put to the Canadian people—"For or against conscription for overseas service"—one may well wonder if the result would have been the same. At a time when the enemy is sinking our ships in the St. Lawrence, attacking our Pacific coastline and landing troops on the North American continent, I wonder if there are still many Canadians who favour sending our best men overseas and running the risk of being unable to cope with the enemy's attack.

The French Canadian does not shirk from doing his share in our war effort and, despite the shameful innuendoes of a handful of Toronto imperialists, the province of Quebec is as anxious to win this war as any other province.

We can rightfully be proud of our war effort, and we shall further it with pride and patriotism, but let us be granted at least the right to safeguard a principle based primarily on the country's best interests and our home defence needs.

My own constituency set an example which might well have been followed in others reporting a majority of affirmative votes. Every appeal on behalf of war loans has met with the most gratifying response. Most of our quotas were oversubscribed to the extent of 140, 150 and 160 per cent, even though my own county of Drummond-Arthabaska is peopled entirely by farmers and labourers. It is no centre of great wealth and national revenue authorities would vainly seek there an opportunity of lining their coffers out of large income taxes. In the last Red Cross campaign, our objective was reached almost a whole week before the closing date.

In terms of military service, our cooperation has been no less full and unstinting. Our young men have readily responded to compulsory training and many of our volunteers are now fighting on all theatres of war. Some fifteen Drummondville youths were among the heroes of Hong Kong and, only recently, the county of Arthabaska lost three of its bravest young men, one of whom died on duty with the Canadian navy while the second, Sergeant-pilot Tourville, gloriously laid down his life in Libya, and the third, Pilot Dionne, lost his life in a flying accident. May I be allowed a word of tribute to the memory of those heroes and of gratitude and sympathy for their families.

All of which, Mr. Speaker, but serves to emphasize the fact that, in opposing conscription for overseas service, we have no wish to impede the country's war effort. On the contrary, we believe that, because it provides better soldiers, the voluntary system is likely to give better results.

Once again, I regret this lack of frankness toward my fellow citizens and deplore the breach of trust in the pledged word. To sum up briefly, I may say that I shall oppose Bill No. 80 and in so doing remain true to my word, comply with the views of my electors and serve my country by working for the preservation of national unity and better understanding between the two main ethnical groups in Canada.

On motion of Mr. Mulock the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as we approach the end of a third year of war, we find ourselves in the midst of undertakings vaster than we ever hoped to assume for the defence of the world's freedom. We are surrounded by united nations more numerous and powerful than we ever dared to expect to be allied with us. Our war programme is great and growing in size and effectiveness. More and more of our national strength is being absorbed into it. The programmes of the united nations are daily becoming more closely knit in mutual aid. Yet to-day it is bitterly plain that we have far to go before victory is in sight.

The financial task of facilitating and safeguarding these developments has also grown in size and difficulty, but in the record and plans disclosed in this fourth war-time budget speech, it has become simple and direct in principle, though increasingly difficult of execution.

I

ECONOMIC AND FINANCIAL REVIEW

The budget proposals which I shall present to the house necessarily grow out of the experience of the past and are shaped by what we know of the work ahead.

Let me first recall some of the economic and financial events and policies of the past fiscal year. It was marked by great shifts and increases in production, employment, income, and private spending. The prime movers in our war economy are, obviously, our sales of goods abroad and our own government expenditures.

Taking the twelve months to the end of March as a basis of comparison, our exports to the United Kingdom increased by 36 per cent, our exports to the United States by 41 per cent, our total exports by almost 50 per cent. In the face of restrictions abroad on non-essential buying and the use of transport facilities, these increases, much greater in amount than in any preceding year may be taken as evidence of our greatly enlarged contribution of war supplies and essential goods to allied and friendly countries.

For our own war programme, in the first quarter of this calendar year, our war direct expenditures were $500 million as compared with $275 million in the same months of last year, that is, more than 80 per cent higher.

General employment at the end of the fiscal year was up 22 per cent over the level of preceding March and employment in manufacturing was up 30 per cent. From the beginning of the war, employment in manufacturing has expanded by more than 80 per cent. Average weekly earnings of employees rose throughout the year. Retail sales at the close of the fiscal year were running about 20 per cent above the previous year's level, more than 50 per cent above the pre-war level, and showed few signs of slackening. Making allowance for the differences in prices, the quantity of goods being sold (aside from automobiles) appeared to be from 20 to 25 per cent above pre-war volume.

CONTROL OF PRICES, INCOMES AND SUPPLIES

As the year passed, numerous and marked shortages became apparent. The mounting war output of the united nations, greatly accelerated by the entry of the United States into the war, created scarcities of one strategic material after another. The widening of the area of conflict, the submarine menace on our coasts, and the loss of sources of supply in the far east shut off or reduced many imports on which we were accustomed to depend. The widening scope, the increasing speed of our own war programme, both in the armed services and in production, made heavy demands on our man-power until no one any longer denies the scarcity of labour. To these have been added shortage of power, congested transportation facilities, and widely ramifying limitations of productive capacity. It has been clear these many months that our economy is in the zone of full employment, a condition in which it is still possible to expand our programmes for production and the armed services but only if we are prepared to make careful and wise choices as to what is urgent, what is more urgent, and what we can do without.

This is not an unexpected nor wholly unwelcome situation. It was clearly forecast in the budget speech, which I delivered in September, 1939. For the most part, it is reassuring evidence that we, as well as other nations associated with us, have so set the scale of our war programme that it will engage our full strength and more than we knew we had.

A clear sign of developing scarcities was provided in the rapid rise in prices in the summer of 1941. By October, 1941, the index of wholesale prices had risen by approximately 22 points since the beginning of the war. Of that, 10 points of rise occurred in the four months of 1939 when our exchange rate changed and shipping rates increased. Of the remaining 12 points of rise, 8 occurred between March and October of 1941. In living costs, half the full rise of the war period occurred between March and October of 1941.

These accelerating changes in production, employment, supplies and prices produced by October of last year a situation which was substantially different in degree from that which could be discerned on April 29, 1941, when the budget of that year was presented to the house. It was clear to the government that new fiscal measures, which could be adopted when parliament met, would be too late in effect and not sufficiently specific in application to meet the situation. It was, therefore, decided that direct controls should be established promptly over prices, wages and salaries, and that controls over production and supplies should be extended and made more rigorous.

The government's policy of over-all control on prices, wages, and salaries has already been discussed at length in the house. I would point out here four things: (1) the policy has in fact worked and has won support at home and admiration and emulation abroad; (2) though increases in some wage rates have been severely restricted, the earnings of labour have not been "frozen". On the contrary, depressed wage rates have been, and are being, adjusted by the war labour boards, while the Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that for its sample of over a million and a half employees, weekly earnings per employee which reflect more continuous employment and overtime, increased nearly 8 per cent since October last. This increase in the average took place, despite the introduction of many women and other inexperienced production workers into industry; (3) the government by guaranteed prices, minimum prices, and export prices, which could not have been so high except for the terms of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, and the intervention of the government, has contributed to a desired improvement in farm income while endeavouring to direct farm efforts to the most needed products. In the calendar year 1941, with relatively poor crops in many localities cash income from the sale of farm products was only 17 per cent below the income of 1928, the year of the biggest crops in our history. Good crops in 1942-43, with assured prices, will bring cash farm income close to the best records of Canadian agriculture. Excluding wheat, which has been in surplus supply since the beginning of the war and has required special measures, the prices of farm products on the average are now about 2 per cent above the level of 1926 and prices of animal products on the average are relatively still higher. Farmers are assured of these prices on a wide range of this season's crops, and will receive, by government action, higher prices than those on last year's crops for wheat, flax, soy beans, sugar beets and apples; (4) price and income control are essential weapons in combating inflation. They must be used, however, in close coordination with direct control of supplies and productive equipment, with direction and management of man-power, with consumer rationing, where necessary, and with fiscal policy. No one of these instruments is itself powerful and pervasive enough to do the whole job of directing our resources to the end desired.

Measures for the direct control of supplies multiplied during the year. The Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Wartime Prices and Trade Board have ordered the discontinuance or curtailment of manufacture of a large and growing number of non-essential products using metals and other scarce materials. Building construction and the installation of equipment, other than for war production, were more severely curtailed. The Wartime Prices and Trade Board is rapidly extending its orders on simplified practice to effect reductions in costs and provide the most ample supplies of essential products that the fundamental limitations will permit. Though dealers' stocks are large, it simply will not be possible during the present fiscal year for consumers to obtain the quantities of goods which they have been purchasing during the past year. Restrictions on civilian industry to save materials and man-power will unavoidably multiply. We need not anticipate severe hardship; the government will do all it can to ensure equitable distribution of essentials. There must be, however, rigorous economy in consumption if the necessary materials, productive capacity, and labour are to be available for the winning of the war.

PROVINCIAL TAX AGREEMENTS

Since the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreement Act has been debated and passed by parliament and the agreements tabled, I need do no more than remind the house of the tax agreements with the provinces. In my budget speech of April 29, 1941, the provincial governments were offered compensation in respect of personal and corporation income taxes and the guarantee of gasoline tax revenues, if they would vacate the personal and corporation income tax fields for the duration of the war. This offer was accepted by the provinces, and I should like to pay tribute to the patriotic and constructive spirit in which the provincial governments cooperated in bringing the long and involved negotiations to a successful conclusion. The effect is that I am now free to recommend such tax changes as appear to the government necessary and equitable, and parliament is free to enact such changes, knowing that persons and corporations affected will be paying the same tax on similar incomes in no matter what province they are located. These are war-time agreements, and their duration is limited, but they make a great contribution to the possibility of an effective and equitable tax policy during the war.

STERLING AND DOLLAR EXCHANGE PROBLEMS

Concerning our exchange problems as they affect the finances of the past fiscal year, I need speak only briefly. In the last three budget speeches, they were dealt with at length because they then were to a degree separate problems requiring measures peculiar to them. They have now, by reason of events and measures taken, become merged with the general budget problem.

In introducing the resolutions on the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, on March 18 last, I explained fully the ways in which the government financed the United Kingdom's deficiency in Canadian dollars since the beginning of the war. During the fiscal year, 1941-42, the entire deficiency amounted to approximately $1,100 million and was financed by Canada. Of this total, slightly less than $48 million was financed by private repatriation of securities, gifts and other private transactions. Of the remaining $1,050 million, which required government financing, $365 million was financed by repatriation of government and government guaranteed dollar securities (including $223 million of the repatriation of $295 million provided for under the Act). The remaining sum, $685 million, represents sterling accumulated to our credit during the year. Such part of this as is not required for working balances, together with accumulations of $215 million prior to March 31, 1941, is being taken care of by the remainder of the $295 million repatriation, by the $700 million loan and to the extent of $76 million by a charge to the $1,000 million gift provided in the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act.

This act, in addition to the real advantages and essential rightness of its principles which were recognized by the house, has the minor advantage of removing from our financial picture an element in our national finances, which was very confusing to the layman. For the fiscal year, 1942-43, the financing of the United Kingdom's deficiency in Canadian dollars will appear as an integral part of Canadian war expenditures.

I turn now to the problem of United States exchange which has occupied a good deal of attention since the beginning of the war and has required special legislation and administrative action from time to time. Our imports of war materials from the United States have increased from month to month; recorded imports from the United States for both war and non-war purposes during the past fiscal year amounted to over $1,100 million, the highest figure for any twelve-month period on record. Faced as we were with this growing need for United States dollars, our resources would not have been sufficient to meet the calls on them, had it not been for the Hyde park agreement, especially the sales of munitions of war to the government of the United States under it, and for the legislative and administrative steps taken to conserve United States exchange to which I have referred.

As I informed the house in introducing the United Kingdom War Appropriation Bill on March 18 this year, liquid reserves of gold and United States dollars held by the Foreign Exchange Control Board and the dominion government declined by $142 million during 1941. In the first quarter of 1942, there was a marked, though in part a temporary, improvement. As a result, the decline in our liquid reserves for the fiscal year 1941-42 was only about $50 million. This welcome change was due to two factors: purchases of Canadian securities by investors in the United States, a method of obtaining exchange which cannot be depended on for really substantial amounts in view of the limited supply of securities available in Canada payable in United States dollars; and payments for sales of munitions under the Hyde Park agreement including some substantial advance payments. While we have reason to believe that these sales will increase, as new contracts are arranged and as larger deliveries are made under existing contracts, the advance payments are, of course non-recurring.

The outlook for the fiscal year, 1942-43, is distinctly more cheerful than the results of the calendar year 1941. We cannot expect, however, the full improvement which took place from January to March to continue. Other unfavourable factors have entered the picture, particularly the adverse effect on the tourist trade of the necessary restrictions on the use of gasoline and rubber and the recent decline in newsprint exports. Nevertheless, I look forward with reasonable assurance to transactions under the Hyde Park agreement being sufficient to safeguard our exchange position during the present fiscal year. The various measures which we have taken since June, 1940, have been sufficient to restrict what I may call our "civilian imports" from non-sterling countries to limits well within our ability to pay. The uncontrollable item is imports for war purposes which for the calendar year 1942 it is estimated will total approximately $500 million, of which about 45 per cent is to supply the United Kingdom and other Empire countries and 55 per cent for our own needs. It is our estimate that were it not for the Hyde Park transactions almost the whole of this amount would be a net drain on our resources in United States dollars, or would be as long as we had any such resources left.

As matters stand, we are hopeful that the Hyde Park agreement will ensure our ability to purchase essential materials and war supplies in the United States to the full extent that that country is able to supply them. In effect, the agreement may be thought of as eliminating the dollar sign in our war-time transactions with the United States by providing a convenient technique for an exchange of raw materials and other components of war goods for the finished war supplies we are equipped to produce. By the collaboration of our good neighbour and ally, we hope to be able to meet our exchange requirements, which arise out of our need for war materials, in the way most effective for a nation at war, namely, by the provision of munitions of war for whichever of the united nations and whichever of the world's battle fronts require them most urgently.

This is a most desirable situation, but let it not be misunderstood. We are able to do this only as long as we continue to exercise care and prudence in our non-war transactions. The restrictions on pleasure travel have now been in force for nearly two years and it can be stated with assurance that these restrictions have saved us well over 100 million United States dollars since they were imposed. The amounts saved by the War Exchange Conservation Act are also very substantial. During the past fiscal year, it is likely that the savings under both these heads have amounted to in the neighbourhood of $130 million, about equally divided between the two items. In the light of these figures, it is fully apparent that these measures have played an essential part in the past and that we are not at present in a position to relax them.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS AND FINANCING 1941-42

Against this background, I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to review the government accounts for the past fiscal year and report on the financing which has been carried out. Following the useful custom which has now been established, I shall only summarize the estimates of our revenues and expenditures, and, before I resume my seat, I shall table a White Paper which will include full information concerning these estimates. The house will recall that, though these estimates are close approximations to the final figures, the Public Accounts will not be available until towards the end of this calendar year.

REVENUES

Revenues are again very greatly increased, Our present estimate is that they will total $1,481 million, an increase over the previous year of $609 million, or approximately 70 per cent. This is some $34 million higher than I forecast in presenting the budget last year, and is nearly three times the Dominion's pre-war revenue.

Total tax revenues are now estimated at $1,360,915,000 as compared with $778 million in the preceding fiscal year. In contrast with previous years, direct taxes on incomes and profits made the largest contribution to this total. The graduated tax on personal incomes, the 18 per cent corporation tax and the special tax on dividends and interest produced $404 million, more than 80 per cent in excess of last year's yield. The national defence tax produced $107 million and the excess profits tax, for what was really its first full year of operation, as it is collected on the profits of the previous year, yielded $135 million.

Succession duties, first introduced in last year's budget, produced $7 million, a figure which gives little indication of the future revenue to be derived from this source.

Excise taxes, though no longer the largest source of revenue showed a greater increase than that for the preceding year, rising from $284 million to $453 million. The largest item in this group, the sales tax, at $236 million was $56 million or 31 per cent higher than the previous year. The other excise taxes including the new taxes imposed last year fully reached or exceeded the estimates of the last budget.

Excise duties yielded $110 million as compared with $89 million in the preceding year. Customs duties, as was expected, showed the smallest increase recorded during the year, from $131 million to $142 million.

Non-tax revenue, to which the largest contributor is the Post Office, is estimated to be $103 million. Special receipts and credits will be approximately $18 million.

EXPENDITURES

Turning to our expenditures, we now estimate that ordinary expenditures for 1941-42 were slightly under $444 million, about $53 million more than last year. Of this increase, $15 million is attributable to increased interest on the public debt, $10 million to increased cost of loan flotations and bond amortization, $21 million to compensation to the provinces under the tax agreements and $10 million to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Other items of ordinary expenditure are slightly reduced. Capital expenditures at $3,357,000 were about the same as the previous year. The category of so-called special expenditures, which includes the costs of unemployment and agricultural relief, Prairie Farm Assistance Act, wheat acreage reduction payments, and prairie farm income payments will, it is estimated, show expenditures of $62,879,000. Expenditures for relief and works projects have fallen to small figures, but payments under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the wheat acreage reduction and the prairie farm income payments have offset this decrease and occasioned an increase of $20 million in the total. To meet deficits resulting from the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board, which had not been previously provided for, $12,571,000 has been placed in reserve.

In 1940-41, government-owned enterprises required $18 million. In 1941-42, because of the immense increase in railway earnings, this was reduced to $1,215,000, only the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals and the National Harbours Board requiring such expenditures.

In the last budget, I estimated that war expenditures for 1941-42 would be between $1,300,000,000 and $1,450,000,000. It is now estimated that they will be $1,351,553,000, excluding outlays of $42,480,000 charged to active assets. This compares with $752 million spent in the preceding year.

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

Adding to the amounts, which I have given, miscellaneous other charges representing chiefly write-down of assets, we get an aggregate expenditure for the year 1941-42 of $1,894,966,000, an amount more than 50 per cent higher than the expenditures of 1940-41, viz., $1,250 million. Deduction of total revenues of $1,481,285,000 gives $413,681,000 as the over-all deficit or increase in the direct net debt, which on March 31, 1942, was approximately $4,062,372,000. I estimated last year that we would pay between 73 and 79 per cent of our direct expenditures out of revenue. It now appears that we will have paid 78 per cent.

On March 31, 1942, the outstanding unmatured funded debt (including treasury bills) was $5,866,071,000 on which the average rate of interest was 2·90 per cent as compared with 3·06 per cent a year previously. In addition, there were outstanding bonds and debentures bearing the guarantee of the Dominion to the amount of $818,842,000, a decrease of $165 million during the fiscal year.

BORROWINGS

Total borrowings during the year, excluding debentures of over $33 million reissued to the western provinces in continuation of the school lands settlement, amounted to approximately $2,424 million. Of this total, $1,834 million was borrowed from the public in the two victory loans; $85,294,000 represents the sale of war savings certificates and stamps; $4,553,000 non-interest bearing certificates; $10,000,000 was borrowed in New York for refunding; $450 million was borrowed from the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks, replacing issues of identical amounts held by them and which matured during the year; the remainder, $40,000,000, is the increase in treasury bills outstanding during the year. Thus, aside from the increase in treasury bills, there was no new direct borrowing from the Bank of Canada or the chartered banks during the year.

DEBT

Dominion of Canada direct obligations in the amount of $931,042,000 (excluding school lands debentures) were redeemed during 1941-42, leaving net borrowings for the year of $1,493,000,000. This sum was used to meet the over-all deficit of $413,681,000, to advance $400 million to the Foreign Exchange Control Board, for use in financing the sterling area's Canadian-dollar deficit, to advance $252 million to the Canadian National Railways (nearly all of which was used to effect a redemption of railway securities), and the remainder ($427 million) to make various other advances and raise the working balances of the government.

To obtain from the people of this country loans to the amount of $1,673 million (allowing for the redemption of securities in New York and London), to obtain from the people and corporations of this country such an amount after they had contributed nearly $1,500 million in revenue is a great financial achievement. It reflects the willingness of Canadians to do what is necessary in finance as in other fields to resolve this conflict in complete victory. It is an achievement which reflects the greatest credit on the National War Finance Committee and on the campaigns which it has so successfully carried out for the sale of war savings certificates and stamps and victory bonds. To them, to the press, radio, and other agencies, which have made special contributions to this success, and to the thousands of workers who cooperated in the campaigns, the government and the people of this country are grateful.

Our whole financial record for 1941-42 is an achievement but I wish to add a word of warning. When we say that 78 per cent of our expenditures was paid out of revenues we are perfectly correct by the principles of bookkeeping, but the figure is open to misconstruction. In addition to our expenditures, we must take account of the financing of the United Kingdom. It was necessary during the year for the government to find approximately $1,050 million for this purpose. In exchange for the Canadian dollars transferred to the United Kingdom, we acquired assets, certain Canadian government obligations held in London and sterling balances which have now been converted into the $700,000,000 loan. Since we acquired assets, the accountants are quite correct in classifying these outlays as investments. But just as an individual faces the same immediate financial problem in finding $100 whether it is to be used to pay for the winter's coal, buy a government bond or make a gift to his son, so the immediate financial and economic problem of our financing of United Kingdom purchases has been the same as that of our own war expenditures. We must realize that though it is correct to say that in 1941-42 we paid 78 per cent of our expenditures out of revenue, the significant thing to say is that we paid just over 50 per cent of our expenditures and war advances out of revenue.

Further, we must not be misled by our achievements in borrowing from the public and the corporations. The conditions, under which a government may most easily borrow from its people and have its loans always oversubscribed, are the conditions in which there is a considerable inflation of incomes and of bank balances. The government is committed to a policy of "pay as you go as far as it may be practicable"; it has set its face against distributing the cost of war through the medium of inflation. We must bear in mind that if it is easy for some of the people of this country to lend, easy for the government to borrow, there is a presumption, unless most of the opportunities for expenditure have been blocked, that we are falling short of our declared policy. I shall have occasion to say something further on this subject a little later.

II

BUDGET FORECAST 1942-43 AND PROPOSALS

So much for the past. I have given a brief, and, I hope, lucid account of the financial policies of the past year and the results of the budget of 1941-42. I realize, however, that the house has a greater interest in the estimates of our expenditures for the new fiscal year and in the measures and policies we propose to meet these expenditures.

ESTIMATE OF EXPENDITURES

For the fiscal ending March 31, 1943, the house has before it estimates of non-war expenditure amounting to $455 million. To this will have to be added supplementary and possibly further supplementary estimates, including about $20 million to provide for payments under the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act, and perhaps amounting altogether to, say, $30 million.

The Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreement Act provides for payments to the provinces of $84,428,000. This does not include any payments which it may be necessary to make as a result of the guarantee of provincial gasoline tax revenue. However, any amount which will fall due on this guarantee in the present fiscal year is likely to be small.

It will be recalled that the War Appropriation Act makes provision for war expenditures of $2,000 million. In the early years of the war actual expenditures were likely to fall short of estimates. At this stage, they are more likely to reach or exceed the estimates and I may have to ask the house for an additional appropriation at a later date. Indeed, as I pointed out to the house in March, though the total appropriation requested was $2,000 million, the individual items in the estimates, submitted by the departments at that time, totalled $2,200 million.

The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act provides for expenditures of $1,000 million to furnish food, raw materials, and munitions of war to the United Kingdom. Of this amount, the sum of $76 million was used to purchase sterling accumulated during the month of March and this sum logically, and as intended, should have been charged to expenditures for the year 1941-42. It was, however, impossible to determine the amount and effect the necessary accounting entries before April 30, the last date on which charges could be taken into the accounts for the last fiscal year. While the gift to the United Kingdom is limited to $1,000 million, it already appears likely that ways and means will have to be found to finance further shipments before March 31, 1943.

Adding these estimates together, we arrive at a total of $3,570 million. In view of the considerations I have mentioned, the figure is likely to be exceeded. I feel, therefore, that it would not be safe nor fair to the house and the people of Canada to make financial plans for less than expenditures of $3,900 million.

ESTIMATE OF REVENUE

To meet these requirements, it is estimated that with present taxes and tax rates, our total ordinary revenues for the fiscal year 1942-43 will be approximately $1,672 million. The following statement shows how the estimate is made up and, for comparative purposes, the estimated yields for 1941-42:

	1942-43 (millions)	1941-42 (millions)
Customs duties	$ 135	$ 142
Excise duties	123	110
Sales tax	218	236
War exchange tax	95	101
Other excise taxes	85	116
Income taxes—
Personal	240	190
Corporate	200	186
Interest and dividends	28	28
National defence tax	150	107
Excess profits tax	275	135
Succession duties	15	7
Miscellaneous	3	3
	$1,567	$1,361
Non-tax revenue	105	103
Total ordinary revenue	$1,672	$1,463

It will be noted that we anticipate substantial increases in revenues from national defence tax and personal income tax and a very large increase in the yield of the excess profits tax. These will result from increases in incomes and the application of the rates of the 1941 budget to incomes for a full year. We also look for a sizable increase from excise duties. We anticipate that the yields of the sales tax, the war exchange tax, and other commodity taxes will decline by about $55 million since a large number of goods subject to tax will not be available in the quantities purchased last year and inventories being used up will have already been taxed. Obviously, the amount of such decreases is very hard to estimate with accuracy. The figures which I have given are the most careful guesses which we have been able to achieve.

THE FINANCIAL TASK

Expenditures of $3,900 million and revenues of $1,672 million will leave an apparent deficit of $2,228 million to be covered by new taxes and borrowing. On the basis of these estimates, we should be paying less than 43 per cent of our expenditures out of revenue. To make a comparison with last year, we can exclude the United Kingdom financing and reach a deficit of $1,228 million as compared with $414 million as estimated for the past fiscal year.

Last year, I referred to the financial requirements of 1941-42, which were difficult to define clearly, as "staggering." Confronted now with much larger requirements, set out as the simplest of sums in arithmetic, I must perforce drop all adjectives and try to state, as clearly as one who isn't a prophet may state, what they mean in terms of the future.

During the last fiscal year, we appeared to achieve the impossible. Rough estimates indicate that we increased the dollar value of our national output of goods and services by nearly 25 per cent, (bringing the increase during the war to about 80 per cent), but we increased our expenditures on war (including expenditures for United Kingdom purchases) by a greater absolute amount. One might have expected that this would necessitate reduced expenditures for private consumption. On the contrary, estimates indicate that expenditures for private consumption were substantially increased. Our own observation confirms this.

The explanation of this seeming paradox is twofold. On the side of goods and services, some of the goods, which were purchased last year, did not come out of our own current output. Apparently, we reduced our inventories somewhat during the fiscal year, and ended the year with lower stocks on hand than we had at the beginning, having used more than we produced in the interval. We did not maintain our capital equipment by expending on repairs and replacements the full depreciation charged as an expense. Shortage of materials, in many cases, made such maintenance impossible. We did not pay for all our imports from the United States out of current production. Decline in our reserves of United States funds and imports of capital provided in the neighbourhood of $200 million of imports paid for out of capital not out of income.

On the side of money, not all the funds which the government acquired by taxation and borrowing came out of income, even out of gross income. A substantial amount, in fact, came in this the first year in which really big bond-selling campaigns were carried on, from idle bank balances or directly or indirectly from private bank loans. We obtained from an increase in our treasury bill issues $40 million.

As I read the experience of the past fiscal year, we were not able to draw enough goods from sources other than our current output to match the idle balances and bank credit which were drawn into the treasury and paid out again in incomes. Of the $1,673 million which we borrowed from the people of this country, by no means all could have come out of current saving. This, and similar situations in countries with which we trade, together with the insatiable demands of war for goods and services, occasioned the rapid rise of prices last summer, and, but for the prompt action of the government in imposing drastic restrictions on prices and incomes, would have led to a further and disastrous inflation.

In the present year, we must and can again increase our total output but by no such amount as was added to it last year. Shortages of materials are daily growing more stringent. Scarcities of power, transport facilities and labour have placed narrow limits on the production of almost everything. The need for war production, and it is only too apparent how urgent that need is this year, will absorb all our capacity to expand output and more.

Looking at the problem from the side of goods and services, we shall not be able to obtain substantial imports from the United States without paying for them out of current output, for we expect to meet, or nearly meet, our exchange problem by deliveries of goods under the Hyde Park agreement. We can probably again draw on inventories of civilian goods but by how much I do not know, for information as to inventories is very deficient. Deferred maintenance and replacement must again contribute a substantial sum. Making allowances for these sources outside of current output, the conclusion is inescapable that industry will not be able to supply goods for civilian consumption and private investment on the scale of last year.

Looking at money income, the conclusion is the same. Increased government expenditures of the amounts which I have given will, with present rates of taxation, leave in the hands of persons and corporations spendable income far in excess of what can be matched at current prices by goods and services. In our borrowing, it would be dangerous folly to depend on the investment of idle balances. Even if we needed to borrow from the public no more than we borrowed last year, there must be a very substantial increase in current saving.

It is a most difficult task to deal with sums of the magnitude involved here. It is an even more difficult and sobering experience to reach decisions affecting such large fractions of the incomes of our people. I have given the most careful and earnest consideration to the problem confronting us, and have inevitably come to the clear decision that my proposals in this budget must include measures to increase our revenues within the fiscal year substantially, at least to the point where our dependence on borrowing will be more nearly within the limits of our current saving; they must provide for increased saving, both corporate and personal; they must include also measures to ensure that the task of contributing to the required increase in current saving is more widely and equitably distributed.

These fiscal measures are necessary if we are to follow honestly our declared policy to pay as we go in so far as it is practicable. They are necessary if our war debt is not to create post-war difficulties. It is not the size of the debt that is a matter of chief concern for after all it is an obligation of the people of Canada through their government to the people of Canada. Rather, we are concerned about the distribution of it. It is a matter of the first importance that those who have the right to receive payments on government obligations shall be those who will use the repayments to provide needed improvements in their standard of living, maintain themselves against insecurity, and contribute to the improvement of our productive equipment.

These fiscal measures are necessary also to success in our four-front battle against inflation. The price ceiling, control and rationing of supplies, the direction of man-power, and fiscal policy are complementary, not alternative measures. The offensive must be maintained on all four fronts. No one front can be held unless the others are held. The price ceiling, a sound policy which is being administered with great courage and imagination, cannot itself defeat inflation. If I may venture another military metaphor, it can prevent the enemy from winning by infiltration.

PERSONAL INCOME TAXES

From what has been said it is evident that fiscal necessity forces us to look again to the income tax on individuals, or some similar device, for a large amount of additional funds. In devising measures to meet this need I have had to keep in mind three other important considerations—the need for equity, for incentive, and for savings.

As regards equity, I am sure we all agree that the income tax on individuals is the fairest method of taxation. By and large, a person's income is the best single measure of his taxable capacity, particularly when we take into account the number of persons dependent on him. It is by no means a perfect measure, however, and as we increase the rates to higher levels we must attempt to take into account other factors affecting ability to pay. Therefore I have several suggestions to put forward in a few minutes, intended to take into account additional special circumstances affecting ability to pay.

The problem in regard to incentive is less easy to assess but more fundamental and therefore more difficult to overcome. A progressive income tax must of necessity take more out of an additional dollar of earnings than it does out of the average dollar of earnings. Consequently it must bear heavily on additional income earned through extra effort or efficiency. There is a danger that high progressive rates of income tax may interfere with the incentive for harder and better work for efficient production. We can and must rely upon other than economic motives to a large extent these days. Nevertheless we cannot afford to dispense entirely with the incentive of improved earnings as a stimulus in the continual week-in, week-out production work of the nation at a time when production is of vital importance. I have endeavoured therefore, to frame these income tax measures so as to preserve as much as possible of the earnings incentive for the great majority of the working population.

The third consideration is the need to ensure that the increase in taxes is reflected in a decrease in expenditures and not in reduced saving. There would be little net gain if the putting into effect of higher income tax rates resulted in a corresponding decline in saving. It is vitally necessary that, while tax revenues increase, the flow of savings into the treasury shall also increase greatly.

Equity, incentive, and the encouragement of saving—these are the considerations which I have kept in mind, but fiscal necessity and the rude facts of war press us hard.

In order to obtain the increased yield from income tax which is required, I am proposing that we combine the present national defence tax and the graduated income tax into a single assessment to be collected as far as possible by deduction at the source, or, where that is impracticable, by a compulsory instalment plan. This total assessment will consist in part of a flat rate tax on the total income like the present national defence tax, and in part of a steeply graduated tax at substantially higher rates than the present. It will be assessed in respect of incomes of the calendar year 1942, but will be collected and payable over the twelve months from September 1 of this year to August 31 of next year. Returns are to be filed, as at present, on or before March 31. National defence tax already deducted from 1942 incomes will be credited toward the total payable under the new tax; this will afford considerable alleviation of the immediate burden for those in the lower brackets.

As at present, single persons with incomes of less than $660 per year and married persons with less than $1,200 a year will be exempt from tax, and the tax will not reduce incomes below these starting points. The flat rate tax corresponding to the present national defence tax, will be at the rate of 7 per cent for married persons, and at the same rate for single persons with incomes not exceeding $1,800; it will be 8 per cent on single persons with incomes exceeding $1,800 but not exceeding $3,000, and 9 per cent on single persons with incomes exceeding $3,000. The allowance of $20 for a child under the national defence tax has been increased to $28 for this flat rate tax—that is, in direct proportion to the increase in the rate. It will be noted that the differentiation between the single and married in the rate of tax comes more gradually and at a higher income than in the present national defence tax; the effect of this on the relative tax payable will be more than counterbalanced in the brackets between $1,200 per year and $3,000 by the changes in the graduated tax and by other means to be noted in a moment.

The changes in the graduated tax are more complicated. In place of the present exemptions of $750 for single persons, $1,500 for married persons and $400 for each child, we are shifting over to a single basic exemption of $660—which is also the present starting point for national defence tax—and a flat allowance off the tax for married persons and for children. Married persons will deduct $150 from the graduated tax, and the allowance for children (or other dependents) will be $80 each. These figures were reached by taking the present exemptions of $750 for a wife and $400 for a child and evaluating them in terms of a tax saving at the rate of 20 per cent, which is not the lowest rate of the present graduated tax, but the rate in the second thousand of taxable income. In effect, therefore, we are "freezing" the value of these present exemptions at about the amount they have been worth to a taxpayer having an income of around $2,500 or $3,000. This, I believe to be a better way of increasing the tax on persons with families than reducing the current exemptions, particularly under present circumstances when other changes are being made which will have the effect of widening the difference between the levies on the single, the married, and those with children.

The proposed rates of the graduated tax are set forth in detail in the resolution. They are substantially higher than the present rates. The first thousand dollars of net taxable income (i.e., after the exemptions are deducted) is now taxed at the rate of 15 per cent. Under the new schedule the first $500 is to be subject to a rate of 30 per cent, the next $500 to 33 per cent, and the following $1,000 to a rate of 37 per cent—compared with the 20 per cent rate on the second thousand in the present schedule. I shall give a number of examples in a moment to illustrate the effects of these increases.

These new rates, together with the changes in exemptions and allowances, will increase very substantially the amounts to be obtained from taxpayers, although they will not impose taxes on any who would not be liable for taxes under present rates and exemptions. For example, these new rates would require from a married man without children and having an income of $3,000 a year a total of $884, in place of the amount of $400 under the present law. While the total yield these rates will produce is still something short of the amounts we should like to obtain and therefore they cannot be considered more than enough from the point of view of our war requirements, they place such a severe burden upon many taxpayers that I believe we must now be prepared to make certain new types of adjustments in order to meet the considerations which I mentioned a few moments ago—considerations of equity, incentive and savings.

One type of special provision which I am suggesting, although not the most important, is to permit an exemption from taxable income in respect of unusually large medical or hospital expenses which a taxpayer has had to meet during the year out of the income on which he is being taxed. This will take the form of permitting as a deduction from income, for the purpose of calculating tax, amounts spent by the taxpayer during the tax year on medical, dental, hospital and nursing services to the extent that these exceed 5 per cent of the taxpayer's income. A limit is to be set on the amounts that may be claimed in this way, of $400 for one taxpayer, plus $200 for his wife and $100 for each child, up to a maximum of $1,000. I should point out that while a family of five, for example, is more likely to have a large excess of these expenses in any year than a single person, it is not likely to have five times the amount for it is not to be expected that all five will be subject to serious illness or accident in the same year. I may say by way of explanation of the 5 per cent that studies of family expenditure indicate that the average expenditure on medical services, et cetera, are in the neighbourhood of 4 or 5 per cent of income, and we desire only to provide exemption for those who have more than average expenditures of this kind. Those claiming this exemption will be required to submit evidence that these payments have, in fact, been made in respect of services received by the taxpayer or his dependents within a specified period.

REFUNDABLE TAX

The second and most important type of alleviation I wish to recommend in order to render equitable the increased rates which I have outlined involves a substantial innovation in our tax machinery. I am proposing to make a portion of the increased tax refundable within a specified period after the war, with accrued interest at 2 per cent. This portion of the assessment on his income will therefore constitute a form of savings for the taxpayer, rather than simply a tax. This saving will be a part of the taxpayer's war-time earnings, kept for him until after the war, when it can be spent to better advantage. By means of this principle we are able to meet our immediate fiscal needs to a substantial degree without endangering the incentive afforded by the possibility of higher earnings for more and better work. In the case of those with incomes in the lowest brackets subject to tax, the refundable portion will be greater than the increase in the total taken, so that the net tax on these lower paid groups will be somewhat lighter than at present, although they will be required to provide a fair share of the increased total assessment.

This refundable portion of the tax we may term a "minimum savings requirement". It will ensure that the taxpayer not only pays his taxes but saves a certain minimum amount, dependent on his income, his tax, and his family responsibilities. In general, it will be collected in the same way and at the same time as the income tax. Allowance is to be made, however, in this refundable portion of the tax for certain types of savings already being made by the taxpayer under contract, which the taxpayer cannot cease making without substantial loss or danger. Payments made by the taxpayer within the tax years as net premiums on life insurance contracts in force to-day, or as principal payments on a mortgage on one residence, or as payments into a pension fund, retirement fund or superannuation fund, will be accepted as an alternative to the liability to turn over funds directly to the treasury as part of the minimum savings requirement. These alternative types of savings cannot readily be drawn upon during the war, and of course to the extent they are drawn upon in any year, they cannot be included. The use of funds for these purposes by the taxpayer does not compete with war requirements for goods or services, nor add to the problems of price control and rationing, as does the use of funds for expenditure. By permitting these savings under existing contracts to be counted a part of the minimum savings requirements, we are able to ensure that everyone saves the minimum amount without creating hardship for those who have contracted to save substantial amounts by means of life insurance, mortgage payments or pension funds.

Let me emphasize clearly that this minimum of savings to be required of all does not release any of us from the obligation to save as much as is humanly possible in addition to this, and to invest it in war savings certificates or victory loans. We are not substituting compulsory for voluntary savings. On the contrary, we must secure a very large increase in voluntary savings from individuals this year, in addition to the minimum savings now to be required by law. The figures I shall give in a few minutes of the amount we shall have to borrow in addition to the revenue to be obtained from existing and increased taxes will make it quite evident that savings must greatly increase.

There is no doubt that Canadians as a whole have the financial means to make such savings. Under the pressure of vast war expenditures their aggregate income is reaching levels which would have seemed impossible a few years ago or even in the palmy days of 1929. Under the measures being proposed we are going as far as we feel we can to ensure a reasonable minimum degree of equity in respect of war saving. But the great majority of Canadians can save more than this basic minimum, and some can save very much more. I have in mind, for instance, family groups whose total income has increased very substantially because of the war. Under a fiscal system which is based on the individual rather than the family as a unit, the full mobilization of possible savings by such groups can only take place on the voluntary principle.

It is therefore clear that the National War Finance Committee, which directs our savings campaigns, has an even bigger and more difficult job to do than it has had in the past. The magnitude and the character of its task is such that the committee does not believe it can succeed unless it becomes to an even greater extent than it is now a people's organization. Success will depend upon the extent to which it can draw upon every group in the community for men and women who will help in planning its activities as well as in carrying them out, and organization is now proceeding with this end in view.

The taxes and minimum savings required from persons with various incomes are illustrated in a table which I would like to place on Hansard at this point, with the consent of the house.

The table gives the figures for single persons, married persons without children and married persons with two children, for selected incomes from the exemption limits up to high figures. The amount of tax payable at current rates, including national defence tax, is shown for the purpose of comparison:

NOTE.—In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that all incomes up to $30,000 are entirely earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total.

Let me give a few examples from the table. A married man without children and with an income of $2,000 a year is liable under the present law for a tax of $175. Under the rates proposed he would be liable for a total amount of $431, of which $231 would be tax and $200 would be his minimum savings requirement to be refunded after the war, with interest. A single man with the same income would be paying $340 under the present rates, and would pay a total of $601 under the new rates, of which $160 would be refundable and $441 would be tax. A single man with an income of $1,000 is at present rates subject to a tax of $87.50, and at the new rates would be subject to a tax of $92—only a slight increase—and as well to a minimum savings requirement of $80. Going up to the middle income brackets, a married man without children, earning $4,000 a year, who is subject to a tax of $675 at present rates, would under the new rates be liable for a tax of $964, and, in addition, for a minimum savings requirement of $400. If he had two dependent children, the tax liability would be only $668, compared with $450 at present, and the refundable portion of the total assessment would be $480, making a total of $1,148. A married man with two children and an income of $1,500 is at present liable for a national defence tax of $35. Under the new plan his tax liability would be reduced to $24.50, and he would have a minium savings requirement of an equal amount. I should point out that in many of these cases at least a portion of the minimum savings requirement will undoubtedly be met by the contractual savings already being made by the taxpayer in the form of life insurance premiums or pension fund deductions from wages or salaries.

It will be noted that on the amount of any income in excess of $100,000, the rate of graduated tax is 85 per cent to which, of course, must be added the flat rate tax of 7 per cent for married persons and 9 per cent for single persons. In addition to this we must add the 4 per cent surtax on investment income, since any income in excess of $100,000 is almost certain to be investment income in this country.

Therefore we have an effective top rate of tax of 96 per cent for married persons and 98 per cent for single persons. This leaves what for such persons will amount to only a token residual of 2 per cent or 4 per cent. The effect of these rates will be that while a married person with a $100,000 income, of which $30,000 is earned income, will be left with about $21,000, another having a total income of $500,000 will be left with about $37,000.

I have considered the suggestion that a maximum level should be set for net income after tax—that we should place a "roof," so to speak, on what a person may be allowed to retain, whatever his actual income may be. In the United States, where there is an awkward problem arising from the existence of large incomes from tax-exempt securities, there may be some special need for legislation of this character. In this country, however, there would be no substantial amount of revenue to be gained from imposing a 100 per cent top rate rather than the 98 per cent rate I am proposing. There may be some political allurement in the principle of establishing by legislation an absolute limit on personal incomes, instead of adhering to the principles of progressive taxation even though at very high rates. I can only say that there have been too many difficult and far-reaching decisions to be made in framing this budget for me to give any consideration to its political adornment.

I would estimate the yield of the present income tax, including national defence tax, for a full year at the present rates on the current level of incomes, at about $410 million. The increase in rates, and changes in exemptions, which are proposed would, I believe, yield an additional $115 million in a full year in the form of tax revenue proper. It would also impose a minimum savings requirement of about $250 million in addition, but we must expect a very substantial portion of this to be met by the alternative contractual forms of saving, leaving possibly $125 million as the yield of refundable taxes. I am not including this refundable tax with the estimates of revenue, however, as it is properly regarded as borrowing rather than revenue.

COLLECTION AT SOURCE

I mentioned that it was proposed to collect as much as possible of the new tax at the source or by a compulsory instalment plan.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

The instalment plans that have been in effect on a voluntary basis for the last two years have been welcomed by many, but they have been used by only a minority of taxpayers. With the higher rates now being put into effect, including the refundable portion of the tax, it is obvious that the income tax is something for which almost everyone subject to it must budget the year round. From the national point of view, it is necessary that these higher rates should be reflected in reduced spending power as soon as reasonably possible, and regularly thereafter rather than in fits and starts. Consequently it is proposed to commence in September of this year to deduct at the source as much as is practicable of the new income tax rates, including the refundable portion. It will not be administratively possible to deduct 100 per cent of the tax liability as is the case with the national defence tax in some cases, but we shall aim at something like 85 per cent or 90 per cent, leaving only a moderate remainder to be paid when the return is filed. During the first four months the deductions will not be on the full scale that will be in effect from January 1943 to August of that year, but will be at an intermediate level between that and the present national defence tax level, in order to give taxpayers an opportunity to adjust themselves to the change. As I have noted, the national defence tax deducted during the first 8 months of 1942 will be credited against the tax payable on 1942 incomes, and this will be reflected in the scale of the deductions, particularly in the first four months.

The actual details of the deduction plans remain to be worked out and are not provided for in the resolution that I am moving. In general, it is expected that employers will be asked to deduct specified amounts from employees of a specified family status within a specified earnings range. Thus, for example, it may be that for married employees without children earning between, say $33 and $36 per week, the employer will be asked to deduct, say, $5.50 a week to be forwarded to the income tax office and to be credited to the employee's tax liability and minimum savings requirements. Tables will have to be prepared showing the amounts to be deducted for various wage and salary ranges for single and married persons and so forth. It is believed that though the amounts to be deducted by employers will be much greater, the work of calculating and recording will not be greatly increased. Deductions will be based upon the income of the pay period against which they are made. It will be necessary for each taxpayer to meet any excess of his tax and savings liability over the amounts actually deducted during the twelve months of deductions or to claim a refund in case of over-deductions.

It will obviously not be possible to deduct the major part of the tax at the source on all forms of income. It is therefore proposed that those persons having incomes in such forms as are not subject to deduction at the source shall be required to pay their taxes and their minimum savings requirements on a compulsory instalment plan extending over the same period as the deductions from other incomes. For this purpose it will be necessary to provide for only four instalments rather than twelve in order to reduce the administrative work involved in such frequent payments.

The collection of most of the income tax at the source, beginning in September, and the compulsory use of the instalment plan of payment for those types of income where the tax is not deducted at the source, would have the effect of increasing the amount of income tax to be received in the current fiscal year, but this effect is offset by the fact that the national defence tax deducted during the first eight months of 1942 will apply toward the payment of the new total tax, and part of the revenue from these national defence tax deductions has already been taken into last year's accounts. As a consequence of the several factors affecting the time of payment, as well as the changes in rates and exemptions, it is estimated that we shall receive from income tax on individuals, including deductions for national defence tax, a total of $435 million in this fiscal year, which amounts to an increase of $45 million over the figure I gave a few minutes ago for the potential yield this year of income tax and national defence tax under the existing law. These figures do not include the portion of the tax which will be refundable; we might expect $140 million of refundable tax or minimum savings requirement during the fiscal year, but a large portion of this—we may say $70 million—is likely to be accounted for in the alternative forms of contractual saving.

There are some minor changes proposed in the personal income tax which I will mention only briefly. I am proposing that the age up to which children may normally be claimed as dependents should be reduced from the twenty-first birthday to the eighteenth birthday except in cases where the child is attending school or college. Under present circumstances all able-bodied persons of eighteen years of age or over should, I believe, be engaged in some useful work or service unless they are completing their education, and consequently children of this age should no longer be presumed to be dependent on their parents. Those dependent by reason of physical or mental infirmity will, of course, continue to be regarded as dependent for the purpose of income tax, irrespective of age.

For those at the other end of their working lives I am proposing some alleviation by providing that anyone over the age of 65 years shall not be liable for the minimum savings requirement, if their incomes do not exceed $3,000 per year. Old persons with small incomes cannot reasonably be forced to save a substantial amount for a future which they may not live to enjoy. I would hope, however, that a large proportion of those entitled to this exemption will choose not to avail themselves of it, or to save even more in other forms, so that they may share with their younger compatriots the burdens of these historic years.

WAR SERVICE PENSIONS

In addition to the changes in the rate structure and the other proposals which I have just mentioned there are several other items which are of general interest. I am pleased to announce that I am going to recommend to the house an exemption from all taxes under the Income War Tax Act in respect of war service pensions, regardless of whether they arise out of the past war or the present one. I feel sure that this will meet with a hearty response not only in the house but in the country as a whole.

OTHER INCOME TAX CHANGES

Legislation will be introduced to prevent tax avoidance in certain directions. For example, it is proposed that income received from oil or gas wells organized on the so-called royalty basis shall be deemed to be income received by the person or persons actually operating the oil or gas wells on behalf of the royalty holders and taxed at that point. Also, when property is sold on an instalment basis the capital payments shall be deemed to include interest at a reasonable rate in cases where there is no interest provided for or where the interest provided for is unduly low.

