I have no doubt that there are capable men in the Conservative ranks who would be qualified to fill the positions they might be called upon to fill in a national government, but in discussing this question of a national government there is one thing that the leader of the opposition and his followers overlook. In order to form a national government it would be necessary to elect the members. If the leader of the opposition is honest—and I believe he is—he will agree with me when I say that it is very hard to elect a Conservative anywhere in Canada to-day. Surely the leader of the opposition and his followers have not forgotten how the people of Canada refused to accept national government at the last election. Surely they have not forgotten how the people in one of thte strongest Conservative ridings in Ontario said of one of the strongest and ablest men in the party, "We do not want him at any price." In the face of these facts, I suggest to the leader of the opposition and his followers that they forget forever the question of national government. The Conservative party can never expect to regain the confidence of the people of Canada so long as they use the tactics they are using at present in connection with this question of conscription.

I said that I was going to be very brief, and I shall close with these words: Any member of this house, I care not to what party he belongs, who now interprets the affirmative vote on the plebiscite as a vote for conscription—after he and his party definitely said that it was not—and advocates conscription on the strength of that vote, has broken faith with the people of Canada and is no longer worthy of the confidence that his electors placed in him.

Mr. W. R. McDONALD (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, like all the other hon. members who have spoken, I consider it is clearly my duty on this occasion to present my views on this important issue and to state what will be my attitude toward the amendment at present before the house.

As you know, I am one of the members from the province of Quebec. I am not a French-Canadian member. There is not a drop of French-Canadian blood in my veins. But I do know something of Quebec and of the French Canadians whom I have had the privilege to represent in the legislature of my native province as well as in this house.

On the plebiscite issue I did my utmost in my humble way to obtain, if possible, a "yes" vote, with a pretty good idea beforehand what my efforts would mean. The result was that there was a large "no" vote in my constituency. I was not disappointed. During the Easter recess I made several speeches over the radio in connection with the plebiscite vote, and I took occasion to tell the people of my riding that a "yes" vote on the plebiscite did not necessarily mean a vote for conscription. I went further; I told them distinctly, for reasons which I shall explain later in my speech, that I had been opposed to conscription in the past, was opposed to conscription at that particular time, and would continue to be opposed to it. So you can conclude, sir, from these remarks that, since the amendment contained in the bill before us to-day involves the principle of conscription, I cannot in conscience vote for that amendment; and when I say that, I do it with the utmost regret, because for the first time in my public life of—now—twenty-three years, I shall have to cast a vote of want of confidence against my party and against the leader in whom, apart from this particular issue, I have confidence.

I have said that I am a member from the province of Quebec, and I have sat and listened to derogatory remarks made by members of the opposition—I am sorry that more of them are not in their seats at the present time, because I have something to say to them—about Quebec and the attitude of its members and its people with regard to the war and to conscription.

The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) yesterday afternoon said, among other things:

> . . . the view of national unity held by hon. members from Quebec is that the other eight provinces must bow to their will.

Evidently we members from the province of Quebec are supermen and are quite capable of exercising our will and superiority over the great majority of the members of this house. I appreciate the compliment, coming from the hon. member. He also made some other allusions to the province of Quebec, and I shall answer them as I go along in my speech.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), in his usual ingratiating manner, referred this afternoon to Quebec's perverse education at the hands of politicians. I am quite willing to admit, sir, that Quebec has received perverse education at the hands of certain politicians, not, however, members of the Liberal party, and I intend to prove that from certain historical papers which I have before me.

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) said to-night that the leadership of the province of Quebec is such that the people of Quebec are to-day paying the price for it.

Let us see something of the so-called leadership on this particular issue that the people of Quebec have been receiving, these hon. members say, for the last twenty-five years. I hold in my hand excerpts of articles taken from Le Devoir under date of May 29, 1913, signed by Henri Bourassa, who at that time was the owner and editor of this newspaper. Mr. Bourassa was at that time also the leader of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. He had broken away from Sir Wilfrid Laurier over the South African war and formed a party of Nationalists in our province. In 1910 a by-election was held in the constituency of Drummond-Arthabaska, in the province of Quebec, in which by-election the Nationalist party for the first time presented a candidate. The doctrine that they preached to the people of that constituency in the by-election was not one of participation in the wars of the British empire or in wars outside Canada; quite the contrary. They said, "If you return Laurier and Laurier's candidate to power, you encourage him to carry on his naval bill", which at that time he had before parliament; "he will conscript your sons, place them on these vessels which he is going to build, and send them over all the seas of the world to fight in England's wars, and they will be engaged in every war in which the empire takes part." The appeal went home. While the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at that time was very strong, particularly in the province of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa's candidate was elected by a majority of something over 200 votes. That was the first test of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec.

Then came the general election of 1911. It was supposed to be fought out on the reciprocity issue, but the issue in the province of Quebec was not reciprocity; it was Laurier's naval bill, and Mr. Bourassa and his candidates of the Nationalist party took part in that election. Now we get the story, as printed in this newspaper Le Devoir, of what occurred. Probably it would have never come to light had it not been for the fact that, when these gentlemen eventually were elected and attained power, they forgot the promises they made to Mr. Bourassa and, in order to retain office, remained within the ranks of the Conservative party.

Then the plot was exposed. That is the reason why for some time we have been able to know what took place. We know now about the loyalty of the Conservative party; we know what party flag-wavers they are, and we know that in the election of 1911 their candidates were strutting up and down Ontario, with a flag wrapped round them, saying to the people of that province, "No truck or trade with the Yankees; President Taft says that if this treaty passes, Canada will become a political adjunct of the United States." But, Mr. Speaker, that was not what was taking place in the province of Quebec; it was something entirely different. Here is part of the story. The first article is on May 29, 1913:

The Conservatives solicit the help of the Nationalists.

Mr. Bourassa is writing:

Not being a party, we will not have a candidate in the ranks; but we will support any candidate, Liberal or Conservative, for or against reciprocity, who will at first hand promise to fight any policy of participation, direct or indirect, in the wars of the empire outside of Canada, or at least who will promise to repulse any measure of this kind before the people have been consulted by means of a plebiscite; and in such a case we will consult neither the wishes nor the interests of one or the other party. We wish—and this is no secret—to obtain the election of enough independent members to overthrow the navy bill and all other means of contributing to imperial armaments just as long as the people have not stated their will in the matter.

There was the first step towards the agreement with our friends the Conservatives. He goes on:

It is up to Mr. Borden and his lieutenants to decide whether they will allow the election of the candidates we support or begin a tripartite fight which will assure the election of the ministerial candidates. In those electoral districts where the fight will take place between orthodox Liberals and Conservatives we will let them fight amongst themselves.

They were not interested in that. They arranged that no candidates should be placed in the field under the name of Conservatives or anything else, except these Nationalists, and he goes on to state that one good Conservative had to make room for a Nationalist candidate because the organizer of the Nationalist party arranged for his withdrawal. You know the old saying, Mr. Speaker, that elections are not won by prayers, and the Nationalist candidates were quite able men on the platform, but they were not gifted overmuch with this world's goods. Hence, finances were somewhat of a necessity. Mr. Bourassa says:

Besides the protestations of faith, the speeches and courtesies of the candidates, there remained the very important question of electoral funds, that festering sore of politics. In this regard the Nationalists were of no help. They furnished the ideas, the enthusiasm and the popularity, but that was all they could give. The organizers of the autonomous party——had offered their moneys, those willing and able to subscribe to the opposition's election funds. There were a certain number who shared Mr. Monk's opinions on the naval question; others thought only of reciprocity; the shade of the candidates they helped was a matter of indifference to them provided they were opposed to the customs convention; others only wished the overthrow of the government, no matter what the ideas or principles of the opposition, whether with regard to the navy or reciprocity.

That is the Nationalist party.

So they contributed their funds to help the Nationalist party to be elected; and when the regular funds were exhausted another gentleman who had a long purse, a man prominent in the Conservative party in Quebec, appeared upon the scene with some additional funds. He wanted to take notes payable from candidates and they refused to deal with him; consequently he had to accede to the wishes of the candidates and supply the money without receiving the notes. Mr. Bourassa goes on to say:

The fact remains that the Conservative party funds and the imperial treasury helped to defray the election dues of from thirty to forty candidates for or against reciprocity, who denounced the navy bill, and the "no less nefarious" policy of Mr. Borden, and who solemnly pledged themselves to vote against any government that refused to allow a plebiscite on this question.

The Tories at that time went about their work very thoroughly. They had contributed directly to the funds, but they saw another opportunity. Mr. Bourassa, as I have stated, was also proprietor and editor of a newspaper, Le Devoir which is still in existence, but which at that time had not anything like the circulation which it has to-day; nor had it the weight or the importance which attaches to it at the present time. So they conceived the idea that it would be good business to get a more extensive circulation of the newspaper in the province of Quebec in order to extend the propaganda through the paper, in addition to the speeches on the platform, and Mr. Bourassa relates how this was brought about. In an article dated Tuesday, June 3, 1913, he says:

Some days afterwards one of the most important heads of the Conservative committee, armed with electoral lists of all the eastern counties, obtained subscriptions to Le Devoir for the duration of the campaign from a few thousand of these brave electors. At any rate, we were princely. Far from taking advantage of the situation and holding up these gentlemen, the paper gave them generous terms; we only asked for the price of the regular subscription—

They did not charge them anything extra, just the regular subscription.

—minus the commission usually paid to regular solicitors.

They were generous.

We thus remained free from anything that looked like political subscription and we had the paramount satisfaction—

This is rich.

—of having the mammon of Tory imperialistic iniquity served to spread the good Nationalist doctrine in full columns.

Mr. Bourassa was making such good progress in the province of Quebec that his fame had spread even to the loyal province of Ontario. I am surprised to read—but of course I knew of it at the time, because I was taking part in that campaign—that he had received an invitation to visit the good loyal province of Ontario and propagate there his good loyal doctrine of nationalism that he was preaching in the province of Quebec. He had a visit from certain gentlemen of Ontario while he was attending a meeting at St. Hyacinthe. His answer was not quite satisfactory to the delegation that waited upon him, so one day he was shown a telegram which was addressed to Mr. McCrea. Mr. McCrea had been told that Mr. Bourassa would not go to Ontario unless certain explicit promises were made by the candidates, so Mr. McCrea evidently wired the candidates and received replies reading as follows:

Mattawa, Ontario,
September 8, 1911.

I certainly am opposed to the reciprocity pact and the navy policy of the government and will support a request for repeal of naval policy and a referendum to the people no matter who is premier.

That was signed by George Gordon, the senator who died recently, who was then a candidate for Nipissing. A similar telegram was also sent by a Mr. Smith.

Being assured by these gentlemen that they would carry out their obligation, Mr. Bourassa consented to visit Ontario and propagate his good, loyal doctrine in that good, loyal province. Here is his reference to the effect of his visit there:

I spoke in Sudbury on September 18. This was the most clearly nationalistic, the most flatly anti-imperialistic speech of all those I delivered during the campaign. Since that time the Hon. Mr. Cochrane, known to be sparing of words and praises, honoured me by saying that my arguments made an even more marked impression on English-speaking electors than on French Canadians.

He made more converts in Ontario than in Quebec.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were pulling his leg.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): The result of the elections in Quebec was as follows. On the dissolution of the house the Liberal party had fifty seats; all other groups had fifteen. After the election the Liberals had thirty-seven seats; the Nationalists had twenty-seven, and there was one Independent, making a total of sixty-five. So that victory in Quebec brought about the balance of power which overthrew the Laurier administration and elected Mr. Borden.

More striking than that are the figures of the popular vote. The Liberal party in that election obtained 164,281 votes. The opposition, the Nationalists, had 159,299. The popular vote in the province of Quebec was split practically fifty-fifty between the Nationalists and the Liberals.

That is what we have had to contend with in the province of Quebec from 1911 down to the present time. That is the element we have to fight, and that is the element which is responsible for what the opposition accuse us of, the wrong leadership in the province of Quebec. My charge is that in 1911 they betrayed every principle of decency; they sold out their party in order to gain a cheap victory, and to-day they are trying to cast that onus and aspersion on the Liberals because, they say, Quebec does not measure up to their expectations.

In a moment I am going to refer to some of the things that were said by one of those men who was afterwards taken into the cabinet. These men who preached doctrines in the province of Quebec which were practically seditious, financed by Conservative money, were taken into the cabinet of Sir Robert Borden in 1911: L. P. Pelletier, Postmaster General; T. D. Monk, Public Works; Bruno Nantel, Minister of National Revenue; and P. E. Blondin, Deputy Speaker, who had a particular flair for shooting holes in the British flag.

Before the term of that parliament had expired, war had broken out. But before that time, Mr. Borden introduced his naval bill for a contribution of $35,000,000 to the British navy. In view of the speeches that these men and other supporters of the Borden administration in the province of Quebec had made, they should have resigned their seats, unless they had a plebiscite of the people. But they hung on to office; office was sweet; they stayed until the expiration of parliament in 1917. There were changes in the administration during that time. Mr. Nantel, who had been Minister of Inland Revenue, had been named a judge; he was replaced by Mr. Blondin, who became Minister of Inland Revenue in 1914. He was introduced into this house in 1915 by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, a great imperialist, Sir George Foster. I am going to leave it to Sir Wilfrid Laurier to say how he, Mr. Blondin, was introduced. Sir Wilfrid said, in a manner that only Laurier possessed, as reported at page 209 of Hansard of 1915:

Mr. Nantel also has been called away from the floor of parliament and removed to another sphere. It is not my intention to say anything of the removal of Mr. Nantel from office, but I may have something to say as to the choice of his successor, the present incumbent of the office, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin). It seemed an evidence of the irony of fate that the hon. member for Champlain, the arch-Nationalist, should have been introduced to the house by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), the arch-imperialist. When on the opening of the session, I saw the new minister walking into this house leaning upon the arm of my hon friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed by the way he seemed to be limping that he had a heavy load to carry. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has always been an insistent advocate of imperialism. I cannot say as much of his new colleague; but perhaps, after all, there may be within the ranks of the Conservative party, as there is somewhere else, some joy over the conversion of one sinner. The Minister of Inland Revenue was introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. When he told you, sir, that the hon. gentleman had taken the oath and had signed the roll, I thought he would add that the hon. gentleman had filled up the holes in the flag and that he would now breath the atmosphere of liberty. But he did not, and really there was no necessity for his doing so. The hon. member for Champlain is now breathing the atmosphere of office; he has found an atmosphere which is suitable to him, and he can breathe freely, whether there are holes in the flag or not. I have only this to observe: when my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue, then the hon. member for Champlain, was making the speeches which he did make in the province of Quebec; when he was threatening to destroy the Canadian navy when he had an opportunity of doing so, I never believed that he meant one-half of what he said. I always supposed, and rightly supposed, that what he was after was to create advantage for himself and for his party. He has succeeded. He is now in office, but to attain office he has travelled a very dangerous road. He has sown the seed of discord—and these appeals to passion are always sure to bring forth a crop of prejudices. My hon. friend, the Minister of Inland Revenue, is a young member of this house; perhaps he will permit me to say, since now he has the responsibility of office, that he had better always stand by true principle.

May I direct those words to the Conservative party. It might be better for them to stand by true principle, and lay the responsibility for wrong leadership in the province of Quebec where it properly belongs, instead of attempting to lay it upon the ministers and humble members of the Liberal party who come from that province. Personally I have been fighting the battles of the Liberal party in Quebec for forty years, and I have no apology to make to anyone for the sort of fight I have put up there. I have used conscription as an argument because conscription was imposed upon the people of Canada, and especially upon us in the province of Quebec, in 1917 for no other purpose than to win an election for a government that had lost every vestige of the confidence of the people of Canada. The shameful arguments that were used in the other provinces against us; the shameful announcements which were made, some of which I quoted during my speech here in February, as I said on that occasion and repeat to-night were seared into my memory. I have had no apology to offer, nor have I to-night, for any statement I have made in the past or for any statements I may make in the future in carrying on that campaign in the province of Quebec as long as there is a Tory who shows his face in that province. Little did they dream in 1911, when they were carrying on this campaign to split our people in two on this question of the naval bill and the contribution to imperial wars, that in 1914 war would break out and that between 1914 and 1917 they would be asking the people of Quebec to support the war effort and enlist as those in the other provinces were doing. To-day they are reaping the results of their actions, and theirs is the responsibility.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the present war. In my speech in February I stated that since the declaration of war Quebec has done its share in comparison with the other provinces. I am just as firmly convinced of that to-night, and as a member from Quebec I have no apologies to offer, nor am I blushing over the part my province has taken. I have before me the speech of the late lamented Minister of Justice, Mr. Lapointe, delivered in this house on September 9, 1939, in which he outlined the programme, the sentiment and the feelings of the people of Quebec; not with the idea, as the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough suggested yesterday, of imposing the will of the people of Quebec upon the other provinces, but as the feelings of a sister province, willing to take her share of responsibility along with the other provinces of this dominion. As reported at page 68 of Hansard for September 9, 1939, Mr. Lapointe used these words:

> The whole province of Quebec—and I speak with all the responsibility and all the solemnity I can give to my words—will never agree to accept compulsory service or conscription outside Canada. I will go farther than that: When I say the whole province of Quebec I mean that I personally agree with them.

Then he went on:

> I ask you, Mr. Speaker, is it not worth while to the Canadian nation, when the nation is at war, to preserve unity on the side on which Canada will be—this unity which is represented by the province of Quebec in the government—behind the measures being taken to help our mother country and France? . . .
> Provided these points are understood, we are willing to offer our services without limitation and to devote our best efforts for the success of the cause we all have at heart. And those in Quebec who say that we will have conscription, in spite of what some of us are saying, are doing the work of disunity, the work of the foe, the work of the enemy.

Again that same fall of 1939 when the then Premier of Quebec dissolved the legislature and attempted to obtain a new mandate from the people by asking them not to take part in the war our ministers from that province, including Mr. Lapointe, the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin), and the present Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) took part in the campaign. I have before me a newspaper report of a speech delivered by Mr. Lapointe on October 10, 1939, in which he is quoted as having said:

> But I have faith in my province. I am confident that it will not render a verdict that will be acclaimed in Berlin and Moscow on election night. Nazi and communist agents have stirred up dissension in all the countries of America. Quebec will not allow itself to be influenced by such propaganda.

And further on he said:

> Canada must remain united. Any attempt at breaking that unity is fratricidal and criminal. We must have tolerance and mutual respect.

And again:

> I have succeeded in healing many wounds. I have steadfastly held up Canada's banner, convinced as I was that the sacred interests of my province were linked with the preservation of Canadian ideals.

Those were the sentiments of the late Minister of Justice; those were the sentiments of every true Liberal and every Canadian citizen of the province of Quebec at that time; and, Mr. Speaker, those are the sentiments of the true Canadians of Quebec to-day. We do not want or need conscription in the province of Quebec. Quebec is doing its share in this war.

Let me quote an extract from an address given by the Hon. J. Arthur Mathewson, the provincial treasurer of Quebec. It will be noted that he is not a French Canadian. This address was delivered in Montreal on November 25, 1941, and was in part as follows:

So much for what we are doing in a material way. Now what about man-power? Quebec can justly boast that it provided the first full regiment of infantry in all Canada. It was a French-Canadian regiment. It was recruited to full strength under its gallant leader, Colonel Robert Bourassa, himself a veteran of the last war, and who unfortunately, after proceeding to England with his unit, has now been invalided back and lies here paralyzed. He led the van of Canada in recruiting and the sympathy of all Canadians must go out to him now, to console him in his suffering.

His was the first regiment. The two regiments which followed in recruiting to full strength were one from Ontario and the other one again from the province of Quebec. Several other regiments, both English-Canadian and French Canadian, have gone from this province.

When the recruiting drive was launched last spring, an objective was set for the province of Quebec. The province met its requirements. The city of Quebec surpassed its quota and achieved 122 per cent.

It would be interesting to the enemy to know exactly how many troops have gone from Quebec. They will not be told. On the other hand Quebec cannot be accused of complacency. We are not complacent.

He concludes with these words:

The French Canadian loves Canada through the province of Quebec, just as a Scotchman loves Britain through his affection for his own native hills. The Grampians and Loch Lomond are to the Scotchman what the Laurentians and the spruce-clad banks of the St. Lawrence are to the French Canadian. That affection for his native heath is not a detriment—it is a source of vital strength.

Quebec will not fail. Depend upon us and we will not let you down. Know above all that here in Quebec are three million Christian consciences, each one a bastion, a fortress, that Hitler's hordes and their supreme commander, who is Satan, will never conquer.

My time has almost expired, and I should like to conclude with two quotations from a book written by Pierre Georges Roy and entitled "Les Petites Choses de Notre Histoire." Two articles struck me forcibly while reading them. The first is headed "Nos coeurs a la France; nos bras a l'Angleterre"—"Our hearts belong to France, but our arms belong to England," and is as follows:

What is the origin of these words which express so admirably the feeling of the great majority of French Canadians since the day when providence broke the bond which united Canada to France?

On July 13, 1885, for the first time since 1760, a French corvette La Capricieuse entered the port of Quebec. The older people, greatly moved, said that their people had come back and the French officers were welcomed as heroes and applauded wherever they went.

The captain, monsieur de Belveze, visited mademoiselle de Lanaudière, the daughter of one of the leaders in the battle of the Plains of Abraham—an old lady of eighty-five, with a very good memory and a wit as sparkling as in the days of her youth. They spoke mostly of France, now allied by treaty with England, in what has been known during recent years as an "entente cordiale". But like most French naval officers, the captain did not like England, and could not understand the faithful allegiance of the Canadians to England while they professed such a deep love for France. Finally, unable to find a more convincing argument, mademoiselle de Lanaudière said these words which have become historic: "Our hearts belong to France, but our arms belong to England."

One further quotation from the same source, and I shall have finished. This is headed "Le Dernier Coup de Canon," and is as follows:

During the second session of the second union parliament which was opened on March 29, 1846, by Lord Cathcart, both sides of the house unanimously passed a law to establish the army on a working basis.

Sir Etienne-Paschal Taché, who had fought in 1812, made a patriotic speech in which he assured the house that if the occasion arose, the French Canadians would conduct themselves again in a manner as heroic.

"What our fathers and we ourselves have done to defend the colony," he said, "our children will be found ready to do, if they are considered in a just light. Our loyalty is not one of speculation, of pounds and shillings, and pence. It is not constantly on our lips. We do not make a business of it. Our habits, our laws, our religion, have made us monarchists and conservatives. We only ask to be treated with justice, and if the enemy comes, you will see our battalions, light-hearted and brave, go forth to fight the foe. 'But', our detractors say, 'you are malcontents, it is impossible to reason with you.' 'You are rebels,' say the ultras, 'we alone possess loyalty to the highest degree.' A thousand pardons, gentlemen, treat us as children of the same mother and not as illegitmate, treat us with more justice in your deeds as well as in your words, and I give you my word that if ever this country ceases to be British, the last cannon shot to maintain British power on American soil will have been fired by a French Canadian."

I commend these quotations to the house.

Mr. J. P. MULLINS (Richmond-Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, for the few moments I have left before eleven o'clock I shall endeavour to make my position clear with respect to the bill now under discussion. I have always been opposed to conscription. On each and every occasion in the past twenty-five or thirty years I have taken the stand I am taking to-night. At every opportunity I have spoken against imposing conscription for service overseas. I have felt this way because I am convinced that the most satisfactory method of recruiting men is under the voluntary system, and I believe that experience gained under the mobilization act has proved I am right.

In Canada the province of Quebec, my native province, and one of which I have a right to be proud, has been accused of not doing its duty. It is clear, however, from figures tabled in the house one day this week that the numbers of French Canadians who have enlisted voluntarily have been very satisfactory indeed. It must not be forgotten that for a country of only between 11,000,000 and 12,000,000 people we have had wonderful success in accomplishing great things in connection with our war endeavour. Other countries have complimented Canada upon the fact that for her size and population she has done more in the way of her war effort than any other country.

It has been said from the opposite side of the house, as well as by other people opposed to this government in politics, that the French Canadians are not doing their share in this war. Such remarks are most unpleasant to the ears of a man who has lived in Quebec all his life and who hopes to pass the rest of his days in that province. I have lived among French-Canadian people, and I do not intend to change my place of abode. They are the finest people in the world. Because of political, and perhaps financial reasons, there are a few in the house and, outside the house, a few in the other provinces who spend their time in knocking Quebec. Why do they seek to divide the country? Is it to try to ruin the party in power for their own political future?

According to the figures in Hansard, the total enlistments in the three armed forces from Quebec up to the present month were 74,053, of whom 36,140 were French-speaking and 37,913 were English-speaking and all other origins. The total enlistments in the army to serve anywhere from the beginning of the war up to the present month were 29,651 French-speaking and 27,071 English-speaking and all other origins. Therefore it would appear that the remarks of these gentlemen are absolutely unfounded and unfair. I repeat that there is only one reason for such arguments, to advance their own political and personal positions, and perhaps in the case of some of them, to ensure their political future.

During the plebiscite campaign I did not try to influence my people. I made no public speeches; I left them free, and they voted 75 per cent "no". I hope that my electors will understand, when I vote against this bill, that I do not do so because of any lack of confidence in my government, but I am confident that the present government will never impose conscription. After section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act has been deleted, there will be no opportunity of discussing this matter before conscription is put into force. I repeat that it is not lack of confidence in my government or my chief that causes me to vote against the government on this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a few words in French, the native tongue of the majority of my constituents.

(Translation) I have always been opposed to conscription. For the last twenty-five years, on every occasion that offered, I have spoken, in public as in private, against conscription for overseas service. It was not that I was averse to defending our country, but because I considered that conscription, far from promoting voluntary enlistment, would hamper it. That is why, for the last twenty-five years, even during the last war, I have declared myself against conscription as being conscientiously opposed to that measure as I still am to-day.

Mr. Speaker, the province of Quebec has contributed its large share in the present conflict and there are reasons to be proud of that province, proud of its citizens. Our province is sometimes criticized in this house by members who have not resided very long in Canada, but have come from the other side because, over there, they felt like small fish in a large lake. They came to Canada, where they settled and were welcomed by the Canadians who helped them to succeed and to-day they want to show us how to run the country and the war. Mr. Speaker, if those people are well intentioned why do they not set an example instead of always criticizing the province of Quebec? Even in this house, there are people of military age who could do their duty by returning overseas as sincere men. They could at least cease criticizing the honest people of Quebec who do their duty courageously and proudly.

I have always lived in the province of Quebec which I hold to be one of the finest provinces in Canada. I am proud to live among Canadians whom I esteem and I hope to have the privilege of spending there my remaining days.

I shall conclude in saying that the repeal of clause 3 will enable any government in power to enforce conscription without consulting even the house and that is why I shall vote against this bill.

On motion of Mr. Fraser (Northumberland, Ont.) the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, June 26, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

FOOD CORPORATION

BEEF SUPPLIES—REPRESENTATION OF PRODUCERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. According to press reports a corporation is to be set up which will purchase and handle beef supplies. Will the minister give the house some assurance that the producers will be represented on that corporation?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The corporation is being set up under the wartime prices and trade board, which is under the Minister of Finance. The corporation itself, I believe, is headed by Mr. Taggart, who is minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan.

Mr. SENN: Then may I ask the Minister of Finance if the matter will be attended to? Even if the minister of agriculture for Saskatchewan is on the board, I doubt whether the producers would be represented by him in the way that a representative of the producers organization might represent them.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): The food purchasing corporation is merely a group of government employees, like so many other crown corporations, and I do not think it is intended to give public representation on it at all. If we undertook to do that we should certainly have to give much wider representation than to agriculture. It is really a government agency.

Mr. SENN: It has wide powers.

WASHINGTON WAR CONFERENCES

STATEMENT OF THE PRIME MINISTER—SITUATION IN NEAR AND MIDDLE EAST

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to welcome the Prime Minister back from his recent journey to Washington and ask whether he has anything to tell the country as a result.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for his welcome, and hon. members for the manner in which the house has received his words. I went to Washington, as I believe hon. members are aware, on the personal invitation of the President and also of Mr. Churchill. While there I attended two conferences in particular, one of which was presided over by the Prime Minister of Great Britain and which was composed of representatives of the different parts of the British commonwealth of nations. The other conference was the Pacific war council, which was presided over by the President, and at which representatives of different powers surrounding the Pacific attended. At both conferences the war situation was very fully reviewed. There was opportunity for discussion of matters that were of concern to any of those who were present. Unfortunately, I cannot disclose the nature of the proceedings or indeed anything that took place at either conference. Hon. members will appreciate the fact that the conferences were wholly confidential. However, I might give to the house the impressions I gathered while at Washington, both at the conferences themselves and in personal conversation with Prime Minister Churchill and the President, and from other opportunities I had of discussing matters with the Hon. Mr. Hull, the Secretary of State, and Mr. Sumner Welles, the Under-Secretary of State.

The position is one which I imagine will be more or less present in the minds of all hon. members. There can be no doubt at all that the situation at the moment is one of the most critical with which the united nations have been faced, one of the most serious that has arisen in the course of the whole war. To get the true perspective one has, however, to recall the very critical situations which have arisen in the past, and to remind oneself that the forces of the united nations have been able to rise superior to any temporary reverse, and that to-day there can be no doubt that the united nations are stronger and better organized than they have been at any time since the war began. While it is true that the situation is much more serious in the near and middle east than it has been, it is equally true that it is not quite so critical in some other parts. My own view is that the present conflict will have more to do with the probable duration of the war than with any question of its ultimate outcome. It may be that as a result of the present conflict the struggle will be much longer than up to the present we have hoped and expected it might be. It will be a very bitter struggle indeed, and it is just possible that the war may, instead of ending in 1943 as all of us I think had hoped it might, may instead run on for two or three more years.

One thing is quite certain; it is that every country that is a member of the united nations will have to put forth its utmost effort in helping to overcome the enemy.

At the conferences at which I was present I was accompanied by the Hon. Leighton McCarthy, our minister at Washington.

I think that is all I have to say at present.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT OF SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Thursday, June 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, like many who have recently taken part in this debate I wish to disclaim any intention of adding any new light on this subject, which has already been debated for some considerable time. I assure you, sir, that I have no intention of entering into argument and discussion, apology, or even recrimination; but I propose, perhaps rather shamelessly, to use the facilities of this house as a sounding board to address myself to the electors of the constituency which I represent.

Before doing so I should like to make reference to matters of a personal nature which are bound to influence the decision I have to make in the matter which is now before the house.

Since 1901 the constituency of Quebec South has, with the exception of three years, been represented by two men, my father and myself. The electoral subdivisions in the legislative assembly and in the legislative council have during the same time been represented by other members of the family. During those forty years our relations with the French-Canadian population who comprise the majority of the electorate of the constituency have been of the most cordial and most friendly. Time after time they have given to us spontaneous and sometimes unanimous expressions of trust and confidence, in business, socially, and in politics. Up to very recently, within a few weeks, the relations which existed between us were such that in most matters, national and political, our views were identical or if not identical at least reasonably capable of accommodation.

If however I am to judge from the expression of opinion which was given in the plebiscite a few weeks ago, the time has come when, in appearance if not in substance, there is a sharp difference of opinion between us. My people—I think I can call them that, because so far there has been no appearance of rancour, of anger or even of distrust—if I am to judge by their vote on the plebiscite, believe that the measure which is now before the house opens the door to conscription for overseas service. I believe they are right; I agree with them that this legislation does that very thing. I know that the vast majority of them hold the very word "conscription" in utter abhorrence, and I must take their views into consideration. To a large extent I share them. I have strenuous objections to compulsion or coercion in any form. But I am also and have been for many years a member of this House of Commons of Canada. I am a Canadian, and by Canada I mean every part and every province of Canada. I mean Vancouver, Halifax, Winnipeg, just as much as I mean Quebec. The people of this country as a whole have pronounced themselves by an overwhelming vote clearly and unequivocally in favour of action of which this legislation is possibly the least expression. Following the ordinary democratic process, and being a Canadian before I am a Quebecker, I propose to vote for this bill.

Having said that with respect to my electors I anticipate that this house will expect me, as one of the service ministers, at least to express an opinion on one of the matters which have been frequently discussed in this debate, namely, where the defence line of Canada lies. In this may I say that I am in entire and hearty agreement with my colleagues the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). This conviction of mine is brought about to a considerable extent by the job of work in which we are at present engaged; because those of us who have to do with the air force know that there is no factor which has come so close to annihilating time and space as the use of air power in modern war. The vast majority of the young men with whom I have to do are Canadians. They know no other homeland than Canada. They have been brought up in our cities and towns and on our farms; they have been educated in our schools and colleges and universities. Very many of them, I would say most of them, had never left the confines of this country until the call of duty took them to the four corners of the earth. They went there because they realized that the spirit of Canada could not and would not survive in a world dominated by racial tyranny and subjugated by racial slavery. And whether they watch the coast of Labrador, or patrol the shores of the Pacific, or fight the Jap in the Indian ocean, or fight the Italian in Libya, or bomb Berlin, they are firmly convinced that they are defending Canada.

The isolationist combat school, which believes that Canada can best be defended by its armed forces remaining within its own boundaries, presents to them a very peculiar aspect which perhaps I may illustrate in this way. Only three to four weeks ago we sent to the Aleutian islands a number of Canadian squadrons, at least some of which were commanded by men who served their apprenticeship in the battle of Britain, battle-scarred heroes who returned from overseas and who are now commanding our men in American Alaska. These men believed when they were half-way round the world over Germany, just as much as they believe now when they are half-way round the world in the other direction that they were defending Canada. We have had no complaint because of the fact that these squadrons have been sent to Alaska; yet a glance at the map will indicate that to the end of the Aleutian islands is 4,500 miles from Ottawa; to the shores of Britain is only 3,000 miles. It is almost as far from Prince Rupert to the Aleutian islands as from Sydney to Liverpool; so our men find it very difficult to understand why there should be more reluctance to move eastward than to move westward, and why we can better defend Canada on one front line than on the other. Our enemies are perhaps not geographical experts, but they seem to have little difficulty in crossing the boundaries of countries and continents. They have attacked in Africa; they have attacked in Asia; they have attacked in Australasia, and only recently they have been sinking ships on one side of our territory and shelling stations on the other side. Our enemies feel that the only way to win victory is to seek out those whom they wish to destroy, wherever they may be, and destroy them. We in the air force feel exactly the same way. We know that for every aircraft destroyed in an aircraft factory in Augsburg, where our men led a raid only a few weeks ago; for every bomb or shell destroyed in blasting the Krupp factory, in which raid Canadians took such a magnificent part, and for every bomber brought down over the English channel, there is one less bomb or shell, one less aircraft or one less bomber which might come to Canada and bomb us. We believe that the best and only way to defend Canada is to take the offensive outside Canada.

Now, sir, having said this, I should like to revert for a moment to my relations with my electors. My future course must depend upon circumstances; but I should like to say simply and plainly, and without fear of being misinterpreted by the people with whom I have been associated for so long, that one cannot believe in a democratic system or in a democratic government and continue indefinitely to represent a constituency the majority of whose people are in political opposition. Should it develop that, as a result of this legislation or of any consequential enactment, there should continue to be a wide divergence of view between the electors of Quebec South and their representative; should this severance be of more than a temporary character; should they, as is their right, desire to be represented by someone who more nearly interprets their views with prestige and conviction then all I have to say is that I have no quarrel with that, but I only hope that the parting will come with as much friendship on their side as it will come with deep gratitude on my side for favours of the past.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): This debate is on the motion for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, by removing from that act section 3, which restricts the government in raising men for service elsewhere than in Canada. The legislation we are discussing to-day is made necessary by, and this debate has resulted from, pledges made by many candidates at the last general election, pledges made to catch the votes of disloyal people, the votes of slackers, those who were afraid to assume the duties they owed their country. I am happy to be able to tell this house that I made no such pledges, that during that campaign I stated that in my opinion compulsory selective service was the only fair and proper way to raise a fighting force, and that any other method was unfair. The voluntary method is unfair. Under that method the loyal, courageous men enlist, while those who are disloyal, those who have not sufficient courage, hang back and let their fellows go forward to perform the duty they should perform.

As the law stood when Canada declared war in the fall of 1939, men could have been called up by the government for service anywhere in the world; but in 1940 this mobilization act was passed by this parliament, containing this restricting clause, and since then the hands of the government have been tied. Since that time, by a plebiscite, a great majority of the people have freed the hands of the government, have removed that handicap, and this legislation is the result.

I must say that a few days ago I was shocked and disappointed to hear the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) make the following statement in the house:

> It may be great and glorious to fight and die for the world's salvation, for the salvation of the united nations, for the salvation of democracy and Christian civilization; but that is a privilege of each man, a privilege he has the right to choose for himself; it is not a duty which citizenship imposes as an obligation correlative to the rights which citizenship guarantees as a privilege.

I decidedly disagree with that sentiment. I say that it is not only a privilege but a duty of citizenship. As I understand the duties of citizenship, every citizen of the state owes his life to the state. It is his duty to offer his life and, if necessary, to give it in defence of the state. There should be equality of service. Every citizen should enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizenship, but should escape none of its obligations; nor should he wish to escape any of its obligations.

I was shocked and disappointed to hear the Minister of Justice pronounce those sentiments in the house, and I was puzzled when the same minister, the one who voiced the sentiments I have just quoted, authorized the prosecution of a man with a splendid record of loyalty and courage for criticizing the report of a commissioner on an investigation recently held with respect to a public matter. This was the criticism of a counsel who was present at the inquiry and who heard the evidence. True, the inquiry was in secret, but it should not have been in secret. The matter investigated was one of great public concern, and concerning which the public should know all the facts. I shall be surprised if that investigation is not the subject of discussion and criticism, and perhaps praise as well, in this House of Commons which, I say, has the duty to perform of discussing the matter. To say that criticism of the report is likely to prejudice recruiting is, to say the least, farfetched, and in my opinion is utter nonsense and an improper exercise of authority.

Addressing the house a few days ago, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) said he prefers a volunteer army. So do I. I admire the volunteer. He shows his courage; he shows his interest in the state by offering his all in her defence. But when one cannot get enough men to compose and maintain the strength of an army, a navy or an air force one must go out and get them. At the time of the great war the mistake was made of putting compulsory selective service into force three years after the war began. The then government waited three years before doing what it should have done at the outbreak of war. During those three years the people who were not courageous enough to volunteer had been lulled into a sense of security. They thought they were going to get off without doing their duty to the state. When the state was forced to make them perform that duty they rebelled.

This government has made the same mistake in this war. It has put off compulsory selective service for nearly three years. If it attempts to enforce it now, there will be dissension, trouble and disunity. That law should have been enacted with the declaration of war; it should have been simultaneous.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) indicated in his remarks at the opening of the house to-day, we have to admit that the united nations, including Canada, are far from winning the war. The last disaster which overtook the allied nations was the fall of Tobruk. Why did it fall? The excuse given is that there was a surprise attack. How could it have been a surprise attack, when the place had been under attack for a year. Dunkirk was a surprise; Singapore was a surprise; Hong Kong was a surprise. The excuse is given that at Tobruk the enemy tanks were more powerful than those of the allied nations, and that their anti-tank guns were more powerful and more destructive. Why should that be? We hear about the wonderful productive capacity of Great Britain; we hear about the wonderful production of armaments in Canada and in the factories of our neighbour to the south. What is the use of production if the enemy is producing more powerful weapons? There is no sense in urging the undertaking of mass production or, indeed, any production of ineffective weapons of war. We were told that the guns defending the fortress of Singapore were mounted to meet an attack from the sea. Those who were in charge never thought of having to defend themselves from the land at the rear. They believed they were defended by the jungle. Surely they must have known that if monkeys, baboons and gorillas could penetrate the jungles, then their brothers the Japanese could penetrate the jungle, too. They did penetrate the jungle, and made their attack successfully—along with the rest of the gorillas and baboons.

Before Pearl Harbour the United States had been warned that the Japanese might attack. Even when the Japanese emissaries of peace were conferring with the President of the United States it was known that attack was imminent. Canada and the United States have a joint defence board. If the United States members on that board knew of the imminent Japanese attack, it is passing strange that Canada was not warned. What judgment does the joint defence board exercise? For one thing I say, if that board has not better judgment in other matters than it has shown in the selection of a route for the Alaska highway, then I have not very much admiration for the board. May I point out that they say they picked the route.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would my hon. friend dissolve the board?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): British Columbia says the same thing.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would my hon. friend dissolve and do away with the defence board?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No; I would wake it up. How many more disasters must the united nations experience to awaken the defence board to the perils of the present situation?

Canada's air force and Canada's navy are playing a splendid part in this fearful war. But we must remember that Canada's army has not yet fired a shot—with perhaps the exception of those poor men, part of them untrained, and without fighting equipment, who were sent on that ill-conceived, fruitless, fatal expedition to Hong Kong. They went to certain death or imprisonment. They saw some fighting; they did some shooting; but apart from that, Canada's army has not yet fired a shot. When the time comes I am sure that Canada's army will give as good an account of themselves as our air force and as our navy.

Canada declared war without a plebiscite; this government did not ask the people for leave to declare war. It is hard to understand why the government felt that before it could fight the war as it should be fought, a plebiscite would have to be held asking the people to allow the government to do so. I do not know whether we should have conscription or selective military service at once, but I do think we should have had it at the outset of the war. It would then be in effect now. But not having adopted it then, I think the ministers in charge of the army, the navy and the air force are best qualified to say whether the voluntary system is giving them enough men to win the war. If it is not, I feel sure that they will invoke compulsory selective service. When it becomes necessary to do that, I feel sure that they have sufficient courage to do it.

I should like to go on record as supporting the suggestion made yesterday by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) that the men in the active fighting forces should be paid not less than $50 a month. That is the rate paid to the fighting forces of the United States. Our men are as good as theirs and should receive the same pay. A civilian in Canada will not work for $50 a month; we would not want him to work for that. That is a Japanese rate. It is not a white man's rate. Civilians are paid much more than $50 a month; so why should not our fighting men who are doing the most dangerous and deadly work of any people receive the same rate?

[Mr. G. Black.]

I should like to refer to another matter which has been brought to my attention many times in this city. I think only those in the army, in the navy or in the air force who are doing actual fighting should be allowed to wear uniforms. There are uniformed battalions of accountants and clerical workers in Ottawa and many other Canadian cities. These people have no intention of getting any closer to the war than behind a desk or an ink bottle, and they should be made to shed their uniforms. Uniforms should be only for the fighting men, the brave men who are doing their duty by their country, not for those who stay at home and try to have an easy time of it.

I have nothing more to say about the legislation now before the house except this: Let us pass the bill and get on with the war.

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, when this motion was introduced I thought I knew precisely what it meant, and I approved it, but with explanation, misgiving set in. I felt as the master poet has said:

> Ere a man hath power to say, "Behold!"
> The jaws of darkness do devour it up:
> So quick bright things come to confusion.

I agree with the measure, but I do not agree with the explanations that have been given as to its application. If I am right, and I know I am, at least on the first count, we have an assured compulsory service for home defence. It is "likely" we shall have compulsory service to help the United States. And then I find myself in flat opposition to the third statement that has been made in this house more than once, namely that it is "unlikely" we shall have compulsory service to send men to the British isles. I want to register my opposition to that view and will speak directly to the point.

I should like to speak about such matters as our balanced war effort, our farm service, and point to our bulging elevators, but I shall not. I should like to take up the matters discussed the other day by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) with reference to the need for turning out more tanks and tractors, and point out to them the crowded condition of our freight yards. Nor should we forget that when we entered this war we were an immaturely developed industrial nation. We had only about 3 per cent of the world's factory production, whereas the United States had 45 per cent.

But I must refer particularly to something that was said in this house a few days ago by the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) when he held this house in silent spell. I have always admired him, but never more so than when he scorned the use of a smoke screen and led us directly to the fuel of the fire. I admired but I disagreed on more than one count. He said, as reported on page 3278 of Hansard:

> I have to reason in my mind why I have to support the British flag and spend my energies for the defence of British rule in this conflict, or perhaps elsewhere. It is the result of thinking, the result of reasoning, if I come to that conclusion; with you it is the impulse of the heart. Your heart becomes inflamed as soon as the name of England, of the British empire, is mentioned. It is quite natural, it is in your blood; it is your blood that makes that impulse. It cannot be the same with me. It would be against nature.

I say to the minister, "Excuse me, my dear friend, but your blood and my blood are the same." You cannot change a family tree; it is written down. I do not accuse the minister, but many sins have been committed with the statement, "It is in my blood". Let us get the blood line straight. In 1680 a record was made of the birthplace of those immigrants who had come from France, and it was found that four out of five were Normans, either by birth or by marriage.

Mr. THORSON: The same blood as mine.

Mr. MOORE: Icelandic, do you say?

Mr. THORSON: Norse.

Mr. MOORE: Who were the Angles and who were the Scots? Kith and neighbours of the Normans. But as the former minister said, it is not our fault; it is good blood. The point I want to make is not that that blood is always going overseas but that we are of the same blood—crossbreeds, it is true, but good crosses. There is a myth, the myth of the pure-bred, the myth of the Aryan blood. Let us not in this house revive that myth, because a good cause never needs to depend on the racial hates of history.

There is another resentment I have against what the minister said. He spoke of the upsurging of blood. Well, there is no doubt about it that the men who came from Coventry upsurged when they heard about the bombing of that city. But that is not race. That is family, and familiar things—a father or mother killed, or the church to which you went bombed. That is not race.

I have still another objection, and I know my friends in the province of Quebec who speak French will pardon me for saying that I sometimes resent their saying that they are the only first families. There were less than five thousand emigrés here before 1700, and many of us have ancestors who were in America before that time. They were here for nearly three hundred years, both south and north. Remember the name Churchill has been inscribed on our map for a very, very long time. Race? Can you produce a race in two hundred and fifty years? No, but you can produce a national culture, and to that matter I shall turn in just a moment.

There are different races in Canada. In my riding there are thousands who belong to the great Slav race. And it is good blood. That blood upsurged at the atrocities of Europe, and when the plebiscite came the men and women of that blood in my riding rushed to the polls and voted "yes", "yes". I have taken the trouble to ask them why, and they said: "Let us drive Hitlerism out". Out of where? Not out of the British isles; Hitlerism is not there. Out of Europe, out of France, out of a home that has been Norman since the year 911. Hitlerism is there.

Does someone tell me that France is content? If they do, then I use the words that Professor Célestin Bouglé used when Professor Amoroso, representing Italy at a world conference held under the auspices of the League of Nations, said Italy was content. Bouglé said:

> I do not wish to be ironical, but how am I to know? For in all countries where political repression reigns one never gets to know what those affected are really thinking. Why? Because silence reigns—a silence you call peace.

Now may I give the application of what I have said to this debate? The spectacle of one or two or three or four men ruling Europe to-day is almost an incredible one. How did it come about? Simply because absolutism is a cohesive power. Do we talk of freedom? No. We talk of the freedoms—we talk of the free nations—we talk of the democracies. That was the secret of Hitler's success—he talked of the decrepitude of democracy. And he was right; he proved it. It was a devastating phrase that brought him where he is to-day, and that phrase was, "It is not our national duty." I take you back to the days when the freedom of Czechoslovakia was involved, when French and British statesmen met and said, "It is not our national duty". We are now, as I see it, learning how freedom may protect itself. That is a great lesson, but it is a costly one—remember Pearl Harbour. Yes, it is a costly lesson that one must learn if freedom is to survive.

Let me turn to a statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), to which the member for Yukon (Mr. Black) has already referred. The Minister of Justice said, as reported at page 3391 of Hansard:

Though some would volunteer to fight for the United Kingdom, people here would not feel that it is a national duty for Canadians as such to do so.

Perilous doctrine!—coming from a minister of the crown. Strange doctrine, in view of what has happened over Europe. Sometimes I thought I knew Quebec. I treasure as much my friendship with the French-speaking people as I do my friendship with the English-speaking people; I thought I knew Quebec, but now I have to call it a province of complenity. I heard the splendid statement of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) to-day and was moved as you were moved, and then I thought back to a statement that I hold in my hand. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) spoke the other night, and he said, as reported at page 3671 of Hansard:

Meaning the government.

—had talked of Canadian interests in the war, they might have been able to convince the French Canadians to accept a compulsory measure at this time; but not having contributed to bring that about, I do not think the government can expect its supporters from the province of Quebec to go back to our people now and attempt to convince them overnight that conscription for overseas service had become a matter of life or death for Canada. I would be willing to risk myself in such an effort if I had received any help before.

That statement constitutes a terrible indictment of the government. I dislike believing it is so.

The Minister of Justice might have spared us the word "inimical" when he was speaking of the two major nationalities or groups in this country. Inimical? Well, there was a conquest of Britain in 1066 when the Normans came over and left a line of rulers, and not the worst by any means; and there was a British conquest of Canada, though we call it by the softer word—cession. It seems to me that in these days the minister might have remembered that not so long ago French and English died together in a common cause in France. He might have remembered that to-day French and English are laying down their lives for the cause of a free France.

"I have to reason", said the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). Freedom begins there. Freedom begins with the right to reason, the right to voice discontents, the right to shape environment, the right to govern ourselves. The right of those who cannot by their own arms defend their possessions. That is what we are losing; that is what is going out of the world—the right of small nations to live and the right of minority cultures to exist within a single nation. That is what is at stake in this war. How can it be preserved without alliances? How can a minority preserve, either as a nation or as a people, a special culture within a state? How can it survive without alliances, and how can there be alliance without reciprocal obligation?

Let us reverse the statement made by the Minister of Justice: "If we do not feel it a national duty to fight for the United Kingdom, we cannot expect the people of the United Kingdom to feel it a national duty to fight for us." What is our alternative? Alliance with the United States? Then, in the strangeness of time, we would have conscription for overseas service—yes, to the British isles. In the 1770's the people who spoke French in this country could have declared themselves out. They preferred to stay in. The Minister of Justice said it was for the preservation of their national culture, their special culture. I agree with that statement.

In the course of time the empire became a commonwealth of nations. We might have objected then if we had wanted to, because the trade pacts that were made then went much further than trade pacts; they cut the life-line of the British isles from the European continent. Members of this house may remember that I voted against those pacts. On one occasion Henri Bourassa and I were the only two to vote on our side of the house against the Ottawa pacts, and not for quite the same reason. I think Bourassa held that Canada should not protect its trade routes; I feared it would not do so, and I said so. What happened? After London closed its doors to agricultural Europe, the agrarian people—and there are a hundred millions of them in Europe—were beggared, and went hat-in-hand to Berlin, where they fell into the German sluice. Now we have a war to establish a new order in Europe.

Were they right, those people who said only the product of a melting-pot could stand the strain of a crisis? Were they right who said minorities can no longer be left to enjoy their distinctive culture within any state, to be given measures of autonomy, to be given schools, allowed their own language? If they were right, then I have misspent years of my life pleading for that very cause.

Let my friends who claim they are of a different race and of a different nationality, and who speak French, not only in Quebec but in the province of Ontario, ask themselves that question and remember this: you cannot have rights without reciprocal obligations. Let them study the map of the Balkans. The objective of this war is made in defence of the people who cannot defend themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I have almost concluded. I want to say just one word more. We have said we are a nation, and we sang "O Canada" in French and in English. But nations do not exist simply by proclamation, or by the singing of national hymns, or by protestations of loyalty. That is not the test. The test of a nation is not even the will of the people to be a nation. The test is the capacity for common action. That is the test; and that test, under the democratic system, must be given by the will of the majority. Seldom is opinion unanimous. The plebiscite was not unanimous in Quebec, but no one contends the minority spoke for Quebec, and no one should contend Quebec spoke for the other eight provinces.

We of this house shall not have the final word; the people will have the final word. But let us never forget that if a house be divided against itself, that house cannot stand.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEDUC (Wright): The bill we are now considering is the most important submitted to us at this session. The government has requested that we amend the National Resources Mobilzation Act by repealing section 3, which reads:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

I intend to support this bill, not because I favour conscription for overseas service at the moment, since the voluntary system has proven adequate for our needs and I have reason to believe it will continue to do so, but because I share the opinion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which incidentally is the opinion of the majority in this house and in the country, that the government must at this stage of the war be granted all the powers required to ensure victory.

On plebiscite day, April 27 last, the Canadian people voted, not for or against conscription, but on the following question inscribed on each ballot paper:

> Are you in favour of releasing the government from any obligation arising out of any past commitments restricting the methods of raising men for military service?

The majority of the Canadian people chose to release the government from the pledges it had given them at the last election. To-day the government is acting quite logically in introducing this bill, which is the direct result of the plebiscite vote. I understand that many of my colleagues feel obliged to oppose this bill because their electors voted negatively on the plebiscite. For my part, despite the fact that in my constituency the "nays" had it by a majority of two thousand votes, I shall have to support this bill to amend the mobilization act in order to be logical and to obey the dictates of my conscience.

During the plebiscite campaign I asked that the government be released from its past commitments, for I was convinced that if the administration were to guide our war effort successfully, it would have to be empowered to take whatever measures it deemed necessary and expedient, in the light of all the circumstances and future events, to ensure final victory.

I am well aware that such a stand will prejudice my chances of re-election to this house; but, faced with the choice of serving my country or being re-elected, I do not hesitate in choosing to serve my country. Moreover, this is not the first time I have voted against the wishes of a large number of my supporters. I remember the session of 1937 when I cast my first important vote in this house in favour of the increased military appropriation for national defence. I am sure that if a plebiscite had been held in my province and in my constituency on this subject, the majority of the voters would have opposed such an increase, as did a group of my colleagues from Quebec who followed what they judged to be the opinion of the majority and voted against the proposed increase. In 1939, when we declared war on Germany, I am equally sure that if the issue had been submitted to the province of Quebec in a plebiscite, the majority would have opposed participation. When the National Resources Mobilization Act was passed in 1940 I am convinced that a plebiscite held in Quebec and in my constituency on that issue would have shown widespread opposition to the measure. Yet I always trusted and supported the government on these important issues. I have the utmost faith in the Prime Minister, whom I consider to be the greatest statesman our country has ever produced, and in his cabinet ministers, who have demonstrated their efficiency, their unselfish devotion and their wisdom in the administration of the country and its war effort.

I must confess that, like a certain number of my constituents and fellow citizens of Quebec and other provinces, I am opposed to conscription at this time of men for overseas service, because this step appears useless, and dangerous to national unity. But I also know that if the fate of Canada and all we hold dear depended on it, the Canadian people would readily agree to the heaviest sacrifices. As citizens of this country, whether of English or French descent, let us remember that we all have an equal loyalty to and love for our land of Canada, even though our two racial groups may not fully agree in the means of discharging our duty toward it. I ask nothing more than to have my supporters and fellow citizens of the province of Quebec understand that our soldiers overseas are defending both England and Canada; that our airmen, striking formidable blows at the enemy in Europe, are defending Canada; that our sailors who seek out the enemy on our coasts and on the high seas are also defending Canada. I trust that, once and for all, my fellow citizens of Quebec and elsewhere in Canada will realize that this is not England's war, but a war being waged by Great Britain, Canada and all the united nations in the defence of our liberties and our Christian civilization. I want everyone to consider and realize that the defence of Canada does not mean exclusively defence in Canada.

I wish to protest against unfair attacks launched from certain sections of the country against the war effort of the province of Quebec. History has amply proven that the people of my province and my race have always been loyal and devoted to their country, their king and the British empire. At present I am proud of the war effort made by my country, my province and the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house. I am in a position to show that my constituents have willingly and generously responded to their country's call. I wish to say how proud and grateful I am in respect of the sacrifices made by a number of them so far, as well as the sacrifices they will willingly accept in the future for the defence of our country whenever further sacrifices may become necessary.

Although my constituency is located in an agricultural section, it has responded marvellously in voluntary enlistment. Here are a few figures illustrating that statement. In the town of Aylmer, located only a few miles from this capital city of Ottawa, out of a population of 3,200 there have enlisted in the active forces 428. Of this number, 25 per cent are of English extraction and 75 per cent are French Canadians. Of the number enlisted, 145 are serving overseas; 253 are serving in Canada, thirty are trainees. In addition, thirty-three persons have enlisted in the reserve army. I have reason to be proud of this splendid contribution, for very few towns of equal population have given so many men to the army.

I also wish to mention my home town of Maniwaki, situated some eighty-five miles north of the capital. Out of a population of 2,200 over 200 men have enlisted in the active force, and most of them are now serving overseas. Some have already given their lives for their country, and I wish particularly to direct attention to one of my neighbours, who gave two of his sons to the air force. One was killed last fall during an air raid, while on duty as a radio operator at an aerodrome somewhere in England. The other was reported missing two weeks ago following a raid over Germany, in which he piloted a bomber. Here is another illustration of the patriotism and loyalty of my constituents. Three men from my town, close friends of mine, are prisoners in Hong Kong. Two are brothers belonging to a family of five sons; the other three, together with a sister, a graduate nurse, are on active service in England.

Had I sufficient time at my disposal I could show that in every municipality of my constituency the people thoroughly understand their duty in this war and have generously answered the call of their country. Moreover, in each municipality there is to be found a very active Red Cross organization. Subscriptions to the victory loan exceeded the objective set for the constituency. On the strength of such an effort I am entitled to believe and to state that, if needs be, we are willing to make still greater sacrifices for victory.

I will admit that active force enlistments in my province are not quite as numerous as in other provinces. However, I believe four factors must be considered if one wishes to be fair in passing judgment on the adequacy of the man-power contribution of French Canadians in the province of Quebec. First, according to official statistics one-third of the population of Quebec is devoted to agriculture, and those of military age in this class reasonably consider that they are making a fair contribution to the country's war effort by producing the food essential to our own people, our army and our allies. Second, according to official statistics the adult male population of Quebec is proportionately less than that of any other province, because of the large number of children in the average French-Canadian family. Furthermore, the government is paying dependents' allowances to only four children; that is, $12 a month each for the first two children, $9 a month for the third and $6 a month for the fourth, which I consider a serious injustice to the men serving their country as well as to the large families they leave behind them. Third, a great majority of the people of my province neither speak nor understand the English language. Those of military age realize that if they enlist in the active army without any knowledge of English, they can expect no promotions to higher ranks. Moreover, they realize that if they are sent outside Quebec, either elsewhere in Canada or to England, they will meet almost none but English-speaking people, who will be unable to understand them; that their stay among such people, even though they may be sympathetic, will be tedious, and that they will become homesick, like so many French Canadians now on active service in England. Fourth, a false education about conscription has been carried on in my province by certain members of the two older parties; by nationalists, whose origin dates back to 1911; by blindly anti-British people, and by supporters of the league for the defence of Canada.

To my mind, these considerations should be pondered by anyone inclined to condemn the stand taken by my fellow citizens of Quebec. Let no one forget that we all want to attain final victory, and that we are all confident that a new social order will prevail after the war, not only in this country but throughout the world. In order to express my views on this matter of a new social order, I cannot do better than quote excerpts from the splendid joint pastoral letter of his eminence the cardinal archbishop of Quebec, their excellencies the archbishops, bishops and other prelates of Canada on the stand taken by Canadian Catholics in this war:

> We should indeed appreciate the advantages we have, at least if we save our inherent human rights from the ravages of totalitarism, and we should do all in our power to improve our civil institutions. Later on, guided by sound social principles, we should erect in our country a society founded on a new order of justice and charity, in which religion, law and equity will ensure true peace. Then, even the most severe and bloody sacrifices of the present time will bear fruit in the eyes of God and men.

Mr. M. E. McGARRY (Inverness-Richmond) Mr. Speaker, probably only those who understand my weak resistance will pardon me for showing the symptoms of infection after the epidemic of speech-making that has prevailed in this chamber for the last two weeks. I have only a very few symptoms of that contagion, however, because my remarks to-day will be very brief, and I shall not enter into any endurance contest. Even at that I am rather loath to take up the time of this house, because I am afraid if I undertook to add to or place any particular emphasis upon what has been said already, my attempt would be rather unsuccessful. However, representing a constituency whose answer to the plebiscite question was perhaps not as markedly affirmative as that of many other constituencies, I feel that it is timely and fitting that I should explain my attitude with regard to the bill now before the house.

In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish at once to affirm, without any qualifications, that I will support the bill. During the plebiscite campaign I urged my people to give an affirmative vote. I did so conscientiously, believing firmly, as I did, that the government had taken the honourable and democratic course to secure its release from commitments made to the electorate in 1940. I could not conceive of anything at that time which would do more to belittle Canada's war effort or to create an adverse sentiment in the minds of our allies than the knowledge that the government of Canada, responsible as it is for our share of the prosecution of the war, did not have the moral and legal authority to call into action any facilities they found necessary to cope with exigencies which might arise in connection with the carrying on of the war.

I freely confess that during the campaign I pointed out to my people that a vote in favour of the plebiscite did not mean the immediate enactment of conscription. I felt then, as did my electors, that conscription was not at that time a necessary factor in the attainment of a greater or more extensive war effort. Had I represented that an affirmative vote on the plebiscite would automatically invoke conscription I doubt very much whether the response of my electors would have been in the affirmative, as in fact it was by a considerable margin.

From these observations I do not wish it to be implied that the people of Inverness-Richmond are in any degree reluctant to contribute their all to the war effort; but they did feel during the plebiscite that up to that time conscription was but a symbol rather than a real or emergent necessity to meet our war requirements. If there are any who entertain doubts respecting the loyalty of my electors, or as to concerted action on their part in making contributions to the war effort, I would draw their attention to the contributions we have made in every phase of our war activities. I would point to the voluntary recruiting of men for the armed forces; I would point to our donations to the Red Cross fund, and our oversubscription of victory loans. All this has been done in my constituency, despite the fact that not one military industrial unit has been established there. This is not because of any lack of effort on my part; the fact is that I have sought something of the kind for the benefit of my people, and I have no doubt the files of government departments connected with the war will show that I have been rather troublesome in that regard.

However, my people are tolerant, and they are reconciled to the fact that this war cannot be carried on on a basis of sentiment. They realize that a business element is involved, and that unless that fact is recognized we cannot carry on successfully. Careful investigations by experts having the knowledge required for the selection of proper sites, have disclosed that the strategic and economic factors in respect of sites in my section of the country do not merit undertakings at that point. On behalf of my constituents, and because of their tolerance and response to the war effort in general, I express the hope that if the war is to continue for some time our war experts may decide that some military projects shall be established in Inverness-Richmond.

Last week the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), speaking in the debate, expressed my attitude with respect to the mobilization of forces. With regard to the immediate necessity of conscripting man-power for overseas, he said this: "Man-power applied to war production is just as vital as an army overseas, and really far more helpful in supplying the needs of the united nations". He asked if our reverses in any amphitheatre of war had resulted from lack of man-power, or a lack of weapons, aeroplanes and ships. He inquired if our successes had not been the result of having adequate arms in the hands of those willing and able to use them. It was pointed out by the minister that Russia needed our ammunition, but did not need our army, and that the same was true of China and India. These are almost identically my sentiments with regard to the mobilization of man-power. The conscription of man-power is not an innovation which will achieve greater expedition or enlarge or enhance our war effort in any degree.

On the other hand I believe I reflect the views of my people when I say that if and when the ministers charged with the responsibility of prosecuting the war, and having the benefit of the studied opinions of their advisers, say that it is absolutely necessary to have conscription to engage in an all-out war effort, I can guarantee that the electors of Inverness-Richmond who voted "no" on the plebiscite will cooperate heartily with those who voted "yes". Perhaps those who voted "no" might be said to come from Missouri, to use a common expression; they want to be shown. They want to get their knowledge from the men who know the facts and who are shouldering the responsibility of conducting our war effort. They refuse to take them from any other source. I believe when the position is made clear to them I can depend as much on the electors in my constituency who voted "no" as on those who voted "yes".

This bogey of conscription probably had its nativity at a caucus of money barons in Toronto, and it has been cherished, fostered and nourished by some elements of the press and others who were not aware of the true record of our war effort. I hope that this bogey will be confined to some chamber of silence and not removed until it is authoritatively stated that we need conscription.

I commend the government for their action in attempting to obtain a release of the commitments made in the election of 1940, but when the answer was given and the government undertook to carry out the mandate of the people I was disappointed with the procedure followed. This may be due to my ignorance of parliamentary propriety or parliamentary usage, or perhaps it is a lack of technical knowledge. When the government attempted to carry out this mandate we immediately heard from men on both sides of the house who had gone out and urged the electors to vote in the affirmative. My idea of what would happen was that when the mandate was given, the necessary legislation would pass the house without debate, except possibly a protest from those who had advocated a "no" vote. The government was released, and I think hon. members should have waited to speak until conscription was indicated. That would be a more appropriate time to have the debate.

However, I have great faith in our leader. I trust him, and I have always trusted him. The electors of Canada have always trusted him. I have great faith in the ministers who preside over the departments having directly to do with Canada's part in this war. None of them is a radical. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is possibly the one man in the whole outfit who would urge absolute conscription before anyone else, and I was glad to hear him say that it was conscription not necessarily, but conscription if necessary. If he follows that principle, he will make himself very popular throughout Canada. There is one essential which is necessary if we hope to have a successful prosecution of this war. That essential is cooperation. There must be coordination, not only of individual thought but of action. We may have enough men at the front, we may have enough ships, we may have enough tanks and we may have enough of other equipment, but if we lack the proper spirit of coordination we can never have an all-out war effort.

I am sorry there are not many of them in the house at the moment but I should like to say a few words to my hon. friends from Quebec. These men do not need a champion as to their loyalty to Canada. They gave evidence of it in the last war, and they are giving abundant evidence of it in this one. If their effort is to be of the strongest they must emulate their forbears, those whom we call the founders of Canada. You may ask who were the founders of Canada. They were the men who came across the waters, the men who hewed down our forests and cleared our land, the men who drained our swamps and created colonies where none existed before. At the price of hardship, privation and bloodshed they founded a country which is designed to have no end. Let me say to these men that the Canada that their forbears founded is in danger to-day. The institutions which they built, and from which has flowed a stream of democracy down through the generations, are threatened. I say, not only to the French Canadians in Quebec but to anybody else who may be inclined to be an isolationist, in this crusade—I would call it a crusade rather than a war—you must ponder the best means and the best method of applying this principle. It would be well for all loyal Canadians to ponder this vital matter. I say, God help Canada, God help her institutions, if we cannot show our brothers who are allied with us in this great war that our cooperation has been such as to merit their succour when we attempt to drive back the hordes from our shores.

In my opinion the proper course for Canada to follow is so to conduct herself in this crusade—imperialism should not be considered at all, because, after all, England is just a unit in the crusade as Canada is—that after it is over our allies will say, "Well done, Canada! You have been a faithful ally; you have never been found wanting; you came to our assistance when we were hard pressed by the enemy." If we will look upon ourselves and our allies as one joint military body fighting for our very existence—and if we lose our liberty and freedom we had better be dead—we shall write a bright page on the dark history of this war that will make the coming generations proud of us. When those who come after us see what we achieved in our day and what we were prepared to sacrifice for democracy they will attach the same value to the heritage of democracy that we hand down to them, and should the occasion arise again they will be prepared to pay the price and make the sacrifices that their forefathers did before them.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, in this debate which is now growing fairly old we have heard a great many speeches for and against Bill No. 80. I listened to; I have read and re-read the speech on this bill which was made by the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenize King), and I deeply regret that my right hon. leader has been misunderstood and that certain groups consider that he has diverged from his time-honoured principles. During his long public career serious situations have continually arisen, but through diplomacy and good judgment he has successfully surmounted them all. It would seem that ever since the Prime Minister's entry into public life he was confronted at every turn with one difficult situation after another; yet each found him equal to the occasion. When appeals were made to prejudice or to racial or religious passions for the purpose of embroiling him in political controversies, his broad statesmanship, his high-mindedness and his profound humanitarianism always enabled him to reach the solution. I would therefore appeal this afternoon to the critics of the Prime Minister to remember the words of Lord Durham who, in his famous report to his gracious sovereign, said:

> I expected to find a contest between a government and a people. I found two nations warring in the bosom of a single state. I found a struggle, not of principles, but of races, and I perceived that it would be idle to attempt any amelioration of laws or institutions until we could first succeed in terminating the dreadful animosity that now separates the inhabitants of Lower Canada.

That was the situation many years ago; but through compromise, by good understanding between the two great races in this country, and by wise leadership on the part of our public men, many of these old animosities have passed away. Let the critics remember that confederation itself, as the former minister of public works (Mr. Cardin) said in the able address he made to this house the other day, was a compromise. We all know that confederation would never have come into being if it had not been for compromise.

Throughout all these years French Canada has always stood out upon one particular issue, conscription for service outside Canada. That was made perfectly clear as recently as March 31, 1939, when the authoritative voice of the late minister of justice, Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, uttered these words in this House of Commons:

> Now I am going to touch a subject which is a delicate one. The French Canadians will never agree that any government has the right to force them to military service on the other side of the ocean. In 1917 that was my view, and I have never altered it. I believe that conscription in 1917 was a blunder of frightful magnitude, and that we are still reaping the sad and sorry results of that ill-conceived policy. I was pleased that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Manion) said yesterday, what I have myself learned, that the results did not in any way justify the taking of the risk; because in the end very few conscripts ever saw the front lines during the war. All should be reconciled to the doctrine which I have just expounded. The best way, the most effective way of helping is not the way that would divide our country and tear it asunder.

We are not alone in that view. Australia has always been against conscription, South Africa will never have conscription, Ireland would never have conscription. I think I am true to my concept of Canadian unity when I say that I shall always fight against this policy; I would not be a member of a government that would enact it; and not only that, but I say with all my responsibility to the people of Canada that I would oppose any government that would enforce it.

That was the view of a man who did a great deal for the unity of Canada.