Our tax on non-residents which now applies to interest, dividends, rents, royalties and certain other income will be extended to cover salaries and annuities. This will bring our tax on non-residents more nearly into line with those imposed by other governments on our citizens. At the same time I propose to remove the present limitation on the personal exemption applying to non-residents who but for this limitation would pay tax under our law on the same basis as residents. This provision, which will be on a reciprocal basis, will be of particular interest to persons who commute across our international border. Several other minor changes in the law will be introduced which I need not mention here but which will appear in the resolutions. Rates of tax in the gift tax schedule will be increased 3 per cent.

This concludes the section on proposals relating to personal income taxes. I wish to turn now to some proposals concerning the excess profits tax.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX

The excess profits tax as it was drafted in the budget of June, 1940, and revised in many details in last year's budget, has been appropriate to the period of expansion during the early years of the war. During this time it has produced substantial revenues for the treasury in a reasonably equitable manner. It has imposed a heavy tax on increases in profits. It has served to keep the over-all increase in profits of all corporations within moderate limits, so that the total of all profits has increased by only a small percentage from year to year despite the very much larger increases in the total of business carried on. At the same time it has permitted rapidly expanding businesses to retain a fraction of their increased profits in order to meet their requirements for additional working capital during this expansion period.

The time has now come when we can and should make the excess profits tax more severe The rate of expansion in business will now be much less than it has been heretofore. In the case of many civilian businesses the volume of their production or turn-over is likely to decline rather than expand. Even in the field of war production we are getting close to the levels of full capacity. Consequently, businesses in general no longer need to retain substantial amounts of their current profits for reinvestment in working capital and can afford to pay a large proportion to the treasury. Secondly, the machinery required to administer the excess profits tax has now been built up and is operating efficiently. We are, therefore, able to undertake changes in the tax which could not be readily undertaken when we did not have the administrative machinery to carry them out effectively. Finally, in the past year we have adopted a much more rigorous general economic policy, involving control over many forms of incomes as well as over production and distribution. This more rigorous economic policy makes appropriate the more rigorous excess profits tax.

I have given a good deal of consideration to various alternative means of increasing the excess profits tax. I believe that the increase should affect the tax on excess profits rather than on profits that have not increased substantially over pre-war levels. Already the tax on profits that have not increased is heavy when we bear in mind that those profits when distributed as dividends are subject to all the personal income taxes in addition to the corporation taxes. This involves, in effect, a discrimination against income earned in the form of corporate profits as distinct from other types of income, such as interest. Some discrimination may be justified, but I believe we have already gone far enough in that direction. Consequently, I propose to increase the rate of tax on excess profits but not the flat rate of tax which applies to profits generally.

In proposing this increase I think it important that we should not remove entirely the continuing, day to day, incentive for economy and efficiency in production. If that incentive were entirely removed by making the tax such that it would take the whole of any increase in profits, leaving no benefit to the producer, then we would be exposing ourselves to the danger of slackness and carelessness in regard to costs and efficiency. I am not suggesting that Canadian producers, or distributors for that matter, or those engaged in any other type of business would in any way sabotage our national effort at this time, but simply that the complete removal of the standard, by which business men are accustomed to determine whether expenditures are justifiable or not, might make them forget the minor economies and opportunities for increased efficiency which do not appear significant in themselves in relation to the national effort but which in the aggregate have very great importance. We cannot afford now to waste labour, materials or time. We need to preserve efficiency by every reasonable means at our disposal. Secondly, I believe that in making any change we should not deprive businesses of all chance to build up reserves for the post-war period. Some reserves will be needed if business is to press ahead actively after the war with the conversion of its operations from war purposes to peace purposes, to modernize its plant and thereby place itself in the best position to provide employment in the post-war period. Thirdly, we must beware of making too severe an instrument of taxation that can never be perfectly fair and equitable, however much we endeavour to provide for various types of cases and situations. If we had a tax that was extremely severe in its treatment of so-called excess profits, yet something short of perfect in determining standard profits, we should be continually tempted to make special allowances of one kind or another to temper its severity in hard cases in an endeavour to be equitable and these would be apt to add up in total to a tax that was far less severe than was intended.

On the other hand our need for funds at the present time is very pressing, as I have already emphasized in connection with the personal income taxes. We must obtain every dollar that we can. Moreover, it is desirable at the present time not to permit those who have substantially increased profits to disperse them in higher current dividends since this would be directly contrary to the government's policy of stabilizing incomes. Any increase in profits would better be reserved to enable the business to play an active part in post-war reconstruction.

Balancing these various considerations I have decided to propose that the rate of tax on excess profits be raised from 75 per cent to 100 per cent, and, at the same time, that provision be made for refunding after the war 20 per cent of the excess profits taken, over the range where this 100 per cent rate is effective.

I am also proposing another more complicated change which is less spectacular but serves to increase the effective rate of tax very substantially on businesses whose profits have increased significantly over pre-war levels. Let me remind the house that under the present act a corporate taxpayer pays an 18 per cent corporation income tax on all of its profits and then under the Excess Profits Tax Act pays either (a) 75 per cent of the excess profits over standard profits after deducting the corporation income tax paid on this excess or (b) 22 per cent of its total profits, whichever is the greater. I am now proposing that under the Excess Profits Tax Act a company shall pay a flat rate of 12 per cent on its total profits in addition to the 18 per cent corporation income tax, and then shall pay as well either 10 per cent of its total profits or 100 per cent of its excess profits after deduction of the corporation income tax and the 12 per cent rate thereon, whichever is the greater. In effect, therefore, I am taking the 22 per cent in the present act and splitting it into 12 per cent to apply to total profits in any event, and 10 per cent to apply as an alternative where that is greater than the amount produced by the rate on excess profits. The effect of this change, which may appear inconsequential at first sight, is to increase substantially the tax liability of all those whose profits have increased by more than one-sixth of their standard profits.

The amount to be refunded to those corporations which are subject to the 100 per cent rate on excess profits will be 20 per cent of the amount of profits in excess of the amount at which the 100 per cent tax on the excess after the deduction of corporation income tax and the 12 per cent flat rate equals the 10 per cent tax on the total profit. This rather complicated provision results in the 20 per cent refund applying only where the 100 per cent rate effectively applies on any additional profits. The amount to be refunded will not bear interest but will be returned unconditionally to the taxpayer after the war, provided only that his tax liabilities have been paid.

The result of these changes in the rate structure of the excess profits tax will be that no corporation will be permitted to retain more than 70 per cent of its pre-war standard profits, though it will be given the opportunity to earn a post-war credit through economies and efficiencies and increased production that enable it to earn higher profits before tax. This limitation on the amount of profits which may be retained may eventually require some corporations whose profits or dividends have increased substantially in recent years to reduce their current rates of dividends. If certain reductions of dividends should be required by the measure I am proposing I do not believe it will be too much of a burden to place on these corporations or their shareholders at this critical time. The amount of tax which will be refunded will not be lost to the corporation but will enable it to safeguard its post-war position and to make itself ready to take part in the important work of reconstruction.

Because these changes impose a 100 per cent rate on many corporations and because in many cases available earnings have already been disposed of, I have decided that it would be impossible to make it retroactive. Consequently, these new rates of excess profits tax will apply as from the 1st of July onwards. In order to ensure that the taxes payable under this act and by corporations under the Income War Tax Act are remitted at as early a date as possible to the treasury it is proposed to require monthly instalment payments on account of the tax liability, including the refundable portion. The payments made before the end of the fiscal period of the business will have to be based upon anticipated earnings or earnings in the preceding period. The result of this change in timing will mean a very substantial increase in the amount of revenues to be obtained from the excess profits tax during the current fiscal year.

Certain other amendments to the Excess Profits Tax Act will be brought in. For example, the tax exemption designed to encourage mineral production which previously was obtained in the Income War Tax Act will be transferred to the Excess Profits Tax Act. The house may recall that the present exemption expires December 31, 1942. It is proposed that a generally similar exemption shall be granted under the Excess Profits Tax Act where the tax relief is greater rather than under the Income War Tax Act. The new exemption will apply to producers of base metals and strategic minerals. This exemption may be regarded as complementary to the measure of assistance being granted under the Income War Tax Act which encourages the search for these minerals.

In the interests of achieving greater equity in our taxes on business enterprises which now of necessity are at such very high levels, I propose to allow in future a one-year carry-forward of losses. This will apply in the case of corporations to both income and excess profits tax and in the case of sole proprietorships and partnerships to excess profits tax.

The law at present gives complete exemption to small businesses with profits of $5,000 or less. Under a proposed amendment this exemption will be withdrawn in respect of the new 12 per cent flat rate which applies generally to total profits of corporations. Other changes of a technical nature which I need not explain here will be found in the resolutions.

I have already given an estimate of $275 million as the yield in this fiscal year of the excess profits tax if there were to be no changes made in it. This revenue would be largely derived from the tax on profits earned in 1941. The introduction of the compulsory instalment plan for the payment of this tax will increase substantially the revenue to be expected from it during this fiscal year from taxes on income earned during 1942. Excluding the effects of the changes in rates, this increase would be about $145 million. The changes in the rates of the excess profits tax which I am proposing would, it is estimated, yield an increase in revenue of about $58 million on the basis of a full year's application with profits at their current levels. Because of the instalment plan, we shall get some of this increase during the current fiscal year, and allowing for the fact that the changes go into effect from July 1, it is estimated that the amount will be about $20 million. In addition to these amounts of actual revenue, the amount we shall receive in the form of refundable tax under the excess profits tax is estimated at about $60 million on the basis of a full year's application with profits at current levels, of which we may anticipate receipts of about $25 million during the current fiscal year.

The application of the instalment plan to the corporation income tax will bring about an increase in revenues from that tax during the present fiscal year, even though the rates are not changed at all. It is estimated this will amount to $105 million.

In the Succession Duty Act there will be few significant changes. The rate structure will not be altered. As a matter of general interest, however, I may call attention to the new form of exemption which will allow charitable gifts up to one-half the estate to pass entirely tax free where previously the duty was one-half the ordinary rate. It is also proposed to offer exemption on a reciprocal basis to representatives of foreign governments. Certain other minor changes will be made with a view to clarifying the law and assisting in its administration.

INDIRECT TAXES

I come now to indirect taxes. I would remind the house that, in the three previous war budgets, we have made a highly selective approach to indirect taxes. We have attempted to collect revenues on specific expenditures rather than on all expenditures. Remembering that we already had an 8 per cent sales tax at the outbreak of war, we have avoided, since the first war budget, except in last year's increase in the sugar tax, indirect taxes which would raise the cost of the necessaries of life. The imposition of the price ceiling has added conclusively to the weight of argument against general rather than selective increases in consumption taxes. I propose to follow again, therefore, a selective approach and recommend substantial increases in taxes which fall on luxury expenditures. It is hoped that these taxes will discourage such expenditure. To the extent that they do, current savings will be increased. To the extent that such expenditures persist, the treasury will benefit from the revenue.

The excise duties on alcoholic beverages have already been increased substantially since the outbreak of war, but the record of sales leads me to conclude that further large increases can again be made. I shall recommend that the excise duty on spirits, which was increased from $4 to $7 a gallon in September, 1939, be raised to $9 and that on Canadian brandy from $6 to $7. The pre-war excise duty on malt was 6 cents a pound and was increased to 10 cents in September, 1939, and to 12 cents in April, 1941. My recommendation is that it be now increased to 16 cents a pound and that corresponding increases be imposed on malt syrup and on beer imported as such. It is proposed that the excise tax on wines be raised from 40 to 50 cents and on sparkling wines from $2 to $2.50 per gallon. It is anticipated that these changes will result in an increase of revenue of $11,650,000 in this fiscal year and $15,600,000 in a full year.

It is recognized that the provinces, as well as the dominion, derive revenue from the taxation or sale of alcoholic beverages. They have also the responsibility for regulation of the sale. If the tax increase here proposed should seem likely to affect their revenues they have it in their own power to raise their prices or taxes. The purpose of these increases is to provide additional revenue for the dominion at the expense of the consumer, not to make inroads on provincial revenues.

Sales of cigarettes, now taxed at $6 per thousand, have increased very rapidly despite war-time increases in excise duties of 50 per cent. It is proposed, therefore, to amend the Special War Revenue Act to provide for an additional excise tax of one cent for each five cigarettes or fraction thereof contained in any package. Relative to cigarettes, smoking tobacco has been less highly taxed. While not seeking to equalize the rates, I propose an additional tax of one cent per ounce on manufactured tobacco. It will be recommended further that the rate on raw leaf tobacco be raised from 10 to 20 cents a pound. It will be recommended also that the tax on cigars be increased by 25 per cent, the tax on cigarette papers be increased from 5 cents to 6 cents per 100 and that on cigarette tubes be raised from 10 cents to 12 cents per hundred. It is estimated that these increases on tobacco, in its various forms and uses, will produce additional revenue of $17,205,000 in the fiscal year and $22,950,000 in the full year.

I shall recommend that a number of excise taxes be increased and that some new taxes be imposed. The increases proposed are briefly as follows: On soft drinks, of which the supply is at present inadequate to meet the demand, a specific tax of 1 cent a bottle in addition to the present 25 per cent tax; on carbonic acid gas, a corresponding increase from 25 cents to 50 cents a pound; on playing cards, an increase from 15 cents to 20 cents a pack; on passenger transportation, a rise from 10 per cent to 15 per cent with the exemption limit raised from 50 to 75 cents; on berths, from 10 per cent to 15 per cent with a minimum tax of 35 cents, and on parlour-car seats, from 10 cents to 15 cents; on long distance telephone calls an advance from 10 per cent to 15 per cent with a corresponding adjustment of the rates on pay-station calls, the maximum tax being limited to 75 cents; and on telegrams, cables and radiograms an increase from 5 cents to 7 cents per message. On furs, which are at present subject to sales tax at 12 per cent, it is proposed to advance the rate to 25 per cent and change the form of tax from a sales tax to an excise tax.

I shall propose new excise taxes to be levied, at the manufacturer's level, on candy and chewing gum at a rate of 30 per cent and photographic films and plates, except for industrial and professional use, at the rate now imposed on cameras, 25 per cent. I shall further recommend a new tax of 25 cents per month on telephone extensions in private households. The treasury will be glad to have the revenue but, if anyone chooses to discontinue their use of such extensions, the telephone companies will be glad to have the instruments.

It was my opinion, at the time of the last budget, that expenditures in dance halls and cabarets were a proper occasion for taxation, but I was unable at that time to find a suitable formula. I shall recommend that a tax of 20 per cent be collected on all expenditures in dance halls, night clubs, cabarets and other such establishments which combine any two of the following features: provision for dancing by the patrons, the sale of alcoholic beverages, the offering of musical or other entertainment by paid performers. This tax is to be payable by excise stamps affixed to the bill or account which must be rendered by the proprietor to the patron. It is proposed that this tax take effect on July 1 next.

I shall recommend also that excise taxes be levied on the retail purchases of certain luxury articles. The tax of 25 per cent of the retail price is to be accounted for by the affixing of excise stamps to the bill, cash slip or the article itself. The articles, on the retail price of which it is recommended that this tax be applied, are (1) articles of personal luggage, brief cases, jewel cases, purses, handbags, sports bags, etc., with an exemption of articles selling for $1 or less; (2) diamonds, jewellery and imitation jewellery and all goldsmiths' and silversmiths' products, articles of ivory, jet, amber, mother-of-pearl, etc., with exemption of articles selling for 50 cents or less; (3) articles of cut glass or crystal, articles selling for 50 cents or less being exempt; (4) articles of china, porcelain, stoneware, etc., except such articles for use in the preparation or serving of food or drink, the 50 cent exemption also applying to this category; (5) clocks and watches; (6) ash trays, tobacco pipes, cigar and cigarette holders, and cigarette rolling devices and other smokers' accessories; (7) fountain pens, propelling pencils, desk sets and desk accessories. In respect of the last three groups of articles the tax will not apply to articles selling for $1 or less.

I am sure that the house will agree that these excise taxes will fall on articles which it is not essential to purchase in war time and that they will fall almost wholly on persons who make unnecessary expenditures, and thus give evidence that they are in a position to contribute to the revenues of the country. I expect that the increases in excise taxes will produce additional revenue in the fiscal year of $20,995,000 and $28,025,000 in the full year.

In the case of taxes on commodities and services which are levied on the retail price and paid by the consumer or patron when his bill is paid, the tax will be stated separately from the price and will be deemed not to be part of the price for the purposes of the maximum prices regulations. Of the commodities on which new or increased taxes are assessed on the manufacturers' price it may be noted that furs are exempt from the maximum prices regulations, as are also sales of alcoholic beverages by provincial liquor boards. The other commodities affected are subject to the maximum prices regulations, viz., alcoholic beverages sold otherwise, cigarettes and tobacco, cigarette papers and tubes, candy and chewing gum, photographic films and plates, soft drinks and playing cards. On cigarettes and tobacco, the new taxes are separately stated and will be so indicated by stamps on the packages. The tax will not be considered part of the price for purposes of the maximum prices regulations. In respect of the other commodities, the wartime prices and trade board will permit such adjustments as are necessary and equitable.

Expenditures on one commodity and one service affected by tax increases, cigarettes and passenger transportation, are included in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics cost of living index. That index has since the institution of price and income control acquired an importance which it did not previously have. It is calculated by precisely the same methods that have been used since its inception. No considerations of policy or expediency can be permitted to affect it. However, these tax increases will be separately stated and clearly identifiable as taxes on the consumer. I propose that in the case of cigarettes which, desirable as they may be in other circumstances, are clearly not necessaries of life for the population as a whole, the new tax shall not be deemed part of the price for the calculation of the cost of living index.

In announcing the offer to provincial governments regarding tax agreements last year, I stated that if certain taxes were given up by the provinces it was possible that the dominion, in order to prevent certain classes of companies from benefiting by the change, might impose special taxes in these directions. On reviewing the situation, it has been decided to levy a tax of 2 per cent on premiums paid on life, fire and casualty insurance, in addition to the taxes we at present impose which are confined to fire and casualty insurance. In the case of other classes of companies it was found that the increase in dominion taxes on profits more than offset the special taxes which they had been paying to the provinces and accordingly no special taxes by the dominion are necessary. Since the taxes collected in this fiscal year will cover both 1941 and 1942 the revenue in the fiscal year should be $13 million or double the annual yield.

The changes proposed in the customs tariff provide for a number of tariff reductions and amend the wording of several items to facilitate administration. The resolutions about to be tabled affect twenty-five items and also provide for increased additional duties on imports of alcoholic beverages. The changes being made in these additional duties equalize the increases being made on the same commodities under the Excise Act. The existing excise duty on beer is being removed from the schedule to the Excise Act and replaced by a gallonage tax in the customs tariff.

New duty free items are being provided to cover machinery and apparatus for operating oil sands by mining operations and for extracting oil from the sands so mined, fuel injection pumps and nozzles for diesel and semi-diesel engines, magnesium scrap and crude cotton seed oil for canning fish.

Additions to existing items provide for reduced rates on semi-finished piston castings of any material, parts of saggers, glass tubing for use in the manufacture of vials and ampoules, especially designed pins for marking systems, unbraided wick for the manufacture of wax candles or tapers, belting, non-elastic woven fabrics for the manufacture of abdominal supporters and spinal braces, mouthpieces and wood bowls for the manufacture of tobacco pipes.

The wording is being amended to facilitate the administration of the items covering parts for use in the manufacture of motor trucks, motor buses, motor truck bodies, motor bus bodies, prepared or preserved vegetables, blended orange and grapefruit juice, silicate of soda and resin or rosin.

This completes the tax changes which I am recommending and I shall put on Hansard two tables, one showing the estimated increases in revenue which are expected in the remainder of this fiscal year and in a full year from the new and increased taxes, and the other showing the full revenue estimates for the present fiscal year after giving effect to all the changes and tax rates and time of payment:

CONCLUSION

If our estimates of the yields of new and increased taxes during the balance of the current fiscal year are reasonably correct, the dominion's total revenues for 1942-43 should be approximately $2,050 million. With expenditures of $3,900 million, this leaves a budgetary deficit of $1,850 million which will have to be covered by borrowing. On these estimates, we shall have paid somewhat more than 52 per cent of our expenditures out of revenue.

The enactment of the budget proposals will provide for the collection in 1942-43 of additional sums to be refunded after the war and which it is estimated will amount to $95 million.

This will leave for other methods of financing $1,755 million. I shall put a brief tabular statement on Hansard to summarize these calculations in convenient form:

Fiscal Year 1942-43

Estimated total expenditure	$3,900,000,000
Estimated ordinary revenue	2,050,000,000
Budgetary deficit	1,850,000,000
Estimated refundable taxes	95,000,000
Amount to be met by decline in cash and by borrowing	1,755,000,000

After making full allowance for some reduction in our cash balances which were unusually large at the beginning of this year, for moneys available for investment from the Unemployment Insurance Fund and other special government accounts and for subscriptions from insurance and trust companies and other corporate investors, it is apparent that the balance which should be provided by individual purchases of war savings certificates and bonds is very large, perhaps as much as two-thirds of the total.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

No great fraction of this can be provided by individuals with incomes of more than $3,000 or $4,000. Individually they must do their share but the total of their subscriptions will be limited by the smallness of their numbers. It must be provided by people of lower incomes especially those in families whose incomes have increased during the war.

Now, the house will understand what I meant when I said that I was not proposing to substitute compulsory savings for voluntary savings. The refundable tax and other provisions which I am recommending are merely to equalize the base from which voluntary savings start. Subscriptions to victory loans and war savings certificates indicate that the current savings of individuals for the purchase of government securities are certainly not in excess of $12 million a week and may be somewhat lower. Over and above the higher taxes, over and above the minimum savings requirement, these current savings must not only be increased; they must be increased greatly if we are to finance this war the sane and the equitable way, if those of us who are not in armed forces are to demonstrate that, as a democracy, we are capable of meeting the stern tests of war as we expect those who dare physical destruction to meet far sterner tests.

Will this mean a reduction in our standard of living? Certainly. The war will not be won by disputing as to whether labour or agriculture or employer or employee should get a larger share of a swollen national income. It will be won, not alone by the valour of fighting forces and the skill of generals but by the willingness of the people at home to make necessary sacrifices—willingness to make those sacrifices first and not after all other groups have made them.

I am asking that there should be by every individual the most rigorous economy. Every dollar we spend means that someone is working for us. Let us not spend it if that someone might instead be working for victory. I am not asking that anyone's standard of living should be reduced below the level of personal efficiency and decency. I am asking that it should be no higher than that level. Let us compete with our neighbours, in saving, not spending; in making shift with what clothing and house furnishings we have, not in buying more; in hard work and plain and thrifty living.

All this has an immediate and necessary purpose. All the equipment, materials and labour that we can possibly spare must be used in this bitter conflict for victory. It has a further purpose which gives hope for the future. The savings that we make now will be available after the war. We can then replenish our wardrobes and build our houses and take more leisure, knowing that not only will we be increasing the comfort and vitality of our families but providing work and pay for thousands of people who will come out of the armed services and war industries and earn their livelihoods once more in civilian industry. By all means let us have a new world after the war. It will not come from speeches and laws. We must work and save for it and for victory now.

The National War Finance Committee is engaged in the development of an organization in each province which will undertake a continuous campaign for the regular sale of bonds, war savings cerificates and stamps to the public throughout the entire year, supplemented from time to time, by special campaigns. I bespeak for them every dollar of savings that can be made and the active help of everyone in their campaign.

I should like to say a word to the business men who operate large and small businesses throughout this country. A big part of the earnings of business must during the war flow into the treasury. That is not because it is government policy to penalize business enterprise but because so large a part of all our incomes and all our work must go to winning this war. I realize fully that where most of the profits are absorbed by taxes it is difficult to be as vigilant in watching costs as when $1 of expense saved is $1 added to profits and the mark of a well-run business. Nevertheless it is imperative that business men should be vigilant also in the national interest. Let no one have it on his conscience that he took man-power for unnecessary work, that he permitted cost increases which could have been avoided. For business too there is a longer view. Industry is going through a tremendous conversion to war production. When victory is achieved, it will have another great job of conversion to do. It must be prepared to serve again the civilian population, perhaps with many new and different products. It is the business interest and the nation's interest that men of business come to that task with costs that have been kept rigorously under control and with funds available for reequipping and restocking their plants and shops. The refundable portion of the excess profits tax will be available for that adjustment but it will be of less than its full value if business ends the war with highly inflated costs.

This, Mr. Speaker, concludes my presentation of the budget. The proposed tax increases are substantial and severe. They are imposed on the assumption that Canadians appreciate the critical gravity of recent events and the necessity of making a supreme effort in the present year. A few weeks ago, the atmosphere was surcharged with optimism which in many of its manifestations was almost lighthearted. The war would be over by January; the tide had turned; Germany was facing internal collapse; Japan had overextended herself; Italy was a joke; and so forth. More and more Canadians were putting forward demands for their own material betterments, and increasing numbers were transferring their interest from war to post-war problems.

The events of the last few days must surely have had a sobering effect. This is no time for airy overconfidence. Events in China, events in the Ukraine, events in the Crimea, events in Libya—do not these convince us that the war may not be won this year, may not be won for many years? It was not recklessly that Germany and Japan brought the United States into the war, as they did. What foolish statements we have made! Not long ago, how often was it said that Hitler was a madman, irrationally running headlong to destruction, that Japan was committing hara-kiri! Alas, there seems to have been nothing irrational—certainly nothing intentionally suicidal about the plans of our enemies. These aggressor nations prodded the United States into the war because they were convinced that they could, nevertheless, win—win in 1942. Do Canadians realize how critical the situation is at this moment in Russia, in China, and in the middle east, and how critical it may be elsewhere before long? I believe that now they do and that their individual desires for gain, and ease, and advantage are submerged in the nation's will to win. In this belief, I present this budget to the house and to the Canadian people.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Speaker, I desire to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That the rates of tax applicable to persons other than corporations and joint stock companies shall be increased to the rates set forth in the following schedule:

A. Rates of tax applicable to persons other than corporations and joint stock companies:

I. Normal tax—

(1) In the case of

(a) a married person,

(b) a widow or widower with a son or daughter under eighteen years of age and wholly dependent upon such taxpayer for support, or a son or daughter eighteen years of age or over and dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity, or a son or daughter under twenty-one years of age who is dependent upon such parent for support on proof that such child is a student at secondary school, university, or other educational institution;

(c) an individual, other than a married person, who maintains a self-contained domestic establishment and who actually supports therein a person wholly dependent upon him and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption;

(d) a minister or clergyman, other than a married person, in charge of a diocese, parish or congregation, whose duties require him to maintain at his own and sole expense, a self-contained domestic establishment and who employs therein on full time a housekeeper or servant;

Provided, in the case of (a), the spouse, and in case of (b), the said dependent, is resident in Canada or in any other part of the territory of the British Commonwealth of Nations, or in a country contiguous to Canada, or is a national or citizen of a country allied with Canada in the present war and is prevented from entry into Canada due to the exigencies of the war, or is legally debarred from entry into Canada;

Seven per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $1,200 per year;

And in the case of

(e) a husband and wife having each a separate income,

Seven per centum of the income of each, if the income of each exceeds $660 per year;

And in the case of

(f) a single person, or

(g) a married person whose spouse is not resident in Canada or in any other part of the territory of the British Commonwealth of Nations, or in a country contiguous to Canada or in a country allied with Canada in the present war, or whose spouse is not legally debarred from entry into Canada,

Seven per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $660 but does not exceed $1,800 per year;

Eight per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $1,800 but does not exceed $3,000 per year; and

Nine per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $3,000 per year.

And in the case of

(h) Estates having income taxable as provided by subsections 2 and 4 of section 11 of this act;

Nine per centum of the income.

(2) From the Normal Tax there shall be allowed a deduction of $28 for the year 1942 and for each year thereafter for each of the following persons who is resident in Canada or in any other part of the territory of the British Commonwealth of Nations or in a country contiguous to Canada or in a country allied with Canada in the present war or who is legally debarred from entry into Canada, and wholly dependent upon the taxpayer for support, namely

(i) a child, grandchild, brother or sister of the taxpayer under eighteen years of age, or if eighteen years of age or over, is wholly dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity, or under twenty-one years of age on proof that such child is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution;

(ii) a parent or grandparent of a taxpayer, wholly dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity;

(iii) a child under eighteen years of age maintained by the taxpayer in Canada under a cooperative scheme sponsored by the governments of the United Kingdom and of Canada or any of the provinces of Canada, for children brought from the United Kingdom under a government plan, or under twenty-one years of age, and likewise maintained, upon proof that such child is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution; except one such dependent provided for in (b) and (c) of subparagraph (1) hereof;

(3) If the tax exigible under the Normal Tax should cause the income of a single person or a husband or a wife to be reduced below the amount of $660 or in the case of those persons referred to in (a), (b), (c) and (d) of subparagraph (1) hereof, below $1,200, then to the extent that it would so reduce the income of the taxpayer, such tax shall not be payable.

II. Graduated Rates of Tax:

In addition to the Normal Tax there shall be imposed in respect of the income above the exemption hereinafter provided, the following:

On the first $500 of income or any portion thereof, 30 per centum per annum, or

$150 upon the income of $500; and 33 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $500 and does not exceed $1,000; or

$315 upon income of $1,000; and 37 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $2,000; or

$6,225 upon income of $13,000; and 60 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $13,000 and does not exceed $20,000; or

$16,925 upon income of $30,000; and 70 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $50,000; or

$45,925 upon income of $70,000; and 80 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $70,000 and does not exceed $100,000; or

$69,925 upon income of $100,000; and 85 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000.

2. That the exemptions of $1,500 and $750 shall be reduced for the purposes of the Graduated Rates to $660 for all persons;

3. That a married person, or a person heretofore entitled to an exemption equivalent to that of a married person, shall be allowed as a deduction from the tax payable under the Graduated Rates, an amount of $150;

4. That in lieu of the deduction of $400 from income for each dependent child or grandchild there shall be allowed a deduction of $80 from the tax payable under the Graduated Rates;

5. That a deduction from the tax payable under the Graduated Rates be allowed a taxpayer to the extent of 20 per centum of the amount actually contributed for the support of a dependent parent or grandparent, or a brother or sister under eighteen years of age or eighteen years of age or over and dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity, or under twenty-one years of age, upon proof that such brother or sister is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution: provided that the maximum credit herein shall not exceed $80.

6. That one-half of the total taxes payable by a taxpayer under the Normal Rate of tax and the Graduated Rates of tax shall be refundable to a taxpayer provided, however, that such refund shall not exceed

8 per centum of the income of a single person, or $800, whichever is the lesser; or

10 per centum of the income of a married person, or $1,000, whichever is the lesser; plus

1 per centum of the taxpayer's income for each dependent, or $100, whichever is the lesser;

7. (1) That the total taxes payable by any taxpayer under the Normal Rate of tax and the Graduated Rates of tax shall be reduced by the amount paid by the taxpayer in respect of

(a) payments into any approved superannuation, retirement or pension fund or plan, paid as a term of employment and not repayable during the continuance of such employment;

(b) premiums on life insurance policies in force prior to the twenty-third day of June, 1942;

(c) principal payments on a mortgage on one residential property, provided such mortgage was registered and in effect prior to the twenty-third day of June, 1942;

Provided, however, that such reductions shall not exceed the amount of the refundable portion of the tax as provided for in resolution 6 above; and the said refundable portion shall be reduced accordingly;

(2) That in the case of a taxpayer over sixty-five years of age with income less than three thousand dollars, the total taxes payable under the Normal Rate of tax and the Graduated Rates of tax shall be reduced by the refundable portion of the tax as provided for in resolution 6 above, and the said refundable portion shall be eliminated accordingly;

8. That the refundable portion of any tax exigible under any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be repaid to the taxpayer or to his legal representatives, after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan, and in the following manner: The refundable portion of the tax in respect of income of 1942 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the Governor in Council may determine but not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities; the refundable portion of the tax in respect of the income of 1943 shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the Governor in Council may determine but not later than the end of the third fiscal year of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities and so on in respect of the refundable portion of the tax on income of successive years.

The date of the cessation of hostilities shall be deemed to be the date of a proclamation issued under the authority of the Governor in Council declaring that, for the purposes of the said refund, the war no longer exists.

9. That the refundable portion of any tax paid by the taxpayer in the twelve months preceding the first day of September in any year shall bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent from that date and shall be payable when the refundable portion is repaid;

10. That where, under any existing or future contract or arrangement, a capital or principal sum is payable by instalments or otherwise, without providing for interest, or with interest at a nominal rate only, the Minister in his sole discretion may by regulation or otherwise determine what part of the capital payment represents interest, which shall be deemed to be income for the purposes of this act;

11. That where any royalty company, association, or other body is organized for the purpose of drilling for and operating oil or gas wells whereby the production belongs not to the company but to the investors in the property, the production shall be deemed to be for and on behalf of the company and the income of the company shall be deemed to include the proceeds secured from the sale of the said oil or gas, less necessary expenses;

12. That any pension granted to any member of His Majesty's military, naval or air forces or to any member of the military, naval or air forces of His Majesty's allies, for any disability suffered on active war service by the pensioner or any pension granted to any dependent relative of any person who was killed or suffered any disability while on active war service in the said forces, shall be exempt from taxation;

13. That any amount received as compensation, other than compensation for loss of time, under any Workmen's Compensation legislation of any of the provinces of Canada in respect of any injury or disability incurred or in respect of any death, shall be exempt from taxation;

14. That any employer may deduct as an expense an amount up to 5 per centum of his pay roll, under limitations to be prescribed, paid as contributions to any employees' superannuation or pension fund or plan, excluding therefrom, however, portions in respect of salaries over $6,000 per annum;

15. That a taxpayer shall be allowed a deduction from income in respect of medical expenses in excess of 5 per centum of the income of such taxpayer, incurred and paid by such taxpayer in the taxation year, or paid in the taxation year and incurred within one year prior to the date of payment if such payment is made to any qualified medical practitioner, dentist, or nurse, registered under any Dominion or Provincial legislation or regulation, or public or provincially licensed private hospital, in respect of any birth in the family of, illness or operation upon, the taxpayer or his spouse, or any person dependent upon the taxpayer, in respect of whom the taxpayer would heretofore have been entitled to an exemption and if the said dependent is resident in Canada, provided that the allowance in any taxation year shall not exceed the sum of

(a) $400 in the case of a single person without dependents, or

(b) $600 in the case of a married person or a person entitled to an equivalent allowance to that of a married person; plus

$100 in respect of each additional person (not exceeding four) dependent upon the taxpayer for support;

Provided, however, that the maximum deduction hereunder shall not exceed $1,000; and provided further that the said amounts are substantiated by receipts and that such receipts are lodged with and at the time of filing the taxpayer's income tax return;

16. That the revenue losses in any business, of the immediately preceding year, may be allowed as a deduction.

17. That contributions not exceeding $500 to any one registered prospecting syndicate searching for base metals or strategic minerals, but not exceeding $5,000 in the aggregate, and payments not exceeding $5,000 by any corporation in respect of its own prospecting expenses for similar minerals, may be allowed as a deduction from the income of any taxpayer, provided that the tax saving under this act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, shall not exceed 40 per centum thereof in each case;

18. That the deduction provided for by section 7 of the said Act under which a taxpayer is entitled to deduct from tax the amount paid under part III of the Special War Revenue Act, be repealed;

19. That salary and other periodic payments payable to non-residents of Canada who are residents of a country which imposes a tax of a similar nature shall be subject to a tax of 15 per centum at the source;

20. That the tax payable by all persons other than corporations shall be paid by quarterly instalments during the six months immediately prior to the close of the calendar year and the six months immediately subsequent to the close of the calendar year

(a) as to the six months, July to December, one-quarter of the estimated tax on or before the 15th day of September and the 15th day of December each year, having regard to the previous year's income and applying the current year's rates, and

(b) as to the six months, January to June, one-half of the tax (after deducting therefrom the previous two quarterly payments) on or before the 15th day of March and the 15th day of June each year, having regard to the income and applying the rates of the taxation year.

This shall be applicable to the tax on income of the calendar year 1942 and each year thereafter.

Any additional tax found due over that estimated or declared by the taxpayer shall be paid immediately upon assessment, together with interest at 5 per centum after four months from the close of the calendar year.

This instalment method of payment shall not apply to persons whose tax is being deducted at the source in respect of salary or wages, and whose salary or wage constitutes three-quarters or more of his income;

21. That the tax payable by a corporation shall be paid by monthly instalments during the six months immediately prior to the close of its fiscal period and the six months immediately subsequent to the close of its fiscal period

(a) as to the first six months, one-twelfth of the estimated tax, having regard to the previous or anticipated current year's income, applying the current year's rates, and

(b) as to the second six months, one-sixth of the tax after deducting therefrom the previous six months' payments having regard to the income, and applying the rates of the taxation year.

This shall be applicable to the tax on profits of fiscal periods ending on and after 31st December, 1942.

Any additional tax found due over that estimated or declared by the taxpayer shall be paid immediately upon assessment, together with interest at 5 per centum, after four months from the close of the fiscal period;

22. That the schedule of rates of tax on gifts in section 88 of the said act be repealed and in lieu thereof there be substituted the following schedule, to apply to gifts made after June 23, 1942:

23. That provisions relating to the collection of National Defence Tax be repealed as of midnight of the 31st August, 1942;

24. That commencing after the 31st day of August, 1942, all dividends and registered interest paid by any debtor to residents of Canada shall be subject to a deduction at the source at the rate of 7 per centum;

25. That commencing after the 31st day of August, 1942, all salaries and wages paid by any employer to residents of, or persons employed in, Canada shall be subject to a deduction at the source of such portions of the taxes authorized herein as may be determined hereafter by the Governor in Council;

26. That any enactments founded on

(a) Resolutions 1 to 15 inclusive, 20 and 21 shall be applicable to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods;

(b) Resolution 16 shall be applicable to the income of 1943 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

(c) Resolution 17 shall be applicable only to the income of the 1942 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein;

(d) Resolution 18 shall be applicable to the income of the 1941 taxation period and fiscal periods ending therein and all subsequent periods;

(e) Resolution 19 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 24th day of June, 1942, and shall be applicable to all payments made on and after the said date.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide—

1. That the rates of tax as set out in the Second Schedule to the said Act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"First part—

Ten per centum of the profits of corporations and joint stock companies and fifteen per centum of the profits of all persons other than corporations, before deduction therefrom of any tax paid thereon under the Income War Tax Act.

"Second part—

One hundred per centum of the excess profits.

"Third part—

Twelve per centum of profits of corporations and joint stock companies before deduction therefrom of any tax paid thereon under the Income War Tax Act."

2. That in computing the amount of excess profits subject to the tax of one hundred per centum, corporations be allowed to deduct such portion of the income tax and the tax payable under the Third Part of the Second Schedule to the Excess Profits Tax Act as the excess profits bear to the total profits.

3. That the exemption from excess profits tax of corporations with profits not in excess of five thousand dollars be limited to an exemption from the tax under the First Part or the Second Part of the Second Schedule but that such corporations be subject to the tax under the Third Part of the Second Schedule, namely, a tax of twelve per centum of profits.

4. That there shall be refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with paragraph five of these resolutions an amount equal to twenty per centum of the profits above the point at which the tax calculated under the First Part of the Second Schedule is equal to the tax calculated under the Second Part of the Second Schedule. provided that the said profits have been paid by way of taxes under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, to the Receiver General of Canada.

5. That the refundable portion of any tax exigible under any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be repaid to the taxpayer or to his legal representatives, after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan, and in the following manner: The refundable portion of the tax in respect of the profits of 1942 and fiscal periods ending therein shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the Governor in Council may determine but not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the Government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities: the refundable portion of the tax in respect of the profits of 1943 and fiscal periods ending therein shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the Governor in Council may determine but not later than the end of the third fiscal year of the Government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities and so on in respect of the refundable portion of the tax on the profits of successive years or fiscal periods.

The date of the cessation of hostilities shall be deemed to be the date of a proclamation issued under the authority of the Governor in Council declaring that, for purposes of the said refund, the war no longer exists.

6. That the tax payable by a corporation shall be paid by monthly instalments during the six months immediately prior to the close of its fiscal period and the six months immediately subsequent to the close of its fiscal period—

(a) as to the first six months, one-twelfth of the estimated tax, having regard to the previous or anticipated current year's income, applying the current year's rates, and

(b) as to the second six months, one-sixth of the tax (after deducting therefrom the previous six months' payments) having regard to the income, and applying the rates of the taxation year;

This shall be applicable to the tax on profits of fiscal periods ending on and after 31st December, 1942.

Any additional tax found due over that estimated or declared by the taxpayer shall be paid immediately upon assessment, together with interest at five per centum, after four months from the close of the fiscal period.

7. That the definition of "standard profits" be amended to exclude therefrom dividends deemed to have been received under the provisions of section nineteen of the Income War Tax Act.

8. That if the Minister of National Revenue is satisfied that the taxpayer has not commenced business prior to the second day of January, 1939, he shall direct that the standard profits be ascertained by the Board of Referees.

9. That the revenue losses in any business of the immediately preceding year may be allowed as a deduction.

10. That the income of any company derived from the production of base metals or strategic minerals shall be exempt from taxation hereunder if the company first came into production during the period of three years commencing the first day of January, 1943, and such exemption shall extend to the income of the first three fiscal periods of twelve months each of any such company following commencement of such production.

11. That any enactment founded upon (a) resolutions Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 shall apply to one-half of the profits of the calendar year 1942 and to the profits of all subsequent periods, provided that in the case of the fiscal period ending after June 30, 1942, and prior to December 31, 1942, the said enactment shall be applicable to that portion of the profits of any such fiscal period which the number of days therein after June 30, 1942, bears to the total number of days of such fiscal period, (b) resolutions Nos. 7 and 8 shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the said Act, and (c) resolution No. 9 shall apply to the profits of 1943 and fiscal periods ending therein.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act and to provide—

1. That superannuation benefits granted by the Dominion, the Provinces or any superannuation or pension fund or plan shall be subject to succession duty;

2. That one-half of the estate may be given to charitable organizations in Canada free of succession duty;

3. That the exemption in respect of gifts made prior to the 29th day of April, 1941, shall be allowed only in respect of gifts which are absolute and without any reservation of benefits to the donor;

4. That officials of foreign countries accredited to Canada owning real estate in Canada for residential purposes, shall in respect of such residential property be exempt from succession duty, if the country they represent grants similar relief;

5. 6. (a) That executors be protected against court action by successors having any interest in expectancy in the property of the deceased if the executor elects to pay the duty in respect thereof at the time of death and not at the time when the expectancy falls into posssession.

(b) That in order to secure payment of the duty a statutory lien be provided for in respect of any real or immovable property in Canada owned by any person who dies domiciled outside of Canada.

7. That executors be permitted to pay out, without the consent of the Minister, sums not in excess of—

(1) $1,500 in the case of moneys payable

(a) under any contract of insurance;

(b) by any friendly society; or

(c) under any superannuation or pension fund or plan.

(2) $500 in the case of moneys payable

(a) out of any bank account; or

(b) out of any trust or loan company's deposit account; or

(c) in satisfaction of wages or salaries.

8. That the foregoing resolutions shall apply from the commencement of the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

EXCISE ACT, 1934

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the schedule to the Excise Act, 1934, and to provide:

1. That the duty of excise on spirits distilled in Canada be increased from seven dollars to nine dollars per proof gallon, provided that duty paid spirits owned by any distiller at the close of business on the twenty-third day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two shall be subject to the following additional duty of excise on every gallon of the strength of proof two dollars and so in proporton for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

2. Resolved, that Schedule A to the Customs Tariff, as amended, be further amended by deleting from The Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, as amended by chapter twenty-nine of the statutes of 1940 and chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1941, the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Whisky, brandy, rum, gin and all other goods specified in Customs Tariff Items 156, 156a, and 156b, $3 per gallon of the strength of proof.

Ale, beer, porter and stout, 9 cents per gallon.

Wines of all kinds except sparkling wines, containing not more than 4 per cent of proof spirit, 32½ cents per gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines, $1.25 per gallon.

and by substituting therefor the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Whisky, brandy, rum, gin and all other goods specified in Customs Tariff Items 156, 156a, and 156b, $5 per gallon of the strength of proof.

Ale, beer, porter and stout, 30 cents per gallon.

Wines of all kinds except sparkling wines, containing not more than 40 per cent of proof spirit, 42½ cents per gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines, $1.75 per gallon.

3. Resolved, that any enactment founded upon the foregoing resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two, and to have applied to all goods mentioned in the foregoing resolutions imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date, and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

COMPARATIVE SUMMARY STATEMENT OF REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

1. As the final figures for the fiscal year 1941-42 are not as yet available, all statements dealing with revenues, expenditures, investments and balance sheet items are estimated. It is expected that when the books of the year are finally closed, any variations from the figures shown herein will be of slight importance.

2. The following tables show, by main categories and in detail, revenues, expenditures and the increase in net debt for the fiscal year 1941-42, together with comparable figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

REVENUES, 1941-42

3. When the books for the fiscal year 1941-42 are finally closed, total revenues will reach, it is estimated, an all-time record of $1,481,285,000. This represents an increase over the preceding fiscal year of no less than $609,116,000 or approximately 70 per cent. The chief reasons for this very substantial increase were the new taxes and the increases in old tax rates imposed by the last budget and the higher level of national income and production due to heavy expenditures for war purposes. In addition, there were less important increases in the yield from income taxes due to changes in the time and method of collection. As a result of the last budget, the due date for personal income taxes was moved back from April 30 to March 31 and the prepayment instalment plan became effective in September 1941, thus providing for seven monthly payments during the fiscal year for those who adopted the plan as compared with only three monthly instalments in the preceding fiscal year under the instalment plan which began in January 1941.

4. The five-year table of revenues shown on page 4 is in the same form as was used last year. This table is divided to show tax revenues under appropriate headings with subheadings for Excise Duties, Excise Taxes and Income Taxes. The non-tax revenue section is broken down under five main headings.

5. Total revenues from taxation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, are estimated at $1,360,915,000 compared with $778,213,000 collected during the previous year. This total represents 92 per cent of the total estimated revenues. An examination of the five-year table discloses that direct taxes on incomes realized $645,412,000 compared with $272,138,000 during the previous year. While, in 1940-41, direct taxes represented 35·0 per cent of the total revenue from taxes, they represented 47·4 per cent of total tax revenues in 1941-42. This comparison illustrates the increasing reliance upon the direct taxation of incomes. Because of the change in the due date of personal income taxes from April 30 to March 31, and the longer period in which the prepayment instalment plan was in operation during 1941-42, an accurate comparison of receipts from personal income taxes during 1941-42 with the amounts received in previous years cannot be made.

6. As a result of the Budget of April 29, 1941, the Dominion levied succession duties for the first time. The yield of this new tax amounted to $6,957,000. This compared with a rough estimate of $10,000,000 given in last year's Budget.

7. The total revenue from sales tax, less refunds, is estimated at $236,184,000, an increase of $56,483,000 as compared with the previous year. Part of this increase was the result of removing building materials from the exempt list (effected by the Budget of April 1941) but for the most part it reflects the higher level of activity brought about by increasing expenditures for war purposes.

8. The war exchange tax is expected to realize a total revenue of $100,874,000 compared with $61,932,000 received during the previous year.

9. Other excise taxes as set out in the five-year table are estimated to produce $116,368,000, an increase over the previous year of $73,834,000. Excise taxes derived from new imposts realized $44,937,000 as follows: gasoline $24,752,000; amusements $7,710,000; parimutuel bets $1,082,000; soft drinks $6,247,000; and travel $5,146,000. The remainder of the increase, namely $28,897,000, is accounted for by business expansion and by increased excise taxes on automobiles, cigarette papers and tubes, lighters, playing cards, sugar, toilet preparations, wines and long distance telephone calls, etc.

10. Revenues from customs import duties for the year just closed are estimated at $142,392,000 compared with $130,757,000 received during 1940-41. This increase is due largely to increased imports arising out of the war.

11. Receipts from excise duties mainly on liquor and tobacco, are expected to total $110,091,000, an increase of $21,483,000 over the previous fiscal year. The gross duty on spirits, malt, etc., is estimated at $46,777,000 and that on tobacco at $65,050,000.

12. Total non-tax revenues are estimated at $102,569,000 compared with $81,542,000 in the previous year. The largest non-tax item is the receipts from the Post Office which it is expected will total $45,994,000, an increase of approximately $5,611,000 over the preceding fiscal year. The receipts from the Post Office will, it is expected, exceed the cost of operations by $4,500,000. As mentioned in previous Budget Speeches, the Post Office accounts do not include the rental value and other costs of premises occupied and equipment used, nor do they include any credit to the Post Office for services rendered to other departments for the free use of the mails. Other increases in the non-tax section were recorded under the headings of Premium, Discount and Exchange, and Return on Investments. The increase in Premium, Discount and Exchange was due to repatriation of sterling securities and the increase in Return on Investments was accounted for mainly by interest on increased loans to the Foreign Exchange Control Board and the Canadian National Railways.

13. The total amount shown for the fiscal year 1941-42 under the heading, Special Receipts and Credits, is $17,801,000. Of this, total cash receipts account for $11,089,000 as follows: refunds of previous years' war expenditures $7,826,000; voluntary donations for war purposes $459,000; insurance moneys received on loss of Prince Edward Island Car Ferry $984,000; and sundry receipts $1,820,000.

The remainder amounting to $6,712,000 represents bookkeeping items which affected the book value of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Capital Stock and certain other non-active assets. All of these items making up the total of $6,712,000 are offset by contra amounts appearing on the expenditure side under the heading, Other Charges.

The first of these items is that affecting the book valuation of the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Capital Stock which was increased by $4,115,000, due to (a) surplus earnings of The Canadian National Railway System for the calendar year 1941, amounting to $4,016,000, and (b) the capital gain arising from redemption of Grand Trunk Railway 4 per cent Debenture Stock at less than par in Canadian funds amounting to $99,000. In addition, there were two other transactions affecting the non-active accounts: Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Capital Stock was reduced by reason of line abandonments during the year 1941 in the amount of $2,539,000, and the sum of $58,000 representing the yearly established losses in the seed grain and relief accounts of the Department of Mines and Resources was written off.

13A. The table below gives a summary of the forecasts made at the time of the last Budget of the probable receipts from various sources of revenue during the fiscal year 1941-42 and a comparison of these forecasts with the present estimates of actual receipts during the fiscal year. It will be noted that there is shown in the first column the forecast of expected receipts from the tax structure as it existed before the Budget of April 29, 1941, was brought down in the House, while the second column gives the expected receipts from the tax structure as affected by the proposals made in the Budget, and the third column the expected receipts from the tax structure as amended by the legislation finally passed by Parliament.

Under the conditions which have prevailed since the outbreak of war, with production and employment expanding rapidly and with prices rising (until last December), it has been very difficult to make accurate forecasts of the yield from various types of taxation. Budgetary authorities must always be cautious in predicting the probable magnitude and results of expanding economic activity and rising national income. It is always wise to err on the side of conservatism rather than undue optimism. It will be noted from the table that while there were under-estimates or over-estimates of some proportions in the case of individual revenue sources, these cancelled each other out to a considerable extent. The total yield from taxation was under-estimated by only $4,815,000.

Some comments may be made in regard to the probable explanation for the major differences as between the forecasts and the estimated actual results. The increase in customs duties as compared with the forecast was due to a higher level of prices and a greater volume of imports than had been anticipated. The increase in excise duties was due to a higher volume of sales than had been expected while the substantial increases in the various excise taxes were due not only to a greater volume of business but also to higher prices than had been anticipated. The close estimate of the yield of the national defence tax indicates substantial accuracy in forecasting the level of personal incomes and the under-estimate of the yield of the graduated tax on personal incomes is chiefly due to the facts (a) that a smaller proportion of taxpayers than was expected took advantage of the prepayment instalment plan, and (b) that many returns mailed on March 31st were not received in sufficient time to be included in receipts for the fiscal year 1941-42.

The difficulty of making accurate allowance in advance for the effects of the pre-payment instalment plan was probably also the main explanation of the under-estimate of the yield from the corporate income tax and the over-estimate of the yield from the excess profits tax although other factors may also have been operative in the case of the latter including probably the fact that depressed businesses were allowed to calculate and pay their tax on the minimum basis pending final determination of standard profits by the Board of Referees. In comparing the forecast with the actual yield from succession duties, it should be remembered that this was an entirely new tax and there was no experience to go upon in preparing the forecast. Perhaps, also, insufficient account was taken of the time necessarily involved in securing full payment of succession duties. In any case, fluctuations in the yield of succession duties are almost impossible to predict in advance. Reference was made in an earlier paragraph to the increase in non-tax revenues. This resulted from a substantial increase in Post Office receipts, a large increase in Premium, Discount and Exchange arising out of the heavy repatriation operations and the increase in return on investments due to advances to the Foreign Exchange Control Board and the Canadian National Railways. It is impossible to predict the amount of special receipts and credits that may accrue in any fiscal year and it has not been the practice to attempt any estimate of this category of revenues.

EXPENDITURES, 1941-42

14. The comments which follow will deal with expenditures classified by the usual main categories: (1) Ordinary Expenditures; (2) Capital Expenditures; (3) War Expenditures; (4) Specal Expenditures; (5) Operating Deficits of, and Non-active Advances to Government-owned Enterprises; and (6) Other Charges. All disbursements under these headings with the exception of active loans and investments chargeable to War Appropriation Acts, are included as expenditures in arriving at the over-all deficit or increase in net debt.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

15. It is estimated that ordinary expenditures for the year will total $443,969,000, of which such uncontrollable and contractual items as interest and other charges on the public debt, pensions, unemployment insurance, post office, subsidies and payments to provinces under the Dominion-Provincial taxation agreements will aggregate $330,342,000, approximately 74 per cent of the total. The remaining 26 per cent represents general administrative expenses and other services of government charged to Ordinary Expenditures.

The above estimated total of $443,969,000 is greater than the actual amount of ordinary expenditures during the previous fiscal year by $53,340,000. It may be noted, however, that this increase is due in considerable part to increased expenditures which are really due to the war itself, including the following as the more important items:

Increased Interest on Public Debt	$15,091,000
Increased Cost of Loan Flotations and Annual Amortization of Bond Discount and Commissions	10,126,000
Compensation to Provinces under the Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreements	21,120,000
Increase in Administrative Cost, Department of National Revenue	1,201,000
	$47,538,000

The total of these increases due to the war should be reduced by $5,475,000 representing the aggregate of special grants to the provinces which were dropped in 1941 and replaced by the arrangements under the new Dominion-Provincial Taxation Agreements. This leaves a balance of $42,063,000. If we add to this the increased cost of unemployment insurance, namely $9,563,000, we get a total of $51,626,000. Some of the increases in the so-called ordinary expenditures of other departments might be regarded as due directly or indirectly to the war, such, for instance, as the $2,795,000 increase by the Post Office Department and the $467,000 for administration of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Regular subsidies to provinces increased by $640,000. Other minor increases were: Government Annuities $550,000; Public Works $429,000; Trade and Commerce $1,560,000; and sundry increases $1,780,000.

The largest decrease in Ordinary Expenditures was occasioned by the suspension of the special grants to Provinces which amounted to $5,475,000. Other decreases are as follows:—Agriculture $156,000; Old Age Pensions $300,000; House of Commons $1,060,000; Senate $444,000; Chief Electoral Officer $2,188,000; Indian Affairs $204,000; Treatment and after-care of returned soldiers $669,000; Pensions, War and Military, $933,000; Transport $233,000; Sundry $320,000. These decreases aggregate $11,982,000.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURE

16. Total expenditures charged to capital are estimated at $3,357,000 compared with $3,358,000 in the previous year. The main items in this category are expenditures arising out of dredging the St. Lawrence Ship Channel amounting to $1,952,000, and other construction and improvements, including lighting and radio facilities in connection with civil airways and airports, amounting to $1,250,000.

WAR EXPENDITURES

17. Direct war expenditures accounted for roughly three-quarters of the Dominion's total expenditures during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942. This is, of course, apart from the assistance given to the Government of the United Kingdom by the accumulation of sterling balances or the repatriation of Canadian securities held in the United Kingdom. It is now estimated that Canada's total direct outlays on war account will amount to $1,394,033,000 for the past fiscal year. Included in this total is the sum of $42,480,000 charged to Active Assets, of which $18,149,000 represented additions to Loans and Investments and $24,331,000 represented advances to crown corporations organized by the Minister of Munitions and Supply for the purchase of scarce commodities. This total direct war outlay represents an increase of $615,609,000 over the corresponding figure for the preceding fiscal year.

The rapid increase in Canada's war expenditures (including amounts charged to Active Assets) is shown by the following table:

Fiscal Year 1939-40	$ 127,384,000
Fiscal Year 1940-41	778,424,000
Fiscal Year 1941-42	1,394,033,000
	$2,299,841,000

During the corresponding three years of the first World War, expenditures charged direct to war account aggregated approximately $533,000,000. It will be seen, therefore, that expenditures by the Dominion on account of the present war have to date been over four times the expenditures made in the same period of the last war. They exceed by over $603,000,000 Canada's total expenditures for war and demobilization during the whole of the last war. Indeed Canada's direct war outlays during the past fiscal year were less than $300,000,000 short of the total cost to Canada of the last war.

18. If we deduct the amount charged to Active Assets, we get a total of $1,351,553,000 as the estimated total to be charged to expenditures on war account during the past fiscal year. This represents an increase over the previous year of $599,508,000. The amounts expended by the major Departments or Services and the increases over the preceding year may be summarized as follows:

	Direct War Expenditures		Increase
	1940-41	1941-42
Department of National Defence—Army	383,235,000	509,879,000	126,644,000
Department of National Defence—Naval Service	88,163,000	132,443,000	44,280,000
Department of National Defence—Air Service	176,279,000	386,418,000	210,139,000
Department of Munitions and Supply	79,954,000	248,639,000	168,685,000
Department of National War Services	2,370,000	3,112,000	742,000
Miscellaneous Departments:
Agriculture	4,490,000	25,724,000	21,234,000
Finance	1,692,000	16,727,000	15,035,000
Labour	1,897,000	6,559,000	4,662,000
Pensions and National Health	3,370,000	5,619,000	2,249,000
Transport	1,214,000	3,666,000	2,452,000
Other	9,381,000	12,767,000	3,386,000
Total	752,045,000	1,351,553,000	599,508,000

19. Expenditures made by the Department of National Defence, Army, are estimated at $509,879,000, which compares with $383,235,000 during the preceding year. This total is broken down as follows:

Administration	$ 809,000
Army Services	501,542,000
Royal Military College	517,000
Radio Services, N.W.T. and Yukon	167,000
Joint Inspection Board of the United Kingdom and Canada	4,876,000
Internment Operations	1,315,000
Censorship	230,000
Dependents' Allowance Board	407,000
Dependents' Supplementary Grant Fund	16,000
	$ 509,879,000

20. Expenditures made by the Department of National Defence, Naval Services, aggregated $132,443,000, which compares with $88,163,000 expended during the preceding fiscal year. The rapid expansion of the Canadian Navy may be indicated by a comparison with Canada's Naval expenditures during the last war; during the corresponding fiscal year of that war, namely, 1916-17, the total expenditures on Canada's Naval Services amounted to $3,806,000.

21. Total expenditures of the Department of National Defence, Air Services, for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, are estimated at $386,418,000, classified as follows:

Home War Establishment	$ 108,708,000
Overseas Establishment	10,370,000
British Commonwealth Air Training Plan	267,189,000
Departmental Administration, Air	113,000
Construction of Temporary Building, Ottawa	38,000
	$386,418,000

For the fiscal year 1940-41 Canada's total expenditure on Air Services amounted to $176,279,000.

22. Under the Department of Munitions and Supply expenditures chargeable to the War Appropriation for 1941-42 aggregated $248,639,000, of which administration accounted for $4,939,000 and expansion of industry for $243,700,000. Corresponding expenditure during the previous fiscal year was $79,954,000.

23. Expenditures of the Department of National War Services chargeable to the War Appropriation amounted to $3,112,000 during the fiscal year ending March 31, 1942. This compares with an expenditure of $2,370,000 during the preceding fiscal year. The total of $3,112,000 may be itemized as follows:

Departmental Administration	$ 84,000
National Registration	274,000
Mobilization	634,000
Division of Human and Material Resources, General	21,000
Salvage	157,000
Public Information	709,000
War Charities	27,000
Radio Broadcasting Censorship	22,000
Women's Voluntary Services	1,000
National Film Board	8,000
Payments re Auxiliary War Services.	1,175,000
	$ 3,112,000

24. Included in the estimated total war expenditures for 1941-42, estimated at $1,351,553,000 are various expenditures by the non-war departments for services or activities arising directly or indirectly out of the war and charged to the War Appropriation. The total of these expenditures, not including loans and investments referred to above, amounted to $71,062,000 as compared with $22,044,000 during the preceding fiscal year.

The following table gives a detailed itemization of these expenditures classified by Departments and Services:

25. Reference has already been made to the fact that included in the total estimated outlays for war purposes during the fiscal year 1941-42 was the sum of $42,480,000 representing outlays made under authority of the War Appropriation Act 1941 and carried forward as Active Assets. This amount is made up as follows:

Advances to Commodity Corporations under Department of Munitions and Supply—	$ 24,331,000
Purchases of Railway Equipment	1,027,000
Working Capital, Canadian National Railways	17,122,000
	$ 42,480,000

Since the beginning of the war advances have been made to provide working capital for commodity corporations set up by the Department of Munitions and Supply and for other companies. The following table shows the net balances in respect of these advances as at the close of the fiscal year 1941-42:

Commodity Corporations—
Melbourne Merchandising Company Ltd. (Wool)	$ 5,531,000
Fairmont Company Ltd. (Rubber and hides)	11,955,000
Plateau Company Ltd. (Silk)	958,000
		$ 18,444,000
Other Companies—
Atlas Plant Extension Ltd	6,207,000
Research Enterprises Ltd	285,000
Algoma Steel Corp. Ltd	4,000,000
John Bertram and Co. Ltd	312,000
Dominion Steel and Coal Corp. Ltd	1,577,000
English Electric Co. of Canada Ltd	777,000
Steel Company of Canada Ltd	2,545,000
A. C. Wickman (Canada) Ltd	75,000
		15,778,000
		$ 34,222,000

Of the above total of $34,222,000, the sum of $9,891,000 represents the aggregate of the net balances as at the close of the preceding fiscal year 1940-41, thereby making the net advances for the year $24,331,000.

The advances to the commodity corporations have been brought to the account as assets because the funds represent either cash balances in the hands of the corporations concerned or are invested in commodities, such as rubber, leather, silk and wool, that are readily marketable after the war as commercial commodities. The advances to producing companies will be invested in commodities, goods in process, etc., that may not be readily saleable in the commercial markets after the war, although in some lines at least a considerable sum will no doubt be realized by liquidation. For this reason advances of this latter type have been charged to expenditures for the year in which they were incurred.

Advances by way of loans repayable over a specified period have been made to a number of private corporations to provide additional plant and equipment facilities. Repayments in the amount of $4,582,000 have been received, and the balance outstanding at the close of the fiscal year is shown at $15,778,000.

26. In addition to the foregoing advances, there have been advances made under authority of Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act, 1941, which are recoverable from the Government of the United Kingdom or from other allied governments. These advances were made to facilitate the provision of services for the said governments. The charges which are brought to account against the respective governments are for services and supplies, such as services arising out of recruitment and training in Canada of the nationals of allied governments, and supplies, repairs or equipment for units of the Royal Navy or naval vessels of allied governments entering Canadian ports.

Recoverable vouchers are raised by National Defence authorities at points of origin and are cleared to Ottawa where they are brought to account against the governments concerned and billed regularly. On the whole these accounts are repaid promptly by the respective governments. Naturally the major participant in this type of operation is the Government of the United Kingdom.

Under Army Services there are charges arising out of the operation of internment camps in Canada for prisoners of war and internees sent from the United Kingdom. As at March 31, 1942, there was a balance owing on this account of $854.000. The Naval Services has a large operation arising out of the servicing of His Majesty's ships at Halifax and Esquimalt dockyards and at other points. A similar service is rendered to Canada's naval units when they are in United Kingdom waters. Under Air Services the major operation arises out of the Air Training Plan in Canada. This has resulted in substantial charges against the United Kingdom for equipment purchased in lieu of a contribution in kind provided for by the original agreement, and also charges for supplies, services and construction work arising out of the establishment and operation of the R.A.F. Special Schools in Canada. The debit balance in these two accounts as at March 31, 1942, is estimated at $102,419,000, all of which will be adjusted when the new Air Training Agreement becomes operative as at July 1, 1942. In respect of participation in the Air Training Plan by Australia and New Zealand, the former had a small balance owing of $2,-812,000 as at March 31, 1942, while New Zealand's obligations had been fully met.

It must be understood that corresponding services are rendered to Canada by the United Kingdom in connection with units of Canada's Armed Forces serving in the United Kingdom. In this case the United Kingdom Government bills Canada, but necessarily settlements can only be made some considerable time after the services have been rendered by the United Kingdom authorities. It is impossible as yet to give a close estimate of the amount payable by Canada as at the close of last fiscal year but it is fair to assume that this will substantially offset the amounts due the Dominion.

An estimate of the amounts owing to Canada, as at March 31, 1942, in respect of recoverable advances made under Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act, is as follows:

Army	$ 1.595.000
Navy	11.862.000
Air	1.017.000
Internment Operations	854.000
R.A.F. Special Schools	53.730.000
B.C.A.T.P.—U.K. Equipment	48.689.000
B.C.A.T.P.—Australia's share	2.812.000
Total	$ 120,559,000

27. Before leaving this summary of war expenditures, it may be well to call attention to the indirect assistance given to the Government of the United Kingdom during the fiscal year under review. In the past such assistance has taken a form which did not result in direct Government expenditure. Since the passing of the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, this situation has been substantially changed, as will be explained in later paragraphs.

During the fiscal year 1941-42, the deficit of the sterling area in Canadian dollars amounted to approximately $1,100 million and this deficit was financed by Canada. Slightly less than $48 million was financed by private repatriation of securities, gifts and other private transactions. Of the remaining $1,050 million which required Government financing, $365 million was financed by the repatriation of Government securities, Canadian National Railway guaranteed and unguaranteed securities and other Government guaranteed securities. The remainder, namely $685 million, represents sterling which was accumulated by the Foreign Exchange Control Board during the year.

The War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act, 1942, received Royal Assent on March 27th last. Its three main provisions were: (1) the granting of a billion dollar gift to the Government of the United Kingdom to finance the purchase in Canada of foodstuffs, raw materials and munitions of war and to defray other expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes; (2) the granting of authority to repatriate all Dominion of Canada direct and guaranteed securities and other Canadian National Railway securities held by British investors; and (3) the conversion of sterling balances accumulated to the credit of the Government of Canada to an amount equivalent to $700 million (at the exchange rate of $4.45 to the pound sterling) into a Canadian dollar obligation which is not to bear interest until after the termination of the war.

The conversion of sterling balances into a Canadian dollar obligation did not take place until after the close of the last fiscal year. In regard to the repatriation of securities, one delivery of securities was received before the close of the fiscal year. The value of these securities at the vesting prices, less interest included therein, amounted to $222,724,000. The securities so purchased by the Dominion Government were classified as follows:

Dominion of Canada obligations		$ 25,338,000
Canadian National Railway securities—
Dominion guaranteed	$132,841,000
Unguaranteed	63,624,000
		196,465,000
Other Dominion guaranted securities		921,000
		$222,724,000

In accordance with the terms of the Act, Canadian National Railway securities to the value of $191,603,000 were turned over to the Railway Company and a temporary loan for this amount was made to the Company to enable it to acquire them. At the close of the fiscal year all the other securities were held by the Dominion with the exception of a small Dominion sterling issue which was cancelled.

The Act provided that the Minister would acquire from the Foreign Exchange Control Board such sterling balances held at the date of the commencement of the Act as were not required for the repatriation operation, the conversion of the $700 million of sterling balances and the current operations of the Board. The cost of acquisition of this surplus sterling was to be charged to the billion dollar gift and as the sterling balances involved represented accumulations to meet the United Kingdom's Canadian dollar deficit during the major part of the month of March, it had been intended that the amount should be charged to the accounts for the fiscal year 1941-42. However, it was not possible to complete the necessary arrangements and estimate the surplus sterling until after April 30th, the last day on which an expenditure incurred in respect of the fiscal year 1941-42 could be charged to that fiscal year. Accordingly the cost of this surplus sterling, namely, $76,429,000, will appear in the Government's expenditures for the current fiscal year.

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

28. Expenditures classified as Special Expenditures for the fiscal year 1941-42 are estimated to total $62,879,000, which compares with $42,869,000 for the preceding fiscal year, an increase of $20,010,000. Payments of awards under the Wheat Acreage Reduction Plan are estimated to total $29,659,000. There was no expenditure on this account during the fiscal year 1940-41. Expenditures by the Dominion under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the form of advances to the Prairie Farm Emergency Fund, as provided for in the Act, are estimated at $11,836,000, an increase of $7,460,000 over the preceding year. The cost of administering this Act is estimated at $420,000, an increase of $74,000.

29. The remaining item under Special Expenditures which shows an increase is the provision for reserve to meet deficits resulting from the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. There has been added to this reserve account $12,571,000, an increase of $2,071,000 over the provision made for this purpose in the accounts of the preceding fiscal year.

As reflected in the Public Accounts for the year ended March 31, 1940, an advance of $52,000,000 was made to the Canadian Wheat Board to meet possible losses of the Board in respect of the 1938 wheat crop. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, an additional amount of $10,499,677 was set up in the Domin-ion's books as a reserve to meet the deficit of the Board not previously provided for, on the basis of calculation made as at July 31, 1940. In the fiscal year now under review, an additional amount of $12,570,828 was added to the reserve account to provide for deficits of the Board not previously provided for, on the basis of calculations made as at July 31, 1941, to the close of the last crop year. These amounts, which aggregate $75,070,505, represent deficits resulting from the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board on the basis of calculations made as at July 31, 1941.

From the reserve account there was advanced to the Board during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, the sum of $4,623,382, which amount enabled the Board to discharge its liability in respect of advances made by chartered banks to the Board and guaranteed by the Government of Canada in connection with the marketing of wheat crops up to and including the 1938 crop. As a result of these advances the amount now held in the reserve account is $18,447,123.

30. The total of the increases of the various items of special expenditure noted above is $39,264,000. Offsetting these increases there was a reduction of relief expenditures of $19,254,000, leaving a net increase in Special Expenditures of $20,010,000, as compared with the previous year.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED ENTERPRISES

The next major classification of expenditures comprises the losses of and the non-active advances to Government-owned enterprises, which are operated as separate corporations.

Canadian National Railways

31. The operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways for the calendar year 1941 totalled $304,376,000, an increase of $56,849,000 or 23 per cent over the previous year. With the single exception of the year 1928, this represented the largest revenue in the company's history, and was more than double that of 1933.

Operating expenses of the railway amounted to $237,768,000, an increase of $35,249,000, or 17·4 per cent over the preceding year.

Net revenue available for interest on the railway's debt amounted to $54,361,000 compared with $33,474,000 in 1940. After payment of interest charges of $44,698,000 on debt held by the public and interest charges of $5,647,000 due to the Government in respect of temporary loans for capital and refunding purposes there was a net cash surplus of $4,016,000 compared with a cash deficit of $16,965,000 in the previous year. This cash surplus, the first since 1928, was paid over to the Government in redemption of temporary loans.

The operating deficit of the Prince Edward Island Ferry and Terminals during 1941 was $424,000 compared with $461,000 in 1940.

Canadian National Steamships

32. The operations of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited in the calendar year 1941 resulted in a cash surplus of $1,206,000 after payment of interest on bonds held by the public but before depreciation and interest on advances from the Government. The comparable figure for 1940 was $666,000. The operating surplus was paid to the Government as interest on advances (current and arrears).

National Harbours Board

33. The operations of the facilities and harbours under the administration of the National Harbours Board recorded a slight gain over 1940. Operating income for the calendar year, after payment of interest to the public but before depreciation and interest on Government advances, totalled $5,174,000 compared with $4,942,000 in 1940.

Financial assistance provided by the Government to the National Harbours Board and charged to Dominion expenditure totalled $791,000. This amount is made up as follows: $33,000 for the operating deficit of the Churchill Harbour; $342,000 for non-active advances in respect of the deficit of the Jacques Cartier Bridge at Montreal; $400,000 for the retirement of debentures of the Quebec Harbour Commission; $2,000 for the redemption of debentures of the Saint John Harbour Commission; and the remaining $14,000 for miscellaneous capital expenditures at various ports.

The elevators at Port Colborne and Prescott operated at a profit during 1941 and the Government received $213,000 from these sources which was credited to Ordinary Revenue.

Summary

34. The total amount charged to Government expenditures resulting from the operating deficits of, and non-active advances to, all government-owned enterprises totalled $1,215,000 as compared with $18,182,000 in the previous year. This decrease of $16,967,000 was due entirely to the better operating results of the Canadian National Railways, as there was a slight increase in expenditure on other government-owned enterprises. Loans and Advances to government-owned enterprises which are treated in the Public Accounts as Active Assets are referred to in a later section.

OTHER CHARGES

35. The total of Other Charges, the final main category of expenditures, is estimated at $31,993,000.

The principal item included in this total is $25,000,000, to increase the reserve to meet possible losses on ultimate realization of assets treated as "active" in the Dominion's balance sheet. This is the same amount as was provided for in the Public Accounts for the year ended March 31, 1941.

In addition, there was the usual annual write-off of Soldier and General Land Settlement Loans estimated at $271,000, and cancellation of Canadian Farm Loan Board Capital Stock, amounting to $10,000. The provision for a further reserve of $25,000,000 and the write-offs from Active Assets result in a proportionate increase in the net debt of the Dominion.

36. The Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock, representing the proprietor's equity of the Dominion in the Canadian National Railways, has been increased by $4,016,000 due to the surplus earnings of the Canadian National Railway System for the calendar year 1941, and also by $99,000 due to the capital gain on redemption of Grand Trunk Railway 4 per cent Perpetual Debenture Stock at a price below par in Canadian funds. Both these items are offset by similar amounts included as special credits to Consolidated Fund already referred to under Revenues.

37. Write-offs from Non-active Assets include $2,539,000 from the Canadian National Railways Securities Trust Stock, representing line abandonments during the calendar year 1941, and $58,000, the yearly established loss on Seed Grain and Relief Accounts of the Department of Mines and Resources. Both these items are offset by similar amounts of other credits already referred to under Revenues.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

38. The grand total of expenditures for the fiscal year 1941-42, under the various categories enumerated, namely, Ordinary Expenditures, Capital Expenditures, War Expenditures, Special Expenditures, Losses of and non-active advances to government-owned enterprises, and Other Charges, is $1,894,966,000.

39. The following table shows the percentage distribution of revenues and expenditures for a number of important items of revenue and expenditure. Receipts from various taxes and other revenue sources are shown as percentages both of total revenues and of total expenditures. Similarly, several of the main items of expenditure or groups of such items are shown as percentages both of total expenditures and of total revenues. This table should only be used for the purpose of drawing broad conclusions as to the relative burdens imposed on the treasury by the several important services or obligations of Government.

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

40. As total revenues for the fiscal year 1941-42 have been estimated at $1,481,285,000 and total expenditures at $1,894,966,000, the estimated over-all deficit (or increase in net debt) for the year is $413,681,000. In the preceding fiscal year a comparable deficit was $377,432,000.

LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

ACTIVE ASSETS

41. In addition to the expenditures for the year, as already outlined, the Dominion has made disbursements for the acquisition of investments which are treated as active assets in the Public Accounts. These active assets are deducted from the total direct debt in arriving at the figure of net debt. The net increase in active loans and investments during the fiscal year 1941-42 is estimated at $616,147,000 as compared with $362,370,000 in 1940-41. This increase is fully itemized in the table under section 56.

LOANS TO PROVINCES

42. As was shown in the Public Accounts for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, loans made to the Western Provinces under authority of the annual Relief Acts and outstanding at the close of that year totalled $157,492,294.23.

No loans have since been made and during the year under review repayments were received from the Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta in the amounts of $171,272.74 and $46,000 respectively. These repayments left the net amount outstanding as of March 31, 1942, at $157,275,021.49, divided by Provinces as follows:

Manitoba	$ 25,217,214 18
Saskatchewan	71,341,419 95
Alberta	25,972,000 00
British Columbia	34,744,387 36
Total	$157,275,021 49

43. The following table shows the net loans made to each Province during each fiscal year:

Advances—Trans-Canada Air Lines	550,000
Total Repayments	$ 7,866,327
Net Advances	$251,721,580

Under the authority of The War Appropriation Act 1941 and The War Measures Act the Dominion purchased $1,027,426 of railway equipment which is being leased to the Canadiant National Railways under the terms of a hire-purchase agreement. The Railway Company repaid instalments aggregating $1,509,141 under the terms of hire-purchase agreements relating to equipment purchased by the Government in the fiscal years 1935-36 and 1936-37; 1939-40 and 1940-41.

Canadian Pacific Railway Company

45. Loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made in previous years for relief purposes were completely liquidated by repayments aggregating $981,000. In addition, the Railway paid the fifth instalment of $441,000 under the terms of a hire-purchase agreement relating to certain equipment purchased by the Government in the fiscal years 1935-36, 1936-37 and 1937-38 at a cost of $5,730,000 and leased to the Railway Company. The Railway also paid the first instalment of $663,000 under the terms of a hire-purchase agreement relating to equipment purchased by the Government in the fiscal years 1939-40 and 1940-41 at a cost of $9,951,000 and leased to the Railway Company.

OTHER LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

46. In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, the Government purchased an additional $25,000 of the capital stock of the Canadian Farm Loan Board. Capital Stock in the amount of $10,000 was cancelled and written off. The Board repurchased out of surplus funds from the Government $1,000,000 of its 3½ per cent Bonds. At the close of the fiscal year the Government's investment in the Canadian Farm Loan Board was $36,537,000.

47. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation repaid $283,000 on account of loans made by the Government during the fiscal years 1937-38 and 1939-40.

48. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, Limited, repaid loans aggregating $750,000 made in the fiscal year 1940-41 in order to provide the Company with working capital.

49. There was advanced to the Foreign Exchange Control Board in the fiscal year 1941-42 an amount of $400,000,000 in order to provide the Board with capital to carry on its foreign exchange transactions.

50. Loans totalling $230,000 were made to the National Harbours Board during the year for capital construction purposes at the ports of Montreal and Vancouver. In the same period, loans made in previous years were reduced by $1,210,000, leaving a net credit on this account of $980,000.

51. Investments in Sinking Funds amounted to $486,000 during the fiscal year under review. This amount together with the amount held at

March 31, 1941, viz., $5,233,000, was written off to Redemption of Debt, as the 4 per cent Loan of 1953-58, the 3¼ per cent Loan of 1950-55 and the 3¼ per cent Loan of 1958-63 were vested by the Government of the United Kingdom in August 1941. In turn these three sterling issues were purchased by the Government of Canada and cancelled.

52. In the fiscal year under review the Provinces of Manitoba, British Columbia and Nova Scotia reduced by $740,000 loans made to them by the Dominion Government for house construction in the period following the first Great War.

53. Loans for Soldier and General Land Settlement were reduced by payments of $1,521,000, and, in addition $271,000 was written off and charged to Consolidated Fund.

54. In the period April 1, 1941, to March 31, 1942, 4,309 loans were approved under the National Housing Act for an amount of $13,541,415, bringing the total approvals to March 31, 1942, to $76,784,145. During the fiscal year, the Dominion's share of loans actually paid out, less repayments by borrowers, totalled $2,644,165. The net amount of loans under the authority of the National Housing Act and the Dominion Housing Act, outstanding on the books of the Dominion at March 31, 1942, was $16,254,095. Loans under the authority of the National Housing Act are made jointly by the Government and approved lending institutions and are secured by first mortgage or hypothec, running jointly to the Government and an approved lending institution. Loans are normally made not in excess of 80 per cent of the cost or appraised value of the completed property, whichever is the lesser. However, in the case of owner-occupied houses where the lending value does not exceed $2,500, a loan may be made up to 90 per cent of the said lending value. Since January 1, 1940, new applications for loans are received only in respect of the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

55. Under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, 1938, no further loans were approved during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942. From the inception of the Act to March 31, 1942, total loans approved totalled $7,801,000. During the said fiscal year, the amount actually paid out by the Government, less repayments, was $331,000. These loans bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum and are amortized over a period not longer than the estimated useful life of the project. The province in which the municipality is situated is required to guarantee the payments for interest on and amortization of each loan.

56. The following statement shows in summary form the net changes in active investments during the last fiscal year together with comparable figures for the four preceding years:

LOAN FLOTATIONS

57. During the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942 the Government issued obligations in the amount of $2,457,464,570 (including the increase in Treasury Bills outstanding but not the total amount of recurring issues of Treasury Bills made to refund outstanding Treasury Bills). With the exception of one $10,000,000 issue sold in New York, all issues were sold in the Canadian market. During the same period Dominion obligations in the amount of $964,335,201 were paid off out of the proceeds of the new issues. The remainder of the proceeds, namely, $1,493,129,369, less cost of flotation, provided cash for direct and indirect outlays on war account.

58. The following table gives details of the amounts and terms of the new issues, including the prices at which they were sold:

(x) Final costs for Second Victory Loan not yet available.

(†) Yield to investor if held to maturity, seven and one-half years after issue.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

It will be noted that both the first and second Victory Loans were sold during the fiscal year under review. Each was an outstanding success. In the case of the first Victory Loan, total subscriptions amounted to $836,820,250 and the total number of subscribers was 968,259. The second Victory Loan offered in February last resulted in total subscriptions of $997,503,300 and the total number of subscribers was no less than 1,681,525.

59. The following table gives the details of Dominion of Canada bond redemptions during the fiscal year under review.

(1) Amount converted into Second Victory Loan.

(2) This issue was vested by the Treasury of the United Kingdom in January 1942. The amount (at par of exchange) purchased in the fiscal year 1941-42 was cancelled.

(3) These issues were vested by the Treasury of the United Kingdom in August 1941. The amounts purchased, including Sinking Funds were cancelled.

(4) Yield to investor if held to maturity, seven and one-half years after issue date.

60. The fortnightly issue of three months Treasury Bills was continued during the past fiscal year. The last issue made during the year was sold at a discount of 0·552 per cent. The amount of these Treasury Bills outstanding at the close of the fiscal year was $270,000,000, and increase of $40,000,000 over the amount outstanding at the beginning of the year.

As at March 31, 1942, the average rate of interest on the Dominion's outstanding direct funded debt (including Treasury Bills) was 2·90 per cent. This compares with an average rate of 3·06 per cent on the debt outstanding at the close of the preceding fiscal year and is probably the lowest average rate in the Dominion's history.

60A. It may be of interest to give a summary of Loan Flotations and Bond Redemptions made by the Government of Canada since the outbreak of war to March 31, 1942. The record of such financing operations is found in the two following statements:

NATIONAL DEBT

61. At the close of the fiscal year under review the gross unmatured funded debt (including Treasury Bills) of the Dominion outstanding amounted to $5,866,071,000. Other liabilities consisting chiefly of Annuities, Superannuation and insurance funds, Post Office Savings Bank deposits, and various trust and contingent funds were outstanding on the same date in an aggregate amount of $742,949,000. The gross liabilities of the Dominion, therefore, totalled $6,609,020,000 as at March 31, 1942. On the other side of its balance sheet, however, the Dominion had active assets of $2,546,648,000 consisting of cash on hand and various active loans and investments (less reserves provided against ultimate loss on their realization). If, therefore, we deduct the amount of the net active assets from the amount of the gross liabilities, we arrive at a figure of $4,062,372,000 representing the estimated net debt of the Dominion. This net debt shows an increase over the corresponding figure for the close of the preceding fiscal year of $413,681,000, which of course is the amount of the over-all deficit for the fiscal year ending March 31 last.

62. The following is a preliminary statement or balance sheet showing the liabilities and assets of the Dominion as estimated at March 31, 1942:

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

64. Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the Dominion and outstanding in the hands of the public as at March 31, 1942, totalled $818,841,717, a decrease of $165,174,661 during the fiscal year under review. This decrease is accounted for mainly by the purchase of Canadian National Railway Company securities from the Government of the United Kingdom, as provided for under the War Appropriation (United Kingdom Financing) Act 1942.

65. There were also outstanding at the close of the fiscal year other contingent liabilities assumed under Relief, Seed Grain and other legislation. During the fiscal year the Government agreed to guarantee the repayment of bank advances to the Canadian Red Cross Society to a maximum amount of $3,000,000. It was anticipated that this Society would require funds for carrying on its war services pending the time when receipts would be available to it from a general public campaign. However, no advances were required under this guarantee.

66. Advances by Canadian chartered banks to the Government of Newfoundland, amounting to $625,000 and carrying the guarantee of the Government of Canada have been referred to in previous budget speeches. These advances were paid off by the Government of Newfoundland during the fiscal year under review.

67. Guaranteed bank advances to the Canadian Wheat Board outstanding as at March 31, 1942, amounted to $116,686,562. This amount constitutes the Board's gross liability to the banks and related mainly to the purchase of wheat of the 1939, 1940 and 1941 crops. The guarantee of the Dominion to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing Association Limited referred to in previous budget speeches is still outstanding. However, no liability accrues from day to day in connection with this guarantee as margin deposits are made to the Clearing Association.

68. Before operations under the Home Improvement Loans Guarantee Act were discontinued (October 31, 1940), 125,720 loans had been made by banks and other approved loaning institutions to home owners under the terms of this Act and the total amount of such loans was $49,959,055. The Dominion's contingent liability arising out of these loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by approved lending institutions, but as the balance of these loans outstanding on March 31, 1942, had been reduced to $6,162,009, the contingent liability of the Government is limited to this amount. Up to March 31, 1942, 801 loss claims for an aggregate amount of $259,100 had been paid. In terms of total losses to total volume of loans, this loss ratio is only slightly more than one-half of one per cent. Repayments to March 31, 1942, amounted to $43,797,048 or 88 per cent of the total volume of loans made.

69. Under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, the Government has accepted and is accepting certain obligations arising out of its contracts with approved lending institutions which, while not expressed in the form of a guarantee, may nevertheless be regarded as contingent or indirect liabilities.

The manner in which losses in respect of any loan are to be borne by the Dominion and the lending institution is fixed by the contract. The general principle is that the Dominion bears two-thirds of the loss if at the time the loss is sustained the principal amount of the loan repaid, less any other amounts due, is more than the amount advanced by the Dominion. In the case of small loans (for amounts not in excess of $4,000, in the case of a single family dwelling place or not in excess of $700 per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling), the share of the loss to be borne by the Dominion is not more than 80 per cent and not less than 50 per cent of the loss. The above provisions apply to loans made under the National Housing Act and its predecessor, the Dominion Housing Act. Under the National Housing Act a new provision has been added to encourage the making of small loans in such small or remote communities and in such districts or other communities as may be designated by the Minister of Finance in any contract. In respect of such loans, the Dominion has agreed in contracts with certain lending institutions to pay losses sustained by any such lending institution up to certain amounts determined by the contract which are not less than 7 per cent and do not exceed 25 per cent of the total amount of such loans made in such areas by the lending institution.

Order in Council of December 5, 1939, provided that after January 1, 1940, applications would be received only for loans for the construction of houses containing one self-contained dwelling place and where the loan does not exceed $4,000.

Loans to the number of 18,251 had been approved at March 31, 1942, under the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and the National Housing Act, 1938, in the amount of $76,-784,145. Losses recorded and paid to March 31, 1942, amounted to $1,010.28, covering the Dominion's proportion of the loss on three loans. This amount represents total losses to date under both the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and Part 1 of the National Housing Act, 1938. These losses are offset in part by a profit of $288.41 realized by the sale of eight properties. The net loss to date is therefore only $721.87.

70. The following is a statement of bonds and debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the Dominion, outstanding on March 31, 1942.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to offer my congratulations to the hon. gentleman upon the manner and the methods he has adopted in the presentation of this budget. I especially call the attention of hon. members of this house to his concluding paragraph which I hope will sink into the minds and hearts of every last one of us, and every last one of our citizens. I agree with every sentiment he has expressed in that paragraph, and I only wish that 100 per cent of our people will also agree.

On motion of Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) the debate was adjourned.

HONOURS AND DECORATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLE ACCEPTED IN 1919 TO MEMBERS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State) moved:

Whereas the report of a special committee of the House of Commons on titles, honours and decorations was presented to the house on May 14, 1919, and carried, on division, on May 22, 1919; and

Whereas the opinion has been expressed that the application of the principles embodied in the report in the circumstances which have emerged during the present war had led to discrimination between the members of the Canadian armed forces, and others of his majesty's armed forces, between different ranks in the Canadian armed forces; and between Canadians actively participating in the present war, and others of his majesty's subjects; and

Whereas the further opinion has been expressed that it is impracticable to make provision for recognition of conduct and action involving gallantry, courage, meritorious service and devotion to duty without contravening the principles embodied in the report;

Therefore be it resolved:

That a select committee of the house be appointed to inquire into and to report upon the expediency:

(a) of maintaining the principles that form the basis of the recommendations contained in the said report and continuing in effect the said recommendations, or

(b) of cancelling, altering, modifying or adding to the said recommendations, in so far as they relate to honours and decorations which do not involve titles, and, if so, in what respect and to what extent.

That the committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Bertrand (Laurier-Montreal), Bruce, Fraser (Peterborough West), Gershaw, Graham, Hill, Kinley, Macmillan, Marshall, McCuaig, Stirling, Turgeon, Weir, Wood, Wright, and shall have power to send for persons and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and to report their opinions and observations from time to time to the house.

He said: In rising to move the resolution standing in my name I feel that it is rather an anti-climax to the magnificent address we have heard from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). We used to hear of the great addresses made by other ministers of finance such as Sir George Foster, Mr. Fielding and other capable ministers, and sometimes we have taken the position that things are not as they used to be, that we do not hear the magnificent eloquence which was heard in speeches made many years ago. That reminds me of an apropos remark which Punch made about the Times. When someone wrote and said that the Times was not as it used to be, Punch replied, "Yes, but it never was."

I think we have heard to-night as fine a budget address as this house has ever heard, and I am speaking not only of the present house but of the old house as well. Again I should like to congratulate my colleague upon a magnificent and splendid address. I should like also to congratulate Canada upon having a Minister of Finance who can prepare and deliver such a budget as we have heard to-night.

In moving the resolution standing in my name for the appointment of a select committee of this house to review the question of honours and decorations, it is not necessary at this stage to deal with it at any great length. It is, however, I believe desirable that I should deal briefly, in the first place, with the present situation and endeavour to point out to the house why it is desirable to have the proposed committee appointed.

As members of the house will see, no question of conferring titles is involved. The members of the house will recall that in the year 1919 a special committee considered the question of titles, honours and decorations and presented its report on May 14, 1919. This report was discussed by the house and was carried on division on May 22, 1919. It will not be necessary for me to read the full report, but I might give a summary of its contents.

The report provided for the submission of an address to His Majesty the King dealing with the exercise by the king of certain legal powers which formed a part of the royal prerogative. It involved an expression by the House of Commons of its views to the effect that:

(1) No titles of honour or titular distinctions should be conferred upon British subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada save such appellations as might be of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

(2) Hereditary titles of honour or titular distinctions or dignitaries or titles as peers of the realm should, by legislation or otherwise, be extinguished upon the death of the holder if domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, and no further hereditary titles should be conferred upon Canadians.

(3) The titles "right honourable" and "honourable" should be continued.

(4) The practice of awarding military and naval decorations such as the Victoria Cross, the Military Medal, the Military Cross, the Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty should be continued.

(5) No person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada should accept or use titles of honour or titular distinction conferred by foreign rulers or governors.

The policy recommended in the report has been followed by the governments which have been in power since 1919, with one exception. In 1934 and 1935 certain recommendations of Canadians for titles and honours were made and a number of titles and honours were granted.

It will be observed that in the proposed terms of reference in this motion, one of the suggestions is that the committee should consider cancelling, altering, modifying or adding to the recommendations in the report of the committee in 1919 in so far as they relate to honours and decorations which do not involve titles.

It will also be observed that in the report of the committee of 1919 the statement is made that the committee do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations to members of the military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty. At that time the Royal Canadian Air Force had not been established, and this accounts for the fact that no reference is made to members of the air force. Carrying out the policy approved by the house in adopting the report in 1919, the prohibition on the recommendation and acceptance by Canadians of titles of honour or titular distinctions has been interpreted to mean that Canadians may not receive any medal or award in an order of chivalry, on the ground that such an award, for example, as a companionship in the Order of the Bath or the Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, or the Order of the British Empire, involves membership in an order of chivalry in which the highest grades involve knighthood.

The medals and decorations mentioned in the report of the committee of 1919—the Victoria Cross, the Military Medal, the Military Cross, and the like—are medals and decorations which are awarded, in the main, for conspicuous gallantry in action. While the Victoria Cross may be awarded to men of all ranks in the army, the navy and the air force, some of the others, such as the Military Cross and the Military Medal, are awarded only to officers or men below certain ranks. For example, the Military Cross is restricted by royal warrant to officers below the rank of major and to warrant officers, classes 1 and 2. The Military Medal can be granted only for gallantry in action and can be awarded only to warrant officers, classes 1 and 2, non-commissioned officers and men.

An examination of the provisions of the report and of the debates in the House of Commons, indicates that there is some doubt as to whether the House of Commons, in 1919, intended to impose a ban upon military decorations other than those which involved titles or titular distinctions. In the text of the resolution, the prohibition is confined to "any title of honour or titular distinction"; while in the debates there was much confusion as to whether the prohibition was intended to extend to military decorations, such as the lower classes in the orders of chivalry, which do not involve either titles of honour or titular distinctions.

When the question of awards arose during the present war, the position taken was that ordinary medals and decorations might freely be awarded to members of the Canadian armed forces and to Canadians serving in others of his majesty's armed forces as members thereof or as attached personnel. The awards thus made available included the ordinary medals and decorations, such as the Distinguished Service Order, the Distinguished Conduct Medal, and the Medal of the Order of the British Empire, as well as mentions in dispatches and commendations. All awards involving titles, and awards in the lower grades of those orders of chivalry which, in their higher grades, involved titles, were regarded as coming within the prohibition involved in the report. It was, therefore, open to Canadians to receive the Victoria Cross, the Distinguished Service Order, the Distinguished Flying Cross and similar decorations. On the other hand, such awards as Knight Commander of the Bath, Companion of the Bath (military), Knight Commander of St. Michael and St. George and Companion of St. Michael and St. George, Knight Commander of the Order of the British Empire, Commander of the Order of the British Empire, Officer of the Order of the British Empire, and Member of the Order of the British Empire (military) were not available to Canadians.

In the present war, civilan decorations have been instituted by His Majesty the King. The report does not preserve any rights in respect of civilian decorations. There was a good deal of doubt as to whether, upon the institution of the George Cross and the George Medal, it would be open to the Canadian government to provide for recommendations without contravening the provisions of the report. The position taken was that a ban upon the award of the George Cross or the George Medal would not be in accord with the general spirit underlying the report and, accordingly, steps were taken to make these civilian awards available for Canadians.

It is desirable that the position with regard to the classes of the orders of chivalry which do not involve titles should be clarified and that doubt should be removed with regard to the availability of the George Cross and the George Medal.

A further question has arisen by reason of the nature of the present war. In total war the dangers of the burdens fall heavily upon the civilians as well as upon the soldiers. There are Canadians serving in positions of great personal danger who are showing qualities of courage and devotion to duty that are clearly comparable with those which result in awards to the armed forces. Such civilians are all excluded from recognition except in cases which qualify for the George Cross and the George Medal. It is thought that the House of Commons would desire to review the whole question of recognition of civilian service in the light of the conditions which have arisen during the present war.

Another problem results from the nature of naval warfare. It has been increasingly evident that seamen of the merchant navy are showing qualities of courage and devotion to duty which require recognition. It is desirable, therefore, that the house should consider whether members of the merchant navy should not be placed in a position of equality with members of the armed forces. It will, of course, be understood that the British mercantile marine is given recognition in the matter of awards fairly comparable with that which is accorded to the Royal Navy and it is probable that members of the house would desire that Canadian seamen should receive similar treatment.

Under the present position, immediate awards take the form of medals and decorations and have been available to Canadians on the same basis as to members of the armed forces of other parts of the British commonwealth. Individual actions of gallantry in the face of the enemy have led to awards to Canadians without discrimination. On the other hand, under the system which has been in force in the past and which is applied to the members of the armed forces of the British commonwealth with the exception of Canada, a substantial number of awards for courage and devotion to duty are made periodically, normally at the New Year and on the occasion of the king's birthday. These lists include operational awards earned by continued courageous action and devotion to duty during operations, and also awards for exceptional devotion to duty in the course of services rendered outside active theatres of war. These periodic awards normally consist of the Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, Knight Commander of the Bath, Companion of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the British Empire, Knight Commander of the Order of the British Empire, Commander of the Order of the British Empire, Officer of the Order of the British Empire, Member of the Order of the British Empire, and the British Empire Medal, all in the military divisions of the orders. Of these only one, namely, the British Empire Medal, has been regarded as being available to Canadians. The Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath, Knight Commander of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Order of the British Empire, and Knight Commander of the Order of the British Empire are higher classes of orders of chivalry; the recipients of these awards have the right to the title "Sir" during their lives and their wives are entitled to be called "Lady". They are thus clearly within the wording "titles of honour or titular distinctions" as set forth in the report. The other awards, Companion of the Bath, Commander of the Order of the British Empire, Officer of the Order of the British Empire and Member of the Order of the British Empire, are lower classes of the same orders of chivalry which do not carry titles. The recipients of the awards are entitled to wear ribbons on their uniforms and formal insignia on ceremonial occasions. These awards are, however, regarded as being so associated with titles of honour or titular distinctions as to be excluded by the provisions of the report.