At the time of the plebiscite I returned to my constituency, as did many other hon. members, and day in and day out, on the radio, in the columns of the newspapers, on the public platform and by personal contact I explained to my electors that a "yes" vote in the plebiscite was not a vote for conscription. I believe that I was perfectly clear on that point, and I am glad that my right hon. leader had no intention of interpreting the plebiscite as a vote on conscription. The electors of Humboldt constituency, which is composed of many racial groups—out of 46,000 people there are something like 22,000 of German racial origin, and we have also Austrians, Czechs, Slovaks, Hungarians and nationalities from almost every country of Europe—turned out and gave an affirmative majority of one thousand in the plebiscite. But I am quite certain that if they had believed they were voting for conscription, they would have given an entirely different vote, and that would have been the situation not only in that constituency but in many others across Canada. Everyone, even our judges and civil servants, went out and assisted in bringing out a "yes" vote. There was no opposition there. The only place where there was any opposition to getting out a "yes" vote was in the province of Quebec.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech said that the principle involved in this amendment is not immediate conscription. If that is so, then why was there such a great rush to bring in this measure just as soon as the house met? Was it that the opposition thought there was a chance to gain some political advantage and urged this matter upon the Prime Minister, and that he believed that this agitation might go on in the newspapers and throughout the country and have a damaging effect upon our war effort? That may be one reason. Despite the manner in which the problem of overseas conscription has been introduced to the people of Canada and to this house, I maintain that my right hon. leader is entitled to every confidence by the Canadian people.

During the plebiscite I spoke over the radio to the electors of my constituency, and I said on that occasion:

Mr. King is not a militarist; on the contrary, by heredity, by instinct, by temperament, he is a man of peace. It was his grandfather who espoused the cause of the common people when they were being trampled under foot by an arrogant oligarchy who sought to impose the caste system upon this country, and it was from his example that my right hon. leader drew the political philosophy which has dominated the whole of his political career.

Even in early life, and before his entry into politics, he had developed a sympathy for the cause of the common people. As a student at college, his mind was directed along these channels and his book entitled "Humanity and Industry" epitomizes this sympathy. It is a work in which humanitarianism is linked with industry. In it he assigns to the worker a high place in the social and economic life of the nation.

With his unusual grasp of world problems, with his genius for government, with his sympathy for those in humble walks of life, the Prime Minister, if anyone, can lead us out of this valley of carnage and catastrophe. If I reject, and if a sufficient number of others reject, the leadership of the leader of this government, where will it lead us? We all know where it will lead. It will lead to union government, and we know where union government led us in 1917, and what a mess everything got into. At that time a party with no political past and no political future, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated in this debate, produced chaos.

The situation would be no better this time. In fact, it might even be worse, because they would have the experience of their forefathers. Factions would be worked for certain interests that would be seeking to control the destinies of this nation. We know what happened when we were saddled with the Canadian Northern railway, and this time all the old elements would be there lined up behind the various cabals. We can hear the rumbling for the amalgamation of the railroads; we might even be faced with the stealing of the Trans-Canada Air Lines. We would have to fight off the grabbing of water rights, and we would have another pitched battle to defend our natural resources from spoilation. These are all matters which must be given due consideration when one surveys the basic issues at stake.

After all, if we drove the present Prime Minister out of office, who would replace him? Who would have the confidence of the Canadian people? Whom could he advise the governor general to call upon to form a new administration? The only member in the cabinet so far that I know of with views sufficiently different from those of the majority of his associates and who might conceivably form a government is the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Macdonald). He was twice premier of his native province. He has a reputation for political skill. He came here heralded as a great leader; but for the life of me I cannot imagine seeing the hon. member for Kingston City sitting over there beside the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce), though I can see the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) reading the flag-waving speech that the hon. member for Kingston City delivered here the other day on conscription. I can see the hon. member for Davenport reading that speech at Cataraqui cemetery at the grave or Sir John Macdonald on the anniversary of his death. Being a dour and canny Scotsman, the hon. member for Kingston City arranges to ride two horses; but he carefully protects himself against all emergencies, and he needs to, because the horses are going in different directions. The hon. member seemed to say in his speech the other day: "Let there be conscription or no conscription for overseas; let there be such conscription now or later; let there be good or bad results from conscription; no matter when it is undertaken, I am secure". Mind you, the hon. member does not say so in so many words; he is too canny for that. But he implies, he suggests and he creates an atmosphere and a mood, and he has succeeded in confusing his listeners and has obtained wonderful headlines from the loyal press of Ontario. Of course, I would quite agree that a great deal of this was for home consumption in the loyal city of Kingston, a city that was my home for many a long year. But listen to some of the words of his associates. What does the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) say? He is a prominent member of this government, and he says that this matter of conscription is overemphasized; that it is the Colonel Blimp attitude; that they are magnifying out of all proportion the need for conscription for our army overseas. Then take what the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) says, as reported at page 3413 of Hansard:

> Is it necessary to change the present system of voluntary enlistments? It is clear that it would not help the air force; it is likewise clear that it is not necessary in connection with the navy. Is there any necessity for its adoption in connection with the army? Thus far there have been no visible signs of any such necessity.

He goes on to explain the reason why there is no necessity for it. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), speaking on this question, expressed similar ideas. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), speaking the other day on the question, said that we had taken on too much without attempting to take on any more. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) was a little more careful than the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. He said he would go so far as to do anything in the world to try to maintain national unity. These are statements that have been made in conflict with statements of other members, in conflict with the Prime Minister's statement; and when contrasted with the speech of the member for Kingston City they reflect the true meaning. If anyone thinks that any single individual can quote in this house the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier in a speech in which he is trying to make out that it is necessary for us to adopt a conscription policy right away, there is something wrong with that particular individual and he has very little respect for that great Liberal leader.

When the mobilization act was first introduced in this house, I, like many more, said nothing about it. It was rushed through in a very short time. I recall that at that time I discussed the matter with the late Minister of Justice, Mr. Ernest Lapointe, and I remember that the day I was speaking to him about it he took the Hansard of 1917 and pointed this out to me. He said, as reported at page 2517 of Hansard of June 29, 1917:

> Conscription should not, and cannot, be enforced in this country, as in every other British country, without something like general consent.

That was indicated pretty well by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) who also said that this was a political issue. Conscription was a political issue in 1917; the history of it I am sure proves that very fully. To-day it is as much a political issue as it was then, as one who reads the debates will see, although I admit that we have improved to some extent, in that, with the exception of a few speakers, the debates are not as bitter as they were in 1917. But I find what the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier had to say upon this question of conscription. On July 24, 1917, he said, as reported at page 3729 of Hansard of that date:

> It is a denial of those principles of democracy which we hold dear and sacred. I oppose this bill because it has in it the seeds of discord and disunion; because it is an obstacle and a bar to that union of heart and soul without which it is impossible to hope that this confederation will attain the aims and ends that were had in view when confederation was effected. Sir, all my life I have fought coercion; all my life I have promoted union; and the inspiration which led me to that course shall be my guide at all times, so long as there is a breath left in my body.

We all know what happened in 1917, after the twenty-seven odd Liberals left Sir Wilfrid on this very conscription issue. Hardly had the ink dried on that conscription bill when the War-time Elections Act was brought in, a measure which disfranchised thousands upon thousands of Canadian citizens, and thousands upon thousands of my constituents, loyal citizens of this country. I remember one of the members who represented Humboldt constituency at that time rose in his place after he had supported the conscription bill and left Sir Wilfrid; he said it was with shame and sorrow in his heart that he had to return to his constituency of Humboldt. This measure of disfranchisement took citizenship away from men and women who had come to Canada, made their homes, sworn allegiance to the king. It was a blot upon the history of this country that it will take many a generation to wipe out. Their naturalization certificates were torn up as mere scraps of paper. Many of them had sons serving in the war at that time and many of them volunteered afterwards. Many of them were of German or Austrian nationality. Whenever to-day you mention the word "conscription" in that constituency, it is not so much conscription as that terrible disgrace of disfranchising people who were loyal subjects of His Majesty the King.

The people of the constituency I represent are loyal and law-abiding citizens of this country. To-day a great many of them are serving in the various armed services. The first major casualty we had in Humboldt constituency was a young man who was in the retreat at Dunkirk, in the air force, who later came back to Canada and was killed in an accident here. He was of German origin. I could go through a long list of these men, young men who are voluntarily enlisting in every branch of the armed services, although at times, many times, when they have gone to their recruiting stations they have been insulted because they have names that are not of Anglo-Saxon origin. But now, since Russia has come into the war, the name of Timoshenko is one that nobody would say you should change. I know many of my constituents, young men who went to the recruiting stations who said, on their return, that the recruiting officer laughed at them and said, "Why don't you go home and change your name?"

I have not decided whether I shall vote for or against this bill. But I will tell my friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that before I do decide—and I have reason for saying this—I want an absolute undertaking from the Prime Minister and leader of this government that when this bill goes through, the next thing is not going to be a disfranchisement of the people of my constituency, because when this plebiscite bill was before the committee there were certain rumblings in this house and the corridors that these people should be disfranchised and deprived of their citizenship.

We who represent constituencies where there are minority problems know full well that if it were not for the old province of Quebec, heaven knows what would happen; we should be at the mercy of the whims of every politician who ever got into power in this country. I hope that no Liberal Prime Minister on whom the mantle of Laurier falls will ever forsake the minority races of this country. Let no one ever forget that Laurier saved confederation, this confederation that Macdonald brought into being. I am sure that the speech of the hon. member for Kingston City the other day did no good. It plunged a dagger into the bleeding heart of the former Minister of Public Works who, I believe history will say, by his resignation from this government helped to save confederation in this country.

There is another thing of which so many people are apparently not aware, for they seem to think that everyone in this dominion is of Anglo-Saxon origin. More than half the population of Canada is not Anglo-Saxon in origin. Why create division, as the hon. member for Parkdale is doing, for political purposes under the cloak of patriotism.

I am glad to see that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) is in his place. A few days ago he delivered a speech in this house pleading for Canadian unity. Last night the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) referred to his pleading. I think it is rather late for the hon. member for Lake Centre to come pleading for Canadian unity or for a good understanding with the old province of Quebec. He was very closely associated with the late Anderson government in Saskatchewan which defeated the government formerly led by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). They obtained power on an appeal to race and religion. That party slandered French-Canadian priests and sisters and placed on the statute books of Saskatchewan a law that prescribed what form of dress the nuns should wear when teaching in the schools of Saskatchewan.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. FLEMING: This same party that passed legislation—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not wish to interfere with the reading of the hon. member's speech, but I do ask for a withdrawal of the statement that I was associated with the Anderson government.

Mr. FLEMING: I said you were associated with it. You ran for the legislature in the city of Prince Albert; you were a candidate on behalf of that particular political party, that is all. Not only that, but they passed legislation—and I think the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) had quite a bit to do with it—making it an indictable offence to have the cross of the crucified Christ in the schools of Saskatchewan. It is rather late for the hon. member now to plead for a better understanding.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I ask for a withdrawal of that statement. It is true that I was a candidate for the Conservative party, but I had nothing to do with the drafting of any legislation of any kind.

Mr. FLEMING: I never said the hon. member had anything to do with it; I said he was a candidate. He was very closely associated with them, and he became the leader of the party after that government went out of office. He has just returned from giving up that leadership, which he has held for several years now.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I ask that the statement be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has taken exception to the statement that he was associated with certain legislation brought in by a particular government. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw his statement.

Mr. FLEMING: Well, I withdraw it, but I still have my own opinion on the matter. I am sure the hon. gentleman cannot deny this, that he was associated with the Ku Klux Klan. He will not deny that J. J. Maloney, who insulted millions of those who belong to one branch of the Christian church—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, I want an unequivocal withdrawal of that statement. It is false in every particular, and—well, I should like to say something, but I am only rising to a point of order.

Mr. FLEMING: I will withdraw the statement, but I know that this man was very closely associated with the Ku Klux Klan, because they had meetings all around Prince Albert.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman must withdraw the statement which has been denied by the hon. member for Lake Centre, that he was associated in any way with the Ku Klux Klan. There must be an unequivocal withdrawal.

Mr. FLEMING: I never said the hon. member was a member of the Ku Klux Klan.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must withdraw the statement that the hon. member was associated in any way with the Ku Klux Klan.

Mr. FLEMING: I will withdraw the statement. This same hon. gentleman, speaking on the plebiscite, remarked, "While the empire fights, Canada plebiscites." I will quote from the editorial page of the Winnipeg Free Press—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker, is it permissible to quote a statement that was made during the present session, in a previous debate?

Mr. SPEAKER: References are made to former debates, but the subject matter of discussion to-day is really a continuation of what has been already discussed in the house, and for that reason I think it would be in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): According to the rule, reference may be made to any debate in the same session on any question not at the time under discussion.

Mr. FLEMING: The editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 7, 1942, goes on to say:

> This is a smart phrase in which Mr. Diefenbaker, we imagine, has been taking less and less pride as his temperature has cooled; and it is even possible that he is by now heartily ashamed of it. The inference to which this assertion lends itself is that Canada and the Canadian forces are out of the fighting until the result of the plebiscite is known. If Mr. Diefenbaker should protest that no one would draw any such inference from his facetious jingle, the answer is that if it has not been pumped over the whole world through the air, this will be due to its having been missed by Doctor Goebbel's sleuths. This is just the sort of thing that for them is ready-made for mischief. No intelligent Canadian, of course, would put any interpretation upon Mr. Diefenbaker's deliverance other than the one which it merits.

The hon. member for Lake Centre also talked a great deal about hyphenated Canadians, and appealed to them to become Americanized. Imagine that, coming from the same party who a few years ago rode into power on the slogan "No truck or trade with the Yankees; nothing to do with the United States." Now the hon. gentleman wants to have our Canadians fight unhyphenated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, is there not a rule of relevancy on the second reading of a bill? What has all this to do with the bill before the house?

Mr. FLEMING: It has just as much to do with it as when the hon. member for Lake Centre was asking that these people—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask for a ruling, and if I am right I want the hon. member to stop this sort of thing.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order has been raised by the leader of the opposition, that what the hon. gentleman is now saying is not relevant to the question under discussion. Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order? There must be some limit, of course, to discussion that may take place on a bill, and I rather think that what the hon. gentleman is now saying is somewhat irrelevant.

Mr. FLEMING: Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot disagree with this, that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has tried his best to maintain friendly relations with the United States. For this he has been condemned and called unpatriotic, and we are now, in this very bill, reaping the results of some of the things that have been said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have been deflated enough; better sit down.

Mr. FLEMING: It is not very often that the leader of the opposition gets blustery and sore. He is a very good-hearted fellow, I know, and I never interrupt him when he is speaking. I think in place of criticizing our war effort and saying we need conscription right away, we should be going through the country doing everything we can to encourage voluntary enlistment, and we should be bringing to the attention of the people the great things we have already accomplished. Surely that is not out of order. Any time we say anything about our war effort or about the number of troops we have overseas, of course we are told that has nothing to do with the government; that is due to the people of Canada. That is the attitude of our friends across the way, and that is so even in the Tory newspapers. The other day a prominent English newspaper man told me this: "You in Canada have done a most magnificent job. Your war effort has been wonderful, beyond anything we in England ever thought of, yet I am told here that we must not say anything about it. Praise the British effort all you wish, or the United States effort all you wish, or anybody else's effort in the united nations; but don't say anything about Canada's war effort, because it might injure the susceptibilities of a certain crowd in Toronto."

The time at my disposal is getting short, and I shall not discuss the question of the number of men we have in our fighting forces in Canada, and the number overseas. The figures have already been put on Hansard.

In an able speech delivered yesterday the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) showed exactly what conscription would mean to this country. I am convinced that indiscriminate conscription would be no answer to Canada's war contribution, because it all must dovetail into the ultimate strategy of the allied nations. Of course I cannot pretend to any knowledge of strategy, but I can say that I have confidence in those who are directing the affairs of this country.

If the protagonists of immediate conscription had their way, and we sent all available man-power to the aid of Russia, for instance, how would we produce the ships, the guns and the tanks which must be sent to Russia? How would we produce the necessary food, or get the ships to send the supplies overseas? I believe the day will come when we will need all the food supplies we can possibly get. There will come a time when the countries which are now under the heel of Hitler will have an opportunity to arise, and at that time we will have to put into their hands the guns, tanks and ammunition they will need.

I should like to have said something with respect to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who said that the Prime Minister was guilty of procrastination. I was trying to find a word which would be equally applicable to the hon. member, and I have thought that I might describe him as an academist. He moved an amendment to this bill, and in that amendment he included the principles of socialism. The hon. member denies that they are socialistic principles, but it is clear that it is the same old pair of pants with a new pair of suspenders.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

On motion of Mr. Henderson the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DOMINION DAY ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre) moved the adjournment of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The suggestion has come from one or two quarters that possibly the house should not sit on Wednesday, Dominion day, in view of the fact that it is only a half day's sitting. I have not ascertained the views of other hon. members, but my own personal view is that we should sit, and endeavour to conclude the business of the session as soon as possible. I would ask the minister to explore the possibilities and make a statement on Monday.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I shall be glad to follow the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. At the moment the intention of the government is to sit on July 1. If there were a general desire to the contrary, the decision might be altered, but I am not aware that any such opinion has been expressed.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.35 p.m.

Monday, June 29, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

2. If so, what products and what districts are concerned, and will the recommendations be acted upon?

These order have been concurred in by the wartime prices and trade board.

1942 VICTORY LOAN

Mr. SHAW:

1. What was the total commission paid to salesmen for services rendered during the 1942 victory loan campaign?

2. What part of the commission thus earned was paid to the salesmen in cash and what part in bonds, war savings certificates and/or stamps?

3. Has the government given consideration to the paying of all future commissions in bonds, stamps or certificates?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. $1,654,381.58.

2. No earned commissions were paid to salesmen in bonds, stamps or certificates. However, most salesmen were purchasers of victory bonds and to the extent that their commissions provided available cash, in many cases bonds were purchased by them.

3. The government has not given consideration to the paying of all future commissions in bonds, stamps or certificates. For the most part, salesmen earning commissions are foregoing remuneration from other sources. The national war finance committee feels that the voluntary purchase of bonds, certificates and stamps by salesmen active in victory loans is as appropriate to them as to the general public.

MOUNTED POLICE—SPECIAL CONSTABLES

Mr. SHAW:

1. How many special constables have been added to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force since the outbreak of the war?

2. What rates of pay and/or allowances are paid to such special constables?

3. Are cost of living bonuses paid to these men?

4. How many special constable guards have been added to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force since the outbreak of war?

5. What rates of pay and/or allowances are paid to them?

6. Are special constable guards paid cost of living bonuses?

7. Are rates of pay and/or allowances paid to special constables and special constable guards uniform throughout Canada?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Ninety-four were engaged and 115 discharged. Present strength is 111, compared with 132 at the outbreak of war.

2. The rate of pay varies according to the nature of the duty to be performed and the location. Some receive allowances in the form of meals on patrol or in barracks, et cetera, and some do not. The R. C. M. Police regulations stipulate that the rates of pay shall be as authorized by the minister. Guides and interpreters receive from $40 to $75 per month according to the nature of the work. Ordinary cooks receive from $80 to $90 per month and meals. Two head cooks receive approximately $4 per day and meals. Waiters receive approximately $75 per month and janitors range from $80 to $105 per month, et cetera.

3. No. Recently, however, an increase in pay, approximately equivalent to the bonus, was authorized for some of those receiving $2.66 per diem or less ($80 per month).

4. 5,074 have been engaged and 3,181 discharged. The present strength is 1,893.

5. Supervisors (married) pay, $2.00 per diem; allowances, $1.60 per diem; total, $3.60 per diem. Guards (married), pay, $1.60 per diem; allowances, $1.60 per diem; total, $3.20 per diem. Guards (unmarried), pay, $1.60 per diem; allowances, $1.00 per diem; total, $2.60 per diem.

6. No.

7. As far as possible the same rates of pay and allowances are granted to special constables and special constable guards for the same kind of work, but sometimes local conditions and requirements make it necessary to depart from uniformity.

JAPANESE NATIONALS—BRITISH COLUMBIA—EXCHANGE FOR REPATRIATED CANADIANS

Mr. STIRLING:

1. Are any Japanese residents of British Columbia to be returned to Japan in exchange for Canadians who are to be repatriated?

2. If so, how many?

3. What are their names and occupations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. I would refer the hon. member to my statement in the House of Commons on June 12, Hansard, page 3301, in which it was stated that arrangements were being made for the repatriation to Canada of Canadians in Japan and occupied China on the understanding that Japanese subjects in Canada who wished to do so may be permitted to return to Japan.

2. No definite figure can be given at the present moment, although in general it may be said that the number of persons to be repatriated will depend upon the transportation and shipping facilities available.

3. No answer can be given to question 3 since the persons to be repatriated to Japan must be approved by the Protecting Power for Japanese interests, acting on behalf of the Japanese government. It is also felt that it would be impracticable to prepare a complete list to cover future repatriations. A number of Japanese non-officials with their families have already left Canada, but their exchange has not yet been effected and it is not considered desirable, therefore, to make public at the present time the names and occupations of the persons included in this party.

EMPLOYMENT IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. LECLERC:

How many men and women respectively are engaged in war industries in each province of Canada?

Mr. MITCHELL: The number of persons, male and female, employed in the various provinces will not be known until the tabulation of the April returns of the unemployment insurance commission respecting those in insured industries is complete.

There is no definite classification as between war and other than war industries. The question in its present form is therefore unanswerable.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE COMMISSION—STAFF

Mr. RAYMOND:

What are the names of the officials, permanent or otherwise, in the head office at Ottawa of the unemployment insurance commission whose annual salaries each exceeds $3,000?

Mr. MITCHELL: L. J. Trottier, R. J. Tallon, Allan M. Mitchell, R. G. Barclay, R. Brown, E. C. Desormeaux, A. A. Heaps, H. C. Hudson, E. P. Laberge, V. A. Minnes, A. J. Odam, A. Peebles, V. C. Phelan, H. S. Relph, W. K. Rutherford, E. Stangroom.

FARM LOAN BOARD

BRITISH COLUMBIA—APPLICATION RECEIVED AND LOANS GRANTED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): With regard to a motion made by the hon.

member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) for the production of certain information relating to the Canadian farm loan board, I am now tabling the answer to the question asked, but I should like to make a brief statement in regard to it.

On June 10 an order for return was tabled giving certain data in regard to applications received and loans granted by the British Columbia branch of the Canadian farm loan board, in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster. These data were given on a yearly basis, with a footnote stating that "the statistical records of the board are kept on a yearly basis." On June 11 the hon. member stated in the house that the answer to his question was an evasion of the question asked and requested me to bring the information down. At the time I promised to look into the matter and see whether the information was available on the basis asked for.

I have looked into the matter carefully and a statistical table has been prepared showing by months since January 1939 the number of applications for loans received, the number of loans granted, the amount of loans granted, and loan repayments, principal and interest. The original return was not an attempt to evade the question asked; it was merely an attempt to avoid what seemed to be unnecessary work on the part of the staff of the head office of the board, which has been depleted as a result of the war demands, and it was believed that any purpose which the hon. member might have had in mind would be served by the statistical information given. However, as the hon. member apparently regards it as fundamental to have the statistics on a monthly basis, they have been so compiled, and I am tabling herewith an amended return to the order that was tabled on June 10.

WHEAT

BRITISH PURCHASES IN CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO METHOD OF PAYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, which I would have asked him last week but for the fact that he was out of the city. It is based on an item appearing in the Winnipeg Tribune of June 23, as follows:

Minister Says British Wheat Price Not Set

Ottawa, June 23.—Trade Minister MacKinnon said Monday night no formal settlements have yet been made for British purchases of wheat in Canada.

This was the only comment he had to make on a Winnipeg report of an interview with Professor J. Scott Watson, agricultural attache to the British embassy in Washington.

Professor Scott Watson said he understood British wheat purchases in Canada were being paid for by Canada out of the $1,000,000,000 gift to Britain fund.

To what period did the minister have reference, and did it include the three sales that he has announced in this house? I should like to know also whether the assumption made by Professor Scott Watson was correct.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: This matter already has been the subject of answer by the minister, and if he wishes to reply now I think he would be in order in doing so.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I noticed the statement made in Washington, to which the hon. member refers. I had no notice of this question; otherwise I might have been able to give more detailed information. My statement to a representative of the Canadian Press was to the effect that according to my understanding, no formal settlement had been made by Britain for the wheat purchased last year from the Canadian wheat board. My understanding is that our sales to Britain are balanced to a certain extent by payments made, services given and goods shipped by the United Kingdom, but that no formal balancing of those accounts has been made as yet.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): That is only one part of it. What about the third question? Have our sales of wheat been paid for out of the billion dollar grant and will they be so paid for in the future? Surely the government has decided that question.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Perhaps I should say a word about that. Under the act providing for United Kingdom financing, the Dominion of Canada makes available to the United Kingdom a billion dollars for the purpose of purchasing munitions of war, foodstuffs and raw materials in Canada, and for defraying other expenses incurred in Canada by the United Kingdom. It is a little difficult to say whether any part of that billion dollars is applied to any particular commodity. The United Kingdom requires large sums in Canadian dollars for the purpose of purchasing goods in Canada, and they get those dollars in two ways. The first way is by the export of goods and the supplying of services and so on to Canada, which gives them several hundred million dollars. The second way is through the billion dollar gift. I have left out of account the $700,000,000 loan, but for the present fiscal period those are the two ways in which the United Kingdom obtain the dollars they require, and they use those dollars for the purchase of everything for which they require Canadian dollars, including wheat. But to say that any particular part of the billion dollars is allocated to the purchase of wheat is to say something which is impossible of demonstration. All the dollars which the United Kingdom must have for purchases in Canada are used for the purchase of goods, the obtaining of services, the construction of projects and remittances of one kind and another to Canada, and that total sum is made up in the two ways I have mentioned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has skated all around the specific question. It is this: Has any part of the billion dollar gift been used to pay for wheat sent to Britain, or will it be so used?

Mr. ILSLEY: It cannot be answered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The answer, then, is yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: It cannot be answered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not agree with that.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCDONALD, PONTIAC—REFERENCE TO EDITORIAL IN OTTAWA "JOURNAL" OF JUNE 29

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. McDONALD (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, arising out of an editorial appearing in this morning's Ottawa Journal, headed "Falsifying the Record". It goes on to state that I am a stout opponent of conscription—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not falsifying the record.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Has my hon. friend anything to say?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not falsification of the record, is it?

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): I would ask the hon. member to wait patiently until I finish my remarks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have read the editorial. I thought it was very appropriate.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): It goes on to give an excerpt from the speech I delivered the other evening, as follows:

> Conscription was imposed on the people of Canada and particularly the province of Quebec in 1917, for no other reason than to win an election for a party which had lost the last vestige of the confidence of the people.

That extract from my remarks is followed by this statement:

> So far is that statement from being true that it includes several misrepresentations. So far from conscription in 1917 being "imposed" on the people, a huge majority of the people did it themselves. And it was under a Union government in which the best of the Liberals of the day cooperated, except Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I submit that the official records of this house show absolutely the reverse; that it was under the Conservative administration of Sir Robert Borden that the Military Service Act was carried in this house and put into force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely this is not a matter of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is replying to a statement in which he was accused of lying. It seems to me he should have the right to reply.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a matter of interpretation, and now he is making a speech.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He is entitled to correct a misrepresentation.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): In connection with the passage of the Military Service Act during the session of 1917 I find the following to be the official record, which I should like to place upon Hansard in order to justify my statement and to prove that I am not guilty of falsifying the record. The bill was introduced by Sir Robert Borden and read the first time on June 11, 1917. It was read the second time in this house on July 6, 1917; read a third time on July 24, 1917; passed by the senate on August 18, 1917, and received the royal assent on August 29, 1917. The Union government, to which this article refers, was sworn in on November 14, 1917; consequently it had absolutely nothing to do with the passing of the Military Service Act. I am entirely within my rights, I submit, in saying that my reference to that matter was absolutely correct, and that I did not falsify the record.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO WITHDRAWAL OF CHARGES AGAINST MR. CHALOULT AND COLONEL DREW

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). In view of an editorial opinion expressed in the Toronto Daily Star on Friday last under the caption "Public Men Brought into Court," in which it deprecates the practice of interfering with the freedom of speech, even in war time, and refers specifically to the cases of Mr. Chaloult and Colonel Drew, would the minister say whether it is the intention of the government to withdraw the charges in these cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order. If my hon. friend will consult Beauchesne, paragraph 293(c), he will find that an hon. member may not refer to a matter on which a judicial decision is pending. That is one of the best known rules of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That rule does not apply in this case at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who says so?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I say so.

Mr. CRERAR: Would it not be better to let Mr. Speaker decide it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not accepting what the hon. member says the rules of the house should be. We are not expressing an opinion on the question of guilt or innocence; we are merely referring to the propriety of the government or the minister laying a charge. That is what is open to criticism. I hope the time will never come when we cannot do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Read the rule—"refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the rule in May.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is the rule quoted in May, 12th edition, page 296, and 13th edition, page 323. If my hon. friend knew the rules better he would not make such an exhibition of himself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do not lose your temper.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think there is any doubt as to the rule. It has always been the practice in this house, and it is the rule, that a matter which is the subject of judicial inquiry is outside the purview of the house during the course of the proceedings. I do not see how it is possible for one to raise the question by asking the Minister of Justice whether he intends to withdraw the charges, because upon those grounds would probably rest the argument in court when the proceedngs were being held. The rule is clear that no such question should be asked. I do not believe it should be raised when the matter is now before the courts.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask a question? Does that preclude a member rising in the house, as did the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) a few moments ago, and asking if it is the intention or the will of the government to withdraw a case now pending before the courts?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a distinction I leave to the Minister of Justice. But the answer would go to the very roots of the action before the courts. If an expression of opinion were given by the Minister of Justice now with regard to the withdrawal of an action which is at present before the courts, he would be expressing an opinion as to a proceeding before the courts.

Mr. COLDWELL: If the case is withdrawn there is no case; therefore it could not be prejudiced.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That question would arise if it were withdrawn; not before.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Friday, June 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this debate has now lasted a considerable time. Much straw has been threshed out, and I trust I shall not impose on the house by speaking at too great length.

Mr. COLDWELL: No chaff?

Mr. McLARTY: I may not be a thresher, but if desirable I could speak at some length on that operation. I do feel, however, that it is my duty to make my position clear on this very important issue.

I am wholeheartedly in support of the bill now before the house and about, I trust, to receive its second reading. If I were not otherwise convinced, the events of the last fortnight would undoubtedly have convinced me that everything this country can do should be done in prosecuting the war in every possible way. It is not a matter of courage on my part to take that attitude. I do think, however, that it required some courage on the part of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) to take the attitude he took in this house on Friday last.

I believe this measure is the natural and inevitable result of the plebiscite which was taken in April. Having thereby obtained the moral right to repeal section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, I do not think we could do otherwise than take such legal right as lay within our power.

It has been suggested in various quarters that the vote was contingent on some precedent condition, that it might be conditioned on some modification of our monetary system, or upon the conscription of finance and industry. I prefer to believe that the question asked was fair and definite. It was made clear during the course of the plebiscite debate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) made it amply clear, in his addresses on January 26 and February 25, and again in his radio addresses of April 7 and April 24, that the question meant exactly what it said, namely, that it was to give a moral right to take a course which at that time neither the government nor this house had the right to take.

My first reason for favouring the repeal of section 3 is that it constitutes a definite answer to and is the natural result of that plebiscite. That result is now well known. It might be well to put upon Hansard a few figures in connection with the vote taken on that occasion, a vote which by the way was the second largest ever taken in the history of Canada. The total vote was 4,638,847. The only other vote which was larger was that given in 1940, which surpassed this vote by approximately 43,000.

Rather than give the figures themselves I believe it might be more helpful if I gave the percentages by provinces and of the active service vote. The following figures refer to the "yes" vote:

	Per cent
Prince Edward Island	83·0
New Brunswick	69·7
Nova Scotia	78·5
Quebec	27·5
Ontario	83·8
Manitoba	79·9
Saskatchewan	71·7
Alberta	71·2
British Columbia	80·1
Yukon territory	73·1
Yellowknife	72·3
Canadian Service vote	80·5

The total was an affirmative vote of 64·2 per cent.

There is one more reason why I approve definitely of the repeal of section 3. We have heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), from the various service ministers, from the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) of the work which Canada has been doing in connection with this war. Figures have been given to us which I believe indicate that this country is doing more per capita than any other of the united nations. But when we refer to the fact that we have expended $4,000,000,000, when we refer to the tremendous increase in the manufacture of aeroplanes, when we refer to the increase in our naval forces, when we refer to the production of all the mechanized units necessary for an army, the effect is lost in the opinion of the united nations because of the fact that section 3 still stands upon our statute book. The whole atmosphere is discoloured, the whole air is contaminated because that happens to be there. For that reason I believe it should be deleted, as is proposed in the bill now before this house.

There is another reason why I favour the deletion of this section. If we in Canada could elect where this war was to be fought we would have a tremendous advantage. But we cannot. Whether it will be fought in Alaska or in Newfoundland or in the British isles is not a matter for our decision; it is a matter for the decision of the enemy. Consequently I feel that we should be free to operate in every part of the world where operation seems to be necessary for the effective prosecution of the war. Suppose the congress of the United States had passed a measure in terms equivalent to section 3 of the act. All the splendid work they are doing in the production of the machines of war would be discounted. And would we not be critical? Would we not be suggesting that that was no effort on their part; that while the machines of war are necessary, while equipment for war is essential, these machines and equipment must necessarily be manned? If the congress of the United States passed such a measure as that what would be the reaction in this country?

I have already given the official returns, but may I suggest that there is perhaps an even stronger reason for adopting the measure we are now considering. It has been proved conclusively that the people of Canada are definitely in favour of the adoption of such a measure. That being so, and parliament being the servant of the people, can we do other than follow the verdict which has been given?

I remember being in Charlottetown about three years ago on the occasion of the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Charlottetown convention of 1864. At that time I was impressed by the words on a bronze tablet, which words I imagine are familiar to most hon. members of this house. They were these:

Providence being their guide they builded better than they knew.

That was the foundation of our confederation. That was the union of the people of Canada. May I refer to my notes in order to state what I believe to be the significance of that union.

In our democratic system of government the evaluations include respect for special interests of groups and of minorities. This results in a balanced compromise which leads to the widest general agreement attainable. It was what John Stuart Mill called the greated good to the greatest number.

We are fighting for our existence—our very survival as a nation. What strategy of defence shall be adopted? The issue is whether the very conditions for the assertion of minority rights shall be lost or preserved. It is for the preservation of minority rights as essential constituents of our organization that we join issue with the enemy, and no group or individual has any social or political, to say nothing of constitutional, right to claim exemption from the duty inherently placed upon every citizen to give his all to preserve his own country's existence.

No minority, in any situation, in any place or at any time can claim the right to refuse to accept the legally ascertained judgment of the state as to the measures to be taken for its own salvation. It would be equivalent to a claim to a right to make that determination of strategy itself. Could any province claim to confine its own forces to its own boundaries? Or to Canada? And if not to Canada, what limitation can be placed on the decision constitutionally made? What is there in any conception of constitutionalism to give countenance to such a claim? Are we to stand on the shore till the enemy lands? Or meet him one mile, two miles, a thousand or two thousand miles, on land or sea? It is either that the strategy of preserving our state shall be confided absolutely to the majority, or that the minority shall have the right to pronounce upon all of us our own sentence of death.

My reference to the tablet in Charlottetown reminds me that perhaps we have been born in a somewhat unfortunate time. We have had to fight two wars, one to make the world safe for democracy and the other to preserve democracy in this world. But if we can pass on to our posterity the heritage which our forefathers have passed on to us, then I believe that in our day and generation we shall have done something of which we can long be proud.

Hon. W. EARL ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up the time of this house at any great length. I have listened with interest to the brief and somewhat emphatic but still uncertain utterances of the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty). I agree with him to one extent, that there is not an hon. member within sound of my voice who has any doubt as to the issue that is at stake and who does not appreciate the seriousness of it during the recent weeks. When one realizes what has happened in Libya, when one remembers what happened in the mouth of the St. Lawrence river, when one realizes that the enemy has landed on the north American continent, when one realizes that only a few minutes ago we were told that the British forces had been driven back another sixty miles in Egypt, then he should have no doubt as to the seriousness of the situation and should pause and consider what is really happening.

Never has there been an issue so clear in the minds of the people, but never has there been an issue so confused in the halls of parliament. I doubt if at this late date in the debate I can do much in the way of clarification of it, but I assure you, sir, that I shall not add to the confusion already caused by the differences of opinion that exist in the minds of some sixty-seven supporters of the government who have spoken. I am glad to find myself in full accord and unison with the eleven speakers who have spoken on this debate from His Majesty's opposition. But as one listens to the speeches coming from the other side one cannot help but think that there are almost as many different policies in the government on this important issue as there were speakers. Together the government stand before the people, but divided they speak in parliament. We have heard a great deal about the importance of cabinet solidarity and unity in the government on important issues, but in the nineteen years in which it has been my privilege to attend this house, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen, and I doubt whether you have in the many years you have been in this house, such a muddled spectacle of disunity in the government party, the very party that has kept national unity on a political parade for the last twenty-five years.

I must not let this my first opportunity pass without complimenting and congratulating those in the government ranks who have submerged, as they believe, their political fortunes, or at least what are called their political interests, in order to respond to what they believed to be the challenge of duty at this time. I cannot help but refer to the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore), who made such a brilliant speech on Friday last, a man who has followed his party for so many years but who clearly and emphatically told this house and the country that in his mature judgment his party were not taking the stand on this issue which the people of the country believed they should.

Among the ministers we see disunity. But it is most fortunate indeed that we have the three ministers of defence standing four-square and independent of the attitude of the government, and I compliment them for their stand on this important issue. I admit that in normal times such a spectacle of disunity might call for further resignations from the government, but in time of war and grave crisis, when the enemy is hammering at both our doors, there is no one in this house who would suggest or even think of it at this time.

I believe in all sincerity that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), and the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) are struggling their very best at the present time to do a job, and I was further convinced of that when I heard them speak in this debate. I should like to compliment especially the Minister of National Defence for Air, the member for Quebec South (Mr. Power). He was elected on far different slogans from those he proclaimed the other day, but with his eyes open to the effect his attitude might have on his political future he nevertheless chose to stand four-square behind our fighting men, including his own gallant son. His speech in this house last Thursday was a credit to his name, and I trust it will be an inspiration to his great old province of Quebec.

Despite the fact that the three ministers of defence have shown the way and taken their political lives in their hands, we find the remainder of the cabinet floundering and squirming, preferring to follow their leader's wait-and-see policy, refusing to look ahead. They prefer to blink at the war with one eye and wink at the ballot box with the other. I hope they will look where they are going, instead of going where they are looking.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) claims that the emphasis on conscription has distorted our whole war effort, while the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) makes the brilliant suggestion that the merits of conscription are outweighed by its demerits. No one but himself knows what he means by that, but knowing his former opinion and remembering that he was one of the out-and-out isolationists, I have little confidence in his outlook on an all-out war effort.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has a heavy burden to carry. He perhaps does not know the past history of his party as well as some of those who are playing politics more viciously, and I therefore hesitate to mention him, especially when he is not in his seat. Quite innocently, I think, he said that the voluntary method was Canada's traditional method of raising men and the method best suited to the character of the people of this country. I do not agree with him. In the midst of his toil, and with that political innocence which he has so often demonstrated, he failed, I think, to realize the implications of his statement.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) of course tells us that conscription for overseas may never be necessary. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) says that the present policy should be continued, and that conscription should not be brought into effect unless it was by a party that had no political past and no political future.

Mr. GARDINER: He did not say that.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, he did, because I heard him. One need not be surprised at this amazing utterance by a responsible minister, because while the government has been following the middle-of-the-road policy, that was the policy the Minister of Agriculture advocated before the last election.

But it was the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who made the most amazing statements on this issue. I realize that it was his first speech in this house; and I have a great respect for the hon. gentleman, who has built up for himself a very creditable record at the bar of his native province. But despite all the advantages with which he came here, no minister of justice in the nineteen years I have been in the house has ever left an important issue in more eloquent confusion than the present minister did when he concluded his speech on conscription. Indeed, had the debate concluded at that point, this indecisive government would have had to hold another plebiscite to ascertain whether we were to march forward as a British dominion or to halt as a French colony. I listened to the minister's statement that—> —our loyalty cannot be expected to be one of traditional affection and sentiment, but it is one based almost solely on a utilitarian viewpoint.

He was repeating a statement he had made in 1939 and he quoted it in this debate at page 3391 of Hansard. What a utilitarian viewpoint may mean to a lawyer I do not know. I am a farmer. It might mean cost plus ten per cent, or it might mean freedom and privileges paid for by somebody else. That might not be the meaning given to it in a court of law, but it is the meaning given to it by the farmers of my constituency. The minister went on to say:

It may be great and glorious to fight and die for the world's salvation, for the salvation of the united nations—

What are we, Mr. Speaker, but one of the united nations? Does he wish us to cease to be a member of the united nations? He went on:

—but that is a privilege of each man, a privilege he has the right to choose for himself—

That is a privilege—for the boys to fly with their loads of bombs over Libya and over Egypt, or to stand and fight with their backs to the wall at Singapore and Hong Kong—that is a pleasant privilege!

—a privilege he has the right to choose for himself; it is not a duty which citizenship imposes as an obligation correlative to the rights which citizenship guarantees as a privilege.

I have always felt that I was a Canadian citizen and also a British subject, and that as a British subject I had some duty to my king and my empire, to the British commonwealth of nations, and, to-day, to the united nations to which the minister referred, which are engaged in a fight to the death against the most terrible enemy that civilization has ever faced. How, then, can we adopt the position taken by the minister?

The Globe and Mail, whose accuracy I have no reason to doubt, though at times they have not agreed with me, also report on the same day the Minister of Justice as having said this, speaking in the house:

French-speaking Canadians have no sentimental attachment for the government of the British isles.

I do not know whether the fact that that passage does not appear in Hansard indicates that the minister does not feel that way about it. But it has been my privilege during my experience in public life to have known some of the finest French Canadians in this country, both in Ontario and in Quebec: I have talked in Montreal and Quebec to leading French Canadians, and I doubt very much the correctness of the minister's statement, despite his long residence in Quebec, that French Canadians have no sentimental attachment to the government of the British isles, or even to British imperialism, in view of the privileges which they have enjoyed and which were conferred upon them under the British flag. Thousands of French Canadians died in the last great war. Many are fighting and dying valiantly in the present war along with their Anglo-Saxon fellow-citizens. I talked not long ago in Montreal to a French Canadian who was appalled at the representation which his province had received on the floor of this house. He said, "I fought throughout the last war, and my three brothers are fighting in this war; one failed to return from Dunkirk, and another was unable to get away from Greece. I feel," he said, "that if we do not stand together now, we shall fall apart."

I realize, as one of the majority race in this country, the necessity of having tolerance at all times towards one another. But I say to my fellow-Canadians from Quebec: You have gone a long way in your efforts to dictate the policy of this dominion. We have every desire to recognize your rights, specifically with regard to your religion and your schools, guaranteed under the British North America Act; but there is nothing in that act or in the constitution of Canada since confederation which gives any minority the right to dictate the policy of the majority of the people of this dominion. I say that in all kindness, because I do not propose to say anything here or anywhere else in Canada that will hurt the feelings of that other great race of people in this dominion, the French Canadian. But I do say that it is unfair to the great French-Canadian race to have them represented as having no interest in the world conflict outside the shores of Canada, when we know, and they know, that on the result of it depends the liberty of their religion—which is no dearer to them than my religion is to me—the right of free worship, the right of free assembly. We shall not continue to enjoy these rights until we meet the realities which press so urgently for attention. But here we flounder along, trying to find a solution of a matter which the people in the country have already decided for us. It is unfortunate that, evidently for political reasons, one province should be misled and placed in an unfavourable light by those who represent her here. French-speaking Canadians have, I believe, a sentiment of sympathy with the British empire. These ministers, Mr. Speaker, fail to realize, in their pursuit of a policy which puts one province in opposition to the wishes of the rest, that minority rights are secure only so long as the minority enjoys the tolerant good will of the majority. That is a long-existent rule in this country; indeed it is a rule in any country. The majority of the people of Canada expressed themselves in favour of an all-out war effort, and the majority expect an all-out war effort. Because two-thirds of the voters in one province oppose that policy, is their will to prevail against the expressed wishes of an affirmative majority, no less emphatic, in the eight other provinces?

I have been a member of this house for some years. I believe my record shows that

I have been motivated by no feelings of intolerance, and that I have endeavoured to show good will to my friends in Quebec of another race. But I realize what we have gone through and what lies ahead of us, and I believe that we shall not meet the future successfully unless all of us stand together in the present crisis. What is the use of blowing trumpets and talking about national unity on election campaign platforms? "National unity" has been paraded up and down this country; it is the most hackneyed political phrase I know of; it has been the stock-in-trade of the Liberal party in this dominion for a quarter of a century. What is unity? What is its worth if we cannot stand together now, when almost the whole world is against us? We had better know now whether we are to be divided or not. In times of peace, when everything is going well, unity is easy. Now is the time when national unity means something more than filling ballot boxes. Now is the time when we must decide whether we shall have in future decisions by ballots or decisions by bullets. Now is the time to capitalize and utilize the "national unity" which we have been parading for the past twenty-five years, and to see whether it is to be expressed in action by every man who loves the freedom of his own faith—that freedom which my friends of Quebec have so long enjoyed—and the privileges enjoyed by his race, given to that race, after the conquest of years gone by, by the most tolerant power in the world—the British empire—and enjoyed under that flag; for under no other could they have been enjoyed so long and so securely.

Now that we are facing this crisis, I want to ask whether we are to work our own defeat by following policies of disunity. President Lincoln said during the civil war in the United States that a nation divided against itself cannot stand. Those words should echo and reecho in this building and throughout this country at the present time. As Canadians we must face the realities of war, and in such an attitude there is no place for disunity. It must be recognized that the present condition is far removed from that all-out war effort which is needed.

The only hope I can see is that those who prefer to blink at the war with one eye and wink at the ballot box with the other may eventually look where they are going rather than go where they are looking. At any rate I know that no less responsible men than the Prime Minister and his cabinet are worried about what is happening in other countries. I realize that an emissary of the government has been sent to the United States in order to improve the reports that are given out about the Canadian war effort. I know from visiting the United States occasionally that there is reason to be alarmed at the present state of Canada's one-time prestige in the great republic to the south. No doubt the Prime Minister has been concerned, as he has mentioned at different times in this house. One has only to read an editorial such as that reprinted the other day in the Toronto Globe and Mail from a United States paper, which stated:

> If the Canadian government expects to enjoy the respect of the American people it will have to impose conscription on a par with America. The Canadian government has a record of so scrupulously respecting minority rights, of coddling a pampered child so long, that failure to impose equal conscription will appear more and more as an effort on its part to place its own personal political welfare ahead of that of victory and have American people assume burdens which it should assume without further fear.

That, Mr. Speaker, is why the American people are concerned; that is why the British people are concerned—not because of the attitude of a province of this dominion, not because of the attitude of a gallant race in this dominion—I hope my friends in the province of Quebec, including the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), do not misunderstand me. The reason is that we have this everlasting search for political expediency, even in a time of crisis, which destroyed our plans for an air training scheme in 1938, which has already cost the lives of thousands of boys overseas, which has left us so that the empire does not know where we are going and the United States do not know whence we are coming. I urge that we should stop, look and listen, and awaken to the parade before the world marches by. I have heard no less a man that the late minister of justice, an honoured representative of the province of Quebec—who was, I am proud to say, a very close friend of mine for many years; I always felt at home in his office or wherever I met him—I have heard him speak in days past, and while I never heard him go quite so far as some speakers have in this debate, I recall that on one occasion he went so far as to say that this country had won a new status through a visit of the Prime Minister of Canada and himself overseas. He said: "We have all the status and sovereign right of a state in the British empire." He said: "I see in the distance only a fine silken thread binding us to the empire." He added that the silken thread was still strong, and he was reminded of how that status was secured. It was not secured by the present Prime Minister in those days when he was following his economic appeasement policies throughout the world. It was not achieved by that right hon. gentleman, the great compromiser and reconciler, whether in his own party or in international affairs. It was achieved by the blood of the boys who fought in the last war. As the late Sir Robert Borden said in 1918, "When I signed that treaty I felt the tears roll down my cheeks because I knew that I was writing the new status of Canada with the blood of the boys who sleep in Flanders' fields." "Lest we forget". How will the future prestige of this empire and the future security of this dominion be written? Will it be by the men of my riding who work behind the plough, sixteen hours a day for the fixed prices that the government has imposed on them? Will it be by the man who works in a war industry, or by the army of men carrying on a bureaucratic administration?—necessarily, I admit, in some measure. No; it will be written with the blood of the men behind the guns, and the sooner we realize that the better.

When we roll off the lines thousands and thousands of tanks and aeroplanes and turn out great numbers of machine guns and trench mortars, let us not forget that we shall need that many more men to use them if we are going to win this war. We shall probably meet with certain reverses. We shall probably have to endure some shelling of Halifax, or bombing of Vancouver island, or sinkings in the gulf of St. Lawrence, or other sporadic attacks by the enemy, but to win the war we shall have to start an offensive over where my hon. friend would not admit was any part of our defence, namely, on the western front. That is why there are more—my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) might think I was going to say something I should not; but I will say this, that the American people realize to-day that if we are going to win this war it must be won overseas in Europe, and that is why they are conscripting their men to put them in the British Isles. Is it to watch their isles in the Pacific that have been taken one by one, to watch the Aleutian islands or the Oregon coast, which was fired on the other day? No; because they realize that, as in any other fight, if we are to win we must meet the enemy on common ground.

Mr. McNIVEN: There are Canadians in both places.

Mr. ROWE: Why would you want conscription to compel a man to fight at home? Who would not fight to protect his own home? I am not speaking of the principle of conscription; it was the government of the day that brought conscription into this country.

Mr. GARDINER: Why does the hon. member not speak on it?

Mr. ROWE: If I were as clever at dodging issues as my hon. friend, that would be the reason. I will speak on it in this way, that even you who stood in the middle of the road before the election—

Mr. GARDINER: I never stand in the middle of the road.

Mr. ROWE: You have never left the middle of the road when there is any political issue at stake. But even you at this time come into this house and support conscription for home defence, while the three ministers of national defence told you plainly the other day that the only defence for Canada is where the enemy is. Let us not pussyfoot on this. Let us not camouflage the issue. Let us not follow the line of least resistance, of political expediency, the whims of someone back home that you may never have the opportunity to represent again unless you look wise and face the issue as it is.

Do the other ministers not agree with the three ministers of national defence, each of whom says the same thing—that Canada's defence is overseas? We are standing at the crossroads of our fate. We must realize that the enemy is ready to strike us if our boys over there let them pass. Those boys stand and say, "They shall not pass", but if they did pass I would like to see what sized army would stop them on the banks of the St. Lawrence. I do not think my hon. friend would prefer to fight them in Saskatchewan rather than overseas. The hour has struck; the time is long past when we should fool away the time of this house as has been done. And it is not the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) or other groups on this side that have held up this debate. We have had sixty-seven speeches from the other side of the house, and the more they talk the less one understands where the government is going. The more speeches they make the more pages they add to another chapter of the story of confusion at which Canada is becoming more and more amazed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Wait till you hear mine.

Mr. ROWE: I should not be surprised if it were better than most, but it would be even less confusing if the hon. member would come and sit over here where he should sit, with the ideas he has on this war issue.

I say in all seriousness, Mr. Speaker, that we have reached a critical point in the history of this country. I warn the government that there is a difference between rigid control of those who hinder the war effort and the persecution by a gestapo of those who criticize the government for its lack of war effort. I am not mentioning any names, but when I see my deskmate hit over the head and knocked down, and another hon. member liable to the same treatment if he is not careful, I wonder how long this situation is going to continue. I do not know as much about law as the Minister of Justice knows, but I wonder how much I could say before he would intern me. I suggest that there is a tendency in this country that might well be feared by more than the individual, because history has told us, in shocking stories of the past, that when the rights of the individual have been "gestapoed" the freedom of the press is restricted very shortly thereafter. I warn my friends of the press gallery to watch their fast pens these days, because several newspapers are vigorously condemning the government because of its war effort, or lack of it; they are wondering why the government is floundering in this way, what it is waiting for, and so on. They wonder why some of the cabinet say the enemy is overseas and our only defence is over there, while others say we must stay here and fight, while still others say they are not sure we should be in the war at all.

Is it any wonder that the people are rapidly losing confidence in our government? They are losing confidence because they expect courageous leadership in time of crisis. They are losing confidence because they expect determined action against a vicious enemy. They are losing confidence because they expect definite, clear and united purpose in a responsible government. They are losing confidence because the government required a plebiscite to tell them what to do, and more confidence because the government will not do it after being told to do it. We have never seen such a spectacle of uncertainty, confusion, distress, disunity and turmoil in a government; and this government has more members behind it than any other government since confederation. We were twitted when we asked for a national government, no doubt because the administration figured they had behind them people of every stripe of politics, as a result of the disunity which they have brought about, and which they probably felt constituted the only form of national government they could have.

In conclusion I want to say only that we are going to win this war in spite of the government. The prestige of this dominion will be upheld by our boys who have enlisted in the armed forces, God bless them; and the future status of this country will be determined by those boys, not by some glib lawyers who will tell us about it in the years to come. It will not be determined by a floundering, fearful sort of attitude, such as the government has adopted. It will not be determined by an attitude such as that of the Minister of National War Services, or that of the Minister of Agriculture. It will be determined by attitudes such as those of the hon. member for Ontario, the Minister of National Defence for Air, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services and the Minister of National Defence. This war will not be won by any single political party.

Mr. GARDINER: I thought you were not looking at the ballot boxes.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend has been watching them so long and so carefully that he cannot imagine anyone seeing anything else. I listened to the minister's speech, and I must say that it was the most political address I have heard from a minister, in time of crisis, during the last fifteen years.

Mr. GARDINER: Better go back and read it; you do not seem to know what it is all about.

Mr. ROWE: I have read it carefully, but I hardly needed to read it. I knew what it would be about before the minister delivered it. Anyone who has ever heard the minister during a campaign would know what his speech would be like. It was simply cheap, political campaign stuff, in a time of crisis.

Mr. GARDINER: But my speeches get better results than yours did in Ontario.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, and the minister has mentioned that before. I do not have to hide behind any of my past glories, and I am sorry to say that is what the minister is now doing. I say this war will not be won by the Liberal party, nor will it be won by the Conservative party, or by the English-speaking people of this dominion, or by the French Canadians. It will be won by every race and creed and class in this dominion standing firmly together, not only to save Canada so that in future we may sing "O Canada", but that we may sing:

> God save our king and heaven bless
> The maple leaf forever.

My hon. friend laughs. This war will be won by those who appreciate and understand that the privileges and rights they have enjoyed in the past have been given them by that very power, now threatened, the British commonwealth of nations, which forms part of the united nations, standing with that half of our civilization that believes in defending freedom instead of surrendering it as other countries did who thought it was not their duty to go beyond their shores until the enemy invaded them.

Mr. H. B. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, we have heard many excellent speeches during this debate, covering practically all the important points, and with few exceptions those who have spoken have been very considerate and tolerant of the viewpoints of others. We often look back and think how outstanding were the fathers of confederation, how tolerant and understanding they were, with vision that has brought Canada to the position she occupies to-day. But when everything is considered I believe the speech of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) last Friday shows that we still have giants among us, and the future of Canada is well assured as long as we have men of that calibre in the public life of this country.

As I see it, this bill is simply the legal completion of the recent plebiscite. Ordinarily it would be more or less a routine matter, but in view of certain developments it has been given a position of importance that few of us could have imagined a short time ago. The bill has been thoroughly discussed; all points in connection with it have been well brought out, and I see no reason to discuss it further. There are a few remarks I should like to make, however, which might be of material benefit to the welfare of the country and to the war effort as a whole.

Between Fort William and Winnipeg there is a territory covering some 430 miles in which as yet this government has not seen fit to establish any war industries. The government would be well advised to take a leaf out of the book of Russia and establish industries in that territory, which is practically the geographical centre of Canada, because they would be as far away from any possible military action as they could be placed in Canada.

I should like to commend the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) upon his approval of employer-employee council. That is an excellent idea, and it was only recently that Mr. E. M. Little strongly endorsed the minister's stand. Mr. Little on that occasion said he did not believe all the brains of the country were in the front office. With that I thoroughly agree. Not only should we make use of all the physical abilities of our citizens, but we should use their mental abilities also. With the establishment of these councils we will go a long way toward assisting to put our war effort on an all-out basis. The government should go further and insist that the councils be established in at least the war industries of the country.

There are many matters affecting my constituency I should like to discuss, but I do not believe such discussion would be proper in this debate. There will be other appropriate occasions on which matters of vital importance to my constituency may be brought up. I would point out, however, that the people of Kenora-Rainy River voted thirteen to one in favour of the plebiscite. There never was any question in my mind as to what they would do, if given an opportunity. They have given every possible assistance in the war effort.

Voluntary enlistments from my constituency in this war, as in the last one, are exceptionally high and compare favourably with those of any other part of Canada. The people of Kenora-Rainy River have subscribed heavily to recent loans. When they voted thirteen to one in the affirmative there could be no doubt in my mind as to the meaning they meant to convey. I am definitely in favour of national selective service, and I propose to vote in support of the bill. I should prefer to vote on the details in connection with conscription, but I well realize it may be impossible to give the house an opportunity to do so. Therefore I concede that the government should have the right by order in council to bring in conscription at such time as they deem it necessary. No man, no body of men, no newspaper, in my opinion has the necessary information upon which to base an opinion as to when the conscription of man-power should take place. That would be a duty for the government to perform.

As has been pointed out by various ministers, there are many activities, including agricultural development and the production of munitions, which go to make up our total contribution to the war effort. Only the government know the extent of what has been done, and because of that they are the only body in a position to know when a policy of conscription should be made effective.

Speaking a few days ago, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) pointed out that a shortage of man-power was definitely possible. In that he is no doubt correct. I believe, however, that there is plenty of man-power employed in non-essential work which could and should be used in our war effort. Let none of us have any illusions about what we are up against. As I see it, this is a war of extermination. Either we win or we go down where there will be no future for the people of this country. It takes very little thought on my part to decide the proper course, because we have no choice. The issue is as clear as it can be. We either go all-out in fighting our enemies wherever they may be found, or we wait until it is too late.

My family have not waited. All who could go have gone, and I am like-minded. The people generally in the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River feel that no price is too great to pay for what has to be done.

May I make one suggestion? If and when the government decides that conscription is necessary, I suggest it should set a date, by proclamation or otherwise after which no more volunteers will be accepted. All enlistments from then on should be on a selective service basis. In my opinion that would be fair both to the individual and to the country generally.

Mr. M. J. EDWARDS (Calgary West): Let me say at the outset that I am wholeheartedly in favour of the bill, and will vote for it. My interest in the subject matter of the bill goes back to the evening of September 3, 1939, when I, in common with my fellow Canadians, heard the fateful news over the radio at four o'clock in the morning, mountain time, that Germany had invaded Poland.

How well do I remember the emotions I experienced, which completely changed my thinking processes! For be it known that at that hour on that morning I was laboriously preparing a speech I had expected to deliver in a by-election to be held in September in the constituency of Calgary West. My reaction to the news was such that every partisan or political thought I had entertained was completely obliterated. Matters which seemed of paramount consideration in connection with the winning of the by-election paled into insignificance before the awful thought that our empire was at war. I for one never doubted that my country, my Canada, would take up the sword in defence of liberty and freedom, and against dictatorship and oppression.

A by-election was held in September and I felt so keenly about what had taken place that on the morning of September 3 I wired the government and gave it as my considered opinion that I should withdraw from the by-election to make way for the Conservative candidate in a seat which with one exception had been Conservative from its inception. This was the seat of none other than the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett. It was somewhat of a disappointment, a blow to personal aspirations, but I felt that under the existing circumstances it was the right thing to do, despite the fact that my supporters might misunderstand and my political enemies misconstrue the reasoning behind my decision. A Conservative was returned again from Calgary West. But I was justified in the sacrifice, if you will, which I made at that time, by subsequently being honoured by the same people in the spring of 1940 with their endorsation and election to this house. One of the things uppermost in my mind at that time was the realization that the people of Canada, and particularly the political leaders of Canada, would not wish to be confronted, when they were making up their minds as to what stand they should take in this world conflict, by the lesser consideration as to whether or not there should be the conscription of man-power for overseas service.

I could not help but recall the feelings by which I was actuated when at the time of the last war I did everything I could to gain admission to the fighting services. For the life of me I cannot understand any red-blooded Canadian of military age not having the promptings which I experienced at that time and the desire to go out and fight for his king and country. I have little sympathy with the individual who justifies his refusal to serve as is commonly done these days, on the ground that some other fellow will get his job, that some other young man has not done his part or has not offered to do his part, or that some other section or class, or creed if you will, is not doing its fair share. This is the greatest crisis that has ever confronted mankind, and there can be no such thing as equality of service or sacrifice. Nothing that I can do or give can weigh against the sacrifice of that friend of mine and yours who lays down his life for Canada and the cause for which we fight? There has been a lot of false reasoning and false logic spread abroad in our land to the effect that this is a war for the defence of Canada or the defence of the British empire. I do not believe that the gallant lads whom I knew and whom I taught at school, the men with whom I grew up and have been associated in later years, are in this fight solely for the defence of any particular part of the terrestrial globe, let alone any of that part of the globe which is generally shown in pink and labelled in black letters "Canada."

Surely there is something finer and grander than the defence of a piece of ground. I believe the Canadian people, and certainly the brave lads who wear uniforms, whether they are serving in the air, on land or on the sea, feel that there is something greater at stake. What is it? The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated what I trust we all believe to be true—that the real issue in this struggle is our way of life and living; it is democracy versus dictatorship; it is freedom and liberty versus slavery. To put this struggle on any other plane is to belittle the objectives and the issues for which we are fighting. Surely we are not in this war merely to defend Canada. Surely the members of this house and the people of Canada realize that if you took all the man-power and all the production of which this country is capable in the way of munitions, food and everything else, there would not be sufficient to defend Canada successfully against the aggressor nations, any more than it would be possible for one prairie farmer to protect his farm against the onslaught of a prairie fire. This is a world on fire, and we are committed to something greater, to something finer, and I trust to something grander, than merely the defence of our own country.

People fight against things. We are fighting against dictatorship, world domination and slavery. We are not fighting for any thing, place or possession; we work for a better world; we fight against that which would destroy it. Men and women the world over will put forth their best efforts when it is realized that they are fighting against something, not fighting for something.

I should say at the outset that as a theory and as a principle of war policy, I have favoured compulsory selective service not only with respect to man-power but with respect to every resource this country possesses. I realize, however, that not until the national resources mobilization bill was introduced was there a decided opposition to that principle in certain sections of the country. Theoretically I do not see how a democracy can wage total war without recourse to that principle, but in practice I recognize the difficulties of applying it in Canada, by reason of views and opinions held with regard to it by many others.

Be it said that conscription was not an election issue in 1940 in my constituency. There was, however, later, a group in Calgary, to which the Prime Minister has adverted on other occasions in favour of compulsory military service, and it was in that city that he first encountered an organized demand for conscription for overseas service. At that time I felt, and I believe the people of Calgary still feel, that the meetings which were then organized were largely called together by a political pressure group which was endeavouring at that time to sow political discord and disharmony and bring the government of the day into disrepute. There were others, however, and of this I am certain, who were greatly concerned and agitated lest their loved ones overseas should be unsupported.

I for one welcomed the introduction of the plebiscite. I worked during that campaign and was not a little pleased that my constituency, despite handicaps imposed by war restrictions with respect to transportation facilities, and the fact that nobody's political "hide" was at stake, turned out and voted to the number of 19,715 persons as compared with 19,798 persons at the general election. In other words the number of voters was only eighty-three short of the number of voters there had been at the general election in the spring of 1940. Of those who voted, 17,612 voted affrmative, 1,976 negative, and there were 127 spoiled ballots. During that campaign I stated what I then and theretofore believed and still believe to be the democratic, the fair, the just, the ideal and perfect way of mobilizing our resources, including our man-power, namely, by compulsory selective service. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to read a few paragraphs from the statement I gave to the press just before the plebiscite was taken:

> As a government policy, I believe in compulsory selective service or conscription. As an individual citizen neither you nor I are called upon by this plebiscite to declare whether or not we believe in conscription for overseas service NOW. The best opinion, that is the opinion of those who are charged with the responsibility of conducting this phase of our war effort, say that conscription is not necessary AT THIS TIME but that emergencies may arise at any time when it may be necessary to resort to compulsion, and it is in anticipation of such an emergency that parliament, and by that I mean the representatives of every political party, is asking that it be released from this promise.

And I gave three reasons why they should vote:

> 1. You are not called on by this plebiscite to declare whether or not you believe in conscription for overseas service.
> 2. You are not called on to vote for or against the government.
> 3. You are not called on to decide any question other than whether the government should be free to adopt any policy that may become necessary to ensure victory.

Then I concluded my statement with these two paragraphs:

> To refuse to vote or to vote "no" is to declare in effect that no matter what emergency may face the country no one should be compelled under any circumstances to defend Canada in any field of action beyond the limits of this dominion, that no one should be called on to strike a blow for his country until the enemy has landed or is about to land on its shores.
> I urge all thoughtful Canadians that they should by an overwhelming affirmative vote put their representatives in a position to be free to act and urge the adoption of whatever methods or measures may be required to attain victory in the uncertain and perilous days which lie ahead.

I am grateful and pleased that my electors, my friends, the people of Calgary West, have released me from any pledge, though indeed I needed no release from any pledge except that which was impliedly given by me as a supporter of this government in regard to that one phase of Canada's war effort.

The plebiscite having passed, may I say that there will be nothing but resentment, if this government gives my constituents cause for believing that it entertains any idea of retreating from the position which it took at the outset, that this war is more than a war for the defence of Canada, that it is in very truth a war for an ideal, a war for the defence of democracy and freedom, a war for our way of life and of living. I was proud as a Canadian to learn that not only the people of my constituency but the people of Canada generally voted overwhelmingly to release the government from its commitment as embodied in clause 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, to delete which the present bill has been introduced. This bill will, as I believe the people of Canada wish it to do, remove the last and only legislative restriction upon our all-out war effort.

I for one cherish the thought and the hope that never again in the political history of this fair dominion will any statesman feel called upon or obliged to make a promise such as, unquestionably, the leaders of the three major political parties made at the outset of this war. From now on the government has a clear mandate to take any and every action which in its considered opinion is calculated to increase in strength and effectiveness the power of this nation, working in the closest cooperation possible with every other nation having the same objectives.

To my hon. friends from Quebec may I say that the people of western Canada, at least in that part of it in which I have lived for the last thirty years, and especially the men of my age and generation find it extremely difficult to appreciate or understand, or even to view with tolerance, the attitude and ideas to which we have listened in this house. I have been much agitated and, indeed, nonplussed for months to try to discover the causes which lie behind the feeling and views to which we have listened during the last month or six weeks in the debate on this bill. Surely, my French-Canadian friends, you do not appreciate or understand the significance of what is going on in the world about you. Why should you be so alert and so anxious to defend our own country when perforce, by modern means of transportation, London and Liverpool, France and even Germany are closer to you than British Columbia or even parts of my province? And it is there the enemy should and, please God, will be destroyed.

I want to pay tribute to one man in this house from Quebec who, to my way of thinking, has given us an outstanding example of singleness of purpose and devotion to the call of conscience and duty in the speech which he delivered here on Friday last. I refer to the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). I am sure that the people throughout the length and breadth of Canada will applaud his actions and his words, which can be likened only to those of another great leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who came from his province and who was willing, at a time of national peril, to take his political future in his hands, vote according to the dictates of his conscience, and govern his actions accordingly.

By any standard, whether of men, money or munitions, Canada's war effort has been adjudged good. The sole question which should concern this house and the Canadian people is, can it be made better, more efficiently effective? Mere size, bulk or numbers, whether of persons, munitions, money or other things, means little in this day and generation when pitted against skill, science and knowledge.

The government has asked to be relieved of its promise. The people of Canada have answered most emphatically that it should be so relieved. I believe that the future conduct of this war can safely be entrusted to the members of the cabinet, headed by our worthy Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have, and I believe the world has, confidence in the Prime Minister; confidence, not only in his judgment, but in his singleness of purpose and his anxious desire that this country shall take its proper place among the nations of the world and do its utmost in the struggle. We have confidence in our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley); in our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe); in our Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner); and in our three national defence ministers. Is there any doubt or misgiving, on the part of anyone who has followed the careers of these hon. gentlemen in the house and before the public, as to their determination that this nation shall put forth the maximum of which it is capable? Theirs will be the decision. They have asked to be empowered; and I for one, not only reflecting the views of my constituents but giving expression to my personal convictions, am satisfied that they will never shrink from their clear duty, nor pause in their efforts until this country is making its maximum war effort.

As a school boy I learned this verse which has stuck with me throughout the years. I believe they are the words of a great Nova Scotian statesman and patriot, and I commend them to the consideration of this house as an ideal which should animate and inspire every loyal Canadian. I think it goes like this:

Inheritors of glory! O countrymen we swear
To guard the flag that o'er thee
Shall onward Victory bear.
Where e'er through earth's far regions
Its triple crosses fly,
For God, for home, our kinsmen
Shall win, or fighting die.

With that as our objective, with that as our motto, this country cannot fail.