In the practical working out of the British system of recognition of courageous action and devotion to duty, the present position results in discrimination between Canadians and members of the armed forces of other parts of the British commonwealth; and also in discrimination between officers and warrant officers, on the one hand, and non-commissioned officers and men on the other hand.

The best illustration of the first type of discrimination would be found in the case of commissioned officers, warrant officers, non-commissioned officers and aircraftmen who are charged with the direction and maintenance, under conditions of grave danger and hardship, of aircraft engaged in operation. Their courage and devotion to duty lead to extended recognition in the awards to ground personnel of the Royal Air Force, and of other air forces operating with the Royal Air Force, including awards in the Order of the British Empire, and medals of that order. In the cases in which equivalent courage and devotion to duty is shown by commissioned officers, warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and aircraftmen of the Royal Canadian Air Force, no awards involving membership in the Order of the British Empire can be made by reason of the principles set forth in the report. Other concrete illustrations might be taken from the experience of other branches of the Canadian armed forces.

The other element of discrimination is between members of the Canadian forces. Here, again, the best illustration would be found in the ground crews of a Royal Canadian Air Force squadron. Assuming that, through a difficult period, continued courage and devotion to duty had been shown by a pilot officer, a warrant officer, second class, and a leading aircraftman; under the present position, a British Empire Medal could be awarded to the leading aircraftman, but the warrant officer, second class, and the pilot officer would have to forgo recognition.

It is thought that the House of Commons might want to examine these aspects of the question, with a view to devising some means whereby discrimination, if any exists, could be avoided. Within the terms of the reference to the committee, it would be possible to submit recommendations to the house which would lead to the removal of any element of discrimination from members of the Canadian armed forces, except in the case, of course, of officers holding the rank of Rear-Admiral, Major-General, Air Vice-Marshal, or higher ranks. Under the existing system of awards it is not possible to arrange for recognition of the services of these higher ranking officers without providing for the revival of titles in Canada—a course which I am sure this house will agree would be unlikely to commend itself under present conditions.

In the making of recommendations with regard to these matters it will of course be understood that, under our constitution, the crown is the fountain of honour, and that any recommendations which may be made should take the form of recommendations with a view to their submission, through the appropriate channels, to His Majesty the King, for approval.

We are all conscious of heroic deeds which are being performed and of distinguished services which are being given by self-sacrificing and patriotic Canadian men and women in the armed forces. I think it will also be agreed that Canadians who are serving in many parts of the world and on many battle fronts beside their comrades from the United Kingdom, from Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and the Indian empire should, subject to the limitations of the resolution, be eligible for official recognition which may be regarded as equivalent to that given their comrades.

This is one of the reasons why the government has reached the conclusion that the whole question at this time should be studied by a select committee of the house. I trust that after the committee has examined the question from all points of view, the report which it may submit will be such as to commend itself to the judgment of parliament.

Mr. JEAN FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I wish to join the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) in paying a tribute to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). Sometimes I disagree with his policies, but I always admire his native eloquence.

Regarding this resolution, I remember that between 1930 and 1935 the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) took a definite stand against the awarding of titles in this country, precisely at the time when Mr. Bennett decided to go back to the old tradition of bestowing titles on Canadian citizens. We are frequently told that we are at war and that we should not forget that we are at war; and I do not. In my humble view decorations should be given only to those who risk their lives for their fellow citizens, either in the army, or in research when they expose their own lives in scientific studies, or in civilian life to those who risk their lives to save those of others, such as the man who jumps into the water to rescue a child from drowning. These people are entitled to decorations. Their decorations have a real meaning; they signify that a man has accomplished a conspicuous action for mankind at the risk of his own life. I assume that up to this point everybody will agree.

Now, sir, what is nobility? Noblemen were first roturiers, and the difference between a noble lord and a roturier is the fact that the lord has been made such from a roturier, who may be described as a man of the mob. It is interesting to discover how it happens that a man who comes from the mob turns into a nobleman as by enchantment. It is much the same as if he were touched by Merlin's magic wand. It is really funny. Four years ago, after a visit to England, I took the trouble to examine the House of Lords "Who's Who", and I noticed that one-half of the noble lords had belonged to the nobility only since the beginning of the twentieth century; that is, at the end of the nineteenth century they were roturiers.

Of course the highest degree of civilization is to enjoy the same kind of life as Horace did in Rome two thousand years ago, when, in the beautiful climate of Italy, garbed in a peplum, he could sit and philosophize while drinking Falernian wine. It was a great life. I know that the lives of most noblemen consist in enjoying the best that civilization can afford—in living in a castle, in hunting, in reading—because there are intellectual pleasures available to those whose livelihood is earned for them—in eating and drinking the best, in racing, fox-hunting and so on. This is very fine.

But the greatest nobility is the nobility of the heart, and that is why soldiers—and when I say soldiers I mean sailors and airmen as well—deserve a special recognition. Their hearts are so big that, though they may not always make the supreme sacrifice, they expose themselves to the risk of sacrifice in such a way that they are entitled to be distinguished in some manner, so that their fellow citizens, seeing them, will be in a position to observe, "That man is a hero; he must have accomplished conspicuous deeds that deserved particular recognition."

In the army there are three classes of men, and now I refer to the militia in particular. There are the privates; there are the non-commissioned officers, and there are the officers. Well, it takes a long time for a private to become a non-commissioned officer, and a much longer time for a non-commissioned officer to become an officer. For my part, the best reward that could be given, not as a matter of decoration—a medal with a ribbon—to any private, is to make him a non-commissioned officer, and the best reward for a non-commissioned officer is to make him an officer—and no officer is prouder than the man from the lower ranks who gets his promotion on the battlefield. Everyone will be in favour of this, but it takes a long time to get it. There is a reason for these promotions. It is that when a man is worth a promotion in the army he is in most instances qualified to have a larger number of men under his direction, and it would improve the army if we insisted upon the observance of the promotion system before going any further in connection with the distribution of titles.

I do not think more titles should be given; in fact, I think some titles should be dropped. For instance, take all those civilians who are now in uniform, especially in the Department of National Defence for Air. There are civilians who are in uniform now, doing civilian jobs, and who are entitled to allowances for their wives and so on. Do you not think, Mr. Speaker, that they should return to civilian life so long as they are doing civilian work? It is not because they are working in a defence department that they should be allowed such a privilege as to wear a uniform when they are not military men. The government should discontinue buying uniforms and paying allowances for these men.

I believe, sir, that you were in the house when we received certain correspondence from Toronto from a gentleman who wrote regarding the restoration of titles. He must have been acting for—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The question of titles is not covered by the resolution. The resolution refers to honours and decorations which do not involve titles. Therefore I do not think the question of granting honours which do involve titles comes within the scope of the resolution.

Mr. POULIOT: The first paragraph reads:

> Whereas the opinion has been expressed that the application of the principles embodied in the report in the circumstances which have emerged during the present war had led to discrimination between the members of the Canadian armed forces, and others of His Majesty's armed forces, between different ranks in the Canadian armed forces; and between Canadians actively participating in the present war, and others of His Majesty's subjects. . . .

I will not insist upon the question of titles, but I wish to say a word about decorations, using the language of the motion, to those Canadians who are "others of His Majesty's subjects." These must be people who have had nothing to do with the war. I should have liked my good friend the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) to say something more by way of definition of "Canadians actively participating in the present war" and, in the second place, "others of His Majesty's subjects." In the first place, reference is made to the armed forces of the country, and then there are two other categories of people mentioned. Who are those Canadians actively participating in the present war? Are they the dollar-a-year men? I admit that some of them are good men, but I wonder if all of them should be awarded decorations or anything of that sort when most of them are paid high travelling expenses and living allowances. They are already receiving compensation. Then there are "others of His Majesty's subjects." Who are they? Of course, the committee would have ample opportunity to inquire into the matter, but I remind the government that we are the ones who have to vote upon the motion for the formation of the committee, and, therefore, if anybody is to get the information the first ones to have that privilege should be the members of the house who have the responsibility of passing a motion like this, which is not clear at all. It does not satisfy my mind, and I know the farmers in my county will laugh about it. Let me make myself clear in this regard. They will not laugh about anything that is done in order to recognize the exceptional merit of anyone in the armed forces, but they will laugh when they think of those fellows who look after their own business while "actively participating in the present war." It is a distinction between the army and those business men who are "actively participating in the present war." It is most impressive. Besides that, there are "others." Who are they? It smells bad.

Whereas the further opinion has been expressed that it is impracticable to make provision for recognition of conduct and action involving gallantry, courage, meritorious service and devotion to duty without contravening the principles embodied in the report. . . .

If it applied only to the army, I would agree. But if it applies in the first place to "Canadians actively participating in the present war" but not in the army, and in the second place to "others of His Majesty's subjects", I do not agree with it. There is something more that strikes me. It is that reference to a report of a special committee of the house on titles, honours and decorations that was presented to the house on May 14, 1919, and carried, on division, on May 22, 1919. Nobody has read that report. It was passed when you, sir, were sitting in the house, but I never had that report. I do not know what it is. But I can tell you, sir, that that motion is superfluous, because when R. B. Bennett was Prime Minister he paid no attention to that report; he gave titles by the bushel and the shovelful. Therefore why refer to that report when it was ignored by R. B. Bennett? I find it childish, especially at this time when Russia, the United States and all other countries will pay no attention to those titles. Here we go back in the vaults of this chamber and find an old report of 1919 which has been ignored by R. B. Bennett when he created barons out of whisky makers and so on. It is childishness in war time—I can return the compliment to the government. I was once told by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that we should be serious. Is this a serious matter? It is toys to amuse the wealthy.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think the hon. gentleman is in order. It is not in order under the rules of the house to style as childish a resolution presented by a minister of the crown—or by any other hon. member as far as that goes.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Furthermore, I do not believe that the hon. gentleman is speaking to the very subject matter of the resolution, which is the expediency of referring to a committee of the house the question of studying some method to give recognition of conduct and action involving gallantry, courage, meritorious service and devotion to duty. I would like the hon. gentleman to withdraw that expression.

Mr. POULIOT: Then, sir, I will substitute the words "not serious".

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Even that is hardly in order.

Mr. POULIOT: Then I will substitute for what I have said that I cannot understand it. I will tell your honour what I have in mind when I used the expression "childish". Your honour will remember that Napoleon said, "c'est avec des hochets que l'on mene les hommes". "Hochets" means toys. That is why I thought of "childishness"; if you find it out of order, of course I desire to abide by your ruling, and I am not hard to please.

But, sir, the basis of that argument is a report, a report which I have never read, which I ignore except for the summary given in the resolution. The first paragraph of the motion summarizes the report that will be studied again by a committee which will include many distinguished members of this house, and especially my very dear friend and esteemed colleague the hon. member for Queens (Mr. Macmillan). In the first paragraph there is mention of titles, honours and decorations. I hear one of the ministers say "no". Well, you may table the famous report. It is easy to have copies made by the king's printer. I am anxious to read the report, but I am too busy to make long searches. If it is given to me here, I will read it.

So we have the preamble, "whereas" and "whereas" and "whereas", and then:

Therefore be it resolved:

That a select committee of the house be appointed to inquire into and to report upon the expediency—

The expediency, observe.

—(a) of maintaining the principles that form the basis of the recommendations contained in the said report and continuing in effect the said recommendations, or—

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That throws it wide open.

Mr. POULIOT: As it may be decided by the committee. But are we to entrust the committee with that job now? We are still in the dark, we do not know.

(b) of cancelling, altering, modifying or adding to the said recommendations, in so far as they relate to honours and decorations which do not involve titles, and, if so, in what respect and to what extent.

The whole thing will be studied from A to Z, I presume, and in my humble opinion that will be a waste of time. When I think of the intelligence of my colleagues, of their experience and their value as members of this house, to think that they will have to spend their time on this—and mark you, I do not say "waste", I say "spend" their time on this—when Tobruk has just fallen; when we heard solemn words of warning from the Minister of Finance just a moment ago, when everybody, if not fearful, is greatly concerned and worried about the future, I find that there is no time for this.

To summarize what I have to say it is this. In the first place there should be no snobbery in the army; there should be no caste in the army, no caste to keep privileges or promotions for themselves. The army should be made more accessible to the common man, and the common man should be given greater opportunity for promotion on the battlefield. The same thing applies to the sailor and the airman. If that is done, our men will be so satisfied with having at last what they were promised when they enlisted that they will not insist upon anything more than they are entitled to receive now in regard to decorations. Is there anything to prevent our men from receiving the Distinguished Flying Cross, the Distinguished Flying Medal, the Distinguished Service Order, the Distinguished Conduct Medal, and so on? But there is one thing I regret, and I will tell you what it is. I regret very much what was done in the case of one man, who at the risk of his life took away a bomb that had fallen either very near or in St. Paul's cathedral in London. He did something which was deserving of the Victoria Cross, but instead of any such recognition he has been put in gaol for five years. First get that man out of gaol; then we might talk about decorations. That is my humble view about the matter.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted just a word, I think my hon. friend is under a complete misapprehension with regard to this motion. I share his view as to the undesirability of bringing forward a matter of this kind at such a serious period in war, if it were at all possible to deal with it otherwise and see that justice might be done. But I want to say to you, sir, that a very great injustice is being done to the non-commissioned officers and men, and to the officers, of the armed services on account of the resolution known as the Nickle resolution, which apparently has been regarded as more or less binding.

May I say to the hon. member who just sat down that the Distinguished Flying Cross is awarded for gallantry in the face of the enemy, and the particular matter that is in mind as far as the armed services are concerned is awards for meritorious service not in the face of the enemy, service such as that to which he referred a few moments ago as being performed by a man who was a member of a bomb-removal squad. Those are matters which cannot be dealt with by way of recommendations at the present time, except in very limited fashion. The air force have an Air Force Cross which can be awarded for meritorious service not in the face of the enemy. The only thing the army has is what is known as the Meritorious Service Medal. That can be awarded for acts of bravery or endurance not in the face of the enemy, but it can be awarded only to other ranks, not to officers. The air force also has the Air Force Medal, which of course is not applicable to the army or the navy. If my hon. friend had noticed the birthday honours, he would have seen recognition accorded a large number of members of the British, Australian and other forces for meritorious services performed. These were not dollar-a-year men, to whom the hon. gentleman referred, but men who performed meritorious service, acts of endurance and devotion to duty, whose only reward can be some recognition of this kind by their country. The fact that this is a serious period in the history of the war constitutes, it seems to me, all the more reason why we should consider this question. It is all we can do for our boys, particularly those who, through no fault of their own, have not seen action as yet. I therefore submit to the house that this resolution should be passed and that the committee should be asked to examine into that situation.

My hon. friend has seen fit to indulge in some remarks with regard to promotions in the army. I want to say to him that promotions in the army are made from the ranks, except in some special technical services, and on merit. He speaks of young men being promoted on the field of battle. Every month young men are coming back from England to take officers' courses here, junior staff courses, for instance. They have been promoted in the field; they have shown their qualifications, and they have come back here to take these special courses. The same thing is being done with regard to the men in the ranks in this country. I think my hon. friend must know, or at least he should know, the rule that a man must serve for four months in the ranks before he may be promoted to become an officer. The hon. gentleman suggests that recognition should be given men by promoting them. There may be men who perform meritorious acts for whom no vacancy may exist as far as promotion is concerned. Would my hon. friend suggest that we should wait for a vacancy in the establishment and then solemnly make a man a corporal because he did something which should be entitled to recognition by way of a decoration? I say that is not the sort of recognition that is contemplated for acts of the sort I have mentioned. Men receive their promotions when they are entitled to them, having regard to their service and what they can do in the way of leadership and when there are vacancies. That has nothing whatever to do with these matters of exceptional gallantry or exceptional devotion to duty, for which it is hoped the decorations suggested here may be provided.

If I may presume to offer a suggestion, personally I have always felt that there was a good deal to be said for the establishment of a Canadian order, an order of our own. Here perhaps I may be stepping beyond the functions of a member of the house, particularly since the matter is to go to a committee, but it seems to me that this is a matter which might well be given consideration by that committee: a Canadian order of merit, for instance, or some other decoration, which might be awarded by Canada itself as a recognition of devotion to duty and meritorious service by its sons in the armed forces, or elsewhere for that matter.

Mr. CHURCH: If I may ask the minister a question, would he quote from the text of the resolution of 1919 any principle which prohibits the decoration of soldiers in this way at the present time, as applied to this war? I have the text of the resolution before me and I cannot find it. As a matter of fact, it is not there.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the text before me; but, if I remember correctly, orders of chivalry are mentioned, which would mean that membership in the Order of the British Empire could not be awarded even to those who might earn the right to such an award by reason of some act of meritorious service. That is one instance. I have not the resolution before me now; but I am advised by the legal officers of the department, and also, I think, by the legal officers of the Department of External Affairs, that the resolution does prevent the award of decorations of this kind for meritorious services which are not actually acts of gallantry in the face of the enemy. I cannot give my hon. friend the text, since I have not the resolution before me. Needless to say, as far as I am concerned, this matter would not have been brought before this house if it were considered that it could have been dealt with otherwise, but I have felt that a grave injustice was being done to the men in the armed forces, and this seemed the only way in which it might be remedied.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): That is an interpretation which makes it desirable that there should be a committee to examine the matter, and I want to commend the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) for having introduced this resolution. We shall certainly work with the committee and do our best to have these discriminations removed. The minister has referred to an interpretation at present used with which I certainly do not agree; this is an interpretation put by someone on the first part of the Nickle resolution. I raised this matter in March last year when I asked a statement of policy from the government as to the awarding of these decorations. Rather to my surprise that produced a statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the government would still stand on the Nickle resolution of 1919 and the interpretation previously given to the first part.

Mr. CHURCH: Is the hon. gentleman speaking for those on this side of the house or for himself?

Mr. COLDWELL: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. McLARTY: Does the hon. member wish to speak on this? Could we not get it through to-night? I do not think we should take up too much time with it.

On motion of Mr. Church the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 24, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PACIFIC COUNCIL

THE PRIME MINISTER IN ATTENDANCE AT WASHINGTON CONFERENCES

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform the house that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), at the invitation of President Roosevelt, left to-day for Washington to attend a meeting to-morrow of the Pacific council at which Mr. Churchill will also be present. During his visit the Prime Minister will also have an opportunity for further conferences with Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill. I should perhaps add that Mr. Churchill had also expressed a desire to confer, during his brief visit to this continent, with the Prime Minister.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

R.C.A.F.—ENLISTMENTS FROM QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. STOKES:

1. What is the total enlistment from the province of Quebec in the Royal Canadian Air Force?

2. Of these, how many are, (a) of French-Canadian origin, (b) of origin other than French Canadian?

3. Of each of the above categories, how many have (a) enlisted for actual flying duties as air crew, (b) enlisted as mechanics for ground crew duties, (c) enlisted for general duties?

Mr. POWER:

1. Recruiting centres in the province of Quebec are located in Montreal and Quebec city, and the enlistments from these two centres as at June 3, 1942, totalled 12,513 (including 352 Women's Division).

2. Where an officer or airman or airwoman does not indicate in his application or attestation papers that he is of French-Canadian origin the following points are taken into consideration in making the assessment:

(i) If he or she has a French-Canadian name as determined by a French-Canadian clerk.

(ii) If he or she completes in French the necessary information on an attestation paper printed in French.

(iii) If he or she makes the declaration on the attestation paper that he or she speaks French fluently and/or speaks very little or no English.

(iv) If he or she was born of French-Canadian parents in any part of Canada which is populated by French Canadians (Quebec, Gravelbourg, Sask., St. Boniface, Man., etc.).

(v) If the mother is definitely French Canadian, and the father is of French-Canadian extraction (even though the name may be "MacKinnon"),—especially if living in the eastern townships of Quebec.

Subject to the foregoing assessment the total enlistments indicated in 1 above are divided (a) 5,110, (b) 7,403 (including 867 U.S. citizens).

3. (a) French, 1,041; other than French, 3,231 (incl. 867 U.S. citizens). (b) French, 2,402; other than French, 3,305. (c) French, 1,582; other than French, 600. French, 85 (airwomen); other than French, 267 (airwomen).

CANADIAN ARMY—ENLISTMENTS FROM QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. STOKES:

1. What is the total enlistment from the province of Quebec in the Canadian army?

2. Of these, how many are, (a) of French-Canadian origin, (b) of origin other than French Canadian?

3. Of each of the above categories, how many have, (a) enlisted for active service anywhere, (b) enlisted for service in Canada only?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. It is not possible without an examination of over three hundred thousand records to segregate the total enlistments of residents of the province of Quebec. It is assumed that this question refers to the total number of enlistments which took place in the province of Quebec. The whole of the province of Quebec except four counties (Gatineau, Hull, Pontiac and Temiscamingue) is contained in military district No. 4 and military district No. 5. These four counties are included in military district No. 3 with headquarters at Kingston, Ontario. The total enlistments actually taking place in military district No. 4 and military district No. 5 in active units and formations of the Canadian army from 1st September, 1939 to 6th June, 1942 were 56,722.

2. Records of enlistments by racial origin are not kept, so that the question can not be answered accurately. The method of taking the names as indicating racial origin has been urged. This method is obviously open to the objection that French names are borne by those of other than French origin. On the other hand, those of French origin bear names which are other than French. However, a compilation has been made using this method, from which it is ascertained that the number of those enlisting from the province of Quebec (without counting the three counties above mentioned) who bear names which are generally considered to indicate French origin, whether French Canadian, French Acadian, or otherwise, is 29,651, and the number enlisting from the province of Quebec (without counting the three counties above mentioned) who bear names which are generally considered to indicate other than French origin, whether French Canadian, French Acadian, or otherwise, is 27,071.

3. All of the above have enlisted for active service anywhere. There is no provision for voluntary enlistment in active units and formations of the Canadian army for service in Canada only.

ROYAL CANADIAN NAVY—ENLISTMENTS FROM QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. STOKES:

1. What is the total enlistment from the province of Quebec in the Royal Canadian Navy?
2. Of these, how many are, (a) of French-Canadian origin, (b) of origin other than French Canadian?
3. Of each of the above categories, how many have, (a) enlisted for active service anywhere, (b) enlisted for service in the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. (Approximate)

Royal Canadian Navy.....	153
Royal Canadian Naval Reserve	521
Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve.....	4,506
Total	5,180

2. (a) (Approximate) 1,474.
(b) (Approximate) 3,706.

It should be stated that all recruiting for the Naval Service in the province of Quebec is done at one or other of the three R.C.N.V.R. divisions. One of these is in the city of Quebec and two are in the city of Montreal. At one of the Montreal divisions most of the recruiting is from the English population. In the city of Quebec, the division enlists both English and French recruits. In compiling the above figures an account was taken of the enlistments from the city of Hull which are dealt with at the Ottawa R.C.N.V.R. division.

3. All personnel joining the naval forces whether in the Royal Canadian Navy or reserve forces enrolled for active service where required.

RAILWAY TANK CARS

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. How many railway tank cars are owned and operated by the Canadian railways?
2. How many railway tank cars are owned by private companies?
3. How many railway tank cars are leased from outside of Canada and operated in Canada?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The board of transport commissioners reports that Canadian railways have about 400 tank cars on the books but it is not known how many of these are in service. The board states that these cars are used in company service for various purposes including transportation for water and fuel oil services in connection with oil burning locomotives and for other services.

[Mr. Ralston.]

2. Information not of record with the Department of Transport, the board of transport commissioners or the transportation and public utilities branch of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Tank cars of oil companies and other private companies are leased to shippers for the transportation of commodities as required, and the railways have no control over the movement of these cars except as they are billed from loading points to destination. This applies not only to Canadian private car companies but also to United States private car companies. Consequently, additional cars belonging to United States companies might be just as numerous on Canadian lines as cars belonging to Canadian car companies.

3. Information not of record in Department of Transport, Board of Transport Commissioners or Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

EMPLOYMENT OF F. LEDUC

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. Have the professional services of Mr. F. Leduc, C.E., of Montreal, been engaged by the government to make a survey into silk intended for use in parachute construction?
2. If so, when was Mr. Leduc appointed and for what length of time?
3. How much has been paid to Mr. Leduc to date for his professional services in this connection?
4. Has the government entrusted to Mr. F. Leduc other surveys or analyses into chemical products intended for use in war industries?
5. If so, when and for what period?
6. How much has been paid to Mr. Leduc to date in payment for his professional services in each case?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.
2 and 3. Answered by 1.
4. No.
5 and 6. Answered by 1.

FUEL OIL AND GASOLINE—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What quantity of fuel oil was in storage in Nova Scotia on March 31, 1942?
2. What quantities have since been received between the period of April 1 and May 31, 1942?
3. What was the average monthly quantity of fuel oil in storage in Nova Scotia during the years 1939-40 and 1941?
4. What was the average monthly quantity of gasoline refined in Nova Scotia during the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?
5. What has been the monthly quantity of gasoline refined in Nova Scotia from January 1 to May 31?
6. Has the refining of gasoline been continuous (along same lines as years 1939-1940) since January 1 to May 31 of present year?
7. How many oil tank cars are owned by the railways operating in Canada?

8. How many oil tank railway cars are owned by private companies in Canada?

9. How many oil tank cars have been used to transport gasoline to the maritimes (Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island) from April 1 to May 31?

10. What total amount in gallons of gasoline was shipped from other points to the maritimes from April 1 to May 31, 1942?

11. What total amount in gallons of gasoline was shipped from other points to Nova Scotia from April 1 to May 31?

12. In view of the extra heavy special wartime demands being made on supplies of fuel oil and gasoline in Nova Scotia, are steps being taken for greater storage? If so, will such plans provide for sufficient fuel oil and gasoline to meet the present requirements?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, it is quite impossible to give the information asked for in this question. The first question is "What quantity of fuel oil was in storage in Nova Scotia on March 31, 1942?" I am sure Hitler would like to know the answer to that, also the quantities received between April 1 and May 31. I would ask that this question be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not all of it, surely.

Mr. HOWE: Then let it be redrafted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister may be quite correct as to the first question, but there are other questions on matters of great public importance to the province of Nova Scotia. I have no brief for the member who asks this question but I do know that this matter is agitating the minds of the people down there and that they believe they have not had a square deal. I have not followed up this hue and cry, as the minister knows. Instead I have tried to help him. But the plain fact is that the people just do not believe what the minister has been telling them. It may be an improper attitude for them to take. I am not going to pass judgment on that. But the people down there have been stirred up and they certainly should be reassured.

Mr. HOWE: I am doing my best to operate the supplies of petroleum in the best interests of the war. I do not know that I am called upon to prove my position. I am not greatly worried whether people believe what I have said or not, so that we can leave that part of it out. I repeat however, that to make public the quantity of fuel oil storage at Halifax for the navy would not be in the public interest, nor would it be in the public interest to state what quantities have been received between April 1, and May 31, 1942. I suggest that it is also not in the public interest to state the average monthly quantity of fuel oil in storage in Nova Scotia during the years 1939-40 and 1941.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, all right.

Mr. HOWE: Surely hon. members know what is reasonable information to make public. I shall be glad to answer any questions other than those that concern storage and shipment of stocks of strategic materials.

Question dropped.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GASOLINE RATIONING—MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. PURDY:

1. How many gasoline rationing books in categories higher than "A" were issued in, (a) Nova Scotia, (b) New Brunswick, as at 1st May, 1942?

2. What is the number in each category?

3. How many books in each province and in each category have now been recalled and lower categories issued in place thereof, and to what categories have these been reduced?

4. What are the occupations of those who have had their categories reduced and are their cars used for other than pleasure driving?

5. Is the Quebec-New Brunswick border the dividing line at which the value of the gasoline coupon is reduced from five to two gallons?

6. If so, will the Minister of Munitions and Supply explain why this demarkation point was decided upon?

7. Are all points in the five eastern provinces, where gasoline is conveyed to the distributing centre by means of small tankers and tank cars, on the same rations?

8. If not, why not?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—PURCHASE OF COAL FOR USE IN PICTOU COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Were tenders called for or prices requested by the Department of Munitions and Supply for coal for use in Pictou county during 1942?

2. If so, what firms or persons were asked to submit prices, stating the grade of coal and place of delivery?

3. What tenders or offers were received stating the names of firms or persons, the grade of coal, the place of delivery and the prices?

4. What orders have been placed, stating dates, names of firms or persons, quality, quantity and grade of coal, place and time of delivery, delivered price for each order per ton?

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

R.C.A.F.—TORONTO MANNING POOL

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of the sylabus of training in the Royal Canadian Air Force at manning pool, Toronto, showing, (a) the length of time spent there by each recruit for air training, (b) the amount of time per day spent on fatigue and guard duties, and a copy of the rules and regulations relating thereto, (c) the number who have spent, (i) over six months' time, (ii) over three months' time at this depot; (d) the regulations as to weekend leave and fines imposed.

R.C.A.F.—STAFF AT TORONTO HEADQUARTERS, MANNING POOL AND EXHIBITION GROUNDS

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. Who compose the R.C.A.F. headquarters staff at Toronto and the officers at manning pool, and at the exhibition grounds?

2. The number of chaplains, clerks, stenographers, accountants, pay and bank officials, press liaison officers, amusement, physical training and sports, civilian and other quasi officers, their salaries, pay, emoluments, subsistence and other allowances.

3. Uniforms worn by these persons and the cost of same.

4. Their military training, if any, before appointment as officers.

5. How many will later go overseas.

6. How many are engaged in purely civilian duties at home, who appointed them, and what are their names and pay.

7. How many of those there now had any training in the universities C.O.T.C. when they joined, what is the length of time for training for this classification and what fatigue, guard and kitchen duties do they perform.

Mr. POWER: I would ask the hon. member to clarify his meaning of the words "quasi officers." With that restriction, I have no objection.

HONOURS AND DECORATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER APPLICATION OF PRINCIPLE ACCEPTED IN 1919 TO MEMBERS OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. McLarty, for the appointment of a select committee of the house to consider the application of the principle accepted in 1919 with respect to honours and decorations to members of the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not wish to prolong this debate, but I think the motion might be amended to enable the committee to consider the cancellation of hereditary titles now held by persons domiciled in the dominion. I believe it is in the public interest that citizens of this country should not pass on to their heirs and successors titles that are meaningless here, and which embarrass the holders of such titles in future years.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Last night I asked the minister in charge of this resolution certain questions on some parts of it. It is true that according to the ruling given by the Deputy Speaker, reference may not be made to the question of titles, but if one carefully examines the Nickle resolution of 1919 he will find that it deals with honours and decorations and also at least refers directly and indirectly to the subject matter of titles.

This resolution is based on the report of the Nickle committee of May 14 and May 22, 1919. I had the text of that report before me last night and quoted from it that soldiers' honours did not come under it. I find on further examination of the debate on the subject that there was a considerable number of speakers at that time, including members from Ontario as well as from all the other provinces, and it is clear from the text of the resolution and of the report of the committee and of its meetings that what the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Stirling) said last night is borne out as true, and that he stated the facts. I do not wish to be discourteous to the hon. member for Yale, because he is one of the most courteous men I know, but I would point out that this whole question was raised by him at the last session, when he asked, quite rightly, for a ruling on soldiers' honours and decorations.

I have no intention of detaining the house, but I am bound to point out to the government that over a month ago the Canadian people, by a "yes" vote on the plebiscite that was submitted to them, gave the government power to deal with the whole war question itself, and not by reference to committees, and in that vote the Canadian people showed a decidedly bellicose spirit toward the government and the House of Commons, including all parties, for our failure to get on with the war. In that vote the people urged the government and the members of this house to get on with a total war effort. Here we are, on the ninety-third day of the session talking about honours and decorations and all that kind of tomfoolery after the waste of time on a plebiscite. The enemy is at our front door, our back door, our side door and everywhere else, and still, at this late date of the session, we are engaged in discussing an academic question—because that is all it is—which is not primary, but secondary, and could wait until the end of the war.

If the legal officers of the crown are right in the opinion which they have expressed in regard to decorations and honours—and it is only an opinion; merely because they say so does not mean that what they say is right or what they take the law to be; it is a matter of policy, not of law—then a good many decorations given by certain bodies such as secret societies and other agencies in this country would be illegal. If these legal officers are correct in their position, then the Knights of Pythias and other secret orders, spiritual and temporal, have no right also under the principle of the Nickle resolution and would, for example, have no right to hand out to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), the title of lord high potentate of the Knights of Pythias or anything else. We have numerous other civilian bodies in this country that decorate their members and hand out honours. The Nickle resolution and the action of the parliament of 1919 cannot bind this parliament. Their powers ceased on the dissolution in 1921 of that parliament.

We see people parading on March 17 and on July 12 respectively. We see them on the streets wearing all kinds of civilian honours and decorations, and if the legal opinion we have on this subject now is correct, then these gorgeous decorations are also out. And so are university degrees. There are very few men on the front benches who have not doctors' degrees. I am glad to see them get these degrees. I remember when the Prime Minister was leaving the house in 1923 to get a degree from Yale; I told him, as he went out, that he was "becoming popular by degrees". I say, Mr. Speaker, that the time has gone by for fun or for talking of these matters in time of war.

Yesterday, June 23, was what we might call decoration day with the budget speech and this decoration debate. Well, I can remember many years ago, forty-six years ago, June 23, 1896 when the Tory government of Sir Charles Tupper went out of office because they would not stick to their principles, and Ontario and other provinces upset the government and elected another in their place. They elected the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I remember a temperance committee that once waited upon his government. I am not a temperance man myself, and I do not pose as one, so I was not on the deputation, but I did hear of that deputation being received by the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. The deputation was led by the Rev. Mr. Huxtable, and it asked for legislation based on a prohibition vote as a result of a referendum that had been held—it was called a referendum then; now it is a plebiscite. The Rev. Mr. Huxtable, in the course of his remarks, referred to Mr. Laurier, as he was then, as Sir Wilfrid. Sir Wilfrid Laurier replied, "Do not call me Sir Wilfrid; I am simply Mr. Laurier"; he said, "I am a democrat to the hilt". I am glad that afterwards Sir Wilfrid forgot his pledge against titles and was prevailed upon to accept a title, because he had earned it. He deserved that title as head of this country, and there was no law to stop it, nor did he take a plebiscite on it.

Let me point out to the government that in this resolution we have an example of the committee system of government. Instead of taking the responsibility for this question, the government passes it over to a committee. Who is asking for this anyhow? It is not the soldiers. We have been trying to get a committee appointed to consider soldier questions in regard to pensions, readjustments of pay, dependents' bonuses, soldiers' insurance, cheap fares, and other matters in which there are hundreds of anomalies and inequalities in the pay of the army, the navy and the air force, but nothing is done. All these matters of first importance should go to a committee ahead of the question of medals. We cannot get the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to take appropriate action on dependents bonuses. Perhaps the government do not realize that they have conferred a decoration on 99 per cent of the people—they did so last night, for they are sending 99 per cent of the people to the poorhouse. That is where the proletarian Canadian people are headed for. I repeat, this is not a matter for a committee, but for the government which has the power. A committee is not the proper forum to consider this question. The government must accept the responsibility for any changes that are made. Since the beginning of this war we have had nothing but the committee form of government, government by order in council and the controls system. I have sat on some of these committees, and the system has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. There are five or six of these committees sitting now. I myself have attended meetings of committees, and I am disappointed in the work that is being done. We have had no report in regard to what is being done in the war expenditures committee; we have had no report in connection with the radio, and so on. The government has initiated this decoration question itself without any demand for it, and must abide by its decision; it must take responsibility for the whole thing. I am not going to refer to the word "titles", or discuss that question, because the Deputy Speaker last night properly ruled that only honours and decorations are being considered; but the fact is that the government is simply trying to shift the responsibility from their own shoulders to a committee. In other words, the door will be wide open for the committee to send on titles. I am a supporter of soldiers' medals, honours and decorations, but not hereditary titles.

This committee will not add anything to the powers which the government already has in regard to decorations and honours for soldiers. Why appoint it? Honours and decorations are the only question before the house, and the government can take action in that respect. I am not going to labour the point much further, but it seems to me a pity that we should be discussing this matter now while we are leaving undiscussed the important and urgent questions I mentioned with regard to soldiers and their dependents. What does it matter if someone wants an honour or a decoration at once when the war is on and he may be decorated immediately? I cannot understand the mentality of this house when it will consider, without much effort, an academic resolution like this, while it refuses to do something for our soldiers along the lines I have mentioned. This is a purely academic motion while the war is going on. We do not want a motion of this sort. This is a motion from a government that does not govern, a government that has no policy and is guided only by political expediency. The people are wondering when this House of Commons is going to wake up to a realization of the real war situation, before it is too late and we are invaded. We have been here a long time now, and in my opinion the government has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The people of Canada showed that through the ballot box a month ago. It showed a hostile, bellicose spirit toward the way in which we have been conducting the business of the country. If representative government is to survive in Canada—I say this with all due respect to your high office, Mr. Speaker—there must be an end of politics in this house in war time, because since the war started, the government has been carrying on the affairs of the country from the party point of view. Every backbencher as well as every front-bencher must take his responsibility in the matter and, if necessary, supporters of the government must make the sacrifice involved in standing up for principle. Everyone must be prepared to spend some time in the wilderness for principle's sake, and every member of the government should be willing to do his duty and stand by his principles and forget politics until victory comes. This is not the time for this resolution.

No one objects to decorations and honours for our soldiers. As I said before, the government has the necessary power, as will be found by reference to the report submitted in 1919. I am not going to read that report, but hon. members can find it in Hansard of May 22 of that year. Mr. Nickle of Kingston City moved the adoption of the special committee's report, and it was pointed out in the report that decorations and honours, so far as soldiers were concerned, were not being interfered with. The Nickle report also referred to the fact that a report, signed by twenty members of the House of Lords and the House of Commons in Great Britain, had criticized the corruption which prevailed in England at that time in connection with the granting of honours, decorations, titles and all that sort of thing for purely party purposes. No sensible person will object to honours and decorations for our soldiers, but this is certainly not the time to raise or debate such a policy, when the enemy is at our door. I do not know what is wrong, but it seems that we in Canada are lacking entirely in war mentality, and that is largely because the government is introducing academic measures, such as the one now before us, and taking up the time of parliament in that way. The government cannot get away from the principle of the resolution that was passed in 1919. The Canadian people, in the "yes" vote which they gave in the ballot box a month ago, showed what they thought of the government and want a real war spirit. In conclusion, I object to this motion, for these reasons now. The committee will not have power, by the text of this resolution, to add to any of the powers which the government now has and which the Nickle resolution left with the government, so far as decorations for soldiers, and honours of that sort, are concerned. A declaration from a committee will not add to the powers of the government in this regard.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I do not intend to delay the house by discussing the question of honours or decorations. I simply wish to protest against the time of the house being taken up by this discussion when such an important measure as Bill No. 80, having to do with man-power, should be under consideration. With the Huns sinking our ships on the Atlantic coast, and the Japs shelling our Pacific coast, surely the question of man-power is the urgent one that should engage the attention of the house at this time. I would suggest that this resolution be referred to a special committee for consideration, and then any hon. member who wishes to speak later on will have an opportunity at a more propitious time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, we the members of the House of Commons are the representatives of the people of Canada at the hour of her gravest danger, at a time when her very existence is threatened and when defeat means death or slavery to our people. Under conditions such as these one thing and one alone should be considered; that is, how can Canada and the Canadian people make the most effective effort to help the freedom-loving nations of the world, and to save themselves from the perils which day by day are coming closer to our shores. This is no time for false optimism. The months before us will be filled with grave danger; they will test the resources of the united nations and the character of their peoples to the utmost limits. Let us not take it for granted that we are sure to win this war. If we and the united nations have the will to win; if we and our people and the peoples of the united nations are prepared to make sacrifices, increasing sacrifices, under more difficult and trying conditions, then we shall win. But if we are not prepared to make those sacrifices, we will not win.

Let us consider the conditions and the outlook facing Canada to-day. On the Atlantic, German submarines are sinking ships along the American coast; not off the coast of the United States alone and in the Caribbean, but off our coasts, off Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Quebec, right in the St. Lawrence. On the island of Newfoundland our troops stand side by side with their brothers in arms from the great republic to the south, defending the approaches to Canada and the north American continent from the forces of the axis powers. Farther to the east and north the United States has assumed the protection of Greenland and Iceland. In the case of Iceland they relieved troops from Great Britain and from Canada, which fortunately arrived in Iceland before the invasion forces from nazi Germany were able to do so.

Farther to the east and south we have Great Britain with a large army, together with our own Canadian army of volunteers overseas who stand on guard protecting Britain itself and preparing for the day when a second front can be established on the continent of Europe. It is well for us to remember the important part played by our first division overseas when, after Dunkirk, in so far as organized land forces were concerned, they would to a great extent have been called upon to bear the brunt of any attempt of invasion of Britain. We all remember the terrible air attacks of the German luftwaffe, and the destruction, suffering and death they brought to the British people. But even that terrorism could not break the morale of the British; their courage saw them through. Nor did those attacks lessen their grim determination to resist aggression.

I wish to pay tribute to the men of the Royal Air Force whose courage and determination stood between a victorious German army and the world domination which they nearly achieved at that time. We as Canadians are proud to know that many from Canada were in those immortal squadrons that saved the freedom-loving peoples of the world at that time. The names of those airmen of ours will never die. As long as freedom exists in the world their achievements will never be forgotten.

In more recent days the forces of the British empire have been joined overseas by large numbers of troops from the United States of America, who came to play their part in the fight for freedom in the world.

Still farther to the east across the continent of Europe, in a battle line stretching from the Arctic ocean to the Black sea, thousands of miles in length, we have Russia, a nation of 190,000,000 people, locked in a life-and-death struggle in battles that may well become the greatest ever to take place upon the face of the earth. Russia, in spite of straining every nerve to produce the equipment she requires, must have help from the other united nations to aid her in equipping her armed services. We are all indeed glad that Great Britain, the United States and Canada are giving that assistance in increasing measure.

In north Africa we have suffered a disastrous defeat, toward the end of the third year of the war. That defeat has imperilled the whole position of the united nations in the east. Throughout Europe the nations which have been overrun but whose spirits remain unbroken and whose people are still unconquered are seething with unrest. Those freedom-loving peoples have fought and are fighting for us with every means at their disposal. They are fighting for the cause of liberty and for the very existence of this country.

To the west the present situation from the point of view of the united nations is no brighter. On December 7 last Japan entered the war, entered it in such a manner that she sacrificed her national honour for all time to come. She had pledged her word, and without warning she broke it. She aped the treachery of her axis partners. Deeply though that treachery is resented by the people of the world, we must admit that in a period of less than seven months the Japanese have made substantial conquests. They have taken Guam and Wake islands, Hong Kong and the Philippines, Malaya and Singapore, the Dutch East Indies and part of Borneo, the Andaman islands and Burma. They have made heavy attacks on Hawaii and Australia. They have greatly increased the tempo and ferocity of their attacks on China, I believe with the idea of opening land communications with Burma, thus releasing a large quantity of their merchant shipping for other purposes. It appears to me that the Japanese problem at this time is one of transportation, not man-power. Japan is a nation of 70,000,000 people; she has a tremendous army; millions of men, experienced troops, well equipped; men who have been brought up from childhood to glorify war, who believe that the greatest honour they can receive is to be killed in action on the field of battle for their Mikado and for the Japanese empire, and that such a death gives them a passport to the heaven that they envisage. She has an army of soldiers who believe in conquest, into whose minds hatred and jealousy of the white nations have been inculcated for many years. Even when they were our allies in the last war they had no love for either the Canadian or the United States troops. I believe that Japan has been working according to a plan carefully prepared over a period of many, many years. It was at the end of the last war that they obtained their foothold in Manchuria. They made large investments of capital in the city of Harbin, and it now appears clear that they were only waiting for the most opportune occasion for Japanese troops to follow their investments, for the conquest of Manchuria.

[Mr. Mulock.]

As I have said, their plan of action has been very carefully prepared. Every eventuality has been considered, and alternative or supplementary plans have been prepared in detail, ready to go into effect as the exigencies of the situation demand. Within the last few weeks Japan has commenced the occupation of the Aleutian islands, the stepping stones from Asia to the north American continent. These attacks on the Aleutian islands may be a great deal more dangerous and a much greater menace to the people of the north American continent than many believe at the present time. It has been the opinion of many who are well informed and who have had much experience that attacks on our western coast are most likely to be in the nature of sporadic raids. They may be correct; I hope they are, but I believe they are wrong. The Japanese nation, which has been preparing for many years, whose forces are highly trained and well equipped, including hundreds of thousands of men with actual front-line experience in battle, is now at the peak of its military strength. Is it reasonable to expect that Japan will wait until Canada and the United States have attained their maximum power; that Japan will wait until the forces of this continent can dictate the time and place for the great battles of the future? I do not think it is. Japan realizes that the final reckoning, no matter what temporary conquests she may make in Asia, will be with the nations of the north American continent and the British empire. It is quite probable that she may try to invade this continent by way of the Aleutian islands and Alaska before we have mobilized our utmost strength. If the Japanese meet with success in the Aleutian islands, and if for the time being the balance of sea power in the Pacific should shift in their favour, I believe it quite possible that they may make an actual landing in force on the upper western coast, fortify their positions and try to hold that part of this continent until such time as they can bring up additional troops, munitions and supplies of all kinds, in the meantime fortifying their harbours and constructing airports to use in their drive southward along the Pacific coast, west of the Rocky mountains and protected by them.

Those attacks must be stopped before they reach Canadian territory; yet there are those who would oppose the repeal of section 3 of this act and would seek to prevent our troops, raised under this act, from fighting alongside United States troops for the very protection of this continent of north America.

No one can tell where Japan will strike next; she holds the initiative. With an improvement in her transportation problem the attack might be on India, through Burma. It might be another attack on Australia, or on Midway and Hawaii, to gain control of the mid-Pacific and so lessen the advantages of the Panama canal to the united nations. It might take the form of an attack on the Russian area from Vladivostock to Khabarovsk, not only to force the Russians to move troops from the German front but also to obtain for Japan control over an area in which airports might be located for use against her vulnerable cities.

Until such time as the allied forces are able to go on the offensive, the axis powers will to a great extent have the choice as to the location of battles and the time when those battles will be fought. With the axis powers holding the initiative we must expect a variety of attacks to be made in an attempt to divert us from our main objective, the establishment of a second front and the destruction of the German war machine. It is possible that the present axis strategy is to attack in a number of widely separated areas, with the object of creating confusion and panic among the united nations. Their great purpose, we may be sure, would be to prevent, if possible, the united nations from assembling in Great Britain the forces, munitions and transport necessary successfully to invade the European continent.

It may be that the present occupation of the islands in the Aleutian group is for this purpose. On the other hand we can be very sure that if the Japanese achieve successes, they will follow them up very quickly. It is almost a foregone conclusion that in the development of the strategical scheme Canada, with its vast air training plan, has not been overlooked by the axis powers. The German high command undoubtedly does not view with equanimity the arrival in the skies over Germany of increasing numbers of Canadian airmen. It may be that by these threats they hope to have large numbers of these airmen retained in Canada. Perhaps they expect, by engendering a feeling of panic, to create a demand in Canada that our forces now in Britain be brought back here.

With conditions as they are; with perils and dangers coming closer to our shores, unfortunately already there are some who subscribe to this view, who say that our troops should not fight alongside the armies of Great Britain, the United States or Russia, but should be kept in Canada. May I make it quite clear that I am not advocating the sending all of our troops overseas; that we would leave our coastlines undefended, or that we should not build up our coastal defences in every possible manner. But the fact remains that we in Canada are going to be in a desperate position if the time ever comes when we must defend this country with the forces that can be raised from eleven and a half millions of people, without help from other members of the united nations.

There are still those who say that the United States will protect us, that the United States will not let any other nation take Canada. I should like people having those ideas to consider this. If Canada relied on the United States to protect her and was not willing to assist the United States in the Aleutian islands, in Alaska or on their western coast, what right would Canada have to expect help from the United States if we should need it? If attacks were made on Prince Rupert, or Vancouver, or Victoria, it might be that our action in refusing to help the United States when our help was most needed would make it impossible for the United States to send us help, no matter how much she might desire to do so.