Mr. J. E. S. EMMANUEL d'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I opposed the plebiscite bill because I believed that such a measure would lead to conscription for overseas service, as later events have borne out. During a memorable meeting held in my constituency on April 16 last, I declared that perhaps within two weeks of the plebiscite vote, provided it were affirmative, a measure would be introduced in the House of Commons calling for conscription for overseas service. And I was right. As a matter of fact on May 10, Bill No. 80 appeared on the order paper and the house was thereby requested to strike out section 3 of the 1940 mobilization act, thus extending compulsory service to overseas. That is the measure we are now discussing, Mr. Speaker.

When I had the honour of being elected as member for Rimouski in 1917, I gave the undertaking that I would oppose any conscription measure submitted to parliament, whatever government were in power. In 1940, the voters of Rimouski again did me the honour of choosing me as their representative. I gave them my solemn pledge that I would even break with my party if that party undertook to enforce conscription for overseas service. Indeed, and I wish to repeat this, I vigorously opposed the plebiscite bill when it was introduced in the house. I voted against it because I believed that it merely served to mask the evil face of conscription. As I have said, events bore me out.

Mr. Speaker, I must adhere to the stand I had previously taken and declare from the very outset that I shall vote against Bill No. 80 because this measure is synonymous with conscription for overseas service. In my humble opinion, the present government is acting even more dangerously than that of 1917 because it desires to introduce conscription not only with the concurrence of the people's representatives but at its own discretion by order in council. In 1917, the union government introduced a conscription bill for overseas service and the measure was discussed for three weeks. Well do I recall the titanic struggle then waged by two regretted leaders of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. We sat night and day to try to prevent the passing of that bill. That is why I wonder at the moment why the Liberal party which has endeavoured for the last twenty-five years, particularly in my province, to show that it was irrevocably opposed to conscription, now wishes to introduce a conscription measure, and that by order in council. As I stated a moment ago, Mr. Speaker, I opposed conscription in 1917 and I do so again to-day. I deeply regret that it should be the Liberal party that wishes to saddle us with this coercive legislation in 1942. You may be sure that the people of my province, the people of Quebec, are surprised, to say the least, at the Liberal government's present stand.

I followed attentively the speeches delivered by hon. members who spoke before me this afternoon. They seemed mainly to assail the attitude of the province of Quebec. Even if Quebec did cast a negative vote on the plebiscite, a close study of the figures for the other provinces shows that some six to seven hundred thousand negative votes were cast. The province of Quebec seems to be the bugbear of certain hon. members of this house. Yet I think that since the outbreak of the war, Quebec has contributed her full share and continues to do so. During the last war two Victoria Crosses were awarded to soldiers from my constituency. Which goes to show, Mr. Speaker, that the constituency of Rimouski is not peopled by cowards and poltroons. Jean Brillant and Joseph Keable were volunteers who fought overseas. They must have proved outstandingly brave since the Victoria Cross is the highest decoration awarded by His Majesty the King. At the present time, Rimouski has a training camp where even farmers' sons report for military service and also an air force training centre at Mont Joli. I therefore feel our citizens are doing their duty and that the criticisms levelled at the province of Quebec are no more warranted in the case of Rimouski than in the case of other constituencies.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said about national unity. It seems that Quebec is always expected to sacrifice everything for the sake of national unity. In our Canadian confederation Quebec secured some rights which she intends to uphold. We insist that they be recognized. We are being asked continuously to ensure national unity and to that end it is we who must always yield, who must forego the rights guaranteed us by confederation. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, my province has done her full share in the Canadian confederacy and we of Quebec should not be alone in forsaking our privileges. We must all do our part if we wish to remain united.

In the interest of Canada's defence, I would agree to every sacrifice. We are told that this country will be better defended overseas. The assertion has never been proved. Our country is open to attacks by Germany or Japan on both our coasts and I fear that the government has not devoted sufficient time to the organization of our defences. Yet we have before us Australia's sad experience. Her shock troops fought in Greece and elsewhere and when Australia was attacked, she had to beg for help from the United States. I consider that Canada's war effort has been adequate so far and, as I was saying, I have always opposed coercive methods of dispatching troops overseas. My electors have given me a mandate which I will fulfil by voting against Bill No. 80.

In my opinion, the government has introduced this bill as a sop to the extremist faction in this country. Speeches are delivered in this house by members who will never have to go to war, who have no children, and who, like certain Toronto people, only see in conscription an avenue leading to larger profits. The province of Quebec will be the most affected by conscription for overseas service, because of her larger families. I myself come from a family of fifteen children, which included twelve sons. Families of eight, nine or ten sons are by no means scarce in my constituency. If this conscription bill passes, it will affect us more than the rest of Canada. Moreover, Canada has a population of only 11,000,000. Has not Canada's war effort been adequate so far as compared with that of more populous countries?

This bill is not justified and the government has not, to my mind, been released from its commitments or pledges of 1940. The late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe declared in this house: "Never will the province of Quebec submit to conscription". That was the agreement entered into at the time of the declaration of war. With Mr. Lapointe, the ministers who represented the province of Quebec stated: "We will participate in the war on condition that conscription for overseas service is never enforced". The province of Quebec voted for the upholding of the pledges given, and moreover a large number of people in other sections did the same, as I said a moment ago. For twenty-five years, the Liberal party has conducted all its election campaigns, not only in the dominion but in the provincial field, on a "no conscription" platform. As I have said, it sought to give, especially to the province of Quebec, the impression that the Liberal party was the only one opposed to conscription. After placing our confidence in the present Prime Minister who, with the help of Mr. Lapointe and all the members from Quebec, was chosen in 1919 to succeed Sir Wilfrid Laurier, I wonder whether it cannot be considered a betrayal of our province to seek to introduce a measure involving conscription for overseas service, in spite of the verdict given on April 27 last.

In politics as in anything else, Mr. Speaker, one must abide by one's pledges. In 1940, every political party was against conscription. The people returned this government with the largest majority ever obtained in our history. It is not enough to claim that conditions have changed. Conditions may have changed but the pledges remain. I for one cannot see any reason for supporting the bill now before the house. It is all well and good for certain hon. members of this house, as I said before, to urge conscription when they will not themselves take part in the war and when they have no sons of military age. As regards our war effort, the province of Quebec has answered the call voluntarily and perhaps much better than certain other provinces of the dominion, and I cannot understand why some hon. members of this house find it impossible to speak without criticizing the province of Quebec.

There is no cause to defend the province of Quebec. She is doing her duty just as she has done in the past. She acquitted herself well in 1917. She has discharged her obligations from 1939 to this date, and this incessant carping on her war effort should cease. I for one criticize no other province. However, as a citizen of Quebec, I have a perfect right to protest strongly against the insinuations of cowardice and ill-will directed against my province by some hon. members.

The province of Quebec is as loyal to her king as she is to the country and I claim for my part that my fellow citizens' first loyalty is to Canada. My motto is that of Sir Wilfrid Laurier: "Canada first, Canada always and Canada only." It sounds fine to say that we should meet the enemy wherever he may be. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, in a struggle such as this, where millions of men are locked in battle, where mechanized forces, tanks and planes are of supreme importance, why run the risk of disturbing the peace of this country by sacrificing through a conscription measure for overseas service between two and three hundred thousand men to the enemy's land and aerial onslaught. Infantry will not be the deciding factor in this war. It has been shown to date that victory will be won through tanks and aeroplanes. I therefore repeat that it would be a national crime to enact this law of conscription at the risk of destroying national unity, in order to raise perhaps two or three thousand men to be sent overseas as cannon fodder. This war will not be won by masses of men. While millions and millions of men are now taking part in the conflict, the present war is chiefly a mechanized one where tanks and aeroplanes will finally decide the issue.

I believe that the government has been ill-advised. Moreover it has no mandate to impose conscription for overseas service. It has not been released from its commitments. Not only did the province of Quebec refuse to release the government from its pledges against conscription, but there were at least six or seven hundred thousand Canadian citizens in other provinces who voted likewise. When speaking on the plebiscite, I stated that I had faith in my leader and in his cabinet. I must say that I have now lost that faith. I truly believed that I could trust the Prime Minister of Canada. I said that if he remained at the helm, I would continue to place my confidence in him, but that I would give no blank cheque to any member of the cabinet.

Unfortunately, he is and has been in bad company ever since the demise of that great Canadian, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe who was his mainstay and counsellor. Since then I have seen a change come over our Prime Minister. He is surrounded by conscriptionists and imperialists and is subjected to their influence. This accounts for the fact that less than a fortnight after the plebiscite vote, he unhesitatingly introduced bill 80 which is synonymous with conscription for overseas service.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not dwell further on the matter. I merely wished to express my feelings frankly as is my custom. I was elected on the strength of a certain programme and I have never deceived my electors. As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, I saw in the plebiscite a mask behind which lurked the hideous features of conscription. I was right. At a meeting held prior to the 27th, I stated correctly that two weeks after the plebiscite vote we would have a bill introducing conscription. And that is just what happened.

I cannot close my remarks Mr. Speaker, without congratulating the former Minister of Public Works and of Transport (Mr. Cardin). I am going to speak frankly; I like to be frank. I did not like his speeches on the plebiscite. He is a wonderful speaker, but those of his speeches I heard did not please me; however, he was just as sincere as when he spoke in this house after he had decided to resign from the cabinet. He has devoted his life to politics and represented his race and his province with honour in the commons. There are some who say: "He should have spoken that way before the plebiscite." Perhaps he should have, but it is never too late to mend. There is forgiveness for every sin, and this is even truer in his case because although he was at the head of two government departments he had the courage to resign and to express himself forthrightly in this house. I wish to congratulate him. He is worthy of Ernest Lapointe, he is worthy of all those great French-Canadian Liberals of my province who have sat in this house. He is worthy of Laurier.

His was the crowning gesture of a splendid career. As I was saying a little while ago, I wish those speeches had been made before the plebiscite, but in any event he was sincere. He too had faith in the government. Having been deceived, he had enough courage to resign.

Mr. Speaker, I will not labour the point. Again, I do not beat about the bush; when I want to say something, I come out and say it. I was a member of this house from 1917 to 1925, and have been from 1940 to this day, and each time I have spoken in this parliament I have said what I thought and have said it in French. I have always honoured the French language.

Mr. Speaker, the little calendar that you see on the table of the house was unilingual when I rose in this house for the first time. If you will look at it now, you will find that it is bilingual. The Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux was then speaker of the house and in the course of a speech I chanced to glance at that calendar. I then asked Mr. Lemieux, who was a patriot, why that little calendar was not bilingual. I told him: "Why don't you have it made bilingual?" Two days later, it was done. Mere details perhaps, yet very important ones from the French Canadian point of view.

When Americans or Englishmen visit the House of Commons and notice this small calendar printed in two languages, they naturally conclude that Canada is a bilingual country. I do not think there is any doubt of it. As I said before, we must uphold the rights granted to us by the constitution. I sat in this house from 1917 to 1925 and I was returned again in 1940. I could speak in English, but as I have the right to speak French I shall continue to do so.

I remember that in 1924 Mr. Justice Joseph Archambault, then member for Chambly-Verchères moved a resolution asking that French speeches be translated into English on the day following their utterance in the house. Before then the view was held that French speeches were of very little importance. Practically no one could understand them and they were translated into English some twelve months later. I do not blame my colleagues in this house for speaking English, especially the French Canadian members of the cabinet who must make themselves understood without delay, but if we are to follow the policy of never speaking French in the house solely because some members might not understand us immediately, I wonder what will become of the French tongue in this country. For my part, as long as I enjoy the high honour of representing my constituency, I shall always speak French. Once again, I do not blame my French-Canadian colleagues, and friends, who occasionally speak in English, especially our cabinet ministers. But I have followed a different policy ever since entering the house and I intend to stick to it.

Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to speak at such length. Before concluding I wish to state that I shall never allow any hon. member of this house, irrespective of party, to attack, unchallenged, the province of Quebec. I shall always rise to answer, for I am proud of my constituency and of my province. I conclude by restating my opposition to Bill No. 80. I shall vote against this measure purporting to strike out section 3 of the mobilization act of 1940, which would mean conscription for overseas service.

Mr. DOUGLAS G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been a long one and there has been a great deal of repetition, but I feel it my duty to say a few words. The house and the country know exactly where I stand on this issue because I made it abundantly clear when I spoke on the plebiscite. One thing that is certain is that when the House of Commons passes this bill it will mean that the government can enforce conscription. There was never any doubt in my mind about the issue at stake in the plebiscite. The plebiscite was introduced for a definite reason, and that reason was whether men should be conscripted for overseas service. I was opposed to the plebiscite because I felt that the government should have obtained their freedom from parliament. I thought it was putting the cart before the horse, and at that time I said, as reported on page 196 of Hansard:

> What do the government hope to gain by a plebiscite? At best the government get a respite of two or three months. Meantime there is all kinds of turmoil. When the three months are up there will be the same pressure for action. This proposal of a plebiscite is an affront to the rights of parliament and an undeserved reflection on the people of this country, of whatever race or creed, if the proposal carries, it will not get rid of the controversy, and it will leave uncertainty as to future action; if it fails to carry, our troops will be abandoned to the uncertainties of voluntary enlistment. In either case the country is humiliated and disgraced.

How right I was. Before the plebiscite bill passed, there was turmoil in this House of Commons, and since then the country has been disrupted by controversy and recriminations. I said at that time that there was no necessity to split the country in two because parliament could have given the government its freedom. The vote in my riding was a great credit to the sincerity of the people as far as the war effort was concerned. There was no doubt in their minds as to what they were voting on. There was an overwhelming majority in my riding in favour of compulsory service anywhere in the world. The vote was 92·6 per cent "yes", and I think a good many voters voted "no" in the belief that they were going to put the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government on the spot. Otherwise I think the affirmative vote would have been much greater. I should like to pay a tribute to those people who worked so hard in the plebiscite campaign. One thing they had to overcome was what I have just mentioned, the fact that there were so many people, including soldiers, who thought that by voting "no" they could put the Prime Minister and the government on the spot.

I do not like the method we are using to impose conscription. I think we should adopt the method being used in the United States; that is, call men up by lot and give them plenty of time to get ready. The people of the United States are quite proud of their draft army, and no slurs are cast upon the men as is done in this country. I wonder why such slurs are cast on men who are called up? I do not think the selectees in the United States are particularly better fellows; I do not think they are any worse than the members of our volunteer army. I am proud of our volunteer army. I should like to refer briefly to the remarks of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), and I quote from page 3278 of Hansard as follows:

> Who can raise his voice in this house and say that the province of Quebec has been lacking in cooperation with the rest of Canada in every activity, in war as well as in any other line of endeavour? We have been doing our share every moment, in every crisis, in every difficult time that confronted Canada. We have measured up to the standard. But we have never been able, even to this moment, to know definitely how many French Canadians have enlisted in English-speaking regiments.

The other day a return was brought down which partly answers the hon. member's question as to how many French Canadians from Quebec have enlisted voluntarily in the army, the navy and the air force. According to this return, 36,235 French Canadians from Quebec have enlisted in the army, the navy and the air force; a total of 29,651 enlisted in the army; 1,474 in the navy, and 5,110 in the air force. That answered his question. Those figures speak for themselves.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am sorry; I have not much time.

Mr. McDONALD (Pontiac): My question was—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The hon. member can make his speech some other time. I am speaking now.

Again, as reported at page 3277 of Hansard, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères said:

> There is no necessity at the present time to impose such a measure.

How does he know that there is no necessity? How does any hon. member know? Why did we take the plebiscite? Why did the three defence ministers rise in their places the other day and speak as they did? Are we to suppose that they did not know what they were talking about? Further on he said:

> There is no haste to proceed with such an important measure, which is likely, in the words of the Prime Minister, and in the words of the leader of the opposition as well, to destroy the good understanding which has been established between the two races in Canada for the last forty or fifty years, through troubled hours and difficult days, by the leaders of all parties and those who have taken part in the public life of Canada.

Who has been responsible, I would ask, for the lack of good understanding? Then he went on to say:

> Wait for the necessity to arise.

Wait, I suppose, until Hitler is on your doorstep. Let us wait, he says, for the need to present itself. Wait, I suppose, until Hitler comes up the St. Lawrence. The hon. member continued:

> Then we shall be in a position to judge according to circumstances what course Canada should follow, what policy Canada should adopt.

I have already pointed to the controversy which has already taken place over conscription, and the hon. member would have us go through all that again, bring in another bill like this and have hundreds of speeches all over again. That is not reasonable, Mr. Speaker. There is no logic in it.

Wait until the enemy comes up the St. Lawrence river, and then what will happen? If the enemy ever gets up the St. Lawrence river, there will be an uprooting of those roots deeply embedded in the soil of the province of Quebec for 300 years. And not only that; there are other citizens of this country who have roots deeply embedded in the soil, just as much as French Canadians have. We have been in Ontario for a long time, and we do not want our roots uprooted. We think the front line is over there in Britain, and that is where it is.

I wish to quote a few words from the speech of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), who, as reported at page 3413 of Hansard, said:

> To come to the armed forces themselves, how could conscription for service overseas help the air force?

It certainly would not hurt it. Some of the draftees could be picked out for the air force. Some of the draftees would apply to go into the air force. That would be all right; it would not hurt the air force. The minister went on:

> We could not conscript young men to fly and expect them to be the flyers that we have, fighting in the skies over every battlefront in the world, with no superiors anywhere in the world. No airman can be compelled to fly; he must have the will to do so. It could not be otherwise. The whole of the Royal Air Force is composed of volunteers.

But the air force in the United States is not entirely built up on a voluntary basis. Some of their men have been chosen from the selective service draft, and they do not make such bad flyers. The minister went on to say:

> The situation is quite similar with regard to the navy. I am quite certain that the work of the Canadian navy, with its great devotion to duty, with the wonderful record of troop ships convoyed without the loss of a single man, could not have been carried out in the same efficient manner if it had not been done by volunteers.

I think it is marvellous to have a volunteer navy, but there is no reason in the world why a man who was called up under a selective service system could not apply to go into the navy and be accepted. The minister went on:

> The only place, therefore, for conscription, if it is of any value at all, is in connection with our army. There, too, I am convinced that it would not make for as effective an army as the Canadian overseas army is at the present time.

If these men called up for service anywhere in the world would be no good for the air force, no good for the navy, and no good for the army overseas, why are they called up for home defence? Is the Minister of National War Services satisfied to have the men that he is calling up now serving on home defence, to defend our women and children in the case of necessity? I think the minister's remark is a slur on these men who are called up, and I would like to see that slur erased.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) says that we must keep our factories going; that we must keep on producing; that we must have a balanced programme. Certainly we must do that. But does he realize that Great Britain has just called up another 100,000 men from industry, to be drafted into the army, and that these men are to be replaced in industry by women? We still have in this country a great reservoir of potential women workers. And not only that, but if we get down to a proper system of rationing for most of our non-essentials, there will be many more people, men and women, available for work in essential industries. Further —and I draw this to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley)—it might make the bitter pill of increased taxation a little easier to swallow if we had such rationing. If the people could not buy these non-essentials, they would not spend the money and would have it available to pay in taxes.

I was interested in hearing the address given in this house by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). As reported at page 3692 of Hansard, he said:

> We budgeted to increase our forces—the members are all familiar with the details—from 27,000 men now in the navy to 40,000 by March of next year.

Then he went on to say, and I do not quote him fully:

> So that the total budget of our man-power by March next is 615,000 men for all the armed forces.

If you are going to budget, you have to find the men to fill your budget, and how are you going to get these men unless you go about it in a proper, businesslike way? These men should be called up two, three, four, five, six, seven or eight months ahead of the time they are required to report. Choose them by lot, and let them know ahead of time when they will be required to report so that they can make their preparations accordingly.

The hon. member for Parry Sound, in criticizing the Military Service Act in force in the last war, said, as reported at page 3695 of Hansard:

> We were to have 70,000 men by the end of December, 1917, but at the end of March, 1918, we had only 26,000. While the figures show that 61,000 were obtained as a result of that compulsion during the whole period up to armistice day, November 11, during the same period 101,000 men enlisted voluntarily.

But, Mr. Speaker, those 101,000 men who voluntarily enlisted did so under the shadow of conscription. That is what happened.

There is no doubt about it that the front line is overseas, in the fortress of Britain. I should like to quote these words from the Prime Minister's speech, as reported in Hansard, at page 3243:

> It is perfectly clear that the enemy will have to be destroyed overseas if this continent is not to be the field of the final conflict, or possibly even an immediate field of conflict, with Canada the scene of the first invasion.

These are potent words. They are the pith picked out of the two-hour pussy-footing speech made by the Prime Minister. Do you believe those words? Let us go to the ministers of national defence for corroboration. The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) minced no words in his speech. He said that the result of the plebiscite was an overwhelming mandate for conscription. And then he remarked as reported at page 3509 of Hansard:

> A wayfarer plans to journey along a road, and on his map he sees a point where that road branches or forks in two directions. Across one of these branches is an insurmountable barrier, and he says, "When I reach that fork I wish to have freedom to take either branch. Therefore remove the barrier, so that I may have freedom to travel as I think best. I cannot say at this moment which road I shall take. That decision will be made when I reach the junction, and will depend on several factors, some of which are entirely beyond my control."

The minister knows we have reached the barrier, or we shall reach it very shortly, and he is far-sighted enough to see that we cannot afford to wait. We must do our utmost. We must now take the step.

If you read carefully the speech of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), you will find that he sees the barrier as well. He says that the people of Canada have turned on the green light to go ahead with this bill, under the mandate they have given the government for conscription for overseas.

I come now to the magnificent speech made by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). All one has to do is to read it to know he has seen the barrier ahead and wishes to take the step at the present time. Opposed, as he has always been, to conscription, would he have taken the step which he took in the house last week, after his family had represented Quebec South for forty years, with all the sentiment which was attached to it between himself and his constituents, unless he had thought such a step was necessary? No, Mr. Speaker. I compliment the hon. gentleman upon the course he took in this house the other day. When it comes to the time of the next election his electors will probably think pretty well of him. He says he is first a Canadian and then a Quebecker. I am first a Canadian, and after that I am an Ontarian. We must all be Canadians in that sense, in these days, if we are to lick the Hun.

I come to the speech of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard). He said that he would have voted for the bill had it not been for past history. He complained bitterly about the lack of political education with an eye to overcoming the prejudices between the various provinces of Canada. He said he could not educate his constituents in a week. Certainly he could not. And whose fault was that? That of the political leaders of the province of Quebec who in the past have raised these issues at every election which has been held. Why have they done this? The political leaders in Quebec have for years been making political capital out of these issues in order to hold the balance of power in Canadian politics. This has been on many occasions their avowed intention. Is there any wonder that the policy pursued by them is resented in the other provinces? Until that situation is cleared up, we shall never have national unity.

With respect to the measure before us, I submit that the time has come when opposition must cease. Canada's future is at stake. The future of the British commonwealth of nations is imperilled. The eyes of the world are on us at the present time.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Before the six o'clock recess I had said that Canada's needs at the present time were greater than those of any province. I might point out what tremendous significance there is in the words of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) when he said in effect that he is for national unity, but unity cannot stand in the way of Canada's safety, and Canada is in peril.

The other day the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) quoted some speeches from the British House of Commons of January, 1916, with reference to the debate on the military service bill. He quoted statements in support of one side of the picture; he quoted the then Prime Minister (Mr. Asquith). That Prime Minister, as we all know, was a great prime minister, but he was a peace-time prime minister and his great forte was compromise. He did not quote anyone on the other side. I wish to take this opportunity of quoting a few words spoken by the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, Mr. Bonar Law, which express my own opinion better than I could do myself. He said, as reported in British Hansard for 1915-16, January 5, 1916, page 1010:

> When this war broke out I felt as strongly as those who had taken the most active part in what is called the national service movement, that our method of raising recruits by the voluntary system was not a good method for such a war as this. I thought it was not a good method, first of all, because it seemed to me utterly unfair that in the same town, or perhaps in the same street, three or four sons of one family should go, and another family on whom the state had precisely the same claim should not send a single man to the army.

I agree with that. I also think that the privilege of citizenship carries with it the duty of defence of one's country.

Mr. Bonar Law said further:

> I thought it a bad system for another reason, the very reason on which many of those who are opposed to this bill oppose it now—that it was a wasteful system, and that if we were to make any attempt to have a proper correlation between the men employed in the necessary civil services and those who go to fight our battles, that could not be arrived at by a system of haphazard enlistment and recruiting which depended on the voluntary will of individual people.

What about that situation? Why did it become acute? As I said this afternoon, the barrier which the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) spoke about was in sight. What actually had been happening at that time was that recruiting had fallen off; they said that it was going to be worse and that they had to take wounded men who had come back to England for convalescence and send them to the front two and three times and the public became incensed.

What is wrong with compulsory selective service? Why is it not right? I cannot see any reason why it is not. Drawing your selectees by lot is a pretty fair way of doing it. Let us take a look across the border; how does it work there? They are proud of their selectees; they cannot do enough for them. They are called up in the regular way, given plenty of time so that they can make their arrangements before they join the army. That is the method we should adopt in this country.

What is the position of a young man in Canada to-day? He has a very difficult decision to make. Many of them do not know whether they are doing their duty or not. Should they finish their university course; should they still be working in the factories; is it fair that they should have to make this choice themselves? How can they make the choice, when there seems to be such a divided opinion in the cabinet itself? Surely the ministers know the situation; there should not be any division in the cabinet in that respect. What a conglomeration of ideas we have had from the ministry, with the exception of the three ministers of national defence!

Are the other ministers real, honest-to-goodness Canadians, or are they politicians? Why have this division in the cabinet when the facts are known to the minister? Why not let us have some real, fearless leadership, as shown by the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and the Minister of National Defence for Air? I cannot pay too high tribute to the latter minister for the way he handled the situation with which he is faced in this house. Let us get rid of the slurs cast at our conscripts; let us call them up by lot. Life is a gamble anyway. Most people are good gamblers; when they are called up by lot they will take their chances like everyone else; they will be tickled to death, in fact, if they know what they have to do.

This debate started some weeks ago, and it seems likely to continue for some time yet. Let me make a suggestion. We have had a tremendous amount of repetition of ideas of one kind and another, and no doubt there are many more hon. members who want to speak in the debate. I suggest they be allowed to prepare a speech, write it and have it placed on Hansard, and they will thus get themselves on record. I think it is a good suggestion, for the same things are being repeated over and over. I am probably doing the same thing; I doubt very much whether I have contributed anything new to the debate.

What are our obligations? We are obligated not only to the defence of our own country, but to the defence of Great Britain, the united nations, the Chinese, the Russians. If there was ever any time when Canada should show herself in the best light and come to the help of the gallant Russian people who have held the foe back all this time, it is now. Where should we be but for them? We know we must open a second front; we must get the men for that, and we must keep our factories going. We cannot let our armies overseas and our navy and our air force down when that second front is opened.

I have just one last word to offer. I hope I have not offended anyone in what I have said to-day. I have spoken from the bottom of my heart; I have said what I thought. I appeal for unity to carry out the will of the people as expressed during the plebiscite recently held. Let us all fight together, Mr. Speaker, or they will kill us one by one.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I am indeed fortunate to-night, Mr. Speaker. The first time I had the privilege of speaking in this house I followed my good friend the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross), who has again preceded me in this debate. With one thing that he said I must agree, and I am not being personal at all. He said he wondered what some of the preceding speakers had contributed to the debate. I also wonder. Some of my political opponents took what I consider to be an unfair advantage of me, though they may consider it fair political strategy. Last Friday I was invited to be the ninth member of a baseball team made up by my good friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Social Credit parties to play a team of House of Commons pages. I do not know why I was asked to be the ninth member of that team, unless it was because they could not muster nine players from the two groups, and so I, the most radical member of the other parties, was asked to complete the team. I had the privilege of playing in the outfield, along with my good friend the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). He and I, coming from the Pacific coast, talk a good game of baseball; that is, our chatter is good though our playing is not. We both talked our heads off, and as a result I am hoarse to-night. The hon. member for Vancouver East need not care, because he does not have to speak. Then they placed me in centre field, where I had to back up a member of the Social Credit party at second base. He neither caught nor stopped one ball, and of course I had to chase the ball until I was stiff, but in spite of it all the umpire saw to it that we won the game. Then my good friends the Conservatives, perhaps trying to put me at a disadvantage, taking advantage of the preparations being made outside for some coming ceremony, told me that I was not to speak to-night but that the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and I were to have a joint debate on the platform being erected outside the building, and I waited there for twenty minutes. Incidentally, I had better watch the clock, because I believe the time is being checked very closely.

I would not be addressing the house to-night, Mr. Speaker, but for the fact that I consider it the duty of every member of this house who is a returned soldier to express his views in connection with this bill; his duty not only to the veterans of the last war but also to the veterans of this war. Before I have concluded my remarks I hope to make quite clear how I stand in connection with the vote that is to be taken shortly. I might mention that we in this corner of the house, commonly known as the "Rump", are very proud of the fact that seven of our members are serving in the active forces; that six of our members are veterans of the last war, and that many of those in our corner have sons serving in this war.

In passing, I might mention that I intend placing on the order paper a question asking what members of this house are veterans of the last war, what members are serving in this war, and what members have sons serving. I am asking that question for a reason which was particularly emphasized by the speech of one hon. member this afternoon. I want to bring to the attention of the people of Canada the fact that many members of this house either are serving to-day or have sons serving. I wish to do that for this reason. Who would have more sympathy, more respect, and a greater desire to help our soldiers overseas in every way possible, than those who are serving themselves or who have sons serving? To-day one hon. member was asked whether he was entirely in sympathy with this bill or any other bill having to do with the welfare of Canada and of our soldiers. That hon. member has a son who is perhaps flying over Germany to-night, and I think I am entitled to bring that fact to the attention of the people of Canada, as I intend to do.

Just here I should like to pay my respects to what I consider the most courageous speech ever made in this House of Commons, or at least since I have been a member of it. I refer to the speech made by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). No one questions the great value of the work he did as the organizing genius behind our greatest contribution to the allied cause, the commonwealth air training scheme. The minister suggested that because of the stand he is taking at the present time it may be necessary for him to sacrifice his seat.

An hon. MEMBER: No, no.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am only repeating what the minister said. I want to state, on behalf of British Columbia, that should that time ever come my seat will be available to the minister, and I think I am safe in saying that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Conservative members of this house will help me to see that the minister is elected unanimously. In this connection I would also mention the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Leduc), a private member, it is quite true, but one whose courage should be recognized. I should like to quote one or two paragraphs from his remarks, and I am only sorry that the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) is not present. I am not a wealthy man, but I hope the hon. member for Parkdale will see to it that his famous committee of 200, which includes the wealthiest men in Canada, will have the speech of the hon. member for Wright printed and distributed to every elector in the province of Quebec. As reported at page 3729 of Hansard for June 26 the hon. member for Wright said:

> I am well aware that such a stand will prejudice my chances of reelection to this house; but, faced with the choice of serving my country or being reelected, I do not hesitate in choosing to serve my country.

And again:

> I ask nothing more than to have my supporters and fellow citizens of the province of Quebec understand that our soldiers overseas are defending both England and Canada; that our airmen, striking formidable blows at the enemy in Europe, are defending Canada; that our sailors who seek out the enemy on our coasts and on the high seas are also defending Canada. I trust that, once and for all, my fellow citizens of Quebec and elsewhere—

I should like to emphasize the words "and elsewhere."

> —in Canada will realize that this is not England's war, but a war being waged by Great Britain, Canada and all the united nations in the defence of our liberties and our christian civilization.

I could go on quoting from that great speech, but time does not permit.

In my own riding all three parties combined and worked with all the other organizations, and particularly the Canadian Legion, in an endeavour to secure a most emphatic "yes" vote. We were successful to the approximate extent of 80 per cent. I am not in a position to say that an 80 per cent vote was a vote for conscription immediately, in the near future, or at any time. But I am in a position to say most emphatically on behalf of my riding that the people there believe in total war. In our minds total war means exactly what it says; it means conscription of every kind, be it wealth, man-power or industry.

I must admit frankly that I prepared certain notes for this speech. Perhaps I made a mistake in doing this. A speech I could have made, one which would have been most effective, would have been a presentation of newspaper headlines collected throughout the world in the last two years. To-night's headline points out that the fall of Matruh is officially confirmed. I do not believe it is necessary for me to turn to my notes in that connection to say what people in British Columbia, and most certainly those in Fraser Valley, feel at this time. We believe there is nothing any member of the house or any individual in Canada can do that is enough under the present trying and serious conditions.

I am proud that since the beginning of the war and, in fact, before the war, speaking as a returned soldier, I have preached or advocated what I believed was a proper policy for Canada. I believe, and always will believe in a policy of compulsory selective service, and it is in that policy that my constituency believes. I do not know if they believe in immediate conscription of man-power, but I do know they are behind the policy of compulsory selective service. As I understand it, they realize the seriousness of the situation, and it is possible that we of the Fraser Valley are in a better position than many in that respect. In common with a few—a very few—other members, some from British Columbia, I was scoffed at when I pointed out the seriousness of the Japanese situation. I was scoffed at when I said that every battle which has been lost in this war to date has been lost, not through lack of man-power but through lack of mechanical equipment and through organized fifth column activity. What would have happened to British Columbia if we had been complacent, and, through our silence, had permitted 20,000 fifth-columnist Japanese to remain in our province?

I am pointing that out for this reason: while I may disagree with government policy in some instances, would I be a true Canadian or a true Britisher if, because of that disagreement with past or present policy, I voted against the bill? I do not think so, and I do not believe my hon. friends from Quebec think so. We believe in total war—war with no restrictions. No pledges can prevent us from carrying out our duties as we see them as Canadians and members of the British empire. We believe the war must be fought to every extreme; we must meet the enemy at every angle, and, if possible, be on the initiative in meeting him.

In that connection may I refer to one of the greatest patriots of our sister nation, Joe Louis. He happens to be a coloured man, but he is serving willingly in the army of his country. He is serving voluntarily under a proper selective system. Furthermore, on many occasions he has given voluntarily, in a financial way, through benefits on behalf of the services, more than any other individual of whom I know serving in any allied army. Would Joe Louis ever have become the great victor he is in his own line of endeavour if he had waited for the enemy to attack? Of course not. No other great fighter ever became a victor in that way. The secret of his reputation and his victorious career has been that he has carried the battle to his opponents.

If your neighbour's roof is on fire, would you wait until that fire spread through your own woodshed before attempting to put it out? Would you not attempt to assist in putting it out while it is still on your neighbour's roof? The answer is obvious.

The proper way to meet modern warfare methods is to combat them with the antidotes of those methods. Methods of warfare must be met with an absolute understanding of what those methods mean. In my view—and I state this frankly—in so far as it concerns man-power for overseas I believe the importance of conscription has been overexaggerated. I do not know if conscription is needed to-day, or if it will be needed to-morrow or the next day to keep our army up to full strength. There are only three men who know that, namely, the three ministers of the defence services.

I have always been in favour of national selective service; but whether it is necessary to-day or to-morrow, I do not know. Certainly I cannot understand some of my friends in the Conservative party and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. I want to be fair to them by stating that both those parties worked, and worked hard, to secure a "yes" vote in my riding. In its programme the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has said, "No conscription of man-power unless we have conscription of wealth". The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) recently before a convention of the greatest organization in Canada—the Canadian Legion—said that he believed in the conscription of wealth before the enforcement of any other kind of conscription. That, at least, is my understanding of what he said.

I agree entirely with that, and have so stated on many occasions. I believe man-power should be conscripted, and, speaking as a veteran of the last war, I believe in the conscription of wealth. But I would say to my hon. friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation: If this new budget does not carry with it conscription of wealth, then all I can say is that I have a railway ticket which will take me back home, but I will need some Social Credit money to pay for my meals on the train. I appeal to them on the ground that we now have conscription of wealth to vote for Bill No. 80 when it comes to a vote on the second reading. If they sincerely believe in the conscription of wealth, then I say they have received almost all they asked for.

At this time I should like to read a short paragraph from a United States newspaper. Of course this does not apply to the member for Fraser Valley, but would apply to some other hon. members. This quotation from the San Francisco Argonaut, bearing the heading "Candid Opinion", states:

If somebody were to establish an endowment fund to award prizes for stupidity we strongly suspect that the greater number of awards would go to members of our congress. It almost makes a man lose his faith in democracy when he sees the kind of human jackasses that get elected to our halls of legislation to make laws for us.

That is from a United States paper. Why do not many members of the House of Commons and Canadians in general, instead of criticizing our war effort at all times, instead of trying to change our great national outdoor game of lacrosse to a mutual indoor game of knocking our Prime Minister and knocking our war effort, adopt the policy of one of the greatest leaders ever developed, particularly in war time, Mr. Wendell Willkie? They should paraphrase his statement and say, "He is my prime minister; Canada is at war; I am a Canadian." Mistakes and errors have been made, but is there any government at war to-day that has not made errors? Why should not the members of this house and the people of Canada tell with pride of our production of tanks, ships, munitions of war and food? As a member of parliament I have had the privilege of seeing that production, as have all members. Is there any greater assistance that we can give to the skunk of all skunks, Hitler; to the runt of all runts, Mussolini, to the scab of all scabs, Hirohito, than to criticize Canada's war effort?

Mistakes have been made in the past, and we are going to make them again. I do not want the house to think I am condoning all the mistakes the government has made. In my opinion the greatest mistake the government has made in the face of our need for conscription has been what I referred to a year ago, the utter stupidity of our recruiting campaign. I happen to be a supporter of the government, but I blame them for our recruiting campaign. One thing that I hold against the government is that they have endeavoured too often to pass on the mistakes we have made. I should like to quote briefly from some of the statements I made to my electors when I was requesting a "yes" vote in the plebiscite. I quote these for the simple reason that I want there to be no mistake about where I stand. I am a member of the Liberal party, a supporter of the Liberal party. I am a British Columbian and I am a Canadian, but above all I am a Britisher. Being a Britisher is above being a Canadian, being a British Columbian or being a member of any political party. The statements I intend to quote appeared in the press of my riding. This may be a small country press, but I do not think it needs to apologize to the press of any province or of any riding in Canada. I quote:

It is to be hoped every one will make the forthcoming plebiscite their own personal problem, will consider the future conduct of our war effort as their own responsibility and say to the government by an overwhelming affirmative vote, "you now have a free hand, no obstacles of any kind in the prosecution of the war to the very extent of Canada's ability to produce the materials of war, either in wealth, industry or man-power; we, the people, demand an entire and all-out war effort and will support all and any action necessary to bring victory."

I am quoting this to show where I stood, and I think I speak with authority for my riding. I quote again:

In particular I urge and every individual and organization who have called for total war now put that just call in practice in a practical way open to all, by seeing that an overwhelming "yes" vote is recorded in the valley on the 27th of April.

One more paragraph in that connection:

It can happen here, it most likely will happen here;

That was said in April and since then there have been two attacks on the Pacific coast and a ship has been sunk off Vancouver island. I quote:

We have no time for complacency by governments, we most certainly have no time for complacency by individuals. One it may be hard to control, can it be said it is hard to control our own actions? Let us all ask ourselves not what the other fellow is doing to defend us from bombs, hit and run attacks, or war in any of its horrible forms, but instead ask ourselves the simple question, what am I doing to protect my very own home and family and the families of those away offering their lives to protect us, we all have a duty.

That is what I wrote in connection with the plebiscite.

I should like to say a word or two about Quebec. I think most of the Quebec members are personal friends of mine. Most of them endeavoured to secure an affirmative vote in the plebiscite. I appreciate their problem because in many cases an affirmative vote was not secured. I realize that their political future may be at stake should they vote "yes" on this amending bill. There was an 80 per cent affirmative vote in my riding. I want to ask my hon. friends from Quebec: What will happen to your conscience if the time should come—and it will come sooner or later—I am very much afraid it will come very soon—when our troops will cry for trained reinforcements? If you advocated a "yes" vote in the plebiscite in order to relieve the government of every obligation, why not be consistent and vote "yes" now? Why not trust your government; why not trust your leader that conscription will be put in force when and if necessary? Why not realize that if you can advocate a "yes" vote when times are not so serious, you should maintain that stand by voting "yes" now?

What are you going to say to the rest of the provinces if the British isles are invaded? If the British isles are invaded, Canada's Pacific and Atlantic coasts will be invaded. What are you going to say to the people who said in 1885, "Our hearts belong to France but our arms belong to England?" My friends, your hearts may belong to France, but the mother country of France is a conquered country today, and she will remain conquered unless your arms are given to the empire to relieve her. Make no mistake about that. I should like to repeat a statement I heard over the radio on Sunday in connection with the United States war effort. I think it is extremely apropos to the present position. I am speaking particularly to my hon. friends from Quebec, and I want to assure them that I would have been in just as difficult a position had my riding voted "no." Let me say to them: You may have a temporary gain, but the empire means more than you or I as political individuals. This was a programme in connection with the war effort of the United States and the theme was, "Eternity is a long time for a man to be ashamed."

I have every confidence in and every admiration for members from the province of Quebec. They have a difficult problem. I, too, might have a difficult problem to explain to my riding. Frankly, many people in my riding might consider it my duty as a Canadian from British Columbia to condemn the attitude of the province of Quebec, but I do not believe that is what the people of Canada want. Of course, we all become more tolerant as we grow older, but I do not think it should necessarily be compulsory to put any young man into a uniform. I do not claim particularly to be a young man, but still I am rather ashamed of the fact that I am not in uniform to-day. I do not have a son, but if I happened to have a son he would not have to be forced by law to get into uniform. If he did not join the army of his own accord, I would shoot him myself. That is what I think of the British empire.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

We are sitting here dawdling around in complacency, both individuals and the government, and we do not know there is a war on. We are stalling. Read the headlines in to-day's papers and the headlines of yesterday and the day before. Are we ever going to wake up—not as members of parliament or as a government but as citizens of Canada? There is a war on. We are not fighting to protect the British empire or to protect Canada; we are fighting to protect our very existence—make no mistake about that.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope that I have offended no one, particularly anyone from the province of Quebec, by my remarks, but I thought it my duty as a returned soldier member to speak on this question. I am somewhat surprised that other than returned soldier members have spoken in this debate. It is not necessary to have any bitterness, but I do think it is necessary that we as Canadians should remember that we would not be Canadians sitting here to-night if it were not for the great traditions and the actions of the British navy.

I am an infantry man and an army man myself, but before I sit down I should like to quote two stanzas of a poem by one of our gallant airmen, Squadron Leader G. L. Creed, entitled "Somebody's Son"; but just before doing so, let me say to my good friends from Quebec and from every other province, in every district and every riding, let us have no illusions that we would have the privilege of sitting here and speaking to-night if it were not for Britain and the British navy:

Somebody's son has volunteered
To risk his life for you,
Somebody's son is far from home
And the things that homefolk do.
Somebody's son for your freedom's sake
Is preparing himself for war,
Somebody's son deserves your help
For it's You he is fighting for!
Somebody's mother is giving her boy
In a cause that is yours as well.
Somebody's wife knows a loneliness
That only her heart can tell.
Somebody's mother and somebody's wife
Are doing all they can do.
Somebody prays that some other may care.
And the answer is up to You!

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I feel very much honoured in following the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank), but I hope he will pardon me if I do not follow along exactly the same lines that he took. I do not take up very much of the time of the house and probably would not be speaking to-night if it were not for the fact that some speeches have been made in this debate which make it almost impossible for a man to continue to sit silent. I do not think I can add anything new to what has already been said. I doubt, indeed, whether very much more can be said, but I think we should give some consideration to the reason for this legislation. The reason for this legislation is quite a long story, but there are some events of quite recent occurrence to which we might well give consideration at this time.

Some of the members on the opposite side of the house, and particularly of the Conservative party, seem to have the idea that politics, and particularly Liberal party politics, is a crime, at least at this time, although Conservative party politics has certainly been intensified both in this house and through the press under the guise of National government.

I think we are all fairly well agreed that we must have some sort of party government and political parties if democratic government is to function. There must be a party in power, and a party in opposition. As long as I have known anything about politics, I have been taught that the best form of government is one with a strong working majority, faced by a strong opposition. The advocates of National government are advocating exactly the reverse. They would take all the able men out of the opposition and put them in the government. The result would be that we would have a much more powerful government and a much weaker opposition. If the theory is sound that we should have a government with a strong working majority, and a strong opposition, then surely in a time of crisis we should not attempt to make a government weaker by putting more strength into it at the expense of a strong opposition.

As far back as July, 1939, when I returned to this country from Geneva, I found that the Conservative party had started on a campaign to elect a National government. The then leader of the Conservative party was making a tour of the Gaspé peninsula in the interests of the Conservative party, under the guise of a National government, which at that time they were advocating. Later on, in 1940, the election was fought on two distinct issues: one of them was national government versus party government, the other was, as was most emphatically affirmed by all three major parties, no conscription for overseas service. The present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), was elected in that year with the greatest majority received by any man at any time in the history of this country. Ever since that election the Conservative party and the Conservative press have done everything humanly possible to destroy Mr. King politically, and his government, and to set up in their stead a National government. As as example of how far things have gone along that line, let me quote what a professor named C. W. Topping, of the university of British Columbia, said before the League of Nations Society of Canada convention recently held in Ottawa:

> His students do not find much sense in fighting for the status quo. The Conservatives have made too good a job in tearing down Mackenzie King.

That was said at a League of Nations Society meeting on May 30, 1942. It is not a party matter. Toronto Saturday Night, which I submit is not a Liberal newspaper, had this to say:

> Conscriptionists killing conscription.

Further on:

> Mr. King is clever.

And still further:

> Our regret at Mr. King's course has a different basis. The political insiders may view these things in the manner that we have surmised; but the public does not. The public of the eight provinces has been worked up into the belief that conscription is "necessary," though with no very definite idea for what reasons or by what standards; into a belief that it voted for the enactment and enforcement of conscription; and into a consequent feeling that conscription ought to be enacted and enforced. The present parliamentary debates and press editorials do not fully represent its reaction. It is disillusioned and disappointed. It has come to regard conscription as the "just" way of raising a large military force, and any other way as unjust to certain classes and detrimental to the future character of the nation.

That is something which has been raised up in the minds of the people through the debates in this house and by editorials throughout this country for the past five months. We have been here since last January, and I submit that this house has done nothing but talk conscription pro and con, either on the plebiscite or during the debate which is now proceeding.

The question before parliament to-day is the repeal of section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act. As the natural consequence of the plebiscite, and the plebiscite, in my opinion, was the only fair, logical and democratic thing to do under the circumstances. The people of the constituency of Kamloops, which I have the honour to represent, did not vote "yes" on the plebiscite in the belief that it was a vote for conscription at once. I believe they had enough intelligence, knowing that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), and the leader of the Liberal party (Mr. Mackenzie King), on the public platform, over the air and through the newspapers told them most emphatically that an affirmative vote was not a vote for conscription, to understand that they were not voting for conscription, but they certainly did know that if they voted "no" the hands of the government of this country would remain tied. They wanted to release the hands of the government so that they would be prepared at any time to take the action which in their best judgment seemed to be the right action to take at the time. It was not intended, as some people suggest, that we should blindly drive into conscription even though it were not necessary in order to win the war. That may appeal to the ideas of some people, but it was not what actuated the people of my constituency in voting "yes" —which they did, in unmistakable terms.

As I understand it, there are sufficient powers in the mobilization act to mobilize and conscript everything in this country, including man-power, except that the government must not conscript men for service overseas. This bill is the natural and logical result of the plebiscite, its intention being to remove that restriction. Not that we must put conscription into effect to-morrow, but conscription is to be introduced if and when in the opinion of the governing body of this country it is necessary. The government, I submit, are the only people who have the necessary information to decide that matter.

What is the record and what are the policies of those who are opposed to the government? I will begin with the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. May I at the outset pay tribute to the leader of that party in respect of the exceedingly able and well-delivered proposals of his party. May I also tell him that with some of his submissions, especially those having reference to the three guiding rules of the New Zealand labour government as laid down by the Hon. Walter Nash, I am in complete agreement. But I am somewhat at a loss to reconcile the present attitude of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation with some of its past utterances and performances. On June 11, when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was making his presentation to the house, he is credited in Hansard, at page 3262, with the following language:

> We of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation have always contended that the financial system should be publicly owned and operated for the common good.

May I say at once that I am in complete agreement with that expression. But that has not always been the position of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. In 1934, before I had the honour and privilege of being a member of this house there was instituted in this country the Bank of Canada. The bill constituting this bank was brought in by the Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, who at that time was Prime Minister, and the majority of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party of that day voted with the government for private ownership of that bank. I point that out merely to call attention to the fact that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation of that time were not of the same opinion as that now expressed by the leader of that group, who himself was not a member at that time; he came in, as I did, at the election of 1935.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the hon. member allow me to say—

Mr. O'NEILL: I have sat here for months and months and listened to many speeches from the hon. member. I have only a little time at my disposal.

Mr. MacINNIS: I want to correct the hon. member's statement. His assertions are wrong. There was no Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in this house in 1934.

Mr. O'NEILL: No; the party came into being in 1932; none of you were elected as Cooperative Commonwealth Federation representatives, but you held the same sort of views as you hold now; you have adapted them to the times.

Mr. MacINNIS: We will tell you later about the screwball amendment against which we voted.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have not interrupted the hon. member since 1935. I assure him there were plenty of times that I should like to have interrupted him with an ink bottle, but I let him go on, and I think he might do the same with me now. I might call attention to the fact that the hon. member who has seen fit to interrupt me voted with the Conservative government for private ownership of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not true.

Mr. O'NEILL: Look at the record.

Mr. MacINNIS: I say it is not true.

Mr. O'NEILL: Look at the record and you will see it is true.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is not true.

Mr. O'NEILL: The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party went on to say, as reported at page 3262 of Hansard:

> Hon. members will have noticed that one of the first controls which the government found it necessary to impose in this war was the control of foreign exchange. Banks are instru ments of financial and investment policy. It is absurd to leave any portion of the policy in private hands during a crisis such as the present.

With that last remark I am in accord. However, I might point out that in the election of 1940 the only man who advocated from a public platform that there should be conscription of wealth, industry and manpower was the Hon. W. D. Herridge, who was defeated in the constituency of Kindersley. But now we have many followers of that doctrine.

Let me now discuss the stand of the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation on former occasions. There was quite a little argument the other night in respect of socialism. As I understand it—I am open to correction if I am wrong—I think the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) put forth the aims and objects of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation on that occasion, and I believe he was contending that the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation are not socialists. I might call the attention of hon. members to the fact that in the Regina Leader-Post of June 18 there was this notice:

The C.C.F. will hold a leadership school at Crystal Lake in the Canora district from July 6 to 11, at which members of parliament, members of the legislative assembly, candidates, members of the provincial council and campaign managers and organizers will be present. Guest speaker will be J. W. Bunce, Professor of Economics, at Iowa State College, who will instruct in the economics of socialism.

Mind you, I have no quarrel with the principles of socialism. What I have quarrelled with is the methods that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation seek to apply. We go back to 1936 and find this. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had this to say on May 28, as reported at page 3203 of Hansard of that year:

. . . in my opinion a country the size of Canada, with its divers peoples and small population, is best defended if we rely upon our weakness physically and our goodwill as a good world neighbour rather than attempt to ape the military powers of the European countries.

I contend that is not a very laudable sentiment to be expressed by a man who seeks to be a leader of a great party. Then on November 15, 1937, he said, as reported at page 888 of Hansard of that year:

Are we in Canada going to join in this mad race without knowing precisely the policy that underlies the increased estimates upon which we shall shortly have to vote? Our answer in this little group is, of course, no, because we believe that such defence preparations only breed fear and that hate, which, in turn, is the child of fear.

Then on February 22, 1937, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, as reported at page 1102 of Hansard of that year:

We have to bear in mind that in any war we should be involved largely on account of our association with some other country. It might be because of proximity to the United States, or because of our connection with Great Britain, even if we declared neutrality. We must remember that either of those nations has a navy powerful enough to prevent the passage of aircraft carriers across the Atlantic, and would be prepared to stop them for their own protection and the protection of their trade routes.

That is the party which to-day tells us that the Liberal party is not going far enough.

Again on February 22, 1937, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said, as reported at page 1105 of Hansard of that year:

If we once put our feet along this path of providing gun emplacements, coastal defences and so on, we must realize that we may be led much farther than we are given to understand to-day we will be. I am thoroughly convinced of that, and that is one reason why I am opposing this estimate. I believe that with a coast line such as we have, to do as the government intends will mean embarking upon a course which will be more or less provocative and interfere with any neutrality we may desire to observe in the future.

About the same time, May 8, 1936, the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) said, as reported at page 2632 of Hansard of that year:

When it comes to voting money for these purposes I desire to register a protest, not because I think these things are unnecessary, but because I think there are other things that are more necessary.

On February 19, 1937, the hon. member for Weyburn said, as reported at page 1063 of Hansard of that year:

Against whom are we arming? What potential aggressor, is more agressive to-day? Oh I know that bogeymen have been trotted out in this chamber. It has been suggested that it might be Italy, it might be Germany, it might be Japan.

I suggest that if the hon. member had been a prophet instead of a critic in that day he would have been a world-beater.

Speaking on the plebiscite, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had this to say:

I welcomed the opportunity to speak to you to-night—not only to urge you to vote "yes" next Monday, which I do, but also to outline to you my views, and those of the movement for which I speak, on the whole picture of our war effort and Canada's hopes for the future.

I might remark that this is the only time I ever knew any government to pay for spreading political propaganda of their opponents.

With respect to our friends of the Conservative party, we have heard a good deal from our friends with respect to leadership. Most of those remarks I believe emanated from the leaderless league in Toronto. They have indicated that they have no leadership, but they constantly advocated that the Prime Minister should get out and that someone else should get in; they asked for total war and so on. To my mind, remarks and tactics of that kind cannot have any other effect than to undermine the confidence of the people of this country in democratic government. I care not who is in power, whether Liberals or Conservatives, tactics of that kind by the opposition can have no other effect. It is my opinion that that very thing was more responsible for the fall of France than anything else. That went on in France until the country fell.

We heard this afternoon the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) and the other night the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) talking about the ballot box. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not heard any members of the Liberal party talk about the ballot box. Those remarks came from the opposition; and it was the wrong construction they placed on the utterances of those who preceded them in this debate that led them to accuse men of placing the ballot box before the good of their country. We could all go on doing these things, calling each other names, but it would not help the situation one iota. Hon. members who make remarks of that kind, however, would be surprised at what some uncharitable people might say about them as a consequence.

I submit that our war effort has been admirable in the eyes of all throughout the world with the exception of those in this country who are opposed to this government. They are the people who are doing everything humanly possible to belittle and discredit Canada's effort in this struggle for freedom. Hon. Walter Nash, who is now New Zealand's representative in the United States and who was formerly Minister of Finance of New Zealand, in addressing a special committee of this house had this to say:

> We have sent . . . men overseas and . . . of these are airmen who have a lot of skill and knowledge as a result of the training they have received under the magnificent empire air training scheme which you are carrying out here in Canada. If that alone was Canada's contribution with respect to this war it is something to be particularly proud of.

That is only one of the many things Canada is doing in this war; but this gentleman, who leans very far to the left as far as politics are concerned, considers that if it were the only thing, still our effort would be magnificent.

I am sure we all listened with a great deal of interest when the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) told us what the government was doing in the way of furnishing supplies to the allied nations. If my memory serves me correctly without referring to Hansard, we were told by the minister that munitions and war equipment manufactured in Canada were seeing service on every fighting front in the world to-day. We were also told that the tanks we are sending to Russia are among the finest in the world.

At this time I should like to congratulate the government upon what they have done in the way of putting representatives of labour on various boards, and upon having chosen a real labour man to head that department. When I say he is a real labour man, I expect the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation will, of course, not agree. I say these things, Mr. Speaker, because we are constantly told that we must conscript men for overseas service.

This is a news item which I clipped from the Ottawa Citizen of June 17. It comes from Vancouver, one of the finest cities in north America, and states:

> C. S. Henley, special representative here for the national selective service board, announced to-day that labour shortages in British Columbia's vital spruce camps had been filled by soldier-loggers given six months leave from the forces, and that a similar plan to fill labour gaps in war industries was in the tentative stage.
> Mr. Henley said that the soldiers were sent to spruce camps, chiefly in the Queen Charlotte islands, about three weeks ago.

I mention that in passing because we are told that we must have conscription for overseas service at once, whether or not men are required for other war work. I might read one other clipping along the same line, from the Monetary Times of June 20:

> Faced with an acute labour shortage . . . farmers of the Fraser valley in British Columbia have appealed to Colonel A. W. Sparling, D.S.O., local army commander, to release soldiers for work on the farms.

The head of one of the associations making the appeal said:

> The men could be released to work on the farms on an eight-hour day basis at wages arranged by the military authorities.

I was pleased to note the appointment of Mr. E. M. Little to the selective service board. In speaking to the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Mr. Little had this to say:

> Employer-employee relations can and must be improved. Without them, maximum efficiency cannot exist. With good relations, miracles can be performed. There are men in this room who have been leaders in establishing sound relations with their employees. There are some who would like to have good relations and don't know how to go about it. And there are some employees who don't seem to want good relations.

To those who are willing, but don't know how, will you find out how from those who do? To those who don't want good relations or don't appreciate their value, I say the country cannot afford to have you as an employer at any time, particularly in war time. You must change your ways.

I suggest that if we had more of that sentiment we might be able to increase our war effort quite considerably. A Hamilton labour leader, Mr. John Mitchell, had this to say along the same line:

Employers who refuse to cooperate with their workers are a menace. They are breeders of discontent, hatred and spite, and kill the initiative of the workers.

I think on the whole it can be said without fear of successful contradiction that while the government of this country has made many mistakes, when the history of these times is written, the record of this country will be among the most glorious of all of those who have taken part in this struggle for freedom. The present relations existing between Great Britain, our splendid neighbour the United States, and Canada, can in all fairness I think, be attributed to the statesmanship of our present Prime Minister. No one in this country, even those newspapers which are most strongly against the Prime Minister and his government, ever says anything against the ministers in charge of our war effort: the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I never see any violent criticism of these hon. gentlemen. If a union or national government were formed, whom would my hon. friends put in their places? Would they take these hon. members out?

I am a labour man, Mr. Speaker, and I confess quite frankly that I have always been opposed to compulsion. I am still opposed to it, but there comes a time when one must bury some of the things he has always cherished, and I believe this is that time. It is my intention to vote for this bill; and if tomorrow I am advised by the ministers who are charged with responsibility and who are in possession of all the information, that conscription is necessary, then I am prepared to vote for that also.

I should like to make a few remarks with regard to the Japanese situation in British Columbia, but I shall not detain the house long. When the regulations were set up in British Columbia every person of the Japanese race within the protected area was supposed to be in his place of residence between sun-down and sun-up. That, of course, applied to the protected area. Then there were regulations with respect to arms, ammunition, motor vehicles, radios, cameras and the like. I understand that those regulations are not being carried out in British Columbia. I am not blaming the government for that; I believe that is the fault of the commission, and I shall not say much more on that subject.

However, I hold in my hand a copy of a train order issued to the engineers and conductors on the Canadian National railway running north from Kamloops, through the Blue river district, where the Japanese camps are situated. This order states:

Account Japanese out of hand and liable to do damage to railway; run carefully and keep sharp lookout in vicinity of Gosnell.

I also have a letter from a man who says that when the Japs were out of hand they went toward a house in that neighbourhood. There was only one woman in the house, and she promptly unlimbered a 30.30 and said that if they came another step farther there would be some dead Japanese. This man makes a comment, "That is the first Jap retreat recorded in British Columbia". I have other letters of a similar nature, but since my time is short, I shall not refer to them in detail. In conclusion, I appeal to members of the house for unity. If there ever was a time in the history of Canada when unity was required, that time is now. To my English-speaking friends I would say this: I would urge that you have more tolerance, and that you consider the conditions existing in Switzerland, a nation of four million people and four recognized languages. In that country one hears German, French, Italian and other Romance languages. Yet, despite the difference in language there is a wonderful spirit of unity in that country. I can see no reason why we in Canada cannot have the same spirit.

To my French-speaking friends, in the most kindly spirit I would advocate the teaching of English in their schools. At the same time I would advocate the teaching of French in English schools, in order that we may get to know each other better. In my opinion, the maintenance of unity will be one of the greatest contributing factors to our share of winning the war and establishing an enduring peace.

I am sorry I have taken up so much of the time of the house. Like the speaker who preceded me, I have not in any way attempted to offend anyone. If inadvertently I have done so, I hope hon. members will bear in mind that I have sat here for five months listening to speeches, and there have been occasions when I thought some of the observations were directed against me. Possibly some hon. members may think my words have been directed against them; I can assure them that is not so.

Mr. PIERRE GAUTHIER (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, so many things have been said during the course of this debate, the most unusual I have witnessed in the sixteen consecutive sessions in which I have taken part since 1927, that one cannot speak without repeating what has been said before by the goodly number of orators who have taken part in the discussion.

The debate on Bill No. 80 has drawn attention to the house, and seems to have caused the formation of so many groups and the expression of so many points of view that one would think we were in the Palais Bourbon when there existed from ten to fifteen different groups or parties. I doubt that this house is as noisy as the Palais Bourbon was in those days, but when one sees such a mixture of opinion, and notes the different shades of expression of those opinions on one subject he realizes it would have been very difficult at the beginning to pick a winner.

Now that we have heard from the three defence ministers, one can say with confidence that Bill No. 80, when adopted, means conscription in the near future. After three years of controversy on that question, one is now permitted to say that those who from the beginning feared that parliament was heading toward conscription for overseas service were quite right in their deduction. Conscription has long been looked upon by a minority in the house and contrary as the quintessence of total war. The fact that Australia has not adopted a measure of compulsory service for overseas service and that Northern Ireland is on the same footing does not mean anything to that minority. However, who will say that Australia is dragging behind the others? Someone has said that our allies have conscription. True—China, to defend her territory; Russia to repel the Hun; the United States to defend its colonies and its own territory. We have conscription to defend our own territory; why must we have conscription for overseas service? Hundreds of thousands of soldiers are overseas following voluntary enlistment. More are training to prepare themselves. If there had not been so much talk on the part of that troublesome minority which, with a strong press campaign and the help of its two hundred gilded friends in Toronto, has put the heat on the government, there would be more volunteers training for overseas. All this proves that my hon. friends have made an enormous mistake, and that their blindness when considering the subject of total war has led them to miscalculate the results they were so keen to obtain. I will not go as far as to say that this was done purposely to stop voluntary enlistments. When I speak of minorities, I do so intentionally because I am positive that the majority of our population of any descent is against conscription. They have demonstrated clearly their intention of giving a total effort on a voluntary basis, and they have demonstrated that they understand the situation in which the nations of the world are at present.

I am one of the eleven Liberal members who went to their electors in Quebec during the plebiscite campaign and urged a negative answer to the question placed before them for their consideration. We said that an affirmative vote would open the door widely to compulsion for overseas service, and I believe that we were right. The people of Quebec cast their vote against conscription; my constituency voted against it by an overwhelming majority. I do not need any further expression of their opinion in order to vote against this bill.

We have been called extremists, fifth columnists, quislings, and many other names, all of which we do not mind. The result in Quebec was conclusive. Quebec did not want to relieve the government from its commitments. While the majority of Canada answered "yes," only those to whom the commitments were made could release the government. That was our stand on the plebiscite, and it still is. That is also the stand of the province of Quebec. If we were isolationists before, we were forced to abandon that. If we were opposed to participation in any external war, we had to concede, and that is not the first time we have made concessions. But on this occasion we had the solemn promise of our leaders, and of the Conservative candidates as well, that conscription would never be imposed. We kept our promise, and we accepted the adoption of conscription after participation had been decided upon, but we are now asked to go further and accept compulsory conscription for overseas service. I do not think that is fair.

The deletion of section 3 of this act will constitute an acceptance of the principle, and then the democratic procedure of an order in council can consummate the tragedy. I think I am right in saying that two-thirds of the members admit that conscription is not necessary, that the volunteer makes a better soldier. Nevertheless day by day we come closer to the adoption of that measure. It is no good; but the government, yielding to the pressure of the conscriptionist minority at any cost, has brought forward this bill for the deletion of section 3. I think we must admit that this is dangerous politico-mental gymnastics.

It has been said that the people of Quebec oppose conscription because they have not been properly educated on the question of war; that they do not realize that the situation is so serious; that they have not been spoken to boldly enough and so forth. Prior to 1917 we had not been told for the past twenty-five years that we would have conscription. I am not overlooking the campaign of the Nationalists. It is a positive fact that that campaign was subsidized by Tory money. But even though we had not been told for twenty-five years that we would have conscription, Quebec was still strongly opposed to conscription for overseas service, and the fact that France was then our ally did not lessen our opposition to conscription.

We have always been ready to help, to fight voluntarily. I do not need to recall the various occasions when French Canadians have fought to keep this country for England. They did it voluntarily and with enthusiasm, but they do not like broken promises. That is one good feature of their education.

One sad aspect of this change of policy is the fact that recruits have been called up and are now training for Canada's defence. From the beginning they have been under the impression that there would be no conscription for overseas service, but they are now facing the fact that with the passing of just one order in council they will be liable to be sent anywhere in the world. What will they think then of the word of honour of their representatives? What will they think then of their democratic parliament? Will there be left in them any confidence in this parliament?

The Conservative party is stamped with conscription, and this country is soon to enjoy the sight of a Liberal party with the same black spot upon its soul. Then the Tories will have the Liberal party where they have always wanted it. As their leader said before the plebiscite, they put on the heat. I understand that this go-between measure was to appease the ire of the imperialists, those within the Liberal party as well as those without. To those who believe that imperialism is dead, I ask, "Why are we denied a national flag and a national anthem?" Just because imperialists are afraid that the Canadian people will take too much interest in the flag, a flag which would mean our whole history, a flag which would speak to the soul of our people and make them feel proud of their land. They would believe that at last they are heading toward a real national status.

Someone might answer that it would not mean much. I think that shows a lack of psychology, a lack of national pride. What is behind all this is imperialism which stands aloof behind words such as these: "Canada a nation," "autonomy," "free association of countries in the commonwealth," "freedom to declare war on anyone," "the Westminster statute," and so forth. But when it comes to the consecration of all these statutes, the red light is on and we remain a colony; a country within another country, separated by a few thousand miles of water, from which mainland we have to borrow a flag and a national anthem. They say imperialism is dead. Imperialism will never die as long as trade and commerce interests exist in the world. It will never die because England must have an empire in order to live. I know that those who stress the adoption of a national flag and a national anthem, those who do not look upon the union jack as their national flag or who do not consider "God Save the King" as their national anthem will be considered as being anti-British or even traitors. These are labelled arguments, always in stock.

The development of patriotism does not go with coercion or the denial of autonomous moves and privileges. Minorities in the world, even majorities with a mental inferiority complex, have been kept under the ferrule; and the results attained were often opposite. Sooner or later they woke up to reality. Sooner or later they realized that they were grown-up nations and were entitled to the stature of a nation. Nobody can overlook that law of centuries. Canada has over three centuries of existence. A country like ours, with unlimited wealth, has the right to its own economic and political life, and to make its own decisions. It has a right to salute its own flag and sing its national anthem, and those who would deny these priviliges have a great deal to add to their Canadianism.

I have said before in this house that the lords of the British Admiralty have never favoured a local defence progamme. At the very beginning of this war Hore-Belisha clearly expressed the same policy. If we had not been a part of the British empire, would we have declared war on European nations at the very beginning, when we were not attacked, and when nobody could foresee that this war would develop into a world war? If we had just been a nation of America without any imperial bonds, we would not have acted so quickly. But when England declares war, all the free nations of the commonwealth declare war, because of their empire bonds. This fact was clearly demonstrated when Canada sent a contingent to south Africa to fight the Boers.

Since the outbreak of this war we have witnessed empires against empires. On one side, Germany, Italy and Japan wish to build up their empire at the expense of Russia, whose dream of ruling the world through communist theories is a kind of imperialism; on the other, the United States and England wish to save their empires. Everyone will admit that the united nations had to put into effect methods that were already in favour amongst totalitarian states, such as defence regulations, press censorship, compulsory loans and so forth, but with a difference in their philosophy.

I do not believe it would be a criticism of the Canadian defence regulations to say that the newspapers and people of England enjoy a larger freedom to discuss the events of the war than we do in Canada. The defence of democracy and of Christian civilization was later on engrafted, however queer may be the fact that the seat of Catholicism is in Italy and that the armies of an atheist state are fighting on our side.

In the democratic states the parliament is elected and empowered by the people and should, normally speaking, bear the responsibilities attached to their mandate. I admit that a plebiscite is a very handy way of lessening to a certain extent responsibility toward the people. "Yes" or "no" would have been more explicit.

There was no plebiscite when through its delegate this country signed a pact giving its word of honour that every economic and military resource would be put at the disposal of every one of the united nations whose signature appeared on that very important document called the Atlantic charter. Every economic and military resource meant all the money, munitions, foodstuffs and soldiers that Canada could provide. This parliament was not consulted on that question; nor were the Canadian people consulted, yet Canada was bound even to conscription if such a measure should be considered absolutely necessary. Even if conscription would provide but a few thousand men, we were bound by our signature to impose the conscription of men as well as the conscription of wealth. That agreement was signed on January 1, 1942, before the plebiscite. If the plebiscite was held to rectify this act of our government, everyone will admit that, even if it was a handy way, it was not the gesture of what we would call responsible government to ask for ratification after the country had pledged itself.

Have we ever heard a member of this house urging upon this government the imposition of conscription for overseas service because we had been bound by our signature to the Atlantic charter? No. Then I am right in saying that conscription is looked upon by some, not to honour a pledge to the united nations, not as an inevitable step in providing the united nations with all the men we could get through conscription, but as part of a policy which has been strongly put forward since right after the election of 1940 by a group of men whose imperialism is as vivid as ever and for whom no conscription in Canada for overseas service would bring dishonour to this country. Canada for them is one with the empire. The boundaries of our country are the boundaries of the empire. In a word, it is the same country. Yet some will say that imperialism is dead!