Others say that they do not want to fight for England. To them I would say this. Britain stands between Germany and world domination. In order to achieve world domination Germany must destroy Great Britain, but she does not particularly want the British isles. They have not the great mineral resources, the great ability to produce potential electrical energy, the vast spaces for colonization by surplus German population, the great farming areas that we have in the Dominion of Canada.

Do not for one moment believe that a defeat in this war will not directly and seriously affect us, and those we represent—because it will. If we do not realize this, then we are indulging in wishful thinking. If Germany should win this war she would probably reward heroes in her army with properties and farms in this country. It is probable that she would take over the farms and allot them to whom she wished. We, and those whom we represent, may be on our farms; but in such event we would not be there as owners, but as virtual slaves until the day we are lucky enough to die. If Germany should win this war and should decide to make large transfers of her population to Canada, can we doubt, with the lessons of Poland, Czechoslovakia, Norway, Holland and France before us, that she would have a few purges to remove those who had been most troublesome?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There would be no Postmaster General.

Mr. MULOCK: Or leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not bad!

Mr. MULOCK: And she would send those of our people whom she did not want up to the north country, or to some other part of the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): New Brunswick.

Mr. MULOCK: There are people who say that Hitler is wholly to blame. Of course Hitler has a lot to answer for. But getting rid of Hitler, and the rest of the gangsters associated with him, including those in charge of the nazi party, would not correct the situation. Let us not forget that millions of children growing up in Germany have been trained in nazi principles since they were four years old. They have had inculcated into their minds the rabid nazi propaganda that the nazi way of life is the only one worth living—that is worth fighting for and worth dying for. From the time they have been old enough to understand they have been told that they belong to a super race which should dominate the world, and that if they would follow their nazi leaders they would become the masters of the world, with a greatly improved standard of living. Such ideas have been so firmly planted in the minds of those young people that there have been instances where children have betrayed their own fathers and mothers to the gestapo.

Can we expect any mercy, any fair treatment, from brutes such as these? While it is true that we fight for freedom alongside Britain, and alongside the United States and Russia, it is equally true that we fight for ourselves, and our very existence as a nation.

When I asked the people in my constituency to vote "yes" on the plebiscite, these are the words I used:

> At this time any government responsible to the Canadian people for the safety of the state, for the defence of Canada, for the protection of the men, women and children of this country, must have an absolutely free hand, unfettered by any commitments of any kind, so that they in their judgment may do that which they consider best to defend this country.

By a very large majority the people of Canada voted "yes" on the plebiscite. As a result, we have an amendment before us; and unless the amendment is approved by the house, the government is prevented from sending troops raised under the National Resources Mobilization Act to the Aleutian islands, Alaska and the United States territory on the Pacific coast, because that would be service outside Canada and the territorial waters. If the amendment is defeated, the government could send those troops only after passing an order in council under the War Measures Act, a procedure which would be in direct disregard of the expressed will of the House of Commons.

Do hon. members who object to the removal of this restriction believe that we should ask our United States brothers to defend us at sea and on the land, ask them to protect us from attacks by the Japanese? Do they believe we should keep our troops raised under the act on our own side of the border until United States troops have been driven back, before coming to their assistance and before beginning to fight? Do they not believe that any request we might make in the future, whether for help along our eastern or western coasts, might be received with this very reasonable thought: "If Canada has to fight by herself for a while, she will be more sympathetic in giving help to us, the next time we need it".

Do hon. members who oppose the amendment believe that in the event of our overseas army being sent to the attack on the continent of Europe and to fight for them and for our country, the government should leave those men to their fate, without proper reinforcements? With such an attitude I could never agree.

My position is this: I believe the amendment is necessary for the protection of this country, and for the protection of our volunteers overseas. I do not believe we can protect Canada or win the war by staying within our own boundaries and waiting to be attacked, any more than any other of the united nations can help to win the war by keeping their troops indefinitely within the borders of their own countries.

I do not believe that conscription should be put into effect unless it is going to assist and strengthen the war effort of this country—and at this time I do not believe that it would do so. I agree with the statement of the Prime Minister: "Not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary."

In connection with the repeal of section 3, the result of which repeal would be to give the government a free hand in connection with the raising of troops for overseas service, it has been suggested that other commitments should replace the one now being removed. Some desire an understanding that in the event of the present amendment being approved by the house there should be immediate conscription. Others wish to tie the hands of the government by saying, "If the bill passes, will you promise not to put conscription into effect, under any circumstances?" To both I say this: We are one of the united nations fighting in a world war, a war in which conditions change from day to day. The government has a very real sense of its responsibilities, and it wants to be free to deal with problems as they arise, and according to its judgment as to what is best in the light of prevailing circumstances. It must be realized that there are times when the government receives from other governments certain information which it cannot divulge. I make this appeal: Do not hamper the efforts of the government to defend this country. Our ideas may not be the same as to what constitutes defence; but upon this I hope we are unanimously agreed: We all want to serve Canada to the best of our ability. Having that determination, I ask the house to do what the Canadian people have done: give the government a free hand to get on with the war.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to offer my congratulations to the minister who has just spoken (Mr. Mulock). He made a very fine speech—except toward the end of it, when he clearly indicated that he was not in favour of immediate conscription.

In rising to take part in the debate I fully realize the importance of the bill before the house, and the obligation imposed upon every hon. member when the vote is taken. When the plebiscite bill was before the house I was one of the members who opposed having a plebiscite because I held the view that it was the duty of the government to take whatever action might be necessary from time to time to meet the ever-changing conditions of the war from day to day. But when the members of this house decided that we should hold a plebiscite I supported it in every way and worked in my own riding to obtain a "yes" majority. That "yes" majority was obtained, and I wish to make it perfectly clear, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the electors of my riding were concerned there was never any misapprehension as to what they were voting for. Despite all the red herrings that were dragged across the trail and all the speeches made hour after hour as to what plebiscite meant, people in my section of Ontario were of the opinion that when they voted "yes" on the plebiscite they were voting for conscription for overseas service, and when they voted "no", they were voting against conscription for overseas service. The electors in my part of Ontario have always been 100 per cent for a total war effort, and they are to-day.

Ever since September, 1939, I have felt that that was the time, when Canada declared war, to introduce conscription of our material resources and man-power for service anywhere in the world. But at that time we were still living in the days of isolation and appeasement, and we were starting the practice of drifting and playing at war. If anyone will read the speeches recorded in Hansard in that short session of 1939 he will see that some of the members advocated a very limited participation in the war by Canada. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) will read the report of that debate he will not find one single word of coercion or direction by the United Kingdom or any other nation as to what action Canada should take in the war. Everyone realizes and appreciates that Canada entered this war of her own free will and accord, as a free, independent nation. The question was brought up in parliament and decided upon by the duly elected representatives of the people.

> It is not a word they are opposed to; it is the thing which the word "conscription" has come to symbolize in their minds. In their minds, conscription is the theory that they can be forced to enrol, train, fight and die for some other cause than that of their own country.

Not only the Minister of Justice but many other members of the house spoke along similar lines, trying to indicate that the Canadian army is not fighting for Canada but that Canada is in this war because it is an imperialistic war being waged on behalf of Britain. Last week the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon) very capably and eloquently made clear that the only powers which have any imperialistic designs to-day are the axis powers. Does any hon. member of this house attempt to say or argue that Canada is fighting an imperialistic war for Britain? I say that the Canadian forces, no matter where they are fighting, are fighting to defend the shores of Canada. When the British navy sank the Graf Spee off the coast of south America and the Bismarck in the north Atlantic, does anybody suggest that these two naval actions were not fought just as much in defence of Canada as in defence of Great Britain? Or when Japan struck at Pearl Harbour, was not that just as much an attack on the west coast of Canada as on the western defences of the United States? Does any hon. member of this house think that the soldiers of the great republic to the south of us are fighting an imperialistic war for Great Britain or any other country? Certainly not. They are fighting to defend their own country, their own lives, their own porperty, and the rights of their citizens. Both Canada and the United States are waging war on behalf of their own peoples. They want to preserve their own religions, their own race, their own freedoms and their privileges. It is quite true that in this war the United States and Canada are allies with Great Britain, but we are also allies with Russia and China and Mexico and Belgium and all the other members of the united nations.

The aims of the united nations are set out in part in the Atlantic charter and in the other agreements signed by the united nations on January 1, 1942. I wish to refer to only one sentence, clause 2, of the Atlantic charter, which reads:

> They desire to see no territorial changes that do not accord with the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned.

Does that sound as though the United Kingdom or the United States were waging an imperialistic war to gain other lands? The united nations are welded together for a common purpose, to defeat a common foe. The aim of the united nations is the survival of democracy and of freedom and of all those decent things of life which free men cherish. I say again, let no one in this house be misled into thinking that Canada is waging an imperialistic war.

The Minister of Justice in the same speech also stated that there was no duty upon a Canadian citizen to give his life in the defence of any other country. I quite agree with him, but I would also point out that there is nothing in the laws of the United Kingdom or of the United States or of the other members of the united nations which imposes any such obligation upon their citizens. But when Japan struck at Pearl Harbour on December 7 last the attitude of the United States changed overnight. Gone forever were their days of isolation and appeasement. Within a few days the Congress of the United States passed in a matter of minutes, without a dissenting vote, a law which made compulsory service for American soldiers anywhere in the world the law of the United States. Will any member from the province of Quebec attempt to argue that that law was passed to aid Great Britain in an imperialistic war? Certainly not. That law was passed to protect the lives and property of the citizens of the United States, because the United States realized at once that the common enemy must be met and defeated far from American shores.

It has been stated many times in this house that our front line is overseas. Only yesterday the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) stated that our front line was in the English channel. I agree with him, and I say further that our front line also runs through Libya, on the Egyptian border, through Midway island and the Coral sea, through Australia—wherever, in fact, the enemy is operating. Why do hon. members attempt to argue that they only want to fight for Canada on Canadian soil? Does any member of this house or any citizen of Canada want to see the fight take place on Canadian soil? Are there any who want to see the front line run through Vancouver, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, or Halifax? I wonder if some people realize what war in the front line is like. If hon. members want a picture of war in the front line at Hong Kong, there is running in the Saturday Evening Post a series of articles entitled "I escaped from Hong Kong," in which will be found a vivid eye-witness account of life in the front line, of the savage barbarism of the Japanese, of the unspeakable tortures that they wreaked upon helpless British soldiers and officers, of the indignities inflicted upon civilian prisoners, and of the raping of women. Is that the type of warfare that any Canadian citizen wants to have in Canada? I say frankly to you that if we do not defeat the enemy overseas that is exactly the type of warfare, and the nature of atrocities which will be committed on Canadian prisoners and Canadian women in Canada.

The United States realized that the war had to be won overseas and for that purpose they passed an act making service compulsory anywhere in the world. That is why to-day we find American soldiers stationed over the entire globe. Everyone realizes that in times of emergency, of national crisis, many of the liberties and the rights which individual citizens enjoy in peace time are taken away. This is only natural, because the state must be protected no matter what the cost may be. And in imposing conscription for anywhere in the world the United States did not hesitate: they did not seek to appease any one section of that great nation, neither did they sit on the fence. Will anyone in this house attempt to argue against the principle that in time of war every citizen owes a duty to the state, a duty which may even cost that citizen his life? For the state must be preserved at all costs. In all democratic countries there are people who in times of peace are only too ready and willing to accept all the rights and privileges and advantages of free citizenship, but when war comes they are the first to find obstacles and excuses for staying at home. They are only too willing to stay at home and "cop off" the good jobs, the high wages, the cream of everything that is going, cashing in on the other man's patriotism while he is away fighting their battle. Mr. Nash summed it all up very clearly in his fine speech before the rehabilitation committee on Friday, May 22, when, speaking of New Zealand, he said:

I emphasize three things, and they are very closely related: one is that no man who goes away from his country to fight ought to be worse off because he goes away to fight. The same applies to women—no woman who goes away to serve ought to be worse off because she goes away to serve; two, that nobody ought to be better off because he stayed at home, and three, no one in the present world situation should at any time expect to profit from the supply of the essential things associated with war.

The very same condition that existed in the last war exists to-day.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), in his recent speech in the House of Commons, is reported in Hansard, page 3391, as follows:

The other conception seems to many of us in Quebec to be characterized by a blind, sentimental, proud and even arrogant attachment to England, not only as the mother country, but as the real homeland toward which all loyal British hearts should ever turn.

I do not agree with what the minister said. Speaking for myself, I am a Canadian born in Canada. My parents also were born in Canada. Like the minister, I can say that the roots of my family go down fairly deep into Canadian soil. Both my parents were of Irish descent, and like all people with Irish ancestors I have a sentimental regard and affection for Ireland. But I do not think it can be regarded as blind or arrogant. I do not regard Ireland as my mother country. Canada is my mother country, and it is to Canada that I owe allegiance. My children regard Canada as their mother country, and it is to Canada that they owe allegiance. But at the same time I am proud to be a British citizen, and proud that Canada is a member of the British commonwealth of nations. Let me ask this one question; were would Canada be to-day if from the second of September, 1939, to the present day, the British navy had not stood between us and the German navy?

The hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), as reported at page 3402 of Hansard of June 16, said:

The Canadian army is three times the size of that of the American or English army, in proportion to population and other considerations.

The hon. member is not here, but I would ask that during the course of this debate he give the house the figures on which he has based his calculation. On the same page he is further reported as follows:

British troops are not yet in action on the continent, and Canada's contribution so far is relatively greater than that of England herself.

The hon. member must have forgotten that the British army was in action in May and June, 1940, in France, Belgium and the Netherlands, where they suffered many casualties and lost many prisoners. The British army was also in action in Norway; has he forgotten that? It was in action in Greece, Crete, Libya, India, Singapore, Burma, and many other places throughout the world.

Mr. MacNICOL: And Hong Kong.

Mr. WHITE: And Hong Kong too. The hon. member objects to sending reinforcements to soldiers overseas, but in the very next line he apparently realizes that our front line is overseas, because he says, at page 3402:

If the axis powers should succeed in their effort to crush that first line of defence,—

Referring to Britain. If that is our first line of defence, there is an obligation on Canada to provide all necessary reinforcements for our men overseas and everything else that may be needed for modern warfare.

But as Canadians it matters little whether we are of Irish, French, English or Scottish descent; we are Canadians first, and I for one have never looked upon Canada as a conquered colony, as mentioned by the Minister of Justice. I regard Canada as a free, independent, sovereign state, absolute mistress in her own house. But as Canadians we all have a duty to the state in time of war. You may call it patriotism, or duty, or whatever other name you wish. I cannot define patriotism or duty, but there is something inside everyone of us that in time of war tells us what is our duty and what is our obligation to the state. Ask any soldier who served in the last war what were the impulses and the real causes that made him enlist, and you will find it is very difficult for him to explain. I cannot explain in words why I enlisted in the last war. Neither can I explain in words why my son enlisted in this war. Perhaps it is something that is born and bred in every one of us, something handed down of the glories and traditions of the race from which we as individuals spring. I can only say that it is something that is very precious to every one of us, and it raises a question that everyone must answer for himself.

In regard to military district No. 3, in which I reside, the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) has advised the house that nearly all the men available under the National Resources Mobilization Act have been called up. The reason for this is the very large enlistment of young men in the active forces. They are young men who are willing to give up their future, their education, their careers, their homes, and all they hold dear, in the defence of Canada. I would like the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to say why one section of this country should pour out its best blood to defend another section which is unwilling to make an equal contribution. Or let the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) answer the question—the hon. member who stated in his speech that the minority, in his province, had made one concession after another to the majority. I for one would be much interested if the hon. member would place on Hansard during the course of this debate a record of those concessions.

The Minister of Justice stated further in the course of his speech, as reported in Hansard, page 3394:

> —nor have we any wish for domination over anyone. But we do wish to be recognized as full partners and full citizens anywhere and everywhere in Canada.

I for one would like to have the minister explain what rights the English-speaking Canadian has which are denied to the French-speaking Canadian. I would be much interested in hearing of one single instance wherein it can be shown that the French-speaking citizens of Quebec are discriminated against. The minister stated in the same speech that his province does not wish to dominate anyone. Will the minister deny that members from his province have had their fair share in the government and the direction of the affairs of this country? The minister himself holds the most important portfolio after that of the Prime Minister. The tolerance and understanding for which the Minister of Justice pleads with English-speaking Canadians might well begin with his own race in attempting to make some effort to understand the attitude of English-speaking Canadians. I say to hon. members from Quebec that you as a minority group in this country have always had your rights respected; your religion, your language, your culture, all the things which you hold most dear, have been preserved; but I ask you, how long do you think they would last under the German gestapo? If we go down to defeat you will lose everything that you hold dear. Only a few days ago the press of the civilized world reported that the gestapo had wiped out an entire village in Czechoslovakia. The inhabitants were butchered and the village itself reduced to a heap of ruins. With such atrocities staring you in the face, and knowing that such things might happen in Canada, even in your own province, how can you say that you are not going to join in total war because this is an "imperialistic" war?

[Mr. White.]

From the speeches made by many hon. members from Quebec it is indicated that they are going to oppose this amendment. I say to them, if you persist in that course you are going to leave in the Dominion of Canada such a legacy of hate, distrust and suspicion that no one sitting in this house will ever again during his lifetime see even a semblance of unity in this country. We have heard much in this debate about national unity, but apparently the view of national unity held by hon. members from Quebec is that the other eight provinces must bow to their will.

For years the province of Quebec have held the balance of power in this dominion and they have used that position for their own benefit. I for one say that the end of this has come. No longer are the eight other provinces of Canada going to be dominated by the province of Quebec. If this matter is to come to a showdown, the sooner the better. Does any hon. member believe that when the war is over and the boys overseas return they are going to be dominated by a province which refused during the war to make an equal contribution in the common cause? I say to you hon. members that you are to-day sowing the seeds of bloodshed and revolution in this country.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): That is what you are trying to do.

Mr. BRADETTE: The most shameful speech I have heard in this house.

Mr. WHITE: The hon. member will hear many more like it. The Prime Minister said that conscription would be enforced when it became necessary. Other hon. members kept repeating the same phrase. I would point out that we have had conscription for over two years in this country. To-day we are raising men for overseas service by conscription and by methods that do no credit to a democratic country, a country which has not the backbone to enforce conscription for overseas service. As was well pointed out by the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) in his speech last week, who can say what number of men are needed? We had one example, in the expedition to Hong Kong, of lack of trained men and equipment, and now we have a report which asks us simply to brush the matter aside.

I would ask the Prime Minister to make full disclosure in this house before the debate ends as to the real man-power situation, because a careful reading of the remarks of the Minister of National Defence yesterday shows he clearly points out that there are still very large reserves of man-power untapped in this country.

I for one have always felt that conscription on a selective basis is the only fair and proper method of raising an army. I am not one who has recently changed his mind on this subject, because, speaking in this house over fifteen months ago, on March 11, 1941, I spoke as follows, as reported in Hansard at page 1548:

> Recently the government had a series of radio talks which they called, "Let's Face the Facts". Why not face the facts right here in this house? Let us as members of parliament show, for once, a little backbone, and face the facts and admit that conscription of all man-power for service anywhere in the world is the only answer to the present situation. Any young Canadian who will not fight for his country is not fit to receive the benefits that this country gives to him.

The Minister of National Defence, replying to me, stated that I was only trying to hinder the war effort and to create disunity. But it is clear from a careful reading of the remarks made by the minister yesterday that he has changed his mind very much since March 11, 1941.

I well remember when this act which we are now seeking to amend was introduced in the house, and the Prime Minister appealed to hon. members for speed, in his very best Hollywood manner. With tears trickling down his throat, he pleaded to have the act passed so that he could have the necessary power to take further action in connection with the war. I wondered at the time what marvellous new scheme we were going to have. After weeks of delay we were advised that we were to have the farce of the thirty-day training scheme, a scheme which was approved by the chief of the general staff. Someone in this house coined the phrase that the young men of Canada had to be made "military conscious." To-day at twelve o'clock it was announced on the radio that Cuba was to have conscription immediately. It was also announced that New Zealand was forming a national government. I say to the members of our war cabinet and the other members of the government, who must have confidential information as to the exact truth of the war situation to-day, "How can you still quibble about politics and the survival of a party, at a time when the very existence of our country is at stake? Can you not realize that there is no such thing as a second prize in this war, that the united nations either gain the victory or we go back to a status that is not even equal to slavery?"

The Prime Minister has stated several times that he will put conscription in force when the proper time comes. Does he expect the Japanese to tell him what are their plans about our west coast? We have had evidence in the Hong Kong report of the slight knowledge or appreciation which the government had of the true situation before the boys were sent to Hong Kong. What we need in this country is decisive, courageous and intelligent leadership—not leadership of a party, not leadership of a caucus, not leadership of one section of the country, but leadership of the whole nation, intelligent and foresighted and courageous enough to tell the people what is needed and how to get it, and ruthless enough to see that they do get it. The Canadian people do not need to be spoon fed. They can take bad news; but when bad news comes it is glossed over and made to appear unimportant or insignificant. Let us be frank and tell the people the real truth. The real truth is that we have lost the war ever since it started; we have not even held our own. Does anyone deny that anything less than a total war effort by every citizen of the united nations will be sufficient to defeat the axis powers? We have only to look around the world and see what happened to the other nations that refused to put their house in order before the zero hour. Are we in Canada to suffer the same fate because we think we are safe behind a rotten Maginot line of isolation and appeasement?

Hon. members who served in the last war know better than anyone else the need of reinforcements and proper equipment at the right time. It is well recognized that if a new front is opened the Canadian army will be the spearhead of that attack. It will then be too late to send reinforcements overseas. Are we to have another Hong Kong through lack of properly trained men and proper equipment? I say that when this government decided to send an expeditionary force overseas there was an implied obligation that those men would be provided with all needed reinforcements and with implements of war in unlimited quantities. That obligation must be fulfilled to the limit.

I intend to support this bill, but I hope that on third reading the government will introduce all the necessary rules and regulations to make conscription for overseas service anywhere in the world enforcible at once. We must not be faced with another example of too little and too late.

Mr. L. PHILIPPE PICARD (Bellechasse): I was not privileged to hear all the speech of the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. White); I have surely missed many pearls and gems. But I heard enough to know the meaning that he tried to impress upon us. He said a moment ago that Quebec had been trying to run the country during the last few years. If he means by that that for a long time Quebec knew how to vote and so helped to bring to power the Liberal government that gave ten years of prosperity under Mackenzie King, he is right, and that when Quebec failed the good cause, we got Bennett and depression, he is right.

The hon. gentleman said that Quebec had tried to run the country. What did Quebec get from the running of the country in the way he means? I did not intend to touch on that matter, yet I am prepared to do so. There is a point I should like to bring to the attention of the house; it concerns French Canada's participation in the war and the extensive criticism thereof in the English language press. Many of my colleagues have refuted those insinuations, but I should like to touch briefly on one aspect of the matter, and that is the apparent success at times of some extremists and demagogues in Quebec who appeal to prejudice in the same way as my hon. friend did a moment ago. These people do not represent Quebec any more than the hon. gentleman represents English-speaking Canada, I hope. They represent a group of extremists who are a small minority, just the same as the hon. member represents a group or caste or school that, happily for Canada, is still a minority in English-speaking Canada.

One of the strongest arguments of those in Quebec who oppose our efforts for unity and harmony is that the majority still refuse to deal on equal terms with us and that we are denied our share of privileges.

The hon. gentleman says that we are running the country. It seems to me we are getting very poor results if we do run it. That would be a good answer to give to some of the extremists in Quebec. I should like to see some evidence of it.

Mr. LOCKHART: Explain the attitude on the plebiscite.

Mr. PICARD: The hon. gentleman will get his answer all in due course. I say to my English speaking colleagues: if you want us to carry on the fight for unity and understanding, rather than such appeals to prejudice as have been made this afternoon and are sometimes made in Quebec; if we are to struggle for unity and understanding between all citizens of good will in this country, whether English, French, Scotch, Irish, or central European, I say, give us a chance; give us the means by which we can curb the speeches of those who try to do in Quebec what the hon. gentleman did here this afternoon. Above all, show your good will more than merely in words and appeals to loyalty; give us our share of the public appointments. Do not overlook our people simply because you have not met them. Do not let the appointments to public control boards and supply boards be the fruit of personal association. Mr. X bringing in Mr. A. because they were on the same board of directors or because A was a good customer of his firm, as has been done so often. Look around and recognize that there are people whom you may not have met in business but who have as good training and education as yourselves. Give us our share, and we shall be in a position to silence the nationalists and extremists in Quebec. Do not expect us to be satisfied to have in Quebec federal public servants who cannot speak French, any more than people in Toronto would be content with men who could not speak English.

Mr. LOCKHART: Why not speak English?

Mr. PICARD: The matter has been settled when confederation was made and you will not change it to-day. Our majority partners in the confederation are surprised and horrified by the statements of some of our demagogues but a moment of serious thought would reveal they are themselves building these demagogues. Quebec is misrepresented by the statements of some of our extremists, but it is evident that the appeals of these extremists are strengthened not only by appeals like the one we heard a moment ago but by the poor handling of the practical end of the relations between the different races in Canada, by the sad neglect and oftentimes the disgusting prejudice shown against French Canadians by a certain caste of narrow-minded people in other parts of Canada as evidenced by the words of the hon. member who preceded me. They are supplying the material for our extremists to use in arousing bitterness and resentment against English Canada just the same as the hon. gentleman is trying to arouse bitterness among those of his own language against my people. Have you seen hatred and suspicion breeding from satisfaction and content? Try for a change to treat French Canadians on equal terms, not only in your speeches but in your daily acts. Do not discriminate against them in your industries, even in Quebec, or against their entry into the civil service; or, they being there, do not spend your time trying to justify overlooking their due promotion, as I have seen so often in the twelve years during which I stood with Ernest Lapointe in Ottawa. Give us a square deal; let us start a new deal for French Canada, and the preachings of the extremists will fall flat.

If one analyses carefully the speeches made during the plebiscite campaign, of which there is a record, he will find that three-quarters of them were based on these grievances, and on the treatment which the French Canadians consider they deserved but did not get.

Would it not be a clever move to try another method with us? Translate your good intentions into practice, and you will take most of the wind away from these demagogues. They thrive on grievances, just as other gentlemen like the one who spoke before me thrive on prejudices just for the pleasure of it and they will fall flat if you remove those grievances. I would not say to my hon friend that there is a feeling of love for Britain on the part of 100 per cent of the French Canadians, but I will say that all fair-minded French Canadians, which would include more than 90 per cent of them, have respect for Britain, and admiration for the behaviour of the people of Britain in this war. They have a deep attachment to British institutions, and above all they have great devotion for their homeland, Quebec, and their country, Canada. The best use could be made of that feeling by making them proud partners in confederation and in the national business. If they have an equal share in the profits they will be more than ready to accept an equal share of the liabilities. If you ask from them a full realization of their duties, it is up to you to give them full enjoyment of the same privileges you enjoy.

Once more, sir, this house is in the throes of a discussion as to the most efficient method of mustering Canada's man-power for a total effort for victory. We are going through the same procedure, voicing the pros and cons of conscription for overseas service. Is it truly for the good of the country that we should be again airing our advocacy or our opposition in regard to conscription? Does anything justify the continuation of such a discussion as to the proper method to supply the army with men? Has the present system of recruiting failed? Are our camps empty? Are training facilities not being made use of? Are there not in other branches of the service, such as the navy, the air force and other specialized units, definite waiting lists? I can answer in regard to the navy, because I know of a young man who tried to enlist the other day and was told that he might have to wait a month before he could do so. In short, are there any strategic or definite reasons why we should be again arguing this matter? There are none of which I know. We are at it again as the result of political manœuvres which succeeded in creating a psychic condition among a certain element of the population. If conscription had not been made a political football from the very start of the war, conditions in the country to-day would be more conducive to a successful war effort than they are tending to be at present, with the campaign that was started and is still going on, stirring up prejudice and resentment between classes and races in this country. Disinterested observers of the future who study the question without bias will, I am sure, cast all responsibility on the shoulders of those who, for purely political reasons, have agitated public opinion throughout Canada in order to impress upon the population the necessity of a conscription measure. The result of their behaviour has been to cause the country tremendous harm: first, by raising doubts in the minds of Canadians as to the scope and extent of their accomplishments; second, by causing such views to be broadcast in the United States, thereby impairing our publicity over there and creating a false impression concerning our war effort; third, by disrupting national unity by arousing suspicion and anger in the minds of Canadians with regard to the attitude of other Canadians of different racial origin. Those who engineered this campaign may feel proud, politically, to have succeeded—temporarily only—in dividing the Liberals on this question of the best means to supply the army with men. If they could survey their actions purely from the point of view of patriotism, they could not but feel ashamed of the result of what they have done.

As for myself, sir, I am against conscription, not as a matter of principle but as a matter of expediency, in the interests of the efficient prosecution of the war and the best results to be obtained in the struggle we are waging against Hitlerism. Since there is nothing just and fair in war, there never has been devised a means perfectly fair and just of summoning men to the defence of their country. Conscription is no exception to that statement. There is nothing just in the fact that the young and the sane and the strong, should sacrifice their liberty, their leisure, their comfort, sometimes their health and, unfortunately, their lives so that others may prosper or at least may not be enslaved. There is nothing fair in that; but even though no system can be perfectly fair, we must have recourse to one of two systems in order to provide the army with the men it needs. One is the voluntary system, under which men are invited to join the colours to fight the battles of their country. Up to now in most countries this has been found the only possible means of supplying the air force, the navy and highly specialized units such as the parachute troops, the tank corps and more recently the commandos. The other method is the compulsory system, under which men are called up by age groups, given a physical check-up and then either discharged or put in the army.

In a country where there exists a strong national sentiment and close national unity, where there is no doubt that the army is fighting not only ultimately but directly for the protection of the country, either by way of defence or of attack, it would appear that a compulsory method, applied without favour and through selective service, might be the least unfair, if there is anything at all fair in such a thing as the mobilization of men when we do not have mobilization of labour, of resources or of wealth. Unfortunately, sir, Canada is not in such a position. It is forever trying to build up national unity, which has never been completely achieved; and, unfortunately, it has no true Canadian national sentiment, nor will it have as long as French Canadians—and I admit it for my own part—consider their province to be their country, and as long as English Canadians think more of the empire and of Britain than of Canada. Moreover, no wars in which Canada has participated during the past century have been Canada's wars. They have been imperial wars in which we participated because of our imperial ties. National sentiment cannot be created in a country where at least fifty per cent of the people are not of pure British origin, in connection with the fighting of an imperial war or participation in an imperial adventure.

I have already stated in this house and elsewhere that I consider the present war, in the stage it has now reached, as vastly different from any preceding wars, and I have readily admitted the urgency of an unmitigated war effort. But national sentiment, even though it may be stirred when war exists, cannot be especially created when war is on. Therefore a system which might be defended under given circumstances would be inadvisable when all the elements necessary to its success did not exist; and it should be resorted to for service other than hemispheric defence only if the ultimate security of the country demanded it.

A day or so ago the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) mentioned the examples of Russia, France and so on in regard to compulsory service. As a matter of fact, compulsory service more or less originated following the French revolution, in an attempt to bring about a sort of equality of sacrifice of life, if not equality of sacrifice in other directions such as comfort and wealth and so on. As I have said, it can be applied in a country where national unity exists, and it is the only method that could be devised in Russia and elsewhere which would take account of conditions existing there. It never existed in Italy until the war of 1914. We shall see in a short time what pains of childbirth there were when it was brought out in England in 1916, seventeen months after the start of the last war.

What are the circumstances which concern us to-day as to our participation in the war? We have started out with a voluntary system, and it has up to now met with success. In fact we have barely been able at times to equip the men who enlisted. As it goes, the first policy of the government met with the approval of all the citizens, and it was stated to be, first, the adequate protection of the country; second, larger industrial output of materials not only for our own needs, but also to be supplied to Great Britain and our other allies; third, larger agriculture output not only to feed Canadians but mainly to feed Britain, which was in need of food and, fourth, a well-equipped and trained expeditionary force to share in the united nations' effort to curb the enemy abroad.

Canada has up to now splendidly worked toward that end. It has obtained 470,000 men who enlisted voluntarily for service anywhere, and it has an army of 150,000 mobilized under the National Resources Mobilization Act. My only reproach of the Department of National Defence would be that it has not availed itself sufficiently of the National Resources Mobilization Act to create an adequate territorial army. All the time and energy of the department has been spent on the so-called active force, whose very name implies that the territorial or defence army is to be inactive.

There can be no more inappropriate name for the defence army than the term "reserve army". It is a reserve for what?—a reserve that supplies the active, or the so-called active army—as if our army would become active only when they are on the soil of Great Britain, and only when associated with the imperial army? This spirit is evident at every step in the military set-up. A man mobilized for service in Canada was interesting as long as hope had not been abandoned to make him enlist for service overseas. The trouble is that the government's policy was entrusted to men who never believed in it, and who from the very start had other ideas in mind, and who tried to bring them about either through compulsion or through the moulding of public opinion by the Tory press.

I still maintain that there is nothing absurd or ridiculous in the idea I previously expressed in the house that there should be two different types of army in a country like ours, so long as it is made up in the way it is, and so long as we have no closer unity than exists among ourselves. There would be a territorial army for Canada, with conscription for Canada under a process of selective service, forcing all men who could serve or who could be spared from industry or agriculture for the defence of Canada. Then there would be a Canadian expeditionary force to take part in the war elsewhere for the defence of civilization, recruited under the voluntary system by the voluntary passage into it of men already in the territorial army, or by the voluntary enlistment of men not yet called in that army under the mobilization act. Both armies to receive the same proper training to make them fit for modern warfare.

That would give us a balanced war effort, without disturbing national unity. There is nothing absurd in it. What is absurd is the present system of putting a man, who is a conscript, in a regiment of volunteers. I will admit that procedure has no sense. On the other hand, if we are mobilizing units for the defence of Canada and recruiting units for an expeditionary force, both trained in the same way, and if we keep in Canada a little more of the machinery and equipment that we send abroad at present you will ensure a better defence of the country while contributing to the fight against the enemy on other shores.

There is a further point I should like to touch upon. I am getting more and more annoyed with the unfair and unjust campaign against Quebec and against French Canadians on the pretext of their opposition to conscription for service overseas. They are trying, like the hon. member who preceded me, to make the people of Canada believe that French Canadians are unworthy citizens, because they do not like conscription. They are trying to make us believe that they are less patriotic Canadians. To read some of the articles published in the Tory press, one would believe that French Canadians are the only ones in the empire who have opposed conscription for service outside Canada. Many of my colleagues have refuted that by citing the examples of Australia, South Africa and Northern Ireland.

Let me go further than that. Let us examine the whole question of the opposition to compulsory service. The objection to conscription is not a French-Canadian invention, nor is it a monopoly of my fellow compatriots. Allow me to quote an opinion on conscription:

> My objection to the employment of compulsion for the purpose of recruiting the army under existing conditions has not been based at all upon abstract attachment to a principle. It is based upon an entirely different ground, namely, that the employment of compulsion under existing conditions would forfeit what I regard to be of supreme and capital importance, that is, the maintenance of the national unity. That again is an abstract objection, but when translated into concrete terms it means this; if you were to apply, I do not speak of any particular method, but any method of coercion or compulsion, without something in the nature, I will not say of universal, but of general consent, you would defeat your own purpose.

Mark those words:

> It would not be a practicable or workable method of making good and filling up the gaps left by the defects of the voluntary system. I am speaking my own view—entirely my own view. My proposition, if I were to formulate one, would be this: Not that I rule out compulsion as an impossible expedient, but that compulsion, if resorted to, ought only to be resorted to, and can only from a practical point of view be resorted to—or, in other words, be made a workable expedient for filling up the gap which you have to supply—with something in the nature of general consent.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the hon. member reading?

Mr. PICARD: Who said this? I shall answer the hon. member for St. Paul's. Was it a French-Canadian member of parliament? Was it a nationalist speaker from Quebec? Was it one of our cabinet ministers? No; the words were uttered by no other than the Prime Minister of Great Britain on November 2, 1915, fifteen months after the start of the great war. Mr. Asquith had said just previously to that—and there is nothing like old books to get new thoughts—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Did he have a change of mind on that?

Mr. PICARD: If he did, the hon. member will see in a moment.

Here is a further statement by that British Prime Minister:

> I will let the house into a cabinet secret—I hope without breaking any obligations of secrecy or any confidence—and that is that there have been differences of opinion amongst the members of the cabinet as to whether what we need, whether, in other words, what I call the full exploitation and employment of the recruitable reservoir can or cannot be obtained without resort to some form of compulsion. I will state my own view. In the first place, I have no abstract objection of any sort or kind to compulsion—in time of war. It is a pure question of practical expediency—how are we going to bring the war to a successful conclusion?

I have many more of these quotations, but I shall have to shorten them, because there are some further points I wish to make before resuming my seat.

An hon. member asked me if Mr. Asquith changed his mind. It was on January 5, 1916, that the compulsory service bill was introduced into the British House of Commons. Let us see what kind of compulsion it was. Let us remember that it was brought into effect only after seventeen months of war. Let us see what reaction its introduction produced on some hon. members in the house at the time. We will see if Mr. Asquith had changed his mind with respect to the compulsory method, when he spoke on January 5, 1916. This is what he said:

There was considerable controversy in the early autumn of last year as to whether we could best do our duty in the war by persevering with our voluntary system, with such improvements as experience had shown to be necessary, or by the introduction, in some form, of general compulsion. There were great divergences of opinion on that subject, even among those who are ordinarily accustomed to think alike, and they penetrated, as I think I have disclosed before, into the cabinet. I believe that these divergences of view on the general question still exist. My own view is well known, and has been publicly expressed. Speaking for myself for the moment, for myself alone—as I have said I do not propose on this larger issue to speak for all my colleagues—I am of opinion that no case has been made out for general compulsion. I, at any rate, would be no party to a measure which had that for its object.

The bill that I am about to ask leave to introduce is one, I think, which can be sincerely supported by those who, either on principle or, as in my own case, on grounds of expediency, are opposed to what is commonly described as conscription.

The right hon. gentleman then went on to give a full explanation of the bill. Note, Mr. Speaker, to what stratagems they had to resort to bring in a conscription bill. It was in effect a conscription bill, but in principle it was not one. Mr. Asquith a little later on said:

The course we are going to ask parliament to adopt is to provide that, if, after due opportunity of inquiry, it is found that there are single men of military age who have no ground whatever for exemption or excuse, they shall be deemed to have done what everyone agrees it is their duty to the state in times like these to do, and be treated as though they had attested or enlisted. . . . The bill applies to all male British subjects who, on the 15th August, 1915, had attained eighteen years and not attained forty-one years of age, and who, at that date were unmarried or widowers without children dependent upon them.

This method of introducing the bill was not followed by a French Canadian, it was not done in the province of Quebec, but in Great Britain, by Mr. Asquith, the Prime Minister, who tried to sugar-coat the bill so that it would be more easily swallowed. It was not conscription, and yet it was conscription. So that in England in 1915 and 1916 there were men like Mr. Asquith who declared themselves opposed to conscription on grounds of expediency, and there were also men like Sir John Simon who regarded conscription as opposed to the democratic way of life. He resigned his post of home secretary rather than support the bill. He said:

I confess to have regarded the voluntary system as a vital principle of national life.

He said further:

If the bill passes, what are the real chances of general consent? Are the omens favourable? I ask myself with the full sense of the responsibility it involves what is the position to be if and when this bill reaches the statute book. . . . I do beg the government and the House of Commons to consider whether the . . . difficulties, some of them existing already in relation to the administration of other acts of parliament, are not likely to be multiplied?

May I remind the house that the gentleman who uttered these words was no less than the Right Hon. Sir John Simon, who had just resigned as home secretary rather than support the bill. And he was not the only one. I could cite many others, but unfortunately I have not the time at my disposal. I shall quote only one more, Right Hon. J. H. Thomas, who said:

I resent to the full the suggestion that has already been made, that those who are likely to oppose this bill are not in favour of winning the war. Not only are they in favour of winning the war, but they genuinely and sincerely believe that the course they adopt is the best course in the interests of winning the war. Therefore, I do not think it will help matters to hurl charges of that kind.

And that applies to the hon. member who spoke ahead of me. Mr. Thomas went on:

I do beg the house to realize, whatever ministers may say, that there is a deep-rooted suspicion in the minds of the workers of this country, that this position has been forced on the government to-day, not with a view of winning the war, and not because of any military value, but because of a certain section of the press.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Now quote Mr. Churchill.

Mr. PICARD: I think the house has had enough for the moment. I can quote Mr. Churchill some other day; I have not the time at my disposal now.

From general considerations of the question of conscription and of French Canada's reaction to it I come now to the bill before us and the attitude I intend to take upon it.

My mind and my heart have been torn asunder on the vote to be given on the measure before us, and I am not ashamed to admit it. I have abstained from following any group in a joint consideration of a concerted attitude to be taken. I have worked and studied and listened and consulted, and I shall be alone responsible for my decision.

My opposition to conscription, as I stated previously, is not so much one of principle as of expediency and what is best for the efficient conduct of the war. I admit that I would have no repulsion to extending conscription to service overseas if I were conscientiously convinced that it was needed in the interests of our own country. As conditions are at the moment I cannot come to that conclusion; I have no such conviction. On the contrary, I think it would hamper our war effort and make it less efficient and it might bring—I hope not—as Sir John Simon said in England, internal disturbances that would cause more harm to the prosecution of a well balanced war effort than the good that might ensue from a more regular flow of men to the army.

But no matter how much opposed I may be to conscription on the ground of expediency, I cannot ignore the fact that the political plots of the Tories in this house and in the press have forced the conscription issue on the Canadian people and have succeeded in making many people in Canada believe that it is now vital to the winning of the war. As a result of this we are faced to-day with a measure which until a few days ago I thought represented a sincere attempt to conciliate opposing views, much in the same spirit as evidenced by Mr. Asquith in introducing military bill No. 2 at Westminster in 1916. Bill No. 80 will give the government all the necessary authority to send the men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act anywhere it thinks fit, and should satisfy those who wish the government to have a free hand. On the other hand, those who oppose conscription for overseas service had reason to be pleased with the assurances of the Prime Minister that such powers would be used only if absolutely necessary, and he thought they were not necessary at the present time.

However, the speeches of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) and of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who seemed to be competing with each other, have shown a lack of unity in the cabinet which justifies a greater need of caution from those who have to pass on this measure. As long as it could be viewed as a compromise and a conciliatory effort, the measure was no doubt worthy of most benevolent consideration, because it must be recognized that good government in a country ethnically and geographically composed as ours is must of necessity be the fruit of conciliation and understanding rather than of one-sided decisions.

Against the arguments which prompted me to vote for the measure I had to weigh the most important factor of the expressed will of the people whom I represent on the issue at stake. I need not go over their reasons again, but it is abundantly evident that not only were my constituents against conscription for overseas but they had unmistakably come to the conclusion and made clear by their vote that they were against releasing the Prime Minister from his pledges despite the personal appeals and pleadings I made to change their views.

Is it not a principle of democracy that a representative of the people should as much as possible express the views of those who have elected him as their representative and vote accordingly unless by doing so he endangers their own interests and impairs their own security or that of the country?

The government appeals to-day to the province of Quebec to change an opinion it has nursed since the South African war—non-participation in imperial wars of Britain—and it has not prepared public opinion to understand that our share in the present conflict in its fields of battle abroad and especially in Britain is not to support the empire, that it is a contribution to a war for the survival of our own liberties and our own institutions. Public opinion in Quebec has not been prepared by the government's agencies. Let us admit that the propaganda and information services have been most inadequate, to say the least, as far as French Canada is concerned, and that our people have not been enlightened by members of the government themselves. If they had talked of Canadian interests in the war, they might have been able to convince the French Canadians to accept a compulsory measure at this time; but not having contributed to bring that about, I do not think the government can except its supporters from the province of Quebec to go back to our people now and attempt to convince them overnight that conscription for overseas service had become a matter of life or death for Canada. I would be willing to risk myself in such an effort if I had received any help before. But I cannot do it in a week. You cannot all of a sudden, overnight as it were, change the lifelong sentiments of a people.

I could not be convinced, sir, that I would have acted wrongly if I voted against the measure and as my constituents desired; yet I had a feeling that I would best serve the interests of understanding, of unity, and of the bonne entente if I voted for the amendment. At that point of my hesitations I came across a sentence—which perhaps I had better not quote; however, I will go ahead—when perusing Lord Durham's report on the affairs of British North America which set me to thinking anew as to the course I should follow.

Reviewing the constant flare-ups in Lower Canada between the new English settlers and the French Canadians and analysing the source and reasons of their quarrels, Lord Durham referred to the men of good-will who tried to compromise and to reach a livable understanding, and he concluded with these words:

A few of the French, distinguished by moderate and enlarged views, still condemn the narrow national prejudices and ruinous violence of their countrymen, while they equally resist what they consider the violent and unjust pretensions of a "minority"—

And mind you, sir, at the time the minority was not French, but was English, and ruled with the force of arms Canada at that time.

—and endeavour to form a middle party between the two extremes.

Those who affect to form a middle party exercise no influence on the contending extremes and those who side with the English are regarded by their countrymen with aggravated hatred, as renegades from their race; while they obtain but little of the real affection, confidence, or esteem of those whom they have joined.

These grave words, the fruit of a keen observation in 1839, a close survey of our political history will unfortunately show to have been true very often. Unjust as this reaction may be, it has proved to exist in each crisis which we have gone through in this country.

Willing as I am to work to change the viewpoint and to broaden the horizons of my compatriots on some issues where I am not always in agreement with them, is it wise to separate myself at this moment from them? If I had any hesitations left, the statements of the Minister of National Defence would have wiped them out.

I must say, however, that if I expected by my vote to overthrow the Prime Minister, I would not hesitate to vote for the bill, even if I were next day to be blamed by many people, because I would consider it of the utmost importance to ensure his continuance in office in these days, when more than ever is needed at the helm his wise, guiding hand. Under present conditions, although my own inclination is to vote confidence in the Prime Minister in appreciation of this further conciliatory measure, which, I am sure, he has introduced in the hope of maintaining unity and harmony as well as in the hope of keeping the full strength of the country behind the war effort, I cannot but view with alarm the divergence of views in the cabinet on the effect of the present measure, and I will consider it a duty to heed the expressed wishes of my compatriots and vote against the repeal of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act. But I wish to assure you, sir, using the words of a British statesman, that:

. . . the choice that faces a member who finds himself divided from his chief is a difficult and painful one.

Mr. ELPHEGE MARIER (Jacques Cartier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in congratulating the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) for the magnificent speech he has just delivered, and for the many substantiated arguments he set forth to justify the stand of those who oppose the measure recently introduced by the government.

At the general election of March 1940, the Conservative party leader, as well as the head of the Liberal party, all the Quebec representatives and most of the other members of this house, assured the Canadian people that there would be no conscription for service overseas.

Why give this pledge when we had been at war for seven months and certain developments were already indicating that the conflict would become universal? Simply because our politicians remembered the lessons of the past. Conscription in 1917 had been an absolute failure from the practical point of view. It increased by very little the strength of our armed forces and produced on the other hand the most disastrous results. Its enforcement left in the province of Quebec the distinct impression of an attempt at racial domination, and also the conviction that for some, perhaps for a great many of our fellow citizens, empire interests came before those of Canada, the only homeland the French Canadians have. Moreover, it was very costly in bloodshed and useless hardship, and the wounds it caused are not yet completely healed; above all, it sharply divided the Canadian nation.

The anti-conscription policy preached by the Liberal party for the last twenty-five years and endorsed by all parties prior to the 1940 election, was neither new nor unknown in the different Canadian provinces.

No need to delve far back into the past to recall the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe in this very house in March 1939, as well as the statements uttered by these same leaders in September 1939, when war was declared, and those of the hon. Dr. Manion, then Conservative leader.

At the Quebec provincial election in October 1939, the National Union party, then in power, advocated a non-intervention policy. We saw the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe and the former Minister of Public Works and Transport (Mr. Cardin) enter the fight to secure Quebec's approval of the federal government's war policy. They promised that Canada's participation in this war would be voluntary and that there would be no conscription for overseas service. On these terms, the province of Quebec pledged her full support to the war effort and promised to contribute her share generously and loyally, side by side with the other provinces in this dominion.

I recall the flattering remarks she then received on every side. There was no newspaper in Canada that did not extol the broadmindedness of our people, their farseeing patriotism and will to cooperate. And these qualities, may I add, this broadmindedness, this patriotism and will to cooperate for victory, still exist there.

That election of March, 1940, gave the Liberal party the greatest majority ever returned to this house since Confederation, which proves that the policy of voluntary participation commanded the approval of the whole country and, so far, nothing shows that the Canadian people have changed their minds. Of course, there have been various interpretations of the plebiscite vote. Some claim that it expressed, on the part of the majority, the desire to see conscription for overseas service implemented without delay; others considered it as a simple expression of opinion, authorizing the government and parliament to discuss the matter on its merits and take any step that circumstances might require.

When the plebiscite was submitted to the house in February, I supported the measure. Many forecasts on the duration of the war and its limitation to certain European countries, had not become realities. Conditions had often changed since September, 1939. Above all else, the entry of the United States into the struggle could and did considerably alter the situation; it could even have forced us, for example, to direct our war effort into new channels. I believed, as I still do, that in a democracy the people had the right to release us from any promises made to them. For this reason, on the day of the plebiscite, April 27 last, I requested the electors of Jacques Cartier, whom I have the honour of representing in this house, to answer "yes" to the plebiscite question. I took this stand on the strength of statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister in this house and elsewhere. Here is an excerpt from a speech I delivered over the radio on April 21 last:

> Mr. King stated in the house, on February 24 last, that conscription for overseas service is not and may never become necessary; the people, he said, over the radio, on April 7, are not called upon to take a stand on conscription by their vote on the plebiscite question; this matter, if it ever becomes the subject of a debate, will be discussed by parliament who will settle it on its merits.

In stating that the question, if it were ever discussed, would be debated on its merits by parliament, I was merely repeating the words of the Prime Minister, in his radio speech of April 7. I quote:

> The question of conscription, properly viewed, is a military question. The place to discuss it is in parliament. What the government now seeks for itself and for parliament is freedom to consider and debate and decide this question, like all other questions concerned with the war, unrestricted by any pledge and in the light only of the needs of national security.

Further on he added:

> The only place it can satisfactorily be decided whether a particular step is necessary or a particular measure needed, is in parliament. In parliament, the government can state its case and provide the information on which a wise decision can alone be made.

Had the vote in my constituency been negative, I would be bound by the will of my electors and I would have little to add to the clear, complete and eloquent statement of the reasons against repeal of section 3 made by the former Minister of Public Works and Transport, and by the other hon. members who are so strongly opposed to the principle of conscription for overseas service as exemplified by Bill No. 80. But in view of the fact that a large majority of my constituents have, on the contrary, given me an affirmative vote and that, in certain quarters, this vote is construed as a vote in favour of conscription, I feel justified in furnishing additional reasons for my stand.

It seems to me that in order to decide whether parliament should agree to the proposed amendment or not, we need only ask ourselves the following questions and answer them logically and sensibly: does the plebiscite vote mean a vote for conscription? Is conscription for overseas service necessary and, if so, should the reasons for that necessity be submitted to the members of this house, so that they may judge them on their merits? Finally, if the measure is not necessary, is it expedient? Or is it liable to produce disastrous consequences?

I must thank the right hon. Prime Minister for having answered "no" to the first question. He has emphatically stated that the plebiscite vote did not mean conscription. The excerpts from the radio speeches of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) which he quoted in his speech of June 10 agree with what he has stated on various occasions in this house and elsewhere.

An affirmative answer only involved freedom for the government and parliament to discuss the matter of conscription for service overseas, and to judge it on its merits; it did not imply the obligation to enforce it, whether necessary or not.

Moreover, that is the way the voters in my constituency understood it. They had enough confidence in me to leave me free to state whether I was for or against any measure involving conscription for overseas service. But in so doing they laid upon me a new responsibility. And it is because I deeply feel that responsibility that I have a right to know the reasons for the introduction of this measure. Is it really necessary? I followed closely the speech delivered by the Prime Minister on June 10. I have read it many times; in my opinion, it is a very strong plea by the leader of the government against conscription.

I would like to quote the following words which appear at pages 3238 and 3239 of Hansard:

> On February 4, the Minister of Finance gave the reasons for believing that the government's war programme for 1942-43 would constitute the utmost effort of which the country is capable. The minister said:
>
> "I believe that the programme which we plan should for the immediate future, the coming year, be a programme which will strain the human and material resources of this country to the limit. I have, therefore, agreed as Minister of Finance, to a war programme for the coming fiscal year which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of my advisers, is the extreme limit of what this country can do, having in mind its human and material resources."

The new features in the budget speech we heard yesterday will tax more heavily, if possible, the human and material resources of the nation.

The Prime Minister said, as reported at page 3239:

> On February 10, the Minister of National Defence stated that the estimated man-power requirements of the army, for service anywhere, from January 1, 1942, to March 31, 1943, a period of fifteen months, were 90,000 to 100,000 men. Of that number over 50,000 had enlisted by the end of May. That is in a period of only five months. These figures show clearly that, at the present time, the voluntary system of recruitment is functioning adequately.

And at page 3241:

> How could resort to conscription for overseas service add to our war effort? The one way, in which so far as I can see, it might add to our war effort, would be by securing more men for service in the army overseas than can be secured by voluntary means.
>
> If the size of the overseas army was unlimited; if we did not require men urgently for other purposes as well as for the army; there might be a possibility of increasing the total war effort by conscripting men for the overseas army.

And further on the same page:

> Clearly there are no grounds for asserting that compulsion is needed at the present time to secure the men required for service in the army overseas. There is nothing to indicate that its application now would add anything to Canada's total contribution to the winning of the war.

Since that date, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) have enlarged, if possible, upon the Prime Minister's words in that connection. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) went farther; he asserted that conscription would hamper our war effort.

If conscription for overseas service is not necessary, why is the amendment to the Mobilization Act introduced at this time? What are the facts by which we may judge this measure on its merits? I cannot find them in the Prime Minister's speech. The voluntary system is supplying more men than required and, the taxing of our resources in men and material to the extreme limit will suffice to meet the requirements of the government's programme up to March 31, 1943. Moreover, the Mobilization Act as it stands empowers the government to conscript all able-bodied men in the country for service in Canada and to train them in exactly the same way as they train volunteers.

In the hour of supreme effort and ultimate sacrifice, what is there to prevent the government from seeking the approval of parliament to the amendment they have now introduced and to launch overseas all the armed forces of Canada, should such a sacrifice or such an effort become necessary? Should conscription become necessary to save the country and to win the war, despite the fact that I, in common with my French-Canadian fellow-citizens, loathe conscription, I would vote for such a measure. But, without necessity or reason and despite enemy attacks on both our coasts, despite the more urgent peril requiring stronger forces for our own defence and for the protection of those sources of supply on which the very life of Great Britain depends, it is being urged that we put on the statute books a measure admittedly unnecessary at the present time, but which may be made use of by some other government tomorrow or by some other leader who might hold an entirely different view of the situation.

The present Prime Minister has more than any other and throughout his entire career, advocated the supremacy of parliament. I understand the government should hold greater powers in time of war, but when the very lives of our youth, the cream of the nation, are at stake, the members of this house would indeed make a serious mistake and fail in their duty should they renounce the right to decide when and how, in what circumstances and in the face of what danger, the government may take upon themselves the right of disposing of the lives of others. In support of his attitude, the Prime Minister tells us that parliament, by virtue of the Mobilization Act, has already conferred upon the government the power of conscripting men and that the present amendment is but an extension of this power. He overlooks the fact that when they brought down this measure in 1940, the government gave excellent reasons to justify its adoption and that, besides, it was accompanied by another solemn pledge given by the Prime Minister, which can be found on page 854 of Hansard for June 18, 1940:

> Once again, I wish to repeat my undertaking, frequently given, that no measure for the conscription of men for overseas service will be introduced by the present administration.

It was on the same day that the Prime Minister announced the armistice parleys between France on the one hand and Italy and Germany on the other. It was in those dark hours when England, together with her dominions and colonies, faced the dark future alone, at an infinitely graver hour than the present one.

Russia was then bound to Germany by a non-aggression pact; we were even anxiously wondering whether she would join our enemies. Japan was as threatening as ever and no one doubted that she would enter the conflict sooner or later.

The United States were still out of the war, and while supplying the allies with credit, arms and munitions, were not extending to them the tremendous support given at the moment.

If the Prime Minister, notwithstanding all this and in spite of the anticipation of an increasing danger, repeated the assurance that there would be no conscription for overseas service, he undoubtedly did so to maintain in this country the sacred unity which must remain the basis of our war effort.

Is it more expedient to-day than at that time to break our pledges, to stir up popular feeling, to plant the seeds of hatred which extremists have endeavoured to sow throughout the country?

Already an important section of the Canadian people is looked upon with distrust because it voted "no" in the plebiscite. Already, the small group of politicians and financiers who have sworn to overthrow the government and to form a so-called national union government are jeering at Quebec through their hired press and their paid advertisements published on a lavish scale all over Canada and even in the United States.

They play upon the inborn feeling of attachment for Great Britain existing among our English-speaking fellow citizens, just as they make able use of the undeserved reproach that Quebec is not bearing her share of sacrifice for the purpose of winning the war. If Canadian unity is destroyed, if good understanding between the two main racial groups in the country exists no longer, whose fault is it? The French-Canadian minority has made concession after concession in order to maintain it, as the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères so ably explained.

Is it that unity and good understanding can only be maintained through repeated and constant sacrifices on the part of the minority, in the absence of any reciprocity? Does unity demand that the French Canadians should give up one of the most sacred rights for which we are now fighting, namely, that of freely expressing their opinions? The overwhelming majority of French Canadians have refused to release the government from its commitments or pledges. Had they not a right to do so, since the question of the plebiscite was an open one? The government was released from its past commitments by a large majority. Well and good, we submit to this verdict. But when the government ask that section 3 be repealed, that the principle of conscription be written into the statute books, have we not the right to know the reasons for this attitude and the circumstances which justify it? Is this incompatible with our position as loyal Canadian subjects. The isolation of the province of Quebec has been mentioned. The vote given in the 1940 election is still too recent for us to believe that the overwhelming majority of the people in this country ardently wish for conscription for overseas service and I share the opinion of the Minister of Agriculture when he states that no party with a background and a hope for the future could well enforce such a measure. Which shows that, in his opinion, a majority of the electorate is still opposed to conscription for overseas service.

The hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has made an eloquent appeal in favour of trusting the present government. His speech is remarkable by the elevation of thought and by the expression of certain truths good to hear now and again, in this house and through the country as a whole. But the hon. Minister of Justice, who is also a great lawyer, endeavoured to justify the blind vote of confidence the government is asking from the hon. members by quoting the fact that in his profession he always insists that his clients do not interfere in the conduct of a case. I practised that same profession for nearly thirty years and always I demanded the same degree of trust from my clients. But the latter know nothing about the law and they come to us for advice, not to guide us. Thus the minister's argument implies, to my mind, that we have nothing to say in the conduct of the war and that we must invest the government with dictatorial powers. I am sorry to say that the conception I have of a member's responsibility is quite different.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, in the course of the remarkable speech he delivered in this house on June 11, stated that one of the reasons of the disunity we deplore to-day lies in the fact that never during the last twenty-five years did Canada have a policy of her own, as becomes a sovereign nation.

This is partly true. We have lived for a long time within the orbit of a great power and we have suffered the repercussions of a policy over which we had little or no control. However, during the last few years and under the guidance of the Prime Minister, who is to be congratulated on this account, our political, financial and economic life has followed pretty closely the pattern set by our country's geographical position. Canada is an American country and if this is taken into account and our policies hence given a purely Canadian trend, many difficulties will be overcome, many causes of disunity will disappear for the greater good of the country. We shall hear less of the two principal nationalities that share our territory and more of the Canadian nation.

I have the highest esteem and regard for the leader of the government, our leader, but I cannot support the proposed amendment to the Mobilization Act, which implies a change of policy and incorporates in our statute books the principle of conscription for overseas service. Neither can I admit that the government, by a simple order in council, be empowered, under section 5 of the Mobilization Act, to apply conscription without consulting parliament and send overseas thousands of young men drafted hereto for the defence of Canada, and of Canada only.

Moreover, the statements of the Prime Minister and the principal members of his cabinet imply that conscription for overseas service is not necessary, that it might even hamper our war effort. For these various reasons, I feel compelled to vote against this measure.

Mr. J. ALPHÉE POIRIER (Bonaventure) (Translation): The question which arises to-day in the House of Commons is whether we should give the present government or its successors the power to impose by order in council a measure of conscription for overseas service. Therefore the principle of conscription for military service overseas is at stake in this bill, and it is the Liberal government that presents the bill and asks Liberal members from the province of Quebec to vote to give the government a free hand to put conscription into effect by and by if needed. Speaking for my constituency and for myself, I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that I will not support the government on this question, that I will vote against it. I am breaking a fifty-three year old tradition when I set myself against the Liberal party in this chamber, and words could not express my regret. As a matter of fact it was in 1889 that Sir François Lemieux was elected Liberal member for the county of Bonaventure, which constituency he wrested from such famous Conservatives as Tarte, Robitaille and Riopel, by whom it had been held since confederation. Since that time, fifty-three years ago, my county has been Liberal, without a single defeat; and I do not think any member from that constituency, including Sir François Lemieux, Hon. Charles Marcil or Hon. Pierre Emile Cote, has ever had to vote against the government and the head of the Liberal party. In a recent radio talk I said about the Hon. Mr. King:

> No other prime minister of Canada has so loved the province of Quebec and has treated it with such a measure of justice. I know of no other man who, because of his dignity and honesty, of his exemplary life devoted entirely to his country's service, deserves so much esteem as the Prime Minister.

I cannot understand, however, how it is that the Liberal government, which has always been supported by the province of Quebec, which has represented during many years the true Canadian sentiment not only in Quebec but in a great majority of the constituencies of this country, should now allow itself to be advised by the worst enemies of the Liberal party and of French-Canadian sentiment, and should go from one concession to another even to the point of bringing into parliament a bill containing the principle of conscription for overseas service. It is easy to see that it is high finance that is influencing the will of the government and forcing it to present such a bill. It is high time we offered some resistance to the will of high finance. I say that immediately after the war the people will revolt, peacefully or with violence, against the rapacity of high finance. In my county of Bonaventure, as in almost every part of the country, people suffered much during the depression of 1930-35. They were told that there was no money to buy bread, and large families were expected to live on relief allowances of $10 to $20 a month. But just as soon as war was declared billions of dollars were found with which to organize it. It is time to realize the financial tyranny which crushes the people of Canada. We are 100 per cent behind the war effort, but on the sole condition that the rapacious financiers be brought to reason, that after the war the riches of the country be put to the service of the people and not the people to the service of the riches.

I wish all my colleagues to understand me, Mr. Speaker. I am a Canadian, and no one loves his country more than I do. My maternal ancestor, a public notary, Alexandre Bourque, came to this country, to Port Royal in Acadia, in 1635; my paternal ancestor came to live in Prince Edward Island shortly after that. Therefore it is more than three hundred years since my forefathers settled in Canada. I represent a county which is representative of the whole of Canada through its components of Acadians, French Canadians and English Canadians. The latter, Scotch, English and Irish, form about 18 per cent of the population. We walk hand in hand, and there are no racial problems in my county. Bonaventure county can be proud of its war effort up to the present. It has furnished to the three Canadian services more than two thousand volunteers, out of a population of 42,000. The families of my county were among the first to be stricken, and more than two hundred of them weep over their sons who have fallen or who are prisoners of war at Hong Kong. The airmen of my county perished gloriously, one after the other, in the near east, in Great Britain, or in the neighbouring zones. Let me in passing offer to these stricken families the grateful salute of their proud country, which will never die.

We are ready to suffer all sacrifice in order to win this war. We have nobly consented to the general mobilization and to conscription for the defence of Canadian territory. We have consented to the gift of a billion dollars to England. We even would have consented to conscription which would have allowed men to be sent to any part of the American continent, in order to liberate all Canadian volunteers now on Canadian soil. Nevertheless we are not ready to go as far as conscription for overseas, first because we fear that conscription for overseas will disorganize completely the defence of our own country. In my county, Mr. Speaker, there are 120 miles of coastal territory without any military defence whatsoever. We, who have given more volunteers than almost any other part of Canada in proportion to our population, are left exposed to danger at the very door of the gulf of St. Lawrence, without defence of any kind. We have sacrificed the flower of our youth in this present war, with joy, with enthusiasm, with patriotism; but do you think we have been given any credit for it? Not a cent has been spent in my county, and we are supposed to accept this principle of sending the rest of our young men overseas by order in council. The Prime Minister and all the members of his cabinet are in accord that conscription is not necessary, that it perhaps never will be necessary; nevertheless we are asked to vote the principle of conscription. Such an attitude is contradictory.

Why have conscription, Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) declares in this house that there are no more bachelors or widowers without children in two districts, Quebec and Vancouver? Why have conscription when the director of selective service, Mr. Little, officially declares that we are threatened with a very serious shortage of labour, when we are in need of four thousand men in the Arvida war industry in the province of Quebec, and when Ontario war industries could employ twelve thousand more men? Why have conscription when Canadian agriculture lacks farmers and when the fishermen of Gaspé, as well as those of the east, are not numerous enough to fill their contracts with England and furnish the quantity of fish required by the armies of the allies? I would suggest rather that a reasonable and intelligently managed campaign of voluntary enlistment be carried on in those districts where there are still able-bodied men. For example, everyone knows that the Gaspé peninsula with a population of eighty thousand has furnished more than four thousand volunteers. We also know that the population of the Gaspé peninsula is spread over a coastal territory of three hundred miles along the St. Lawrence. We know that this population is one of able seamanship, and that its sons would have cut a worthy figure in the Canadian navy. It is hardly believable, but no enlistment office for the navy has ever been opened in that region, and our boys have been forced, under those circumstances, to enlist in the land forces.

I do not want to be unjust toward anyone, and I am glad to admit that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has greatly improved the situation of French Canadians in the Canadian army. He has created new French Canadian regiments. Lately he did all he could to increase the number of French Canadian officers in the army. He has even opened special schools to allow educated French Canadians to follow training courses for officers at St. Jerome, Quebec, and at Brockville, Ontario. I congratulate him. We appreciate his efforts, and we are grateful for all he has done in this direction.

Following the same trend of ideas, I am pleased to recognize publicly in the parliament of my country the tolerance and moderation of the great majority of my English-speaking colleagues. A son of Acadia, I myself belong to a race whose wisdom, calm and moderation have been its strength in the past. Submitted to the greatest trials a people can endure, we have survived, I am glad and proud to say, thanks to the indomitable courage, unending patience and unexampled strength of will of our race. Thanks to these qualities we have succeeded at last in obtaining recognition of a part of our rights. We are ready to walk hand in hand with Canadians of other nationalities. It is with these dispositions that I came here two years ago, and I am happy to say that I have found here English-speaking colleagues who have an open mind and a tolerant soul. They are all filled, as we are, with love for our country. They are ready, I believe with all my heart, to understand the mentality and the aspirations of French Canadians and Acadians. I therefore beg them to make an effort to understand our point of view.

It is clear that in 1940 the honour and the given word of the Canadian people in its entirety were at stake in this promise that there would be no conscription for overseas. The province of Quebec, to whom the representatives of the Liberal party had long since promised that we would never participate in the wars of the empire, nevertheless consented to everything, provided there would be no conscription for overseas. Consequently this pledge of honour cannot be broken without the consent of Quebec. Let us therefore continue our voluntary war effort. Let the Minister of National Defence continue to grant his favours and place his confidence in the province of Quebec, and he will see that the volunteers will continue to come into the Canadian forces in ever-growing numbers.

It was Reverend George A. Little of Toronto who said lately before a religious meeting held in Winnipeg that Quebec would surprise the rest of the country by the number of its enlistments, if we went about the matter in the right way. I thank this distinguished clergyman of the Protestant faith for his wide understanding of the French-Canadian point of view. He is right. In spite of the mistakes that have been made in Quebec; in spite of the fact that a free field has been left to anti-British propaganda for two years and a half, the bulk of the French-Canadian population is ready to suffer voluntarily all the sacrifices expected of it.

A great many English-speaking members have expressed the same opinions in the house, and I thank them with all my heart. Many are making an effort to-day to keep intact the bridges which connect the two races. They are right, Mr. Speaker.

Within the last few days the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Fulford) and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) have tried to create a little harmony between the two races and many others are working in this direction.

The whole of the country will be grateful to them. Let us admit, with the French journal L'Action Catholique, that there are a great many points on which we fully agree; and let us leave aside the only point on which we cannot think alike.

I express the hope, in concluding this speech, that the present crisis will pass, that we will win the war with volunteers without the application of conscription, and that the two great races of Canada will continue together in friendship toward their glorious destiny.

On motion of Mr. Mitchell the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 25, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

R.C.A.F.—BUILDINGS ERECTED IN TORONTO HARBOUR AREA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many sheds or huts have been erected on Toronto harbour improvements, on the north shore of Toronto bay, east of Yonge street, by the R.C.A.F. equipment department, under the British empire air scheme, and at what cost?

2. What is the total expenditure?

3. How many are occupied and for what purpose?

4. How many civilian men and women are now employed there and on what work, and who appointed them?

5. How many returned soldiers?

6. Who supplies the guards, and for what period are they on duty, and how many?

Mr. POWER:

1. Fifty-eight buildings.

2. Total commitment to date, $959,773.36.

3. Nine buildings are occupied by administrative offices, and motor transport section, and the remaining forty-nine buildings are used for the storage of equipment.

4. 840 civilians, consisting of 580 males and 260 females. They are engaged in handling R.C.A.F. equipment received and despatched for distribution among units of No. 1 Training Command.

The appointment of these civilians was made through the medium of the Unemployment Insurance commission, Soldier Welfare Committee, Canadian Corps association, Canadian Legion and Welfare department, City Hall, Toronto.

5. Eighty-five per cent of the male employees are returned soldiers, having served either in 1914-1918 or in the present war.

6. The main guard is supplied by the R.C.A.F. security guard, and in addition ten civilian watchmen form two shifts, from 4 p.m. to 12 p.m. and from 12 p.m. to 8 a.m. on piers 4 and 6.

SHIPMENTS OF DRESSED BEEF TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River):

How much dressed beef was shipped to the United States the first five months in 1942 as compared with the first five months in 1941?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me there was no reason why this question could not be immediately answered, but I am advised that the censorship advisory committee has held several meetings recently to consider the question of the publication of statistical information, and, after consultation with the representatives of the United Kingdom and the intelligence branches of the Canadian armed forces, it is deemed inadvisable to release for publication any statistical information during the war period.

I know that in some cases, such as this one, it appears doubtful as to the possible value of this information to the enemy. The authorities, however, take the most serious view of a question of this kind. I assure hon. members that there is no desire whatever to withhold any information from them, and I am prepared to give any hon. member the statistical information he desires for his own personal and confidential use, if accepted by him on that responsibility.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to register positive dissent from that point of view, especially in relation to a question of this kind, and I believe I shall be sustained by the judgment of the house and the country. What possible good could result to the enemy from giving the information sought in this question? This is the state of mind of bureaucracy. Does it reflect the policy of the government? It would appear that it does. I protest against it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I do not think any further comment from me is necessary. I expressed not only my own personal view, but also the departmental view. It is very difficult to know just where to draw the line in respect to giving information which may or may not be useful to the enemy. This rule has been adopted by the censorship committee which has been set up

SCRAP IRON AND IRON ORE

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. What was the tonnage of scrap iron exported from Canada during 1937-41, inclusive?

2. What were the countries of destination and what was the tonnage sent to each country during each of the above years?

3. How many tons of iron ore were mined in Canada during each of the years 1937-1941, inclusive?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1 and 2.

Exports of scrap iron by countries, during the calendar years 1937 to 1941.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION AND OTHER PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE

Mr. FAIR:

1. In the province of Manitoba, how many claims have been made for bonus under, (a) wheat acreage reduction regulations; (b) Prairie Farm Assistance Act; (c) prairie farm income regulations?

2. How many of such claims have been passed for payment?

3. How many claims have actually been paid, (a) in full, (b) in part?

4. In the province of Saskatchewan, how many claims have been made for bonus under: (a) wheat acreage reduction regulations; (b) Prairie Farm Assistance Act; (c) prairie farm income regulations?

5. How many of such claims have been passed for payment?

6. How many claims have actually been paid, (a) in full, (b) in part?

7. In the province of Alberta, how many claims have been made for bonus under: (a) wheat acreage reduction regulations; (b) Prairie Farm Assistance Act; (c) prairie farm income regulations?

8. How many of such claims have been passed for payment?

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

9. How many claims have actually been paid, (a) in full, (b) in part?

10. What amount has been paid under each bonus act or regulation in, (a) Manitoba, (b) Saskatchewan, (c) Alberta?

11. What is the estimated amount still due and to be paid under each act or regulation in, (a) Manitoba, (b) Saskatchewan, (c) Alberta?

12. Has any decision yet been made as to what constitutes, (a) a rancher, (b) primary occupation?

13. If so, what is it?

14. If not, when will it be made?

15. Has any decision yet been made to pay individual claims to father and son where they are domiciled under one roof but operating their farms as two separate units, and each owning part of the farm machinery?

16. Who are the members of the board of review?

17. Are any of these practical farmers?

18. Who are the members of the treasury board?

19. Is the decision of the board of review binding on the treasury board?

CANADIAN FORCES—HONOURS AND DECORATIONS

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. Will a general service medal be issued to those sailors, soldiers and airmen who enlist for active service during the present war, but who are retained in Canada?

2. If so, will the government recognize similarly those soldiers and airmen who enlisted for active service in the great war, but who for reasons beyond their own control were retained within Canada?

3. If not, how many, (a) soldiers, (b) airmen enlisted for active service overseas during the great war, but who, because of uncompleted training prior to the armistice, or being retained in Canada for the purpose of training others, or for home defence, or because of youth or over-age, or otherwise, saw service only in Canada and were not awarded the general service medal, 1914-1918?

4. Of these how many are now serving in the armed forces and have no distinction to show that they served in the great war?

5. How many soldiers or airmen lost their lives in Canada while on active service?

6. How many George V jubilee medals were awarded in Canada?

7. How many George VI coronation medals were awarded in Canada?

WARTIME ADMINISTRATOR, PORT OF HALIFAX

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Has a war-time administrator been appointed for the port of Halifax?

2. If so, what is the name of said administrator?

3. What are his duties?

4. What are his special qualifications for such work?

5. Where was he employed before his appointment to his present position, and what was his salary?

6. What salary will he receive as war-time administrator at Halifax?

7. Was he allowed any transportation expenses to Halifax? If so, what amount?

8. Will he receive any living or expense allowances? If so, what?

9. Will he be provided with an automobile? If so, state arrangements; if not, state any arrangements entered into with respect to a purchase of automobile, and the taking over of said car at the expiration of period of employment of administrator?

10. What were the reasons for the appointment of such a person to the port of Halifax, (a) was there a lack of proper supervision of harbour facilities; (b) was there a loss of time in the docking of ships; (c) was there inefficiency in the directing of traffic through the port?

11. Will the administrator's authority rank higher than that of, (a) the controller of loading operations in so far as war-time supplies are concerned; (b) the navy in respect to control and direction of traffic?

12. What, if any, experience has he had in shipbuilding and ship repairs?

PAY OF SOLDIERS WITH DEPENDENTS—COST OF LIVING BONUS TO CIVILIAN MESSMEN

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. How does the amount of pay now received by soldiers with dependents compare with that received by soldiers with dependents in the last war, when the allowances paid from the Canadian patriotic fund are taken into consideration?

2. What steps have been taken to provide cost of living bonus for the civilian employees of the air force known as messmen?

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION—EFFICIENCY OF PERSONNEL

Mr. JACKMAN:

On Thursday, May 14, 1942, on page 2648 of Hansard, the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated:—"He turned out a tremendous amount of work, but it was found he had destroyed over $3,000 worth of stock and had produced nothing which would be useful in an aeroplane."

1. When did the incident occur?

2. What was the material used?

3. What form was it in when given to the novice?

4. What, if any, was the system of inspection of work in process or of parts immediately on finishing?

5. What part or article was the novice attempting to produce?

6. What was the name of the plant?

7. What were the names of the president and general manager?

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—EXAMINERS

Mr. SHAW:

1. What are the names of the civil service examiners?

2. Who is the chief examiner?

3. What was the occupation or profession of each examiner at the time of his appointment?

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this has been a very long debate. Almost every point of view on economic and social questions has been aired in this house, and I think it is only fair to say to my friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation that the conscription of wealth is now an inescapable reality. I do not think there is much more to conscript; wealth is down the drain. I would make this short statement, however. I do believe that in the post-war period we shall have this country so organized that we shall be in a position to abolish want.

Opinions have been expressed indicating the will of the Canadian people on the plebiscite. There is no doubt in my mind that our people definitely placed the responsibility upon parliament and the government to implement any policy including conscription for overseas service if they deemed it necessary for the successful prosecution of the war. It has brought to the surface the driving force of the faith in the future destiny of this country, and the fundamental viewpoints of those in favour of and those opposed to conscription of men for service overseas. I would point out to some who have taken part in the debate that some of the arguments used have been prevalent in countries which have long since fallen under the heel of the enemy, whose people are now suffering from the mistakes of their leaders.

This war is different from the last war. In the last war the front was mainly in continental Europe and the allies had almost unchallenged control of the seas. In this war the front encircles the globe and their control of the seas is by no means sure. In the last war our problem was how soon the allies would win; in this war the problem has always been and still is whether we can stave off defeat long enough to enable us effectively to mobilize our man-power and our resources on behalf of the common front of the united nations. In the last war our defeat would have meant some loss of territory and possibly the payment of an indemnity, but even after defeat we would have continued to lead our own lives with the loss of only a few of our liberties. In this war, as the experience of all the conquered nations shows, defeat means the utter and ruthless repression of all our liberties and our institutions and the degradation of all of us to the level of slaves and beasts of burden to the master race.

Let us visualize the position in which we are in this dominion at the moment. Eleven million people are living on what is almost a continent, and by the same token one of the richest parts of the world. Through the genius and foresight of our people we have pushed back the arctic circle so that we can grow things where they had never grown before. We have uncovered mineral riches which have added greatly to our productive powers and without which successful war cannot be waged. As I have already pointed out, we are a small population living in a vast country; but on the basis of our ability to produce the instruments of war, the valour of our fighting men, and the initiative of those engaged in industrial and agricultural pursuits, we are a far more important unit of the united nations than mere population would indicate.

We have heard it said in this house, and also outside, that Canada is not on a total war footing, the inference being that without conscription for overseas service we cannot wage total war. What is total war? Does it mean squeezing the last possible man out of the population and putting him in uniform, or does it mean making the maximum war effort by a balanced distribution of man-power between the armed services on the one hand, and, on the other, agriculture, war industry and civilian occupations? We may well ask ourselves these questions. Hon. members' memories are not so short that they cannot recall the words of Prime Minister Churchill, "Give us the tools and we will finish the job."

[Mr. Mitchell.]

It cannot be denied that Canada has moved with the utmost speed to provide the tools of war on every possible front. My colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) indicated this in a striking manner to the house the other day. This war cannot be won with bows and arrows. Dunkirk, Hong Kong, Singapore, Burma, and more recently Tobruk, should have taught us the folly of raising men for armed forces without also providing them with the best and most powerful weapons of war. Let this be clearly understood: we must maintain the level of our war production to ensure the adequate provision of war equipment for our own men and those of the united nations, but we must soon face the question, how long we can continue to increase both the number of our men in the armed forces and war production.

As one of the major arsenals and granaries in the British commonwealth, our Canadian war problem resolves itself primarily into a balance for the allocation of total man- and woman-power to: (1) the armed services; (2) production of munitions; (3) production of foodstuffs for war purposes; (4) production of essential civilian supplies. While raising a large number of men for the armed services, we have been able at the same time to achieve a remarkable increase in both industrial and agricultural production. Up to the present we have been able to accomplish this by a process of natural selection, allowing individuals to find that war-time service in which they feel able to make their best contribution to the total war effort. However, the time has come when we cannot reach the military, industrial and agricultural goals that are necessary to ensure victory without the gradual exercise of some government direction and control. One has only to read the newspapers—and by this I do not necessarily mean editorials. In recent issues of the Toronto and Ottawa papers I have noted almost frantic appeals from war industry for men. Many of these industries are located in ridings represented by hon. members here this afternoon, and they cover almost the whole field of human endeavour. Particularly is there need for men in the heavy industries; and in my judgment, if we are to continue production on the scale on which we are now producing—and of course we have planned for even a further increased production—it will be necessary to pay particular attention to heavy industry, because it is the basic industry of the war, in which few women can be employed. I believe that steps will have to be taken in the very near future to see that the heavy industries of this country are provided with sufficient men so that we can produce the necessary supplies according to plan. I sometimes wonder whether we have not tried to do too much for a nation the size of ours.

In recent weeks I have received many visits from industrialists who are anxious about the shortage of labour and its effect on war production. I should like to quote two paragraphs from a letter which, because of the nature of its contents, dealing with the war effort, was confidential. This paragraph reads:

> Indications are that this condition is going to become worse, since we have a number of production units which will go into production during the summer months, so that unless more labour becomes available by the fall our efficiency will be greatly impaired.
> At the present time we have need for between 300 and 400 men, and with the new units going into production we will require by September or October a force of approximately 500 to 600 more than the number we now have working. We are doing everything we can to relieve the situation by picking up labour in the north country and in various other parts of Ontario where we understand non-essential industry is being curtailed.

I could instance many other appeals for labour to take jobs on which women cannot be employed. It is evident that almost all our people who are ordinarily accepted for work in industry and agriculture are now fully employed. From now on we must carefully classify the man- and woman-power of the country so that every individual can be referred to the work in which he can make his maximum contribution to our war effort.

The conclusion is inescapable that we cannot reach the military, industrial and agricultural goal which we must attain to ensure victory without steadily increasing resort to measures of government direction and control, of which I now wish to speak briefly.

Effective utilization of man-power implies that none be wasted by unemployment. Every unemployed male worker is now required to register for work and to keep that registration active as long as he remains unemployed. This will soon be made compulsory for women workers also. It is generally agreed that every effort should be made to offer jobs first to the available men. We do not expect 100 per cent success in removing every local or temporary pocket of unemployment; even Great Britain has not been able to achieve that. But lack of success will no longer be because of incomplete information. We must know of every unemployed worker, where he is and what sort of work he is best fitted for.

On Friday last the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) requested a statement as to the total numbers of males and females recorded at the employment offices across Canada in compliance with the order requiring all male persons from sixteen to sixty-nine years of age to register. I may say that the employment offices have been reporting the number of persons who at specified dates had applied for work and who on the dates reported had not yet been placed. The following are comparative figures, as at April 30 in the years 1940, 1941 and 1942, of those who had voluntarily come to the employment offices seeking work and have not been placed:

April 1	Men	Women	Total
1940.....	108,257	19,295	127,552
1941.....	51,580	14,912	66,492
1942.....	24,879	8,141	33,020

Of course in the day to day transactions of the employment offices there will always be a number of persons who at the end of any given day are unplaced because of the ordinary movement of men and women from one job to another. However, the comparison I have just given of unplaced applicants as between 1940 and 1942 shows that the reservoir of available labour is almost entirely depleted.

An interesting check against the foregoing figures is disclosed by the employment reports secured monthly by the bureau of statistics from firms employing more than fifteen employees. These reports indicate a very large increase in the number of persons employed in non-agricultural employment. The figures are:

March	No.
1940.....	2,120,000
1941.....	2,678,000
1942.....	3,131,000

Hon. members will see that there has been an increase of approximately a million persons employed in these industries over the last two years. It is apparent from these figures that the number of persons reporting voluntarily for work is decreasing rapidly and that the number of persons employed in this group of roughly 13,000 firms has increased by over a million in the last two years.

It is interesting to note that in April, 1942, as compared with April, 1940, the number of unplaced applicants at the employment offices showed a decrease of 74 per cent and the number of wage earners employed by these 13,000 firms had increased between March, 1940, and March, 1942, by 47 per cent.

It was our opinion that the number of employable men who have not registered at the offices voluntarily was very small. However to make sure and to obtain a registration of employable women on a voluntary basis and generally to encourage the use of the employment offices, compulsory registration of men and voluntary registration of women was ordered to be taken early in June. At the close of business on June 11, 1942, as a result of the two registrations the total number reported as being unemployed in Canada was:

Women	8,818
Men	59,933
Total	68,751

It should be noted that the number of women who registered is not greatly in excess of the figures for April 30, 1942. Since the registration was voluntary, most of those who registered were women who were actually seeking employment. As the registration of men was compulsory, the 59,933 who registered included many unemployable persons, many only partly employable and many who for various reasons it would be difficult to place in employment. The employment officers are examining the registration, and from preliminary but incomplete returns it appears that some 50 per cent of the 59,933 males are totally or partly unemployable. Accordingly the net figure of employable men registered is approximately the same as the total number of males who had voluntarily registered at April 30, 1942, or something over 20,000, and not more than 30,000 unplaced on June 11, 1942. This is a remarkably low figure, undoubtedly an all-time low for Canada. The registration of all those persons covered by unemployment insurance is almost complete. They are being classified by age, skill, sex, and industry.

It is obvious that we cannot meet our man-power requirements solely from the present small number of unemployed. Women must replace men in very many occupations within the range of their strength and skill; men must be transferred from less essential to more essential industry, and it may be necessary further to contract employment in less essential production. One has only to walk down the main streets of any of our cities to observe that we have not yet touched the fringe of the measure of sacrifice necessary for victory.

One will appreciate the difficulties in establishing a man-power inventory when we are dealing with the records of millions of individuals. The inventory gets out of date before it can be put to effective use. But we are undertaking to maintain a running inventory of our man-power by requiring employers to report all additions to and separations from their payrolls. This is essential to reduce excessive and wasteful labour turnover. The effort to prohibit enticement from war industries was not effective, because employers were free to hire anybody who applied. However, the wage control policy has restrained employers from putting up wages in their competition for scarce labour. This competition, of course, did not increase the total supply of labour, but simply caused more movement of the available supply between employers.

We intend to channel all transfers of labour through employment offices. At the moment employers are required to notify the national selective service officer of all their vacancies and all prospective lay-offs, and they may engage only persons referred to them or approved by the national selective service officer. This is the beginning of genuine control and direction of man-power. The national selective service officer, as the system develops, will have before him at all times the local demand for and the supply of labour.

As employers and employees grow more accustomed to using the officers, and as the officers gradually learn the details of their local situations, it will be possible, either generally or in particular localities, or in respect of particular industries and occupations, to tighten or slacken the control as circumstances necessitate. This will mean some inconvenience to both employers and employees. A tremendous burden of work and responsibility is imposed on the employment offices, but the procedure if effective will facilitate post-war readjustments in employment of untold benfit and value.

The house is well aware of the steps already taken with respect to the maintenance of an adequate labour supply for agriculture. I would like to say this to my farmer and industrial friends. This war in its very essence demands that we improvise from day to day, and as the changing conditions require, the measures necessary to free men for the fighting forces so that victory may be assured.

Last year the province of Ontario, in cooperation with the dominion, was able to organize a farm labour programme that provided an additional 23,000 workers to assist in the peak period of agricultural activities, and a similar arrangement has been made for this year.

It is certain that governments cannot do everything, but I am confident that with the intelligent cooperation of the farmers themselves most of the difficulties of farm labour supply can be minimized.

If I had more time I could discuss the war emergency training programme under which tens of thousands have been trained, and the plan recently adopted to train 15,000 war plant job instructors within a period of three months. We have set in motion, in cooperation with the universities, a course of training in personnel work, because of the dearth of qualified men in that field, which I think will be of untold benefit both to employers and to employees in our industrial life. From my experience as chairman of the industrial disputes inquiry commission I am of the opinion that one great defect is the lack of knowledge by some managements of how to deal with the human element in industry. A man may be one of the brightest of engineers, but when it comes to the engineering of men he sometimes is the worst kind of engineer, and we have felt in the labour department that with the development of a personnel force especially trained and skilled in the handling of men much unnecessary industrial friction may be avoided. The British government have taken similar steps, also our friends to the south.

We have arranged with the universities and the provinces to provide assistance to student doctors, dentists, engineers, and scientists who on graduation will be directed to the armed services and war industries. This financial aid will make it possible to continue the courses in the summer months and will speed up training in these most important occupations.

Funds are being made available to meet the transportation costs of moving workers to distant employment.

Negotiations are proceeding with the provinces with a view to the conclusion of agreements for the establishment of day nurseries for the children of women employed in the war industries.

It will be observed that by the adoption of a variety of measures, some still in their early stages, the mobilization of Canadian man-power has been proceeding steadily. The regional and national war labour boards are turning to the problems of wage adjustments necessary to attract and retain labour in distant and isolated undertakings, such as the defence projects in British Columbia.

As the labour supply situation tightens I shall be prepared to recommend, and I know the Canadian people would wish me to recommend, whatever measures of increased direction, compulsion or control prove necessary to meet future requirements. As Minister of Labour I have the task of seeing that there are enough men for our war industries. Hence the setting up of the national selective service branch under Mr. Elliott M. Little, who with his associates are moving faster in the total mobilization of man-power than many realize. It is the part of statesmanship in this time to unify the people of this dominion so that our national war effort may reach maximum proportions and efficiency. We cannot maintain our free institutions in these desperate times unless there is national unity. I believe that is the soundest policy to pursue.

May I say this, Mr. Speaker, that I am doing many things to-day which are in direct contradiction of everything I have ever believed in, and I am doing them because I believe they are in the interests of this dominion. Many "shalls" and "shall nots" are going out from the Department of Labour every day in the week, but I trust that it may be said of the Minister of Labour and of the government of this country that no step that we take will endanger the liberties that have been handed down to us, and I hope that at the conclusion of the war we shall speedily return to that way of life where the utmost amount of freedom is possible for the people of this country.

Tribute has been paid to the various racial groups that go to make up the life of this dominion. Basically we have French and British, but we have taken within our blood streams most of the finest races of Europe and have fashioned a nation based on the concept of freedom equal to that of any other country in the world.

Mention has been made of imperialism. The British people, and I speak now in the broader sense, with all their faults, have been mainly responsible for the form of government that has made possible even this debate in the House of Commons. It has been my privilege, Mr. Speaker, to visit almost every part of what is sometimes called the British empire, and I know something of the contributions that have been made to democratic government and justice by the British people. I have also seen things and conditions that I felt were not warranted in any civilized country, but viewed in the broad sweep of history I think it will be said that the contributions made by the British empire have been the greatest in the history of the world.

Members of this house have a terrible responsibility. It is their duty to give leadership to their constituents. Freedom, as we understand it, is in the balance. When the history of our time is written, may it be said that we measured up to our responsibility, and that nothing we should have done, no matter what the cost, was not undertaken to preserve the heritage of liberty handed down to us by those who have gone before.

I do not want hon. members to have any doubt as to where I stand on the question of conscription for overseas service. It has been indicated in certain quarters that I am a conscriptionist. Be that as it may, I hope it can never be said I am not a realist. I want to say in conclusion that when in my view conscription for overseas service is essential to the safety of the state and the preservation of our way of life, I will express my opinion in no uncertain terms.

In conclusion I should like to quote from a book written by an American. It is called "The White Cliffs", and from it I take this thought:

I am American bred,
I have seen much to hate here—much to forgive,
But in a world where England is finished and dead,
I do not wish to live.

That expresses my sentiments.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) upon the excellent speech he has made this afternoon. I take to myself a good deal of credit for the fact that he occupies his present position. Some hon. members will recall that nearly two years ago I recommended to the house that we have as Minister of Labour a man who understood the problems of labour. I am glad to see that for some little time we have had a man as able as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat.

After listening to the monotonous, partisan repetitions of set phrases which came to us like a gramophone record of their master's voice, in the form of speeches by one cabinet minister after another in support of voluntary enlistment, and of the Prime Minister's policy of procrastination in so far as the real issue is concerned, it was indeed refreshing to hear the well-reasoned argument of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) in favour of conscription.

There is no misunderstanding his language when he says:

The need for conscripting those men—

For overseas.

—having arisen, I say frankly . . . the government should have power to apply conscription.

He does not follow the Prime Minister's ifs and whens, or the Minister of National War Services' confessions of an ex-pacifist, but says with conviction that the time is here —now. I congratulate him upon his courage, and the valuable contribution he has made to the debate.

On Tuesday last I listened with much interest to the important speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). I congratulate him upon the change which has taken place in his attitude toward the manpower problem since he rebuked me in the house following my speech on May 12, 1941, when I had the termerity to suggest the adoption of compulsory selective service. I admit at once that he may have done this from the very best of motives, knowing as he probably did the effect which even the suggestion of conscription would have upon Quebec. I am glad to find that he now declares there is nothing sinister about the word conscription, and that if it comes to a choice between national unity and national security he will select the latter.

On May 12 I spoke in part as follows:

We should have the compulsory selective service which was visualized by the sweeping powers of the National Resources Mobilization Act passed last June, without the hamstringing clause that prevents men who train under that act from being used wherever the need is urgent. Voluntary recruiting has reached the stage where it is slow, cumbersome and wasteful. I am certain that all parts of Canada will respond to the high patriotic call that the situation now requires. Selective compulsory enlistment is the only fair and efficient way to meet the complex needs of Canada. I venture to suggest therefore that this session should not close until we have disposed of this urgent business.

I objected then, as I do now, and as I did in 1940 when the National Resources Mobilization Act was passed, to section 3 being incorporated in the act. I am firmly of the opinion that if the government had courageously introduced conscription at that time, the province of Quebec would have accepted it, and to-day we would have greater national unity. This lack of unity I attribute to the vacillating leadership we have had under the present government.

From listening to various speeches one would assume that the need for conscription has not yet arisen, but that when it comes—and not until then—conscription will be enforced. They seem to lose sight of the fact that it takes from nine months to two years to make an efficient soldier. When the need comes we cannot just go out and grab men, put them into the service and rush them into the firing line. We have had many illustrations of the lack of wisdom of that procedure.

I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) upon the courage he has shown in casting aside at least temporarily his partisan ties, and upon the able way in which he disposed of the irrelevancies with which the speeches of his political friends have confused the issue. He has offered a correct and logical interpretation of the meaning of the "yes" and "no" votes as applied to conscription. I agree entirely with the hon. member when he says:

The question of conscription cries out for decision, and can no longer be evaded. Let us determine it now. This is the debate, and now is the time. It has already been decided by the high court of the electorate.

And I may say to the hon. member that it was decided by the high court of the electorate in my constituency, as well as in his.

May I also congratulate the hon. member for Lambton West (Mr. Gray) upon the admirable speech on conscription he delivered in the house on June 18. He expressed the views held by over 80 per cent of the people of this province, and earned their admiration for his courage in doing so. After all, I submit that in time of war, national defence should be placed before party, and that is just what the hon. members to whom I have referred have done.

The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), speaking yesterday, called for unity and understanding and referred to what he termed the disgusting prejudice against French Canadians. I may tell him that that does not apply to any of the hon. members of this house who are associated with me here. It certainly does not apply to me. I have always advocated tolerance. I should like to quote from a speech I made on April 24, 1934, on our heritage of tolerance. I said:

> The priceless heritage of tolerance, the priceless gift of freedom which this dominion, as a part of a great empire holds in trust for this and future generations, will, I know, never be betrayed, never be lost. For it is in this freedom, this tolerance, this true democracy, that the richest life is to be found for all men.

I may tell him also that I have nothing but the kindliest feeling of friendship and admiration for the race which he represents. Many years ago I went to Paris to take a post-graduate course in surgery, because in that city there were some of the most expert exponents of surgery to be found anywhere in the world. I should like to pay a tribute to that great scientist Louis Pasteur, whose discovery that minute organisms caused suppuration has enabled such great progress to be made in surgery. Had it not been for his discovery, many of the successful operations now performed on various parts of the human body would not have been possible.

I believe also that our French-Canadian compatriots are just as loyal as any of us. If they are placed in a false position to-day it is not their fault; it is owing entirely to the perverse education they have received at the hands of the politicians. It is a fact that a million French-Canadian people of Quebec origin who now live in the New England states have responded to the national selective service draft as loyally as any other United States citizens. Our French-Canadian compatriots would do the same under the leadership of a Roosevelt or a Churchill. Instead they have been misled for political party considerations by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and some of his colleagues. It is clear that the present unhappy situation in Quebec has been due to the spread of anti-British propaganda over a period of years by politicians for their own partisan ends.