With some people talk of the war effort and of conscription develops into what medical men call a neurosis, and when controversy awakens they are scandalized to hear someone advocating the defence of Canada as our primary goal. If Canada is attacked directly on its own territory it is because, in their view, we have not conscription for overseas service. The sight of Australia bringing back her soldiers to defend Australian soil does not lessen their "mother knows all" attitude. Conscription for overseas service has become a fixed idea with them, and since French Canadians are strongly opposed to it, queer words are uttered. But we let them go by, ready to forgive, but never ready to surrender.

Our patience has surmounted many obstacles. Our faith in our country has long made us believe that some day the minorities will see their privileges equitably considered. In war time the French Canadians are urged to contribute their share in the conscription of blood. But do you not think, sir, that their good-will would be more apparent if in peace time they were not so often deprived of their share of the advantages to which they are entitled? And this is the real situation in peace time.

"Why don't you speak English in Quebec?" someone said in this house last week. In Quebec we learn and speak both languages because both are official. We would not learn or speak English if we wanted to dominate other parts of the country. A wonderful example of tolerance is given to the "one language, one school" apostle by Switzerland.

They have three official languages in that country, and since none of the three try to absorb the others they are enjoying perfect unity. Why not follow the example of Quebec where the two languages are spoken freely, where religions are taught to children, and school commissions are equally subsidized by the government. That French Catholic legislature of Quebec! The example is on the threshold of the door: "open it wide and broad-mindedness will come in". That is what we find in that "depressed minority of Quebec". If our social laws are not adequate to the needs of our people, which is far from being the truth, Christian charity comes to the rescue.

We have the best laws of hygiene that one can wish. I admit that our farming has not developed into an industry and that we do not receive the millions inherent to the wheat policy. But the permanency of our farm owners is certainly better established. We do not mind buying for millions of dollars even from Toronto firms. One of them, whose president was among the two hundred, showers the province with its catalogues every year. We are patient. Our past illustrates the degree it can attain. It kept us fighting for our share in this Canada of ours. We received it from our mothers, the symbol of patience and self-sacrifice. From them we have inherited the belief in the sanctity of pledges.

We are not opposing conscription because our men are afraid to fight. It is because there is a principle at stake. For this principle we will go on and fight. But there is a limit to everything.

To those who are afraid that French Canada wants to dominate, to rule, to dictate to other parts of the country, I will read these few lines from an article in the publication "Food for Thought". It is entitled, "What French Canadians Want—Survival, not Domination", and is written by the Abbé Arthur Maheux. He says:

> How English-speaking Canadians could fear domination by French Canadians has often been a source of wonder to me. Such people should read French-Canadian writers, poets, journalists, and scholars. They should listen to French-Canadian speeches, sermons and radio talks. I would dare say that not a single French Canadian has ever expressed the aim or desire of domination in Canada or North America. So far as I know from conversations with people from all social groups in French Canada, the idea of domination is quite absent from the mind of the French Canadian. His ambition is not to dominate Canada. Even if he should outnumber the other racial groups put together he would not use his numerical strength to dominate.

Those who are afraid of us should meet us more frequently and know us.

I must repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I shall vote against this bill, and do so with pleasure, because I know now that I was not mistaken about the plebiscite campaign. I know that I was right when I urged my people to vote "no", that this plebiscite meant conscription, and that the deletion of section 3, as has been said in this house, is the logical consequence of the vote. We were right when we said that. We were called Quislings and other nice names. We do not mind. We knew it was conscription coming, conscription in the making, and I was pleased to see that my people voted 95 per cent "no". I shall vote against the measure, and nothing will make me vote in favour of anything heading toward conscription.

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong this debate, which has already, perhaps, proceeded too long. I do not wish to delay the passing of this bill, but on some of the issues involved I want to make a few comments, which will be very brief.

During the course of this discussion many extraneous topics have been introduced. I am not going to pose to-night as an evangelist of harmony, because I do not believe disharmony exists to a great extent in this country. I am not going to hold an inquest on unity, because I do not believe that unity is dead or is in danger of death. I am not going to turn back very far in the pages of history. I believe that in this debate far too much emphasis has been placed on alleged disunity, and strange pictures have been painted. With all respect, may I say I think there has been far too much beating of dead political horses.

I am going to vote for this legislation. The bill before us is the result of a people's decision, a popular vote, a popular voice. That decision was made on April 27 last. While overwhelmingly in the affirmative, it was not unanimous. There was difference of opinion in every city, in every town, in every district. That difference does not mean revolt or disunity, it does not mean hatred. In these troubled days that are upon us, when half the world has been forced into silence, when an effort is being made to make us all think in terms of nazism or not to think at all, surely it is a privilege—or perhaps I should say it is a luxury—to differ with those for whom I have a deep affection, and a high regard, like those who sit around me. One of the things we are fighting for to-day is the liberty of difference, and that liberty of difference does not mean the severance of friendship.

There are certain sections of the press that, with a peculiar presumption, arrogate to themselves the sole anxiety for an all-out war effort. They even become armchair strategists and field marshals. I have no objection to their assuming that role if, in doing so, they do not paint an inaccurate picture of my country. We are all, inside this house and outside this house in Canada, whatever our differences may be, one in hope and in heart, and that hope is for the speedy winning of this war. The young men, young women and children with whom I come in contact in this country are each and all sentinels on duty willing to do their best for the safety and the defence of this country. Therefore let us be done with this cry of disunity and these recriminations; let us guard our tongues and our pens when we speak or write about this bill.

In my province of Prince Edward Island the plebiscite was interpreted, as I think its language intended it to be, as a request for release from a pledge which, rightly or wrongly, was given two years ago with regard to the method of raising men for overseas service. The answer to that in my province, as it was throughout Canada on the whole, was an overwhelming "yes." That did not mean necessarily, in my judgment or in the judgment of my constituents, immediate conscription. It meant this, that when the time comes that the system now in vogue fails to be an adequate defence of this dominion, then the government is given freedom and power to act in any way necessary to save this country. When that crisis comes and those obligations arise I, as a former soldier, believe that the decision will depend on the experienced advice, the expert knowledge and the considered judgment of military leaders and of the allied command. When that time comes this government must be free to act in any way necessary, and in accordance with their action or their failure to act the people will hold them responsible.

With many of my hon. friends in this house who served in the last war I believe in the voluntary system as long as it works. I believed in it in the last war. But there may come a time when the stream of men under the voluntary system will dry up. We cannot win this war without aggressiveness; aggressiveness means, casualties; casualties mean reinforcements, and reinforcements mean that troops have to be raised and sent in one way or another. I think one of the proudest things to any Canadian is the success of our voluntary system. In my little province, small in size but great in heart, nearly 9 per cent of the entire population have enlisted for active service. If that proportion were extended throughout all Canada, we would have over a million men in the field to-day. That is true also of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. A great percentage of those men have gone into the navy. That is natural, because those boys are born and bred to the sea; each boy is drawn to the docks as boys in other provinces are drawn to the baseball parks or the movies. The young men of the martime provinces see themselves in imagination holding a flapping top-sail in the breeze or standing by a kicking wheel on some far distant ocean. So we find them going into the merchant marine or the navy. Conscription would not mean anything in my province, because there is no one left to conscript. That, I think, should be the situation throughout Canada.

I wonder if we have considered the difficulties and obstacles with which the voluntary system was faced. There must be the will for enlistment. Let me go back, from ten years before the war to the very eve of the war, to recall those days right up to 1939 when we were living in a sleep-walker's world. In that world, into the schools and colleges and universities and on the platform and, indeed, into some of our pulpits, went hawkers of utopian propaganda. These so-called leaders exploited our youth, told them to love other countries better than their own, taught them that every war was inglorious, that every hero was a fraud; they had them sign declarations that they would fight on their own terms; even the students of Oxford signed a declaration that they would not fight for king or country. We who came back from the last war tolerated that paradise of dreams; we sat silent while they sang utopian lullabies to youth. When we consider that the boys of that time, from fifteen to twenty years of age even five years ago, now from twenty to twenty-five, have—nothwithstanding that attempt at innoculation given to them by so-called leaders—gone from the schools and colleges and universities in a steady stream and enlisted, with that background I sometimes wonder that they enlisted at all without compulsion. It gives me renewed faith in youth when I regard them and their sterling character. The youth of this country have been weighed in the balance many a time and have never been found wanting.

A second thing that has interfered with the will to enlist is the stream of criticism that has flowed out. I have no objection to criticism if it is fair. But ever since this war broke out, a certain section of the press in this country has spread misinterpretation to deceive the Canadian people, with greater energy than any dictatorship. One man has been pursued relentlessly and maliciously in a manner before which I think future historians of Canada will stand appalled. That man is the Prime Minister of this dominion. I am not going to indulge in excessive compliment, because it always breeds suspicion, but I will say it is not for his contemporaries to judge him, and I believe that as long as this nation survives he will be remembered in the hearts of the Canadian people because of his conduct of affairs during these last few years.

One other thing I would mention is the lack of news. I do not know who is responsible for that. We hear a great deal about the desirability of more news being spread in the United States, but where we want the news is right here; the news of how the war is going, the news that a squadron of Canadian fighters was over Cologne, that a Canadian corvette limped back to port after ramming a submarine. That is of more value than all the good-will lectures and tours and visits of all the actresses in Hollywood. We are not getting that news. Our young people are asking for it. I just give that as a hint to whoever may be responsible.

Let us make no mistake about it; the crisis is coming. It may come more quickly than we think. When it does come and it may be necessary to send men overseas, let no man think we are fighting for Britain. Does anyone suggest that the Canadian boys who may be dying to-night in Alaska or the Aleutian islands are fighting for the United States? Does anyone suggest that General MacArthur's men in Australia are fighting for Britain, or that the United States troops who were reviewed by their majesties the other day are fighting for Britain? This is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said, in France, during this June month in 1897:

> I am told that here in France there are people surprised at the attachment which I feel for the crown of England, and which I do not conceal. . . . That double fidelity to ideas and aspirations, quite distinct, is our glory in Canada. We (French Canadians) are faithful to the great nation that gave us life; we are faithful to the great nation that gave us liberty.

That liberty is in jeopardy to-night. It is in greater danger than ever before in the history of our world. Are we going to let it die? Do we want a repetition of Lidice in Canada, where every man was shot to death, every woman raped and sent to a concentration camp, and every child sent to a propaganda school to learn how to murder his neighbours and his kinsmen? Do we want in this country a repetition of the atrocities of Hong Kong? In my part of the country when there is a forest fire we do not wait until it comes round our homestead. We go out to meet it and keep it from our precious possessions, and I believe that is true also on the prairies. There is a line in the United States national anthem which I think fits this case:

> O! thus be it ever, when freemen shall stand
> Between their loved homes and wild war's desolation!

When this crisis comes and it is necessary to act, I hope that action will not be the calling of parliament to debate this question again. Democracy is always at a disadvantage in war time. The dictator and the tyrant act on the instant. Democracy acts by consultation, debate and discussion. Dictatorial powers in war time are necessary, if they are not usurped and if they are given to leaders by the people. That is what we have done. The people have given the government power. Why should the government call us back here to discuss this matter at great length again? Hitler will not wait. Do not blame the method; blame Hitler, because he is responsible. The other day I read an address delivered by Admiral King, commander of the United States fleet, to the cadets at Annapolis who were just leaving to go into service. That great leader told those boys three things which I wish I could spread all over Canada: "First, do your best with what you have, and remember that there is no perfection in war either in men or in equipment. Second, do not mourn or weep over the water that has gone over the dam in the past, but let your cry be, 'Where do we go from here?' Third, there are difficulties, but 'difficulties' is the name given to things we have to overcome."

One other thought. As a Canadian I deplore the aspersions cast on Quebec. I know Quebec; it has been kind to me. I know its people. Like many others in this house, my ancestors came to this country nearly 150 years ago from the highlands of Scotland. They did useful work in this country; probably the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will say they did the most useful work of any race, and I might agree with him. They came here in search of liberty, looking for freedom to worship God, but they did not forget that the country to which they came was born of French vision, pioneered by French enterprise, colonized by French courage and blessed by French religion. We have lived in peace. The rocks from which we Canadians have been hewn were of divers countries and divers races. We are not bound together, as someone has said, by reverence for a common past or a common ancestry. We are bound together by a common hope, a hope for a peaceful world, where each man will eat in safety under his own vine what he has planted, and sing the merry song of peace to all his neighbours. We in this country are not enemies; we are friends. We must not be permitted to become enemies. We must not let anything drive us apart, not even this bill, because, as I said before, I believe we are one in hope and in heart.

We are passing through dark days. They will be darker. We shall have to give up many things. We shall have to give up our leisure and devote it to the service of our country in some capacity. There will be less gasoline, less sugar, fewer tires, fewer silk stockings, and other things, but I believe we can take it as a nation. One night, 170 years ago, by a flickering camp fire, a great soldier and writer wrote these lines on a drum head, and I think they might be our lines to-day:

> These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now, deserves the love and thanks of man and woman.

We have this for our consolation: the more difficult the conflict, the greater will be the triumph. We are not pessimistic. I close with one further memory, which is somewhat sacred to many people in this house. It was a spring day in France in 1918; a day of yellow sunshine, with birds singing above the mutter of the guns, with flowers creeping out among the broken walls. The road hog of Europe was on the move; his grey troops were trying to crush the British and French armies, and there came to every commander of a Canadian unit this message. Does it not sound as though it were written yesterday?

> In an endeavour to reach an immediate decision the enemy has gathered all his forces and struck a mighty blow at the British army. . . .
> Measures have been taken successfully to meet this German onslaught. The French have gathered a powerful army, commanded by a most able and trusted leader and this army is now moving swiftly to our help. Fresh British divisions are being thrown in. The Canadians are soon to be engaged. Our motor machine gun brigade has already played a most gallant part and once again covered itself with glory.
> Looking back with pride on the unbroken record of your glorious achievements, asking you to realize that today the fate of the British empire hangs in the balance, I place my trust in the Canadian corps, knowing that where Canadians are engaged there can be no giving way.
> Under the orders of your devoted officers in the coming battle you will advance or fall where you stand facing the enemy. . . .
> Canadians, in this fateful hour, I command you and I trust you to fight as you have ever fought with all your strength, with all your determination, with all your tranquil courage. On many a hard fought field of battle you have overcome this enemy. With God's help you shall achieve victory once more.

That was a message from Sir Arthur Currie, commander of the Canadian corps. My point is this: That message was sent to us a little more than three months after the conscription election, with all its turbulent activities. Do you suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the men who listened to that and went over the top to crack the Hindenburg line were worried about conscription? The Frenchman from Three Rivers was in the centre of his platoon; on his right was a Scotsman from Cape Breton; on his left an Irishman from the Fraser Valley or Toronto, an Englishman from Victoria. One word only described them; it was the word "Canada" on their shoulders.

I believe the spirit with which those men obeyed that order is still ours in Canada. And I believe this, that if we will only banish intolerance from our minds and prejudice from our hearts, and go forward together, with God's help we, too, will achieve victory.

Mr. ROBERT RYAN (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in this debate. First I would congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) upon the well-prepared, ably delivered and explicit statement he made to the house at the opening of the debate. I would congratulate, too, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) upon the courageous and vigorous statement he made, and the clear manner in which he placed his position, and that of Quebec, before the house. I would congratulate, too, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) upon his clear exposition of the position of Quebec.

I congratulate the government upon the nomination of the Minister of Justice to his portfolio, because I believe the Prime Minister selected for that post one of the most capable men in Canada. May I congratulate, too, all other ministers and hon. members who have taken part in the debate. Each has expressed his views. One cannot be in favour of all he hears from the orators, but we can believe at least that these men have spoken in good faith.

I have believed since the first session of this parliament that the Conservative party, those who have supported that party and certain organizations throughout Canada, have waged an organized campaign to create prejudice in the public mind against the Prime Minister. There is no doubt whatsoever as to the truth of that suggestion, and I could prove it from clippings I have taken from editorials in newspapers.

Six months after the beginning of the war there was a general election, and the leaders of both the major parties stated there was to be no conscription for overseas service. I understand some hon. members opposite did not accept the statement of their leader. That does not matter, however, because the statement was made by both leaders. At the first session of parliament the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) stated in the house that he had been chosen temporary leader, and that when he was chosen it was understood he would oppose the government. He also stated, "As long as I remain in the house I intend to oppose the government." I give him credit that that is what he has done since the first session.

There has been an organized campaign to create prejudice against the Prime Minister—not so much against the government, because it has been suggested at certain times, particularly during the first and second sessions of this parliament, that certain ministers might replace the Prime Minister, if he would kindly get out. I believe it was the Montreal Gazette which stated, "Now is the time for the Prime Minister to resign. He could resign in all his glory. He could be one of the best Prime Ministers Canada ever had, if he would get out now." They are of the same opinion to-day.

I recall that on January 26 one of the Ottawa daily papers published a special number in three sections. There was the regular news section, and two others in addition. One of those sections was headed "Canada's War Effort for Victory", and pointed out that the war effort of the dominion was rapidly expanding to a peak. In those special sections I found photographs of nine ministers, and five other gentlemen connected with war departments. The texts under these pictures were most appropriate, giving due credit for the work done by each. So far as it went this was all right. But something was missing, in none of the sections was there a photograph of the Prime Minister of Canada. Why was it missing? It was missing for the reason I mentioned earlier, namely, prejudice against the Prime Minister.

If ministers of the crown have done their duty, they should receive credit. But if, for instance, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) have done their duty, then surely some of the credit must go to the Prime Minister who had the good judgment to select those men—because we know it is the Prime Minister who made the selection. Let us give him credit.

During the last session I said this, "We may not agree with everything that is being done by the government; but we should agree that on the whole the Prime Minister and the government are carrying on a gigantic undertaking very satisfactorily and under strict control." I repeat that to-night, because it is just as true now as it was then.

In that connection may I read an extract from Liberty of June 20, appearing under the hand of the publisher:

> An executive of one of Canada's greatest industrial concerns has stated, "I wonder if people realize that they have seen a miracle. They possibly do not know it, but they have seen in Canada in the last two years the greatest per capita industrial expansion that has ever occurred to any people anywhere."

Following that statement, I should like at this time to congratulate the Minister of Munitions and Supply upon the clear statement of facts which he gave us the other day. I think he has always been held in high esteem, but he will be held in still higher esteem after making that statement. I think it was John Ruskin who wrote:

> That the greatest thing a human soul ever does in this world is to see something, and tell what he saw in a plain way. Hundreds of people can talk for one who can think, but thousands can think for one who can see.

There is no argument as to where the defence line of Canada lies; the difference of opinion is in connection with the method to be used to select men to reinforce that line. In connection with conscription for overseas, I should like to read a letter which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of June 23 signed by a gentleman named Arnold Stuart. The heading on this letter, which I suppose is put there by the Gazette, is "Crerar's Convictions", and it reads:

> Sir,—This morning's leading editorial asks some pertinent questions concerning Hon. T. A. Crerar, federal Minister of Mines and Resources. "Where are the convictions of 1917," you ask, "and where is his courage of that war?" (concerning conscription).
> Well, I should say it is quite possible that Mr. Crerar has looked up the record. Perhaps you should do so too, Mr. Editor. It would show the following:
> 404,000 enrolments under the Military Service Act (conscription).
> 380,000 exemptions asked (118,000 in Ontario; 115,000 in Quebec, etc.).
> 104,000 exemption claims approved in Ontario; 108,000 in Quebec, and so on in other provinces.
> 31,000 ordered to report for duty. 5,000 of these defaulted, leaving 26,000 net yield out of 405,000 enrolled.

It is quite possible, Mr. Editor, indeed highly probable, that Hon. Mr. Crerar and his leader the Prime Minister, have these figures of the results of conscription in mind. Is it any wonder that they want to defer conscription until every other expedient has failed?

The Gazette said in 1918 concerning the Union government's course in applying the Military Service Act (conscription):

The government appears to have established a system which, if it gets the men at all, will get them so slowly that whatever military advantage depends on expeditious reinforcement will be lost.

If, as is alleged, recruits are coming in satisfactorily under the voluntary system there would appear to be little reason to turn again to the sad expedient of 1917. The fact is that politicians on both sides have for decades made such a bête noir of conscription that now it rises up to bedevil the whole domain of our war psychology. But nothing is to be gained by ignoring the real situation.

The leader of the opposition made the following statement, as reported on page 2768 of Hansard:

Because this government in the first nine months of the war did absolutely nothing to meet the situation. They were going to have a moderate war. A moderate war! Ask any hon. member from the province of Quebec if they were not promised that Canada's contribution would be a moderate contribution.

As far as I am concerned I have no recollection, and I do not believe anyone else has, that Quebec was promised a moderate war. The promise was made to Quebec that men would not be conscripted for overseas service. Quebec has never objected to a total war effort; Quebec has never objected to men enrolling voluntarily to go any place in the world. Quebec has not criticized the all-out war effort, and it did not criticize the billion dollar gift to England for food, materials and so on. Quebec has not criticized the budget or anything else. There has been no criticism of the government or of any action that has been taken in furthering our total war effort. But the people of Quebec were promised, and they want the government to keep the promise that there will be no conscription for service overseas.

There is one thing I have had in mind for a long time, but hon. members who have spoken before me have brought this up. I am in favour of increased pay for the men in the armed forces. I am also in favour of widowed mothers whose only sons have enlisted being given the same allowance as that received by a wife, namely, $35 a month. To-day such a widowed mother receives only $20. The men who are fighting for our liberty must be assured that after the war there will be a better world in which to live, a world in which every man will be guaranteed work and security.

I want to congratulate the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) upon some of the public statements he has made during the last couple of years. I do not know if the government was aware of all these statements, but I am very much in favour of certain of the things which the Minister of Pensions and National Health thinks should be done after this war is over. In this connection I should like to quote from "The Road We are Travelling 1914-1942" by Stuart Chase. No doubt most hon. members know who Mr. Chase is. He is a writer on economic questions, and in this book which has just been published, he said:

I believe, moreover, that we are more likely to win the war if we have a clear idea of goals for the peace. Men fight better when they know for what they are fighting. Any peace we make must be superior to that which our enemies can offer. They make alluring promises about new orders and new spheres of prosperity. These promises are widely heard in the lands most affected, and we shall have to do more than sneer at them. We shall have to—and can—offer something better, more just and more convincing.

Defeatism about the peace is almost as dangerous as defeatism about the war. The victory need not and must not lead to economic depression and disaster at home. Actually, when peace does come, it will be an opportunity and a challenge; an opportunity to use our vastly increased plant and human resources to raise the standard of living for us all; a challenge to make a greater civilization.

If our young men were assured that there would be a new and better world after this war, they might feel like joining up.

There are a number of things I should like to say with regard to the plebiscite, and I should like to give my understanding of the plebiscite vote. First, I understand it as a vote to release the government from the promise they had given to the people of Canada that men would not be conscripted for service overseas. Second, the plebiscite was the only democratic method by which the government could secure an expression of opinion from the people in regard to their promise. Third, the "yes" vote in eight provinces did release the government from their promise. However, this vote cannot be interpreted as a definite and emphatic vote for conscription but should be interpreted as a vote for freedom of action for the government. Fourth, the "no" vote refused to release the government from their promise. This vote must be understood as a definite and emphatic vote against conscription of men for service overseas. Fifth, if Bill No. 80 is adopted by parliament, it is my opinion that should the government find it necessary to impose conscription of men for overseas service, the matter should be submitted to parliament for final decision.

It has not been proven up to the present that the voluntary method of enrolling men has not been satisfactory and that, if there had been conscription of men for overseas service, a greater number of men could have been trained and equipped. I never heard that any of the three defence ministers were not satisfied with enrolments under the voluntary system. I understood that some time ago the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) stated that he believed that with the voluntary system the country could carry on until March, 1943. I think some hon. members misunderstood the three speeches made by the ministers of defence and were under the impression that they were in favour of immediate conscription. But these three ministers did not say one word against the voluntary system. They did not say that the voluntary system had failed; they did not say or suggest that conscription should be imposed at once. They did say that they would vote for the bill. Undoubtedly the ministers of defence will vote for the bill or, like the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), they would have to resign from the government. There is no doubt in my mind that when these ministers find it necessary to impose conscription for overseas service they will be in favour of imposing it, but in their speeches they did not say anything about that. The public also are under the impression that the voluntary system has been satisfactory, and nothing has been said up to this time by the ministers of defence against that system.

The "no" vote in Quebec was not a vote intended to disrupt the bonne entente that has existed between the two races that have built up Canada. It was a vote to uphold a principle which is deeply rooted in the minds of the great majority of the electors of Quebec.

The vote on the plebiscite or on Bill No. 80 should not affect the good work that has been done up to the present to cement Canadian unity, and this good work should be continued.

Let me recall to this house the words which the Prime Minister uttered in Winnipeg on July 10, 1941. He said:

> My duty as I see it is to seek above all else to preserve national unity, for on the maintenance of national unity all else depends.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say as a Quebecker to the English-speaking members of this house that I do not think we shall find men who have more consideration for the English-speaking members than the members from Quebec, and I say to all the English-speaking members of all the other provinces that I do not believe the people of their constituencies have any better friends than the people of Quebec. I am persuaded that I can also say with equal assurance to the members from Quebec that they could not find any better friends than the English-speaking members from the other provinces, whose constituents also, I am sure, have the same friendly feeling toward the people of Quebec as the people of Quebec have towards them.

Mr. J. A. BONNIER (Saint-Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we really need conscription in this country more than in any other British colony. Many voters have asked me this question: Why should Canada adopt a conscription measure which every other English colony has rejected? I would like to have a reply to that question which I have been asked repeatedly, in order to satisfy my electors and state the government's views to them. Australia, Northern Ireland, New Zealand and India have not introduced conscription. Neither has Egypt. Why then do Great Britain and Canada wish to force conscription upon us every time war is declared? Why is this? I would like to know once for all in order to be able to enlighten my constituents.

Mr. Speaker, Sir Wilfrid Laurier always endorsed voluntary service in this country. For my part, I have done the same thing ever since I cast my first ballot. We have been brought up with that in mind. It was in 1903, I think, that we had the Boer war. We dispatched a contingent of volunteers overseas but there was no conscription. Then in 1911 the Conservatives attained power largely through a platform which denounced Laurier's reciprocal trade agreement with the United States and naval programme to the province of Quebec. They tricked the Quebec population and the English element of Canada into defeating Laurier. When he appealed to the people, the English population claimed that Canada was being sold to the United States, that the intention was to annex our country to the United States. In Quebec, the mothers were told: Laurier wants to send your sons on foreign seas immediately. He wants to send your children to war as cannon fodder. He intends sending them to the China sea and to all European waters. Was that not the cry heard all through the campaign organized by the Tories of Quebec and those of Ontario and the other English-speaking provinces in order to defeat Laurier? He was defeated and on the very next day what steps were taken by the Borden government which had just come into power? Instead of building a navy, we were asked to send $35 million to England.

In 1914, war was declared. Once more we contributed volunteers until 1917; but in 1916 a census was ordered. At first, the people of the French-Canadian province refused to register. In this difficulty, the clergy were asked to undertake a campaign in the various parishes to urge the people to register, stating that it was not a matter of conscription but simply a means of ascertaining the exact population of the country. In 1917, after the census, a conscription bill was introduced. It was opposed by all French Canadians and many Britishers. Our efforts failed to convince the people of Canada that the voluntary system of enlistment was adequate. At that time, many supporters of Laurier, even many of his former ministers, forsook him. But he remained in the struggle. Ever since his attaining the office of Prime Minister, he had held to the principle of avoiding conscription and maintaining the voluntary system. To-day, after so many years during which we have been taught that the voluntary system is the better method, how can we change our views on this subject and support conscription? Our minds have been steeped in the doctrine of voluntary enlistment. In 1938, during the partial election which brought me to this house, conscription was mentioned. I carried the vote of the Liberal convention against seven candidates. Then came the election. You all know my opponent, the former mayor of Montreal, who had been elected to his post by a majority of more than 50,000 and who has always been a dangerous opponent. My election was due to the former minister of public works (Mr. Cardin) and the late Hon. Mr. Rinfret. Conscription was brought up even then, with the promise that it would never be introduced. Again in 1940, it was generally opposed. Moreover, even the English-speaking members of the other provinces were elected on the strength of anti-conscription pledges. Why have they altered their views? Their election campaign, as that of all the others, was waged on the conscription issue. The right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) did not come to the province of Quebec only; he visited all provinces, and so did the other ministers. Was there a speech specially prepared for the province of Quebec and another for Ontario and the maritime provinces? No; he gave everywhere the same pledge, to wit, there would be no conscription.

If I remember well, one of the previous speakers who is from Prince Edward Island and represents, I think, the constituency of Queens, (Mr. Macmillan), quoted what Laurier said in France when he thanked that country for having given us birth and England for having given us freedom. Supposing France were one day to be at war not with England but with any other country. Could we then advocate conscription in order to assist our former mother country? Would such a course be accepted? Yet that is a perfectly legitimate stand: one country gave us birth and the other gave us freedom. We would certainly be willing to help our former mother country on a voluntary basis, but we would never advocate compulsory military service for that purpose.

It is said that we are cowardly and that we are afraid to participate in the war. Mr. Speaker, those who say that do not remember that in 1812 our neighbours, who are now on friendly terms with us, invaded Canada. What did the French Canadians do at that time? Did they look around in order to see if the British were there? Did they wait for conscription before rising and saying: We are going to defend our country? They did not. General de Salaberry and his army set out to meet the enemy. The battle was won near Chateauguay at the spot now called Bryson, on the Chateauguay river, in my native county. A monument erected there bears the names of French Canadians who did not wait for the English to defend Canada. They took up her defence themselves. They held their ground right up to the present border on the 45th degree of latitude.

The answer to the plebiscite in the province of Quebec and the intelligent and clear sighted vote cast by her people should have been enough to open the eyes of the Prime Minister and even of the most obtuse among his colleagues. Such also should have been the effect of the resignation of the Prime Minister's faithful colleague, who has been the senior member of this house since the death of the late Mr. Lapointe and whose tact and eloquence held the Montreal district under the Prime Minister's banner as Mr. Lapointe had done in the Quebec district. The resignation of the former Minister of Public Works has therefore come as a most conclusive confirmation of our stand.

We have always believed in Mr. Cardin's sincerity and we now have more reason than ever to do so. Just as Mr. Lapointe, our lamented leader, and we ourselves did, Mr. Cardin hoped that a government led by one whose very faithfulness to Laurier in his struggle against conscription had led to his being chosen as leader of the Liberal party, would never enforce such a measure. It seems that he was in such earnest about it that he retained his hope longer than we did. However, confronted by the facts, as soon as he realized that the Prime Minister put his cards on the table—

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. It is eleven o'clock. Does the hon. member intend to proceed with his speech at an early date?

Mr. BONNIER: It will take ten minutes at the very most.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member may continue with the unanimous consent of the house.

Is it with unanimous consent of the house?

Mr. COLDWELL: How long is the hon. gentleman going to be?

Mr. BONNIER: Eight or ten minutes.

Mr. STIRLING: I do not think we can consent to that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has not unanimous consent. Therefore he must move the adjournment of the debate since it is eleven o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Bonnier the debate was adjourned.

It being two minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 30, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS

CONSTITUENCY OF STANSTEAD—JUDGMENT OF SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from the registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada certified copy of judgment of the said court setting aside the decision of the trial judges of the Superior Court of Quebec and declaring the petition in the matter of the election for the electoral district of Stanstead should be maintained and the election of the respondent for the House of Commons should be annulled.

PRIVILEGE

MR. O'NEILL—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. MACINNIS IN DEBATE ON JUNE 29

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. O'NEILL (Kamloops): Yesterday when I was speaking in this house in the debate on the mobilization act amendment bill, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) said that some things I said were not true. In order to keep the record straight I wish to refer to page 3770 of Hansard, where the hon. member for Vancouver East is reported to have said:

I want to correct the hon. member's statement. His assertions are wrong. There was no Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in this house in 1934.

The record is somewhat different. On February 1, 1933, at page 1687 of Hansard, the late Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, then the member for Winnipeg North Centre, speaking to a resolution of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, had this to say:

When I introduced this motion a year ago there was no large body of organized opinion behind it. To-day that situation is altered, for last August there was organized the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation—

Then he goes on to say:

We endorse the general viewpoint and programme involved in socialization of our economic life as these have already been outlined and accepted by the labour, farmer and socialist groups affiliating.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Is this a question of privilege? I cannot hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is speaking to a question of privilege in regard to a statement which he made yesterday and which the hon. member for Vancouver East characterized as incorrect.

Mr. COLDWELL: We were not able to hear what the hon. gentleman was saying. I heard indistinctly the name of Mr. Woodsworth mentioned, but could not hear anything else.

Mr. MacINNIS: On a question of privilege—

Some hon. MEMBES: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: If the hon. member for Kamloops makes a statement we surely have the right to reply. His statement should have been made last night.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is referring to a statement he made in debate, which, he says, the hon. member for Vancouver East characterized as untrue. He is now rising to a question of privilege in order to substantiate the statement he made.

Mr. O'NEILL: The hon. member for Vancouver East did not merely characterize it as untrue; he said positively that it was not true. That was in connection with my statement that the hon. member for Vancouver East had voted with the Conservative government for private ownership of the Bank of Canada, when the bill relating to the Bank of Canada was introduced for third reading.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is an argument.

Mr. O'NEILL: I have not taken up much of the time of this house, Mr. Speaker, and I think I have the right to proceed. On June 28, 1934, the hon. member for Vancouver East and the late Mr. Woodsworth voted with the government on the third reading of the bill for the establishment of a privately-owned central bank, on a division in which the Liberals all voted against privately-owned banks.

MR. CHURCH—REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. SLAGHT IN DEBATE ON JUNE 25

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to refer to a speech made in the house last Thursday by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), at page 3695 of Hansard, in which he mentioned myself and the Union government and the Military Service Act. He based his remarks on a text book, Doctor Skelton's "Life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier." He said:

I am sorry the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) is not here, for the Toronto Globe referred to the widespread feeling of disappointment, while it is said that Mayor Church of Toronto stated:

"The Military Service Act will cost the country millions and is getting very little results. If the government had spent one-quarter of the money in voluntary recruiting, they would have got more men."

Let me say that this book does not quote the page or the issue of the Toronto Globe, nor does it say what I said, because the remarks were never made in that connection. I was complaining about one thing, and that was a lack of equitable enforcement of that act throughout Canada. I complained because before the act became effective Toronto and Ontario had been dried up of voluntary recruits, and hardly any could be further obtained.

I never saw Doctor Skelton's text book until this afternoon. And may I say that the hon. member for Parry Sound has described the author of the book as an historian. Well, if he is an historian he should state facts. The book does not state facts, because the real fact is that from the start I strongly supported the Union government and the Military Service Act. My only complaint was in connection with the non-enforcement of the act elsewhere in the province, and particularly its enforcement in Toronto. I called attention to the fact that that enforcement was not equitable. In reply to the hon. member for Parry Sound I say that what I said was that the enforcement of the act was unfair to Toronto and to Ontario generally.

Two or three years before this war, from 1937 to 1939, I urged on many occasions here a compulsory selective service register for Canada. I have been a supporter of that policy, and before and during the 1940 election I supported conscription and the policy of equality of sacrifice. Then the hon. member for Parry Sound makes things worse by casting reflections upon me, and by attempting to show a worse side of the picture. Referring to me he said "that I had been misled by my absentee leader". I was not a member of the House of Commons between 1917 and 1921. And may I point out in passing that the absentee leader to whom he refers has two sons in England, and that the party he refers to polled nearly one-half of the total vote in the elections of 1940. I might have something to say about these matters in another debate, because the hon. member has not stated the facts exactly and the connection to which they relate. His facts are not correct, nor are those of the writer of the book. I may challenge this or discuss it at another time.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX

BUDGET PROVISION FOR REFUND OF 20 PER CENT AFTER THE WAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): In view of concern which has been expressed to the effect that the 20 per cent of excess profits tax to be refunded after the war is to be taxable as income when refunded, would the Minister of Finance make a statement in the matter?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): It will not be subject to income tax when refunded. It will be regarded as a part of income which is already taxed.

BEEF

REDUCTION OF PRICE PAID BY PACKERS TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture. A few days ago the price control board issued a statement setting a ceiling price on beef, and stating that there would be three reductions between July and September, the first of which, to the extent of one cent a pound, is to take effect on July 13. On what authority did packers in Toronto and Winnipeg yesterday reduce the prices for beef paid to farmers to the extent of one cent a pound at Toronto and one and a half cents at Winnipeg?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Probably I am the minister responsible. All I can say is that I shall make inquiries and let him have the information either privately or in the house, as he wishes.

Mr. TUSTIN: It is reported in this morning's press.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 23, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Tomorrow will be the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of this dominion—a long time in the life of an individual, but relatively short in the life of a nation. Only one other nation—the United States—has made such rapid strides in intellectual progress, political development, and material wealth in such a short period of time. So rapid has been our growth along all these lines, so certain has been our advancement, that we have been largely unconscious of our own development or of our strength. Yet on this seventy-fifth birthday of this nation we are literally standing on the edge of an abyss, and the whole future of civilization hangs in the balance. What a paradox!

What the end will be, no one can foresee. Dark days ahead—yes. But victory in the end is certain if we of the united nations will but gird our loins, put on the full armour of our strength, and pull our weight in the great task which lies before us.

In one respect at least this budget is the answer of the Canadian people to the challenge of the hour. Financial sacrifice—yes. But, after all, that is the least we can do. If you do not believe that, remember the casualty lists of 1917 and 1918, and try to visualize those of this year, next year, and every year until this war is won.

There was neither glamour nor high-sounding rhetoric nor political adornment in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to which we listened on Tuesday last. But there were statements and assertions of an arresting nature at the close of the minister's address which I sincerely hope caught the ear of all the people of Canada, including, if I may say so, those in this house who, in the early days of the war, advocated a moderate contribution—a middle-of-the-road course—for Canada.

I have observed during a somewhat long and full life that if you want to get the immediate attention of an individual you have only to say or do something which affects him personally, something which will affect his pocket-book. We have this something here in this budget.

The tax proposals are not only substantial; they are crushingly severe, and will bring home to all of us, as perhaps nothing else could, "the critical gravity of recent events and the necessity of making a supreme effort", to use the words of the minister, not only during this present year but in each succeeding year in which this nation, along with those of the united nations, will be engaged in a struggle for survival.

The position which the minister portrayed in the concluding paragraphs of his address is exactly the position which I have tried, perhaps inadequately, to portray to the Canadian people from the very first session of this parliament. There have been times when I have been appalled, and have had a feeling of despair at the apathy of a large portion of our people. In the early stages of 1940 there was a feeling of complacency which, in my view, was engendered and fostered by the attitude of the administration itself. Fortunately that has been reversed, both in the minds of the administration and in the minds of our people.

Their complacency, their desires for "gain and ease and advantage"—again quoting the minister—from now on must be submerged in the nation's will to win. I only regret that in one particular feature the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has not shown that will to win which is so urgently needed. But I say this, that sooner or later—I hope not too late—he, going along with the more forthright members of his cabinet, will change his views and practise what he has so long preached—total war with total effort. We are now approaching full conscription of wealth, and soon, I trust, we will be practising, in fact as well as in theory, the total mobilization and use of all the resources of the nation.

To those of us who recall the budgets of Mr. Fielding, in the pre-war days, the budgets of Sir Thomas White, in the days of world war No. 1, or even the budgets after that war, this year's budget is a stern reminder that two world wars have changed our whole economy, as indeed they have changed the lives of every one of us.

The consideration of ways and means should be one of the chief preoccupations of this House of Commons, and I regret exceedingly that the delivery of this budget has been delayed to this late date in the session. Here we were, late in the fifth month of the session, on the ninety-second sitting day, listening to the largest budget—in terms of dollars and in terms of material sacrifice—in our history. The delay in its presentation is directly attributable to the anxiety of the Prime Minister to maintain his political position in the country and has been brought about largely by his determination to carry through the farce of the plebiscite and his policy of appeasement. We have had almost a hundred speeches by hon. members opposite on the debate on the address, and at least seventy-five on this mobilization bill. On this question of delay, six of the twelve months of the calendar year have passed. Now, after six months, business executives, and more especially taxpayers in the lower income brackets, are being called upon to make tremendous adjustments in order to meet the strain occasioned by this budget. Six months of the calendar year have gone by, and to bring down these changes so late in the year does not give the taxpayer any opportunity to make a twelve months' adjustment, but compels him to carry out a twelve months' adjustment in the last six months of the year. That position is unfair, especially for the small salaried man who has to budget at the beginning of every year and who makes his commitments in the first part of the year. It reveals an attitude of indifference to the plight of the people who are called upon to pay this budget, and it is wholly reprehensible.

In the more than five months in which parliament has been in session, we have really dealt with only three of four important pieces of legislation—the billion dollar appropriation for Britain, the two billion dollar war appropriation bill, the wheat legislation, and the dominion-provincial agreements. All the rest of the time was wasted on the debate on the address, the perfectly useless and wasteful debate on the plebiscite bill, and still later, the debate on bill 80, amending the mobilization act—all three of which measures should have been disposed of in as many weeks.

No wonder the people of Canada look askance at this House of Commons and, in some quarters, express amazement at our performance!

An hon. MEMBER: Ah!

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hear some hon. member interject "Ah". I venture to say that that comes from a quarter which has not contributed anything to this debate. No wonder there is a feeling of frustration on the part of the Canadian people at all this sham and shadow-boxing, and that at a time when the fortunes of the united nations are at a lower ebb than at any time since Dunkirk. I confess to you, sir, that when I heard, a week ago Sunday, the black news of the surrender of Tobruk, the news of the imminent fall of Sevastopol, the reports of the shelling of our own shores on the west coast, and this week the depressing news of the retreats in Libya, I was oppressed by the dreary and heartbreaking thought that, little by little, with a retreat here, another there, a disaster here, another there, the united nations were steadily losing this war, while we in Canada, and especially in this House of Commons, were debating among ourselves the question whether we would or we wouldn't, not whether we could or we couldn't, achieve in deed and in truth that which, for two long years, the administration has professed with lip service but which it has not by any means reached—the practice of total war. Surely the time has arrived when we should cease talking about the things which divide us, and here and now highly resolve that if we are to survive we must resort to and put into practice complete and unlimited action, along the line of principles to which most of us, if we will be but true to ourselves, will admit that we adhere.

Down in Washington last week the two greatest statesmen in the world, the two men upon whom the eyes of the whole allied world are to-day straining their vision—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Three.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —were meeting to perfect ways and means—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Three.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —of stemming the tide of retreat. I said two, and I stick to it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Three.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have a little order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must insist that the leader of the opposition have the right to proceed without further interruption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They were meeting to perfect ways and means of stemming the tide of retreat, adopting plans to turn retreat into offence—offence which is the only road to victory. May God guide and direct them. For I say to you, my friends, unless the united nations adopt a new attitude and strike out in an offensive, we shall continue to see and witness more retreats and more disasters.

For months now I have been looking for some sign of an offensive action in Europe. I am firmly convinced this war can and will only be won where it started—in Europe. I pray that there shall not be a day's delay in reaching a decision. When that time comes, then our gallant Canadian army in Britain, together with the forces of Britain and the hosts from the United States now being massed there, will strike the vital blows that are so necessary for the liberation of the world. Then, and then only, will the forces of the united nations be in a position to overthrow the forces of evil.

I try to visualize the difficulties, with Britain already fighting on so many fronts; but if Russia fails, then ultimate victory recedes. Who is there among us but does not shudder at the very thought of Russian failure?

I have no special knowledge of the feasibility of the project, but we are supposed to have the best trained and best equipped army of its size in Britain. United States troops are being massed there in large numbers. Surely they are not there merely for the defence of Britain. The time and the manner and the place must be left to those in authority.

I turn now to a consideration of our financial requirements for our war effort this year. So far as I have been able to estimate, they, together with the normal peace-time outlay of government, will approximate four billions of dollars. The minister says it will not be less than $3,900 million. Just imagine a total budget expenditure of almost four billions of dollars for this little nation of less than twelve million souls—more than $333 for every man, woman and child in Canada! What a task to raise, by various means, this vast sum of money!

Can it be done? I believe it can and will be done, but it will mean sacrifice, great sacrifice. Let there be no mistake about that. I believe the Canadian people will make the sacrifice willingly, if they are convinced that they will have the leadership so necessary—leadership that we have never had right down to this moment.

Direct taxation and incidental revenues on the basis of 1941-42 are producing many times as much as was produced in the last pre-war year. What we have already accomplished will not be good enough for this and succeeding years of the war. This country will have to produce by taxation two billions of dollars, or half our total outlay, if we are even to approach within striking distance of the objective of the pay-as-you-go—as far as practicable—policy of the administration, and to which neither we nor the Canadian people in general have objected. I have always said the Canadian people will give and lend to the limit, to this or any other government, the money necessary to win this war, but they want the money spent properly, not wasted, and they will hold the government strictly to account.

There is one very grave omission in this budget. Every individual is being asked to practise the most rigorous economy. But what proof is there in this budget, or indeed elsewhere in government policy, that ordinary operating costs of government are being cut to the bare bone, that waste is being eliminated, that thrift and frugality are being practised? In every quarter there is evidence of wasteful expenditure, and particularly is this true in defence expenditures. Evidence and examples of that reach me almost daily, and I know it must be within the knowledge of almost every member of this house, this terrible extravagance that is going on in connection with defence projects. I say to the ministry that the new tax proposals would meet with a more generous reception and there would be greater willingness to shoulder the new tax burdens if the government would itself set the example of economy. Instead, it has budgeted for a 10 per cent increase in ordinary non-war costs of government—instead of what it should be 10 per cent cut off, and then 10 per cent more cut off.

We have a rising national income, attributable largely to war expenditure—not true national income, as I understand that term, but yet national income as interpreted by the economists. How large is that national income? Estimates vary. It depends on who is making the estimate; but let us estimate it at seven billions of dollars. I think that is a little high; but it will approach that figure. If so, then we must divert by taxation at least one-third to war purposes. The balance required must be raised by loans and other devices, if we are to follow the orthodox methods of the administration and its advisers. This will strain the resources of the Canadian people to the utmost. We must not disguise that fact in any way. There must be more of the tightening of the belt, as has been stressed from time to time.

We have raised $2,600 million in our four war loans, in war savings, and in free loans, in forty months of war. Four billions more in taxes and loans or other devices will test us, but I believe the loyal people of Canada will meet the test with fortitude and endurance. We must—or else! All they ask is that the burden of taxation be equitably distributed, and that there be equality of sacrifice. Surely they are entitled to that.

Really, Mr. Speaker, when you come to examine the position, what hardships have we, as a people, been called upon to endure up to this time? Relatively high taxation? Yes. But what else? A little less coffee, a little less tea, a little less sugar, a little less clothing, a little less gasoline, and now we are to be asked to pay a little more for whisky and tobacco. There are also some slight restrictions on consumer goods and in other directions. But let us be candid with each other. We have not sacrificed much—nothing like what the people of Britain have sacrificed; nothing like what I fear we shall have to sacrifice before this war is won. Let us face the future manfully and realistically. Let us tap the national income all along the line without fear or favour. Let everyone from the highest all the way down do his share. Only then shall we be able to face our conscience and each of us say to himself: I am doing and shall do my part if it takes the last dollar. The stake is worth it, my friends. That is the text and that is the spirit I offer to the Canadian people to-day.

When Canada entered this war in September, 1939, our basic sources of revenue were customs duties, excise duties and taxes, including a sales tax of 8 per cent, and income tax on corporations and individuals. From these sources, in the fiscal year immediately preceding the war, we derived a total of 435 millions of dollars.

In the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941, we collected from those same basic sources a total of 1,359 millions of dollars, or more than three times as much. I think it is fair to add that we have had some new taxes not differing in principle or radically different in any degree, except in quantum, from the old taxes.

The ability of a country with a population of less than twelve millions to pay in taxation a total of nearly 1½ billions of dollars—averaging, as it does, about $120 per capita—without undue hardship, is a tribute not only to our people but to the material resources of this country.

In making this vast contribution in cash to the national revenues, there have been some inequities and some inequalities. In particular, in the field of personal income taxation, there has not been equality of sacrifice. I emphasized this on a previous occasion. When in 1940, and again in 1941, the rates on personal incomes were raised by the budgets of those years, I indicated the view I held that the taxes then imposed on such personal income were inequitable and lacked the element of equality of sacrifice.

I now wish to deal in some detail, if the house will bear with me, with the proposals of the Minister of Finance with respect to personal income tax.

In his personal income tax proposals the minister has had three major objectives in view. First is the curtailment of present excess purchasing power and the diversion of as large a proportion as possible of the national income to direct war purposes. The curtailment of existing purchasing power is necessary to-day in order to curb the causes of inflation and in order to divert labour from the manufacture of unnecessary consumer goods to the manufacture of war materials or to the use of those materials in the armed forces.

So far as curbing the causes of inflation is concerned, it will be recognized that the existence of a price ceiling may prevent inflation, but I suggest that it does not strike at the causes of inflation and certainly does not prevent inequitable distribution of available essential consumer goods. Consequently a further curtailment of purchasing power and a further diversion of labour to war purposes has become an essential part of our war financing programme.

It will be recollected that last year I criticized the minister's budget on the ground that it had not faced, with sufficient realism, the problem of consumer spending. The enormous increase in retail sales during the last year has demonstrated that I was justified in that criticism, and I am glad to note now that, not only in his income tax proposals but in his new taxation of luxury commodities, the minister has met, in a measure at least—perhaps to a large degree—the criticism which I offered last year.

I now turn to the minister's second objective, which was, of course, the raising of additional revenue. He estimates that the increased yield from the personal income tax will be 45 millions of dollars for the remainder of the present fiscal year, and 115 millions of dollars for a full year. That is a large increase, and I do not believe that people will visualize just how large it is unless a comparison is made with what they have been paying heretofore under the same heading.

The magnitude of this increase is perhaps best illustrated by the fact that in the fiscal year 1938-39 the total personal income tax collections amounted to only 46 millions of dollars. In the fiscal year 1939-40, during seven months of which we were at war, the total income tax collections amounted to only 45 millions of dollars. In other words, the total increased yield from the tax increases for the remainder of the present fiscal year is as much as our total collections from personal income tax in the fiscal year 1939-40, during seven months of which we were at war. Our total income tax collections, including national defence tax, for the first full fiscal year during which we were at war, namely 1940-41, amounted to only 106 millions of dollars. Consequently the anticipated yield from the increased rates for a full year is almost 10 millions of dollars more than our total collections by way of income tax for the first full fiscal year of the war. That, I think, illustrates the size of the increases.

The third objective which the minister had in mind would appear to be the provision of post-war purchasing power to aid in post-war recovery. I was rather amused at a question—I suppose a framed question—asked by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) at the opening of this sitting, whether the refundable portion of the tax collected would be subject to further income tax. Well, it is a ridiculous question. To do so would be a violation of good faith, and I wonder at the mentality of the hon. member who asked the question.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is just a little lecture, and does not call for a reply from the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question was being asked publicly by certain newspapers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the newspapers had better examine their own heads, because to tax that twice would be a breach of faith. It is income tax now, it is credit; it is to be given back to us, and no government, unless it was a socialist government, would dare to tax it twice.

Mr. ROWE: That is why the question was asked in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps that is the reason. If that is so I will forgive the hon. member the question.

In this provision, the minister has adopted in large measure the principles and theories of the great English economist, John Maynard Keynes, whose principles and theories, as expounded by him in his book, "How to Pay for the War", have also been largely adopted in England. As I propose to discuss them in greater detail a little later in my address, I shall not dilate upon them further at this juncture, except to point out that two forward-thinking members of the opposition have frequently advocated the adoption of such a plan. I mention in particular the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Bence) and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) both of whom have advocated the plan with considerable force and vigour.

These three, then, were the objectives which the minister had in view in presenting his proposals, and the success of his proposals must be judged largely by the manner in which they attain the objectives.

In addition to stating his proposals, the minister laid down three standards or criteria on the basis of which to judge his proposals—namely the need for equity, for incentive, and for savings. That these are proper criteria I would not disagree; I think perhaps we all agree, although we may not be completely in accord on the question whether the minister's proposals are fully in line with all these criteria.

The minister mentioned the danger that high progressive rates of income tax may interfere with the incentive for harder and better work for efficient production; and well he may. There is such a thing as killing the goose that lays the golden egg. In mentioning this the minister recognized, of course, the important role which profit plays in the life of every individual, every last one of us. I would hope that the proposals have not too seriously interfered with that instinctive craving of individual human beings, and that the people of this country will respond to the urgent necessity of making service to the state—let me emphasize that—in this time of national crisis their major incentive to greater and more efficient production. Service to the state, not private profit or private gain, should be the standard for every one of us.

I propose to turn now to a discussion of some of the highlights of the proposals themselves. I think it is only on the anvil of discussion we can get to understand these proposals. That is one of my excuses, not an apology, for occupying the time of this house on this very hot afternoon, and if I add something to the sum total of the knowledge of hon. members I am sure they will forgive me.

The first important change is what the minister speaks of as the combination of the national defence tax and the graduated income tax into a single assessment. In committee we shall be able to analyse these imposts and determine whether the minister has gone far enough in the combination of the two taxes. What is now spoken of as the "normal" rate of tax appears in reality to be substantially the old national defence tax. It differs in principle from the graduated income tax in that is is assessable against the total income of any person whose income exceeds certain specified amounts. In view of the attempt which will be made to deduct both types of income tax at the source, I hope the minister will explain to the committee why he has not made a full and complete combination of the two taxes into a single graduated tax—in other words, added the percentages required to be paid under the normal tax to the percentages required to be paid under the graduated income tax, properly adjusted to produce the same revenue. This would have meant greater simplicity, I submit, both for the individual taxpayer and for the tax officials of the Department of National Revenue. There may be good reasons why this was not done, but I should like the minister to explain fully in the committee stage just why it was not done. I have a shrewd suspicion as to what the reason was. By this method of putting the normal tax on the full amount of taxable income the minister desires to draw a larger sum from the lower wage and lower salaried people than he would by a complete combination. I think that is incontrovertible.

I am bound to say that I think the increase in rates of the normal tax as opposed to the old national defence tax was expected. I do not think there will be great objection. I believe it will make for equality of sacrifice, a principle for which I have always contended. The increase, however, in the graduated taxes is tremendously heavy, although, as the minister pointed out, there are certain alleviating features which are introduced into our financial system for the first time, and which I shall discuss a little later. These increases will bear heavily upon all classes of our citizenship and will involve a very substantial change in the mode of living of practically every class of our Canadian people. Subject to certain inequalities which I shall point out later, and which I hope the minister will undertake to rectify, I believe the Canadian people will assume this burden in the same spirit of patriotism and willingness to sacrifice as they have assumed every other burden which they have been called upon to bear since the outbreak of the war. These increases are part of the price which we must pay for victory. I do not believe there is any class of our Canadian citizenry who are not prepared to place their last dollar at the government's disposal if it will mean the triumph of our institutions over the forces of evil and terror.

The next important feature in the income tax resolutions is the proposal to collect payments by regular deduction at the source, or, where that is impracticable, by compulsory instalment payment. There will be objections to this procedure in some quarters. There are many deductions from pay envelopes now. There is grumbling, and demands will be made for higher and higher salaries and wages to meet these deductions. In the early stages of the war these demands were met by many employers. This new deduction will cause a good deal of irritation; but, having considered the matter from every angle, I do not intend to oppose the procedure. I realize that this is the easiest method by which the government can get the money, and this is the surest method by which payments will be made. It must be obvious, I think, to all of us that the tax rates have reached such a level that their payment must be a matter of grave anxiety to the taxpayer and a matter of monthly budgeting by every one of us.

I was rather disappointed to hear the minister say in the course of his speech that only a minority had availed themselves of the heretofore existing voluntary instalment plan. I believe that plan was both good and useful, I used it myself. I was compelled to use it, and I found it satisfactory. The new plan of deduction at the source, or the compulsory instalment payment, will bring not only increased revenue but earlier revenue to the treasury, and it will above everything else help to curb consumer-spending by preventing prodigal and spendthrift individuals from going on a buying spree, thus utilizing unnecessary consumer goods and then finding themselves unable to meet their obligations to the state.

The minister has changed the whole principle of exemptions in respect of dependency. Instead of allowing specific sums as exemptions in respect of marriage and dependents, the minister proposes in effect to freeze the value of exemptions at the amount which they have been worth under existing tax rates, to a taxpayer with an income of between $2,500 and $3,000. This feature of the minister's proposal is open to serious objection, and in my view works unwarranted hardship upon the family man as opposed to the single person. I am sure the minister will agree that the family man should be in no less favourable position than the single man or woman, but that is exactly what is occurring and that is where he is being put. He is being put in a less favourable position.

No matter what the economic status of a husband may be, he will now be allowed only $150 deduction in respect of his wife and $80 in respect of each child. Surely no one will suggest that there is any equity in this. Surely no one will assert that the obligations of a married man with two children are only $310 per annum greater than those of a single person. Surely no one will suggest that the obligations of a married man who must buy or rent quarters and provide clothing and food for his family, must provide for the education of his children and the security of his dependents in the event of anything happening to him, are so little greater than those of a single person. Is it right that a man with the responsibilities of a home should be given only $150 per anum consideration for having undertaken those responsibilities, and an additional $80 for each child whom he maintains? I ask the minister to reconsider that whole position. It is not fair; it is not just.

The minister stated that other changes would have the effect of widening the differences between single and married persons and those with children. While some of the changes do perhaps have this result in an indirect way, I do not believe that any of them are of such a nature that they will place persons of these different marital circumstances upon a substantial equilibrium. I give the minister and the house an example of what I consider to be a glaring case of discrimination and inequity. A single man earning $3,000 a year will contribute total taxes and compulsory savings amounting to $1,064 per annum; a married man with two children, with all the responsibilities of a home, education and all that goes with the maintenance of a family of four, earning $3,000 a year, will contribute total taxes and compulsory savings amounting to $668 per annum. The single man will thus be left with $1,936 net income per annum, while the married man with two children will be left with $2,332 per annum, or less than $400 more than the single man. Is it right that the man with the responsibilities of a home should be allowed less than $400 per annum consideration for having undertaken those responsibilities? I believe the old system was much more equitable and just. It recognized the undoubted fact that as a man's income status becomes higher his necessary family obligations increase, and so his tax exemptions operated to decrease proportionately his tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: But were not those nearer together in the past?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These are my deductions. The minister can analyse them any way he likes. I think I am right.

The old system recognized that an attempt should be made to achieve a comparative equity between married and single persons. Now all that is gone by the board and the family life of this nation will inevitably suffer.

I draw this particularly to the attention of the house and particularly of the Prime Minister. I hope he will give some consideration to this question. It is the only appeal I shall make to him in regard to the matter of taxation. Heretofore my observation has been that he has never paid much attention to these questions of taxation. I fail to recall in recent years any occasion on which he has intervened in the budget debate or expressed any opinion on fiscal policy.

I want to point out, and I draw this particularly to the minister's attention, that the object of his fiscal policy, an object with which I agree, is to reduce inflationary spending on useless commodities and services. It is notorious that our young single citizens are the chief contributors to the wave of useless and wasteful purchasing of non-essential goods and services which is a fundamental cause of inflationary danger.

Do not let it be said that I am arguing the case of the rich man. Nothing is further from my intention. I am arguing the case of the small and medium earning class who have undertaken responsibilities to the nation and who should not be penalized but should be given encouragement to fulfil them. Those who say that to retain the old system would help the rich man do not appreciate the fact that the maximum exemption which could possibly be allowed under the old system would be, in the case of a man with an income of $500,000, only 98 per cent of $750—not a very substantial sum for a man with an income of $500,000. If it is thought that to retain the old system would assist the wealthy man too much, then I suggest that the old system be adopted up to a specified ceiling and that the exemption should not then operate at any higher rate. The man I am trying to help is the man of small and moderate income, and I believe that this change works upon the married man of that class a most unfair discrimination.

I consider this proposal a retrograde step, and I urge the minister to revert to the old system, which was much more just and equitable than his new proposal. The youth of any nation is its greatest asset. Anything which tends to discourage the raising of a family is a vital and oppressive blow to the future of any nation, and this proposal does just that. People cannot afford to have children. If Canada is to be a great nation in the future she must have greater population, and the most satisfactory way to achieve an increase in population is to encourage the raising of children steeped in Canadian tradition rather than through immigration of persons steeped in the traditions of other lands. I therefore urge most strongly upon the minister the reconsideration of this proposal, and I sincerely hope he will change it.

As a measure of alleviation of the steep increase in income tax, the minister has proposed the adoption of three new principles:

1. Exemption of medical and hospital expenses in excess of 5 per cent of income;

2. Establishing a proportion of the tax as a minimum savings requirement, which will be held to the credit of the taxpayer as a refundable credit, with accrued interest at 2 per cent;

3. Deduction from the minimum savings requirements of amounts paid in respect of superannuation, life insurance, and principal payments on mortgages on homes.

So far as the first principle is concerned, I am sure that every member of his house, especially those who belong to the medical profession, will be in agreement. Indeed so far as I am concerned I would hope that this might be a permanent feature of the income tax structure. When the tragedy of serious illness befalls a family, the drain on the family income is frequently such that for the state to tax the amounts spent constitutes a most serious hardship. It occurs to me that perhaps the principle will require to be broadened somewhat. As it now stands it does not appear to cover those not unusual cases where the actual expenditure for a physician or for hospitalization is not large, but where the expenses of the individual for medicines prescribed by the physician reach very large sums. I have in mind as an example those who are required to use insulin. I hope the minister in committee will see fit to broaden the resolution to include such cases, although I appreciate that there might be great difficulty in doing so, and perhaps some danger.

Earlier I mentioned, in passing, the new principle of minimum savings requirement, which has been largely adopted from the deferred pay theory of Lord Keynes. I mentioned also that this is a principle which has been advocated from time to time by members on this side of the house. I am glad to see that the minister has adopted the principle. This minimum savings requirement, as part of the general increase in the tax rate, strikes at the problem of unnecessary consumption of consumer goods. The provision for the return of the specified sums in the post-war period means that the individual now forgoes or postpones consumption in order that he may enjoy it at a later period when that consumption will be more advantageous to the economic good of the nation. This plan of deferring or postponing consumption will be, I hope, an important feature in post-war recovery. The release to individual taxpayers after the war of the sums which they will now establish to their credit will lead to a demand for consumer goods after the war and will thereby help to start the wheels of the ordinary economic system in renewed and vigorous operation. Therefore I believe the principle to be a sound one, not only for the present but for the future. There are a number of matters in connection with the practical application of the theory which will require to be clarified when the house is in committee, but I commend the principle itself.

I should like at this stage to reiterate what the minister emphasized in his budget speech, namely, that the refundable portion of the tax is merely a minimum savings requirement. It does not absolve the taxpayer from the patriotic obligation of contributing to his utmost to voluntary savings methods. It is obvious from the minister's speech that new taxation alone will not begin to meet the financial requirements of this country, and that hitherto unheard-of sums will have to be raised by direct borrowing from the people. I have sufficient confidence in the Canadian people, as the minister himself has expressed, to believe that they will respond to their patriotic duty and will endeavour to save, over and above the amounts which they will be called upon to contribute as minimum savings requirements, as much as it is possible for them to do, and will invest it in war savings certificates and victory loans. To do so will require rigorous and plain and simple living on the part of every one of us. I am prepared to make that sacrifice. So are we all, I believe.

An important feature of the minimum savings requirement is the third principle to which I alluded, namely, the deduction from the minimum savings requirement of amounts paid in respect of superannuation, insurance, and principal on mortgages. In other words, credit is being given to the frugal individual who has taken his own means to provide for his own future. The minister has recognized that such a person should not be required to contribute twice and, in addition, that such payments are not of an inflationary character.

Another type of payment for which I believe provision should be made is that under agreements for sale. Such payments are identical in principle with principal payments on a mortgage, and I hope the minister will see fit to include them.

The minister's proposal, as it now stands, will rectify what has always seemed to me to be an inequality. In the past a person contributing to an organized pension or superannuation deduction scheme was entitled to claim exemptions in respect of his payments, whereas the individual who had not the benefit of such a scheme, but who must provide the equivalent by the purchase of government annuities or life insurance as a means of securing himself for the future, was not permitted any deduction. I am glad to see that this inequality has been done away with.

There is just one other feature of this vast increase in personal income tax to which I desire to allude. I call the minister's attention to it particularly. It must be recognized that personal income is of two classes, namely, that earned by the personal effort of the taxpayer, and that received from investments either accumulated or acquired by inheritance. The taxpayer in the fortunate position of owning investments can obviously meet a difficult situation by selling some of his investments. On the other hand, the taxpayer whose income is derived in the main from personal earnings—say a lawyer, a doctor, or one receiving a salary—has no such happy recourse.

Events of recent years have left many people with debts that they are honestly and valiantly struggling to pay off. The new taxes take such a toll of their earnings that in many cases there will be little or nothing left to apply on old debts. It is surely in the public interest that debtors be given reasonable encouragement to pay their debts. Under conditions now envisaged, this will become practically impossible. It would be only fair and equitable if the government would permit an exemption, with respect to earned income, to the extent of, say, 10 per cent to enable the taxpayer to pay debts contracted before the war. In the aggregate the amount could not be important in relation to the total income tax. But it would in very many cases encourage and assist honest people to pay their old debts, and thereby help to maintain their morale and their feeling that there is something left to work for. People of this type should not be driven to the bankruptcy courts.

I do suggest to the minister that some provision must be made for people in the circumstances to which I have alluded, and I believe an exemption of the type which I have mentioned would serve the purpose best.

I wish to refer now to the excess profits tax. These are important business taxes. Important principles are involved.

In the first war session of September, 1939, we witnessed the introduction and, a few months later, the abandonment of a hastily drawn and ill-conceived excess profits tax. It never was put in operation. It had many inherent defects. I shall not enter into a discussion of these, but it laid down the principle that excess profits over normal or basic profits would be subject to special taxation and so make available to the state a substantial portion of the excess profits made. Its enactment in eighteen hours was hailed as a demonstration that democracy could act with speed on occasion. The present act is based on the statute of 1940.

We on the opposition side of this house have never opposed or criticized the principle of taxation of excess profits. We have all, I think, subscribed to the principle that no one shall become rich out of the war. Whatever criticism has been offered has arisen from the incidence of the tax and its application. That is a fair and legitimate subject of examination and criticism. In my opinion, due regard was not had, up to this budget, to the plight of many industrial corporations which, during the ten-year period of the depression, 1929-1939, had a hectic time to keep alive, not to speak of their obligations to their employees and to the communities which they served and in which they functioned. An attempt was made—which I believe in a measure has been successful, although only partly so—to classify those who were in the so-called "depressed industry" category. I have always thought this effort was praiseworthy and I believe the system established was fairly satisfactory. A board of referees was set up, composed of men of high calibre and good character, men who went about their work conscientiously. But I do not believe and never have believed that the base was broad enough.

There is a feature of our excess profits taxation on corporations and individual proprietors to which I desire to direct attention. Last year I asked the house and the country this question: If you continue to exact high corporation income and excess profits taxes, and still higher personal income taxes—and I agree that we must do so if we are to continue to pay as much as possible of our war costs out of current revenue—if you continue to exact huge so-called excess profits from these same sources, how will these individual proprietors and companies be in a position to meet the exacting post-war period of transition and change from a war-time economy to peace-time activity?

In particular, I then asked what thought have those master minds, who behind the scenes are formulating our war-time financial policies, given to the problem of enabling these same companies to provide the employment for our returned soldiers and our civilian population which it is so necessary to provide if we are to escape that dread period of unemployment which will inevitably descend upon us within a measurable period of time after the close of hostilities? These men have responsibilities; they have great power; but they are not answerable to anybody. I put this question to them—and they will probably all disappear and get out from under by the time the post-war period arrives.

Mr. ILSLEY: Put it to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I put it to the minister, who can put it to them.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I shall answer it myself.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I dare say the minister will, but I suggest that it is to these gentlemen I wish to speak, these men who are formulating the fiscal policy of Canada, men with great power and no responsibility.

I then asserted that that situation must be faced. I have asserted with assurance on more than one occasion, both here and elsewhere, that no matter how wise government planning may be, no matter how much you may continue with economic controls, no matter what plans may be laid, nothing can ever effectively be substituted for the principle of private employment, which is based on the broader principle of private enterprise.

I believe that unless you keep these private enterprises strong and healthy—supervised and controlled, if you will, wisely and effectively—you will have no cushion upon which these industrial undertakings can rest during that trying period which, plan as we will, is bound to come. Unless they have adequate reserves to fall back upon, then the old problem of unemployment will be upon our backs, as it was in the days following the last war and in the long dreary days which preceded this war

The answer to my appeal, the reasonableness of which no one will deny, is found in that portion of the budget proposals which deals with this subject. The minister takes the ground that the act of 1940, by which certain basic and excess profits taxes were imposed, was appropriate to the period of expansion during the early stages of the war. Undoubtedly it has produced a substantial amount of revenue, but I doubt that it has always been reasonably equitable. However, I have no time to debate that point now. The minister now states that the time has come when we can and should make the tax more severe, and he proposes now to take the full 100 per cent instead of 75 per cent, but with a compensating feature. Personally I would prefer another method, but I shall not argue the point now. He proposes to increase the rate of tax on excess profits but not the flat rate of tax which applies to profits generally. I agree with the latter point of view, for obvious reasons. But I wonder if he is correct in his hypothesis that, in taking 100 per cent excess profits, he will not be removing the incentive for economy and efficiency in production. I hope he is right, but human nature being what it is, I may be at least pardoned if I am sceptical.

By taking the full 100 per cent, even though he leaves the flat rate of tax alone, he is in a degree depriving business of the right and duty to build up reserves—adequate reserves—for the post-war period. As a counter-balance, however, the minister proposes that, after having raised the rate from 75 per cent to 100 per cent, provision will be made—subject, as I understand it, to certain limitations—for refunding after the war, presumably after the official cessation of hostilities, to the taxpayer who has paid the 100 per cent rate on excess profits, 20 per cent of the amount of profits in excess of the amount at which the 100 per cent tax on the excess after the deduction of corporation income tax and the 12 per cent flat rate equals the 10 per cent tax on the total profit. This is a very obscure provision. Clearly it requires further clarification and elucidation. It is complicated, and I admit that I do not fully comprehend it. For this I may be pardoned. I wonder how many hon. members of this house comprehend it? I wonder how many members of the government who gave assent to this budget know what this means? I do not think any one of them outside the minister knows what it means. I suggest that the 20 per cent refund applies only when the 100 per cent rate effectively applies on any additional profits. This is a great limitation. It does not mean exactly a refund of 20 per cent of excess profits where the effective rate is paid, but only after certain other factors are computed. I invite the minister to clarify the position in the committee stage. The sum to be returned is without interest, but is unconditional except as to liability to the crown for any unpaid tax accrued.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is a nice touch.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The outstanding principle is clear. These companies will have allocated to them on the books of the nation credits varying in amounts for the express purpose of enabling them to function in giving employment in the trying post-war period. This idea is not original with this government. I have hardly found any original idea in any budget. They have all been copied from something and made to apply to conditions in Canada. Some such a scheme has been established in Britain, although there are differences in the details and different limitations. When there in September last I had a long and most interesting interview with the chancellor of the exchequer, Sir Kingsley Wood, and I discussed this very matter with him.

They have no corporation income tax in Britain, but they have an excess profits tax of 100 per cent over and above standard profits. I have often thought that system would have been the proper one for Canada and preferable to our present system. It avoids the reproach of double or even treble taxation. This reproach has been levelled across the floor of the house on many occasions. I remember well that when the then hon. member for Waterloo North was the Minister of National Revenue I levelled criticism at the proposals made in the 1920's, and he admitted that the charge was well founded. It is probable that it is too late now to change our system, but it was quite possible to have done so in 1939 and 1940, when the corporation income tax could have been vacated, the income taxed in the hands of the shareholders, and an excess profits tax of 100 per cent established from the very beginning. Business men, I believe, would have accepted it; in fact, those with whom I discussed the problem favoured it.

This was not done. It showed, in my view, a lack of vision, a lack of the realities of the situation which will confront us in the days to come. But because we have the present system fastened upon us, it is still, in my opinion, necessary and quite feasible to prepare for the post-war period by setting up, on the nation's books, credits for those who are paying so much in taxation so that they may—under government control, if you will—be able to function normally in the post-war period and provide that measure of employment and contentment which only private enterprise can provide. I approve the principle, even if I do not clearly understand the details. It is enough if I enunciate the principle which I think should guide us. It has been studied with great care by the treasury officials in Britain. They have no doubt of its soundness and of its necessity. I had intended to offer it as a constructive suggestion to the minister and to the gentlemen, from the head of the Bank of Canada down, who are advising him.

The minister indicated that other and minor amendments to the act will be brought down. I shall only allude to one—that relating to small business. I refer principally to owner-managed businesses. These men are in many cases facing ruin as a result of present taxation and controls. At present the law gives complete exemption to small businesses with profits of $5,000 or less. The minister states that this exemption in respect of the new 12 per cent flat rate will be withdrawn. If this means that taxation is to be made greater and heavier for them, I regret it; for under present conditions of price ceilings and similar restrictions, their plight is a difficult one.

On the whole, I congratulate the Minister of Finance on his action in providing that these taxpayers may recover, even in somewhat limited circumstances, 20 per cent of the 100 per cent excess profits tax at the close of the war, for the purpose of permitting the modernization, reconstruction, or readaptation of their factories, and, much more important, for providing working capital and employment which will then be so necessary.

I just want to say a word to the socialist party in this house in regard to this proposal. They will probably criticize the minister for making what they will allege to be a concession to the profit motive and to capitalism. My own feeling is that fundamentally it is a concession to the very important purpose of permitting employers to find jobs for their workers. I should like to take this opportunity to say to our socialist friends that they are never going to become the true representatives of the Canadian worker until they realize that the one point on which the Canadian worker does approve capitalism is as an employer furnishing jobs—not talking about employment, but furnishing jobs. The Canadian working man knows his common interest with his employer on this point, however much he may differ with him on the details of how the jobs are to be furnished.

Mr. REID: You are not arguing that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation are the only ones speaking on behalf of labour?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly not. In other words, the Canadian worker has a pride in his employer's success, provided that the employer passes on to him the employment, under proper working conditions, that is so necessary for his own well-being and happiness. If you want an instance of that, look at the two great railway systems in this country and how loyal the workmen are to their employers. I doubt whether any socialist speaks for the railway workers of this country.

I have one last word to say to the socialist party on this point. When the socialist party tries to criticize the minister's action in this respect, I should like to remind them that a great English labour leader, Sir Walter Citrine, told the Canadian club in Montreal not a year ago that English labour was tired of being misrepresented to the public by politicians and college professors.

I want to say a word with respect to the succession duty. I am glad to note that the minister has yielded to the theory that charitable gifts shall be entirely free of duty. If I recollect aright, I urged this course a year ago. The experience of a few months must have indicated to him that it was a mistake to impose even one-half the ordinary rate on such gifts. The reason is obvious. No matter how well intentioned a person having property to dispose of, by will or otherwise, may be, he instinctively feels that if the state steps in and confiscates twice, perhaps thrice, a portion of his capital assets, the state thereby releases him from obligations which, under different circumstances, he himself would assume. If the state takes that which under ordinary circumstances would go to charities, then the state itself must assume those responsibilities. As a result of two, sometimes three, capital levies on the same dollar, plus high taxation for war, and levies for war purposes, charitable gifts have been rapidly receding. I congratulate the minister upon having seen the light, and changed his tune.

Now a word on indirect taxes. The minister has made another of his selective approaches to indirect taxation. He recommends substantial increases in taxes which fall on luxury expenditures. With the general principle involved I am in agreement. Any reasonable measure which will prevent or discourage such expenditures merits support. The money is required for other purposes.

With regard to the excise duties on alcoholic beverages, his approach is definitely not that of restricting consumption, but rather of securing additional revenue. It is of no use to tell this house that $2 a gallon added to the excise duty on spirits will reduce sales and expenditures. The only effect will be to raise the retail prices on domestic whisky from present levels by a small amount. Already I believe the Ontario liquor commission has announced new prices—25 cents more here, 35 cents there, with a maximum of 75 cents on a large quart. Does anyone mean to tell me that any person in Canada who wants a bottle of whisky will stop at the additional impost? The idea is ridiculous. Let any member of this house who uses liquor as a beverage pause and ask himself if he will refrain from buying a bottle of whisky because the government has raised the excise duty by $2 a gallon. The answer is obvious.

I do not know what the effect of the increase on malt will be on the price of beer. I should think not much—15 cents per dozen bottles, perhaps. I have heard that former increases did not perceptibly increase prices. I understood that the brewers, generally speaking, absorbed the increases. Certainly those two increases had no effect on the quantity purchased by the public. On the contrary, sales have steadily increased. I venture to predict that this increase from 12 to 16 cents on malt will not divert any dollars from consumer expenditure. This whole situation, Mr. Speaker, has given cause for grave anxiety in Canada. I fear that the drinking habit is increasing in this country. The drink bill in Canada has increased from $153 million in 1938 to $232 million in 1940, an increase of almost $80 million in two years, and I am told that this year's drink bill will probably reach as high a figure as $290 million. Recently representations have been made to the Prime Minister with regard to this matter. The liquor trade is a thriving trade, and it is the only trade known to me over which control has not been exercised, except by way of taxation.

Recently the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Nicholson) quoted in this house an extract from the "Brewers' Magazine", from which I shall quote two sentences:

> One of the finest things that could have happened the brewing industry was the insistence of high ranking officers—

Meaning high ranking officers in the army, I assume:

> —to make beer available at army camps.

Then mark this. It goes on:

> Here is a chance for brewers to cultivate a taste for beer in millions of young men who will eventually constitute the largest beer-consuming section of our population.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that when I heard that I was appalled at the implications. The whole general effect will be more revenue from all these sources, and the alleged objective will not be attained. There is only one way to deal with this problem—for problem it is—and that is to make it impossible to expend such vast sums of money on alcoholic and malt beverages; and that apparently is the last thing in the world this government—or the provincial governments either, for that matter—wish to do. They know that the tremendous drink bill of this country is a serious drain on the people of Canada of money which should be diverted to other and better purposes, but neither authority will deal with it.

I shall not refer to the new taxes on cigarettes, smoking tobacco, cigars, and the like. I doubt if the new imposts will cut down consumption. They may. Meanwhile we are to receive in excess of fifteen millions of dollars of new revenue from the one source, and twenty-three millions of dollars from the other—and I suspect that is really what the minister is after.

I wish to refer to the tax on candy. This undoubtedly is imposed on the theory that candy is a luxury. I dispute that premise absolutely. Candy is an important food. It is probably the best energizing food, particularly for young people, because of its sugar and cocoa content. Our soldiers on active service use it for emergency rations. Our Atlantic pilots carry it on their trips, and I believe the commando troops take it with them as emergency rations. Recently Mr. Morgenthau recommended a 15 per cent tax on candy in his message to congress, and the committee threw it out, because candy is such an important food and uses many farm products—butter, milk, cream, et cetera.

Candy is the only food which is taxed in this budget. Cheap jewellery is exempt from $1 down, but a tax is put on the candy sold to children. This is not just figurative, because it will actually be done. All penny goods will have to be eliminated; a child with six cents can buy a chocolate bar, but a child with one or two cents cannot buy anything.

There is another aspect of this matter which should be considered. With the restriction on sugar, children will get less sugar and now they will also get less candy. It will be bound to have a detrimental effect on the health of the rising generation. I say to the minister that this tax is unnecessary, and he ought not to pursue it.

Time will not permit me to make reference to the large number of other taxes, generally described as "nuisance taxes". We had them in the last war. I suppose we shall have to submit to them, as we did then. The only excuse for most of them is that the country needs the money. On that theory they will be accepted, but on the distinct understanding that we shall be rid of them at the earliest possible moment. I fear that is a vain hope. Never again shall we be able to face life freed from the major part of these small, petty, nuisance imposts.

There is one redeeming feature, and it is this. The people of this country, who have become soft and prodigal in their personal spending in normal times, will once again have to scrimp and adopt the old-fashioned virtue of thrift—one of the real virtues, one which our parents practised, one which they endeavoured to instil into us as children, but which, alas! most of us in the easy days of the 1920's soon forgot and failed to practise. It will come back to us. It is being forced upon us, and it will be a good thing for us and for our children. It will teach us and them the principles of self-denial. That, at least, will be worth while.

I have either read or listened to all the budgets which have been delivered in this house for the past forty years. Even in peace time none of them are all good or all bad; but in peace time it is easy to criticize, easy to suggest that some other fiscal policy, some other tax, some other proposal, should be adopted. Per contra, it is usually easy to support some of the proposals in any peace time budget.

One of the difficulties which confronts me, and which always confronts one in my position at any time, is that one is obliged, on a motion to go into committee of ways and means, either to accept the budget outright or wholly to reject it. But the difficulties are greatly accentuated when one is dealing with a war budget, a budget of such dimensions as almost to stagger one with its enormous figures and implications.

It has not been difficult to criticize the budget in its details, to find fault with this feature and that, to say that, from one point of view, it is soaking the rich; and from another angle there is concealed in this budget power to exact an undue portion of the national revenue from the wage-earners of this country—and there is substantial truth in the latter statement.

But having heard this budget delivered at the darkest hour in the history of this war, when the situation is more critical than at any time since Dunkirk; having since read it with care, and endeavoured to master the huge mass of figures and the underlying principles, realizing as I do that we are passing through a world revolution, a very convulsion of civilization itself, I have come to the conclusion that the proper and patriotic course for me is to support the general budget proposals. My reason, my convictions, tell me that we must raise this huge sum of money, by some means or other, and to argue at this time that some other ways or means are preferable has no great appeal to me.

And let us not hear anything more of failure to conscript wealth. We are conscripting wealth. We had it in the 1941 budget, notwithstanding what some people may say or think. We have had it since 1940. We have it here, in stark reality. Also, those who are not possessed of accumulated wealth, those whose wealth consists of their week-to-week and mouth-to-mouth wages, those who are in receipt of the major part of the increased national income—their wealth is being conscripted by this budget too. They are paying—paying much more than appears from the skilfully disguised language employed by the minister. They will be called upon to pay the major part of the new millions which the minister hopes to get under the new personal income and other tax rates. The method or manner of approach to them is skilfully concealed and not so brutal as to those in the higher brackets. It is hidden in a mass of verbiage, but the power to withhold from the pay cheques of the wage earners and the lower salaried classes the greater part of these new levies is embodied in these resolutions, and they will pay by far the heaviest portion of these new imposts.

I point out as a matter of information, and information only, the following facts:

1. Up to this budget, the group earning over $2,000 per annum were 58 per cent of the income taxpayers, and they paid 97 per cent of the amount paid in personal income taxes. They have been called upon to make great sacrifices, but there has been no great complaint from them.

2. The group under $2,000 constituted 42 per cent of the taxpayers, and they paid 3 per cent of the tax collected.

3. Under the present proposals, based on the status of a married man with two children, the tax on an income of $1,250 has now been increased 45½ per cent; on one with an income of $2,000, 258 per cent; and on $3,000, 211 per cent.

4. Then the curve of increased taxation is reversed. On $5,000, the increase is 126 per cent; on $10,000, 68 per cent; and on $50,000, 30 per cent.

The undoubted fact is that those in the lower group of $3,000 and under are being subjected to a very sudden and steep levy.

But let us not flinch from our obligations. Let us face the situation with courage and fortitude. Let us make every sacrifice. We are all together in this great adventure. There are no favoured few. Together we shall either survive or go under. Let us resolve that survive we shall.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has completely excelled himself this afternoon. I cannot recall having heard him deliver a speech more thoughtfully prepared, or more meaty, or more genuinely valuable. It was devoid of all forms of bitterness and party animus, and altogether it was a fine effort. I wish to congratulate him on it. But I do not wish to leave the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) entirely without commendation. As I have said on more than one occasion, he is the man who has the greatest burden in Canada to-day, and his task is made more difficult by the fact that he is endeavouring to carry on in a power age with an ox-cart financial system. That is almost tantamount to a man's undertaking to equip an army with bows and arrows in order to meet tanks. The mere fact that the minister is endeavouring to carry on under that handicap is cause for congratulating him even more sincerely than one would under ordinary circumstances.

With respect to the budget, I do not desire to be in any way unkindly or harshly critical. I should have been pleased if upon this occasion I could have had my speech carefully written out weeks beforehand so that I could read it, but the rules of the house deny me any such privilege. I must therefore do my best to clothe my thoughts in language as I stand here facing a critical situation.

The attitude to budgets is changing rather rapidly, I fancy, in the world. There was a time when a budget was looked upon simply as a means of raising money, but to-day the budget is regarded as much more than that. It must be a means of regulating the whole economy of a country. To illustrate the truthfulness of what I have said, and to indicate that in this statement I am in reasonably good company, may I read from "Fiscal Policy and Business Cycles", a book copyrighted by Alvin H. Hanson, of Harvard university in 1941. I quote from page 187:

> For the public economy expenditures ought to be weighed not in terms of the profit and loss of the state itself but rather in terms of the effect of such expenditures on the full and efficient functioning of the economy as a whole. Fiscal policy is an important instrument for maximizing the real income of a community and for regulating the distribution of income and wealth.

As I deal with this budget I shall have in mind more particularly the assertion which is made in the second sentence. I read that statement from page 187 in the chapter "budgetary theory and practice". In the first place, I wish to make two or three comments on the budget itself and on the inconsistencies which arise from the difficulty of the minister's position rather than from any inadequacy or inefficiency on his part.

The budget lacks unity because it aims at two things. It has two objectives. The first is to raise money, and the second is to withdraw from the people purchasing power, thereby relieving buying pressure upon prices and tending to offset the tendency to inflation. Since the minister is aiming at two objects all the time he cannot be blamed for forgetting one of them once in a while and being really at a loss to know which object he is pursuing at any given moment. As I listened to him, I thought he hardly knew, in the case of any given impost, whether he had in mind chiefly the raising of money or the withdrawal of purchasing power. As a matter of fact, theoretically, the principle of withdrawing purchasing power should be his principal object, and not the raising of money. He would very much dislike to acknowledge that, I fancy, and I know many good gentlemen, prominent in Canadian financial affairs, who would dread to acknowledge it. But it is unfortunately true, and that is one of the momentous facts predicable of our time, that the object of a budget is no longer to raise money but to withdraw purchasing power.

If we could once grant that the whole object of this budget had been the withdrawal of purchasing power, the incidence of these taxes would have been placed in an altogether different position as regards many imposts.

Is this budget as it stands designed primarily to raise money or to guard against inflation? If it is designed to guard against inflation, to prevent people from buying the things they desire to buy, did the minister have in mind the object of preventing the people from buying life insurance? If he had not in mind preventing people from buying life insurance, why would he withdraw purchasing power until they were unable to buy life insurance? Yet this compromising position has been thrust upon the minister and his department. Did he wish to prevent people from repaying debts? The repayment of a debt would hardly cause inflation, for in most cases the money would go immediately to the bank and the money used in payment of the debt would be dead for that cycle. Did he wish to prevent them from having dental care, or from having medical treatment, or from sending letters by paying postal rates, or from buying flowers and shrubs to decorate and beautify their homes, or from buying breeding stock such as cattle, horses, sheep, swine, poultry, bees and the like, to increase their productive capacity? Did he wish to prevent them from buying fences or building fences, or from getting timber to make fence posts with which to build fences? By these imposts he has successfully contrived to prevent them from buying a good many such things, the purchase of hardly any one of which would tend to cause inflation. I think I have said enough about the inconsistency of the budget, an inconsistency which results from the difficulty of the minister's position and not from his inefficiency or inadequacy in any respect.

Again, the budget is inequitable. I am not saying that the minister did not do what he considered his very best in an endeavour to make it equitable. He said specifically in his speech that in framing the budget his object was to recognize the need of equity, incentive and saving. That indicated a fine power of discernment in the minister, a fine appreciation of values. But in my opinion he has fallen far short of providing equity and incentive in many cases. As the leader of the opposition pointed out very well, I thought, sufficient to render it unnecessary for me to repeat except by reference, this budget bears destructively upon the less well-to-do among Canadians.

The sales tax—I hardly recall whether or not the leader of the opposition mentioned it—is designed to raise $218,000,000 in 1942. A disproportionate amount of that will be taken from the less prosperous. The people who are straining every nerve and lying awake nights trying to make ends meet are being bled of their substance in a dozen and one different ways of which they are not really aware, by an 8 per cent sales tax stealing in upon them and completely unavoidable. While that impost was not levied in this budget, yet it was continued in this budget. I believe that the time has come for the removal of a large part of the sales tax, if not all of it.

The minister has borne with harsh insistence upon those with incomes of $3,000 a year and under. The leader of the opposition in his closing remarks referred to an article in the June 27 number of the Financial Post, a portion of which I shall read:

> The tax on an income of $1,250 has now been increased 45·5 per cent. On $2,000 income the increase is 258 per cent. On $3,000 it is 211 per cent. There comes the dividing line. For incomes above that figure the percentage increase declines. At $5,000 the increase is 126 per cent; at $10,000 it is 68 per cent, and at $50,000 it is a 30 per cent increase.

I rarely mention personal matters in this house, but when I was elected to parliament I had nine children. My income would have come in that $1,250 bracket and would have been subject to that increase.

Mr. ILSLEY: Surely not. You get $80 exemption for a child.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, provided there are the children, but the income would come in that bracket. It indicates how seriously we affect people when we increase taxation in the lower income brackets. Generally speaking, incomes below $3,000 a year are those of the men and women of Canada who are carrying the burden, who are raising the men and women who will be the fighters or producers—or who are not raising them, and who very probably will not raise them, as the leader of the opposition pointed out. Under the circumstances I find it difficult to see why the minister bore down with such particular care on the people with lower incomes. He would answer, I believe, as I think he indicated in his speech, that since money had to be raised it was necessary to go down to the incomes of the people who constitute the majority of the population.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an even and fair gradation from $660 right up to $500,000.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But the evenness ceases to exist when you get into the realities. It is easy to say that academically, but it certainly is not true when you get down into the lives of men and women. The people with those incomes are having all the trouble to get along that they need.

The minister, still indicating that he was desirous of being equitable, said, as I recall it, that he desired to see people have a decent standard of living. Now, what is a decent standard of living? "Decent" is one of those general expressions, like "a fair wage," "a fair price." It means pretty nearly anything, depending upon who uses the expression and who hears it used. If we could only come to some sort of agreement as to what constitutes a fair income and a decent standard of living! As an example, we felt it necessary, if I recall aright—I am speaking entirely from memory—to give a cost of living bonus to civil servants getting less than $2,000 a year. That indicated the belief that a decent standard of living would be rendered possible for the civil servant only by an income of not less than $2,000 a year. I rather think that is about right. But how in the world are the people who are getting $400 to $450 to have a decent standard of living? Yet we are taxing those $450 incomes through the sales tax right along. I think in a recent issue of the Ottawa Citizen there was a statement covering a considerable number of civil servants recently appointed all across Canada. A substantial percentage of them are girls receiving very small incomes and having a hard time to live in Ottawa and elsewhere. But the average income of all of them was $168 a month if I remember correctly. A man could live reasonably well on $168 a month, but if that is the average, when you take into consideration the large number receiving only a bare subsistence, there must be some receiving very substantial incomes. Probably they have no difficulty in attaining a decent standard of living, but I am not so sure about a good many others throughout this land, in agriculture and among the labouring people. What is a decent standard of living? I will not take time to go into it now; I simply raise the question. But I think it can hardly be assumed with justice that this budget is equitable.

This budget makes one more long stride toward the destruction of democracy through national debt. It increases our debt $2,228,000,000, according to the statement of the minister, as compared with $414,000,000 estimated increase for the past fiscal year. Our debt on March 31, 1942, was $4,062,372,000. It is impossible to forecast what our debt will be within a few years. Mr. J. H. Fisher, staff writer for the Toronto Telegram in an article on June 29, 1942, estimates that we shall be in debt to the extent of twelve billion dollars if the war lasts for three years, and I think we can pretty safely assume it will last that long. That is twelve billion dollars as compared with three and a half billion exclusive of the guaranteed Canadian National Railways debt at the outbreak of war. Mr. Fisher estimates that this will constitute a mortgage of a thousand dollars a head on every man, woman and child in Canada.

I ask this question: Where does any man in this house or outside it suppose we are going to get the money for social services after the war, with a debt like that?

Mr. JACKMAN: Who owns the debt?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We will come to that in a moment; the question only aggravates the position. Whence will come the reward for the fighting men who are now risking their lives and being maimed? Where will preparations for a later war come from?

At this point I wish to pause to say something I have wanted to say a dozen times. I am going to say it now. I do not believe since the beginning of time there ever was a generation so callously betrayed by its leaders as was the generation which to-day is fighting for its life. Why? Because they had so big a debt they had to save; and the life and very existence of 650 million people are now in jeopardy because we owed so many dollars we had to tighten our belts.

What is going to happen after this war, with a twelve billion dollar debt hanging round our necks, if we insist upon using the system of financing of which the minister now apparently seems to be irretrievably enamoured? Whence will come the relief from the depression about which so many economists running round the country take delight in terrifying the people? "We have to have a depression" they say; "surely we are going to have a depression". Even the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) fell into that foolishness. There is no reason why there should be a depression in this country. There was no reason for the last depression. It was deliberately and foolhardily manipulated by blind men.

Mr. HANSELL: And nearly destroyed us.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It did destroy us, unless we, by good fortune, come through the war successfully. And the very men who engineered that depression are the men who are responsible for the defeats this race has suffered and is suffering to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: They should be shot.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Shooting is too pleasant an experience for them. They betrayed us shamefully, culpably, reprehensibly, and they are all getting ready to do it all over again as soon as this war is over, simply because we shall be owing twelve billion dollars of debt.

Here is the astonishing fact: we in the House of Commons, responsible members of parliament, calmly and complacently contemplate such a situation as that. Only the odd person here and there rises to contest the claim of those who insist that we must carry on according to this financial system.

The minister made the remark that the size of the debt did not much concern us. So that we may have exactly what he said I shall read his words, as reported at page 3578 of Hansard:

> It is not the size of the debt that is a matter of chief concern for after all it is an obligation of the people of Canada through their government to the people of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member had better finish it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To be perfectly fair, I shall read everything the minister wishes to have read. He continues:

> Rather, we are concerned about the distribution of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is that sufficient? I want to be perfectly fair. He says that we are concerned about the distribution of the debt. The distribution, I say, is going to be very largely the same kind of distribution we had after the last war. Men who buy war savings certificates and victory bonds, yielding to the urgency of high-pressure sales methods, and activated by an impulse of patriotism, will dispose of their holdings. Of course they will—to pay the corner grocer, or to pay the doctor for the last child, or perhaps to prevent foreclosure on a home.

Who owns this debt? I say solemnly and after consideration, that to say that Canada's public debt is an asset to Canada is to tell a pernicious half-truth, more mischievous than an obvious falsehood. I know who made that remark, and I mean every word of what I have said, and apply it to him. In the position he occupies he should have had a stronger sense of his public responsibility than to make a remark like that, one which would deceive the people of Canada.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: He said it was an asset as well as a liability, which is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It is a half-truth.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member would finish what was said by the governor of the Bank of Canada, he would find that there is no half-truth about it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I say it is a half-truth, no matter what he said or how he said it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just like reading only part of what I said.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister put on record what Mr. Towers did say in that regard?

Mr. ILSLEY: All I am saying is that my recollection is that Mr. Towers said that debt was an asset as well as a liability, which is the truth.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But the implication was that it was an asset to the Canadian people.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because it was being urged that it was purely a liability. There is no half-truth about that; he just finished out the picture. The hon. member is attacking the governor of the Bank of Canada in unrestrained language because he had pointed out an obvious fact, namely that a debt is an asset as well as a liability. It is an asset in the hands of the creditor and a liability to the debtor—both of whom are Canadians.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My next words will answer the minister completely. The minister implied the same thing in the remarks I have just read into Hansard.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All the people will owe that debt, and pay taxes to a point of misery and slavery to repay a few.

Mr. ILSLEY: But taxes in accordance with their ability to pay. The rich will no doubt be taxed much more heavily than the poor.

Mr. MacINNIS: Relatively no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I challenge the minister's statement that they are taxed in accordance with their ability to pay. The tax structure erected in this budget is there to stay, just as the three-cent postage tax, imposed at the time of the last war, has stayed to this day. Whether or not the people go down into the depths of degrading poverty, as they did during the depression, they will still pay that tax, just as we had to pay the three-cent postage in the depths of the depression in 1932 and 1933. There is no way of getting out of it.

This tax structure is being prepared to bleed the Canadian people of every last drop of spending power possible of extraction from their emaciated bodies for the next generation. And what for? To pay 3 per cent interest on a twelve billion dollar debt to a few favoured ones.

Mr. ILSLEY: On what?

Mr. BLACKMORE: On a twelve billion dollar debt, on the assumption that the war will continue for three years.

The difficulty lies right here. With the exception of, I believe, only three, there is not a newspaper or a public official or a bank manager anywhere in the dominion that is indicating even the slightest scintilla of vision as to what can be done so as to change the system to a point which would render such intolerable conditions more endurable. All they do is to sneer at anyone who has any idea as to what might be done. They will not even go so far as to consider a suggestion and permit intelligent and honest discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the debt should be $12,000,000,000, which I do not admit for one moment, the interest would be $360,000,000. Why does my hon. friend say that we shall have to maintain these taxes because of the interest charges, when this year we are budgeting for expenditures of ten times what the interest charges would be?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a very fine answer and a perfectly honest one. If the depression which is promised so abundantly and with such sincerity and gusto occurs, the productive capacity and the national wealth of this country will fall off in huge swaths, as it did in 1929, 1930, 1931 and 1932. The only way by which we shall be able to raise enough money to service that debt will be by the imposition and maintenance of such a tax structure as this, a tax structure which the people are now viewing with apprehension.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not admit the inevitability of a serious depression, although my hon. friend may.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I tell the minister that unless he changes the system he is using, a depression will come just as surely as the sun shines in the heavens.

Mr. ILSLEY: That system will not cause it.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It will cause it, because the same thing caused the last one.

Mr. ILSLEY: Another system caused the last one.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should be glad to have the minister explain that. I realize that he would not be prepared to explain it now. Public debt like private debt limits freedom of choice—which means a limitation of democracy in the case of the state,—a limitation of freedom and a limitation of choice of action. Public debt will threaten and completely destroy our security and will almost inevitably impair our productive power. The federal government could and should adopt such a fiscal policy as will enable and encourage all individuals and all groups of individuals to get out of debt and to stay out of debt. The present fiscal policy of Canada motivates and to a considerable degree necessitates falling into debt. Ours is a debt creating system, and terrible have been the results.

I should like to refer to what has happened in Saskatchewan, and I quote from the United Farmers of Canada information bulletin of March, 1942:

> In the meantime the farm debt in this province has increased by nearly $50,000,000 since the war commenced, thereby increasing the Saskatchewan farm debt to approximately $630,000,000 or $21 debt average on the 30,000,000 acres cultivated in this province, which requires about $44,000,000 to satisfy interest. It is estimated that the average debt on the higher quality wheat land is $30 per cultivated acre. It should be remembered that much of this land operates the practice of summer-fallowing one-half of their land each year, consequently each crop acre in such circumstances carries a debt responsibility of $60 per acre, requiring $4.20 to satisfy interest obligation. And, granting that this type of land yields more bushels than the average land of the province, it would require about 45 per cent of a wheat crop at present prices to satisfy interest upon the debt.

That is individual debt.

> Land of inferior quality is not in any better position because, while two-thirds of the cultivated acres is usually cropped and as the average yield is only about 12 or 13 bushels per acre, even with a less than average per acre debt, it is estimated that almost the same percentage of the wheat income is required to cover the interest amount.
> As mortgage companies call for one full third share of the crop to apply as mortgage payment it should be clear that even this full one-third is insufficient to meet the interest obligation. This deficiency, plus an amount less than the one-third which also cannot be paid except in exceptional years is pyramiding upon unpaid principal. 1940 produced the second higher provincial farm income since 1930, i.e., $142,000,000 and in that year $42,000,000 was required to service the farm debt of this province, leaving about $100,000,000 as the fundamental maintenance for our provincial economy, or slightly over $100 per person.

It may be contended that this hardly has a bearing on the budget, but I shall soon show that it has. In Alberta, in 1935 the provincial debt amounted to $161,000,000; municipal debt, $70,000,000; mortgage debt, $200,000,000; private debt, $171,000,000, making a total of $602,000,000. Those men who with complete ease and real satisfaction talk about our servicing this $12,000,000,000 debt forget entirely the other debts in Canada which must be serviced as well. In consideration of the debt situation which this budget is imposing upon the people of Canada, and for other reasons, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell):

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house views with alarm the obviously decisive drift into national or state socialism everywhere in evidence in this budget as indicated by the shackling taxation structure it erects; the sweeping trend towards centralization, bureaucracy and oligarchic regimentation which it involves and the general deterioration of morale and incentive to productive effort which it aggravates;

Further, this house regrets the government's apparent inability to see the vast improvement in Canada's efficiency that could be effected by a wisely scientific use of her credit and currency potentialities, and deplores the government's persistent failure to employ Canada's credit and currency to supplement her pay-as-you-go policy, thereby to restrict the appalling growth of debt, and to provide a means of gradually paying off Canada's indebtedness.

Therefore this house respectfully urges the government to formulate and to introduce at the earliest possible moment such a modernized credit and currency policy as will, to the greatest degree rendered possible by our available facilities, curb inflation, control debt, mobilize Canada's resources for total war, ensure democracy and security to Canadians, in war and then in peace."

I wish to turn now to another aspect of this budget. Indirectly this budget is an inflationary budget. There are many situations in life where a man trying to avoid a certain thing runs directly into it. The effort here is to avoid inflation, but this budget is inflationary in effect. In the first place, it actually forces up prices. Take fountain pens, watches, clocks, passenger fares, long distance telephone calls, telegrams and so on as an example. It is commonly assumed without reference to the facts of the situation that each and every one of these items is necessarily a luxury. Are we to assume that people, no matter how poor they are, are now to be able to avoid travelling on railways? Are they not likely to need to use the long distance telephone? For example, take the man operating a small grocery store. Will people no longer require to send telegrams in case of death or great mishaps? Are the teachers in our schools to go henceforth without watches? Must the little nurses in training, no matter how poor they are, get along without watches? Are the children in our schools to be made to go without fountain pens on the assumption that they are a luxury? The price added to the cost of these commodities will increase the family cost of living.

The result is there will be a tendency toward inflation. That is not the most serious aspect of the situation. This budget will discourage production, or it will, in many instances, render production impossible. Just as soon as production begins to be restricted, as it undoubtedly has been now in many respects, there will be an increased buying pressure on the price ceilings. A scarcity of goods always results in an increased buying pressure on the price.

No producer can continue to produce at a loss. The minister said that we would have to find another incentive than the profit motive to encourage men to produce. There are simply tens of thousands of men in this country who must have a little profit or they can no longer produce. How is it that so many men overlook that important fact? As soon as the producers of this country find themselves unable any longer to make a living they will sell their stock, if they are stock raising, desert their farms and join the army or go into industry or go on the streets and hawk. They will do anything rather than stay on the farm where they are losing money, for they must do so.

But once cattle are gone it takes a long time to recover them. We have one fine example of that within the memory of this house. A few years ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) deemed it expedient to allow a large percentage of the cattle in Saskatchewan to be destroyed. Would it not help wonderfully if we had those cattle back now? But they just are not there, and we cannot get them there; they are gone. Every herd of cattle that is slaughtered as those were slaughtered that we heard about the other night from the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) means another herd of cattle gone; and it does not matter whether the children of Canada were crying for milk or the children of Great Britain were starving for cheese, when the cattle are gone, production from them would be impossible, no matter how high the price of milk or cheese may be. Why is it that men cannot see these things in this most trying time? I find myself afflicted almost with dismay when I read some of the short-sighted statements which have been made by certain permanent officials, whom I am not now going to name, with regard, for instance, to the desire of the Ontario farmers for an increase in milk prices to enable them to produce or of the Ontario berry producers for a similar increase in price to enable them to produce.

The government of this country should be watching every breeding animal. Three years ago I pointed out to this house that no more female lambs should be allowed to be killed until we were certain we had enough. Would it not be a fine thing if we had those lambs to-day? It would help our wool situation greatly. But there were all-wise who thought I was just foolish in making that suggestion. They will now continue to bump their heads against the cold stones of reality until they realize that once in a while some good thing can come out of Nazareth.

The government should be watching every heifer, every cow in this country, and seeing that none are destroyed until we are positive that we have all we need. That does not mean passing a law forbidding their slaughter; it does mean that the government would make sure of buying them if it was necessary for their owners to sell them. That is just common sense. There will be great pressure to sell and to slaughter unless an incentive is given to keep this stock, far more incentive than is indicated in this budget.

May I spend just a moment on inflation. I have spoken on inflation so many times in this house that I know everybody is weary of the subject. Nevertheless the fundamental facts regarding inflation which I have laid down since 1936 are the essentials upon which must be based a new economy, and every year of development will show the truth of what I say.

I am told that in one city of Ontario where there is plenty of ice in the winter, a number of companies, because of impositions and levies and restrictions of one kind and another, have been forced to close their ice business, after having been engaged in it, some of them, for sixty years. And this is all because of utterly impossible regulations. They were forced out of business, not because they did not want any longer to produce ice, not because there was not plenty of ice, not because people were not needing ice, but just because the officials in charge lacked the understanding and discernment, and the humility to be told. They had to go on blundering and bumping their silly heads until knowledge was knocked into them. There are some people that one cannot tell anything to—they know everything—until, by their immeasurable folly, they drag the people of Canada into misery. The result of forcing those people out of the ice business is now a scarcity of ice in that city. A scarcity of ice means that there will be a buying pressure upon ice and a tendency for the price of ice to go up; and if people are unable to buy ice, they will have in their pockets the money they would have spent on ice and will buy something else with it, which will bring pressure to bear on other commodities and cause an inflationary tendency.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Once we understand what inflation is and realize that it is not a great big ugly bogeyman, with cloven hoofs, a long tail, and great horns; once men realize that it is just a common-sense thing, the result of scientific facts, they will stop talking much of the indescribable nonsense which is being talked over the radio and in the press to-day, and they will come to realize that if we want to prevent inflation we must do the common-sense thing we would do if we wanted to prevent a headache—just refrain from the cause. The cause of inflation is a lack of goods, and anything that causes a lack of goods will have a tendency toward inflation. The people who made the regulations which caused these firms to go out of the production of ice were unwittingly doing that thing which was tending toward inflation. The people who unwittingly neglected to provide adequate sugar supplies in Canada were doing that which tended to cause inflation. The men who neglected to save the ewe lambs so that we would have plenty of wool in Canada were doing that which tended to cause inflation, and the people who caused the destruction of beef cattle all over western Canada were causing inflation and a rise in price without knowing it.

We need to look upon every dollar that goes into circulation as an agent tending toward inflation. As soon as it is out of circulation, it ceases to have that tendency. It is like a billiard ball that goes bouncing about a billiard table knocking anything that gets in its path and giving impetus to it. If you want to stop that billiard ball from doing more damage you must pocket it, and so with that one dollar bill. Get it into the bank, and then you will stop its inflationary tendencies. Every time it buys goods it tends to go into the bank. Suppose it is used to buy milk. The farmer who sells the milk will take the dollar and pay his debt that he incurred when he borrowed the money to produce the milk, thereby killing the dollar for that cycle so far as its inflationary tendency is concerned. If you want to avoid inflation, get as many goods and in as wide a variety as possible; get great productive capacity, and then the dollars which are out in circulation will find the goods and buy them and thus lose their inflationary impetus. Once people all recognize this simple, fundamental, common-sense fact, they will stop talking much of the foolish nonsense and indulging in much of the unjustifiable fears that we hear of to-day regarding inflation, and men will have a great deal more sense about money than many people seem to show in Canada. The government must take all possible care to see that there is plenty of goods in wide variety.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Unless the hon. member has unanimous consent to continue, I am sorry to say that his time has expired.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is moving an amendment.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a non-confidence motion, I believe.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes; that is what it is—a non-confidence motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. The hon. member has all the time he wants.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for warning me.

If we are to be saved from inflation, in large measure we must look to our farming population in Canada. The minister has, in my opinion, been unfair to the agricultural portion of our population. He may consider that that is a severe thing for me to say, but I say it in all calmness, certain that I am right. He has been unfair to the agricultural population; he has slighted the farming population, perhaps without knowing it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not in the budget.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Oh, surely in the budget there should have been some provision made for more generous treatment of the farmer, if the minister was aware the farmer was needing it.

It is a strange thing that the minister should neglect this important matter in his budget, because in speeches which he has delivered in the past he has made statements indicating that he was aware of the importance of agriculture in our economy and the bearing of agricultural production on the whole question of monetary policy, of our strength to win the war. May I read passages from a speech which he delivered before the Ontario Federation of Agriculture on March 17, 1942. I read particularly these words:

> The important position of agriculture, indeed its central position, in relation to this whole policy of price stabilization, was recognized from the very beginning.

Well, we certainly have no evidence that it was, from the prices that were given. I continue to quote:

> As I emphasized in explaining the programme to the House of Commons, the policy could not be introduced until farm prices had been allowed to come fairly well up in line with other prices. We had waited until this had happened. By the time the price ceiling was put into effect the general level of retail food prices and of farm prices, with the exception of wheat, had reached a fairly reasonable relationship with other prices.

Did the minister really believe that? If so, he was altogether misinformed by the men who advised him. I think the minister has some particularly doctrinaire and academic advisers. I think he should get some people from the fighting line of production, where they know something of the realities, to mix with these doctrinaire gentlemen who have taken university degrees and thus are supposed to be qualified to be the minister's advisers in these trying times. Again the minister says:

> Let me assure you, however, that the arrangements by which the prices of various agricultural products are controlled have been worked out, and will continue to be worked out, by men who understand farm marketing problems.

These men may understand farm marketing, but they appear not to understand farm production.

> On the prices board itself we have two senior representatives of the Department of Agriculture, and as foods administrator we have been fortunate to be able to secure Mr. Taggart, Minister of Agriculture of Saskatchewan, an outstanding authority on farming. Under him are many other experts on the marketing of farm products to work out methods and details in consultation with producers and distributors.

I wonder how many on that board are practical farmers, who have got right out and known what it takes to produce a pig, what it costs to produce a bushel of wheat, who know the effort and expense it takes to produce a dozen eggs and keep on producing eggs.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Taggart himself does.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then he must be the only one. There is no evidence that these men—and I do not know one of them except Mr. Taggart, whom I met once—are aware of the real needs of agriculture in this country. There are too many factors which they are disregarding altogether. I shall refer to one or two of them before I finish. Again I read:

> For most of us who are civilians that means one thing above all else now; to produce; to produce more rapidly, to produce more efficiently.

True. The minister never used truer words.

> It is to our superior productive power that we look for an overwhelming victory. We must make that power effective in the factory, in the mine and forest, and in the field. We must produce the goods and deliver the goods.

Utterly true. The one means of producing the goods is to make it pay to produce them. You do not need to go out and plead with farmers over the radio to be patriotic. If you make it pay them to produce goods, they will produce them, if you make it pay them so that they can live.

Having quoted the minister's speech in March of this year, may I quote from his speech on the budget, as reported in Hansard at page 3592:

> The war will not be won by disputing as to whether labour or agriculture or employer or employee should get a larger share of a swollen national income.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hear hear.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Perfectly true, but the war may be lost by disregarding the economic exigencies of the whole process of production. It may be lost, I say, by ignoring these things. Men will plead only so long. All that the minister and the men who are associated with him need to do is to read the remarks which were made by the leaders of the delegations who have come in the last three weeks to this government pleading for consideration. Read those statements and see how much hope there is in them. See how nearly ready these men appear to advise that men should stop milking cows and go and join the army. If, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to dispute about matters such as these vital ones to which the minister has referred, why all the prattle about equity? If we are going to pay handsome salaries to civil servants to take lucrative and dignified positions from one coast of Canada to the other, while we tell the farmer that he is supposed to produce for solely patriotic motives, I think the gross inequity will appear so grotesque as to arouse the disgust of ordinary men.

All one has to do is refer to the beef situation. I come from one of, I believe, the best beef-producing constituencies in Canada. What an amount of significance there was in the question asked this afternoon by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) why the packers were permitted to lower the price of beef.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): And a new quota going on to-morrow.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Never for a moment should that have been permitted. Who is governing this country? Is it the dominion government or the Canada Packers?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Ask Mr. Gordon.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If Canada Packers are able to dictate prices and decide whether this country is to have production or is not to have it, how long can we maintain that we are governing this country intelligently? How long can we maintain that we are guided primarily by the principle of an all-out war effort? I speak as one with experience. My father and my family have been producers of beef since I was old enough to know what a cow was. The beef prices in this country have been such as to ruin the beef producers; and now, at the very time when they have a chance to recover themselves, to improve their breeding stock, to get pasturage, to repair their fences, we have Canada Packers obtruding its unwholesome self into the picture, and the government sitting supinely by and permitting it, and then talking about governing the country.

We have to have discussions of farm income, and the discussion should have been on the floor of this house. I have avoided carefully saying anything in this plebiscite discussion which might embarrass the government, or might indicate that I did not sufficiently understand the situation. I will grant that there are things no man can understand, coming from the wholesome west here to Ottawa where we have to hear about the most pernicious political sculduggery going on. I have deliberately avoided saying much about this plebiscite, but it has been one of the astonishing things of my life that this government has devoted months and months to a discussion of the plebiscite and has never had any time to discuss the price of beef which meant food for Britain.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is playing politics pure and simple.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Playing politics, as the leader of the opposition says, and then having the effrontery and hypocrisy to maintain their concern about an all-out war effort. That is the thing that amazes me. I would say that the minister showed callous disregard of the interests of the farmer. He may not have felt it, but it was there and there was the insinuation that farmers should not busy themselves about incomes, about their share of the national income. But you can appoint deputy ministers at $9,000 a year!

An hon. MEMBER: And take it away from them in income tax.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, but you will be taking it away from the farmers in income tax if they get it. At any rate it would be a little comfort to them to be able to get it. The minister in his speech manifested little appreciation of the difficulties of the farmers. There seems to be a surplus of highly paid individuals going to and fro in Canada nowadays calling upon farmers to produce from patriotic motives. Why not help them to make their efforts yield returns? Here is an evidence of the attitude of such men who pose as financial and economic advisers to the people of Canada in this grave crisis. I quote from the letter of the Bank of Nova Scotia of March, 1942, from which I gathered a great deal of understanding that helped me to see through some of the government ways. I quote:

The price of wheat is a matter of national policy. Such policy must take into account the fact that, from a war-time standpoint as well as from a social standpoint, all sections of the population should receive enough income to maintain their health, their efficiency as producers, and their morale. But such policy must also take account of the fact that war is a time of shortage and that financial assistance to any group increases the demand of that group upon the diminishing supplies of manpower and materials available for civilian purposes.

The income of a deputy minister apparently does not have any effect upon the demand for materials, nor do the incomes of those officials appointed to lucrative positions across Canada apparently affect the demand for materials. But the moment farmers get an extra dollar, that affects the demand for raw materials for civilian supplies. Is it hypocrisy, or is it just unbelievable inconsistency and lack of intelligence?

To continue:

These two considerations balanced against one another, rather than the more obvious financial aspects, set the real limits on aid to prairie wheat farmers—

This indicates that the prairie wheat farmer must be content with only 90 cents a bushel for wheat, not because the government cannot pay more, but because the government is afraid to let the farmer have the money to spend. He is likely to hurt himself and Canada if he takes the money and spends it or pays off some of the tremendous debts that exist in Saskatchewan, or those great debts in Alberta, or pays his store bill or his doctor's bill which has been standing for ten years as a result of the depression. If the farmer takes the money for any of these purposes, he will cause inflation. Can you beat that in this time of war, in 1942? I continue the quotation:

—or for that matter, to any other depressed group of the population.

That is an acknowledgment that the farmers are a depressed group, and we have the callous affirmation of the proposal to keep them a depressed group purely because they must not have the money for the reason that it would cause inflation. That statement comes from the Bank of Nova Scotia in its March, 1942, letter. That man should be made chancellor of one of the prominent universities in order to be quite consistent with what has gone on in the past in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He ought to be in the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let us see what the farmers think about this matter. I will read what George W. Robertson, Secretary of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, has to say. He is a man who knows what the realities are:

In my judgment the establishment of parity prices for agricultural commodities represents the equitable method of price control for the agricultural industry, and that no price ceilings on farm commodities should be established below parity level. I would define parity prices for farm comodities as the price which these commodities would need to realize in order to purchase as large a quantity of other commodities now available as it actually did during a specified base period, preferably 1926 to 1929. Ceiling prices should be established at levels approximately 15 per cent above parity prices to offset increased living costs recognized in government's labour policy by provision for cost of living bonus.

It will be answered that price parity has been established, but I will prove unchallengeably that it has not been established.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the dinner recess, Mr. Speaker, I was dealing with the budget and arguing that the farmers were not receiving a fair deal. I said that the minister has slighted them, that he had disregarded their interests, that in his budget speech he had indicated a rather callous attitude toward them. Whether or not I was fair to the minister I am not able to say; we shall be better able to judge that by what he does in future, rather than by anything he may say now or anything he has done in the past. I was pointing out that the farmers generally were under a very heavy burden of debt, and now I wish to go forward with the argument as to whether or not the prices the farmers are now receiving are equitable.

The minister indicated that the farmers were receiving reasonably good prices and a reasonably good income. But the minister, in saying that, disregarded the increased cost of the things the farmers buy. In order to show the truth of my statement I should like to read from the Searle letter of June 3, 1942. This letter is published by the Searle Grain company, which I believe is one of the best authorities on farming problems to be found in western Canada. I find the following remarks on page 1:

However, as was shown in an article in this letter on May 20, the price of wheat at the new 90 cent price will still be 31 per cent below "parity"; the price of hogs is now 15 per cent below "parity", of steers, 19 per cent above and of lambs, 11 per cent above "parity". ("Parity" meaning the present purchasing power of these products as compared with their same purchasing power over the same things farmers had to buy in 1913-14, all as shown by the Searle index.)

This indicates that on the whole the farmers are a good deal worse off to-day with respect to prices than they were in 1913-14. But may I pause here for a moment to deal with this whole question of parity prices. There seems to be abroad both in Canada and in the United States the idea that if we could get the farmers back to the point where they would be getting the same income as they were getting in another given period of time, say between 1909 and 1914 or between 1926 and 1929, or some other period, all would be well with us and we would have no further need to worry about the farmers. I do not believe there has ever been a time in this country when the farming population has had a fair deal. There has always been the grossest disparity between the prices farmers were able to obtain for their products and the prices of things they had to buy. So to say that prices have returned to parity is not enough. We must place the farmers in a position in which they will be able to get as much for their effort, as much of the goods which other people produce and which the farmers have to buy, as other people are able to obtain of the goods which the farmers produce and sell. Then, and not until then shall we have something like a balanced economy with respect to the farming population of this country.

May I now read another statement from the same Searle letter of June 3, 1942:

> The Searle index of the cost of things farmers buy (147 items), now stands at 152·3 (1913-14 equalling 100). This means that these things cost farmers of the west at the present time 52·3 per cent more than did similar items of the same quality in 1913-14. (These costs have risen 16·3 per cent since August, 1939.) The price of wheat is now 10·5 per cent lower than it was in 1913-14. The purchasing power of a bushel of wheat is now, therefore, only 59 per cent of what it was in 1913-14.

When it is remembered that such a large percentage of the farmers of Canada, and particularly of the farmers of the west, are mainly occupied in the production of wheat and are scarcely in a position to go into any other kind of production, I believe such figures must give any thoughtful man cause for serious concern. But there are other matters which go still further in support of the statement I made. I have in my hand the booklet issued by the Searle Grain company, setting forth in great detail the costs of the 147 items which are used by the company in compiling their index, indicating the manner in which the prices have increased by years from 1913-14 up to the present time. From this booklet let me cite a number of facts which I think should impress the members of this house. With regard to twenty-eight items of household equipment, taking the 1913-14 level as 100, it is true that whereas those items of household equipment were priced at 100 in 1913-14, prices had risen in 1926 to 165 and had risen still further in 1941 to 175. Of fifty-three items of farm equipment which were priced at 100 in 1913-14, in 1926 they were priced at 149, and in 1941 at 156. Of twelve items of farm machinery, taking the price at 100 in 1914, we find that price had risen by 1926 to 164, and by 1941 to 187.

Nothing further should be necessary to indicate that even if it were shown that the prices the farmers are receiving had returned to the 1926 level, that in itself would not indicate that the farmers were receiving an adequate return having regard to the price of things which they have to buy as compared with the price of things they are producing and selling.

There were other matters which the minister disregarded, and which are likely to be disregarded by such good men as Donald Gordon and others, men of good-will but who simply have not had time, in the great urge of their responsibilities, to look into all the facts, and who have been advised by men who also are not familiar with the facts. The matters which might be disregarded include such things as these. Many of the farmers, as I indicated in my remarks before the dinner recess, have been forced out of live stock, so that now they do not possess the breeding stock which would enable them to go back into the production of beef or other commodities which might be more profitable to them. They have been through a depression and a long series of very bad years. As a result they have not the capital with which to go back into live-stock production, even should they wish to do so. Then in a great many cases they lack equipment, and in many more cases they are hopelessly in debt. They are simply hampered at every turn. Furthermore I believe the minister has overlooked the increased debt of the farmers, to which I referred at an earlier stage of my remarks.

Before I go on to the last aspect of the budget with which I choose to deal to-night, I wish to read to the house a line or two that will indicate something the minister might do in view of the precedent he has set in this budget.

The minister has forced loans from a number of people, and is undertaking to pay them only 2 per cent on the money he is forcing them to place with the government. He makes the promise that he will return that money at the end of the war. There are gentlemen who lent money in the past throughout the west, and perhaps throughout the whole of Canada, at interest rates running up as high as 6½ per cent. It was largely as a result of those high interest rates that Alberta was reduced to the state of financial impotence in which the Social Credit government found her in 1935. And it is largely because of that state of financial embarrassment that so many things have occurred under that administration which have aroused the indignation of so many people in high places in Canada.

I should like to read a passage from an editorial appearing in the Edmonton Bulletin of Monday, June 29, an editorial which I believe will need no explanation or amplification:

> The high interest rates on public and private debt in Alberta is nothing short of a scandal. Alberta was faced in 1935 with bankruptcy, due largely to paying ruinous interest rates. The drastic action by the Alberta government in cutting in half, to two and a half per cent, the interest rate on the provincial debt was the only action possible at the time, unless social services were entirely abandoned, or by pyramiding a huge increase in debt by funding the unpayable interest charges.
> Edmonton is paying about $500,000 yearly in excess interest charges. And still we hear the suggestion to raise street-car fares and curtail much needed civic improvements.
> The place to direct our demand for action is where action is possible—the hon. Mr. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, has absolute power to remedy this deplorable situation, which is a positive menace to the public interest.
> When Mr. Ilsley in his new budget compels Canadians to lend part of their weekly wages at 2 per cent interest, why can he not compel our financial corporations to charge only reasonable interest rates.
> Edmonton is paying 150 per cent more on a debt of $26,000,000 than what Mr. Ilsley declares to be a fair rate of interest.
> Canada is fighting for its very existence against Hitler's new order of world slavery, and cannot continue to support the "high interest racket" if she hopes to make an all-out war effort.

One might suppose that that was from a Social Credit paper; but it is just a good, hard-headed Liberal paper from Edmonton.

Mr. ILSLEY: But does nothing depend upon the term during which you have the money? Two per cent is a fair rate for a short term.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If this war lasts for ten years the minister will not return the money until after ten years, and the 2 per cent will not be increased. I say to the minister that 2 per cent is enough. And 2 per cent is also enough for these other gentlemen to have. If they need any more than the 2 per cent, then I suggest to the government that it direct the Bank of Canada to refund the money. Let it give those men back their money, and then let the people of Edmonton have the money at the 2 per cent rate. It does not make sense in 1942, for a people to be charged 5 per cent or 6 per cent on money, while other people are in the throes of war, and having to suffer in order to pay that interest.

I should like now to turn to another aspect of the matter discussed in the budget speech. I would point out that things should be ever so much better than they are indicated in the budget. Again I am not casting any reflection upon the minister. In view of the circumstances in which he found himself he probably did the best he could. So long as he holds to the ordinary debt finance system he is going to be forced to bring down more and more onerous budgets, year after year, until the people of Canada are completely crushed under the enormous structure. It is not so serious now perhaps when the government is spending huge sums of money for goods which are to be taken overseas and destroyed. But just as soon as the country has returned to an economy wherein it consumes what it produces, then there will be a collapse. The object of this group is to adjust our affairs before the time comes for that collapse.

I suggest that the budget could be a victory budget, instead of a budget of defeat, as it is to-day. Notwithstanding all that is going to be done with the money that is raised; notwithstanding the splendid effort Canada has made in the war—and I have no thought of disparaging its vast effort—Canada is not by any means doing what she is capable of doing, judged from the point of view of materials, men and organization.

If business methods were applied directly to Canada's financial and public affairs we could have a great improvement. May I read to the minister something from his budget speech which possibly he hardly realized was so significant, but which I am going to point out to him as being very significant. This is what he said, as reported in Hansard at page 3578:

> We can probably again draw on inventories of civilian goods but by how much I do not know, for information as to inventories is very deficient.

No expression could have been used on the floor of the house which would condemn the government more completely, beyond question, than that statement. The very first thing a businesslike administration should do is to discover what inventories are from one end of the country to the other. When we had that make-believe registration, that child's-play window-dressing in 1940, there should have been a registration of every aspect of Canadian public life, a complete registration of Canada's economic set-up. People will ask: How could it have been done? It could have been done. How is it that the bureau of statistics accomplishes so much by way of gathering statisties? Is it to be supposed that the bureau of statistics could not have been enlarged and specialized so that a complete inventory of everything in the country would have been prepared. Had that been done, the government would have been able to tell at a moment's notice—the minister himself, or anyone in charge of his department—just how many shoes there are in stock from one end of Canada to the other, just how many pounds of butter there are, how many suits of clothes there are. Of course it could have been done. That would be a first essential in a businesslike administration in any country whatsoever, and especially in a country like Canada.

Without delay, the government should at once obtain an accurate and detailed inventory of all goods on hand, from coast to coast. Let it inquire into the amount of food, clothing, shelter, available fuel, educational facilities, available medical and dental services. Let the people be informed as to the available supply of those goods and services. The government would then be in a position to tell how much money it could put into circulation, without causing inflation. Then it would be able to tell how much in the way of goods is available for consumption, how many pairs of shoes a family may have, how many pairs of shoes the province of Alberta may have from Canada's supply, all matters which are vital to any government, where the money situation is going to be managed properly.

Then the government should know the number of non-Canadian goods, goods we receive from Great Britain, the United States, South America, Mexico and other countries.

We should know the number of goods in sight. For example, sugar is produced in my constituency. The government should know exactly the amount of sugar which it is estimated will reach the market this year. Probably it does know that—very likely, in fact, because there is a sugar controller. Then it should have the same information with regard to every commodity in Canada.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

It should know the productive capacity of the country. The government probably does know the productive capacity with respect to sugar and a few other commodities, but it should know the productive capacity with respect to every other commodity in Canada. For that productive capacity has a direct bearing on the question of inflation, the question as to whether money must be taxed out of circulation, so that people may be kept from buying goods, and the question as to whether the minister should have forced loans, or should spend money.

The government, I say, should know the productive capacity of the country. It should know the mechanical productive capacity: the number of machines for manufacturing cloth, for example, and the number of machines for the manufacture of other commodities. It should have the extent of our transportation facilities. The government should know the extent of our storage facilities. This information should be right at the government's finger-tips. All that should be necessary in order to obtain the information is to touch a button. It could be done. The government should know, too, in great detail, the human material available in the country.

The government should know the potential additional productive capacity. They should know, for instance, how much sugar could be produced, and how long it would take to get into that sugar production. They should know how many factories it would be necessary to have, whether they could get the factories and all that sort of thing. They should know our honey producing capacity. They should know our wool producing capacity. They should know our dairy producing capacity, our fruit producing capacity and the same with all other foods. We should have full information as to the resources of Canada, both material and human.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has elapsed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have moved a vote of want of confidence in the government, and my time is unlimited.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have taken that into account. The hon. member started to speak at twelve minutes to five, and his amendment was presented at twenty minutes to six. He has now been speaking for one hour and thirty-seven minutes. The hon. member spoke for forty minutes on the motion and fifty-seven minutes on the amendment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is no time limit on a member who has moved a vote of want of confidence in the government. If the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) had moved this amendment, he would have had unlimited time. He did not move it; so I moved it and I have unlimited time.

Mr. NEILL: It is a well known fact that there is no time limit on an hon. member moving a vote of want of confidence in the government. I think the leader of the government will confirm that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not need it.

Mr. STIRLING: I draw attention to the fact that the hon. member does not need unanimous consent. Surely he has unlimited time when he moves a vote of want of confidence.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Very well, I am satisfied.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There should be a complete inventory of the needs of Britain and the needs of Russia. Three or four times I have asked on the floor of this house to be given information as to how much of a given commodity the government wants. I do not believe the government has any definite conception of what it wants in the case of most of the major commodities which are required overseas by Britain and Russia. The government is so much in the habit of following the principle of laissez-faire that it cannot get out of the habit even to fight a war. It just has to let things drift. I think that situation should be remedied, and remedied at once. The government should determine what will be left for Canada after Russia, Britain and the other allies that require assistance have been supplied. Then after that it should determine what Canada's consumption could be.

There is something else that has been neglected by the government in connection with all these matters—the cooperation of the provinces. It is conducive to bureaucratic and centralized control in Ottawa when the wartime prices and trade board undertake to govern everything from Ottawa. They will find that in each of the provinces of the Dominion of Canada there is a government which is as much concerned about keeping prices down as ever the government at Ottawa is. Those governments could be of great assistance to the wartime prices and trade board and to the ministers of the departments in making up inventories of goods and in doing many other things which must be done in this time of great peril. It would add greatly to our financial and economic stability.

Then the provinces could be divided into regions, and the regions could take care of these matters. The municipalities could take care of many things. I find that the cities are greatly concerned about prices within their own borders. They are just as vitally concerned as Donald Gordon or any other person in Ottawa in the prices of commodities. Surely we can count on the cities to assist most heartily and effectively in the administration of the policies of the wartime prices and trade board. I suggest that the government needs to decentralize its responsibility at once and bring in a great number of people to assist. It will have no trouble in doing that. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is in his place to-night. He has mentioned that he has found the assistance given by the provincial governments and other bodies most excellent because they are all vitally interested in this war. They are not foreign countries; they are Canada, they are British. Why try to monopolize all the control and management in Ottawa? It just does not make sense. It is contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act. It is contrary to democratic procedure in any British country, and especially in a country like Canada.

After having obtained, with the cooperation of the provinces, an absolutely accurate inventory of the goods on hand and the goods which could be put on hand at a given time, the next thing the government should do is to determine how much money could be absorbed by those goods and by services such as schools, dental establishments, medical establishments, tranportation facilities and all that sort of thing. The government should determine how much might be paid into debt and insurance before it fixes a tax structure such as the minister has fixed by this budget.

The government should next find out the prices which are necessary to stimulate the desired maximum production. I have said time and again that if you give a man a fairly remunerative price for his eggs, or any other commodity, I care not what it is, you do not have to go on the air and plead with him to produce that commodity. You do not have to plead with any particular producer to produce something that will prove profitable to him. As I say, the government should determine the price which will stimulate maximum production. If it is prepared to maintain that price, it will get the maximum production which it desires.

There is one more thing that ought to be done, something to which I referred this afternoon. Let us say the government is trying to determine the price that ought to be paid for apples. There is no one in Canada who knows more about that price than the apple grower. Why not bring him into consultation instead of having a lot of doctrinaires who have probably never seen an apple orchard.

The next thing to do is to determine the wage rate which is necessary to stimulate maximum production and to make the labourer feel happy. When you are determining what your wage structure will be you should consult the workers; they know.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is what we are doing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I realize the minister is doing it. I am not sure but that he is the most progressive minister in the whole cabinet, and I hope the others prove themselves able to learn.

Mr. GARDINER: While we are correcting the hon. member, may I say the apple growers are handling the apples.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The minister can hardly conceive how much reassurance he has given me by this evidence that he has finally got on to what is the right thing to do. That is the policy that should be followed. The people who are producing know what is necessary.

There is one more thing that should be done. An adjustment should be made in order to bring agricultural purchasing power, labour purchasing power and the purchasing power of each and every one of the other groups into harmony so that there may be balance in the economy of Canada. In his telegram to the Minister of Finance of October 14, 1941, Mr. H. H. Hannam suggested this and indicated quite strongly that there had to be balance in the Canadian economy. Agriculture is only one of the groups. The other primary producers are also groups; the wage-earners and merchants are also groups which must be brought into such a state of prosperity or spending power that there is a balance throughout the country.

The next thing, after having determined on the price, is to advance credit to producers who would produce and also to students who would be prepared to learn. I commend the government for having helped, through the Department of Labour, to train boys and girls for specialized work. This policy should be followed throughout the country. Wherever there is a young man who is qualified to become a highly skilled technician or workman he should be discovered and the government should advance credit so that he might be able to go on and perfect himself, because that young man or workman can be made into a great asset.

Then there should be price subsidies and wage subsidies, and price discounts, pensions and other allowances. There should be subsidies for freight rates where necessary, and discounts of the prices of secondary products to enable farmers to buy.

People will ask: "Where are you going to get the money to do all this?" The members of the house know full well my stand on that question.

Mr. MacNICOL: We do not. It is not clear to us yet.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then I am going to say just a little bit more about it. The whole amendment which I have moved this day is centred around credit and currency management. In a country such as Canada it is possible to have a certain amount of credit and currency out in circulation; the amount of credit and currency that can be out in circulation depends upon the goods and services available, upon the consuming and producing power of the country. The task of the government is to determine by scientific means how much credit can be put into circulation without inflation, and then to see to it that that amount of credit and currency is put into circulation. The credit and currency should belong to the government, be under the direction and control of the government, and the direction and control should be exercised scientifically.

If the government wants a farmer away out in one of the Battlefords, for instance, to produce sheep, and the farmer has not the money to produce the sheep, the sensible thing for the government to do is to see that the farmer gets the money with which to produce the sheep, and to show him where he can buy the sheep. Then, when he produces the wool it becomes an asset to the country. If a similar principle were applied over the whole economy of Canada, the improvement in the national economy, in the wealth and strength of this country, would be almost inconceivable; I am sure of that. This whole matter of the possibilities of currency and credit management has been neglected by the minister up to the present; it is time he changed his ways in that respect.

I am going to give just one little illustration to show how this thing could be worked out practically. In Britain during the last war they created a credit instrument called the Bradbury and 354 million pounds of Bradburys went into circulation in Britain during the last war. Hon. members who are interested in a study of the whole matter will find it excellently dealt with in "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges," by William A. Shaw, one of the best authorities on matters financial in the whole of Britain. As I said, 354 million pounds of Bradburys were distributed among the people. They were paper, treasury bills, nothing but paper currency, but they were accepted and they became legal tender. They helped to finance the war, and through them Britain won the war and would have won the peace had not evil counsels prevailed causing the discontinuance of the Bradburys some time after 1920.

We can think of saving certificates becoming legal tender just as easily as a five dollar bill. The savings certificates could be made not legal tender until a year from now, or two or three or four years from now. They could be kept out of circulation, "frozen" as it were, until the government saw fit to bring them into circulation by the simple device of declaring them to be legal tender or to be negotiable. The Bradbury experiment could be duplicated in Canada with great advantage. If we had a Canadian Bradbury and we paid the farmers the extra price necessary on his wheat with Canadian Bradburys or savings certificates; if we paid in Bradburys an extra price on any commodity that we chose; if we paid a subsidy on wages or on freight rates to bring down the cost of transportation of western wheat from the prairies to Ontario or Quebec or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, the Bradbury or the savings certificate would then be being used as a credit instrument.

People will say immediately: "What good will all these things be to the companies concerned?" Well, what good are the savings certificates? What good is a bond, apart from the fact that it yields interest? A credit instrument such as the Bradbury or the savings certificate used in this way would be a use of the nation's social credit.

The number of Bradburys which could have been in circulation in Britain during the world war depended upon the number of goods and services available for purchase, together with the amount that could be produced. With price controls, the number of Bradburys could have been increased.

In Canada a considerable number of savings certificates could be put into circulation. What good would that do? Suppose the farmer received, at the end of the year, a $500 subsidy in savings certificates, or in Canadian Bradburys if we decided to issue such a credit instrument. He could then use that credit instrument to pay off, say, a portion of a mortgage. The government could rule that the mortgage companies, but no other companies, could accept the Bradburys this year. That would enable the farmer to use that $500 immediately to pay off some of his debt. If a similar principle were applied throughout the whole economy of Canada, I think we would be astonished at the amount of debt that would be repaid and the tremendous amount of interest that would stop accruing, and surprised also at the general improvement in well-being and strength of the Canadian economy.

If the government chose to issue a kind of Canadian Bradbury or savings certificate it could say: "These certificates will not be transferable until the government so proclaims by order in council". Then, if the government decided that it was unsafe to have that money put into circulation until three or four or five years after the war, it would be in a position to rule accordingly. The government would decide when they should be put into circulation. It need not be worried at all about inflation. If such an accumulation of purchasing power were put into the hands of the people as would result from the application of such a policy as I have indicated, we would have a fine guarantee against a post-war slump. When the war is over and we cease to spend money like water all over the country buying munitions, and the factories immediately try to transform themselves into peace-time production, purchasing power in many ways will at once cease to be distributed, and there will be a shortage of purchasing power, which will cause a shortage of buying, which will tend to cause unemployment and to bring on a depression. But if the government, knowing that there is a great deal of passive purchasing power in the hands of the people at this time, determined to use it by declaring that Bradburys or savings certificates, or whatever the credit instrument might be called, should be negotiable or legal tender at a given time, it would then have a reserve of purchasing power upon which it could draw to remedy the situation resulting from a falling-off of purchasing power following the making of the peace.

I wish to point out just one or two more things to hon. members. I am deadly in earnest in this matter; I am positive that there is a solution here, and that no solution can be found without some principle such as this. I crave the indulgence of the house to read into Hansard some bits of literature which I read into Hansard on May 25, because it is possible that some hon. members who are now here were not present when I read these passages before. I quote from a book called "Economic Tribulation", by Vincent C. Vickers, of the Vickers munitions corporation.