The hon. member for Bellechasse has been less than fair in quoting only the statements made by Mr. Asquith in 1915 and 1916, because it was in the latter year that Mr. Asquith was deposed from leadership for his persistence in those views and for following of a policy of "wait and see." There is ample evidence of disunity in this house, as well as a steadily mounting feeling of distrust and despair throughout the country under our present Asquithian leadership, to warn the Prime Minister that he will soon meet a similar fate. I should like to bring the hon. member for Bellechasse up to date by quoting a few passages from a speech made by Mr. Churchill in May, 1939, to be found at page 170 of "Blood, Sweat and Tears." Speaking of the conscription act, he said:

> But there is nothing undemocratic about this measure; it is the most democratic thing we have ever done in the island. Provided that no exceptions are allowed, it will wear away differences between class and class, and it may also be the beginning of a far more broadly and evenly based society than we have ever known.

And again:

> This is a time when prejudices must be abandoned on either side, and a true comradeship established between all parties and classes throughout our loyal anxious land.

Referring to the period of which my hon. friend spoke, he says in part:

> This proved intolerable to the national sense of justice. Moreover, the two million households and families whose menfolk had borne the whole burden, were infuriated by the fact that there were very large numbers of perfectly fit men remaining at home, filling at higher wages the jobs of those who had volunteered. It was this sense of wrong and injustice, which spread through the country in the spring and summer of 1916, that alone carried the conscription bill.
> How different now! Today, before a shot has been fired, in cool blood we are taking this momentous step, and taking it with a very large measure of national acceptance. Nothing could more vividly mark the manner in which the wage-earning classes—without whom no armies can be formed—have realized the deadly nature of the assault which is being directed at their fundamental right and liberties. What nearly two years of bloody war only attained with difficulty in 1916, is now practically conceded by the will of the nation in a time of nominal peace. This is the point which should impress foreign countries, and—

I interject, "Canada".

—because it is the most explicit guarantee of the resolve of the British people to bear its part in what is now plainly a world cause.

I am sure we were all greatly touched by the pathetic evidence of fog which surrounded the statesman from Saskatchewan when he visited a valley in British Columbia many years ago. One can only conclude that the same fog has pursued him through the years and still envelops him. This is perhaps the kindest way to explain his willingness to sit silent and listen to the aspersions which have been cast upon his former colleague, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, in connection with the enforcement of conscription. This would seem to be the appropriate time to get the record straight. Mr. Meighen drew up the conscription act of 1917 in his capacity as Solicitor General, and no one can read that act without agreeing that it is as fair and equitable as a law could be made. All decisions to be made under it with respect to the liberty of the subject were made by impartially appointed tribunals. The bill was introduced by Sir Robert Borden on June 11, 1917. It passed on July 24 of the same year, when it received the practically unanimous support not only of the Conservative members of the house but of a large part of the Liberal party as well. About a month later, on August 28, Mr. Meighen left the justice department to become Secretary of State. On October 2 of the same year he became Minister of the Interior, which position he held until 1919. Sir Robert Borden promised not to give the bill effect until it was submitted to the people in a general election, which was held on December 17, 1917. The actual call for service was not made until January 3, 1918.

The administration of the military service act was entirely under the Department of Justice, whose head was the Hon. C. J. Doherty, of Quebec. From what I can learn there does not appear to have been any complaint at all about its having been unjustly administered, although, doubtless, minor errors were made. The talk, therefore, about the administration of the act being the cause of the opposition is absurd. The opposition, clearly, was to conscription itself, as everybody will realize who has sat in this house during the last week or so.

The present Prime Minister and his Quebec ministers capitalized on it in the most ruthless way. It will be apparent how unfair and untrue it was for the Prime Minister to announce over the radio in seeking the "yes" vote, as he did, as follows:

The pledge not to impose conscription, as everybody knows, was the result of Canada's experience in the last war. The way in which conscription was then introduced and the way it was enforced gave rise to bitter resentment.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that this statement is the more reprehensible because it was made in what the Prime Minister proclaimed as a non-party campaign, and when Mr. Meighen, a member of the government of 1918, had no means of replying to the audience which the Prime Minister reached, gratis, over the radio.

May I point out that the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) and all the Liberal ministers in the Union government at that time, as well as Mr. Meighen, were jointly responsible for what was done. The minister of mines, who has been a member of the present government for many years, had exactly the same relation to the enforcement of conscription as had Mr. Meighen. But the Liberals made a bogeyman of Mr. Meighen because he became the leader of the Conservative party. If there was anything wrong or unjust in the enforcement of the act, the minister of mines had the full responsibility that Mr. Meighen had, but had not the common fairness between man and man to defend either himself or his former colleague. Instead, he proposes sending me and other critics of the government to a concentration camp—which only confirms the fears of some people that we are soon to have, if we have not already, a dictatorship in this country. In fact, does not the announcement yesterday of the action launched against Colonel Drew point in the same direction?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FLEMING: That is before the courts.

Mr. BRUCE: I gave a fair hearing to the hon. gentleman who spoke before me, and I would ask my hon. friends to accord me the same treatment.

Mr. SPEAKER: May I point out that any reference to a matter which is before the courts is not in order.

Mr. BRUCE: I would simply add that I consider, as many others do, that the methods of the gestapo were brought into play and displayed for the observation of this country yesterday. Is it a crime for a man to try to find out what caused our troops to be sent unarmed—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —and untrained to Hong Kong? If not, then some explanation is needed of what took place yesterday.

The present debate on conscription, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GOLDING: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I believe that the rules of the house prohibit speakers from reading constantly from manuscript.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Minister of Labour read every word of his speech.

Mr. GOLDING: Mr. Speaker has given a ruling and so far as the leader of the opposition is concerned he is the first one to create a fuss if anybody interrupts him. I am now addressing myself to the house through Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I have already stated to the house the rule regarding the reading of speeches. I will not say that the hon. member is reading his speech in a manner that should be taken objection to. It is true that the hon. member is reading closely from his notes, but I think that some latitude has been given to other members addressing the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Postmaster General yesterday read every minute during his speech.

Mr. MULOCK: That is not correct.

Mr. BRUCE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I have had previous interruptions from the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), and I expected the same thing from him again this afternoon. He has been very restless for some time, particularly when I talked about some of his friends.

The present debate calls to mind the discussions which took place during the crisis which arose over conscription in England in the summer of 1915, when Mr. Asquith was Prime Minister. Mr. Churchill explained that the delays and uncertainty were arousing great disquiet, and then went on to discuss in a general way the question of temporizing in peace and war. The quotation will be found in "The World Crisis", volume I, page 243.

Mr. FLEMING: Well, we can read it there.

Mr. BRUCE: I should like to read just what Mr. Churchill said. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) read a good many extracts yesterday. Surely I can have a similar privilege to-day, without the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others looking discomfited.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must call the attention of hon. members to the fact that the hon. member who has the floor has a perfect right to give expression to his point of view, whether or not it is pleasing to other hon. members of the house. He should be extended the consideration to which all hon. members are entitled, and I must insist that he have the right to make his speech without interruption.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, I object to the hon. gentleman bringing my name into it. I was sitting here just listening to him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A case of mistaken identity.

Mr. BRUCE: I thought the minister's actions portrayed a little more than a kindly interest. Perhaps not; I am sorry if I misunderstood him. Mr. Churchill says:

> There is an extraordinary contrast between the processes of thought and methods of management required in war and those which serve in peace. Much is gained in peace by ignoring or putting off disagreeable or awkward questions, and avoiding clear-cut decisions which, if they please some, offend others. It is often better in peace to persist for a time patiently in an obscure and indeterminate course of action rather than break up or dangerously strain a political combination. . . . In war everything is different. There is no place for compromise in war. That invaluable process only means that soldiers are shot because their leaders in council and camp are unable to resolve. In war, the clouds never blow over; they gather unceasingly and fall in thunderbolts. Things do not get better by being let alone; unless they are adjusted they explode with shattering detonation. Clear leadership, violent action, rigid decisions one way or the other, form the only path not only of victory, but of safety and even of mercy.
> The state cannot afford division or hesitation at the executive centre. To humour a distinguished man, to avoid a fierce dispute, nay, even to preserve the governing instrument itself, cannot, except as an alternative to sheer anarchy, be held to justify half measures. The peace of the council may for the moment be won, but the price is paid on the battlefield by brave men marching forward against unspeakable terrors in the belief that conviction and coherence have animated their orders.

Thus does Britain's great war-time leader set forth in clear and unmistakable language the distinction between peace and war-time leadership, and confirm the attitude which I took shortly after I entered this house when I raised the question, in all good faith, I submit, whether the qualities that commended our present Prime Minister for the job of conventional statecraft in peace-time were not the very ones which condemned him as a courageous war-time leader. At the time I assured the house, as I do now, that this appraisal of the Prime Minister's ability and temperament was not meant to be personal criticism of him as a man of opposite political faith, because, as I have often said before, I do not consider in these grave times that a man's political viewpoint is of any moment whatever. However, my statement that I was apprehensive as to whether the Prime Minister's temperament was such as to qualify him to direct this nation in the greatest crisis in its history was interpreted falsely, and of course the heavy guns of partisanship were trained on me. May I ask again with equal sincerity if the events of the past weeks do not in some degree justify the apprehension which I expresed two years ago.

Briefly, the Prime Minister's philosophy to keep the party afloat and lie at anchor in the stream of time has not worked even sucessfully for the great party which he has the honour to head. I further submit that this policy of evasion of responsibility has worked disastrously also for the interests of the nation. Without dealing in recriminations, I should like to say that those of us who, from the most honest and honourable motives, tried to prevent the Prime Minister and his party from evading responsibility by submitting the question of mobilization of man-power, to the people in the form of a plebiscite have been fully justified in opposing this method on the floor of the house. I should like also to add that once the plebiscite as a means had pased this parliament and become an instrument through which the nation was to express its views on mobilization of man-power, I, and the other loyal members of this house, shared equally and vigorously in the campaign to bring the vote on this evasively-worded question to a successful result.

It is with some pride that I point to my constituency, Parkdale in Toronto, and to the result which they gave—92 per cent "yes" in answer to the question which was asked. Speaking as a member from the province of Ontario, I wish to say that the result of the vote in that section of Canada is a magnificent tribute to the patriotism and soundness of the Canadian people. However, the plebiscite is past history. That it was a political blunder of the first magnitude goes without saying. The vote, however, established clearly for this government that there is a division of opinion in Canada on the question of conscription. No matter in what innocuous language the question was phrased, the result of the vote was a clear-cut indication to this government that the people went to the polls and voted on conscription, "yes" or "no".

What is the result? In one part of Canada the carefully nurtured bogey of conscription has borne full and devastating fruit, while throughout the nation as a whole a substantial majority of the people have told this parliament through its government to introduce full-out conscription and have done with this hypocrisy. In the eyes of world opinion the government's unwillingness in the past to face up to this issue honestly and courageously has done us untold harm. This nation won its reputation and carried influence in world affairs far beyond what its small population justified, because of the magnificent achievements of the Canadian forces in the last war. That this reputation and our current effort have been done serious harm throughout the world by the government's policy of conscription, is an unchallengeable statement. This damage is such that only time and deeds can repair it.

Therefore I appeal to the Prime Minister of this nation, even at this late date. Let us have finished with half measures and deception. Let us obey the will of the majority of the people of this great dominion. Let us put ourselves on an equal plane with the other members of the united nations by a straightforward clear-cut introduction of complete selective compulsory service. I hear our present system defended because the voluntary form of enlistment is said to be successful. I submit it is most niggardly and cowardly for this nation to continue a system which obviously brings out all its best and bravest, placing a penalty on patriotism while paying a premium to the shirkers who stay at home. We all as members of this highest court of the nation stand here as trustees for those brave young flyers, those gallant members of our naval forces, and the yet unproven but equally fine mettle of Canadian manhood which constitutes our active army. Let us be faithful to that trust.

I ask the Prime Minister to amend the present bill in committee to provide for the immediate introduction of conscription. He will perhaps draw strength partly from his political adversaries. If there is a defection on the part of his cultivated followers I am sure it will be accompanied with regrets, but I am equally certain that as this war progresses the wisdom of that course will be vindicated and those who temporarily do not see fit to support a policy of honesty and courage will some day thank him for performing what must be considered the first duty of the head of any government, that of taking the proper steps to protect the lives and property of the people who constitute the nation which it is his high privilege to govern.

I have heard much of a political crisis in recent weeks. There need not be one. I address myself to the Prime Minister through the acting leader of the house: by taking the simple, honest, fearless course he can enlist his critics on his side, and the judgment of history will certainly dissipate any temporary dissension within his party ranks. These tragic days of war will not always be upon us. Surely it is consistent with statesmanship and honour that this nation be governed with a view to the future. I am perfectly conscious that the great job in hand is the effective prosecution of the war, and I am not unmindful of the great contribution this nation has made in many spheres under the present government. But I do feel that when that day arrives when all our sacrifices will be crowned with victory it will be an irreparable tragedy if the British empire's war effort should have suffered because Canada failed to adopt a form of conscription equal to that of the United States. Canada's position geographically makes her the show window of the British commonwealth of nations, influencing American public opinion to a far greater degree than her population of twelve million people would in itself warrant. We cannot afford to prejudice the magnificent contribution of those brave people of England, the senior partner of this commonwealth, by causing a chink in her armour. If the comradeship which is being gained in arms among the Anglo-Saxon nations by the sacrifice of their bravest and best is to bear full fruit in the days of peace, surely it is important that this nation leave no justifiable opportunity for individual patriots in any land to say that Canada among the united nations failed to meet the sacrifices of any other country.

Again I appeal to the Prime Minister to consider our obligations to the future, and to give this house at once a clear-cut measure of conscription, which will enable sacrifices to be equally shared so that the laurels which will accompany victory may be worn with equal pride in every section of this dominion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Exception has been taken this afternoon to the reading of speeches. At the beginning of this debate I asked hon. members to give strict observance to the rule in that regard. That observance has not been given throughout this debate, and hon. members on both sides of the house are at fault in that breach of the rule. It is clearly the sense of the house that speeches should not be read, and that there should be strict conformity to the rule, no matter from what side of the house or in what language the speech is made. I therefore propose now, knowing the sense of the house, to require strict conformity with the rule, and I therefore ask hon. members to observe it.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): Before making some observations on this bill I wish to compliment the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Bruce) on the clearness and tolerance and the excellent manner of delivery of his address. I shall have a word to say a little later as to his introduction into this debate of the name of his honoured leader, but in the meantime I do pay that tribute, a genuine one, to my hon. friend.

Let me say at once that I propose to vote for this bill. Indeed I could find no reason not to do so. I believe I owe it to my constituents and to the people of Canada and to myself to support this bill, in order that the answer given by the people in the plebiscite may have the effect for which they overwhelmingly voted.

What argument can really be found to the contrary? Section 3 of the mobilization act, if it remains the law, is a distinct prohibition against the government introducing compulsory service at such time as they may in the light of all the circumstances of the moment deem it essential so to do in order to maintain Canada's war effort. Therefore I find no difficulty whatever in believing that it is my bounden duty to vote for Bill No. 80.

How can we justify any other course? If occasion arises, if our voluntary system should fail—the contrary is the fact for the moment —the government should, I believe, be free to act speedily and fearlessly by introducing a measure to provide for compulsory service, in order that we may at all times reinforce and support and not desert the young men of this country whom we have sent overseas, whom we have voted money to support, whom we are maintaining, French-Canadian and English, in Britain and elsewhere to fight Canada's battle over there.

I feel that some confusion has crept into this debate because we have not realized the importance of one of the main factors, and I should like to put it to hon. members now. Canada has a budget, or if you like a programme, under which to carry on the war.

We budgeted wisely in advance, not merely for money—we had our money budget on Tuesday and that will be discussed at the proper time—but for our man-power needs in all three armed forces, as all nations do. We budgeted for the fifteen-months period for our man-power requirements, from January 1, 1942, to March 31, 1943; we announced the budget to parliament and received the assent of parliament, practically unanimously, to our man-power budget. Our war cabinet did not do that lightly. You heard from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that he had consulted the high commands of all our Canadian forces. Next they consulted and received the approval of our much respected and revered chief of the armed forces, General McNaughton, who also approved our man-power budget. Next, as the minister has told you, he secured the approval, although it was not necessary at all to do so, of the British Secretary of State for War to the sufficiency and propriety of our budget.

We budgeted to increase our forces—the members are all familiar with the details—from 27,000 men now in the navy to 40,000 by March of next year. We need 80,000 more young men in the air force to bring the strength up from 100,000 to 180,000, and we need from 90,000 to 100,000 more men in the army to bring it up to the requirements of the two army corps set out in the manner indicated by the minister, it is on Hansard, and I shall not repeat it. So that the total budget of our man-power by March next is 615,000 men for all the armed forces. I have heard no man in this house or out of it declare that he has any quarrel with those figures or with that objective, with that budget or with that programme. If there is any such, let him indicate to me now that he does not think it is enough, having regard to those who approved this budget, and having regard to the well-known fact that generals as a rule want all the men they can get. With General McNaughton's approval of that budget, I have not heard a man in Canada, not even a newspaper in Canada, say that it was not an ample and proper budget, when you remember what we have to do in the other fields of total war effort.

Those other fields I shall not dwell on, but there is the food supply. We supply from Canada to-day two-thirds of the food of the British isles. We are supplying now three times more food to Britain every month than we supplied during the corresponding period of the whole course of the last war. We have also greatly increased our munitions supply, our supply of automotive vehicles, and of all that comes under the head of munitions. We are supplying eight times more munitions for the allies now than we did at any time in the last war. Remember those two facts, and do not let us get out of gear when we attempt to determine whether Canada's war effort is one of which we may be proud, and not one, as I am afraid some hon. members have almost indicated, at which we must hang our heads for fear the United States might laugh at us or sneer at us because our war effort was insufficient. I do not believe that the great majority of the decent people of the United States have any such notion in their hearts or heads at all. Would we be a proper subject for their laughter or their sneers when by a purely voluntary effort, without the least compulsion, we have done everything the mother country has asked us to do, and when, in the midst of this budget period, we are over-subscribed in money and in men for all three armed forces? And Canada is doing all that on a voluntary basis!

May I digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to deal with an incidental topic which I am sure you will feel is in order but which nevertheless is a little off my thesis. The United States recently raised the minimum monthly pay of any soldier in the United States army to $50 a month. After listening to the budget delivered in this house two days ago I say that we in this country ought at once to put similar legislation on our statute books. The soldiers of that great country and our own have almost everything in common—their mode of living, their scale of subsistence, their common desires, their common expenditures. All these things make them practically parallel, and I do not want to feel that these boys of ours, when they get over there, will be fighting shoulder to shoulder in a great crisis yet to come with the gallant troops from the United States and be receiving only $39 a month while the soldiers of the United States receive $50. I believe that we can afford to pay them $50, and we ought to do it. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) touched on this subject the other day, and I am heartily in agreement with him. He deserves great credit for bringing it to our attention.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the hon. member elaborate for a moment on the dependents' allowance, which makes, I think, a little difference?

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is correct. But dependents' allowance or no dependents' allowance—and what we are paying is not any too much for those dependents—we should raise the soldiers pay to $50 a month as a minimum. If the Minister of Finance has any doubts about it, then the least he should do, although I would prefer that he pay the $50 to them now every month, would be to let the difference between $39 and $50 accumulate as savings for the soldier, to be paid to him at the end of the war.

I have a word to say to two types of people on the subject of this debate. They are very different types. The first type is the man from Quebec or anywhere else in Canada, whether in or out of this house—and there are very few in this house to whom my remarks will apply at all—who says: I am against any young man from Canada going out of Canada to fight. Unfortunately there are some few people in this country to-day who take that position, who say: I will not send any Canadian boy or be a party to sending him outside Canada to war anywhere, at any time, under any circumstances. I am referring now to the absolute isolationist, who says that under no method, voluntary or compulsory, will he be a party to a boy from Canada fighting outside of Canada. That is the old Duplessis doctrine which we fought to a standstill a couple of years ago, when the gallant people of Quebec, to their credit—I had no part in the contest—indicated decisively that they would have no part in that doctrine in this war.

Why did Canada declare war on Germany? When we came here in September 1939 did we put a mushy declaration on the statute book that if Germany came over here we would get out our g ns and fight her? No; Canada declared war on Germany, and Canada said, "We will stand beside the mother country, and we will help her whip Germany to her knees." That in effect was the declaration of war, if hon. members will look it up and read it, as I did this morning. And what else could you expect, in declaring war, than to proceed to send men to fight the enemy outside of Canada, wherever the enemy could be found?

Do you people who say we should not send men out of Canada to fight expect some day to whip Germany in Canada? Is that the theory on which we declared war—to whip Germany in Canada? To ask the question is to answer it. I say to my hon. friends from Quebec—to the very few I am now addressing—you joined gallantly with us in September, 1939 in declaring war on Germany. You joined with us for three years in voting moneys—to do what? To send overseas our armed forces who enlisted voluntarily. You joined with us in Red Cross activities—not to have bandages waiting down in Quebec, but to send bandages to meet all needs and mercies to the Red Cross overseas. Those bandages were to follow our men, to be ready if disaster should come.

You have also followed us in respect to our air force. Could it be said by the isolationist that he intended only that our airmen should fly up and down over Manitoba and Quebec? Was it intended that they should not go outside the country? What arrant nonsense that would be! We created an air force—the greatest thing Canada has ever done since confederation—which has attracted the eyes of the whole world. We created that air force to go over there and fight the enemy where they can find him. We created the air force to whip him in Germany and to fight in Germany—and that is what they are doing.

All over the world our boys are to be found—and I shall not give the details, because they were put on Hansard the other day.

An hon. MEMBER: To China.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, even to China. And what about the navy? Did we build up that gallant navy in order that they might sail up and down lake Erie, or up and down lake Ontario, or perhaps even down the St. Lawrence river—"but if they get eleven miles out, don't dare let the boys go outside the twelve-mile limit"! What arrant nonsense, again! We created a navy in order that it might brave the perils of the Atlantic to meet the enemy, and we have been doing it, ever since the war started, in the finest and most splendid way. Let us, therefore, have a truce to all these suggestions that the boys should not be sent outside of Canada to fight for Canada and whip Germany, to win the war.

That is the first type of person to which I wished to direct my first observations. The second type of person is the man who says, "Enforce conscription right away. Put it on the books to-morrow. Don't wait another moment." There are some hon. members to whom I wish to pay the greatest credit, because I am of the opinion that they believe that to be the best thing to do. But will they permit me to examine for a moment whether or not we should take that course, having in mind the plight in which we find ourselves on this 25th day of June, 1942.

Let me refer to the observations made yesterday by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White), speaking to this bill. He asked that on the third reading—and I trust I may refer to my notes in this connection—the government should introduce all necessary rules and regulations to make conscription enforcible, and that we should go on and debate all the petty details, every little item, and sit here I suppose all summer, or possibly into the fall—perhaps even up to Christmastide. Meantime Hitler and the Japanese would not be waiting for us. I entirely disagree with the hon. member's suggestion that the house should follow details of that kind. It may be that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) would agree with him.

Let me for the benefit of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough look a little deeper into his suggestion. It is important to recall that in 1917 a conscription bill was placed upon the statute book, and assent was given to that bill on August 29 of that year. There was provision that the measure should become effective on December 1, 1917. It was introduced by a Unionist government, containing within its ranks splendid Canadians of both stripes of politics, Canadian from both the great political parties. Our new-found friends to the left had hardly come out of their swaddling clothes, or perhaps were not even born at that time—and I make that observation in no offensive way.

I call attention to the fact that in 1917 the government headed by Sir Robert Borden joined with eminent Canadian Liberals such as the late revered Mr. Rowell—I shall not name them, because history has recorded their names—and that government went to the country on the question of conscription. On December 19, having brought in a bill and having wrestled with it in parliament, as my hon. friend would have us do now—the hon. member from the west will recall the occasion—and having settled all the details with respect to it, the people of Canada passed upon it, and declared overwhelmingly in favour of conscription, on a vote of 153 for and 82 against.

In promoting that legislation Sir Robert Borden said to the people of Canada earlier in the year, back in May or June, "We must have 70,000 more men by December 31." That was one of his great pleas. That was the only way he could get them. What happened? When December 31 came they did not have even 7,000 more men. January, February and March passed by, and they had called up 404,000 men all across Canada, under conscription. It is recorded that 380,000 applications for exemptions had been filed. Of the total registrants called up, the proportion from Ontario was 125,000.

In order to have my figures accurate perhaps at this stage I could not do better than to read an extract from a most revered author who has now passed away. I refer to the late Doctor O. D. Skelton, a man who for fifteen years under different governments was Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, and a man who was held in the highest respect, as was so clearly indicated on the occasion of his passing in July of last year. As an historian of integrity he has had something to say about conscription, an issue which it was his duty to follow very closely. I quote the following from page 545, volume 2, as filed in the parliamentary library:

It failed absolutely—

He was referring to conscription.

—in the ostensible aim of providing greater reinforcements than the voluntary system. The government had had a free hand in framing the measure. No effort or expense was spared in its enforcement. A huge administrative staff was set up, each office with its full equipment of shining desks and elaborate files; forms and instructions and regulations rained from the printing bureau; medical officers and reviewing boards, local tribunals, appeal courts and a central appeal judge (Mr. Justice Duff) were appointed, with militia representatives to check exemptions; police were enrolled to round up defaulters. In Quebec as elsewhere, once the issue was decided at the polls, the act was accepted, and its operation given full scope. Yet the legions promised did not appear. The first shock to the sanguine supporters of the act came when it was found that of the 404,000 of the first class, unmarried men from twenty to thirty-four, who had registered by the end of 1917, 380,000 had claimed exemption; the next, with the announcement that there were 118,000 claims for exemption from Ontario as against 115,000 from Quebec (out of 125,000 and 117,000 registrants).

Will the hon. member for Parkdale digest that little morsel?

Mr. BRUCE: Mostly farmers, I should think.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BRUCE: Who were needed on the land.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is casting slurs on the farmers of my province and I resent it.

Mr. BRUCE: Only because—

Mr. SLAGHT: I represent a riding where there are as fine farmers as my hon. friend ever had in his riding.

Mr. BRUCE: I happen to be a farmer myself.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. BRUCE: Only because the farmers were needed on the land, the same as they are to-day.

Mr. SLAGHT: Perhaps the figures for Quebec will tell the house whether the farmers were needed on the land in Quebec. Is there any virtue about the Quebec soil that it farms itself? Let my hon. friend show a little reason in this discussion.

Just let me digress to say that he referred to his absentee leader, his remote control leader, whom he sought to eulogize by saying that he was the author of the act of 1917. I want him to listen to how the act of 1917 worked out. Perhaps he did not remember that his revered leader, his remote control leader to whom he pays such a tribute, had a great deal to do with the enforcement of the act of 1917 as well as having been the draftsman of the act.

An hon. MEMBER: The lost leader.

Mr. SLAGHT: Lost leader is right. I admire the affectionate way in which the hon. member for Parkdale referred to his leader. It was touching. It was almost bridal in its effect. Let me say to him that since February 9, when the people of York South had something to say, the honeymoon has been over for my hon. friend and his great leader.

Mr. BRUCE: May I just interject a word?

Mr. SLAGHT: Will time come off for this?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then my hon. friend will have to pardon me. I think I will be able to keep within my time; if I do I shall invite him to ask any question he wishes before I sit down. If not, no. Let us see what happened in Quebec. A total of 117,000 were called, and out of the Quebec registrants there were 115,000 applications for exemption.

Mr. BRUCE: Not bad.

Mr. SLAGHT: Not bad, but is my hon. friend saying that the discrepancy between the figures for Ontario and Quebec justifies the language we heard yesterday across the floor of this house? No. I continue with Doctor Skelton:

> Local tribunals, particularly in Quebec, were charged with being farcically lax; on the other hand, the military representatives appealed nearly every exemption in Quebec, but allowed 90,000 in Ontario to go unopposed. Exemptions were reviewed by the appeal judges and later by Justice Duff; by the end of March, some 364,000 out of 372,000 cases had been decided. In Quebec 108,000 exemptions had been finally approved, and in Ontario 104,000. Sir Robert Borden had insisted in June that it was absolutely essential to have 70,000 men by December 31, 1917. By March 31 1918, the number ordered to report for duty was only 31,000, of whom 5,000 defaulted, the net yield being less than 26,000. Supporters of conscription were slow to admit its failure, but in the face of this breakdown criticism could not wholly be suppressed.

Then there is a quotation from the Montreal Gazette. I think this is one of the newspapers loudest in support of conscription. It was not playing politics when it said:

> The spectacle offered by the operation of the draft system has not been encouraging. The government appears to have established a system which if it gets the men at all, will get them so slowly that whatever military advantage depends upon expeditious reinforcement will be lost.

I am sorry the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is not here, for the Toronto Globe referred to the widespread feeling of disappointment, while it is said that Mayor Church of Toronto stated:

> The Military Service Act will cost the country millions and is getting very little results. If the government had spent one-quarter of the money in voluntary recruiting, they would have got more men.

I am not quoting this to annoy my hon. friend from Toronto. I believe he is as loyal a man as there is in this house. If I may say so, I think he has been rather misled by his absentee leader.

I have just a few more quotations from Doctor Skelton's book. This gives the worst side of the picture. I want to be fair, because there is another item. I quote from page 548 as follows:

> The military crisis caused by the German drive for the channel ports in March gave occasion for a change in policy. The government decided to cancel all exemptions granted to men of twenty, twenty-one and twenty-two years of age. A resolution sanctioning an order in council to this effect passed parliament by a vote of 114 to 65.

The matter was carefully reviewed in parliament, and this order called up men who were entitled to stay home. Parliament did that, and parliament had the right to do it. Doctor Skelton continues:

> When the end came in November, 1918, some 83,000 men had been enrolled under the act, or had reported voluntarily after its enactment; of these, 7,000 were on compassionate leave and 15,000 on farm leave, so that the actual yield was 61,000 men, of whom few ever saw France.

What does that mean? We were to have 70,000 men by the end of December, 1917, but at the end of March, 1918, we had only 26,000. While the figures show that 61,000 were obtained as a result of that compulsion during the whole period up to armistice day, November 11, during the same period 101,000 men enlisted voluntarily.

I suggest that our fight must go on. A man who talks of peace now ought to be stuck up against a wall and shot. It would be nothing but a German peace; we would be putting our people into slavery for the rest of their existence. To my friends from Quebec, for many of whom I have the highest personal regard, let me say this in the friendliest spirit. The one sure way to avoid conscription for overseas is to continue the good work that you are doing of voluntary enlistments in ever-increasing numbers. That is the solution. Let all our provinces unite in friendly competition to supply men for the armed forces in this great struggle.

Mr. GRANT: Like Prince Edward Island.

Mr. SLAGHT: Like little Prince Edward Island. We shall have a hard time, in any province, to beat their record.

I have referred, perhaps insufficiently, to the fact that Quebec has done well in the armed forces under the voluntary system.

Thousands and thousands of our best boys in the navy, guarding and convoying and doing all the dirty work of the seas, come from Quebec, and you may be proud of them. Thousands and thousands of the young men in our air force—those who are over the channel, over Great Britain, over Germany—come from your province, and you may be proud of them. I had the privilege some ten days ago of attending a function, just outside these noble buildings, when two young French Canadians, Robillard and Morin, were acclaimed by a multitude of 20,000 people. French Canadians came in thousands from the other side of the river and we English-speaking people joined with them in a tribute to these two young heroes. They did not spend their time in the air over Manitoba or Quebec; they were over Germany, and we should not overlook the fact that the youth of Quebec turned out on that occasion with us and paid the greatest tribute to boys who were willing to go and did go and fight overseas, and were decorated by His Majesty the King. Let us keep up the tradition those two lads have set for the province of Quebec.

I conclude with this suggestion. Let us live our Canada as we believe she should be lived. Let us ban all those sayings which come so readily to the lips, and set race against race. Let us understand that we have had a wonderful history and record as a nation under the most difficult circumstances. Let us not forget those wonderful words which Winston Churchill uttered more than a year ago, and which apply with even greater force to-day: "There is grave reason for vigilance and concern, but no room for despair." I say to you, my fellow Canadians of the House of Commons and any across Canada who may hear or learn of what I have said: Let us join together in unity. The danger is terrific. What might happen is unthinkable unless we make a common cause, unless we show a common front, unless we go out to stop the enemy from destroying the motherland. Were the British fleet to go—I am not uttering these reflections as a harbinger of evil, but we must think of what might happen—how long would it be before the enemy's ships and their dastardly agents of destruction would be up the St. Lawrence river, through the fair province of Quebec, desecrating your cathedrals, blasting your schools, ravishing your loved ones? I say to my hon. friends across the way, as well as those by my side: Can any of us afford to do anything but adopt a course which is all for the greatness and glory of Canada? Let us not forget that little sentence which I like so much: "There is always a far horizon for forward-looking men."

Mr. J. R. HURTUBISE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words on this all-important resolution, but I experience some timidity in speaking after the eloquent member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) who has just resumed his seat.

I think it is my duty to say a few words on this matter on behalf of my riding and the good electors whom I represent. Much has been said in this house; many speeches have been made—many of them read. Mine has not been written: I shall just utter a few expressions on this important subject.

I consider it a great honour to represent the constituency of Nipissing, which extends, on the direct line from east to west, stretching from the Ottawa river to Georgian bay, a distance of two hundred miles, and another two hundred miles from north to south. In the election of 1935 there were nearly 63,000 voters on the lists, and without boasting I may say that I held eighty-six meetings during the campaign. In other words, to be the member for Nipissing is a full-time job. The riding is composed partly of rural and partly of urban people. We have a nice farming country; we have also the cities of North Bay and Sudbury, containing populations of 17,000 and 34,000 respectively. Of my electors, about 40 per cent are of Anglo-Saxon origin, about 40 per cent French, and the remainder of other nationalities.

Since this war began I have been astonished to see the patriotism, good-will and generosity of all those citizens, regardless of race, creed or politics. It would have been the wish of the people of North Bay and Sudbury to have separate regiments of their own, as they had in the last war, which did such marvellous deeds then, but we were told by the military authorities that this was not possible in view of the fact that uniformity in training was highly desirable. We therefore accepted their decision. Nevertheless, in the constituency of Nipissing our citizens have enlisted by thousands from the very start, and regardless of race or religion they have come forward—English, Scotch, Irish, French, Italian, Greek, Finns, Ukrainians, Poles, Jews, Serbs, Croatians and Indians. Some of them have joined Scottish regiments, the Royal Engineers, the Grey and Simcoe, the 14th Forestry Tank Corps and many other units. In the first Scottish regiment that was recruited, there are to be seen, I am proud to say, men of many nationalities wearing the kilts. They have continued to enlist in this way until the present day. Every time the military authorities have asked for a quota in my district the best young men have come forward. There has been complete cooperation on the part of everyone. Our citizens have accepted the situation with patriotism and generosity. They have been willing to bear the restrictions that have been imposed from time to time. They have willingly paid their taxes and have made various contributions to the war effort. We have played our part. All our public bodies have cooperated. I might cite one example of generosity and patriotism. At the time of military registration in North Bay, that city did all the work gratuitously. I do not know that this was done in many other places, but it shows the spirit of the people in that part of my riding.

In 1930 the electors of Nipissing did me the honour of returning me to represent them at Ottawa. I am not so credulous as to suppose that they voted mainly for myself. They voted for the party led by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and for those supporting him. Since that time they have voted for the same party as a government, and they have done so with increasing majorities. Again, I do not take credit for this; I give it to the Prime Minister and his government. In 1930 the majority in my district for the government party was 2,000; in 1935, 12,000, and in 1940, almost 16,000.

In the plebiscite, those who voted in my constituency returned 4,868 of a majority in favour of the affirmative. Many things have been said about the plebiscite, and I have taken the trouble to go around my constituency in order to find out the sentiments of the people. I want to be perfectly frank with the members of this house as well as with my electors. I admit that many voted "yes", for conscription, while many voted against conscription; but a great mass of the people voted neither for nor against conscription but simply as a means of expressing confidence in the present administration and so giving directions for a continuance of the present war effort. They voted to release the government from its past commitments. That was the attitude of a great part of the voters in my county, and I am sure that if a straight vote had been taken for or against conscription the result would have been different.

The question of conscription has been brought up in different campaigns that have been held in my district. It was discussed during the plebiscite, and it has been the chief topic of discussion during this debate. Widely different opinions have been expressed, but the conclusion I have drawn from the discussion, from all the speeches and the different statements that have been made, is that there is no great necessity for the immediate imposition of conscription. Why should there be pressure for the immediate imposition of conscription when we had the experience, as stated a few moments ago by the member for Parry Sound, which we had in the last war, when the results that were obtained were so unsatisfactory. It proved altogether impracticable. Judged by the results, the method was then a failure.

Since this question first came up we have had statements in the house from the different war ministers indicating that until now we have filled all our quotas; that, indeed, we have been in advance of our quotas, in regard to the army, the navy and the air force. The various ministers have proved this beyond any doubt. We have complied with the demands of our own military authorities and with the demands of the combined allied military authorities. Mr. Churchill made the statement that our contribution to the war effort was magnificent, and yet in spite of that we have heard a good many speeches—and violent speeches at that—in favour of conscription. I cannot understand it. For some days now we have been hearing from different ministers that for the present there is no necessity for conscription. I believe that Canadians are generous enough, loyal enough, to continue to answer the call in numbers great enough to fill the needs, and this voluntarily. But no one knows when the war will end or what the necessities for Canada or for the rest of the world will be in the future. However, I have confidence in the Prime Minister and in his cabinet, and I believe that they will act wisely under the circumstances that exist at any time. That is why I intend to support the present resolution, because I have full confidence in the government. I know they will not act unwisely. I know they will bear in mind always, as they have done from the beginning, that a total war effort means a well-balanced war effort. They know that if they should throw this total war effort out of balance, it would be disastrous for Canada and would greatly impair our contribution in this war.

The question of conscription has given rise to a great deal of discussion against my compatriots. I am a French-Canadian and I am proud of the fact. Although my father and mother were born in Quebec, I was born in Ontario and I was brought up and educated in that province, except for my arts course. I have lived in contact with the English speaking people of my part of the country—I might say mainly with the Scotch people—

I have got to know them, and I think we have always co-operated well together. With good-will we can go very far. Yes; I was brought up among Scotch people. I remember very well that my mother could understand English but could not speak it, and our neighbour—Martha Campbell—was a good old lady who cound understand French but could not speak it. They were, however, great friends and used to visit each other and have long conversations together, one speaking in English and the other in French, and they understood each other very well. That shows that with good-will we can always work together in a friendly spirit.

After my university course in the good Scotch Presbyterian university of Queens I went north to what I think is the most cosmopolitan part of the whole of Canada; it is about 40 per cent British stock, 40 per cent French and the remaining 20 per cent of various racial origins. Yet I may say we have always agreed together very well. I have been there for about thirty-five years; I grew up with our chief towns and cities, and I know the mentality of the people. We agree together very well although we differ in race and religion. I remember that before the last war there was some antipathy between different groups—and let me say I believe that such antipathy between people of different race or religion is always due to ignorance, lack of contact, nothing else. I have seen proof of it. In my own constituency before the last war there were groups that looked upon one another with some antagonism, but the contacts made during the last war between men of different races and religions did great good in bringing those men together and creating a real national ideal and unity. I know men of both races who went to the last war very narrow-minded and who came back real Canadians ready to cooperate in a fraternal spirit with their fellow citizens.

The question of conscription, which has been talked of so much in this debate, has been approached from a very bad angle, mainly, I would say, by the extremists. If we are broad enough to take the people as they are and treat them as they are, we shall have greater cooperation and less friction. Those who understand the French Canadians and have the right approach to them have always found 100 per cent cooperation. I want to cite one great Canadian who sat in the seat now occupied by the hon. member for Parkdale. I refer to Mr. C. H. Cahan of Montreal. I think he was one of the greatest of Canadians; he was Canadian first and all the time. This is what he had to say in March, 1939, speaking of foreign policy, as reported at page 2497 of Hansard of that year. I think it covers the subject very well as far as the mentality of the French Canadians in the last war and the reason for that mentality are concerned. He said:

Therefore as far as I am concerned I stand by and support the attitude taken this afternoon by the Minister of Justice.

I could go on and say many things in support of his suggestion that at the time of the outbreak of the last war the province of Quebec and the people of the French-Canadian race were placed in a very difficult position indeed. But I could write a volume to show, I think, that the great body of sentiment in that province was in favour of cooperation; but it resisted coercion at a time when coercion was not necessary.

As was proven by the hon. member for Parry Sound a few minutes ago. A little further on Mr. Cahan said, as reported at page 2498 of the same Hansard:

That, after all, is the spirit of the French people; but you must treat them with the consideration, respect and esteem which they deserve and which we often fail to give. If that is done, and it comes to another great conflict, if it comes under this government I am sure other methods, more conciliatory, will be followed; and if they are followed you will find the young men of the French Canadian race—I know them better in the country districts, perhaps, than in the cities—ready and anxious to play their part and do their share of service alongside their Canadian fellow subjects. Coersion will not be necessary in Quebec if you exercise conciliation and respect the mentality and traditions of the great people who founded that race, particularly—and I hope this will not be offensive to any person—those of the Norman race to which so many of us actually belong. I can make that statement with some pride, because my grandmother on one side came from the Huguenots and had strong French sympathies.

This great decision, if it has to be made, may have to be made suddenly. If so, the whole matter of Canada's active participation in war must be decided by the Canadian parliament, and, through parliament, by the Canadian people. But if that issue is raised, if my fellow Canadians in the province of Quebec realize that the question of neutrality involves the severance of Canada from the British empire and from the British crown, I have no doubt as to the decision that the thoughtful people will make.

I sometimes talk to the leading clergy of Quebec and to those men who lead public opinion on various sides of politics in Quebec, and I am persuaded that the thoughtful and intelligent men of that province believe that the preservation of those religious and racial rights which they hold sacred depends upon Canada remaining a part of the British empire, because in no other state in Europe or in America is there the same freedom of religious opinion and of religious worship as is to be found throughout the British empire under the crown.

I heard those words across the floor of this house in 1939. Mr. Cahan, I think, knows the people of Quebec province as well as anyone. I have known Mr. Cahan by reputation for many years; I have followed his writings in books and papers, and have always thought he was a great Canadian; and I think his opinion on this subject should be worth something.

He said that the question of conscription should be decided by parliament. That is something I was always led to believe. I have confidence in my leader and his cabinet, but we have a right to our personal opinions and I may disagree on some points. I say here and now that I regret very much that this question is not directly submitted to parliament for decision. That is what we were promised in the past. Still I have enough confidence in the present prime minister and his cabinet to do the wisest thing under the circumstances, for the reasons I stated a few minutes ago.

Some might think that as a French Canadian I have spoken in a queer manner on the racial question. But I was brought up under different circumstances and had the opportunity of seeing both sides. There is not very much difference between French Canadians, and when I say that I really mean those of Norman descent—and, let us say, the Orangemen of Ontario. The difficulty is that we do not know each other. Anybody who has read history knows that the Normans were descendants of the Norwegians, of the Norsemen. In the revolution under the Vikings, those who were defeated emigrated to the south shore of the English channel and some to the east coast of England. Later the Norman kings conquered England. They were people of French education; they gave to England Magna Charta and its form of government, and there in England they found their brothers on the east coast who had left Norway many years before. We French Canadians of Norman descent have been separated from France for a long time. France in the meantime was progressing through an evolution, and England came over and took possession of Canada and implanted here British institutions. We French Canadians have adopted those British institutions and have learned to love and cherish them and to defend them. Yes; we are lovers of British institutions, though probably the great majority of French Canadians do not know why. It is because we have found in those British institutions the ideals of our forefathers, who themselves were lovers of liberty. That is why I cited this afternoon the words of Mr. Cahan, when he spoke of coercion versus cooperation. With our mentality, French Canadians are lovers of liberty and freedom; we do not like coercion, and it will be hard ever to make French Canadians swallow it. If, however, they are approached in the proper way, they will be found just as loyal to Canada and to our king as anybody else. But they will not stand coercion. With the proper approach you will find among the French Canadians as much cooperation and enlistment and fighting for king and country as among any other Canadians.

I had no speech prepared, Mr. Speaker, and have made these few remarks because I thought I might help in these difficult times to bring us closer together. Every individual, every nation has made mistakes in the past. Why spend this precious time in mutual reproaches. Let us forget our little difficulties, our little racial and political animosities because, after all, we have all the same ideals, the same ambition and the same end in view—to win this war. So let us put aside this little political fight that has been going on. I think the time has come when we should cut short all this discussion and give a free hand to the government by passing this bill. Let us members of parliament show our confidence in the government as the people of Canada showed their confidence in the government in March. I for one am sure that the government will do the right thing at the right time, and without throwing out of balance our present war effort.

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, on rising I should like to assure the hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Hurtubise) that he need make no apologies for the speech which he has just delivered. I have been in this house now for upwards of seventeen years. I was here in the hectic days of 1926 when the government of the day balanced on the ridge of the fence for six months, and I heard the oratorical talent of this parliament developed then to its fullest. But I must say, reviewing that time and all the years that have since passed, there has never been a debate in the House of Commons that has brought forth so many wonderful speeches and so much grand oratory, almost astounding for its magnificence and power, as this debate. Still it is my firm conviction that no matter how many speeches are made, no matter what may be said in the course of this debate the result in the end will be the same.

Before I get my wires crossed I had better say at once that I intend to vote for this bill to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act. That is my intention, and I want to say that immediately on rising. The hands of this government must be freed to employ such measures as will best meet at the time any emergencies which may arise. When we see gaps in the lines of our men who at present are protecting our land and our lives, and those gaps not being filled as they have been filled in the past, undoubtedly the government must have authority to proceed along such lines as it may deem best.

The great tragedy of war is that it demands the best of everything, the best of manhood and the best of material. And all to what end? Mostly for slaughter and distress. I am very sorry that this should be so. Men of my age and generation feel useless at a time like this. We have neither the strength nor the stamina nor the courage to be of any use to our country. Only the young men of strength and vigour, the hope of the next generation, are taken out of the land to carry on the work that must be done, while we who have had a run for our money, have used up the most of our three score years and ten, and have enjoyed largely of life, are left at home in comparative safety and comfort. The young go forth to lay their lives on the altar of patriotism.

The other night I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent), one which was most excellent and full of force and eloquence. He indicated that his compatriots from Quebec were willing, if necessary, to give their lives for this Canadian country, as it stretches from the green meadows of Prince Edward Island to the pine-clad mountains on the Pacific coast. But he pointed out that when Canada was ceded to Great Britain, French Canadians had been given assurances that they would not be asked to fight outside this country for Britain, and that they would never agree willingly to do so.

As he spoke I felt sympathetically toward him. In my opinion much of what he said was true, and I thought at the time that I should like to vote as he will vote. But at the same time I had a vision of a man who lived in a house in a city. One night he heard the sound of running feet, and cries of "fire". After a time he noticed that the confusion appeared to concentrate round his own house, and there appeared to be loud and excited conversation. Hearing this, he went to the window and saw a great throng of people talking excitedly. Looking round, he observed that his neighbour's house, not many feet from his, was on fire. But he said to himself, "Oh, well, it is not my house; I do not need to be particularly concerned; I shall just go back to bed and settle down." Then, after a time there was a knock on his door, and someone said, "Do you know the house next door is on fire, and the wind is blowing in your direction?" But his reply was, "Oh, that is all right; I need not worry about that; it is not my house." He retired again. After another short time there was a loud banging at his door, and the people said, "Do you know your house is on fire?" Then, indeed, did he bestir himself. Then, indeed, did he dress in a hurry, get his family out, and do what he could to save his possessions. But it was too late; his house was burning.

It occurred to me that that was about the position in which many people from French Canada are placing themselves to-day. They are not willing to get out and bestir themselves when the houses just opposite are burning. They seem prepared to wait until their own house is in flames. What chance will there be if the people of Canada wait until the invader is at our doors?—and he is at our doors. If they wait until the invader is at our doors, what hope is there? There is none whatsoever.

The issue under debate is plain enough. I need not refer again to the various elements which enter into the discussion. I might say briefly, however, that on the one hand there are many strong elements of British extraction who demand immediate conscription. On the other hand we have many French Canadians—not all of them, it is true—who steadfastly resist the application of that principle. I would preface my further remarks by asking two questions which seem to bear on this subject. First, why are the French Canadians so bitterly opposed to conscription? Second, why are other people so determined to have immediate conscription?

Let us turn to the first question, as to why the French Canadians are so bitterly opposed, and consider the corollary as to why Quebec and French Canadians should require pledges, more than others. In that connection I would refer to the remarks of the former Minister of Transport and Public Works (Mr. Cardin) who, in his observations, sought to explain the first question in these words:

> But when we come to consider problems such as the one confronting us at the present time, immediately any man who has any elementary knowledge of psychology will understand that your response is going to be much quicker than mine. Why? Because I have to reason in my mind why I have to support the British flag and spend my energies for the defence of British race in this conflict, or perhaps elsewhere. It is the result of thinking, the result of reasoning, if I come to that conclusion; with you it is the impulse of the heart. Your heart becomes inflamed as soon as the name of England, of the British empire, is mentioned.