To give an idea who Mr. Vincent C. Vickers is, I will read the following paragraph from the introductory note:

Vincent Cartwright Vickers was born on 16th January, 1879, and educated at Eton and Magdalen College, Oxford. He was a deputy lieutenant of the City of London, a director of Vickers, Limited, for twenty-two years, and a director of the London Assurance from which he resigned in January, 1939. In 1910 he was made a governor of the Bank of England, and resigned this appointment in 1919. Later, he became president of the Economic Reform Club and Institute.

I submit that any hon. member must be rather impressed by the record that this man has. It is not likely that a man of his calibre and his standing would recklessly espouse any untenable theory. In this book, which was finished on his dying bed, and published in 1941, and in which undoubtedly he put the very best things he had to say, he makes this reference to democracy, which I was discussing for a few minutes this afternoon. I then maintained that this budget is a step toward the destruction of democracy. As some hon. members might consider that I was extreme in saying that, may I support what I had to say on that occasion by the following quotation, which appears on page 66:

Our democratic system and our existing financial system can no longer live together; one of them must give way to the other.

And, Mr. Speaker, the one which is giving way in this country is democracy, and it is giving way very, very fast. I will read from the closing chapter of the book, in which the author offers suggestions which in his judgment are necessary for the preservation of democracy and the restoration of prosperity, peace and hope in the world, and particularly in his own beloved country. I read on page 74:

1. State control and state issue of currency and credit through a central organization managed and controlled by the state.

In this dominion we could use the Bank of Canada. The minister told us not long ago in debate that he was using the Bank of Canada, but it was astonishing, I believe, to every hon. member—it certainly was to me—what meagre use he had made of its facilities. He had touched that privilege as though he was afraid of it. If he can use the Bank of Canada as a means of getting money without cost, as a debt to ourselves as a government, why not use it on a far more generous scale than that on which he has so far used it? If he feels that the financial stability of the Bank of Canada is not great enough to enable him to use it to help finance this war; if he feels that the responsibilities of that institution are so great, because of the foreign exchange control board and other burdens upon it, I suggest that he establish in Canada a currency commission. Such a commission would not be seriously different from what existed in the last war. I pointed out to the house on a previous occasion that $26 million were printed in the last war by the treasury board for the cabinet and the Minister of Finance. That money was printed and used. Hon members will remember that up to the time of the organization of the Bank of Canada all the money of Canada was called Dominion of Canada bills, was printed and issued by the dominion treasury, and was good money—as good as ever it has been since the Bank of Canada printed and issued it. To say that such a board cannot be set up in Canada to-day is to talk arrant nonsense. If the government feels that the Bank of Canada is not in a sufficiently stable position to issue this money, I suggest the appointment of a credit and currency commission whose business it will be to discover the capacity of Canada to absorb currency and credit without inflation and then issue that currency and credit and apply it scientifically in accordance with the needs of the people.

The next suggestion made by Mr. Vickers in his book is this:

2. Stabilization of the wholesale price level of commodities.

He does not say how it is to be done. It can be done by a monetary technique, by price subsidies and discounts, as I have explained several times on the floor of this house.

That is to say, a fixed and constant internal purchasing power of money; so that a pound will buy to-morrow what it bought yesterday; an honest pound, not a fluctuating pound. And this can be done by so issuing and regulating the volume of available credit and currency that it shall at all times be adequate to permit of the purchasing power of the consumer being equated with the volume of production; not by limiting the purchasing power, but by firstly increasing purchasing power more in proportion to the productive capacity of industry.

Again:

3. Fixation of foreign exchanges by foreign exchange equalization funds, and agreement with empire countries and all other countries willing to fall into line; and, once this was accomplished, the removal or diminution of trade barriers which to-day protect the countries from the results of a bad monetary system.

I pause there just a minute to point out, what I believe will be interesting to hon. members, that this writer says we have trade barriers because we have a faulty monetary system—which indicates that if we get a sound monetary system we can demolish trade barriers, greatly to the benefit of the people. I am not advocating any such set-up as will endanger our industries. We must have our industries in Canada; but we do not need to protect them by trade barriers; we can protect them with such subsidies as are necessary to enable them to compete successfully, and we can subsidize them by the creation of credit and currency which we are able to base on our goods-and-services-producing-power, which again is dependent upon our resources in materials and in men.

4. Any additional supply of money should be issued as a clear asset to the state; so that money will be spent into existence, not lent into existence.

5. The fluctuating quantity of gold lying in the vaults of the banking system should never be permitted to govern the volume of credit and currency needed by the country.

6. The elimination of slumps and booms; and more direct procedure for eliminating unnecessary poverty.

7. The abolition of the debt system where all credit is created by the banks and hired out at interest to the country.

May I in closing, Mr. Speaker, point out that there is no need for despair or for a defeatist attitude. This country is going to be richer after this war than ever it was before, except for the loss of precious men and women killed and maimed; for the riches of a country are to be computed in terms of the goods-and-services-producing-power of the country. Every nation at present at war will be richer, excepting in those countries where productive power is being destroyed. The world is on the verge of a greater era of material prosperity than mankind has ever conceived of in its wildest dreams, and the only thing which can keep us from crossing the threshold and entering the realm of that prosperity is our own stupidity, our inability to adjust ourselves to the conditions of an age of plenty, our continuing to think we must carry on the affairs of this country in a power age with a dogcart or an oxcart financial and economic system.

What the government of this dominion needs above all things to-day; what the countries of the British empire and the united nations need above all things, is financially speaking, to turn and face the sunrise and cease to worship the sunset. Having done so; having modernized their economic and financial system, they may go forward with complete confidence; for our productive capacity far exceeds that of our enemies in combination. With the help of Providence, and our own good hard work, the work of the men and women whom we shall be able to employ as a result of a revised financial system, we shall struggle through, and under God we shall win, not only during the war but during the ensuing peace.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I do not propose to speak at any great length to-night, because I believe that we should endeavour as far as possible to shorten this debate and to discuss in committee the various matters which we shall consider in connection with the minister's proposals. I am therefore going to confine my remarks within the shortest possible compass.

With what the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) has said regarding the condition of agriculture both now and in past days I am in thorough accord. I do not propose to follow him and to discuss the other proposals that he has made; but, as I understand it, we are discussing a budget designed to restrict purchasing power among the people, and I think any policy which would defeat that objective would probably bring disastrous results upon the country at the present time. I, too, believe that we ought to plan our productive effort and our purchasing power in relation to one another; but to think that the mere issue of more money will cure the ills of society, or that the mere manipulation of currency, credit and money will bring us into some sort of utopia, is to follow something of an illusion, a money illusion, if I may put it in that way; for, after all, goods and services, not monetary tokens, are the real wealth of a nation, and if mankind can once grasp that fact, I, like the hon. member for Lethbridge, believe that when this war ends we can be, if we will be, better off, happier than we have ever been in all our history.

I congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his able presentation of the financial position of the country. It was, I think, admirably done and he deserves every credit for doing such a splendid job. As a tax measure his proposals move in the right direction. I think they lag toward the top and fail to reach the objective that I should like to have seen reached. I think they fail, too, in another significant respect, and that is in the realm of social security. Again we have a war budget, a budget that contains no additional measures of social security, nor any additional help for the social security measures we now have in effect Old age pensions are left where they are; dependents' allowances are in the same position; veterans' pensions are too low with the rising costs of living which we have experienced, and I think that even in war time the budget should have recognized these needs. Indeed, I believe that if we are going to maintain the morale of our people, not only have we to consider the necessities of the aged, of the dependents of men overseas and of a health programme for the nation, but we ought to provide something of a minimum standard of life for the people of the country. I should like to have seen a national minimum adopted and a ceiling placed on incomes, not as a political gesture but as a very real aid in our war effort, because I believe that while some sort of ceiling is being established now by means of heavy income tax in the higher brackets, the gulf between low incomes and those that remain high is far too wide.

The budget outlines stupendous expenditures—some $3,500,000,000 for the war alone; but in my opinion the Canadian people will not object to these expenditures because this war must be won, and in order to win it we have to produce the instruments of war. We have to arm the men who are going to the battle zones, and that means that we have to provide for the financing of the instruments of war and the men who will use them. The total budget, I say, is stupendous. With our peace-time expenditures it reaches almost the fabulous sum of $4,000,000,000. In spite of the very heavy increased taxation, just over 50 per cent raised by taxes, we have to raise a very considerable portion by way of loans. Few will object to the higher income tax, because after all the income tax is probably the fairest way of assessing taxation in a modern country. Few will object to the increased income tax, provided they are convinced that these increases are made on an equitable and just basis.

In examining the minister's proposals in that regard, I was struck with the fact that the people in the low and middle brackets will feel the pinch most; for let us keep this in mind: it is not what you pay out in taxes that really counts; it is the amount you have left after your taxes have been paid that counts. On a $2,000 income the increase in tax and compulsory saving is over 250 per cent. That is a tremendous increase for a family man, we will say, in the $2,000 bracket to take all at once. In the $3,000 bracket the increase is slightly over 300 per cent. In the $5,000 bracket it drops; the increase is 120 per cent; and in the $10,000 bracket the increase is 65 per cent, while in the $50,000 bracket it is 30 per cent. The increase above $3,000 diminishes on a percentage basis as the income increases. I think I know the reason why the increase is so great in the middle brackets, but the impact of the present budget in the income tax field will be greatest in these moderate income groups. Presumably, of course, this is to restrict purchases of non-essential goods by the largest group of wage-earners and salary earners who can be reached through the income tax. I know the minister can make a good case for the taxes, because he will say that the reduction in purchasing power in these fields is to prevent buyer competition, to prevent price inflation, and ultimately to release material and labour for war purposes. Those are good objectives, but let us not forget that the impact upon this group of middle-income earners is going to be very great indeed.

The introduction of compulsory saving is also a step in the right direction, following as it does to some extent the British plan, though I believe it is rather more severe than anything the British have adopted as yet.

Mr. MITCHELL: You pay back more.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite right. A few moments ago the hon. member for Lethbridge remarked that the interest on these compulsory savings, which of course are in the nature of compulsory loans, is to be 2 per cent until paid, and it is anticipated that the loans will be repaid at the end of the war. Here, I think, is the defect in the minister's budget. Where is a compulsory loan made in connection with large accumulations of wealth, held either by individuals or by corporations? The owners of these accumulations will be induced to lend their money to the government at a rate, if the term is longer, in excess of the 2 per cent which will be paid those who are handing over their compulsory savings to the government.

Mr. ISLEY: But we take 20 per cent of the excess profits at no rate of interest.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will deal with that in a moment. I would point out that you are not touching the same people with your excess profits tax as I am talking about at the present time. I am talking about corporations, trust companies, insurance companies and individuals who may have large accumulations of wealth. They are not touched by the excess profits tax; we have no compulsory loan on those accumulations of wealth, and I think that is a defect in the budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman will permit me, on their incomes we are much more severe than on the smaller incomes, in that we pay them back so much less.

Mr. COLDWELL: Quite so, but I am not talking about individual incomes. I am talking about persons who have large accumulations of wealth, not income; and I am talking about corporations which may have accumulations on hand. I believe justice demands that where there are such accumulations, we should levy on them compulsory loans on a graduated scale, according to their ability to contribute. The compulsory savings plan is, in my opinion, a good feature; but, like the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) this afternoon, I would say that I think it is bound to interfere with the sale of victory bonds in the future, and with the sale of war savings certificates and stamps. It will be impossible for the average man to pay the very high income tax, plus the compulsory saving, and also buy victory bonds and war savings stamps or certificates. Therefore I think the government and the country are going to face a very difficult situation in financing the amount which the minister indicated during his budget speech would have to be financed by way of loan, though I certainly wish him the very best of good fortune in endeavouring to raise money in that way. The amounts in the savings accounts of small depositors will be reduced, of course, and, as I say, that will make it difficult for such people to put their savings, as they have been doing for the past year or so, into various forms of war loans.

The minister mentioned the excess profits tax. It is raised to 100 per cent superficially, but in reality it is increased only 5 per cent, because 20 per cent will be refunded after the war. I think this is insufficient, particularly since the minister admitted in his budget speech that companies have been retaining substantial amounts for reinvestment in working capital, expansion and so on. I think, if I may say so, that this admission on the part of the minister in his budget speech is a vindication of all we have said in past months with regard to the necessity of a 100 per cent excess profits tax; and an answer, if I may say so, to the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott), who a couple of weeks ago took me to task for picking out, as he said, a group of profitable companies. I may say I did not pick out a group of profitable companies; I took them more or less as they appeared in the newspapers, and somewhat at random, because they were war production companies. I say the determination of the government to impose this tax now indicates that the demand was justified when we made it some time ago.

With regard to the 20 per cent to be refunded, I noticed that this afternoon the leader of the opposition spoke at some length on this feature of the excess profits tax. He said that it would be a good thing; that it would enable industry to return to its normal way of doing things; that it would provide employment after the war, and so on. But I should like to point out to the house that the 20 per cent is to be refunded unconditionally. There is no obligation upon the company which receives the 20 per cent refund in connection with the excess profits tax to do anything in particular with that money. It could, if it liked, cut a very substantial dividend melon after the war is over. This refund could, therefore, simply be deferred profits returnable to the shareholders when the war is over. If we are going to justify the return of this 20 per cent to industry when the war is over, that return should not be unconditional. It should be conditioned on industry using that amount in the transition from war-time to peace-time operations. Then this 20 per cent refund might be justified. Unless that is done, however, I would point out that we are simply setting up a fund out of which, at some future date, some nice, juicy dividends may be paid, and this would defeat the very object of the 100 per cent excess profits tax.

The leader of the opposition spoke of our little group and said he thought the worker was most interested in returning to his job when the war ended. He spoke at some length of the necessity of producing jobs for our men. Yet, as he was speaking—and I do not say this unkindly—I remembered that to-day is an anniversary. On June 30, 1935, in my home city of Regina, there were some 1,700 or 1,800 young men who were endeavouring to come to Ottawa to place their sad case before a government of which the leader of the opposition was then a member. I recollect meeting those boys in Regina and moving among them. In the number were university graduates and high school students. There were boys very much like my own boy at the time. What happened to them on that 30th day of June? In a peaceful meeting on the market square they were showered with tear gas bombs. A riot occurred, and one of our city detectives was killed.

Let us not allow that kind of thing to happen when this war is over. I have looked around the city in the past forty-eight hours and have seen the flags flying. The city is decorated in honour of those men who are now overseas—and I am glad the country is honouring those boys. Yet let me say that the greatest honour we can do them is to consider immediately how we may best give them an opportunity of living decent, comfortable lives when the war is over. To my mind, the flags are out of place until we have done something of that kind.

I said a few moments ago that the war will need every dollar we can find, and in my opinion we should go further in connection with the excess profits tax. We should take 100 per cent of all profits above a stipulated amount. In another debate in the house recently I suggested that perhaps that amount might be limited to four per cent, and that above that we should take all else for the war effort. Indeed, I believe that would be fairer than the present system, because I think there is not a member in the house who does not know that in some respects the base upon which the excess profits tax is computed is both uneven and inequitable.

So I would point out that while we commend many features in the budget, it falls far short of anything which might be called the conscription of wealth in war time. It does nothing to conscript industry, and leaves financial institutions free to lend or to refuse to lend money to the government. In those respects, in my opinion it falls short of what a budget during war time ought to be. Let me emphasize again that it does not in any sense nationalize the financial system, without which, in my judgment, not even the shadow of the thing suggested by the hon. member for Lethbridge could be in any way instituted. Without a complete national control of the financial system it is impossible, to use the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to issue currency and credit in terms of the nation's need.

The Minister of Finance has also decided that the new income tax and the excess profits tax shall be collected at their source. I think that is a good plan, and will prevent evasion. But how does the minister propose to prevent evasion in respect of unearned incomes, incomes from all kinds of bonds and investments, unless he compels a complete registration of both the securities and the owners of those securities?

One of the good features of the budget is the allowance for medical care, nursing and that kind of thing. In view of the tremendous tax now imposed upon the Canadian people it seems to me that that is an essential accompaniment of the budget. May I say to the minister that I hope, when the regulations are drawn, they will be sufficiently broad to meet various types of cases. It is proposed to make provision for medical care, hospitalization and nursing services. Among many of the lower income groups there may be a sick mother in the home, or a sick member of the family, but those people are unable to engage the services of a trained nurse or to remove the sick member of the family to a hospital. Yet the amount they spend on the sick person may be very considerable indeed. So, while they may not have the services of a trained nurse and while there may not be hospital expenses, there may be other expenses in connection with that sick person which ought to receive some specific consideration by the minister. Regulations governing this matter are being drawn, and I draw this to his attention in the hope that he will give it favourable consideration.

Then, as in former years I want to put in a word of criticism with respect to the kindness which has been shown for a number of years to the mining interests in this country. I think they have been treated very generously in their relief from taxation. Yet we send out surveyors. I do not know how much the Department of Mines and Resources is spending this year in sending out geologists and scientists into all parts of Canada, looking for favourable indications of minerals or oil. There is no doubt, however, that a very considerable sum is being spent for these purposes. When we have located favourable areas the private companies come in, on most occasions do some further prospecting, and then exploit the properties for their own private gain. Then we give the claims to private corporations and individuals for their own profit.

I think the time has come when we ought to consider doing this ourselves, and obtaining from our vast mineral and other deposits all the revenue that is in them. I notice we are still going in for some prospecting in gold. Well, I agree with those people who think it something of a paradox that we should take gold out of one hole in northern Ontario, ship it to the United States and put it into another hole. It seems to me a great waste of human labour when we are at war, and labour is needed.

The increase in the tax on alcoholic liquors is, as the leader of the opposition said this afternoon, fully justified. I could only wish that some steps might be taken to bring about a more moderate use of intoxicating liquor at this time of war. I believe in temperance, rather than in total abstinence; but I look round this country, and it alarms me to see the amount of alcoholic liquors being consumed at the present time.

Taxes on such luxuries as cigars, cigarettes, tobacco and so on were to be expected, but I want to join with the leader of the opposition in criticizing the imposition of a fairly substantial tax on candies. I think some differentiation might be made. Where candies are worth more than a certain amount per pound or where they are put up in boxes, they might come under the tax, but I think exemption should be given to the ordinary fudges and hard candies which children love. I agree with the leader of the opposition when he says that children crave some sweetmeat. This is a natural craving, and candy in moderate quantities should be within their reach.

The people of this country must be given assurances of a greater measure of social security when this war ends. When peace is proclaimed, are we going back again to the old pre-war unemployment, insecurity and poverty? A mother of a western Canadian boy who is now overseas sent me an extract from a letter which he had written to her during the plebiscite campaign, and which I received about the end of May. The people are English born, and the boy enlisted early in the war and is now in Great Britain. He said he was surprised that I had advocated a "'yes" vote in the plebiscite. He stated that he and some other boys from the same city, all of English stock, had voted "no" in the plebiscite overseas. He said they voted "no" because they did not feel justified in compelling boys to go over there and, when the war is over, to return to the conditions that they left when they enlisted. That comes from a boy who enlisted voluntarily and is now serving overseas. That was his thought, and I am sure the same thought is in the minds of many thousands of Canadian boys who are now in uniform.

What are we doing in the way of real preparation for the post-war situation, for the boys who will come back from overseas and for the workers who will be dismissed from industry? We have unemployment now. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) will tell us that in the area which he represents miners are working only one day a week, and to-day they are enduring depressed conditions almost as bad, if not—

Mr. GILLIS: Worse.

Mr. COLDWELL: The hon. member says worse than they had to endure during the years of the great depression.

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend knows there is an answer for that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I know the answer, but I would point out that nothing is being done to assist these men to maintain their families in decency when they are on such part-time employment. What we need is at least some beginning of a comprehensive social and economic plan. Hon. members have said to me that they have not heard me speak lately of economic planning, but I want to say that it is always in my mind. I believe that there can be no intelligent social and economic life in the future unless through our democratic institutions we build and plan effectively to meet the needs of the people. It is no good crying "socialism!" That is like crying "wolf!" It can be cried too often. I remember not so many years ago when some people in Regina where I lived said, "This man, if given his way, will hoist the red flag on the city hall or on the grounds of the legislative buildings." Our former leader, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, was accused in this house of wanting to put the red flag on parliament hill. Last Friday when I came up here in the evening I looked over toward the governor general's office and, hanging right outside his excellency's window, I saw the red flag with the hammer and sickle in the corner. I did not put it there. I want that to be known. Times are changing, and it is useless to cry "socialism".

I do not believe in stateism, whether it is state socialism, state capitalism or any form of stateism. In New Zealand the Labour government succeeded in having the foundations of democratic socialism incorporated into the constitution before war broke out. They hope to do this also in Australia under the leadership of Mr. Curtin, and they plan to do it in Great Britain when the war is over under such men as Bevin, Citrine, Morrison, Cripps and so on. Our social democracy must mean the preservation of the widest measure of private ownership in home, in farm and in those things which do not oppress the people, but taking into the nation's hands the great trusts and the great monopolies so that we may plan and use them to attain security, plenty and peace.

Mr. CHARLES E. FERLAND (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) and the leader of the New Democracy group (Mr. Blackmore) in congratulating the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on his brilliant delivery of a budget address remarkable both as to form and substance.

That part of the budget which introduces compulsory savings offers an interesting parallel with the "Enforced Benevolences" of King Henry VII who ruled England from 1485 to 1509 and who, impoverished at the end of the War of the Two Roses, filled the empty coffers in his treasury through compulsory loans levied from the nobility. But Henry VII never saw fit to repay his subjects the moneys he had forcibly extracted from their purse. Whatever the criticisms directed at this budget, Mr. Speaker, let us at least confess that our Minister of Finance is kinder than King Henry VII.

The two most important measures submitted to parliament during the present session are undoubtedly Bill No. 80, purporting to strike out section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, thus introducing the principle of conscription of men for overseas service, and the present budget in which the principle of conscription of wealth is incorporated to a large extent. Canada's war expenditures last year amounted in round figures to a billion and a half. Now the Minister of Finance requires for the present fiscal period appropriations totalling nearly four billion dollars. He estimates the total revenues for 1942-43, the current fiscal year, at $2,050,000,000 and the total expenditures at the figure of $3,900,000,000. This would leave a deficit of $1,850,000,000.

The minister is relying chiefly on direct taxation of incomes and profits and on indirect taxation of goods and services to increase the revenues of the dominion by about $377,850,000.

Here is a summary of the budget:

First, a sharp increase in the income and national defence taxes is contemplated. These taxes will be combined and, whenever possible, deducted at the source. They will be increased by a salary deduction, considered as a form of compulsory savings, repayable after the war at 2 per cent interest.

Secondly, the excess profits tax is raised from 75 per cent to 100 per cent; 20 per cent of the tax would be refunded after the war also bearing interest at the rate of 2 per cent.

Thirdly, there are increased taxes on spirits, tobacco of every description, soft drinks, transportation, telephone communications, night clubs, luxuries such as furs, jewelry, candy, chewing gum, and so forth.

The Minister of Finance wishes the people to understand that Canada, together with the united nations, is in a critical situation and that victory will only be achieved after a long war. He said:

> The war will be won, not alone by the valour of fighting forces and the skill of generals but by the willingness of the people at home to make necessary sacrifices—willingness to make those sacrifices first and not after all other groups have made them.

In this budget, the Minister of Finance calls upon the nation as a whole to accept the heaviest sacrifices in these tragic days, in this the most critical period of our history.

The budget has two main features: taxation is increased to such a degree that it appears crushing and savings become compulsory.

How will this war budget affect the economic life of Canada? I believe it is impossible at the present time, even for the exponents of new doctrines, the builders of theories, the pedlars of new systems and the experts who contributed to the preparation of this budget, to foresee the consequences which, I fear, will spell disaster for many people.

Does this budget not preface a fundamental economic revolution? Is it not, to a certain extent, tainted by state socialism? Let us hope that it will not cause our economic structure to collapse.

This budget places our country on the same footing as every large nation devoted to an all-out war effort. I unhesitatingly state that Canada is now reaching the limit of her war effort, in spite of the statements made by inveterate conscriptionists who, during the last few months and even before, have waged a campaign of hate, prejudice, insult and slander against Quebec, ceaselessly proffering both in their newspapers and in public speeches, the same nonsensical charges with unheard-of violence and in a spirit of revolt against our province heretofore unknown in Canadian history.

Mr. Speaker, a nation with a population of 12,000,000 which raises an army of 500,000 men through the voluntary system, which can employ in its munition plants almost a million workers—the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said that the figure was 900,000 at this time—which is able to maintain on farms at least one million men, which supplies to the common cause all the planes, the merchant vessels and the warships it can build in its yards operating to full capacity, which supplies all the guns, munitions, supplies and commodities needed by the allies, a nation of 12,000,000 which does all that has no reason to be ashamed of its conduct, and I do not hesitate to say that Canada now ranks with the great nations which are putting forth a total war effort commensurate with their resources. We are doing even more than our neighbours.

I have before me, Mr. Speaker, a table published in a Montreal newspaper showing the taxes proposed in this budget as well as those that are paid in England and in the United States. I find, in the first place, that England pays the heaviest taxes and I wish to correct a wrong impression which I have frequently noticed among the working classes who think that Canada is doing more than England herself. Taxes are much heavier in England than they are in Canada. One can understand that because Britain is in the war zone.

There are a few comparisons: We find that while a single person with a $2,000 income is taxed $441 in Canada, that same person is taxed $624.50 in Britain and only $106 in the United States. Single persons earning $10,000 in Canada must pay a tax of $4,312—not including compulsory savings—while in Britain the tax is $4,624.50 and only $2,190 in the United States. I will give no further illustration but the proportion is the same all along the line.

At first sight it does seem that this budget is bound to have among others the following results: it will so reduce the purchasing power of the people that the taxpayer, the consumer and the government's competitors will be unable to buy the raw materials required for war.

The general taxes and the 100 per cent excess profits tax will necessarily bring about a formidable, indeed an excessive reduction of wealth among the very rich. The middle classes will also be seriously affected and they will be forced to adopt a standard of living far below that of pre-war days.

I believe the farmers will not be affected by this budget, those of my province anyway. Such is also the opinion of a financial publication from Toronto. It complained in its issue of Saturday last of what it termed "a grave and serious omission." Still one would need to have very little knowledge of the conditions which obtain among the poverty stricken farmers in Quebec to state that they should be in a position to pay income tax.

Further examples make it evident that certain civil servants, bank employees, employees in industrial, commercial and other establishments, earning a $2,000 income, will find it very difficult to balance their budget particularly after having paid $450 in taxes. But the wealthy—and I emphasize this point as an answer to all demagogues who hold a grudge against the wealthy class—the rich man whose income formerly was $100,000 will only retain $21,000, that is 21 per cent, and turn over $79,000 to the state. And what about the millionaire with a $500,000 income? According to the budget provisions, Mr. Speaker, he will only be able to keep $37,000. On the whole, however, the class most affected is composed of people with an income between $1,500 and $3,000 a year. It seems probable that a large number of these people whose standard of living required every dollar of their income and who must continue paying the same rent until next May, will be unable to balance their budget.

I hope that the hon. Minister of Finance will, within the shortest possible delay, find the means to correct any errors that may have been overlooked in a war budget of that size.

I sincerely think that the present budget will inevitably lead us to the enacting of moratoriums which will necessarily be requested of the government, especially by small property owners and a certain number of small industrialists doing business on a small scale, who seem to be seriously affected by the budget.

In order to reach its ambitious goal, the government also relies on a voluntary savings tax. Certain newspapers claimed that this was merely penalizing the thrifty, since the government taxes insurance premiums. Such a tax, although paid by the insurance companies, will necessarily affect the policyholders, for the companies will certainly deduct the amount of the tax from the dividends payable, at least in the life insurance field. Thus the people generally will be asked to make a further sacrifice.

I hold no brief for the wealthy, but I have heard so much said against them, especially by certain demagogues, that I would be remiss in my duty were I not to point out to the house the sacrifices demanded of those who enjoy large wealth. Is it not true that the wealthy invest their money in insurance companies and are sorely hit by this new tax?

Many people who were in dire need before the war are now earning reasonable wages. A gradual levelling of the social classes is in process of accomplishment and it is to be hoped that after the war there will no longer be families in need of assistance, no unemployment in a country such as ours, as large as a continent and enjoying tremendous resources.

For this levelling of the social classes, the Liberal party deserves some credit. If we consider the results of the Unemployment Insurance Act through which the government collects from 50 to 60 million dollars annually, we must realize that these moneys are held by the state for the benefit of the working class and not for the rich.

Mr. Speaker, as I said before, the government is requesting our people to make tremendous sacrifices. In the opinion of the administration, the present budget is necessary to attain an all-out war effort. Although I find the budget provisions severe, I find war even less to my liking and our people would be even more harshly treated in the event of an invasion of our shores, in the east by Germany or in the west by the Japanese.

The Canadian people realize that in view of the immediate threat to our country and to all the united nations, every individual must do his part and accept personal sacrifices, and no one in our dominion can remain indifferent to the war effort directed by our government.

Mr. Speaker, as the representative of the three combined counties of Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, with a population of 65,000 who have raised no objection to the government's war programme, who have accepted every measure with the sole exception of conscription for service overseas, I believe, Mr. Speaker, that I am expressing the opinion of virtually all my electors when I say that I shall support this budget on the whole, in spite of certain mistakes it reveals, mistakes which, I repeat, are unavoidable in a war budget of that size. I feel that the province of Quebec will accept this budget. I hope it will accept it without complaining. That is my personal opinion, for I have consulted none of my fellow members from the province of Quebec. We have taken that stand, but I feel that I am serving the best interests of my country and my province in supporting this huge war budget, the largest in our political history. I feel that I would ill serve the interests of the French Canadians by a futile and barren opposition to this war budget which commands the general approval, as far as I can see, of the members of this house and which also seems to enjoy the approval of the press in this country. Of course I have no desire to force my opinion on hon. members. Every member of the Liberal party enjoys complete freedom. Those who do not agree with me are at liberty to take whatever stand they deem appropriate. I do not blame them in the least but I sincerely believe that we from Quebec would be mistaken in opposing such a measure; we would even interfere with the spirited battle undertaken by the members from Quebec under the efficient leadership of the former Minister of Transport and Public Works (Mr. Cardin) who has tendered his resignation, and who did a creditable thing when he showed the country at large that the province of Quebec is unalterably opposed to conscription. I feel it would be a mistake to persist in our quarrels and our dissensions on matters of lesser importance and that conscription must take precedence over financial questions. After all, as the saying goes, what money mars money will mend. And I assert with all my heart and with the utmost sincerity that there will never be any equality of sacrifice as between the soldier who sheds his blood, who gives his life, and the Canadian citizen who gives his money. I feel in duty bound to support the government on this measure. I am in agreement with the government's entire policy since the beginning of the war, and I will continue to support it with the sole exception of conscription for overseas service. I shall take the opportunity of stating why my electors are opposed to conscription at some other time, but for the time being I merely want to say that I shall vote against Bill No. 80.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the business of the house much longer. This is army week, dedicated to the Canadian soldier. The government has directed that during the week extending from the 29th of June to the 4th of July, we should honour our valiant Canadian soldiers and, personally, I see no better way of paying tribute to the courage of our soldiers than by telling my fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec that they have a duty to fulfil and that if they are opposed to conscription, they must at least make personal sacrifices and assume the obligations imposed by this budget which is deemed necessary in the opinion of the government.

As an homage to the soldiers of Quebec as well as to the clergy and the bishops of our province who have supported every activity of the government with clear-sighted and broad-minded patriotism, may I be permitted to quote an excerpt from the collective letter made public by our bishop:

> Let it be recognized that this spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice is nobly expressed by those who so courageously enlist in the army, navy and air force. We owe a debt of gratitude to our fellow-citizens who, by their courage and their bravery, will have so magnificently served their country and humanity. Their triumph over personal interest is a pledge of final victory; their loyalty honours our nation; their faithfulness to duty is the bulwark of our freedom. Every day we have new reasons to be prouder still of their steadfastness and their courage under fire, through thick and thin. They show themselves worthy of our young and valorous country. In their willingness to conquer or perish, their hearts are filled with heroic strength. And the sacred ties that bind them to all they hold dear are as many reasons for fulfilling their worthy part as defenders of our freedom.

So speak the bishops of the province of Quebec of the self-imposed sacrifices of our soldiers who are risking their lives and who stand ready to shed their blood for the common cause. Do our sacrifices count for so very much, I ask you. Would we not be ashamed to refuse to give a few dollars in support of so sacred and so dear a cause in this struggle between civilization and barbarism, in this battle of freedom against slavery?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote these words addressed to our soldiers on the occasion of this national celebration, which I have taken from the newspaper Le Droit:

> The Canadians are there!
> . . . and when the Canadians are there, that means the enemy shall not pass! . . . What heroic deeds are theirs! . . . What perilous tasks they have accomplished! . . . More than once have they covered themselves with glory by standing fast when it seemed impossible and in taking positions held impregnable! . . .

Stout hearts and valiant arms, the Canadians have their legend. Those of to-day are the worthy sons of those of yesterday, and blood will tell.

They shall hold fast and they shall conquer!

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): To-morrow is Dominion day, the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation. I thought we would have been home long ago; and I think the time has come, after we have been here since November last, when the house as quickly as possible should conclude its business. I am only filling in, as it were, to-night as one member of the opposition in order that the debate may go on to-morrow.

In Sir John A. Macdonald we have one of the main pillars of confederation; he was one of the great statesmen who were responsible for bringing about that great event. He was Attorney-General of Canada, and we did not hear in those days the strange talk that we heard in this house the other day from one other Attorney-General of Canada, because, after all is said and done, Sir John Macdonald laid down the policy of this party and of this country's long British policy. As I understand it, we are all together in this war. We do not know who will own the country before the next Dominion day arrives, because the whole empire and the dominions are being attacked now and are in very grave danger from the axis powers. As I say, we are in the war together, but sometimes some of the parties in the house seem to me to forget that particular fact. The object of some—it is not my object, but it is the object of some here—seems to be to use the great national danger in which we find ourselves to-day in order to advance what I might call the aims of their own political parties and their own political faiths. That is a great mistake, because nothing else matters until the war is won. It is our only business.

Speaking to the electors of the city of Kingston in December, 1844, Sir John Macdonald used these words with reference to the fiscal policy of the country as it was then:

I, therefore, need scarcely state my firm belief that the prosperity of Canada depends upon its permanent connection with the mother country, and that I shall resist to the utmost any attempt, from whatever quarter it may come, which may tend to weaken that union.

Forty-seven years afterwards, speaking in the same city in February, 1891, in his last campaign—he was again elected—Sir John reaffirmed the same doctrine of our close relationship with the mother country. He said:

For a century and a half this country has grown and flourished under the protecting aegis of the British crown. Under the broad folds of the union jack, we enjoy the most ample liberty, we govern ourselves as we please, and at the same time we participate in the advantages which flow with association of the mightiest empire the world has ever seen. As for myself, my course is clear. A British subject I was born and a British subject I will die.

In the course of half a century, Sir John never failed to make the stand of Canada known, in its relation to the rest of the empire. In those troublesome days, before the fathers of confederation had drawn up the British North America Act, they all had to give and take, with the result that confederation was facilitated and thus brought about. Shortly before the last war Canada was the chief drifter from the mother country, of all the dominions, owing to status dream, isolation and separatism. The visit in May, 1939, three months before the war, showed the great popularity of the king and queen in their visit here, but the decline and decay of our parliamentary institutions had already set in, because of the fact that we had surrendered our rights and privileges and functions to bureaucratic boards of all kinds and to the executive, especially under the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). That is a serious mistake. To-morrow will be Dominion day and this week is called "army week." We had troops in front of these buildings to-night. I do not wish to speak with disrespect of the Minister of Finance, because I have a great deal of respect for every minister of the crown to-day in the laborious, thankless tasks they have, and whatever I shall have to say on the budget is said without any intention of giving offence to anyone and in a spirit of good-will. Indeed, I wish nothing but the utmost good-will towards every member of the cabinet and this house. It seems to me, however, that the present Minister of Finance has forgotten the duty of this country to its soldiers at the present time. I have urged for three years that there should be some readjustment and reallotment of pay to the army, the navy and the air force. The question of pay was put through the house on September 10, in half an hour one night, Mr. Speaker—you were in the house—with practically no discussion at all. The present rates of pay were then established without discussion, and they have been found to be unjust, inequitable, unfair and full of inequalities; have done untold harm to recruiting and brought real hardship and suffering on soldiers' dependents. I find this every day in a soldier city from which I come.

A month ago I referred to what had been done in Washington, whereby every soldier in the United States army is given a minimum of $50 a month, with some receiving $60, and extra pay all along the line. I was glad to receive some support in what I said then from my good friend the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), and the soldier member for the Yukon (Mr. Black). I suggested that when these three payrolls were being discussed last session and this, they should be sent to some committee. In June, 1941, the present minister would not allow me to place on Hansard our schedules of pay, which are unjust and unfair, and nothing was done. I revived the matter this year. I venture to say that you could not get a Japanese office boy or cook to work for $50 a month, but what are we paying our men in uniform? It is all very well to sit and talk in this house; it is all very well to refer to what is being done on the farms and in the munitions plants, but that is as nothing compared with what is being done by our boys in the camps. Go to Camp Borden and the other camps throughout the country; see how our men sweat and toil all day. Yet all across the country this government has been spending money like water in the erection of camps, vast distances apart and at out-of-the way places, on expensive plants and military buildings. The youth of the city of Toronto have been taken from their homes and scattered all across the country, while the railways have been making millions of dollars out of the taxpayers, and this carnival of spending goes on. Down to the end of 1940, according to a return tabled in the house for me, the railways had made as much money as they made during the whole of the great war; yet they charge a soldier's wife or family $2 or $2.50 to go to Camp Borden to-morrow. The railways should be compelled to give the soldiers free transportation, particularly on holidays such as to-morrow, and on special occasions. We are becoming a laughing-stock, the way we set one class of the community against another, and pay control boards and stay-at-home civilians and office soldiers in uniform, and refuse to pay those overseas and in training.

The plebiscite caused more dissension in Canada than has occurred at any other time in the history of our country. I believe the forgotten agency of the services of the government of the day is the army and one of the most necessary. It is the forgotten arm of the services. The cost of living bonus should be given to the dependents of those in the army, but it will never be given as long as the present state of affairs continues. I can tell you this, Mr. Speaker, that yes-men and nodders caused this war. The yes-men and nodders in Germany, Italy and Japan brought about the tyranny and oppression which exist in those countries, and caused the surrender and usurpation of the powers of the people to dictators, just as the House of Commons has surrendered its powers to controllers and bureaucratic boards. This House of Commons is to blame if the cost of living bonus is not given to soldiers' dependents and for Canada's bureaucracy of civil servants. Last fall a few small changes were made in the government's policy, but this added pin-money for a soldier bonus I think went to only about 204 people in military district No. 2, which at one time before the war had as many soldiers as all the rest of Canada combined. Many of these dependent people cannot pay their rent; some of them are without clothing and fuel, and this winter there will be a terrible condition. I think our schedules of pay should be brought up-to-date before we close. A committee should revise them, or I believe it can be done by the cabinet under the War Measures Act.

Then I suggest that the National Resources Mobilization Act should be enforced in regard to all classes of the community. I know of three young men in the city of Toronto, engaged in sports, who were given notice of their call last April. But they went away to a prairie town; then, against all regulations, they were allowed to join the air force, and now they are not to report to it until the end of August. In all other cases there is a thirty-day limit. How much longer are we to continue a policy of this kind, while other young soldiers who are not earning extra money in sports, but for $1.30 a day are being killed every day over Germany? If that is the policy with regard to recruiting, there is no use in having an army week. The government's stand on sports in relation to the war should be made known. When we come to this building we find armed guards outside during this army week. But one-half of this building has been vacant since last June. If the government has no real war work to give the other branch of the legislature where there are so many able men of great experience ready to help, why not rent out that part of the building for an hotel, or use it to house some of our soldiers, or let it be used by some of these bureaucratic boards. The senate has been sent home, and the "House of Gordon" is reigning in its stead. I believe the time has come when we should stop talking about soldiers and do something practical about soldiers, who are going to defend this country from our enemies and fight the axis powers wherever found.

In my opinion, the budget simply deals with spending all along the line; there is nothing in it about retrenchment or economy. It deals with the raising of $2,000,000,000 for the war. That matter has been debated here for months; but other than that there is very little new in the budget except provision for the cost of civil government, half a billion, and all that sort of thing, and marking up revenues from direct and indirect taxation. I believe the Minister of Finance should be compelled by statute law to bring down his budget on a fixed date each year. You, Mr. Deputy Speaker, have had a great deal of business experience through your legal connections in the city of Montreal, and you know that no large business concern of any kind could carry on as we carry on here. Six months of the year have passed and we have not yet had one dollar of our annual estimates passed in committee of supply. A haphazard budget is brought down, after several interim supply bills have been put through. From now on I am going to vote against every one of these interim supply bills as causing deficits and overdrafts. They are to blame for all the deficits we have in this country, war deficits, budget deficits and deficits on civilian estimates. The estimates do not contain the details. Any banking institution or insurance company which conducted its business as the Minister of Finance conducts his business on the present plan would close its doors in short order. I believe a date should be fixed by statute for the bringing down of the budget, and I also believe that we should establish a ways and means committee like the one at Washington. There are a great many inequalities in this new income tax schedule. These matters should come before a ways and means committee, as they do in the United States, because some of the professors and others advising the minister are not trained in business. On one occasion, referring to one of the unnamed government "spokesmen" talking over the radio, I described these people who are unnamed spokesmen, as the ghosts behind the scenes, because they tell us what we must do, but we do not know who they are. At Washington they have what they call a ways and means committee; they do not leave things to a bureaucratic board of officials. They take advantage, on such a committee, of the experience and knowledge of those who are in politics, who know something about questions of public policy and are trained in some form of competitive business. I do not believe any such income tax scheme would be imposed in that country. The minister has compared our income tax with the income tax in the United States, but he forgets that in the United States they have no sales tax, and in England this year the income tax has not been raised. Also he charges too much to income and not enough to capital.

In this budget we have the highest income tax in the history of this country. I believe it is going to disrupt business to a great extent. I do not know how anyone is going to be able to pay his fixed charges for insurance, mortgage and other taxes. If a young man wants to get married, I do not know how he is even going to pay for any insurance or mortgage or keep his home. No small business man can pay all these fixed charges and the rest of the taxes out of the pin-money he will have left over after we pass this budget which has been drawn up by these bureaucratic powers over our heads. I believe the minister is taking too much from the taxpayers. There is no such thing as retrenchment in this budget. Look over the estimates, as I have looked over them four or five times from beginning to end, and can find no attempt at economy whatever. Do you see anything there about economy? Is there one word in the budget about economy? The civilian estimates have been brought before the house, but not one dollar has been passed yet—and let me point out that we have now reached the ninety-seventh day of the session. Not one dollar of estimates has been passed yet by this house.

That is the system we have in the house. If municipalities ran their affairs in that way they could not get along, and municipal governments would be beaten in their annual elections on the first of January. I say the system is all wrong, and it should be changed. This year the British budget was brought down on April 14 by Sir Kingsley Wood, and in that budget there is no increase in the income tax. The small man has his exemptions for dependants and those he has to keep. In Canada the only thing to do is to turn your business over to the state. And the state—this federal state—is taking income and corporation taxes away from the municipalities and provinces and destroying the basis of confederation.

This all arises from that celebrated document known as the Sirois report. Ontario has become the goat of confederation, and under this particular budget she is most certainly the goat of confederation. When a comparison is made between this budget and the budget introduced in Washington, it will be found that the leading principles set out in the first part of our budget and review of the year are copied from Washington largely as to details and subject matter. That is all it is; it is a copy from Washington. I shall refer to it in more detail in a few moments.

No more interim supply should be passed until conditions are remedied. Hon. members are not doing their duty. Prior to the discussion on Bill No. 80, this House of Commons might as well have met in secret. When the public realizes that the important debates of their representatives in parliament are being held in secret they will have something to say about the whole matter.

The press have done well and at a great cost have given the people the facts. I am one who all along has advocated the removal of censorship barriers which have been placed in the way of the press. The present censorship should be abolished, because it is not a censorship at all. We would have no news only for the press, and not the radio. In England press censorship has been eliminated. They have eliminated so-called information bureaux. Before the censorship was removed in England the minister in charge of the information bureau there was in hot water almost every day, just like our own minister who heads our bureau of information. The fact that we call it an information bureau affords the only bit of humour in the whole session.

I say that press censorship as we have it at the present time should be abolished. The press should be free to publish the news. This information bureau with a pamphlet of its own, which hands out information, is only a farce because it gets its news from the newspapers. I sympathize with the newspapers when they do not publish proceedings of the house. One great newspaperman told me, before he died, that the proceedings are not worth publishing. Well, I am not prepared to go that far, because I believe this is the only place where the average man on the street or woman in a bus may have his or her grievances remedied. When we fail to function, parliamentary government is at an end. After all is said and done, the private member is the connecting link between the government of the day and the electors; and when he fails to function all parliamentary government is at an end. Are we going to wait until there is a rebellion of hon. members against this bureaucratic system of budgeting and surrender of our functions to all these czars and autocratic controls and boards costing the country millions?

I do not see any of the other Toronto members here to-night, and I do not care whether many members are here or not at present. But I want to say this, that the city of Toronto is the chief tax-paying city in the whole of the dominion. At one time they were paying between 25 per cent and 30 per cent of cash taxation of the dominion. This is the first time since confederation that that great city has been without a single representative in the cabinet of the country, since 1935. We have one or two cabinet members from Ontario, but it seems to me they are not active enough to stand up for their province and prevent us from being burdened in this way. The city of Toronto has sent more recruits than any other centre, notwithstanding comparisons by tables, indexes, pamphlets and that kind of thing, and we have no direct cabinet representation as a city proper.

I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) is in his seat, and I would suggest to him that he turn to the fifteenth chapter of St. John and refer to the thirteenth verse where it says:

> Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

As thousands did in this and in the last war for our empire. I have a very high regard for the minister; he is a great lawyer, and a fine gentleman; but in his references to the British empire I believe he made a grave mistake, and it was a most unfortunate speech at this time. I can tell him that if the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) loses his seat in the city of Quebec, I believe he could get one in Ontario, or in the Toronto district, because he commanded a Toronto unit in the great war, and his name is much respected by soldiers in Ontario. I am glad to say that about him in his absence; he is not in his seat to-night. I say to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada that his speech of the other evening when he referred to the mother country was a most unfortunate one. Let him remember, on this eve before Dominion day, that 4,275 boys from Toronto lie buried in France. They went over there without compulsion; they enlisted as volunteers, and they will lie in France, where they died fighting the battles of this country, until the resurrection morning. There is no bigotry in Toronto or ill-feeling toward others in this confederation.

I believe the Minister of Justice was not in his seat when I referred earlier to Sir John A. Macdonald. Let him remember that I am a great admirer of what the French people did, along with Britain, for civilization. I respect what was done by the glorious land of France in the last war; I respect what they then did for the world and for civilization. They took part in the great war for their state, their religion, freedom and civilization generally, and Britain and France deserved a better fate than this war. I should hope that before another Dominion day comes along, that fine land of France may be rid forever of those savage barbarians who have invaded the country, and it can be done only by Canada taking part in another peninsular war, by a total war effort.

I suggest that the Minister of Justice might go to the city of Quebec and read the inscription on the monument to the memory of Wolfe and Montcalm, an inscription which will last for all time, and which was there in the days of Sir John A. Macdonald. I have always believed in a policy for all the provinces of a confederation, and in the old Cornish battle cry: "Each for all and all for each."

This is what I said in the house on March 19 of last year:

> We in Canada should be a united country from coast to coast. Wolfe and Montcalm lie buried together at Quebec, and the inscription on their monument attests the unity of the races in this country, as described in the motto on their memorials on the Plains of Abraham. Britain and France in the last war fought for a better world and for a better fate than has befallen them. I have always believed in the principles of confederation since I have been in this house—of the old Cornish battle cry of "Each for all and all for each". There is no use in our thinking that this is going to be an easy victory. We have no divine right to victory. This is going to be a most difficult, hard and heavy task and we should face that fact before it is too late. Facts are facts, and we should take our lessons from the past. So far we have lost the war and almost every battle; we have had no successes—

And we have lost the war so far right down to our Dominion day to-morrow. I say the same to-day.

A few days ago my good friend the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) referred "to my absentee leader". Let me say to him that our party polled nearly half the votes in the last election. The Right Hon. Arthur Meighen is a private citizen now. About him I would say that he is a great Canadian and Britisher, and I think he got a very dirty deal in the campaign which was conducted against him in a riding, near one which I used to represent a few years ago. In addition to that, as head of a city which had joint relations with the Township of York, it was under my regime that the municipal services were installed—roads, sewers, water, street cars and all that kind of thing there. Some of the people of Toronto and of York South did not approve the most unfair treatment given my former right hon. leader by certain people inside and outside the house. He has two sons now in England and ready to go to the continent. I regret that I do not see as much of him as I should like, and I do not believe I have had twenty words with him since he was defeated in February. But I was one of his followers here for many years, and I want to say that he is a man who speaks his mind and says what he believes to be true. He represents, I believe, a large body of public opinion in this country, even though he did not win that election. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was beaten; Sir John Macdonald was beaten, and so were many others.

Many of those who are now talking here and elsewhere about reconstruction are the very people who were responsible for our being unprepared to fight this war. They said that we could depend upon the Monroe doctrine, the League of Nations, the Kellogg note, Locarno, pacifism, Geneva, the status quo, isolation and collective security. There is collective security only when there is an armed Britain. We were told that we could depend upon notes and pacifism and Geneva. The Minister of Finance is presenting his budget, but let me tell him that last week I received a return which shows that, all told, $6,000,000 of the taxpayers money was spent, without any protest from the minister, on this sham folly of the League of Nations. He was one of those who went to Geneva a year or two before the war. He became imbued with all these kinds of pacifist ideas even after Hitler had taken the ascendency in Germany. The hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) also went to Geneva. I was glad to see them all go, because one of them told me after he came back that it was a wonderful trip, that it was a good cure for any ill health from which one might be suffering. Many of them made no report at all, but they said that the boats, hotels, meals, side-shows and cigars were good; that the banquets were wonderful and the wine perfect; that it was a delightful pastime attending the league and imbibing the doctrines that got us into this war.

This is the agency that caused the war, the league, Locarno, the Kellogg pact, pacifism, the Monroe doctrine, the status quo and pan-Americanism. Is it any wonder the taxpayer is groaning when he sits down and sees $6,000,000 spent on the league folly, $186,000 more this year, and that a million and a half of his money has been spent on the plebiscite mistake? If Hitler or Japan invade Canada, I said in my constituency, they would take the plebiscite and all connected with it and hang them on the sour apple tree alongside John Brown's body. The people of Canada, I find, are beginning to get quite bellicose against the present government and the House of Commons because of the plebiscite and because of the way they were led to believe that a vote for the plebiscite would be a vote for conscription and for a total war effort.

I can tell the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), that if it were not for the mother country, after Dunkirk we would have had the enemy in the St. Lawrence, and they would have blown down the citadel and this building long before he was sworn in. Then Quebec would have had the police gestapo, the concentration camp, the whip, the loud speaker, the tramping of feet, the taking over to Germany of thousands to work there, the burying of men, women and children alive as has happened in Russia and Czechoslovakia. They would have had the slavery which is worse than death. It behooves the people, not only of Quebec but of all Canada to pay tribute to the mother country for protecting our shores ever since we have been a nation. If it were not for the work of the British fleet and the air force after Dunkirk, long ago Washington and Ottawa would have had to sue for peace with the axis powers, and we would have had slavery worse than death.

I believe the League of Nations was largely responsible for the fact that we were unprepared when this war came. Munich was necessary because it gave us a year's respite, and a respite was necessary because Britain and France, either singly or collectively, were no match for Hitler. They purchased a truce; they had to buy a truce for one year, which later became an ultimatum. But what did we do? We did nothing all that year but spend money in the old way to send deputations to the league and all that kind of thing, and refused to see the handwriting on the wall. The Prime Minister was in Berlin in 1937, and if he had kept his eyes open he would have seen those huge tanks on the streets of Munich, Berlin and other places. He should have come back and told the people what Germany was doing. The taxpayer will not forget all these things when he pays his tax bill to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) and the Minister of Finance under the present budget. This confiscatory budget is going to destroy all competitive business, large and small, in this country. In England they have passed a law known as the pre-war trade practices act which will restore the wholesaler and the retailer his pre-war trade practices. We are relying on different agencies here, and the bureaucrats will, in the end, drive this country into bankruptcy. If I had time I would read the remarks of the chairman of the wartime prices and merry-go-round board in Montreal that all competitive business was at an end.

There has been a great hip-hurrah over this budget from the press of this country, also from the paid officers and press agents that the government have hired and from other loud-speakers of civil servants and of their control boards all over the country. You cannot pick up a newspaper without reading of these new controls ordered over our heads. The minister of the crown responsible for them all is the present Minister of Finance. The minister told me that he could not give me the cost of the ceilings. That was before Easter, but during the Easter recess the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board said in Winnipeg that it would be $2,000,000. Inside of two weeks the same civil servant, Donald Gordon, was announcing the information, over the heads of this parliament while it was in session, that the cost of the ceilings would be $2,000,000. What kind of recognition will we get from the electors? The minister has brought down an item of $50,000,000 for ceilings for these bureaucrats over our heads, but by next year it will be a quarter of a billion without any control by parliament.

There are a lot of utopians in and out of this house who advocate various policies. As I see it, they have one thing in common. They have always in the past been mistaken; before the war they were mistaken about notes and collective security, about the Monroe doctrine, the status quo and pan-Americanism. If I had taken a stand like that, when I came to the House of Commons I would have taken the penitent's bench, because I would have felt that I was guilty and had been responsible for a budget like this, and for this war which may engulf civilization. But no, they go round the country now posing as super-patriots, and they tell us about the new utopia that there is going to be after the war. Remember the utopia we were promised after the last war—a land fit for heroes to live in—a war to end war? We all know what happened. Our heroes were forgotten. They said it was a war to end all wars, and they advocated then, as they are doing now, all kinds of nostrums and cures. They should wait to see whether we are going to win the war, because that must be done first. Nothing else matters. Although we have many domestic problems, we do not yet know to whom Canada will belong.

I wish to protest about the way the income tax is being carried out. It is going to abolish all competitive business, large and small. The small man is not treated fairly, and in other ways the budget is full of inequalities, injustices, hardships and pitfalls.

The government has appointed a horde of officials in connection with the wartime prices and trade board. I have a clipping here which says:

Ottawa, May 13.—Fred W. Jones, of London, Ontario, has been appointed director of the management service section of the wartime prices and trade board's division of simplified practice.

The management service section plans to propose programmes that will aid the small business man to bring about economies in his operations, and re-model his methods to meet present-day problems caused by the price ceiling and merchandise shortages. Operations will be carried out by field consultants in various trade categories. Offices are located in Toronto and Montreal, advising the small man how to run his business.

We have a whole regiment of officials appointed, not many of whom ever had any connection with any retail or wholesale competitive business, or any business. I have a list of some of them here, with their names and former occupations. If the war policy of the government, as I said last year, is to control and administer every walk of life and almost every article or commodity of trade and commerce, it is going to bring this country to disaster and national bankruptcy and will not help win the war. These bureaucrats and boards have certainly got business into a huge mess in this country. The ceilings are bound to collapse, because many of them are founded only on sand. Some of the ceilings on the necessaries of life were no doubt absolutely necessary perhaps last season, if they had been properly administered. If all these bureaucrats were necessary for the winning of the war, no one would object, but we should beware of this hidden evil, the bureaucracy within our gates, with headquarters at Ottawa. From birth to death we are registered and controlled, supervised, directed and even dragooned. You can be arrested and kept in gaol without trial, on the word of a minister advised by his civil servants. We can be taken from home and our work, and sent hither and thither up and down the country, without any appeal.

The Minister of Finance has put himself in control of these men behind the scenes—professors, economists and all that kind of thing. They tried to do that in England, but there was such a rebellion in the House of Commons there that they stopped it and corrected the errors and got some parliamentary control. The idea seems to be, "a board a day will keep Hitler away". A newfangled controller a day is transforming all Canada into a serfdom and destroying all chance of the small, independent business man to exist. We have overnight become a nation run by bureaucrats, many of whom have never had any practical business experience with competitive business, and under the pretext of war they coin out their utopian economic new-deal methods and patent medicines and quack remedies for the poor, dear, suffering public and give him a knockout blow.

The budget has not one word to say about the housing situation. The housing conditions in the industrial city from which I come are simply disgraceful, and housing conditions in this city of Ottawa are also very bad. But nothing has been done about that. No doubt this question of housing and the beef control farce will be pulled out of the refrigerator by Christmas and be administered when one of the large number of bureaucratic boards we have in this country allow it. There are few walks of life which are not now supervised or directed by some department of state at Ottawa.

People want the money that is to be raised for war purposes to go for war purposes, but half of this budget is not for war purposes at all. They want the war vigorously carried out, its costs distributed as fairly as possible and the general welfare put ahead of special interests. They want a suspension of disputes and no special favours toward anyone—farmers, capital, labour, social workers or anyone else. Let me quote what Mr. Winston Churchill said in the House of Commons on April 13, 1939, with respect to bureaucracy:

> I know very well the patriotism and sincere desire to act in a manner of perfect rectitude which animates ministers of the crown, but I wonder whether there is not some hand which intervenes and filters down or withholds intelligence from ministers.

This budget is largely copied from the United States. The Minister of Finance, addressing the House of Commons a month ago, said:

> In my judgment parliament is more and more on trial at the bar of public opinion. There is something wrong with the House of Commons. I am not reflecting on the house, and I do not know what is the cause, but there is something wrong with it. I have asked myself is this the fault of the government in any way?

Following that the Financial Post sent me a wire for an opinion and I replied:

> What is wrong with Mr. Ilsley? Why does he not veto and apply the brakes to the orgy and wasteful expenditures and to the way a mint of money is being spent like water over parliament's head.
> A civil war was fought in England for nearly one hundred years to gain control over expenditures and of the executive now surrendered to irresponsible boards and bureaucrats who mostly never had any training in any competitive business. The press will not report the proceedings of parliament, who might just as well meet secretly, yet pages of paper glorify sports. I propose that the annual budget be brought down on a fixed statutory day.

Over our heads, while parliament was sitting, a subsidy was announced by Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, for fruit and vegetables. He announced to a delegation representing 25,000 Ontario fruit and vegetable growers that the price ceiling would not be punctured to allow increased prices on produce grown for canning and jam processing industries. But he promised that the board would consider paying a subsidy on such products if processors and growers could prove to the board that the price of any one product should be increased. All that was done while parliament was in session! A huge amount has already been spent by the board in subsidies, and Mr. Gordon has surrounded himself with a lot of people who never were in business.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I am sorry, but the hon. gentleman's time is up.

Mr. CHURCH: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I had to speak without any preparation, on such short notice.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, in asking you for the privilege of the floor, may I say that I would not inflict myself upon this august assembly were it not that I am convinced that the matter I wish to discuss should be discussed in this budget debate because it relates to a part of our activities that is very much in the limelight at the moment.

First, however, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the presentation of his budget some days ago. It strikes me that it was the most courageous budget ever presented, and the presentation itself was an outstanding performance because, while it presented requirements in such staggering amounts the minister made everybody like it. But as usual in all democracies those who have been yelling the loudest for total war are reluctant to congratulate the minister upon presenting a budget which undoubtedly means total war for all the people of Canada. At the other end of the line, strange as it may appear, those who have been agitating for the conscription of wealth, whatever that may mean in the present circumstances, those who have been asking that the rich be taxed, now appear to be dissatisfied because the rich are being taxed out of practically everything they make.

I believe, however, that the Canadian people as a whole, of all classes, will agree with the tribute I have feebly tried to express to the Minister of Finance for his masterly budget in these critical times.

I notice by the tariff schedules in the Votes and Proceedings of June 23 that the government proposes to remove entirely the duty on machinery used to separate oil from bituminous tar sands. I am speaking from memory, but I believe the old tariff was 27½ per cent. This is being taken off entirely, showing the government's intention to help in the development of these great resources of our north country.

I have a piece of information which I should like to give to this assembly. It came to me from the far north, a part of the country which liars have not reached yet; one generally gets the truth from the people there. A large amount of material is being moved by some important company to Fort Norman, some 900 miles north of Fort McMurray, with the purpose of constructing a pipeline from Fort Norman to White Horse to supply gasoline, oil and other petroleum products for use on the new highway being constructed by the United States government through the Yukon to Alaska. But on behalf of the people of Fort McMurray, which is right in the centre of the greatest field of bituminous tar sands in the world, bar none, as has been proved by outstanding engineers of this government, and others, I wish to protest to this house against the apparent neglect of these great resources which, after all, are so much closer to the transportation system of Alberta and of Canada generally. An engineer of the Department of Munitions and Supply, in making a report to that department some weeks ago, stated it was not advisable to expend any money in developing the tar sands of the Fort McMurray and Fort McKay areas because of their inaccessibility. He expressed that opinion in spite of the fact that the railway runs through fifty miles of these sands, right to the town of Waterways, and within a few miles of Fort McMurray, and in view of the further fact that the greatest armies of the world to-day are engaged in a most murderous and costly struggle for the control of certain oil resources. Hitler is willing to go a thousand miles and wade through an ocean of blood, leaving thousands of corpses on his way, in order to reach either the Caucasus or the Iran fields, while we in Canada declare that a field like the Fort McMurray area, only 350 miles from Edmonton, is too far away for us to consider.

Through the courtesy of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons) who is always awake to anything in the interests of the far north, my attention has been drawn to the issue of the Canadian Geographical Journal of June, 1942. In that magazine I find an extremely well-written article, containing information in the possession of the Department of Mines and Resources, written by S. C. Ells, an engineer of such repute that his fame has gone far beyond the confines of the Dominion of Canada. Mr. Ells was one of the first, away back in 1913, to go down the Athabaska river from Athabaska Landing, at what is now the town of Athabaska in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, to investigate these tar sands. He went down in a scow to investigate what he had heard from the voyageurs of the Hudson's Bay company and the missionaries about these great tar sand deposits along the Athabaska and Clearwater rivers. It may not be of any great interest to the house, but some hon. members have given a certain amount of attention to this subject, and I was surprised that so little is known about it. In 1904, nearly forty years ago, I myself went down the Athabaska river in a scow as far as Fort McMurray. Even in those days, at Pelican portage, near the House river, the Department of the Interior of those days had sent some engineers to investigate the possibilities of gas and oil in that part of the country. They dug a well at House river near Pelican rapids which struck such a tremendous flow of natural gas that for a great many years it could not be capped. In those days the machinery which can now be used to stop flows of that kind had not been invented. Fire was set to that flow of gas, and one could hear the noise of it about eight or ten miles away, while at night one could see the flames burning 150 feet in the air. It continued to burn for some years, until the force was spent, allowing the engineers to cap the well.

In those days I went to Fort McMurray and saw these tar sands. In some places they were over two hundred feet high; it was an impressive thing to see them shining in the sun. Since that time Mr. Max W. Ball and his associates at For McMurray spent over half a million dollars in the construction of a plant to mine and refine these sands successfully. It was not a share-selling proposition; they put up their own money.

The reason why I present these facts to the house to-night is to try to interest the government and the people of this country in order to see whether something cannot be done, at a time when we cannot get gas elsewhere, and in view of the fact that eminent engineers have expressed themselves as so favourable to development work. Mr. C. S. Bowey, of the United States bureau of mines, a man of outstanding repute, after investigating that field declares that it is the largest field of bituminous sands in the world and contains the largest oil reserves in the world. I am not speaking merely of America. In 1937 he estimated that the known field, which extends two hundred miles along the Athabaska and fifty miles along the Clearwater river, contains deposits, which he himself saw, from which could be extracted with the machinery available in those days—and which has been improved since—two hundred and fifty billion barrels of oil, while the known resources of the rest of the world, barring what may have been discovered elsewhere since that time, are only some thirty-nine billion barrels. Yet everywhere in Canada we are cutting down the consumption of gas in order to carry on our war effort, while 350 miles by railroad and 245 miles by air from the city of Edmonton, there is an unlimited amount of gas and oil for the Canadian people to develop.

There is another aspect of this subject which I wish to mention to the Minister of Finance. I have not had time to reckon the amount; but I venture to say that during the last few years, until we recently cut down consumption, the large amount of gasoline, crude oil, and oils of all sorts imported from the United States has had a great deal to do with the adverse balance of trade which affects our exchange with that country. Besides that, we are importing millions of barrels of crude oil from south America, or at least we were doing so until the Germans stopped us. We were importing that crude oil to be refined on the east and west coasts and in Montreal. Millions of dollars were involved, while our own resources in our own country, sufficient to supply the needs not only of Canada but of America, are lying practically idle.

To-night the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) referred to the treatment of mineral companies. I do not agree with the ideas he expressed in that regard. I say that when this war is over, contrary to what he seems to have in mind, whether it be a year or two or three years from now, we shall be facing a world which has wasted billions of tons of minerals of all kinds, blown up into the air, or sunk into the depths of the sea all over the world, to such a staggering extent that no man would dare to estimate the value of it. Besides the world scarcity of agricultural products, to be supplied by the great Canadian wheat lands, there will be a world scarcity of cattle and hogs, also to be supplied by the great western provinces and by the eastern provinces as well; and the demand for those products of this dominion, to replace the stocks of starving Europe and other parts of the world, will be tremendous, because there will be nothing left in the most populated parts of the globe. The war monster of Hitler will have eaten it all up. But just consider the wastage that is taking place in steel, iron, copper, aluminum, oil and everything else. All these commodities are being wasted, billions of tons and billions of dollars' worth of them. Canada with its vast resources, in practically all these mineral fields, and with great coal resources, some of them untouched so far, will be able to supply the needs of the world. Take the coal resources in the Peace River country and the Rocky mountains, estimated at billions of tons—the best steam coal, available in Canada, but so far from communication that they are not being developed at present. This is in addition to the fields already in operation. Take the resources of Alberta alone. The coal resources of that province are estimated to be 15 per cent of all the coal of the British empire.

Mr. DECHENE: Yes, of the world. Then take our oil and other minerals. I suggest that if we begin now to consider the tremendous expenditures we have to make, and which I approve, in order to win the war; if we start now to organize for post-war production to replace the wastage that is at present taking place; if we develop these resources at Fort McMurray alone, for example, we shall be taking a step in the right direction. At Fort McMurray the possibilities are simply immense. According to the figures of the engineer of the Department of Mines and Resources—and he puts it lower than does the bureau of mines of the United States—the estimate is a hundred and fifty billion barrels. If we proceed to develop these vast resources, then within a few years after the close of the war the worries of the Minister of Finance will have ended. Just consider the tremendous wealth that will be produced. That is why I dare to rise in my place to-night and speak as I am doing.

Aristide Briand, the great foreign minister of the French republic after the last war, and one of the greatest men produced in that period—as hon. members will remember, he had dreams of the United States of Europe—made a remarkable statement with regard to the strategic advantage to the nation possessing the oil fields and oil resources of the world. He said that possession of these oil resources was the reason for the breaking up of peace conference after peace conference, economic conference after economic conference. He said that without these resources no nation could be great in times of peace. How much truer his words are to-day. No nation can become great, he said; no nation can go ahead and be powerful unless it possesses these vital resources so necessary to the machinery of transportation and to all the other operations of our modern age. This was one of the reasons for some serious misunderstanding between the British and French governments.

Though the French government obtained a mandate in Syria, all they saw of the oil resources was a pipeline going through the country. But do we need to have impressed upon us the fact that the possession of these oil resources is as important as Briand stated? Surely it is palpable, it is a truism, that no nation can go ahead without this possession. As he said, it has caused the breakdown of many peace conferences.

I say therefore that, no matter what other burdens we may have to carry, we should proceed with the development of these vast resources. There is no wild-catting about it. This year in the dominion, I venture to say, $1,000,000 or more will be spent in attempting to prove oil fields. Sometimes six thousand or seven thousand feet will be drilled at tremendous cost, and many times there will be a dry hole. That may be true of the Turner valley or other places, but at Fort McMurray there is no dry hole. There is the sand staring you in the face, and the statement has been made by Mr. Max W. Ball, who is operating in the field and has spent his own money, that in cutting walls through the sand, with a steam shovel, or with whatever tools they use, they strike ponds of clear bitumen. Everything that we have been importing from Trinidad and far-off places in the world we have in the far north. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it is no longer the far north, because there is a railway right through the property.

On motion of Mr. Dechene the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, July 1, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING ORDERS

Third report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Golding.

THE CANADIAN CONFEDERATION

SEVENTY-FIFTH NATIONAL ANNIVERSARY—CANADA AND THE WAR—ARMY WEEK

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this being the 1st of July, and the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation, I should like to give expression to some of the thoughts I believe will be in the minds of hon. members of this house. With the permission of the house I should like to make a brief statement.

This day, the seventy-fifth anniversary of Canadian confederation, falls at a time when Canada is employing the nation's energy and resources against an enemy who would destroy our very existence as a free people. At such a time, when the citizens of Canada are engaged upon one all-absorbing task, elaborate ceremonies would be out of place even in celebrating so splendid an achievement as confederation represents. We may, however, rightly pause on this anniversary, gratefully to reflect on the vision and the wisdom which enabled the fathers of confederation to bring our nation into being.

We are freely and fully associated with the other free peoples of the world in a death struggle, with an enemy seeking to remove from the earth the heritage of freedom on which our institutions are founded. A few days ago, for the first time since confederation, Canadian soil was attacked.

The fathers of confederation built this nation on a foundation of human freedom, of self-government, of religious liberty, of racial equality, and of deep and abiding attachment to a common homeland. These are the sources of the harmony and mutual understanding among our people which, in turn, is the essence of our national strength, alike in war and peace.

Our enemies seek, everywhere, to replace freedom by slavery, self-government by tyranny, religious liberty and racial equality by the pagan conception of the master race; they seek to make of the homelands of all free peoples, colonies of slaves in which the sanctity of home and family will be sacrificed to the lust and greed of the conqueror.

To meet this threat to Christian civilization, to national existence, to homes and families, Canada is mobilizing all her resources of skill and strength, of brains and energy, of farm and forest, of mine and factory, of wealth and manpower. Our fighting forces, with those of our allies, are on many shores and many seas, and in the skies over many countries, battling to make sure that victory is won before war comes to Canadian soil. Along the coasts of Canada, our soldiers stand on watchful guard. Our coastal waters are ceaselessly patrolled by vessels of the Canadian navy and planes of the Canadian air force. In all the centres of industry, men and women are labouring to make huge stores of weapons and munitions. From fields and mines and forests workers are extracting the essential supplies of war.

It is particularly fitting that the celebration of our seventy-fifth national anniversary should coincide with army week in Canada. Our national pride has deepened with the knowledge of Canada's army guarding the heart of the empire, protecting the world's greatest citadel of freedom, and prepared for action in any place, at any time. We have all been profoundly stirred by the exploits of Canadian airmen in every theatre of war; Ceylon, Cologne, Essen, Emden, now Bremen, are a witness to their magnificent daring, and to their important role. We know how great and how vital has been the work of our navy. We have been told that Canadian machines and munitions, Canadian food and Canadian money were essential to keep Britain fighting in the dark days of 1940 and 1941. But our Canadian army, because it has seen little fighting, has not thus far received its fair share of credit. This week, throughout all Canada, the Canadian people are being given a special opportunity to restore the balance by showing their appreciation of the Canadians in battle dress.

May I pause to recall the record. The first contingent of the Canadian army landed in Britain on December 17, 1939. But for the collapse of France, the first division would have come to grips with the enemy in the summer of 1940. All through that dark summer they stood waiting for the expected invasion. They were joined during that time by the second division, and at Christmas of 1940 the Canadian corps was formed. In 1941, a third infantry division, an armoured division, an army tank brigade, and thousands upon thousands of specialized troops and reinforcements were added to their numbers.

This year more units and reinforcements have crossed the sea, and others will follow. The Canadian corps in Britain has become a highly trained, hard-hitting, mobile Canadian army. Mr. Churchill has told us what the Canadian army has meant to him and to the people of Britain. Let me repeat what he said last September:

> There they stand, and there they have stood through the whole of the critical period of the last fifteen months at the very point where they would be the first to be hurled into a counter-stroke against an invader. No greater service can be rendered to this country, no more important military duty can be performed by any troops in all the allies.

There has been no glamour; there have been no great headlines. We in Canada, have not realized, as fully as the people of Britain, how greatly our army has contributed and continues to contribute to the security of the bridge-head which separates the tyrant of Europe from the western hemisphere, and which bridge-head is also our own surest defence.

I doubt, too, if we have given the credit which is their due to the men in battle dress who have stood in ceaseless vigil at the lonely outposts of our own country. When the balance sheet of war is struck, we shall do well never to forget the long dreary months of dull, but vital routine which the army has performed with little notice, and no complaint, on our coasts, and in vulnerable areas in Canada, in Newfoundland and Labrador, and on the islands of the Atlantic.

The Canadian army is not an instrument built only to resist attack. It was planned, it has been organized, and is trained as a highly mechanized and armoured striking force. The day is coming—it may be close at hand—when it will have an honoured place in the van of attack. No Canadian doubts that when that day comes, our army will do its full part—and a glorious part—in helping to defeat and to destroy the military might of an enemy whose design and ambition is to conquer the whole free world. Canada's army is strong; it is united by a common purpose. It is the duty of all Canadian citizens to be no less strong, no less united by a common purpose. On this seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation the need is greater than ever before in our history, to let nothing divide us as a people, to compose our differences, and to throw all our energies into the task of saving our country, and helping to save the freedom of the world. If we would be worthy of our past, and the sacrifices of the past; if we would be worthy of the many brave sons of Canada who, in the present war, have given their all, and of the half million young Canadians who have offered, if need be, to die for their country, it is our supreme duty, while striving for victory, to preserve for those who may survive the frightful vicissitudes of war, and for future generations, a free and a united Canada.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we all join in the expressions of noble sentiments which have just fallen from the lips of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I desire to associate myself and the party I represent in this house, with what he has said. In less critical times, the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of this dominion would probably be celebrated with a fitting degree of pomp and ceremony; but in the midst of the gigantic struggle in which we are engaged, we do the greatest honour to our nation if we pause from our labours long enough only to rededicate ourselves to the herculean task of preserving those ideals and principles which the fathers of our nation sought to establish upon enduring foundations on the northern half of this continent.

We do well to pause, on the occasion of the commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation, and recall with pride and gratitude the example and accomplishment of those great men who founded the Canadian nation. The genius and vision of Sir John A. Macdonald, the patience and tolerance of Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, and the helpful cooperation of Brown, Tupper, Tilley, and the other fathers, resulted, as Sir John forecast it would, in the development of "a friendly nation, a powerful people to stand by Britain in north America in peace or in war." At this juncture of our history, the inspiring words spoken by Sir John in 1861 are as pertinent and important as when he uttered them more than eighty years ago. His message, like all eternal truth, retains its significance for each succeeding generation. In stressing the importance of the preservation of union between Upper and Lower Canada, Sir John used these words:

> If I had any influence over the minds of the people of Canada, any power over their intellect, I would leave them this legacy: "Whatever you do, adhere to the union—we are a great country, and shall become one of the greatest in the universe if we preserve it; we shall sink into insignificance and adversity if we suffer it to be broken." God and nature have made the two Canadas one—let no factious men be allowed to put them asunder.

In this, democracy's hour of trial, it is, as I see it, the duty of each and every Canadian to keep before him those inspiring words. If democracy is to survive, the freedom and liberties for which the fathers of confederation laboured long and well must be preserved. The preservation of those liberties depends and will be determined by the vigour and the strength of the united effort of each of the allied nations.

It is fitting that when we are celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation we should also have the opportunity, through army week, of paying tribute to those upon whom rests, with the navy and the air force, the responsibility for the preservation of our nation. On this hill, this afternoon, in front of these buildings, is being demonstrated the gallantry, the determination, the enthusiasm, the will to victory, of Canada's youth. The hearts of those of us who must serve in more mundane fashion go out to these men. So far, the task of the Canadian army has been one rather of preparation and training than of action, but there is no doubt when the great offensive comes, without which victory cannot be achieved, the Canadian army will not only live up to the high traditions of the past but create a new and glorious record for our future history. The Canadian army will prove, as General McNaughton has said: "A dagger pointed at the heart of Berlin." We all hope that the time is not far distant when that dagger may be plunged at its objective.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I was unaware of the fact that any recognition was to be given in the house this afternoon to the seventy-fifth anniversary of the Canadian Confederation, but I think it is quite proper that it should be done. A little less than one hour ago I was joining, through the magic of radio, in a service being held in Westminster Abbey. The Archbishop of Canterbury preached the sermon; the High Commissioner for Canada read a brief scriptural lesson, and representatives of many nations took part in the service. I listened to the tribute paid to this country by the archbishop, and to his expression of deep conviction that the British commonwealth of nations as it is to-day may be the forerunner of a development in the future of a free association of all nations all equal; none subservient to the other. As he said this afternoon, the British empire is no longer an empire in the old sense, but a new form of association, typifying something far greater and far better than any ancient empire ever was.

This afternoon we are paying a tribute not only to those who founded this dominion but also to the young men who are standing guard along our coasts and across the seas. In my opinion the greatest tribute we can pay, both to our forefathers and to those who to-day are bearing the brunt of battle, is to determine in this chamber, first, what shall be done now to make our contribution to a great cause the most effective that we can make, and, second, how best we may lay now the foundations in this country to the end that the men who are serving across the seas may return to a land in which they may live in security and in peace; in which they may build for themselves and for coming generations something better than we or they have ever known. If on this occasion I might leave one thought with the house, and particularly with the government, it would be this: Let the government come before this house without any further delay and tell us exactly what the situation is, and thus share with the members of the House of Commons, representing the people of Canada, the entire responsibility for all that we may have to do to ensure our maximum contribution to the cause of world freedom and universal peace.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the members of the group that I have the honour of leading, and the great body of people whom we represent in this chamber, will be happy to join with those who have expressed the noble and lofty sentiments to which we have just listened. We love Canada, we love the British empire, the British commonwealth of nations, or association of nations, or whatever people choose to call it—that great body of British peoples and associated peoples who at this critical time are fighting for their existence as a unit and the right to continue to endeavour to lead the world.

I was thinking while the others were speaking how greatly disappointed the fathers of confederation must feel as they look down upon Canada from their high places and reflect upon how much unhappiness there is and has been in our country during the last twenty years. I was thinking that the finest resolution we could make here now, all of us together, would be that to the extent to which we are called upon so to do, we should consecrate our lives to the high task of making this nation what the fathers of confederation intended it should be—a great union of majestic states called provinces, each of which, while daughter in her mother's house, is mistress in her own; a union of states in which all enjoy equal opportunities. There is no reason why there should not be in Canada the greatest happiness. There is no reason why this nation should not in every sense become one of the greatest nations in the world. It is our task now to dedicate ourselves to the accomplishment of that worthy end, so that the people of all Canada shall have justice, prosperity, peace and joy, and shall be foremost in the making of that brighter and better world to the threshold of which the great Creator has manifestly led us. This, sir, would be my sentiment on this occasion.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Richelieu-Verchères): Mr. Speaker, as the rules of this house have already been broken on this seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation, I would ask your indulgence and that of hon. members while I express a few thoughts, in the French language.

(Translation) Mr. Speaker, as a representative from the province of Quebec, I think it only appropriate to add my humble tribute to those you have already heard celebrating the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of our Canadian confederation. I do so with all my strength of heart and mind because I am one of those who have believed in our Canadian confederation, in the opportuneness of its establishment and in the benefits to be derived therefrom by our citizens of all races and creeds. I rejoice with those who had the advantage of speaking earlier this afternoon in the remarkable success already achieved with regard to the development of our Canadian nation.

I am well content with the progress made and I sincerely hope that the results obtained to date will not be endangered by the differences of opinion and thought which are liable to divide public opinion.

Let no one forget, Mr. Speaker that the Canadian confederation does not represent the union of the majority with a minority, but rather the union on an equal footing of the two main racial groups in Canada. At the time of confederation, the main problem was that of ensuring equal rights to all citizens, whatever their mentality or language.

Let us never forget this great truth: There is no minority, there is no majority in this country. There are only brothers joined together by a common agreement for the good of the entire community; not for the advantage of a certain class or group but for the greater good of all Canadian citizens.

There have occurred in the past, Mr. Speaker, just as there occur to-day, differences of opinion and thought on certain matters which may stir up public opinion. Human institutions can never command complete unanimity of opinion in every field. There are always different views held on every question. Despite all the good faith in the world, humanity must remain divided. Such division dates from the very beginning of time and will endure till the end. The human mind is not one; it divides itself into various points of view and there are no questions on which we may really achieve complete unanimity of thought and feeling. Such an achievement would be contrary to human nature. It would be superhuman.

It even appears necessary that these differences of opinion, these conflicts of thought should exist if only as a source of that light by which nations as well as individuals are guided.

I repeat that I share the views already expressed and I hope that now as in the future peace and harmony will continue to distinguish our mutual relations on this Canadian soil. If our opinions should differ on certain points, if we should not agree on the manner and means of reaching a certain goal, this does not mean that we have opposite aims. It does not mean that we from the province of Quebec do not share the same feelings, the same aspirations, the same desires, the same love of Canada that inspires those who belong to the majority.

On this anniversary day, I pray that there may come about a better understanding between all Canadian citizens and that silence be imposed on those who, in this house and country appear inclined to sow disunity and misunderstanding which might destroy the master work of our Canadian confederation.

Let us try to understand each other, to get along better together. Granted this understanding, there is no doubt that Canada can become a great nation, without any of her different racial groups being forced to abandon their ties with the past, their traditions, in a word all that has made them great in the past and which they hold dear.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN NATIONAL HOTELS—WAGES OF TRADESMEN

Mr. ISNOR:

1. What were the rates of pay in effect as at May 1, 1942, at the Canadian National hotels at Ottawa, Halifax, Charlottetown, Port Arthur, Winnipeg, Brandon, Saskatoon, Edmonton and Vancouver, of the following trades, (a) carpenters, (b) plumbers, (c) pipefitters, (d) electricians, (e) painters, (f) engineers, (g) assistant engineers?

2. Have any rates been increased since the 1st May, 1942? If so, state which, and by what amounts?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. The management of Canadian National Railways state that it is not in the interest of the national lines to publicize the information called for, and suggest that the hon. member get in touch with Mr. R. Somerville, general manager of Canadian National chain of hotels, whose office is located in the Chateau Laurier at Ottawa, who will be very glad to confer with him and give him such information as may be possible, having regard to the interests of the railway and its hotel system.

2. No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the Dufferin shipyards rent two derricks from the Dufferin Construction Company?
2. If so, what is the rental charge?
3. Are these derricks in first class condition?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1 and 2. No. However, Toronto Shipbuilding Company Limited (formerly Dufferin Shipbuilding Company Limited) does rent from Dufferin Paving & Crushed Stone Limited (a subsidiary of Dufferin Construction Company Limited) the following crawler cranes at the following rentals:

No. of units	Crane No.	Rating	Make	Model	Type	Monthly rental First shift	Monthly rental Second shift

The full first shift rental is payable each month; the second shift rental is paid at one twenty-sixth of the rental shown for each day the crane is operated on the second shift.

It is the intention to retain the above equipment only pending delivery of new cranes now on order, and in fact on June 5, 1942, notice of intention to release the "Erie" crane, crane No. 14, was given and this crane will be returned to its owners on July 3, 1942.

3. All the above equipment is kept in good operating condition.

MILITARY SERVICE—MARRIED MEN SEPARATED FROM OR NOT SUPPORTING THEIR WIVES

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

Are married men of military age, separated or not supporting their wives, subject to call on the draft?

Mr. THORSON: Men married prior to July 15, 1940, are not subject to the proclamation now in force calling out men for military training under the national war services regulations.

*VICHY REPRESENTATION IN CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the statement, on June 9, by Pierre Laval, the head of the French government, that "he desires to see a German victory because of the red peril"?

2. Will the government give consideration to the immediate closing of the office, here, of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, of the French government of Vichy?

3. Will time be afforded for the house to discuss the matter?

4. What action, if any, will be taken, in view of these new developments?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer this question orally.

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the statement, on June 9, by Pierre Laval, the head of the French government, that "he desires to see a German victory because of the red peril"?

The statement to which my hon. friend has reference is, I think, one which was made on June 22, not on June 9 as he mentions in this question. The attention of the government has not been drawn to the statement, but I, of course, have seen the statement to which my hon. friend has referred. I might mention what I said a few days ago in this house, that the representation of Canada at Vichy is a representation to the people and country of France, not a representation to any particular government, and there is no evidence whatever that the statement which was made by Laval represents at all the sentiment of the French people. Unquestionably Laval, in speaking, has had in mind much more the effect of his utterances upon Germany than their effect upon his own country. However, apart from that, I gave reasons of a practical nature, when speaking in the house some days ago, why it was thought inadvisable to sever diplomatic relations between Canada and France, and I have nothing to add to that statement.

2. Will the government give consideration to the immediate closing of the office, here, of the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, of the French government of Vichy?

I have just answered that question.

3. Will time be afforded for the house to discuss the matter?

When the estimates of the Department of External Affairs are before the house there will, I think, be ample time to discuss this and any other matter with regard to external relations.

4. What action, if any, will be taken, in view of these new developments?

At the present time I am unable to say what action the government may take in the future or to give any statement of policy with respect to our relations with France, but I assure the hon. member that the matter is one which is always receiving consideration.

Mr. CHURCH: It is a fine appeasement policy—while refusing to give encouragement to General de Gaulle.

INCOME TAX IN CERTAIN BRACKETS, 1938-1942

What was the combined amount of income tax, including Ontario provincial, and national defence taxation, in tabular form, to which incomes of $1,500, $2,000, $3,000, $5,000, $10,000, $15,000, $20,000, $30,000, $50,000 and $100,000, were subject in the following years, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, and 1942, assuming that the taxpayer was married with two dependents and that all incomes up to $30,000 are earned incomes, and that incomes of more than $30,000 include earned income of that amount and additional investment income to make up the total?

Mr. ILSLEY: The information requested is contained in schedule below:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

QUOTA ON CHEESE EXPORTED TO BRITAIN

Mr. LECLERC:

1. Has the government adopted a cheese quota for England in 1942?
2. What is the proportion of this quota supplied to date?
3. When the full quota of cheese has been reached, does the government intend to encourage the production of butter by raising the ceiling price or by paying a bonus on butter fat?

MILITARY SERVICE—FARM LEAVE OR POSTPONEMENT

Mr. LACOMBE:

1. At the present time when farm work requires all available labour, will leave be granted from military training to all those who are actually engaged in agriculture?
2. Will postponements of military training be accorded to farmers, sons of farmers and farm labourers who have actually been called up?
3. Have instructions of this nature already been given to those entitled to them?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

R.C.A.F.—CASUALTIES IN CANADA

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. How many airmen have been killed in Canada since the present war began.

2. Whether an inquest was held in each case by, (a) a military court, (b) by provincial coroners.

3. A copy of the findings, showing the cause of the accident in each case.

4. Whether a copy of the evidence and court finding was sent to the next of kin of each deceased.

5. The pay and other allowances of these airmen paid to next of kin, pending receipt of a pension, and the practice herein.

Mr. POWER: I am prepared to agree to the passage of this order subject to certain restrictions.

With respect to question No. 1, the information will be supplied.

With respect to question No. 2, the publication of returns of inquests and courts of inquiry respecting flying accidents is not considered to be in the public interest, because this would tend to aggravate and cause unnecessary suffering to the relatives of victims of air accidents.

Question No. 3, therefore, cannot be complied with; nor can question No 4, which requests that a copy of the evidence and court finding be sent to the next of kin.

As to question No. 5, particulars will be given.

Mr. CHURCH: Civil inquests were held in similar cases in the last war.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is careful inquiry made into any death by misadventure, say in an accident or a brawl or something of that sort? I am asking the question because of word I have from Regina regarding a recent death there.

Mr. POWER: We have a special branch set up to go into all these questions of accidents. I submit to the house that it would not be in the public interest nor would it be in the best interests of the relatives of deceased airmen to publish the findings or give them to the next of kin.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are the families given some information, at least, even if of a confidential nature?

Mr. POWER: Whatever information we can.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the reservations indicated by the minister? Carried.

CANADIAN FORCES—MEN DISCHARGED OR STRUCK OFF STRENGTH

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

For a return showing the number of persons by military districts and/or provinces who have been discharged or struck off the strength of, (a) the navy, (b) the army, (c) the air force by reason of (1) medical unfitness, (2) desertion, (3) other causes, and, in the case of military districts Nos. 4 and 5, and/or the province of Quebec, showing the number in each category (i) of French-Canadian origin, (ii) of origin other than French Canadian.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the portion which asks for the number in each category of French-Canadian origin, and of origin other than French Canadian, as was indicated in the house before, so far as the army is concerned the attestation papers do not show racial origin. The only thing that can be done—and I must say it is a laborious process, but if the hon. member who is making this motion thinks it will serve any real public interest we will endeavour to have it done—is to go over every attestation paper and every card in order to examine the names of those who are there and ascertain as best we can from the name itself whether that person is likely to be of certain racial origin. It certainly is a very inaccurate method of doing it, but that is the only thing which can be done. Perhaps my hon. friend would let the motion stand for a day, so that he could consider that particular part of the question.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Will that be changed to "French-speaking" rather than "French-Canadian origin"?

Mr. RALSTON: "French-speaking" would not help us. There is nothing in the attestation papers, so far as I know, to indicate whether the soldier is English-speaking or French-speaking. I think I am correct when I say that the name is the only general method in which one can get an indication, and that has been used with regard to the return brought down last week. I am indicating to the house that it does not give the information asked for. Perhaps the hon. gentleman does not regard it as of such importance, in the public interest, as to preclude his allowing it to stand for a day.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): We will let it stand for a day.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

WHEAT

BRITISH PURCHASES IN CANADA—PRICES—FUTURE ANNOUNCEMENTS WITH RESPECT TO SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct two or three questions to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I informed him that I would ask these questions, and I think he is prepared to answer. On June 8 the minister read a cable he had sent through the high commissioner's office in London asking him to get permission from the British ministry of food to divulge the price of Canadian wheat. The public are anxious to get this information—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: —and there is no reason why it should not be given. My first question is this: Is the minister prepared to say whether he has received a reply to that cable?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister has been given notice of the question and is prepared to answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is in such form that in my opinion it should be placed on the order paper. The fact that a minister is prepared to reply to such questions on the orders of the day does not alter the fact that to put the question in this form and at this stage of the proceedings is against the rules of the house. The hon. gentleman should put it on the order paper.

Mr. PERLEY: I have another question to direct to the minister. It is pursuant to a question asked the other day. How many million bushels of Canadian wheat have already been paid for—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: —by Great Britain under the one billion dollar gift fund?

Mr. SPEAKER: The same ruling applies to that question. It should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. PERLEY: A third question is this: Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce give to the house a detailed and complete statement with respect to sales of wheat under the billion dollar agreement or under any other agreement that is pending and that has already been consummated?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister is prepared to answer the question.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the minister is prepared to answer the question, he has some privileges in the house and he may do so if the mattter is of such public urgency as to warrant its being answered at the moment. In my opinion, however, in the form in which it is put, the question is one that should be placed on the order paper, because I do not think there is that degree of urgency about it.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to direct another question to the minister, which I think he will be ready to answer. If there are any important announcements to be made in the near future with respect to sales of Canadian wheat, will he have these announcements made here in the house rather than in the Winnipeg grain exchange or some other place?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I shall overlook the last few words of the hon. member's question, and reply that just as soon as word comes from the British government that a decision has been arrived at with regard to the sale of wheat, a statement will be made in this house.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY AS TO AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY BILL NO. 67

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Will the Attorney General read Bill No. 67 and give a reply as to what the policy of the government is? It is a public bill of the utmost importance, and requires consideration before prorogation.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I understand that the hon. gentleman is referring to order No. 13 under public bills and orders. If that is so, the order should be reached in due course, I assume, under the rules of the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I hope the minister is right, but I am afraid he is wrong. He had better ask the boss. So far no disposition has been made of these bills under public bills and orders. I wish the minister would look into this matter. Perhaps he can use his undoubted influence to have this item reached before the end of the session.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The Attorney General has no control over the procedure of the House of Commons. When the item is reached it will be considered. In the meantime I do not think I can say more to the hon. member.

BEEF

REDUCTION OF PRICE PAID BY PACKERS TO FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. TUSTIN (Prince Edward-Lennox): Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance what authority the packers had to reduce the price of beef, and he said he would give the matter consideration and let me have a reply. In this morning's press there are large headlines which again call attention to the falling prices of beef. Is the minister in a position this afternoon to answer the question?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I am not aware that the price of beef is falling.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He means cattle.

Mr. ILSLEY: In his question yesterday the hon. gentleman used the word "beef"; he must have meant cattle. I had only a moment's conversation with the food administrator, and he points out that the prices of cattle are not subject to ceiling regulations. They have gone up and down regardless altogether of the regulations of the wartime prices and trade board. Therefore when the hon. gentleman asks on what authority the packers in Toronto and Winnipeg have reduced prices paid to farmers for beef, I must inform him that they are not subject to the authority of the board. At least there is no rule or regulation affecting the price of cattle. If there had been, the price of cattle would not have gone up to the marked extent that it did.

Mr. TUSTIN: But the price control board rules that there must be a reduction of one cent a pound on July 13.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is in the price of beef.

THE BUDGET

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 30, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Blackmore.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been considering the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). If any hon. member wishes to speak to the question I would be glad to hear him now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I submit that the amendment is out of order under Beauchesne's marginal rule 395; and also, because it refers to the total mobilization of resources, which is a principle already disposed of by this house during the present session.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not looked into this matter at all. There may be some ground for the last argument advanced by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), but clearly on its face this amendment is in order. If in a previous debate this session part of this matter was dealt with, of course that is something else to consider. I would hope that Your Honour would not rule out this amendment on the ground that it is not a proper amendment to the motion to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. SPEAKER: On the motion of the Minister of Finance that I do leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means, Mr. Blackmore moves, seconded by Mr. Hansell, the following amendment:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house views with alarm the obviously decisive drift into national or state socialism everywhere in evidence in this budget, as indicated by the shackling taxation structure it erects; the sweeping trend towards centralization, bureaucracy and oligarchic regimentation which it involves and the general deterioration of morale and incentive to productive effort which it aggravates;

Further this house regrets the government's apparent inability to see the vast improvement in Canada's efficiency that could be effected by a wisely scientific use of her credit and currency potentialities;

And deplores the government's persistent failure to employ Canada's credit and currency to supplement her pay-as-you-go policy, thereby to restrict the appalling growth of debt, and to provide a means to gradually paying off Canada's indebtedness.

Therefore, this house respectfully urges the government to formulate and to introduce at the earliest possible moment such a modernized credit and currency policy as will, to the greatest degree rendered possible by our available facilities, curb inflation, control debt, mobilize Canada's resources for total war, ensure democracy and security to Canadians, in war, and then in peace."

Under standing order 48, and referring particularly to citation 395 of Beauchesne, at page 126, it is provided:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

That is also borne out in May, at page 261. The amendment is framed in general terms and so phrased that it might be considered as a vote of no confidence. It expresses alarm at "the obviously decisive drift into national or state socialism" and suggests a wisely scientific use of Canada's credit and currency potentialities. But in the declaratory paragraph it urges the government:

. . . to formulate and to introduce at the earliest possible moment such a modernized credit and currency policy as will, to the greatest degree rendered possible by our available facilities, curb inflation, control debt, mobilize Canada's resources for total war, ensure democracy and security to Canadians, in war, and then in peace.

If the house adopted the amendment the effect would be that the budget proposals now before the house would be postponed until the new credit and currency policy was framed. Divested of what might be called the preamble of the amendment, the conclusion expresses the negative of the motion before the house and would be determined by a vote on the motion. Beauchesne, citation No. 400, provides that an amendment that is merely an expanded negative cannot be proposed by the Chair.

There is another objection to the amendment, in that it proposes something which has been already before the house this session on two occasions, and the house has given its decision. The amendment urges in these words "mobilize Canada's resources for total war". In Votes and Proceedings of 18th February, 1942, pages 56 and 57, an amendment was moved by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and in that amendment occurred these words:

And this house regrets that Your Excellency's advisers have not seen fit to recommend to parliament without delay additional measures designed to: (a) completely mobilize the wealth and material resources and, on a selective basis, the full man- and woman-power of the nation, to the end that the nation may wage total war in any theatre of war.

A subamendment to the amendment was moved by Mr. Coldwell, and part of that amendment was in these words:

. . . in the opinion of this house no total war effort adequate to meet the present needs of the war, domestic problems, and the preparation for post-war conditions is possible without total mobilization of wealth, industry and finance as well as human resources.

The house divided on these amendments, and both were negatived. Again in Votes and Proceedings of 11th June, 1942, pages 380 and 381, I gave a ruling on an amendment moved by Mr. Coldwell on Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act as follows:

This bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that provision for the introduction of conscription of man-power for overseas, without specific proposals for the immediate use of the power conferred by section 2 of the act, to conscript war industries, financial institutions and accumulated wealth, does not meet the urgent need for total war, imposes further inequality of sacrifice and is, therefore, contrary to the peace, order and good government of Canada.

I ruled that amendment out of order inter alia on the ground that the house had already given a decision on the same question this session, and I based my ruling on citation 396 of Beauchesne:

An amendment on a question must not be inconsistent with a previous decision on the same question given at the same stage of any bill or matter. Thus words which the house or committee has decided to insert or retain cannot be altered, but additions may be made to them.

The amendment we are now discussing refers again to the mobilization of Canada's resources for total war, just as it did in the amendment I have just quoted. It also refers, in different terms it is true, and from a different point of view, to what was stated in Mr. Coldwell's amendment as imposition of "further inequality of sacrifice." The terms may be phrased differently, but the conclusion is the same.

For these reasons I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. J. M. DECHENE (Athabaska): In rising to continue the remarks I was unable to conclude last night, I do so after being deeply impressed by the nobility of the sentiment expressed in the house by leaders of all parties upon the occasion of the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation.

For a few moments I should like to speak to this matter from another angle, and pay my tribute, not to the fathers of confederation, because that has already been well done, but to the people of Canada. I think it fitting that such a tribute should come from a man occupying my position, belonging as I do to the common peoples of Canada. I am not a professional man, nor am I a schoolteacher or preacher. I am just an ordinary fellow, belonging to that large class in the community, that numerous class of people of whom a great statesman once said, "God must have loved the common people because he made so many of them." It is to those people I pay my tribute. I pay it to the fathers and the mothers of the land. I pay it to those mothers who, since the discovery of the country, have pioneered in their settlements, and who are continuing in their pioneering spirit in my part of the dominion. I pay it to those mothers who are writing the history of Canada with a golden pen dipped in blood. I pay it to the fathers of our country who have devoted their energy, time and ability, no matter what their occupations, to the welfare of the country. I pay my tribute to the veterans of the last war, to the boys in all the arms of the services in this war. I pay it also to the women engaged in services connected with the war, and to our farmers who are carrying on under conditions more difficult than ever before because they are finding that help is growing scarcer. Still they continue to do their share to see that all the food asked for by Great Britain and our allies may be furnished. I pay my tribute to the brains, the courage and the forbearance shown by the common people of this country. I, sir, a common man, a backbencher, beg of you the privilege of humbly bowing my head in tribute to the people who have made Canada, and who will continue to make it.

Last night at the adjournment I was directing my remarks in the budget debate to the tremendous resources of Alberta, and particularly as they relate to the possibilities of development of one of the resources this or any other country must have, if it wishes to be great and prosperous. I refer to oil and its by-products.

Complimenting the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the masterly budget he presented to the house, I would refer particularly to those budget provisions cutting down tariff restrictions on machinery necessary for the separation of oil from the bituminous sands found in the areas surrounding Fort McMurray and Waterways.

Aristide Briand, recognized as one of the most able men in France during the after-war period, also one of France's greatest ministers of foreign affairs, is credited with saying that many of the conferences following the war had proven futile because of the oil question. The question as to the ownership of the oil resources of the world, whether they were in Persia or in Iraq, in the East Indies or in any other part of the world, was the main cause for the failure of many of the peace and economic conferences. He pointed out that it was recognized by the great powers that no nation could be great in war or peace unless it had oil properties, without which the operation of mechanical contrivances was impossible, whether those contrivances were for use in farm or factory, or by tradesmen in their lines of occupation. After this war it is reasonable to expect that the world will be more mechanized than ever.

It has been proved, not from my own words or from any processes of imagination, but from the reports of practical men in the business, one of whom is an engineer and an expert in the Department of Mines and Resources, that we have at Fort McMurray and at Waterways, at a point 350 miles north of Edmonton, the largest oil reserve not only in America but in the whole world.

I have before me certain pages from a report by Doctor S. C. Ells of the Department of Mines and Resources, but to save time I shall quote only the last declaration in the splendid article appearing under his name in the Canadian Geographical Journal of June, 1942. This, may I point out, is not an old publication.

> It would thus appear that ownership of oil in place, controlled production, and consequent economies as regards storage, are factors which should prove favourable to commercial development of bituminous sands. The writer visualizes a time when McMurray may become one of the leading oil producing centres of the North American continent.
> Justification for the development of important production from Alberta bituminous sand has been considered:—(a) as a war emergency measure, and (b) as a development to meet normal peace-time requirements.
> Many preconceived ideas and plans have yielded to changing and unexpected circumstances during the past thirty months. Whether important development of Alberta bituminous sand should be regarded as a war emergency measure will depend on circumstances which may develop during coming months, but which cannot be foreseen.

At this point may I also pay tribute to two young men who were engineers and experts in the research council in Alberta. These young gentlemen, K. A. Clark and S. M. Blair, are known to me personally. For many years they have given invaluable services both to Alberta and to Canada, in co-operation with the Department of Mines and Resources in Ottawa, by making a study of the bituminous sands, and by helping to evolve a machine which would make possible the separation of the sand from the oil, at a price at which the oil might be sold on a competitive market.

Having established that we have there a reserve estimated by Doctor S. C. Ells at 150 billion barrels, while the whole world reserve is estimated at from 35 to 39 billion barrels; having submitted to the house that Mr. C. S. Bowey of the United States bureau of mines estimates that 250 billion barrels of oil are available in the tar sands of Fort McMurray and Waterways; having also mentioned the fact that far from being inaccessible, as was stated in a report made to the Department of Munitions and Supply, this field is only 350 miles by railway from Edmonton, which railway is jointly owned by the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway and therefore an application to reduce rates, if they are thought to be too high, could be made to the board of transport commissioners; having stated that by air it is only 245 or 247 miles from Edmonton to Fort McMurray and this is the recognized method of transportation in the north country, I submit to the house that this matter is well worth the interest of hon. members. Attention should be given to the development, not after the war but now, of the tremendous resources there are in Alberta.

Here in Ottawa, the capital city, many members of the house and many business men and other people cannot go beyond the city limits because they are limited in the amount of gasoline they can purchase. This limitation applies to all lines of activity, and yet we have this tremendous supply of gasoline, greater than anywhere else in the world. I do not think we are doing the right thing by this country if we do not take immediate measures to develop these tar sands. It may interest the house to know that I stand on firm ground in agitating this matter. I have been bringing it up for twenty years. I first brought it up in the Alberta legislature, and any one who is interested may look in the old files of the Edmonton Bulletin and the Edmonton Journal. They will see that year after year, in 1922, 1923 and 1924, I brought up the question of these oil resources, as well as those in the Turner valley.

It will be remembered that in 1914 the Discovery well was brought in, in the Turner valley. This well produced a small amount of oil, but a tremendous oil boom resulted. Then war broke out, and most of the companies went to the wall. Drilling was stopped, and it began again only after the war. Gasoline sold for thirty-seven cents a gallon in the city of Edmonton, and the farmers throughout Alberta could not afford to pay that price. Prices dropped after 1921. One year I moved in the Alberta house that the Alberta government should pay a bonus of $100,000 to the company or individual that first succeeded in bringing in a well which would produce 1,000 barrels a day.

We should develop these great resources, the tar sands, the oil wells and the other resources of Alberta and the Northwest Territories. I heard the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) say that it was absurd to mine gold in Canada, to take it out of a hole, ship it to the United States and put it into another hole there, but he forgets that the mining of gold brings a great deal of money into the country and employs a great deal of labour. He is talking all the time about giving employment to labour; yet he rises in his place in this house and talks about the mining of gold which provides considerable employment. He forgets that we are not giving this gold to the United States. When it goes across the line it brings us a good price. If we could deliver from $200 to $250 million of gold a year, it would go a long way toward equalizing the rate of exchange between the United States and Canada.

I have something a little more difficult to say. A few days ago I was reading one of the best United States magazines, a magazine considered worth-while reading. This magazine contained an article by a gentleman who is recognized as being a world authority. He is a most reputable writer and has a complete knowledge of world conditions. This man has been in Asia, Singapore, Oceania and all over the world since war broke out. He was in the far east when the treacherous attack was made on Pearl Harbour by Japan. He describes some of the islands in the Pacific now held by the Japanese, and he gives details of some of the minerals which could be obtained from these islands and of which there is a great need to-day in Canada and the United States. These minerals have never been developed because the companies owning them belonged to cartels. Other resources were worked, but not these. I imagine this was done in order to keep up the price. He names the places, and he gives the estimated amounts of the minerals available. This information was given to the companies and to him by the engineers. To-day there is no access possible to these islands. The Japanese are in possession, and they will be able to develop these minerals themselves. I am wondering if there is not a possibility that a cartel exists in this country in connection with gasoline in order to stop or retard the development of the bituminous oil sands of Fort McMurray.

Mr. COLDWELL: What about the Standard Oil of New Jersey, the Imperial Oil in this country?

Mr. DECHENE: I am not a communist or a socialist; I am just a Liberal, a common man. I am one of those who has absolutely nothing bad to say about the man who makes a success. I admire such a man. I think 99 per cent of those men who amass fortunes do so because they use their brains, muscles, and everything else to the limit. They are generally thrifty and work harder than anyone else. They devote all their time to their business and make many sacrifices in order to achieve success.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Standard Oil is not a common man.

Mr. DECHENE: I believe the people of this country are going to watch developments closely in view of the fact that we have this oil; they are going to see that the development of these resources in western Canada, so needful to all, is not retarded by the action of some company interested in working other fields or in buying their supplies of crude oil from the United States and South America.

Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made an address which I admired very much. He made a wonderful contribution to this debate, and he must have given considerable care and attention to the details of the budget resolutions. But then he ruined it all by refusing, at the request of some hon. members on this side of the house, to include in the names of those who had met in Washington the name of the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). I am an old-timer in this country, and for a long time my ancestors made their living here. I love Canada. The United States has grown to a population of 130,000,000 people, while we have remained at only 11,500,000. For many years we have been losing our best blood to that country. Two or three millions of Anglo-Saxons and of French origin, born in Canada, make their homes in that great republic, and it benefits by their brains and brawn.

But because of that narrowness of which we witnessed an example yesterday we have not been able in this country to forget our political differences when it comes to the point of recognizing a man's ability and his services to Canada, and in that way we fail to create in the minds of our young people a pride in what is Canadian. When you look at the picture of one of the most illustrious sons that Canada has produced you cannot help but reflect that Sir Wilfrid Laurier really died of a broken heart. The hon. member from Saskatchewan has perhaps never heard of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Apparently he has not or we would not have heard his sneers. Such an attitude as his makes it very difficult in this country to create in our young people the pride in their country that the young people of the United States have in theirs. Sir Wilfrid Laurier died broken-hearted because on two occasions he met with the same narrowness, the same opposition from an organization of men who for political purposes refused to recognize his talents and his services to this country.

On this first of July, Canada's seventy-fifth anniversary, and in this budget debate I think it is only right for me to say that even if we should dispose of the whole of our wheat after the war at $1.50 a bushel or more; if the price of cattle and hogs should remain as it is now, and if, in addition, we exported all our surplus of gold and other minerals, we should still fail to attain prosperity in this country unless we achieved the unity of all the different elements that constitute this dominion.

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Speaker, this being July the 1st, Dominion day, and the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation, and very appropriate sentiments having been expressed in honour of this occasion by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the leaders of other groups, and thousands and thousands of our citizens being congregated on the grounds of parliament hill, one is led to wonder what has become of the spirit of the fathers of confederation. The prolonged parliamentary debate on conscription and the plebiscite, lasting for almost six months, is in my opinion an insult to the founders of this great nation. If we were to observe the true spirit of Dominion day I think we should stop wrangling over the duties of citizenship at this time. We have a truly great heritage, but it imposes also a great responsibility, and if by deed and action we would manifest our sense of responsibility, then before this nation reaches the century mark Canada could easily become a world power far greater than anything of which the fathers of confederation ever dreamed.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has said that there is something wrong with this parliament, and I agree with him—after practically six months of debate, chiefly over the nonsensical plebiscite and conscription. Twenty-five years ago to-day, approximately 20 per cent of the membership of this House of Commons were overseas with Canada's expeditionary force, many of them serving in no man's land, putting in longer and more uncomfortable and more arduous hours than we have ever served in this house. Yet when the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) suggested that we should speed up the work of this house he was roundly spanked by his leader, the Prime Minister. Just this morning I attended three different committee meetings. I have probably as much work to do in this house as the average member, and I feel that our procedure could be speeded up by the government of the day.

I should like to compliment the Minister of Finance upon his presentation of the budget. While agreeing with its general principles, there are some parts of the budget with which I entirely disagree. I would also congratulate the leader of the official opposition upon the splendid speech he made, in which he pointed out a number of glaring inequalities in the budget. Certainly so revolutionary a budget, brought down in the middle of the year, upsets any systematic planning by the people of this nation with respect to their livelihood, and it is distinctly unfair to the family man on a two thousand dollar income. The increase in taxation and compulsory savings for such a man is over 250 per cent, and for the family man in the three thousand dollar bracket the increase is over 300 per cent. While the compulsory saving feature is certainly a step in the right direction, the new tax will create a great many hardships for people on small or average salaries, especially with the budget being brought down so late in the calendar year.

I am opposed to the tax on candy. I think it is unjust. I have heard many stories of taking candy from a youngster, and I think it is going too far to tax candy, especially in view of the fact that, as was pointed out yesterday, it is a food, and with such other articles as sugar, chocolate and cocoa, forms part of the emergency rations of our armed forces.

In my opinion the budget should also make some allowance for old debts, say a deduction of at least 10 per cent. A farmer may have two or three crop failures, and then a good crop. How is he going to take care of his past obligations if he is compelled to pay this increased taxation? Some system should be worked out to cover the farmer's operations over a period of two or three years, because the tax is most unfair and almost unworkable under the present set-up so far as the farmers of Canada are concerned.

I should also like to make a few observations with respect to inequalities and the lack of parity for agricultural products. In this connection I should like to quote what the Minister of Finance said on June 23, at page 3572 of Hansard, in presenting his budget. He said:

In the calendar year 1941, with relatively poor crops in many localities cash income from the sale of farm products was only 17 per cent below the income of 1928, the year of the biggest crops in our history. Good crops in 1942-43, with assured prices, will bring cash farm income close to the best records of Canadian agriculture. Excluding wheat, which has been in surplus supply since the beginning of the war and has required special measures, the prices of farm products on the average are now about 2 per cent above the level of 1926 and prices of animal products on the average are relatively still higher. Farmers are assured of these prices on a wide range of this season's crops, and will receive, by government action, higher prices than those on last year's crops for wheat, flax, soy beans, sugar beets and apples; (4) price and income control are essential weapons in combating inflation. They must be used, however, in close coordination with direct control of supplies and productive equipment, with direction and management of manpower, with consumer rationing, where necessary, and with fiscal policy. No one of these instruments is itself powerful and persuasive enough to do the whole job of directing our resources to the end desired.

I wish also to refer hon. members to what the minister said on June 4, at page 3081 of Hansard:

Just consider the position—and if members of this committee do not remember anything else I say, I want them to remember these simple figures. During the first twenty-six months of the last war, known as world war No. 1, price levels rose 15 per cent. During the first twenty-six months of this war, world war No. 2, price levels or the cost of living in the Dominion of Canada rose by 15 per cent. During the next seven months of the first war price levels rose by 13 per cent.

Mr. McLarty: Additional.

Mr. Ilsley: Thirteen points over and above the first fifteen points, making a 28 per cent increase in the total period of twenty-six plus seven months. But during the next seven months of this war the price level has risen less than 1 per cent. I want to say that in the last war—

Mr. Ross (Souris): At whose expense?

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): The expense of the producer, of course.

An hon. Member: The farmer.

I think these two arguments should be compared at this particular time. Also, in his remarks on the introduction of the budget, I think the minister should have taken into consideration the increase in the population of this country. He quoted the year 1928. The last population figures prior to 1928 were 8,787,000. The figures for 1941 were 11,420,000. That is quite an increase, and should have a bearing on the amount of money available to agriculture. Considerably over one-third of the population is dependent upon agriculture for a livelihood. Therefore that 17 per cent hardly gives a true picture of the present difficulties of agriculture in the dominion.

It has been said several times before that the base used for industry and organized labour in setting up this price ceiling scheme is the period 1926-29. Figures found in the publication of the economics branch of October 29, 1941, show that during the period 1926-29 the average prices of certain essential agricultural products were: wheat, $1·417; oats, 60·3 cents; barley 71·6 cents; rye, 97·1 cents; butchers' steers (Toronto), 9·04 cents; bacon hogs, 11·01 cents; creamery butter (Montreal), 38·2 cents; eggs (Montreal), 48·2 cents. The only article in that list which is over parity at the present time is cattle.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but the price of hogs, as read out there, is above parity.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No. I believe if the minister figures it out he will find that it is slightly under parity to-day, although it is very close to parity. You have to figure out per kill on a hog-grading basis. I think it is still slightly under.

The United States government have announced that they will allow $1.14 on wheat on farms in 1942, or 16 cents above the 1941 price. That is a guaranteed price to the producer on the farm of $1.14, or approximately 40 cents above the price guaranteed to our producers at this time. While they are guaranteed 90 cents, I do not think it will amount to much over 74 cents to the producers on their farms.

Butter fat from the same cow is set, under the price ceiling, at 35 cents a pound at the creamery for butter, and 50 cents a pound at the cheese factory for cheese. In this connection I should like to refer to an article which appeared in my local paper under date September 4, 1941. It states:

For the sixteenth consecutive year, the grand championship in the Canadian butter competition at the Canadian National Exhibition, Toronto, has been won by butter manufactured in Manitoba, but the winning of this prize in 1941, is of particular interest to southwestern Manitoba for the reason that the top entry in the exhibition was that of Cy. McCallum of the Melita creamery and the high honour attained this year reflects most creditably, not only to Mr. McCallum and his fellow members of the Melita creamery staff, but to cream producers in the area served by this plant.

In that respect I do not think I have to point out to the Minister of Agriculture that those producers are being discriminated against, because they cannot deliver their cream or butter fat to cheese factories, which are not available in that part of Canada. As has been pointed out before, it is impossible to have these factories constructed owing to the present priority system in this country.

May I now refer for a few moments to the cattle situation? A question was asked yesterday and to-day, on the orders of the day, by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), and the minister apparently endeavoured to differentiate between beef and cattle. I feel sure he realized that beef comes from beef cattle. But I have been amazed, in following this cattle situation for the past month, that we have not had a statement from the Minister of Agriculture on this matter, in view of what has occurred in the past few weeks.

Mr. TUSTIN: It was promised weeks ago.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Yes, questions were asked weeks ago, and an answer promised which has not yet been given.

With reference to the questions asked yesterday, I would refer to the following statements in an article in a Toronto paper of June 30, under the title:

Big Cattle Run Here, but Two-thirds Unsold. Market Staggers under $1 Price Drop—Army to Pay Civilian Price—How About Supply?

I do not intend to read all this. The first paragraph will give some idea of the condition that exists to-day.

All across Canada yesterday prices of cattle declined from 60 cents to $1 per cwt. on all live-stock markets. In Toronto, where the beef shortage has been most acute, the market opened with a very large run of 4,450 cattle, but as bids declined sharply to a greater extent than previously shown in one day's operations, trading slackened and 2,700 head were unsold at the close.

On July 1 opens another quarter when Canadian cattle can be shipped to the United States at a customs duty of only 1½ cents per pound, as compared with the regular 3 cents a pound. In the first two quarters of 1942, these quarterly quotas of 55,000 cattle were filled very rapidly, but now, with the existence of Wartime Food Corporation Ltd. to have first chance of buying before cattle can be shipped—

And so on. Elsewhere the article says:

Recently Ottawa reduced maximum prices of wholesale beef by 3½ cents a pound, to be applied 1 cent a pound July 13, 1 cent a pound Aug. 3 and 1 cent Aug. 24 and ½ cent on Sept. 14. The wartime prices and trade board has desired to change the index from time to time during the year because cattle on grass during the spring, summer and fall months gain weight at less than at any other period, whereas in winter they have to be fed at considerably increased cost.

That is an account of yesterday's market. To-day, in the same paper, is another article entitled:

Cattle Prices Falling in Swiftest Drop Known. All Watching Market to See how Farmer Will React to Lower Rates—Ottawa Begins Buying.

This article says:

With receipts of 790 cattle reported by the dominion marketing service at the Toronto live stock market yesterday, a considerable trade developed in spite of a further decline in prices to points which showed levels lower by $1 to $1.50 for the week. There were about 1,200 head unsold at the close and to-day is a holiday. Wartime Food Corporation entered into buying for the first time of cattle ticketed for export when the United States quota for the third quarter of the year begins to-day. On Monday Toronto prices had been out of line with United States prices for most cattle but the further drop in price yesterday brought more of them into line. A complicating situation is that over-all ceilings are causing as much confusion in the United States as here and that Washington also pays a few cents more per pound for the armed services. That is abandoned in Canada.

Then it goes on to say:

Market Watches the Farmer.

Most of the old hands found themselves unable to gauge what will be likely on the market in the weeks and months ahead. The week's decline is the largest some of them remember for twenty-five years.

Mr. TUSTIN: And the farmers are watching the government.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The farmers are watching the government for some lead.

Following that, we had a return brought down in this house, on April 29 last, which gave the following information:

Total number of cattle on farms in Canada:

	Head
June 1, 1932	8,529,700
June 1, 1937	8,840,5[illegible]
June 1, 1941	8,797,000

The amount of beef in store in Canada:

	Pounds
April 1, 1932	9,088,000
April 1, 1937	15,694,000
April 1, 1942	21,894,000

Exports of cattle to United States:

	Head
1932	12,865
1941	250,573

The total dressed weight of beefs and calves slaughtered in the slaughtering and meat-packing industries in Canada was as follows:

	Pounds
1932 beefs	338,545,602
1937 beefs	457,544,311
1940 beefs	454,110,866

The figures for calves are as follows:

	Pounds
1932	42,918,685
1940	80,999,915

In answer to a question as to what recommendation Mr. Donald Gordon of the wartime prices and trade board had made to the government for dealing with the control of Canada's beef cattle export, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said that the question was not in order at that time. I think the impression prevailing among the producers of the country to-day is that the packers are to some extent in control of the cattle industry and of the marketing of the farmers' produce at this particular time. It is true enough that when the Minister of Finance said that beef did not mean cattle, he meant that beef came under the price control board, whereas cattle are sold by the producer and did not come under the board.

Mr. ILSLEY: What I meant was that there is no ceiling on live cattle prices. If the hon. gentleman wants one put on—

Mr. ROSS (Souris): No, I am pointing out that the statement was made this afternoon for the purposes of the record, but there might as well be a ceiling in the face of what is happening to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Take the events of the last two or three months.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister care to explain this matter right now for the benefit of those engaged in the cattle business? —because it is confusing to the producers. I am willing to lose two or three minutes of my time now if the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture will explain the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Go on with your speech.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I said I was prepared to lose a few minutes in order to get an explanation for the benefit of the producers of the country. I am satisfied that money is still in control and is considered more important in some places than the essentials of life. One sometimes wonders what a difference it would make to the farm people, in the balance of Canada's economy, if Mr. Donald Gordon had spent half his life on the farm and the other half, as he has the greater part of it, in the banking business. Tennyson once said, "I am a part of all that I have met," and I think that applies equally to the chief price controller to-day. I still think that money is in control in this country. If there is any doubt about that, hon. members have only to refer to a reply made by the Minister of Finance on June 5, at page 3114 of Hansard, to a question put by the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). The minister was asked why interest was left out of the price-ceiling structure. His answer was:

> The reason is that the risk varies so greatly that we did not think we could put a price ceiling on it. Money is worth 6 per cent when it is lent on one class of risk and only 3 per cent when it is lent on another. You cannot do that unless you made it 10 per cent, 24 per cent or something like that. You could have a ceiling such as that, but it would completely prevent lending in many places where lending should take place.

I wonder if there is much greater risk anywhere in this land than in farming—and yet the farmers' commodities must be put under the price control board. In my opinion prices under this price control machinery are not based on equity, and I do not think the minister or anyone else will claim that they are. Here let me quote from paragraphs 4, 5 and 6 of the famous Atlantic charter:

> They will endeavour, with due respect for their existing obligations, to further the enjoyment by all states, great or small, victor or vanquished, of access, on equal terms, to the trade and to the raw materials of the world which are needed for their economic prosperity;
> They desire to bring about the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field with the object of securing, for all, improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security;
> After the final destruction of the nazi tyranny, they hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries, and which will afford assurance that all the men in all the lands may live out their lives in freedom from fear and want.

I believe the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has suggested in this house that unless some of the principles of the Atlantic charter are put into operation before this war is finished, there will be little hope for the country after the war. I would point that out to the Minister of Finance at this time, because he is responsible for this price-ceiling set-up. I think he should bring about some basis of equity. I intend to discuss some points of this budget when we are in the committee stage because they more directly affect the great agricultural population of Canada.

There is another matter that gives me a great deal of concern, which I had thought of discussing under the budget. It is a matter of considerable importance. On June 8 the Prime Minister promised to set aside a day for the discussion of the Hong Kong report. In my opinion that inquiry should not have been made in secret. I know there are those who have their doubts as to whether we should refer to the report. It has been mentioned on the floor of the house. To clear that up I would read a short article from the Montreal Gazette of June 8:

During the last great war, two royal commissions were appointed by His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom to look into various military operations. Lord Cromer headed a commission investigating the Dardanelles campaign. In the second volume of his autobiography, "Memories and Reflections", the then Prime Minister Asquith thus described the way the Cromer report was received:

"The first report (of the Cromer commission) did not survive four hours' debate in the House of Commons, in the course of which it was riddled by the criticisms of (Winston) Churchill and myself."

Lord Cromer was one of the most distinguished jurists of his day in Great Britain. Yet the report he submitted on the much-disputed Dardanelles expedition was subjected in parliament not only to debate, but to such vigorous and successful criticism that the report was subsequently redrafted.

That in my opinion was the correct procedure. I submit that this is the proper place in which to discuss the report. I am satisfied if the evidence is produced, whether or not dereliction or error is found on the part of the war committee of the cabinet, of which the Prime Minister is chairman, or of the then acting minister of defence, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), or of members of the permanent joint defence board of the United States and Canada, and certain high ranking officers—I am satisfied that all officers of the expeditionary force and of military district No. 10 will be entirely exonerated. At a time like this, in face of the peril that now exists to the democracies, prosecution of loyal citizens under the defence of Canada regulations, such as has recently been instituted against that gallant and great soldier, Colonel George Drew, who has such an excellent record, are unjustified and are not in the interests of an all-out war effort.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): In rising to take part in the debate on the budget may I at once pay my deep tribute of admiration to our brilliant Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), whose great ability was manifested when he submitted, with such pleasing forcefulness and such clarity, the greatest financial statement ever brought down in parliament since confederation. I am also reminded, as I feel sure we all are, after listening to the inspiring words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and other leaders, that this is the seventy-fifth anniversary of the founding of Canada. As one of Scottish birth, I am not unmindful of the great privilege and honour bestowed upon me in my having been elected member of parliament for New Westminster. I join with the Prime Minister and others who have spoken in paying my tribute of devotion to this our great dominion. I am Canadian to the core, and in this troubled day I say with heart and soul: God bless and protect Canada.

With regard to the budget, Mr. Speaker, so far not one murmur of complaint has been heard from the Canadian people, and it is my belief that the people are truly prepared to sacrifice anything for victory, so that we shall not lose this war. They want an all-out war effort, in the fullest sense of the word, and with that desire I am in hearty accord. It is my opinion that the people of Canada are somewhat impatient with parliament. They sense a waste of time in the many speeches made here, very often duplicating other previous speeches. They feel that this is not right in time of crisis, and I believe they are watching parliament with great concern and that they resent party being placed before the welfare of the nation. The other day we listened to three very good speeches, one from the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson), one from the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) and one from the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell). I would particularly commend the speech of the leader of the opposition, which I thought was a remarkable contribution to the debate. I would say to the hon. gentleman, however, that I do not believe he needs to apologize for taking up the time of this house on any occasion. After all, he has a duty to perform as leader of the opposition, and he knows full well that democracy is safer with a live, active opposition. Speaking for myself, I know that many times I have been critical of certain matters affecting our people, often in connection with matters on which the government did not believe I should speak. But I have dealt with those matters in the full realization that the 77,000 people of the constituency of New Westminster, whom I have the honour to represent, have no other voice in parliament but that of their elected representative. I feel that I have a duty to perform, and therefore I may have to do some criticizing in my remarks this afternoon.

At the outset I should like to join in what was said by the leader of the opposition with regard to Canada's ever-increasing liquor bill. It is appalling to realize that last year we spent on liquor and wines some $20 per capita. Our wine and liquor bill increased last year by $50,000,000, reaching the stupendous figure of something like $234,000,000. It may be true that it is not the direct duty of the Minister of Finance to interfere with an industry of that kind, but we all agree that this is not an essential industry so far as the welfare of our people is concerned. I would say to the minister and to the government that if this increased taxation does not bring about a substantial curtailment in this business, more courageous action will have to be taken than a mere increase in the taxes imposed. I understand that so far as malt is concerned, the increase, which looks very large on paper, will amount only to something like one cent a bottle. However, we can discuss this matter in greater detail when we are in committee.

With regard to compulsory loans, this is a new departure in our budget. I think there are some splendid features in it, but I am just wondering what effect compulsory loans are going to have when the minister, as he will have to do later on, asks the Canadian people for $1,755,000,000 by way of voluntary loans. I trust this new system will not interfere with the success of the voluntary loans, but I rather gathered that the minister sensed the difficulties which might arise, because by way of encouragement he paid certain tributes to the committee which is in charge of this work.

I believe the merging of the national defence tax with the income tax is a step in the right direction. This multiplicity of taxes was rather confusing. I wonder if the minister had in mind, in taking this step, that when the war is over a demand might be made for the abolition of the national defence tax, because then people might say there was no need for a defence tax. By this step, however, it will be possible for the government of the day to continue the income tax and with it the national defence tax, if it so desires, until we are safely through the post-war period.

I listened with a great deal of interest to what the minister had to say with regard to trade between Canada and the United States. It was right and fitting, I thought, that he should pay some tribute to what the United States are doing and to the relationship now existing between that country and Canada. Then he went on to say, at page 3574 of Hansard:

> In effect, the agreement may be thought of as eliminating the dollar sign in our war-time transactions with the United States by providing a convenient technique for an exchange of raw materials and other components of war goods for the finished war supplies we are equipped to produce.

As I listened to those words I could not help wondering why steps have not been taken to bring our Canadian dollar to par with the United States dollar. I wondered the more when I read an address made over a United States radio network last May, on a programme called "America's Town Meeting of the Air", at which Canada was represented by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) and Mrs. Phyllis Turner, both of whom I believe were very well received and both of whom did very well. On that programme Doctor Kindleberger, who is the research economist for the board of governors of the federal reserve system, had something to say with regard to the Canadian dollar. I trust that the minister will take note of this, so that when we are in committee he may give us some explanation of why the Canadian dollar is not at par with the United States dollar. Doctor Kindleberger was asked this question:

> I would like to ask Doctor Kindleberger why should Canadian money be worth less in United States exchange than it was formerly?

This was his answer:

> Canada came into the war faced with the problem of having to import a great many things from the United States; faced with the problem of having to cut down on non-essentials. It also wanted to increase its exports to the United States. To that end it changed the value of its money (in terms of United States money) as a Canadian act, not as a United States act. The United States did not partake in that decision at all.

To me that is a rather startling statement, and I think some explanation is due us when we get into the committee stage. Both Canada and the United States are full partners in this life and death struggle. That being so, why should our Canadian dollar be at a discount of 10 per cent? Last year we bought from the United States something like $1,100,000,000 worth of goods and exported to the United States goods to the value of about $600,000,000. In effect this meant that the Canadian people paid $50,000,000 more for the goods we bought from the United States than I believe we should have been called upon to pay. If we are partners in this war, our money should be at par with the money of the United States.

Certain statements have been made here with regard to the farmers. In also advocating their cause this afternoon I offer no apology to anyone; but before going seriously into the matter I should like first to quote what the minister had to say in this regard, at page 3572:

> . . . the prices of farm products on the average are now about 2 per cent above the level of 1926 and prices of animal products on the average are relatively still higher.

I do not know where the minister got his figures, but I do know that they do not agree at all with the figures given by the bureau of statistics which I obtained the other day. Taking 1926 as a base of 100, farm products in 1930 reached a height of 82·3 per cent, while wages in Canada were at 105·8. Wages were away above the 1926 level, but farm products were about 18 per cent below. Then, in 1941 farm products had dropped further, to 71·2, while wages had still increased and had reached 109·7.

It is true in connection with certain lines of agricultural products that prices have gone up. To-day farm products on the average, however, are worth 80, and speaking of the month of May, 1942, we find they are worth 80·2, while industrial wages have gone up further to 120·9.

Concluding his speech, the minister said this:

> The war will not be won by disputing as to whether labour or agriculture or employer or employee should get a larger share of a swollen national income.

I say to him that the farmers are not fighting with labour for a larger portion of the swollen national income. They are asking that they, as a class, be not called upon to make a greater sacrifice than any other civilian class. And before I have finished I think I will show that they are doing just that.

Comparing 1942 with 1941, it may be shown that in some lines of agriculture increased prices are being paid. But a comparison of 1942 with 1941 does not tell the story. That is just making a statement which proves nothing. In my opinion, agriculture has been further affected since coming under the operations of the wartime prices and trade board. When I mention the wartime prices and trade board I hope the government does not consider that board sacrosanct. Anything I have to say about it is not made in the sense of casting any reflection upon the chairman of the board, who, I think, was the proper person for the job. He is very able, and is doing, I believe, a great work, a work which has been successful along many lines. But let me point this out: We had better be careful of the great powers we are conferring upon the board. We had better be diligent. Although I am not a prophet, I will prophesy that many of the powers they are taking and many of those they have at the present time they will not give up without a struggle.

Not long ago one of the newspapers stated that some members of parliament were kicking because they had lost some patronage. I will tell the house this, that most members of parliament to whom I have spoken do have a sense of frustration because they feel that, either knowingly or unknowingly, the government has set them aside and has handed certain powers over to boards. The people we represent should be in a position to approach their elected representatives when they want some redress from those who are handling the boards. The only place they can come is to their member, but when the member makes any approach to these officials he finds just how little he means to these men who are running boards. I feel sure every member of parliament knows I am speaking the truth. This is the condition which has brought about the sense of frustration among members of parliament who, like myself, feel that they have been just set aside, and that the people in their constituencies are not being represented as they should be.

With respect to agriculture, we sometimes refer in other matters to what is done in the United States and Great Britain, and we point out that we should follow their example. Why, then, did we not follow the example of the United States in connection with agriculture? The Economic Annalist of April, 1942, states this in pointing out what the United States have done to protect and encourage agriculture:

> The United States Emergency Price Control Act, 1942, approved by the president on January 30, 1942, provides for government regulation of commodity prices, rents and marketing margins.
> Farm prices—

Such as the prices which are being set up by our wartime prices and trade board.

> —are to be set by the office of price administration.

There is this proviso, however, this safeguard:

> Farm prices are to be set by the office of price administration, with the approval of the secretary of agriculture.

I maintain if the wartime prices and trade board is to go ahead setting the prices of farm products, then matters in connection with agriculture are bound to get worse. The Department of Agriculture has been, so to speak, divorced from agriculture—I was almost going to say that it had been placed in cold storage for the time being. But each one of us knows what happens when we go to the Minister of Agriculture, after an appeal is made to us by our farmers. Let me say right here and now that it is a good job for the farmers of Canada that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) is in charge of that department, because I do not know where our farmers would have been had they been left under the wartime prices and trade board. As every hon. member knows—and it is an open secret, or at least common knowledge—the Minister of Agriculture has had a terrible fight with the wartime prices and trade board to obtain anything for the farmer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And still has.

Mr. REID: But it is not right. The wartime prices and trade board was set up to keep the ceiling prices down. It has no concern with what it costs the farmer to produce. Yes; it has stated just that, on numerous occasions when farmer organizations have gone to it and pointed out that farm labour is scarce, that prices of feed have gone up and that other commodity prices have increased. On those occasions the farmers have been told in plain terms, "We are not interested in what it costs you to produce. Our job and duty is to keep prices down." I say now: Is it any wonder that the farmers of this country are feeling as they do at the present time?

It was predicted by the Minister of Agriculture when the wartime prices and trade board took over, that there would be a butter shortage if they did not raise the maximum price on butter, a price which had been set at 35 cents, and was far too low. There is a butter shortage now. We are almost 10,000,000 pounds shy. What did the wartime prices and trade board say when that was brought to their attention?—"If there is no butter, you can eat more bread."

Mr. ILSLEY: Who said that?

Mr. REID: I think I can find the name of the man in the wartime prices and trade board who said that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish you would.

Mr. REID: I will, and I will hand it to the minister. I have a little more to tell the minister.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is good to hear these things once in a while.

Mr. REID: I will tell the minister more. I will give him more in connection with another matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Give me the name and the date, and I will check it up.

Mr. REID: I will send the name and the date to the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want something authentic.

Mr. REID: Any statement I make I am prepared to prove, and when I make that statement the minister should accept it. I am not rising here to voice a lot of rumours with respect to reports which have come to me.

I had pointed out that there is a butter shortage. Then, the price of new potatoes was set at five cents in Ontario. With what result? New potatoes are being allowed to stay in the ground, and we are importing potatoes from the United States because our farmers cannot pick potatoes and sell them for five cents a pound.

Then, we have a sugar refinery closed in Ontario. Oh, yes, we are told that labour is scarce. But why is labour scarce? We all know that labour is scarce on the farm, simply because the farmer cannot afford to pay wages, when he must meet the competition from shipyards and munitions factories.

Then, the British Columbia asparagus growers have lost $3,000 because of the low price set down by the wartime prices and trade board. The strawberry growers were told, "Strawberries are not essential."

Mr. MacNICOL: But they are pretty nice to eat.

Mr. REID: Yes, and good for you too. I have pointed out that the board is not concerned with farmers' costs, or with the fact that they are getting worse each day. Price control can be made to operate, and I quite realize that great distress would follow now if it does not operate. But agriculture must be thoroughly understood by the wartime prices and trade board.

Food is a munition of war. I am not sure but that there may be a scarcity of many kinds of food in this country if conditions are allowed to continue. With butter selling at thirty-five cents farmers are selling their cows to citizens from the United States who are coming across to buy them. The fact of the matter is that herds are being depleted because of the low prices set by the wartime prices and trade board. I repeat, they are not interested in the farmers' costs.

I am going to make another complaint about the wartime prices and trade board. While I am at it, I might just as well say what my people believe; I might just as well utter the thoughts that are in my mind as a member. I have no complaint to make about the chairman of that board. I think he is a splendid man and the right man in the right job, but I wonder just how the people of this country are looking at the appointments that are being made to that and other boards. If they are, they will be asking us members, "Why in the name of heaven are there so many bankers and industrialists obtaining positions when agriculturists and labour have been ignored and are not considered at all in these appointments?"

There is a movement in progress toward a new era, toward the implementing of the Atlantic charter. What is taking place in some countries to-day? Certain persons in some countries are viewing with alarm the onward march of the common people for a better life. I wonder how many hon. members know the details of the committee that was set up in Great Britain, called the 1922 Committee, and is still functioning. I have not the time to read all of one report made, but one paragraph is of interest. This committee is really the power behind the throne in Great Britain, and lately its chief function has been to safeguard the rights of private enterprise and big business against the advance of socialism. It is described as the mouthpiece of vested interests and an extension to parliament of the activities of the Federation of British Industries.

Mr. MARTIN: Is that a parliamentary committee?

Mr. REID: It is a voluntary parliamentary committee, acting without any authority from parliament itself. It is an arrangement among a certain group of members of parliament whose powers, shall I say, come from the vested interests. The hon. member will know what I mean when I say that. I am not saying that there is a similar committee set up here, but I warn the members of this house that they have a duty to prevent any such movement here, even though they are on the government side. After they are elected they do not represent Liberals, Conservatives, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or Social Credit; they represent all the people. That is what I am endeavouring to do this afternoon in saying what I have said.

Past history has shown that social legislation has made more headway during periods of war than at any other time. We are doing well now to give some thought to the post-war period. The Atlantic charter has been mentioned often since that historic meeting of Prime Minister Churchill and President Roosevelt, and it is to be hoped that the provisions outlined in that charter are not merely idle or empty words. When we speak about some new world order after the war, I suggest that we put into effect now some of the provisions of the Atlantic charter, particularly in connection with two worthy classes of our citizens.

One class I have in mind is made up of the great number of soldiers' widows in this country who have been knocking on the door of parliament for many years and whose plight is known to every member of the house. How about trying out some of the provisions of the Atlantic charter on these worthy people? Then how about trying it out on our old age pensioners? Is nothing further to be done for them? True it is that we have on our statute books an Old Age Pensions Act which provides the small allowance of $20 a month for those who have reached the age of seventy years. This amount will hardly keep body and soul together. I wonder how many hon. members realize that the allotted span of life on this earth as laid down by God is seventy years? In psalm 90, verse 10, you will read:

> The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.

With the full knowledge of that before us, how can we call the granting of a pension at seventy years of age an old age pension? I am going to designate it from now on as a death-bed allowance. The great sums being provided by the Canadian people show that we can do anything, and refutes the statements which have been made by former ministers of finance who had always the one stock answer, "Where will the money come from?" when representations were made advocating further social legislation on behalf of our people. I remember one minister of finance holding up his hands in holy horror—I can visualize now the challenging look in his eyes—as he said, "Where can I get $100,000,000 to put these things into effect?" Yet we are budgeting to-day for close to $4,000,000,000, a sum which staggers the imagination, a sum the magnitude of which few members of parliament can fully grasp.

Since my time is short, the last subject which I have to bring before the house has to do with the protecting of the Pacific coast. The people out there, and the people throughout Canada, are greatly perturbed over events these days. They are more perturbed because there is a feeling among the people that they are not being told the truth of the war situation. I am one of those who believe that our people can take the truth, but once they realize that they are being fooled it will be too bad for those in authority. I think it is fair to say that since this war started the average citizen has been further ahead with his views than many of the high military authorities. On so many occasions they have been wrong.