That is very largely true. We people, although common citizens of Canada, differ greatly in some respects. After all, the French Canadians are French. They came from France hundreds of years ago—about four hundred years ago, history records. Their tradition is French; their language is French; their education and their religion are of the French Catholic church.

Mr. BRADETTE: Catholic.

Mr. HOWDEN: Their religion is Catholic, and their education is of the French Catholic type. The French people have no real regional connection with Great Britain. Their minds undoubtedly go back to the land of France, the land of their great forefathers. When Canada was conquered by Britain the French were given a good deal—there is no doubt about that. After the conquest of Quebec the French Canadians were allowed to retain their possessions and to carry on in precisely the same manner as they had prior to the war. Not only that, but I believe they were very much better used by their new English masters than they had been by many of their French governors. They were satisfied, and they played the game with Great Britain as is shown by their actions at the time of the revolt of the United States, in 1775, and again in 1849. For the next hundred years after the conquest of Canada the French Canadians were well satisfied.

The patriotic zeal of the French Canadian swung away from old France at the time of the revolution when that country forsook royalty and religion. However, when the patriotic regard of the French Canadian for old France was withdrawn, it was not turned to Great Britain by any means. At this time the people of Quebec transferred their allegiance from the fatherland in Europe to their own home in Canada. Canada became their new country. Canada was their only country. They owed allegiance to no other land than Canada. I may be wrong, but it is my opinion that with all the respect and loyalty that remained in the hearts of the French-Canadian people, with regard to the British empire, there was never any indication of filial love for the great empire. So long as the people of French Canada were not asked to take part in British wars which might take them out of the country, everything was all right; everything was quiet. This afternoon we have heard of the great number of young French Canadians who have enlisted voluntarily in this war, as well as of those who enlisted voluntarily in the last war. However, on every occasion when there was any suggestion of coercion or compulsion or domination, the French, who are a fiery, sensitive and proud people, resented it and fought against it as they are fighting to-day.

The hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères was only half right. He referred to the Canadian people who were burning with patriotic fire. I should like to point out the difference between the French people with their French traditions and those of British origin. I never learned it at school, and I certainly never learned it at church, but I always thought of Canada as being a member of a great British family. I thought of Canada as being a family herself and as being one of many other families. When any one of those families got into trouble their relatives and their friends came to their assistance. I well remember 1884, when I was not a very big boy, when the young men of Winnipeg went on the Nile voyage to the siege of Khartum. That is my earliest international memory. Then the next year we had the northwest rebellion, and I remember the redcoats from Toronto in the old Canadian Pacific Railway depot who had come out to help our 90th battalion, the so-called Little Black Devils. That seemed only natural to me.

When I first heard it said that the sun never set on the British empire I thrilled with pride. I have always had that feeling about Canada and about Great Britain. After all, we are one of a great conglomeration of people with like sympathies and a like purpose in life. This seems to me to be perhaps the most outstanding difference between us of British origin and those of French origin. The latter came from France, and they had a filial connection with that country which they threw off after the conquest of Canada. On the other hand, we are of British extraction. I am the fourth generation of my family in this country, but I am afraid that I have never been consumed with this so-called patriotic fire. At any time that the British empire has become involved in trouble I have felt a decided sense of duty and obligation, but it has been a well considered idea.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HOWDEN: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was speaking to the question, why are the French so bitter against conscription? Why this question should be addressed only to the French I do not know, because I believe there are in Canada a great many of racial origins other than French who would probably resent with equal force the application of conscription. I believe that if the recent plebiscite had been submitted to the people in the form of a question such as, "Do you favour the application of immediate conscription?" many thousands of our young men, their mothers and perhaps their fathers, and probably a number of industrialists who had engaged young men whose services they particularly wanted to retain, might have thought twice before they answered that question, and their answer might have been different.

I was seeking to explain the reason for the resentment of French Canadians toward conscription. Of course we all know the real reason; there is nobody in this house who does not know it. It is that French Canadians resent coercion, which is a form of domination. They claim and, I assume, with entire truth, that they were given to understand by the British, a hundred years ago or thereabouts—

Mr. MacNICOL: In 1763.

Mr. HOWDEN: —actually, in 1760, that they would not be called upon to fight British wars overseas. Unfortunately, since that time they have been compelled to do so. Probably that instance has been the outstanding occasion of offence to the people of French Canada. While not seeking to make a complete answer to the question, I wish to present a few relevant circumstances from our past history.

To begin with, French Canadians have been in this country for about four hundred years. They were the pioneers. They lived here for two hundred years before the country passed from the control of France. I believe that with French Canadians it has always been a case of Canada for Canadians, Canada for French Canadians, Canada and Canada only as their homeland, and they recognize no filial obligation to any other. As the Jews, after two thousand years, still look for the day when they will repopulate Jerusalem, so in the hearts of French Canadians there lives the hope, as well as the half-belief, that the day will come when Canada will come back to French Canadians and to the French Catholic church.

Mr. BRADETTE: Never that.

Mr. HOWDEN: My hon. friend behind me says, "Never that". Well, I would not blame them, and certainly I am not blaming them. It is, perhaps, a worthy hope. But let me suggest that to-day we are living in the immediate present, and if Hitler and Japan have their way, the day in which Canada returns to the French may be long delayed.

The reason why the French detest conscription dates back, of course, to the conquest of Canada. No one likes the humility of defeat, and the French are a proud and sensitive people. For nearly two hundred years they owned this land, which had been, in the words of of the former Minister of Transport and public works (Mr. Cardin), wrested from the wilderness and the savages and given to Christianity by their forefathers. Through the early terrible years they suffered many hardships and privations. They defended the land against raiding Indians and against the invasion of the English colonists. Often their early settlements were wiped out with fire and massacre. But they persisted; they held on. They turned forests into farms; they built roads, villages, communities and fortified cities. After two hundred years their land was handed over by the crown of France to that of Great Britain. Fortunately, their new masters were, comparatively speaking, easy and much less offensive than some of their rulers from the old land.

Now, sir, at confederation the people of French Canada received, in my opinion, a very satisfactory arrangement. About a hundred years passed, during which they were quite satisfied and contented; they had very little to complain of; but when, in 1885, when Riel was hanged, Quebec was not so happy. Riel was a French Catholic. He was a dreamer, an impractical dreamer, who had visions of setting up an independent republic in Rupert's Land, with himself as president and the local archbishop enthroned as the pontiff. That may sound ridiculous, but that is the fact.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): It does not sound ridiculous, but it sounds strange.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I tell my hon. friend that I have the intimate friendship of many of Riel's compatriots, that I have been family attendant physician for his brother's family, and that I have had those words from them. So I did not get that in any history book.

Mr. McIVOR: I know it is right.

Mr. HOWDEN: When trouble arose in 1870 between Riel and a man named Scott, resulting in the death of the latter, Riel had to flee and thereafter was exiled. Later he came back to lead the rebellion of 1885; and although the massacres at Frog Lake, Duck Lake and Battleford were probably not under his control, he was the leader, and he suffered in consequence. There was certainly just cause for the Canadian government to send aid to the threatened people of the northwest, for by this time the northwest was part of the Dominion of Canada and the white settlers were Canadian colonists who had gone to pioneer the new land. Quebec looked upon the whole western move as an extension of empire, and many felt that Riel had come to an untimely and unjust end. Probably that is the first incident in the history of Canada since confederation that estranged the people of Quebec to some extent.

At the time of the South African war Quebec looked with disfavour upon the sending of Canadians to assist Britain. We remember that the British interests were roughly discriminated against in the South African Dutch republic and that the Jameson raid was in the form of a rebellious protest; but it is questionable if it justified the government of Britain in later attacking that republic and subjecting it to British rule. In any event, it was the beginning of the French-Canadian nationalist movement which was in protest, first of all, against the extension of British imperialism and also against Canadians being called upon to fight Britain's imperialistic wars overseas.

The next trouble came during the great war. It was well known by this time that the people of Quebec, while prepared to fight and die in the defence of Canada, had no sympathy whatever for British imperialism and disavowed any responsibility or obligation in relation thereto. When, therefore, Russia backed Serbia, France backed Russia and England backed France against Germany and Hungary in 1914, it certainly looked like a war of conquest for national aggrandizement. When a bill for conscription was brought into this house in 1917 by a union government preponderantly British, and a union government preponderantly British was used to push it through, Quebec opposed it fiercely and sent a solid phalanx to oppose it. Quebec took the attitude that we were in reality an independent nation, that there was no obligation to send men overseas, and fiercely resented compulsion in the matter of securing men for the army. I am disposed to think that the people of Quebec were not far wrong, particularly when defeat in the last war could not likely have made so much difference to Canada, and when one feels that the union government had more fish to fry than one, and that besides the provision of men for the army there was the little matter of the Canadian National and Grand Trunk investments to be considered.

At the outbreak of the present war no political party in Canada felt that conscription was necessary or that there was any need indeed for sending men overseas, and they so stated in this house and out of it. Pledges were given to Canadians everywhere that there would certainly be no conscription for overseas, and when this pledge was challenged by the Premier of Quebec we all know what happened. Small wonder then that when the government sought release from this pledge and used the preponderance of the British vote by way of the plebiscite to overrule the French, and when now this government seeks to remove the last barrier, the French people feel that they have been betrayed and look with distrust on the action of the government.

I would now turn to question number 2 and ask why other Canadians, as typified largely by members of the official opposition, are so set on immediate conscription for men overseas, when there is at present no apparent need. That there has been a well sustained effort in this house and out of it by members of the opposition and their friends to force the government to apply conscription will hardly be denied. Then, conscious of the well-known aversion of French Canadians, and of the fact that with two exceptions the French Canadian group in this house are supporters of the Liberal government, and the further fact that the application of conscription will probably—at any rate possibly if not probably—bring about national disunity, why do the members of the opposition insist on a measure of this kind? Do they seek to create a cleavage in party support in the chamber?

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but this afternoon attention was called to the reading of speeches and I would ask him to refrain from reading his speech.

Mr. HOWDEN: I will do my best to address the house without referring to my notes so closely; but with all deference to Your Honour, I do not think this ruling is quite fair, because I see leaders of all parties, and very many members too, being permitted to peruse their notes very closely. There is no irritation whatever on my part, and no rebellion; but I must say that the thoughts I have set down here have received extensive consideration before being put down, and while I hesitate to do so, I would remind Your Honour that I have spent many years in this house with yourself and that there were occasions when it was desirable apparently for Your Honour also to use a written text.

Mr. SPEAKER: I realize the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's observations, but to-day the house expressed its opposition to the reading of speeches. There is a rule, and that rule I must enforce. It is distasteful to me to have to call attention to that rule, but from now on I must insist that it be observed.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was asking whether the opposition are seeking to create a cleavage in the government's following in this house in order possibly to defeat the government or force it to form a union government. I would remind the house of a drive some four years ago against the government for the formation of a union government.

I find that my time has expired.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I shall humbly bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and endeavour to the best of my ability not even to refer to my notes, any more than I can possibly help.

At the outset of my remarks I wish to refer to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) who, when giving during this debate, his review of the accomplishments of his department, gave us a very clear description of what had been done, for which I think he deserves a great deal of credit, in giving leadership to such an accomplishment as has been developed by the industrial forces of this country. I am sure the minister knows that I have no animosity toward him and will do anything I can to help him; but I must say this, that not many months ago an urgent demand was made to members of this house —it was to myself and, I know, to other members with whom I have conferred—urging that industrialists and the great army of industrial workers be given an opportunity to make tanks and aeroplanes in Canada. The minister, improperly advised I think, said that this was impossible on account of lack of technical men and for other reasons which were stated. I know that answer did not please the great body of industrial men in this country; it did not suit the army of industrial workers who are so capable of carrying on this work, and I know considerable pressure was brought to bear upon the minister, so that in due course they were able to persuade him that these things could be done. I wish that the minister had, in his report, made reference to the loyalty of the heads of industry and the great body of workers in industry, because I believe that was due them, as I think the minister will probably agree. The minister rather gave the impression that what has been done was largely as a result of the efforts of his department; but I want to say publicly, knowing something of the situation, that it took some persuasion on the part of heads of industry to make, probably not the minister, but his department realize what could be done in Canada, as shown by what has eventually been done.

Passing on to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) and referring briefly to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), I think this house was deeply appreciative of the clear and concise statements given by the ministers of those departments, on whom rests so much responsibility. I do not believe that the country at large or this house were particularly enthusiastic about the explanations given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) although I pay him this tribute, that he is now, at long last, doing a better job in trying to coordinate the interests of the farming community. I have, however, heard a good deal of criticism of the tactics employed by him in his address. That criticism was made to me both by letter and in person. Then, when we come to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar)—well, I think the press said enough about that. Those of us who observed the attitude of the minister when he spoke in the house the other day, and compared that with his record, realize that it does not carry much weight with the Canadian people.

This debate awakens strange thoughts in our minds. The security of this country is threatened from both without and within. It is threatened from without by the fiendish activities of the nazis and fascists and by the atrocities that are being perpetrated in the world. I fear it, threatened as it is from within by the practice of political expediency right down to the present moment. No nation can survive when it is attacked from without and from within; no nation, young or old, can survive attacks of those kinds.

I rise in my place in this house for one of several reasons. I read carefully the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the second reading of this bill. At page 3237 of Hansard for June 10 I find these words:

> It is not only the right but it is a duty of hon. members to interpret the view of their constituents, but it is equally a duty in so doing to see that a construction is not placed upon their views which was never and could never have been intended.

That was the first challenge thrown out by the Prime Minister to the members of this house. Then, as reported at page 3235 of Hansard the right hon. gentleman said:

> What really is important is that the government's policy should be fully known, presented to parliament, and agreed to by parliament before any action is taken. In this way and in this way only, the people's representatives in parliament can be afforded a full opportunity to discuss the whole subject upon its merits.

The only exception I take to that statement is that here we have a bare bill purporting to give the government an authority which the people of Canada undoubtedly wished the government to have; yet in the words of the Prime Minister we are told that it may never be necessary to have any form of compulsory service for overseas.

I now pass on to another remark by the Prime Minister, dealing with the plebiscite. These were his words, as reported at page 3231 of Hansard:

> If there be any wisdom in removing false impressions, surely the sooner they are removed the better.

With that I entirely agree, and I say there have been altogether too many false impressions attempted to be put over on the Canadian public.

I now quote briefly from page 3233 of Hansard, where the Prime Minister, after saying that the government had full power to deal with this matter as and when it desired to do so, notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, went on to say:

> Why then, it will be asked, does the government come to parliament for powers which it already possesses? The answer to this question is the sense the executive has of its responsibility to parliament.

After this address by the Prime Minister I thought perhaps it would be advisable for me to state what I believe to be the interpretation that was placed upon the plebiscite vote in my constituency, and also to make some brief observations on the general situation that has developed in this House of Commons. As reported at page 3231 of Hansard the Prime Minister stated that it was difficult enough, in some quarters, to have the people see the wisdom of trusting the government, and he went on to ask, "Why arouse suspicions?" That is what I find in the hearts of a great many of the people. They are suspicious, and I do not believe the debate which has developed here has done much to remove that suspicion.

But let me pass on and state what I believe the people felt was the correct interpretation of the plebiscite vote. They appeared to feel that it was an evasion of responsibility. That statement has been made several times in this house, and I believe that was in the hearts and minds of a good many people. Personally I opposed the taking of the plebiscite. Had the Prime Minister agreed to add the words, "in any theatre of war", as one amendment suggested, the whole situation would have been clarified in the minds of the people. Notwithstanding the fact that the question was vague and uncertain, after it was decided to hold the plebiscite large numbers of my constituents said to me, "What do you propose to do in connection with the vote that is to be taken?" I must confess, Mr Speaker, and I readily admit, that I was somewhat at a loss to know just what one should do. When I told them that I felt a "yes" vote was absolutely necessary, of course I was immediately asked, "What does a 'yes' vote mean?" Naturally I could not answer that, but I urged my people to do their utmost to get out and vote, and the results were quite obvious in my constituency. The thing I deplored most of all was the loss of a month of valuable time, when Canada's very destiny was hanging in the balance. But then, when I contemplated how that month was being used by members of this house and citizens at large in certain parts of Canada, it dawned upon me that there was the possibility of a "no" vote throughout this country unless the people who would vote "yes" were stirred to get out and cast their ballots as they were expected to do. I say the indifference of the people up to that point was appalling, but it would have been a national tragedy if a decisive "no" vote had been recorded in one part of Canada, while the people in the rest of the country remained indifferent to the whole question.

In any event, the plebiscite was held, and the results have been published. I suppose all hon. members have copies of the Canada Gazette of June 23, which indicates where the "yes" vote was recorded and where the "no" vote was cast. I do not know of anyone on this side of the house who evaded his responsibility. I know that personally I consulted with the other groups represented in my constituency. We held joint meetings, and did our utmost to get the people to vote, notwithstanding the feeling of suspicion and the many criticisms that were voiced against such a vague question. In that plebiscite eight of the nine provinces voted "yes" with a very large majority. I believe approximately two out of three people across Canada voted "yes", while in my constituency the proportion was nine out of ten, and I believe about 28,000 votes were cast there. But even after that vote was taken, we continued to have evasion and equivocation, which were apparent even in the Prime Minister's speech in support of Bill No. 80. I am going to join with the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) by saying that not only in my constituency, but in very many others with which I have been in touch, that was the feeling they had. They were voting on the definite principle of conscription, "yes" or "no", and they expected there would be some definite action in the light of the circumstances developing in this country almost hourly. So I say that the hon. member for Trinity stated quite clearly the condition with respect not only to his own but to other constituencies. I know of some other constituencies in Canada the representatives of which, if they had the courage of their convictions to tell the story as they know it to be back home, would speak definitely in this debate.

The great criticism I found had to do with the inequality of service being developed. It had to do with letters being received from overseas referring to men with very little training being sent—and they are still being sent—to fill the ranks over there. It was only two or three weeks ago I received a letter from a young chap who lives in Windsor, and who is now in England, pointing out that for some reason men were being sent over who had scarcely any training. I would say that this does not represent a healthy state of mind for our men overseas, when the enemy is coming closer and closer to our very shores—in fact, has now reached our coasts.

This all develops into a question of leadership in Canada. I am a comparatively new member in the House of Commons, but I have read a good deal of the past debates. After the Prime Minister made his long speech in moving the second reading of the bill, I spent some time studying the plebiscite of 1917 to which reference has been made by some hon. members. In one article I found that the great leader of that day, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was then leading the Liberal party—and I think men of all political affiliations will agree he was a great statesman—used these words with respect to the plebiscite of that year:

> We do not believe that conscription is necessary to our war effort. But we are part of Canada, and if the majority of the country believe and declare that conscription is necessary, then we will submit loyally to the verdict.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member allow a question? I should like to correct a statement he has made. It was not a plebiscite, but rather a referendum.

Mr. LOCKHART: The other evening when the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was making a courteous appeal, which I shall attempt to do before I take my seat, and was directing that appeal to the hon. member's compatriots in Quebec, I heard some gentlemen across the floor of the house indulging in sneers, and their words were, "Let Quebec alone." The hon. member who has interrupted me was perhaps one of those gentlemen. If he wishes to make a speech, let him rise in his place and make it after I have finished.

I had quoted the words of an eminent statesman of that day, one who was doing his best to coordinate all the viewpoints which at that time were rampant throughout the country, viewpoints more diversified than Canada had ever had.

There is a brief reference in the remarks of the Prime Minister which I should like to couple in at this time, so as to establish continuity in what I am about to say. At page 3240 of Hansard he is reported to have said:

> It is surely time that we began to call things by their right names. The total mobilization of man-power means the most effective use of all the men and women available: it has nothing whatever to do with the method by which that mobilization is achieved.

Following that address, in which we were asked to call things by their right names, the former Minister of Transport and Public Works, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) made a most eloquent appeal on behalf of the people of his province. I believe in many respects he cleared the air in that most memorable address. He went on to point out, how throughout the years, statement after statement had been made to the French people. He even went so far as to say that he had risked his own life by urging the "yes" vote upon his compatriots. I am not criticizing the people of his constituency, or those whom he may have attempted to influence. But I do say that he made abuntantly clear to the house the fact that it was the leadership received in the last twenty-five years which had brought about the present situation. That is something which I suggest has been made clear to the country.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) attempted to evade the question when my leader asked him about a certain letter written to a political group, in his constituency, I believe it was. It has been a policy of evasion, right through. But if the speech of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères has done nothing else, for all time to come it has been made clear, beyond contradiction, that the leadership which Quebec has received for the last twenty-five years, as indicated by the hon. member, has been the cause of all the disruption down to the present time.

At long last I say we are beginning to call things by their right names. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said that 179 constituences voted "yes" and 65 "no." The conclusion is obvious that that was the consensus among the great majority of the Canadian people. The isolationist idea which in the last twenty-five years has been so fruitfully developed has been the cause of a great deal of trouble in Canada. We must conclude that the Prime Minister is responsible for a considerable portion of the blame, and I cannot exclude such men as the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), because even in this debate he made a long discourse on the subject of isolation. Unfortunately, the people of Quebec—and I am not questioning their loyalty at all—are paying the price to-day of that kind of leadership.

So we must stop to consider this matter in a broader sense. Not so long ago I was talking to a citizen of Canada who is of Polish extraction, and I do not know of a better way to illustrate what I have in mind than to quote his words. He was speaking of the present difficulty we are having in Canada, and as a Canadian citizen he deplored it. He came to this country when five years of age and has lived here for nearly fifty years. He is now living in the central west and, having known him for thirty years, I know what a good Canadian he is. I want to let the good citizens of Quebec know the feeling that came over this new citizen of Canada when he found that the paper money being distributed through the western provinces had two languages upon it. I am stating this man's reaction. He told me that he always thought that Canada was part of the British empire, that our predominant language was English. He told me that there were many people, particularly of his own racial origin, who do not know a word of French. He asked, "Why are we obliged to have this in the Dominion of Canada?" I told him that it was authorized by statute, that there was a lot that could be said about it, but that it had gradually crept in. I am simply trying to give the reaction of this man. There are tens of thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands of people of the same, or other racial origin in this country, and his feelings are but an illustration of what can easily happen when perhaps tens of thousands more will come in after the war. He feared that a demand for certain racial privileges might easily develop, which he felt was entirely unnecessary if we are going to have one great Canadian family. We must stop to consider the reaction on the part of people of other origins. I say in all fairness to my hon. friends from Quebec that I do not think this is the time to bring out so much bitterness and animosity.

The spirit of conciliation has been quite evident in the house this afternoon. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) made a most eloquent appeal, and I was moved by the remarks of the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Hurtubise). When the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) was speaking he referred to the French not wanting to fight British wars. References such as that are not fitting on June 25, 1942. Surely all of us, no matter what our racial origin may be, must realize that on this day and date the sanctity of our homes is not secure. In the light of developments of the past few months particularly, and since Dunkirk, I do not know how anyone in Canada can call this a British war.

I do not think that many French-speaking citizens call it a British war, even though some of them may be a little erratic in their attitude toward the present bill or the present issue. This is a question which every one of us must face as a Canadian. I represent a constituency which voted nine out of ten in the affirmative. The people of that constituency, like the people in other parts of the country, felt that they were voting "yes" or "no" on compulsory service. They feel that there is no equality of service if the cream of our young manhood, the men who might be the potential progenitors of a future race, are sent overseas simply because they volunteer. Every one of us has an equal responsibility in beating off the enemy. That is the way my people feel, and I know that most of Canada feels the same way.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to correct that allusion of the hon. gentleman. I said nothing about French Canadians not wishing to fight for England in the present war; I was talking about their earlier history.

Mr. LOCKHART: I am sorry if I misinterpreted the hon. member's remarks. His statement clarifies the situation. I do not think that any French-speaking Canadian could possibly hold such a view at the present time.

The Prime Minister is reported on page 3242 of Hansard as having said:

> It is no military secret that willing men make better soldiers, on the average, than those who are compelled to serve. Moreover, the army overseas is composed entirely of volunteers. Its spirit and morale will undoubtedly be higher if its reinforcements are also volunteers.

I am simply voicing the sentiments of the people whom I represent. I spent a long week-end in trying to acquaint myself with their feelings. One person, whose opinion I value, sent me a press report dated Washington, June 10. I shall not read it, but the gist of the article is that the United States, having an all-out compulsory service, apparently is taking exception to the words used by the Prime Minister, that "it is no military secret that willing men make better soldiers, on the average, than those who are compelled to serve." There are many members of this house who served in the last war, and I think they will agree that after the conscription bill of 1917 was enforced, no one ever differentiated between the man who volunteered and the man who was obliged to serve. The Canadian army as a whole covered themselves with glory, and how proud we were of them. I know that French- and English-speaking alike can do it again. References of the kind to which I have referred only cause suspicion and resentment, and they do not befit a leader, in a crisis like this, in Canadian history.

Mr. McLARTY: Has the hon. member information that the Prime Minister of Canada ever made such a remark as he is now quoting?

Mr. LOCKHART: That is right in Hansard. I just quoted it from Hansard.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): He is hardly the man to make the statement, but it is there.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the hon. member like to have it?

Mr. McLARTY: The hon. member would not like to have it. He would like to suggest that the quotation is probably a misquotation of the Prime Minister's remarks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What page is it?

Mr. LOCKHART: Page 3242 of Hansard of June 10:

> It is no military secret that willing men make better soldiers, on the average, than those who are compelled to serve. Moreover, the army overseas is composed entirely of volunteers. Its spirit and morale will undoubtedly be higher if its reinforcements are also volunteers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Hear, hear. It is right there.

Mr. McLARTY: Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, to lift it from its context is hardly fair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not removed from its context.

Mr. McLARTY: The suggestion is, after all, that if a man volunteers—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLARTY: All right, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is the end of a paragraph. It is not taken out of its context.

Mr. LOCKHART: It is just at the end of the paragraph.

There are other quotations here I could give which are exactly along the same line. If the minister will read page 3524 throughout, he will see there are several references to the same thing.

[Mr. Lockhart.]

Mr. McLARTY: Mr. Speaker suggests that I should not further interrupt, and I shall adopt his suggestion.

Mr. LOCKHART: I have received from members of the veterans' associations of the last war definite exceptions to such an attitude. I say that these things are leading to public distrust and misunderstanding.

I do urge that we try to bury our differences. There is no question about it; we must pass Bill No. 80. I want to make my position clear; we must pass that bill. If it is to remove a moral obligation, well, it is all right: if the whole thing developed on that ground, as the Prime Minister has indicated, that is all right. But I know the feeling across this country. Perhaps it is borne in upon me more clearly because my people voted in the affirmative more strongly than some other sections; but they voted clearly that we must have a definite equality of service right now in Canada in order to make our proper and most efficient war effort. Upon that point my people were explicit; they have been repeating it continually since this bill came up. I urge upon the Prime Minister that that is the feeling of one hundred and seventy-nine constituencies as against sixty-five, and I believe it is the feeling that the great majority of the people had when they marked their ballot "yes".

So I say to my French-Canadian friends, there has been definite evidence that the majority favour this bill; do not start a filibuster against it. Then the Prime Minister must accompany it with something which will convince the Canadian people that he is still not trying to evade the issue which they have presented to him. He must follow it up, maybe not to-morrow but in the very near future. This bill must be passed. I hope that the whole of the membership of this house, acting in the spirit of the speeches the hon. member for Parry Sound, the hon. member for Nipissing, and others have made, will drop petty differences and let us have a united effort, not only by our personal activities outside the house, but by trying to persuade the Prime Minister that the people of Canada are asking him to develop a universal, selective, compulsory service which will eliminate a lot of present inequalities and what may be called unfairness. I urge this upon the government as the view of nine out of every ten people I represent. They are asking me to bring it to the attention of this house, and I am very glad to have had this opportunity to do so.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken

(Mr. Lockhart) has graciously given the poor province of Quebec some advice, and in a few minutes I shall refer to the same question. Before making my remarks on Bill No. 80, I wish to refer to the speech which was made last Friday by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). Undoubtedly the plebiscite and conscription, taken together, constitute a very complicated subject. Some light has been thrown upon it by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and several ministers of his cabinet since the beginning of this debate, but I am afraid that the minister for naval services has complicated it more than ever.

At the beginning of his speech he gave us the impression that the plebiscite was not conscription, and in that he was in agreement with most of us. But in the next breath he proceeded to argue in favour of conscription, and at a given moment, linking the plebiscite and conscription together, he made the following statement as reported in Hansard at page 3509:

If conscription is of no value and cannot be of any value, then the plebiscite was of no value.

Again, he said, at page 3512:

We have had a plebiscite on it—

That is, on conscription, because he was discussing conscription.

—and I must confess that I felt that if the vote on the plebiscite was in the affirmative, there would be very little further debate on the matter.

Evidently the minister for naval services believed that if the plebiscite was in the affirmative, it meant conscription. Now I ask the minister for naval services why he did not say this, or did not express this opinion, before the plebiscite. If he had, I think his word, as the word of a minister, would have made a great deal of difference in the vote that was given.

I wish to express in these few words my disagreement with the minister for naval services, and my surprise that he should disagree on such an important question as much as he does with the Prime Minister and with most of the other ministers who have spoken thus far in this debate. The minister for naval services received the repeated applause of the members of the Conservative opposition, and, speaking for myself, I do not envy him that honour. He received the applause of almost the same people who last night listened almost religiously to that shameful, arrogant and provoking race cry which the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) sounded in this house. I wish to protest, publicly and now, against that conscriptionist speech of the minister for naval services, because I do not wish it to be said later that I approved it by my silence.

There is another matter which I wish to discuss briefly. We have heard a great many speeches—interesting, substantial speeches—in this house since the beginning of this debate. Practically every speaker in this house, whether he belongs to one party or another, Social Credit, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, Tory or Liberal, has devoted a good portion of his speech to the province of Quebec. There was a profusion of advice, and, if I may say so, prescriptions. I believe that most of the speeches were made in good faith, earnestness and sincerity, and therefore I thank the members who have so graciously given us much sympathetic advice.

This debate will soon be brought to a conclusion, and I believe it will have had some good results. It will have made us much better known to one another; it will have made us acquainted with the local difficulties and the affairs of members; and particularly it will have shown that every member of this house is imbued with an admirable spirit of tolerance and good-will. Of course, there are exceptions. I wish to refer to the exception who represents the constituency of Hastings-Peterborough. That hon. member, speaking as he did last night, made himself the champion of one of those miserable, but not strong castes of Canadian citizens who are to be found in all races and nationalities and who thrive on religious and racial prejudices, who seem to think that the religious and racial issue is just as important as any in our country. I do not intend to dwell very long on this subject. I will simply say that the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough and his speech deserve only utter contempt, and everybody whom I met since the hon. member made that speech, whether he came from the maritime provinces, whether he was French-speaking or English-speaking—

Mr. WHITE: On a point of order, I would point out that in my speech yesterday the word "religion" was not mentioned once, nor did I at any time make reference to religion, Protestant, Catholic or any other. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his remarks in that regard. As far as his other remarks are concerned, I expect nothing different.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I must give the hon. gentleman credit for that much.

Mr. WHITE: I do not wish credit from the hon. member.

Mr. BRUNELLE: The hon. member says he did not mention religion last night, and I withdraw my remark in that regard. Every hon. member whom I have met since last night, whether he comes from Quebec or Ontario, from the west or the maritime provinces, had the same words on his lips; he said, "Shame on the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough." But I must come to the rescue of the hon. member.

Mr. WHITE: I protest. Heavens above! I do not want to be rescued by the hon. gentleman. I am capable of taking care of myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order; sit down.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I say again I must come to the rescue of the hon. gentleman—

Mr. WHITE: I do not want the hon. member to rescue me.

Mr. BRUNELLE: —whether he likes it or not. I am going to help him out. He did not interpret correctly the vote on the plebiscite as given in his constituency, nor did he give a proper picture of his electors. In his speech last night he said he had helped during the plebiscite and that he had advised his constituents to vote "yes". He said that in voting "yes" they were voting for conscription, and that his electors understood when they were voting "yes" they were voting for conscription and that when they were voting "no" they were voting against conscription. He said further, as reported at page 3661 of Hansard:

> The electors in my part of Ontario have always been 100 per cent for a total war effort, and they are to-day.

Note that. Well, I have in my hand the dominion report on the results of the plebiscite given by constituencies, and I note here that Hastings-Peterborough gave the following results: 5,764 votes in the affirmative, 1,357 votes in the negative; 51 ballots were rejected; 7,172 votes were cast in all, and there were 14,980 people on the voters' list.

Mr. WHITE: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order. Sit down.

Mr. WHITE: On a point of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. WHITE: I will not sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is rising to a point of order.

Mr. WHITE: On a point of order I wish to say that the difference between the number who voted—

[Mr. White.]

An hon. MEMBER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Figures do not lie, and I would much rather rely on figures than on some people.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must withdraw that statement.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I will, but I insist on helping my friend with his electors. In Hastings, which is very suggestive of loyal citizens, they were very far from being 100 per cent for a total war effort, if a total war effort meant conscription for overseas service. In the first place, 25 per cent of those who voted voted "no", and half, if not more, of the whole number of people who were on the voters list did not vote at all.

Mr. WHITE: Because they were in the army.

Mr. BRUNELLE: Now I wish to tell this to my hon. friend; he is a very convincing talker, a very clever man—he never convinced me though—and he tries hard to drive his point home. He pleaded with his electors to vote "yes"; he told them that in order to have a total war effort we must have conscription for overseas service, and that if we are to have conscription for service overseas, they had to vote "yes." But half of his electors did not pay one bit of attention to him and did not vote at all.

Knowing all this, the hon. member last night insulted the people of Quebec because they voted "no," and he was almost insulting to hon. members representing the province of Quebec because we were not going to support the bill to amend the mobilization act. He knew all the circumstances; he knew that his own electors had not done much better than we did in the province of Quebec. But he had the audacity to ask when and how injustices were imposed by the majority upon the people of Quebec. That was one injustice that he himself committed last night. He did not need to ask. Mr. Speaker, there is one term which I should like very much to apply to the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, but I cannot; it is unparliamentary. The Bible, however, applies it to the Pharisees.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that remark conveys exactly what the hon. member said he could not state. I ask the hon. member to withdraw it. There is only one implication that can be drawn from his reference to the Pharisees. The hon. member is not entitled to make such an implication.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I am sorry; I shall have to withdraw it, but I thought using the words of the Bible would make it good.

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): I do not see that words taken from the Bible can be regarded as unparliamentary.

Mr. BRUNELLE: I hope these interruptions will not be counted in my time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The interruptions were provoked by the hon. member himself, and they will be considered in his time.

Mr. BRUNELLE: They have no right to interrupt me. However, I wish to thank all hon. members who have been kind enough to give advice and to prescribe to the province of Quebec. But I think I could give advice to the hon. members who advised me. However, I shall not do it, because, seriously, I think it is too late. A situation has now been created. It took a number of years to create it, and now it has to be faced as it is. I for one gave warning in this house, and some of my colleagues did the same thing; some of my friends outside this house gave warning that certain causes of discontent and friction should be made to disappear, but nothing was done. I say it is too late now to change the situation, and it must be faced as it is.

I cannot refrain from recounting a conversion which took place between two friends, which may have some bearing on the present case. Two friends met; one said to the other, "Do you think the medicine of Doctor Jones is good?" The other said, "I do not think it is unless you follow the directions very closely." And the first one asked, "What are the directions?" The answer was, "Always keep the bottle tightly corked."

(Translation): Before concluding my remarks on Bill No. 80, I wish to refer to the speech delivered here about two weeks ago by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). The house undoubtedly listened with sadness, as did all the representatives of the province of Quebec, to the hon. member's inopportune, unjustified and harsh denunciation of the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). Attacking without the slightest provocation, the hon. member for Gaspé worked himself up to a rage where, lacking parliamentary expressions, he resorted to others less dignified. More than once was the Speaker compelled to make him retract his words. Now in critical times such as these, when political partisanship should rightly disappear, at a moment when it is disappearing from the discussion of an essential problem, we can only deplore that the hon. member for Gaspé should have seen fit to depreciate the independence of mind and moral courage shown by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères in quitting his post as Minister of Public Works in the federal cabinet.

The hon. member for Gaspé struck a sour note. He merely succeeded in lowering himself in the esteem of his fellow-citizens of Quebec, both Liberal and Conservative. He has turned himself into the symbol or prototype of that far too numerous class of people who always decry those who meet with success, who cannot suffer one of our men to succeed, and who never miss an opportunity of reviling those who surpass them or of belittling that which God has made great.

These same people, Mr. Speaker, even criticized the sensible, energetic and appropriate speech that the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) recently gave in this house. They criticized that speech of the Minister of Justice in which he was noble and impartial enough to advise his followers, his colleagues and his friends in the house to vote according to the dictates of their conscience instead of urging them to follow his lead, an advice he might very well have given them. I wish to protest against these malevolent and unbecoming criticisms which can serve no useful purpose.

Mr. Speaker, there is no need of speaking at length to explain our stand on the amendment to the Mobilization Act. Indeed were the length of the speeches measured by that of the amendment, it soon would be disposed of; in fact, one short sentence is the object of this debate, to wit: section 3 of this act is repealed. Our participation in the war in 1939 and the Mobilization Act in 1940 were willingly accepted by all of us following official representations and statements by our ministers, which I shall not quote, precisely because of section 3 of the Mobilization Act which reads as follows:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

That clause shut the door on conscription for overseas service. We were satisfied and quite prepared to continue making sacrifices. I see a grave danger in the disappearance of that clause notwithstanding what the government give us to understand. I may as well say, Mr. Speaker, that the Quebec people, if I am to judge by the feeling in my constituency, under no consideration will accept compulsion for service overseas; I repeat under no consideration. Being anxious to state the views of my electors and quite unwilling to deceive those who have been conscripted solely for home defence, mindful also of the pledges I gave my electors, I cannot agree to the repeal of clause 3, our sole guarantee against overseas service.

I supported the holding a plebiscite because it was a means of sampling the opinion of the people, a substantially democratic measure allowing the people to express their will freely. I can now say that at least 95 per cent of my constituents decided not to release the government from its pledge nor to free me from my own commitments. Had they done so, I would nonetheless vote against conscription, for I believe in persuasion and not in compulsion.

I am not ashamed of my own or my electors' stand on this issue, neither am I afraid of voicing my opinion because I feel that we are not alone in that position. It has been pointed out repeatedly, and I wish to recall it once again, that Australia, Northern Ireland, South Africa and India do not have conscription for service outside their borders. When embittered, fanatical and evil Canadian citizens, of the same ilk as Dr. Shields, of Toronto, who does not hesitate to use his church pulpit for the purpose of raising the year round, on fifty-two consecutive Sundays, the race cry in this country, when Canadian citizens preach hatred, discord and intolerance instead of charity and harmony, such people should ask themselves, before blaming the Prime Minister for not enforcing conscription in Quebec, if the province of Quebec does anything to prevent them from adopting conscription for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I find it quite strange that a congregation of serious and intelligent people should let their pastor use his church pulpit every Sunday of the year for the purpose of raising the race cry, of delivering political speeches and slavering over a quarter of our population at a time when unity is so necessary in this dominion. Mr. Speaker, there are many kinds of fifth columnists. Racial conditions being what they are in this country, the actions of Dr. Shields, of Toronto, are those of a fifth columnist. I know it is not advisable as a rule to publicize the doings of miscreants, but I believe it is high time that this notorious pastor were denounced because our silence might be misconstrued as an admission of the truth of his statements.

If conscription does not follow the passing of this amendment, so much the better, and I pray God that the Prime Minister may hold his ground and succeed in silencing the advocates of conscription in this country. I do not hesitate to say that I shall always trust the Prime Minister but unfortunately he is not the only member of his cabinet and he will not live forever. For those reasons I am quite dubious about this amendment.

I notice with much regret, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative and conscriptionist opposition, so talkative and politically-minded, is winning another hand in the conscription game. Though that opposition is not powerful, it has but a handful of members, it proves once again that the least useful wheel is the most creaky. I am prepared to admit that some of them are sincere but I believe that most are prompted by other motives and that political considerations have much to do with, if they not wholly explain their attitude. Since 1939 they have been complaining about everything and everybody and they always fall back on conscription with the sole object of embarrassing the Prime Minister whose views in the matter they know, and of dividing the Liberal party in the province of Quebec. Their efforts are well known.

I would even state that in the province of Quebec there are rabid politicians who, while they fear conscription like the very devil, would be satisfied to see the government enforce it so that they might derive some political advantage therefrom. What a shame to deal so lightly with such a grave question! But our Conservative friends in Quebec have once more chosen the wrong path, for the Liberal members from the province of Quebec, almost to a man, wishing to honour their promises, will keep the pledges given to their constituents, will oppose this conscription measure to the bitter end by voting first of all against the amendment to the mobilization act. Sincere opinions deserve to be respected as does a firm attitude consistently held. For perseverance and tenacity are often a proof of sincerity. But what spectacle are the Conservatives giving us? Their only evident consistency since 1939 has been a ceaseless attempt to destroy the Prime Minister and to belittle Canada's vast and admirable war effort.

A wise man makes no statement without substantiating it. I intend quoting evidence gathered at random in the several sessions held since the outbreak of hostilities, to show that while regularly urging the adoption of conscription, the Conservatives mainly attempted to play politics and to have the Canadian people lose confidence in the present government. You shall see, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservatives are opportunists and seek only political advantage.

During one of these sessions, while offering us a side-dish of conscription, they launched their main attack or offensive to form a national government. And we saw the Conservatives, who could not reach power the normal way, endeavour to get there through charity's door. They clamored that the best men should be placed at the helm, in order that they might obtain at least a part of the spoils of war they had found so fruitful in 1914 and 1918. But they were on the wrong track and got nowhere.

At another session, they criticized the government because it did not send a sufficient number of men overseas and because our war munitions output was not high enough. After the matter had been debated for at least a week, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) made his statement and I can still hear the opposition leader (Mr. Hanson) confessing that he had spoken rashly and that Canada's war effort was, after all, an admirable one.

Later on the conscription issue was raised again. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, those bitter denunciations of the Prime Minister. How comical they all appeared, rising one after the other to say that the Prime Minister was a great man, an honest man and an able administrator to boot, but adding that he was not one to wage war, not a wartime Prime Minister; he lacked the necessary qualities of leadership.

However, the Prime Minister has succeeded in being elected three times to his present high post and the third time he commanded the greatest majority obtained since confederation.

At another session, the interim leader of the opposition, sickened by his failure and aware, after a tour of the country, that the Canadian people opposed conscription for overseas service, tendered his resignation which was immediately if not blithely accepted by his colleagues. The Hon. Arthur Meighen, branded as a thoroughbred conscriptionist, left the Senate well determined to come to this House so as to set things in order and hasten the passing of conscription for overseas service. This was a cause of great rejoicing for the loyalists and the opposition. The campaign in York South was memorable. There were severe accusations against the government for their sluggishness, and against the Prime Minister because he had not assumed the portfolio of war; this was followed by a thorough defeat and the complete crushing of the hopes of the Hon. Arthur Meighen.

At another session, the debate was on selective service. No more was said about conscription for the word had become a bogey. Mr. Speaker, I shall give you my candid opinion on this matter. I feel that selective service, might be a very good system, in a country as populous as the United States, but that, in a country like Canada, whose population is limited, no legislation is necessary to effect a well-balanced distribution of the man-power between army, navy, air force, agriculture and industry.

At still another session, the opposition complained that the Department of National Defence was not putting the Canadian army to work. They claimed that our army was shamefully idle, that our men did not compare with the Australian soldiers; then, England invited the Department of National Defence to send a contingent to Hong Kong. We all know what happened then. Some of our men have died, some have been taken prisoners, all have endured severe hardships. At the next session, the opposition blamed us for having sent troops to Hong Kong.

Mr. Speaker, whatever the calibre of the opposition, they have made considerable progress and I must admit that the idea of conscription has had some success. They keep repeating that our fighting troops overseas are not numerous enough and in the same breath, they complain of the lack of men on the farms and on the industrial front.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. BRUNELLE (Translation): I will finish my remarks another time.

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, the debate on Bill No. 80 to repeal section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act has, in my opinion, taken up altogether too much time. I intend to touch briefly on only two or three points.

Speaking in the house on the plebiscite bill on March 12, I said that I was not opposed to conscription, if and when conscription became necessary. I stated further that I did not think conscription was necessary at that time. I know of no reason why I should change my mind now.

I have listened carefully to the address of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and those of many other hon. members, and I find no suggestion that the voluntary enlistment system has failed in any way. Nor have they given any reason to show that conscription is necessary at the present time. I wish every person in Canada would read the address delivered by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) on Tuesday of last week. If his observations were read by all our people, I believe they would be convinced that what we need and what we have is a well-balanced war effort. The minister pointed out that conscription was not the all-important factor. He showed clearly that one of the great problems was the manufacturing of war munitions, and the building of ships to transport those munitions to our allies who are in such great need of them.

All hon. members know that Russia has far more trained men in reserve than Germany has. If Russia to-day could get enough heavy equipment such as tanks, heavy guns and aeroplanes, she could drive every German out of her country, and defeat Germany on her own soil. I read a report recently which stated that China has five million men at the battle front, and that she has ten million trained men in reserve. But these men cannot get the arms with which to fight. Just think of it! Ten million men, equal in number almost to the population of Canada; all these men, but unarmed! They are crying for arms, but cannot get them.

The same is true of Libya. If our armies in Libya to-day could have had all the heavy equipment and tanks and guns and aeroplanes they required they would not have been driven back sixty miles into Egypt, as is reported in to-day's press. India is in the same position. She has unlimited numbers of men, but cannot get the equipment. The United States is raising an army of ten million men. That country is shipping all possible war materials out of the country, and sending them to India, China, Libya—almost every country in the world. If Great Britain could obtain the heavy equipment, tanks, heavy guns and all other necessary war equipment, we would have a second front to-day, and would be closing in on the Germans from the west.

In these times the all-important task in Canada is not the conscription of men for overseas service. There is something to be proud of in the fact that over half a million men have volunteered for service anywhere in the world. Two days ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) had this to say:

> I always prefer to see our Canadian army overseas a purely volunteer army.

Would not anyone be proud to say that our army overseas was entirely and purely a volunteer army? I trust that when this war is ended Canada will be able to say with pride that not one man had to be forced into service; that every man overseas was a volunteer.

It has been said in this house that there are two extreme views on this question of conscription. To my mind both are wrong. As has been pointed out, the one extreme view is that there should be conscription at any cost, regardless of what effect it may have upon our unity or war effort. The other extreme view is that we should not have conscription under any circumstances. There are many who are opposed to this system of conscription. Sir Wilfrid Laurier held that view; the late Ernest Lapointe held that view; the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) holds that view, and many other outstanding leaders in the province of Quebec are of the same mind. Will anyone doubt the sincerity or the loyalty of these men? Can it be expected that men of French origin will have the same feeling toward Great Britain as Canadians of British stock have? I often feel that people in other provinces are most unfair in their judgment of the people of Quebec.

It is difficult to understand the attitude of the opposition group on this question of conscription. When the plebiscite vote was taken Liberals, Conservatives, the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—I am not so sure of the Social Credit group—all united in an effort to convince the people of Canada that they were not voting on the question of conscription. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Hanson), and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell) said so. We said so in our broadcasts; we said so in our letters to the press, and we said so from the public platform. We did everything we possibly could to convince the people of Canada that they were not voting on conscription.

Having some confidence in us, the people of Canada came out and voted "yes" in large numbers. It is true that those who were voting for conscription voted "yes", but it is also true that thousands and thousands of people voted in the belief that we were sincere. Many, if not all of the members of the opposition, and the odd Liberal member interpreted that vote as a vote for conscription. What changed their minds over night? I do not know, but I do know that they must admit one of two things. They must admit that they were sincere but that their people had no confidence in them, or they must admit that they were not sincere and tried deliberately to mislead the people of Canada.

That is one reason why the Conservative party is in the position in which it finds itself to-day. Can any party expect to have the confidence of the people of Canada when their word does not mean anything? Speaking in this debate, the leader of the opposition brought up once again the question of a national government, and he is reported on page 3249 of Hansard as follows:

> I believe now, as I have believed from the outset, that the highest efficiency in carrying out such a programme can be guaranteed only by the establishment of a truly national government, a government composed of the best men in Canada, representative of all shades of opinion, but united by a common and single purpose—the waging of total war by total effort. I have urged this view many times in this house. I emphatically reiterate it to-day. More than ever am I convinced that unity of purpose and action will be achieved only under such a policy and position.