The Japanese have landed on the Aleutian islands. To back up my statement that the people have not been told the truth, I should like to quote from an article which appeared in the United States press and which was copied by the Ottawa Citizen. I shall read only one paragraph of this article, which first appeared in the New York Times. Dealing with the fact that the Japanese had landed in the outer Aleutians, they say:

First we were assured that the enemy had landed in no "inhabited" area. Then it was suggested the islands were too rocky and forbidding to be of much value to the enemy. Later it was admitted enemy ships had entered Kiska harbour and that troop barracks had been erected on the shore. Now we are informed there cannot be more than a few hundred Japanese soldiers there.

I wonder how many people of this country and how many members of parliament are really aware of the significance of the toe-hold which the Japanese have obtained on the Aleutian islands? Even some of our own people do not seem to realize the significance of it. Lieutenant-General Kenneth Stuart, chief of the general staff, who has just taken over the Pacific command, referred to the landing of the Japanese on the Aleutian islands as being "only a little invasion". He suggested that we should pay no attention to it. I suggest that it is more than a little invasion and has more significance than he realizes or most people perhaps realize. I think the Vancouver Sun set this out very well in an editorial, which reads in part:

The Japanese are not yet into Alaska. They have not taken Dutch Harbour. But how can any sensible person believe that the Japanese will pause, for our convenience, in the outer Aleutians? Of course they must attempt, at all costs, to neutralize the bases of Alaska, which will be used against them as soon as Russia is at war with Japan. And the fact that Japan is moving so early in the north indicates clearly that the Japanese are getting ready for an early attack on Russia.

I should not be at all surprised if the Japanese moved forward and made a desperate attempt to attack Alaska. How many hon. members realize that Germany and Japan have put an encircling movement into effect and are attempting to divide the allies one from the other? We all wish to help Russia, but I say that if Alaska is taken by the Japanese, the one great outlet for munitions into Russia from this country will be blocked off.

Where the Japanese have a toe-hold is only 580 miles from Kamchatka in Russia, and that is only 600 miles from Japan. The Japanese are not going to sit back when they have a foothold on the Aleutian islands, and if they should attack Alaska it will be a serious thing for Canada as well as the United States. We sometimes talk of an invasion. An invasion may or may not take place, but the object of the Japanese in taking Alaska and the Aleutian islands would be to stop aid going to Russia from outside countries before war between Japan and Russia takes place.

I have one word to say regarding the Alaska highway. For ten years this country has been surveying routes from Canada into Alaska. We had the routes laid out, the estimates made and the plans worked out. We knew the best and easiest route to get in there, and I believe this country made a mistake when it allowed the United States to go ahead and build a road over a very nebulous route into Alaska. We are just as much interested in Alaska as they are, and we should have taken a firm stand, instead of showing a colonial mind, and said: "Here, Mr. United States, we have gone into this thing, and here is the proper route you should take." Some people are already beginning to doubt whether the United States will be able to complete the road they have started and whether they will not have to come back and build over one of the routes we have surveyed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the hon. member never hear of the word "appeasement"?

Mr. REID: I have, many times.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is another illustration of it.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Nonsense.

Mr. ILSLEY: As near nonsense as anything could be.

Mr. REID: I have just one more word to say regarding the Japanese in British Columbia. Only a few days ago a Japanese submarine fired shells into Estevan. Some have said that the Japanese must have been poor marksmen because they did not hit anything. But does anyone know what their real object was? No one can tell. They may have been looking for supplies that could have been cached there earlier. In British Columbia in January of this year, and even before, the Japanese were buying gasoline, not by the gallon but by the drum, and buying stumping and blasting powder in great quantities. We from British Columbia raised our voices many times and asked the government to move the Japanese out of the province, but this was delayed. The latest information I have is that there are as many Japanese seen around the city of Vancouver now as ever there were. Those who come from British Columbia know that the situation is serious, but we have had a terrible fight to make the authorities here believe it. It has been flung in our teeth: "Do not listen to those men from British Columbia because they have not the milk of human kindness in them." Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope we are wrong; our own people come first. We who have lived among the Japanese know something of their methods, and I would not be surprised if they had cached gasoline and blasting powder in different areas along the coast. The Japanese it was stated landed men surreptitiously at night in the Charlotte islands before the war; when the war started three hundred Japanese disappeared and the authorities could not get hold of them at all. I have no doubt that some of them were those who came in surreptitiously. I would ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), if it comes under his department, or the Department of National Defence, to watch the bays and coves of the coast of British Columbia, and, if possible, do a little searching there to find out whether there are any caches which the Japanese have made of supplies for submarines and other vessels to pick up when needed.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, it is realized that the war situation is serious, but do not let us forget that Hitler's plans are not going well. His attack on Russia was a mistake, and we can thank God for that mistake. Second, he never dreamed that the United States and Canada could turn out aeroplanes and tanks and ships and munitions and food in such huge quantities as we are doing. Canada's record in that respect is one of which we can justly be proud.

It is not often, Mr. Speaker, that I quote poetry in the house, not that I have not been in a position to do so, but on this seventy-fifth anniversary of our dominion I may be pardoned if I quote four stanzas from a poem called "Canada's Call—1942," by John of "The Lilacs," Prince Edward Island.

The pipes are sounding far across the water,
Across the lakes and dells comes their refrain;
The pibroch strains are calling from the distance—
O bonny lad, guard well thy great domain.

Guard well thy freedom! flower of Canada's greatness,
Far o'er the ocean waves thy help is needed still;
"Lest We Forget," these words live in our memory
From out the past—from Flanders' field and hill.

Ours is no empty boast, nor words vain-glorious
Of flattering tongue, or craven servile race;
Upon the undying page in deeds immortal;
There Canada's sons have won a glorious peace.

No pen however great could write the glory,
Of Canada's heroes who braved war's awful hell;
"Their names shall live forever;" through the ages,
Where history's chronicle of valorous stories tell.

My final word is this. We the members of this house have a duty to perform during these trying days. I trust that when the history of this crisis is written those who read the pages of Canada's great deeds will find a sentence something like this dealing with our parliament: During those days none was for the party but all were for the state.

Mr. F. W. GERSHAW (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a brief contribution to this debate I should like first of all to say to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that the writing of the budget and the manner in which he delivered it are accomplishments that will stand out brilliantly in the political life of Canada for many years to come. I have noticed that the British people have commented favourably on this budget, and I believe that the people of Canada have accepted it, not with joy and shouting, but with the seriously firm conviction that it is fair, that it is just and that it is necessary in order to meet the very difficult circumstances with which we are faced. It is an outward indication that the economic life of Canada has changed from a peace-time to a war-time basis. But to me, Mr. Speaker, it means something more, because I believe it means the end of that phase of capitalism which has allowed poverty and want to exist side by side with great wealth and waste. As I go into the homes of the people of the country I find that there is one problem which faces them all, and that is the problem of making a bare living. I find that during the thirties there was demoralizing unemployment, when many of our young people were denied the chance to work and make a decent living. I believe that the sentiment of the people of Canada and the sentiment of the soldiers who will return to Canada will be never to permit such conditions to recur within our country.

Speaking before, earlier this session, I advocated the giving of larger pensions for the aged and for the blind. I have also advocated that this very high taxation be kept up after the war so that the plans which the various reconstruction committees are making can be carried out. I believe that those plans can so adjust things that no one who has gone overseas will lose for having done so and that no one who has stayed at home will gain for having stayed at home.

I believe that on this Dominion day we might well not only give lip-service in honour of our fighting forces but also convince them that when they return there will be positions for them, that there will be preference for them in the positions they had before, including the civil service, and that they will be re-established as they should be.

I believe that during and after this war we should all be on the same level in respect of whatever sacrifices are necessary. I see in this budget a levelling-up process which, I believe, will have a great effect; that level should be the one which will give the maximum health to the people of this country.

There was a day when certain people in Spain knew that they had four columns coming against them, and then they had the traitors in their midst, making a fifth column. We in Canada are faced with more than that. We are faced with what might be called the sixth column. I refer to the devitalizing effects of ill-health and undernourishment. Never since the beginning of time has the morale of an army been high when the civil population was not well fed. No army was ever at its best; no army had the necessary sustaining energy unless it also was well fed. So we must see to it that the boys who have gone from these shores shall be the best-clothed, the best-equipped and the best-fed army that our resources will provide, because—

> Vain mightiest fleets of iron framed;
> Vain, those all-shattering guns;
> Unless proud England keep, untamed,
> The strong heart of her sons.

Health and life are the most precious possessions of any mortal. Before this war is over, many of our bravest and best young men will lie beneath wooden crosses; many, too, will lie in foreign lands without crosses, or in the depths of the ocean. Others will return broken in spirit and in body. We cannot prevent those violent deaths and injuries. But we can prevent deaths on the highway. We can do much to prolong the span of life. Just to illustrate, I should like to mention some things which have been done.

Research up to the present has discovered means of combating previously rapidly fatal diseases as diabetes, goitre and pernicious anaemia. Sulfanilamide has been discovered, and, with its allied drugs, has been a real elixir of life, because it has done so much to inhibit and destroy the effects of the invading germs which are always present. Drug addiction in this country is almost unknown, owing to the vigorous action of the Department of Pensions and National Health. Workmen's compensation boards in the different provinces not only pay compensation but have a department studying the cause of accidents and trying to prevent those accidents from happening, and putting in measures for the protection of the workmen. Yet we find that, with all those precautions, there are still some things which have not until recently been given much attention, and for a few moments I wish to speak on the deficiency particularly as it applies to diets.

Anyone who is working hard needs a substantial diet. A cigarette and a cup of coffee are poor nourishment to support the body. On the other hand, a full stomach is not by any means an assurance that there is not partial starvation and deficiency. There are many men who have been in good health while they were in humble circumstances, but when they started to indulge in the rich diets and the worry and the stress and the strain and probably the night life of the affluent, their health has been broken.

During the days of Washington the average age of life extended to only thirty-eight years. During the days of the first Roosevelt it was forty-nine years. To-day a male child can look forward to living sixty-one years, and a female child to sixty-four years. That great improvement has been brought about chiefly by better care of infants, better protection against contagious diseases, including tuberculosis and typhoid. There are still many—too many—sudden deaths coming in the most active period of life. Many of these deaths have definite causes; the causes can be learned and precautions taken in time. Sometimes dietary excesses have a good deal to do with it—eating the wrong foods, drinking the wrong fluids, and a body-softening and nerve-debilitating method of life. From a study of 200,000 insurance reports it has been found that, for every hundred men who die at the age of forty-five at normal weight, one hundred and thirty-nine die at that age who are overweight, because every cubic inch of flesh and every extra pound impose a great strain on the vital organs. That, together with the high-tension lives which we live, has been the cause of many sudden deaths. This budget seems to provide very good reasons for people to improve in that respect, because the high taxes and the restrictions which this budget has brought forth will tend to cause people to walk more and ride less and live a much simpler life.

In Great Britain, rationing has brought about an improvement in the health of the people. During the last war people waited in long queues to get their food. The result was that the strong and the rich got too much, and the poor and humble were often told, "There is nothing more to-day." In this war, ration cards are given to the people, so that everyone gets his share. In Great Britain to-day and every day about a million meals are served, mostly to the children, and the government pays for 90 per cent of them. Coal miners, who are subject to cold and damp, are given extra supplies of Canadian bacon because of its heat-producing qualities, and those who work strenuously for long hours in the docks receive extra supplies of cheese because of its calcium content. Fruit juices, milk and the fish liver oils are supplied chiefly to children and to expectant mothers. The cargo space which is available to take food to the people of Britain is limited, and they must put essential foods in that space and deliver them where they are most needed. This has resulted in an improvement in the health of the people.

I come now to the second class. Deficiency affects those who have too much to eat and to drink, too little exercise and too little sleep; but it has a much more varied, serious and complicated effect upon that other class of people who have too little to eat, too much to do, and too much anxiety and worry. Poor food, poor clothing, poor housing conditions are companions of ill-health and dejection. Why? Because these unhappy conditions lower the resistance which each of us has to germs which are ever ready to attack us, to invade our systems and destroy our lives. These things result from our economic activities failing to keep up with the light and knowledge gained by medical research and medical experience. Our hearts go out to the old person, to the aged man or woman who has not ordinary comforts, but perhaps much more are we touched by the pale, drawn face and lean body of the undernourished child. We know that these physical deficiencies can be evaluated and that the necessary proteins or minerals can be supplied in the proper quantities and qualities.

For instance, there is vitamin B. We are all interested in vitamin B because it is the youth-preserving vitamin. Deficiency of it in childhood causes decrease of growth, and in adult life fatigue, neuritis, nervous depression and so on. This substance is found in a number of foods but particularly in the whole grain cereals and in milk, liver, and such products as eggs in particular.

Take vitamin C. A deficiency of this causes poor bones and teeth, and scurvy in advanced cases. This vitamin in found abundantly in tomatoes, oranges, unpeeled potatoes.

One more vitamin comes to mind, vitamin A. A deficiency of this causes a decrease of growth in childhood and aching eyes, eye weaknesses and diseases of the eye. This vitamin is found abundantly in green vegetables, spinach, carrots, apricots and, of course, particularly in butter and in fish liver oils.

The absence of a small quantity of these important essentials does not cause total disablity or complete sickness, but it does tend in that direction. It causes partial disability. It retards the person in the strenuous struggle for life. As Doctor Thomson put it, it takes us to the nutritional twilight. We do not enjoy the bright midday sunshine of an adequate diet, but yet we are not altogether consigned to the night of definitely diagnosable disease or starvation. Doctor James recently visited some places in the east end of London. He went to Bethnal Green to a school there and found that the government was providing one meal of protective foods for the children in that school every day. He found that the children of thirteen years of age weighed eight pounds more and were one and three-quarters inches taller than their predecessors in 1938. Not only that, but that particular part of London had been hit by enemy action and they have often had to go into shelters. Then in a boys' school the diet was considered to be adequate, and yet it was found that a large number of boys, when compared with an equal number of other boys, showed that in the first class, where one pint of milk a day had been given to each boy, at the end of a certain period of time each of these boys had gained 6·98 pounds in weight and was 2·63 inches taller, whereas the average of the other boys had gained only 3·85 pounds and 1·84 inches in height. Their school work and their sports activities showed the difference.

In Canada surveys have been made. In four Canadian cities expert dietitians went into the homes of people who were making about $1,000 a year and weighed and measured the food which was taken by each member of the family at each meal, and a surprising deficiency was discovered. It was found that the total amount of heat units was 15 per cent below normal; that iron was deficient as was also calcium. The vitamins were very deficient, and some were receiving only half what they should have been getting. These people were taking too much food made from white flour, from which valuable constituents had been extracted; there was probably too much sugar in their foods, and they were woefully deficient in whole grain cereals, fresh vegetables, dairy products, and possibly tomatoes or citrus fruits. Most of these products are not very expensive. It was worked out then that the average family of five could have an adequate diet if they had $7.50 for food each week. This means that they would have to have an income of about $100 a month. I am glad that the Minister of Finance has said that no married man receiving $1,200 will pay income tax, nor will income tax leave him less than that amount. But one-quarter of the people of Canada have not sufficient income to provide that adequate diet, and perhaps another quarter have not the special knowledge of how to prepare the diet. I am sure that if the rural homes were checked up, it would be found that many of them have not sufficient money to provide a really adequate diet.

Most of these foods can be provided by Canadian farms, and the future market for farm products is not predictable. It has been said, however, that if every person in the western hemisphere, including the British empire, could, with public aid and education, receive an adequate diet, all the farm products of the farming communities would be used, so that what we should do is to get the farmers to produce food which will provide an adequate diet and fully pay them for it. Great strides have been made in the army along the lines of providing a balanced diet. The people of Canada are becoming nutritionally conscious. Difficulties are met with —economic difficulties, difficulties of indifference, of education and so on—but the solving of these problems is not beyond the ability of the Canadian people, and their solution would accomplish something that would be permanent and enduring. That would be a great step toward victory, by doing away with the danger of a sixth column; and the reward would be the disappearance of despair and the bringing of sunshine to many Canadian homes.

On motion of Mr. Fraser (Peterborough West) the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 5.52 p.m.

HONOURS AND DECORATIONS

First report of special committee on honours and decorations.—Mr. Macmillan.

QUESTIONS

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

What is the obstacle which prevents the government from adopting a national Canadian flag?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If by "obstacle" is meant "legal obstacle," there is no obstacle to His Majesty, on the recommendation of the Canadian government, authorizing the creation of a national Canadian flag. The government would not make such a recommendation without the prior approval of the House of Commons. It is the view of the government that, with war conditions what they are, it would not be justified in asking the House of Commons to debate the matter at the present time.

SASKATCHEWAN SURVEY PARTIES

Mr. PERLEY:

1. Have any investigation or survey parties been working in the Qu'Appelle river valley and its tributaries east of Lumsden in the province of Saskatchewan since March, 1942?

2. If so, (a) what is the personnel of each party; (b) what is the purpose of the work or surveying being done; (c) what has been the cost of such surveying parties to date?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes.

2. (a) Engineer, L. D. McMillan; draftsman, E. Nixon; engineer, H. G. Riesen; instrumentmen, E. O. Wood, E. Shienfield, T. R. Stuart; rodmen, M. J. Peace, H. F. King, W. M. Huddleston, D. A. Kennett, R. G. Ellis, D. Halliwell, C. Mohr, R. M. McWalters, T. W. Whitworth, A. Rowand, T. S. Farquharson.

(b) To determine the location and extent of irrigable areas and to locate sites for water storage for the same.

(c) $2,719.15 (April 1, 1942 to May 31, 1942).

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—VANCOUVER OFFICES

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. What is the name of the building, and the street address in which the offices of the wartime prices and trade board is located at Vancouver?

2. How many square feet of floor space is occupied?

3. What is the rent per square foot?

4. Before offices in the said building were taken, did the government investigate the accommodation available in other buildings?

5. If so, (a) what buildings were considered, and (b) what was the rent per square foot in each instance?

6. Could other adequate accommodation have been secured at a lower rental?

7. If so, why was it not taken?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Marine building, 355 Burrard street.

2. 10,000 square feet.

3. $1.50 per square foot. Other tenants in this building pay $2 per square foot.

4. Very exhaustively.

5. (a)	(b) Per sq. ft.
Royal bank building	$2 00
Stock exchange building	1 60
Rogers building	1 50
Hall building	1 50
402 Pender street west	1 40
Pacific building	1 21
Vancouver block	1 13
Merchant's exchange building	1 05
Crown building	1 00
Northwest building	1 00
Davis chambers	0 85
Fairfield building	0 75*
Holden building	0 75

* Without janitor service; 90 cents per sq. ft. with janitor service.

6. No.

7. In most of the buildings listed above there was not sufficient space for our offices. Some second class space was available at lower rental, but it was definitely not suitable for the board's purposes, either as to location, efficient lay-out, services supplied, money spent by the owners of the building to fit the premises up for our requirements, or accessibility.

In the Marine building, the owners spent approximately $10,000 to fit the space up to provide efficient working conditions. Working conditions in the cheap space would have been so bad on account of inefficient lay-out, lighting services, etc., as to have been more expensive in the end than the space taken.

STONEY POINT INDIAN RESERVE—PURCHASE OF LAND FOR MILITARY PURPOSES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Has land been acquired on the Stoney Point Indian reserve for military purposes by the government?

2. If so, what amount of land has been acquired?

5. Were the Indians consulted in the matter?

6. If so, was a vote taken?

7. With what result?

8. How much per acre was paid for this land?

9. Was this part of land ceded to this band of Indians under treaty in 1827?

10. Did this treaty expressly reserve to this band of Indians and their posterity for all time to come, the exclusive use of the land?

11. Was the opinion of the Department of Justice obtained as to the right of the government to supersede as solemn a treaty by order in council?

12. If so, what was the opinion?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. Two thousand, two hundred and eleven point two hundred and twenty-five acres (2,211·225).

3. The Chippewas of the Chenail Ecarte and St. Clair band of Indians to which the Stoney and Kettle Point Indians belonged retained under the surrender of 1827, 12,343 acres. Of this area 5,873 acres were surrendered or disposed of through enfranchisement at various dates and times leaving 6,470 acres. From this amount was taken 2,211·225 acres for military purposes.

9. Yes.

10. Yes.

11. Department of Justice expressed opinion that the government had the right to acquire property under War Measures Act.

12. Answered by No. 11.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—RENTAL OF CAMERAS FROM EMPLOYEES

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the national film board make a practice of renting either still or motion picture cameras from employees of the board?

2. If so, what are the names of each employee from whom a camera is or has been rented since March 31, 1941?

2. The temporary camera men referred to in answer to No. 1 are: Roger Barlow, Leo Seltzer, LeRoy Robbins, Douglas Sinclair.

3. Total rental paid to temporary camera men referred to in answer to No. 1: Roger Barlow, $222; Leo Seltzer, $117.60 (rental for camera and equipment); LeRoy Robbins, $225 (rental for camera and lights); Douglas Sinclair, $11.

3. What are their names, and length of absence from the bench, and what has been paid for these special services?

4. Who looks after their judicial duties while they are absent?

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONS UNDER EXISTING ACTS—SITUATION IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): On April 30 the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) stated that he expected to be in a position to make a statement to the house with regard to the housing situation within a week. That is over two months ago. On June 1 I drew this matter to the attention of the minister, and he stated that he would comply with my request that the statement be expedited as much as possible. Another month has passed, and we have had no statement of government policy on this very important matter. May I urge upon the minister that he make a statement at the earliest possible opportunity.

At the same time I hope he will deal particularly with the difficult local housing situation in Ottawa, to which reference was made during the course of a debate in this house not so long ago, when I made the suggestion that some authority should be set up immediately to study the situation. Will the minister deal particularly with the suggestions which have been made regarding the construction of hostels?

I think this problem must be attended to, and government policy on both the larger matter and the particular matter should be made clear as soon as possible.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as far as I am concerned my responsibility as Minister of Finance is with the national housing administration. A great many requests were received for the continuation of the National Housing Act, and it was suggested that we should vote more money because the amount already voted is just about or quite used up. I think it is just used up at the present time. For many months a great many letters have been coming to me and to the other members of the government requesting that the housing act be continued. It was on that matter that I had hoped to be able to make a statement long before this, but I felt that at the time I made a statement I ought to give some indication of what the government's general policy was with regard to housing. It must be remembered that this is not by any means the main part of the housing activities of the government. The main part of those activities at the present time I should say are those carried on by Wartime Housing Limited, under the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Those programmes are going ahead in numbers and with great rapidity in various parts of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And with great expense for what you are getting out of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Housing costs money, no matter who does it. I decided a little while ago that before I made any statement on housing

I would wait until the subcommittee of the war expenditures committee had their report ready, if that did not take too long. If I did not do that I would be in this position, that the members of the committee would think I had disregarded them completely. They have been taking evidence, formulating proposals and giving a great deal of time and conscientious attention to the matter, and I did not want, just on the eve of their report, to make a statement which might be greatly at variance with their recommendations; but whether it was at variance with their report or not, such a statement before they had made their report would make it appear that their duties were entirely useless and not appreciated by the government. I have been in touch from time to time with the chairman of the subcommittee relating to that matter. I do not know whether they will be in a position to make their report immediately or not; but I hope so, and as soon as they do I will take into account their recommendations. Whether they can be followed or not, I do not know. But then I will make a statement to the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the situation in Ottawa?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was coming to that. The situation in Ottawa is not the responsibility of the Minister of Finance or of the Department of Finance. The situation in Ottawa is that a great many people are urging that further accommodation should be provided for female civil servants, and it was arranged some time ago that that matter would be considered and gone into by another minister, my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty), under whom the civil service comes.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, might I add that that matter is receiving very active consideration at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is just a stock answer. What the people want is some action.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF RALPH P. BELL AS AIRCRAFT CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not in his seat because I wanted to ask a question of him, but with the consent of the house I will ask the question and it will serve as a notice.

There has reached me to-day an order in council, P.C. 5387, passed on the 25th of June, establishing regulations respecting aircraft production which appoint Mr. Ralph P. Bell aircraft controller, and by the regulations enacted thereunder he is given all the powers of a czar. I do not question the power of the government to create this new authority and endow the controller with the very wide powers bestowed upon him. Undoubtedly, that power exists under the provisions of the War Measures Act and of the Munitions and Supply Act. Mr. Bell has been acting as director of aircraft production, and I had thought he was already possessed of almost unlimited power. What circumstances have arisen which make it imperative to create this new authority and to clothe the controller with such wide and unlimited powers? Has any situation arisen which makes this step imperative? If so, what is that situation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Stands as a notice.

WHEAT

NEW INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT—DRAFT CONVENTION ON PRODUCTION AND EXPORT CONTROL AND MINIMUM PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. According to this morning's papers some agreement has been reached with regard to wheat. Can the minister make a statement to the house, since one has already been given to the press?

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add at the moment to what has been published in the press in connection with finality, for the time being, in the wheat discussions at Washington. It was agreed that an announcement would be made from Washington for all the nations participating in the discussions, and my comment was based on the statement which has been published.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does not the minister think it wiser that any statements of that kind should be made to the house when it is sitting rather than to the press?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I take it that the hon. gentleman is referring to the announcement regarding the wheat agreement?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): It was originally arranged that the announcement would be made simultaneously from the various countries concerned, and had it been possible to do this, the announcement on behalf of Canada would have been made in this House of Commons, but it was found that the hours in the different countries did not tally sufficiently closely to make that possible, and it was finally decided that one announcement would be made on behalf of all countries and that it would be made from Washington, where the conference was held.

CANADIAN ARMY

ACCIDENT TO CADETS IN BATTLE EXERCISES IN OTTAWA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think I ought to mention to the house an incident which occurred to-day regarding which I feel very deeply, and as to which I should like to give the house such facts as I can.

I deeply regret to inform the house that two cadets of the officers' training centre at Brockville are in a very grave condition as a result of an accident which took place in the course of an exercise which the cadets were putting on here this afternoon. Part of the exercise was the crossing of the Rideau canal in battle order. These two cadets could not make the crossing and were rescued with considerable difficulty. When I left the scene only a few minutes ago resuscitation efforts were being continued, but up to that point without success, although all hope had not been abandoned. These two cadets are both non-commissioned officers recently returned from overseas to take their commissions.

Two other cadets were overcome in the crossing. They were taken to the hospital, and the report I have is that their condition is not serious. The names of the cadets are withheld pending receipt by the next of kin of notices which are being sent out in accordance with the regular practice.

I may say for the information of the house that two of the three officers in command of the party were officers who had come back from overseas for instructional work, including instructional work in battle drill.

I want to say further—this is information I got when I was on the scene—that all these cadets had been through this practice in water-crossing, only last week, and had practice of this kind as part of their regular training. The adjutant-general has already undertaken a thorough investigation, which will be made to-morrow.

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

I am sure that we all join in the deepest sympathy for the next of kin, and I also feel that the cadets of the school should also have our sympathy and interest because they have entered most keenly and enthusiastically on exercises of this kind, which are regarded as a necessary part of the preparation for training in present-day warfare.

BATTLE OF EGYPT

PRESENT POSITION—MR. CHURCHILL'S STATEMENT IN BRITISH HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the house no doubt will desire to have the latest word with respect to the battle of Egypt. I am not, unfortunately, in a position to give information based on official reports which have been received to-day, but through the courtesy of the Canadian Press I have received the Associated Press report of what was said by Mr. Churchill in the House of Commons to-day. In the course of his remarks Mr. Churchill said:

> The battle of Egypt has brought the allies face to face with a disaster in the middle east equalled only by the fall of France, but the issue is not yet decided and "very considerable" reinforcements have reached or are approaching the battlefield.

Mr. Churchill also said:

> Military misfortunes of the last fortnight in Cyrenaica and Egypt have completely transformed the situation, not only in that theatre but throughout the Mediterranean.
> At any moment we may receive news of grave importance.

The press report states:

> Mr. Churchill's sombre portrayal of the war in Africa was relieved only by his statement that "very considerable" reinforcements have reached or "are approaching" the battlefield.

And in indirect quotation:

> I do not consider the struggle as in any way decided.

The Prime Minister also stated that the war, he thought, was likely to be a long one.

In that connection I should like to repeat what I said in the house the day after my return from Washington, as follows, as reported at page 3722 of Hansard:

> There can be no doubt at all that the situation at the moment is one of the most critical with which the united nations have been faced, one of the most serious that has arisen in the course of the whole war. To get the true perspective one has, however, to recall the very critical situations which have arisen in the past, and to remind oneself that the forces of the united nations have been able to rise superior to any temporary reverse, and that to-day there can be no doubt that the united nations are stronger and better organized than they have been at any time since the war began. . . . My own view is that the present conflict will have more to do with the probable duration of the war than with any question of its ultimate outcome. It may be that as a result of the present conflict the struggle will be much longer than up to the present we have hoped and expected it might be.

One thing is quite certain, that every country that is a member of the united nations will have to put forth its utmost effort in helping to overcome the enemy.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF FRENCH TRANSLATION OF BUDGET RESOLUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CHARLES PARENT (Quebec West and South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct the attention of the house to the fact that the ways and means resolutions have not yet been distributed in French. We have been asking for copies since the speech was delivered by the Minister of Finance, and we have not been able to get a single copy in French. This is one of the most important documents which should be available to hon. members, and we are entitled to read it in our own language. The question is one of primary importance, and I do not know why we should not have these documents in time, as for Hansard. We are now called upon to rush this budget through at full speed. How can we judge the importance of the budget until we know the items which will be fought out, or amended if it is possible, without having knowledge of the budget in itemized form? I believe this situation should be remedied without delay, and for my part I am not prepared to support the budget until I have read what is in it. Until that time I must be counted as against the budget as a whole. When it comes into committee of ways and means, I reserve my right to discuss the items after I have been able to read them in my own language.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is referring to the translation or to the French version of the resolutions which appear as a part of the budget speech, at the end of the budget speech, on June 23, 1942?

Mr. PARENT: Exactly.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I assumed that they would be translated just as the budget speeches are, the next day, or within the next day or two.

Mr. PARENT: The budget speech has been translated. We have, however, not been able to get a single copy of the ways and means resolutions in French. About fifteen hon. members have asked for it from the messengers at the distribution office, and they told us that copies in French were not available.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will make inquiries. I certainly put the resolution on Hansard, assuming that they would appear in both French and English within a day or two.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Votes and Proceedings of that day have them, and I think they are translated.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think they will be in Votes and Proceedings.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 1, consideration of the motion of Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, during the few years that I have been in this House of Commons I have heard many speeches—some good, some bad, some indifferent. Some speeches demanded this and that from the government; other speeches were very pleading; but the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 23, was the most "touching" speech ever delivered in this house, in fact, ever delivered since confederation. I know that statement of mine will not be contradicted, because that speech and the effects of it will touch not only every taxpayer but everyone in Canada, and the coming generation as well. The taxes therein set out affect "rich man, poor man, beggar man, thief", and I can rightly say that if this rate of taxation continues for a few years there will not be any rich men in this country. To-day many men who are in the higher and the middle brackets have found that, in order to adjust themselves to these new taxes and the new modes of living they involve, they have to draw on their capital, and we can rest assured that if that state of affairs continues for a few years we shall have no rich in this country; there will be a wonderful levelling off process.

This budget has put a tax on practically everything in Canada except the air, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) has the power to put a ban on that with the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even a tax on your wife.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Yes, even a tax on your wife. And I might say that they do not value wives very highly, because we are only allowed $150 for them.

Through the defence of Canada regulations even the right of free speech is taken from us. To-day the people of Canada are not only taxed to death but restricted in every way, manner and form. With the defence of Canada regulations and the wartime prices and trade board, our people are virtually in straight-jackets. Some know it and some do not, but eventually they will. These wartime prices and trade board regulations are regulating the small business man out of business and are depressing the farmer so that he will be deeper in debt at the end of the war than he was before. In fact, the farmer is really the forgotten man, as I said in my budget speech of 1940. The Minister of Finance has gone very far this time because he has even taken the candy away from the babies and, by taxing one-cent candy 30 per cent, candy which is the poor child's delight, he is taking away the extra nourishment that some of these children get, nourishment that is needed by them. I know he will find that the health of these children will be affected to a great extent. It will add to the work of the welfare societies and the children's aid societies throughout the country. I was quite pleased last night to hear just before the adjournment the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) speak on nutrition, and I am sure he will agree with me that some children in the poorer families do need the extra nourishment from these one-cent candies. I have here a letter in which the writer says:

> A great number of my customers are quite concerned with the new 30 per cent tax on penny candies. With the increase on bulk candies, packages, chocolate bars, et cetera, it can be immediately added on, but with the penny line it cannot be raised so easily, for if it is made 30 per cent smaller there just won't be any candy left.

He goes on to say:

> A young child who has done a few good deeds or helped his mother is very often rewarded with a penny and in 99 cases out of a 100 he goes to his favourite store to spend it on one-cent or some other confection. I am afraid that if he is deprived of this privilege there is nothing else in the world that will drive home in his mind the stern reality of war and its sacrifices, and surely none of us want these young children to have this brought upon them any sooner than it is necessary.

Some people might say that candy should be kept away from children. That is all right in some intances, if they are overloaded with it, but these poor children are not overloaded with candy as some others are, and they should enjoy the right to have some candy. I think it would be proper for the minister to exempt this one cent candy and leave the tax on the higher priced confectionery, because otherwise the children's health will be affected.

As I listened to the Minister of Finance the other night delivering his budget speech, a story I read in the first book over forty years ago came back to me, the story of King Midas. Everything he touched, even his food, turned to gold. As the Minister of Finance ran his fingers through his golden locks, in the same breath he said that we expect a revenue this year of $1,481,000,000, or $609,000,000 more than last year; that is, more than half a billion dollars more than last year. It seems like a fairy tale that Canada can raise that amount of money, but the Canadian people are willing and ready to pay it and will pay to the last cent without grumbling or making any row about the matter, so long as the government gives them a lead and economizes and stops waste in governmental activities. The people want the government to feel the pinch as much as they do, and it is only fair that they should have this feeling.

Yesterday I received an order for a return in regard to the Toronto Shipbuilding Company Limited, the former Dufferin Shipbuilding Company Limited, and Dufferin Paving and Crushed Stone Limited. The shipbuilding company is renting from the Dufferin company a 25-ton Kochning crane or derrick, a 20-ton crane, a 10-ton crane and two 7½-ton cranes. The 25-ton crane is rented at $750 for the first shift per month, plus $375 for the second shift per month, or $1,125 a month. That crane, I believe, could be bought to-day, brand new, for $15,000, so that in a year the government will almost pay for it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Per day.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No; that is per month. The 20-ton crane is rented at $935 for the first shift and $470 for the second shift, or $1,405 a month. The 10-ton crane is rented at $565 for the first shift and $285 for the second, or $850 a month. The two 7½-ton cranes, which operate on gasoline, are rented at $510 each for the first shift and $255 for the second shift, or $765 a month. The government paying the sum of $4,910 a month to this firm, the Dufferin Construction company, which I understand is run by the Franceschini outfit.

The other evening I was very much surprised to hear the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) speak of the wonderful work that the government is doing in turning out tanks and munitions of all kinds. He gave no credit at all to the people of Canada, and it is the Canadian people who are responsible for this production, not the government. The government had to be absolutely pushed into it by the opposition, who gave them the lead. Canada has done wonderful work in production. This dominion has done a good job, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has also done a good job, but he can do a better job and so can we all. What we want is more production, and right away.

I have a few suggestions to make which I believe are constructive. To-day the Minister of Finance mentioned the National Housing Act, and I wish to refer to it because it is of vital importance at the present time to a great number of municipalities throughout Canada, especially Toronto, Peterborough, St. Catharines and Ottawa. What I am asking for—and I am sure the people in these municipalities are asking for it—is not only that this act be continued but that the government lend up to 90 per cent of the appraised value of all homes of $3,500 or less instead of just 90 per cent on homes of $2,500 as at present.

I have here a resolution which I am sure the Minister of Finance has already received:

City of Peterborough
City Clerk's office,
June 2, 1942.

Mr. G. K. Fraser, M.P.,
Parliament buildings,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Fraser:—

I beg to advise that the municipal council of the corporation of the city of Peterborough passed the following resolution at its meeting held last evening:—

"That whereas the housing situation in Peterborough is becoming more serious every day;

"And whereas it is the opinion of the council that this condition can be substantially alleviated by the continuation of the dominion housing loan facilities, particularly if a 10 per cent down payment requirement can be established;

Be it therefore resolved that this council petition the government of the Dominion of Canada, asking it to give serious consideration before deciding to suspend the provisions under the Dominion Housing Loan Act and, if possible, to extend the provisions whereby the 10 per cent down payment could be applied to homes of $3,500 and less; and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, Minister of Finance, and Mr. G. K. Fraser, M.P."

Yours sincerely,
E. A. Outram,
City Clerk.

I feel, and I know the people feel, that the workingmen of this country should be given a chance to build, to create, to have something to show for their work. Since the government have lost less than one-half of one per cent on this national housing plan there is no reason why it should not continue, because these homes are permanent, not temporary, makeshift affairs like those put up by Wartime Housing Limited. These war-time houses are supposed to be torn down within six months after the end of the war, and houses will be needed for these workers and other people to go into.

I was surprised to see in the paper the other day that the government had issued a permit, to the Ontario government evidently, to build a $50,000 home for the quints. That is not a right thing to do at this time. It will mean large upkeep; and if other people cannot afford it, or if the government does not want other people to spend money in that way, there is no reason why this residence should be built.

In regard to compulsory savings in connection with income tax, I am pleased that this has been brought in, but I believe that when the resolutions come before the committee of ways and means there will have to be many changes and clarifications in regard to this provision. I have here a letter from a real estate man, in which he says:

There is a point in the new budget under the compulsory savings plan which permits deductions up to a certain point when principal repayments are made under a registered mortgage. This seems clear enough.

However the budget has not apparently dealt with the payments of principal by purchasers of houses purchased under agreement of sale. This of course also includes those buying houses under the National Housing Act.

I have been to see one of the officials of our local income tax department, and they, too, are in doubt as to the interpretation of this item.

It would seem to me unfair and discriminatory to acknowledge the reduction of principal in the case of a registered mortgage, and to ignore the reduction of principal in the case of a purchase made under an agreement of sale. This latter reduction would affect far more workingmen than those reducing principal under a registered mortgage.

Then, under this compulsory savings tax, if a man wants deductions for his mortgage payments, his insurance or anything else, he has first to pay that amount to the government and then put in an application for refund, which may take months. That man would not only have to pay to the government but have to pay perhaps to the loan company also, a double payment. These people cannot afford that. Therefore the government should have some plan whereby cases like that could be checked monthly, so that there would be no hardship on the taxpayer. Take a doctor's account or a hospital bill for an operation; it might come to $200, which might be the full amount that the man is compelled to save by this new tax. When he pays that account and produces that bill, automatically that should be taken off and should be allowed to extend over the full year, so that he would have nothing else to pay to the government. The receipt from the hospital or the doctor should be enough to cover the whole compulsory saving.

In connection with this—and I give this to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) before he leaves the chamber—if the national revenue department would use some common sense and forget the red tape, I know perfectly well that this can be carried out, but you have to forget the red tape and use your brains, and then everything will be perfect.

In regard to insurance premiums, according to the budget they are to be allowed only on insurance already in effect. But what about a young couple getting married now or next week or next year? The young man will feel that he is not doing his duty unless he takes out life insurance to protect his wife and future family. Therefore I believe that insurance policies should be included even if they are taken out after this date. The Minister of Finance could draw up a schedule to take care of this, especially in the case of a small wage-earner, with an income of, say $2,000 and under, or $3,000 and under. Insurance policies of $1,000 or $2,000 that he might be allowed to take out should be included in this plan.

The same thing should be done with regard to victory bond purchases. There are many men and women in factories buying victory bonds by payments out of their wages to the company for which they work. Those payments also should be taken from this compulsory saving. Otherwise they will have to lose their victory bonds; there is nothing else for it. I have one example of a man who has a salary of $2,000 a year; he pays $22 a month to the insurance company, $20 a month on the principal of a mortgage and, on top of that $40 rent. That makes $82 a month, or $984 a year. In addition to that, he will have to pay this new income tax, $215, of which $108 is compulsory saving. That makes $1,199 a year that this man has to lay out in fixed charges. If the government on top of that says he must pay his compulsory savings to the income tax branch at the end of the year, it will mean $1,307 he will have to lay out, leaving him only $693 to feed and clothe his family and for doctors, education, church, et cetera. That is for a man with a wife and two children. I believe men in that class should have a little better break, perhaps a little lower tax and a little better on the saving. This man would have less than $2 a day to keep his family, to build decent bodies on his children and put clothes on them. It cannot be done. If he is compelled to pay that amount, it will mean just so much extra work for the welfare societies and the children's aid societies.

This year these welfare societies are going to feel the effect of this tax very severely, because people who up to now have made donations will have to cut down such donations from now on. They will not be able to help it, much as they would like to continue to contribute. So I think the government should make some provisions for these charities. Only this morning I met one gentleman who told me what his income was, what his tax would be, and the amount of his donations to various societies last year. If this year he donates one-quarter of the amount he gave last year, he will have to dip into his capital, which is very small. The same situation applies right across Canada. Every day these societies are doing more work; they are overloaded now. They are doing a great deal of the work of the dependents' allowance boards, and making a good job of it, and with all these war babies their work has been increased tremendously.

Under the compulsory saving provision, these savings are not required to be deducted from the income of any person over sixty-five years of age, if that income is not in excess of $3,000. I believe that age limit should be reduced to sixty years, for many who reach sixty-five may never live to see sixty-six. For instance, I understand that in many municipalities female schoolteachers are retired at the age of sixty, and I also believe that in many businesses female workers are retired at the same age, so I believe this should be taken into account. In fact, I honestly believe that it will not be more than a few years until the Old Age Pensions Act is readjusted so that every man and woman in Canada over sixty years of age will receive not $20 a month but $40, which will not be charity but rather a refund on account of the taxes they have been paying all their lives.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Do not applaud yet, because I have something to say which may hurt. In Canada the railways issue thousands of passes each year. I do not see why those who travel on passes, other than for business, should not be required to pay the 15 per cent tax on transportation. The wives of members of this house travel on passes. There is no reason why they should not pay the tax. Only yesterday a railway man said to me, "I ride on this pass, and my wife rides on it, but Mrs. Jones next door, whose boy died in Thorold, had to pay a 15 per cent tax on the cost of her ticket, and she even had to borrow the money with which to buy the ticket." I believe that if this tax were collected on passes not used for business purposes, many dollars would be brought into the treasury, and it would act as a check on the number of passes being issued. I believe we should start right here in the House of Commons, because "what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander".

A few weeks ago I heard an announcement over the radio on behalf of some finance company, whose name I have forgotten. It went something like this: "Why worry about your income tax? Why not let us look after it?" I believe the minister should see to it that these finance companies are not permitted to advertise in this way, because they only encourage people to spend their money. There must be a day of reckoning, and when that day comes, the people have to pay through the nose.

In conclusion, let me say that on the night of June 23, after the minister had delivered his budget speech, I met him entering the elevator outside this chamber. I said, "It must have taken a great deal of courage to make that speech." I do not know whether or not the minister agreed with me, though he shook his head as though to say he did not; but again I congratulate the minister upon his courage, because I know the people of Canada will congratulate him. The people are willing to pay; but for goodness sake let this government give us the lead in saving.

Mr. G. A. McLEAN (Simcoe East): Almost all the speeches that have been delivered so far in this debate have dealt with the ways and means of raising money announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in his budget speech. I am not going to refer to those ways and means, but I should like to make a few remarks with regard to the expenditure of some of the money that is to be raised by the methods announced by the minister. The great bulk of that money is for war purposes. I am not going to have anything to say about that, but I should like to refer to that very much smaller portion of the money which is devoted to ordinary government expenditures that go on year after year.

War is a very wasteful business. War organizations are built up under conditions of great urgency. If sometimes the necessity of subordinating every other consideration to that of speed, in order to provide against a threat to our national existence, results in waste, there may be some grounds for excuse in connection with that waste but, no such grounds can be found for lack of the strictest care in the expenditure of money for ordinary government purposes. On the contrary, the fact that by these very proposals we are taxing people high and low, rich and poor, to a degree that we have never before contemplated; the fact that many of the citizens of our country have been or before the end of the war will be compelled to modify their standard of living very materially in order to meet our taxation demands, makes it imperative that the care which should be exercised at all times by those charged with the responsibility of spending public funds should be intensified fourfold in time of war.

In at least some departments of government I submit that this is not being done. I am not going to range over the whole field of government expenditure, of course, and I hope that I may not give any grounds for being accused of vague and ineffective generalizations, such as those with which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was charged, I think quite properly, by the Minister of Finance some six weeks ago, when the first supply bill was under discussion. In fact, I shall be painfully specific. I make one submission, and one only, based upon my obesrvations during six or seven years in this house. I submit that there is due; there is past due; and, in fact, there is long past due a drastic curtailment in the cost of government services here in Ottawa. I shall confine myself to still narrower limits; I shall confine myself to only a small branch of the service in Ottawa, namely, the legislation branch.

We are dealing with thousands of millions of dollars and I know I am running the danger of creating the impression that I am one of those men with a small mind who can deal only with small matters, who cannot see the large items, who can see only the petty things. It may be that some hon. members will be impatient and ask: When we are dealing with a budget of hundreds of millions of dollars, why spend time in discussing a comparatively small matter? My answer is that often there is a danger that in looking at the forest one is so blinded that he cannot see the trees. These vast sums of money that are being raised and spent are, in the last analysis, made up of small items. Any attempt to bring about economies will be absolutely futile if we remain up in the clouds, if we deal only with generalities and refuse to come down to earth to discuss the details of the smaller items which inevitably make up the larger totals. As I say, I am limiting myself to a small branch of the government service, but I do not say that what I have to say about this branch is not true in a greater or lesser degree of the other larger departments in Ottawa. What I have to say about this branch will occupy all the time I feel free to take.

In connection with this department there is costly and unnecessary duplication and indefensible overstaffing. There is lack of business-like organization. There exists the vicious practice of nepotism which is so destructive of morale, efficiency and cooperation. There is waste of material, waste of man-power and waste of woman-power. Some of the salaries paid are entirely out of proportion to the qualifications required and the nature of the services rendered. There is lack of supervision and direction which should correct these abuses. I shall give a few examples of duplication.

In the basement of this building there is a post office for the House of Commons equipped with a permanent staff. Close to it in the same basement there is another post office for the other house. On this floor there is the House of Commons reading room, staffed with permanent officials and supplied with magazines and newspapers; there is a duplicate for the other house, similarly staffed and equipped. In the basement there is a stationery distribution room for the House of Commons with a full-time staff; there is a duplicate for the other house. In the basement there is an accountant's office for the House of Commons with a full-time staff; there is a duplicate for the other house. If we want to get down to really small things, we find that there is a barber shop in the basement for this house and a duplicate for the other house. These are just a few of the costly and unnecessary duplications that come to my mind. It may be argued that these duplications are unavoidable, but I submit that even if they were unavoidable the cost of the services are unnecessarily expensive and some of the services cannot be justified at all.

Let me give an example in connection with the reading room. The House of Commons reading room is a most convenient luxury, but it is used very little. It is open only while the house is in session and is not open to the public at all. It is used by only a few members. Go into the reading room of the House of Commons and you will find a much larger number of the paid staff of the house there during working hours than you will members of parliament. This is just another evidence of my charge of overstaffing. The salaries paid to the staff amount to $8,780, and the cost of the magazines, periodicals and newspapers is $3,800. This item for the other house amounts to $2,500, which gives a total for the two reading rooms of over $15,000 a year. We have a magnificent parliamentary library with salaries paid amounting to about $55,000 a year. Can any hon. member defend the retention of the two reading rooms at a cost of $15,000 a year?

I am giving figures to be put on the record, some of which will probably be challenged. I do not guarantee that they are correct for to-day or yesterday or a month ago. It is not easy to keep these figures up to date. It may be said that such and such an officer has retired, that a certain position has not been filled, but my answer will be to turn to the estimates before the house and say that no such reductions are reflected in them.

The post offices are not under the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) as they ought to be; they are under the legislation branch. There has been some reduction in this particular service. About a year and a half ago protests were made about the staff of nineteen handling the mail for this house, and the staff was reduced by six. At the present time I believe there are eight permanent employees and five sessional employees, employed at a cost of between $19,000 and $20,000 a year. If these two post offices were amalgamated, put under the Postmaster General and handled in the efficient and economical way that post offices throughout the country are handled, I feel sure that this cost would be cut in two.

As I say, there is the stationery room for the House of Commons and another one for the Senate. Surely that is a stupid idea. The salary list for these two offices amounts to $11,256 a year. This is to pay a staff to handle the requisitioning, storing and distributing of stationery. The cost of stationery for the House of Commons is $35,000 a year; the same item for the Senate is $9,000, making a total, including salaries, of $55,000. This one branch needs looking into most carefully. In the stationery branch of the House of Commons there is an inventory of some $40,000, made up of articles numbering about 1,200. A large number of those articles ought not to be there at all. The waste in stationery is simply shocking.

I am sure hon. members are familiar with the wasteful attitude of the staff of this house in connection with stationery. This may seem a small item, but it is indicative of an attitude that must be corrected. These wasteful methods would not be tolerated in private business for one day, and they should not be tolerated here.

A fruitful source of waste is the lack of modern, businesslike organization in the branches. I realize that as soon as you try to correct this you will be confronted with traditional methods and attitudes that will be most difficult to change and correct. The very architecture of the buildings is an obstacle, but not an insuperable one.

I am sure members have noticed that there is on the part of a great many civil servants and officials a tendency to make their own office the centre of a distinct organization, with a secretary, a stenographer, a messenger and so on. I do not want to detract from the dignity or the prestige of any civil servant or of any official, but I suggest that that dignity be consistent with modern ideas of efficiency and economy.

Again, let me be quite definite. Let me give an example. One group of the offices of this house, of which there are many—and I will take the offices with whom the members are most familiar, the offices that are closest to this house—consists of that of the Speaker, the Deputy Speaker, the Clerk, the Assistant Clerk and the Sergeant-at-Arms. The functions of these officers are closely related, and any private organization having officers whose functions were similarly related would have their offices together. I doubt very much if in any private organization they would all have separate offices, but even if they did they would be grouped together and would have a common staff. But what have we here?

I am not suggesting for a moment that this is a condition which is only a present condition; it is a condition which my investigation into the records shows has gone on for thirty or forty years. Let us look at these offices. The staff of these five officers of the house consists or did consist last year or the year before—I do not know what they are at the present moment—of six secretaries, a stenographer, a steward and a messenger. The salary cost to the country was $22,600 a year. This does not include the sessional staff; it does not include assistance from the stenographers of the sessional staff or of the messengers of the sessional staff, who are available to these officers. These are the salaries of the staff which are paid all the year round to people whose duties are confined entirely or almost entirely to the offices of these officers of the house.

I could go on and give other examples in connection with other offices and groups of offices scattered under this roof.

I want to say just a word or two about the sessional staff of stenographers. I have only time to touch on a very few items which come to my mind. We have a staff of sessional stenographers numbering 129. That staff was reduced this year by about thirteen. There is a great lack of supervision and direction of the work of that staff. A great many of these stenographers, as members know very well, work very hard and efficiently. Some of them do the work of three or four or five members. But I will assert without fear of contradiction that there is extreme unfairness in connection with the distribution of the work. If that work were properly and fairly distributed, we could cut out one-third of these stenographers, with a saving of thousands of dollars to the country, and with a great deal better feeling among members of the staff.

Take the messengers. I do not suggest for one moment that any efficient organization should not have a sufficient number of messengers to facilitate its work; but let me point out that while we are sitting here during the session there are employed on the messenger staff, in temporary or permanent capacities, forty-eight employees and, when the house adjourns, thirty remain on the staff all through the year. The total cost of this messenger service is $64,500 a year. Is it not a fact that either one of two things is true: Either half of these men are sitting down doing nothing but drawing their pay, or else they are engaged in work for which we have no right to ask the public to pay. I think a great many members will say that both these things are true.

I said there was nepotism. In Ontario, if one member of a family is engaged in the service of the province, no other member of that family is permitted to be engaged in the provincial service. I do not suggest for one moment that we should go to anything like that length, but I do say that nepotism is a pernicious system. It is destructive of cooperation; it is destructive of efficiency, and no officer, high or low, should be permitted to have in his office under him a son or daughter or brother or sister. But that is practised here, and it should end and end at once.

I mentioned something about salaries but I cannot take the time to deal with that at any length. When I speak of salaries I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not one of those who object to high salaries. We have some men in the employ of the government who are paid what would be considered high salaries, but in my estimation those men would be cheap if they were paid twice the amount. We have members of the cabinet who, in my opinion, would be cheap if we paid twice what we are paying them. But if members will closely examine the salaries that are paid here in Ottawa and consider the qualifications required and the services rendered, they will find some very grave defects.

I have this further to say about salaries. I am making what may be considered a reckless statement but I am making it deliberately. There are in our employ under this roof men whose salaries run between $3,000 and $4,000 a year whose work, measured by the performance of similarly qualified men in private industry or commerce, or in any well-ordered municipal office in our towns, spread over the working days of the year, would not amount to two hours' work a day, and some members have said to me that I would be nearer the mark if I said one hour a day. There was a time when there were positions that were called sinecures, and we sort of took them as a necessary evil, but in these days, Mr. Speaker, sinecures should be out, and out for good.

I suggest that in this one comparatively small department of which I am speaking, $150,000 a year would be a very, very conservative estimate of what could be saved if we exercised the same care in the supervision of the work of this branch that any member would exercise in his own private business.

I think the members will recognize that it is not a pleasant task that I have undertaken this afternoon. I do not like making this kind of speech. I am not fond of making speeches at all. I think this is the second speech I have made in six years, but I know from my conversation with a good many members that they feel just as keenly about this as I do. My practice has been, whenever I saw what I thought were abuses, not to air them on the floor, but first to go to the minister concerned, or preferably to the officer or official concerned, and in that practice I have had considerable success. I have followed the same, reasonable, decent procedure for the last two years in connection with this matter, with indifferent success. I am now bringing it to the attention of the house because I want the support of hon. members who feel the way I do; I want the support of hon. members who, perhaps, have not looked into these things as they might, in order to bring about a state of feeling whereby this blot on our government service can be corrected. I am not making an attack on the government, or, particularly, on this parliament.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is on the system.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): As the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) says, it is on the system which has been going on as long as I can find in the records. It is the system I want to see changed. This is not an attack on the administration. Certainly the last thing I would have in mind would be to criticize the Minister of Finance. There are things that should be changed, and to do so will require the support of hon. members of all parties. I must say—and I do so in all kindness—to my friends of the opposition, from whom I have received nothing but kindness, that the indifference with which they have viewed what has been going on, as their leader said the other day, under their very noses—though he was indefinite—fills me with amazement.

Do not misunderstand me. I do not say that it is not the duty of a government supporter to bring these matters to light. It is. But surely it is a duty of the opposition. What is the opposition for? They know these things have been going on. They were going on when my hon. friends opposite were in power. Some hon. members now in opposition filled cabinet positions, and one, Mr. Speaker, occupied the honourable position which you hold. I have waited for years; I have looked at members of the official opposition, business men who know what efficiency means in business and understand the necessity of it, some of them have sat in this house continuously for twenty years or more, and never once have I heard any one of them attack this waste and these abuses which have been going on for years and years.

I am a great believer in the system of a government and an opposition. But the successful working of that system presupposes an industrious and alert opposition. We have heard a great deal about complacency, lack of leadership. I think we have had complacency deep and slumberous for years, complacency on the part of the opposition in refusing to say a word about these abuses.

I do not want to say anything unkind. I know that the leader of the opposition is filling a difficult position. Perhaps it is rather unfortunate that he does not happen to be the gentleman who, if and when his party comes into power, will place men in cabinet positions, because that would give him a little more disciplinary power; he would be able to issue orders to his followers and put them to work at this, that and the other task which he knows very well should be done and is not being done.

As for my hon. friends further to the left, I have heard them on one or two occasions single out some salary of $15,000 or $20,000 or $30,000 for a very ineffective attack, without giving grounds for it. But we have heard nothing from them on this matter, perhaps because of that magic system by which they are able to pull money out of the blue like rabbits out of a hat; apparently it does not matter much to them what is spent. But my hon. friends of the official opposition do not hold these views; they have not been bewitched by the oratory of our hon. friends to the far left. Like myself, they realize that when the government imposes taxation, in the last resort the money is paid for by the sweat of the brow of people high and low throughout the country, or else out of savings which have been earned by the sweat of their brow and have been accumulated by habits of frugality and thrift.

My only motive in speaking to my opposition friends is that I want their support. I want the support of all hon. members, and I believe that nobody will be more pleased to have it than the man who to-day occupies the position of Minister of Finance. I feel the more free to speak as I have done because I have the utmost confidence that in the Minister of Finance we have a man who feels keenly about these matters, perhaps more keenly than any other man in the house, and I do not think for one moment that he will resent the criticisms and suggestions I have made this afternoon. Probably no man in many years has risen so rapidly as he has in the estimation of the people as a man of courage, a man who has his feet on the ground and who is doing a wonderful job in the Department of Finance; and it is in order to help him in the good work he is doing that I am bringing these matters before the house.

I do not want it to be supposed that I am making an attack on the civil service. I am not. I am simply trying to remove what they know much better than I do is an impediment to them in their progress to the highest and best in the profession to which they have given their lives. I want to pay tribute to our civil service. I am never done telling service clubs and others whom I address that the civil service of Canada is second to none. I know the Minister of Finance and other ministers have men of the very highest ability and devotion to duty in their departments. Many of them are working long hours and are not limiting themselves to their ordinary duties, but are giving themselves unstintedly to war work. We have a civil service of which we may be proud. It is no reflection on and no criticism of them that we remove the deadwood that is clogging their progress and sapping the strength of the organization to which they belong. "Deadwood" is the word. You know the effect of deadwood on an otherwise healthy tree. If some tree like an elm has a branch which dies, it may remain for many years and it does not hurt the tree a bit. But let a branch of a hard maple die; in a very short time it becomes dozy and forms a channel through which rain and frost and heat and insects and fungi enter the trunk, the heart of that tree; rot sets in at the heart, and the tree becomes weakened and dies. But the careful husbandman, as soon as that branch dies, will cut it off clean and close to the trunk, so that the healing processes of the inner bark will very quickly spread a living layer of clean, fresh wood over that wound, until hardly a scar is left. That is all I am asking to be done with the civil service.

I was discussing a very small branch of the service, namely the legislation branch; but I am not suggesting for a minute that the conditions I have described do not apply to other and much larger departments, such as public works, agriculture, the post office, mines and resources, national revenue, the Department of the Secretary of State and so on, with their hundreds of offices and their thousands upon thousands of employees. I am not going to make any categorical statements regarding them, because I have not here any definite information to substantiate anything I may say. But if we were to go through these departments and examine them as we examined this one, I doubt whether any hon. member would be so optimistic as to think that the conditions I have described here do not obtain in greater or lesser degree throughout these departments.

Now is the time when we ought to correct this situation. While we were paying millions of dollars in unemployment money, it might have been said that the time was not opportune to turn people out of their jobs; but to-day we are building up organizations with thousands of employees, and if there is overstaffing and waste of man-power and woman-power, the natural thing to do is to work these people into these other organizations that are being built up temporarily. Now is the psychological time to do so. As I have said, these things are hard to correct, but I am quite sure that the civil service generally is not of a state of mind different from that of the rest of the people, and by taking steps to bring about this reform now I am sure we would find them responsive and ready to give such cooperation as would be impossible at any other time.

My time is up. I was going to make some suggestions as to how we ought to set about correcting the situation. Corrected it ought to be, and corrected without delay. My time will not permit me to make these suggestions, but I will say this. I hope no one thinks I would suggest something that was suggested some years ago, that in order to cut down overstaffing we should employ another large highly paid staff of experts, civil servants, to go through these departments and tell us what ought to be done. I throw out this hint, that if there are not among the private members of the house men of business experience, men with a sense of responsibility to the taxpayers in their ridings, men with ability who could be of assistance in this work, then our people have picked the wrong persons to represent them as members of parliament.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): We have all listened with interest to the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean). He spoke about small things, but in the aggregate they are not unimportant. I do not suppose that any member of this house, particularly if he comes here with a background similar to mine and maybe also that of the hon. member, being brought up in the hard way, taught to turn a copper over two or three times before we decided to spend it, will fail to appreciate what the hon. member has said. Personally I hate to throw away a sheet of paper unless both sides of it have been used. The condition to which the hon. member has referred can be rectified, but it can be rectified only if members are prepared to allow the administration to undertake the work without bringing pressure to bear when some individual is interfered with. This is the first thing that has to be recognized, and in the last analysis improvement in the matters will depend upon the members of the house. The situation here is a tradition that has developed out of the beginnings of our parliamentary institutions, when parliament was considered to be the best club in the country, a place where gentlemen met to talk over the affairs of the nation and not to do anything much in particular, with a staff of servants to wait on them. That day is past. Parliament to-day is a huge administrative establishment, and it should be run on that basis.

In saying a few words on the budget, I wish first, in common with members who have already spoken, to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his performance of a very difficult task. I hope the minister will not take any criticism I make as indicating a lack of appreciation of the time, the thought or the study he has put into the preparation of the budget. I hope he will not take any criticism I make as a doubting of his sincerity in wishing to deal equitably with all concerned.

This is of necessity a war-time budget. The minister was dealing with Canadian conditions as affected by our war activities. The economic consequences of the war are more keenly realized now than they were in 1940 or 1941. The minister had, therefore, two main tasks before him in preparing his budget: first, to find money to meet the costs of the war, and, second, to prevent prices from rising by taking money out of the pockets of consumers about as fast as it gets there. Whether we like it or not, this last point has to be recognized, and the importance of it can be realized from the answer to a question in the house on June 17. The question was asked by the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Kirk) as to what amount of money was in circulation in Canada as at March 31 for each of the years from 1929 to 1942, both inclusive, and what was the amount of the same, per capita, during each of the above-mentioned periods. This can be found at page 3407 of Hansard. I will not repeat all the figures given. I will give them for two or three years. At March 31, 1929, the amount of money in circulation was a little over $222,000,000, and the per capita amount of circulating media in the hands of the public was $22.21. At the depth of the depression, March 31, 1932, the total amount of circulating media in the hands of the public was a little over $176,000,000, and the per capita amount was $16.77. At March 31, 1939, the total amount of circulating media in the hands of the public was almost $236,000,000, and the per capita amount was $20.85. This was the last pre-war month given in the statement. On March 31, 1942, the total amount of circulating media in the hands of the public was almost $523,000,000, with a per capita circulation of $45.79. During the depression there is no doubt there was a shortage of money in circulation as compared with the goods available. I shall not go into the reasons for that now; they are obvious. The money that has now come into circulation came in because of increased production. War production, that is the production of war goods, is increasing, and the production of consumers' goods is decreasing. In view of this condition, it is the height of folly to suggest that the production of consumers' goods can be increased so as to raise the over-all living standards of the people during the war. Later I will come to a point which I think should be made in this connection.

I believe, however, there is a third task which the minister did not undertake. Possibly it does not come altogether within his department; it may come under a number of departments, but the financial planning for it would have to be done by the Department of Finance. This third task would be planning to utilize the services of everyone in essential production of either war or ordinary consumers' goods, with only luxury production excluded.

There are three points in the budget which I wish to discuss briefly. The first has to do with the effect of the increase in the income tax on the lower and middle incomes. This was mentioned by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) when he spoke on Monday. He pointed out the enormous increase in these taxes over last year, and that the percentage of increase decreases as the income goes up. I have tables showing how the tax affects an income of $2,400 in a family consisting of a man and wife and two children, also how it affects a married couple with children numbering one to eight. For a married man with a wife and two children and an income of $2,400, the tax as proposed in the present budget, the normal tax, that is at 7 per cent, would be $168, less allowance for two dependents at $56, making $112. The graduated tax on an income of $2,400 less $660 would leave $1,740 to be taxed. The tax on that would be:

First $500 at 30 per cent		$150 00
Second $500 at 33 per cent		165 00
Balance $740 at 37 per cent		273 80
		$588 80
Less allowance for the wife	$150
Allowance for 2 dependents	160
		310 00

To which would be added $112 of defence tax, making total tax $390.80 of which the compulsory saving would amount to $195.40, or half the total tax.

The same tax applied with the same deductions as we had last year would make the total tax only $232, with compulsory saving of $116.

What I want to point out is that even if the exemptions for dependents had been reduced to $300 in the present budget, a family in this income range would pay $95 more than was paid last year.

If we take an income of $4,000—I am not making any objection to it as it affects single persons or married persons without children or even married persons with one dependent—it will be noted that as the number of children increases, the per capita residue for each dependent becomes less; so that when we reach persons with five children the residue is only $453.60 each, and when we reach eight children it is only $349.96 each.

These tables were prepared very carefully, and if the house does not object I should like to put them on Hansard:

What I want to point out is that we should not penalize people for raising a family. Walter Nash, in an address made in Ottawa recently, told us of the mothers' allowances act in New Zealand, which has been in effect I think since the Labour party came into office, although I am not sure of that, and which provides that if the family income falls below a certain amount, the state pays directly to the mother a stated amount per child. Mr. Nash said that because of that provision the birth rate in New Zealand had increased by some four points since the time the legislation came into effect.

As I said before, I am not complaining about the effect of the income tax on single persons or married persons without children, or even married persons with one child, but we should be careful not to allow the income tax to reduce family incomes unduly. I have heard statements in the house on occasions that corporations might have to draw on their capital. If the family income is unduly reduced, the family also may be compelled to draw on its capital, and its capital is the health of the family. I should like to impress that point upon the minister. There is also the fact that it costs more to keep children at certain ages, particularly when they are fourteen, fifteen and sixteen, when they are going to high school or perhaps to university. Sometimes it becomes very difficult to keep children at school because the parents cannot give them any spending money, which I think members will agree is not a good thing.

There is something else in the budget I should like to bring to the attention of the house. Section 13 of the Income War Tax Act provides for the taxation of the undistributed profits of corporations in the hands of the shareholders or set aside for the shareholders. I do not know whether this section of the act is being applied; my impression is that it is not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not very much. I can remember one case in which it was applied, but that is about all.

Mr. MacINNIS: In any event I believe the minister should take into consideration the freezing of these surpluses as of August 31, 1939, or some other date, and that all increases since that time be taxed as personal income.

I wish to commend the minister for having introduced the principle of deducting the income tax at the source. I believe this will make it much easier for persons with small incomes, who because of necessity live very close to the limit of their incomes, so that at the end of the year there is very little, if anything, set aside to take care of the payment of a lump sum. I would suggest also that some method be found to provide that too many deductions are not made from the pay envelope at the same time. Because of unemployment insurance contributions and other contributions, a great many deductions are made from the pay envelopes of the workers these days. Those who recall the trouble at Arvida last year will remember that one cause of that trouble was the deductions which were made on a certain date, without the employees having been notified that such deductions were to be made.

In this regard I would suggest to the minister that the pressure and coercion in connection with the buying of war savings certificates should be discontinued, particularly in the case of persons receiving low incomes. In this connection I have in my hand letters which passed between an employer and an employee, which reveal a situation that in my opinion is nothing less than scandalous. We have heard in this house some strong opposition to the conscription of wealth. I am going to read something that will show conscription of wealth with a vengeance; compulsory conscription of wealth, as applied to a wage-earner. First, I have a letter signed by the general manager of the Canadian Western Lumber Company, Limited, Fraser Mills, British Columbia. I imagine this was a form letter sent to all the employees of that company, since the name of the employee and his clock number are typed in, while the rest of the letter is a carbon copy. I am not going to read the whole letter; this is the important paragraph:

> The minister—

That is, the Minister of Finance.

> —has issued instructions to all employers that they must contact each employee personally, and, as far as possible insist on their subscribing to this scheme, but I am quite sure you do not want any undue pressure made in order to have you join in a voluntary way.

Can anyone harmonize "undue pressure" or pressure of any kind with voluntary action? Well, one employee wrote back to say that he was not buying war savings certificates, and later on I will give the house his reason. He was sent another letter, and he replied once more saying that he was not going to buy them. Finally, on April 25, 1942, this letter was addressed to the employee, Mr. T. Hebert, clock No. 1698.

> Fraser Mills, B.C.
> Dear Sir,
> I have for acknowledgment your letter of April 20 in further reference to war savings certificates.
> For your information, you are the only employee of this company who is not now buying these certificates.

Seemingly, the "undue pressure" for voluntary participation worked satisfactorily.

> We have now received instructions from the president of the company that owing to the Minister of Finance having made it abundantly clear that it is the duty of employers to see that all employees subscribe, we are obliged to see that these instructions are carried out.

Accordingly, this will be your final chance to immediately commence subscribing to the war savings scheme, and if you are not prepared to do so, then we have no alternative but to ask you to resign from our employment.

Very truly yours,
Canadian Western Lumber Company.

That is signed by James R. Murray, assistant manager. I will not read the whole of the letter written by the employee in reply, but it included these words:

The above-mentioned received to-day. In reply I beg to inform you that I intend to carry on as I have been doing, by giving financial assistance in the war efforts as I see fit best. . . .

But as for me to buy war savings certificates, not for a long time to come, because it would be capitalizing on the lives of the boys in the army, including my own boy. . . .

From the tone of your letter above-mentioned, it sounds to me as if Hitler had dictated the letter, at least it's tactics that was used by his storm troopers for nazi propaganda, and I always understood that the war was for the purpose of destroying such principle of interference in the private lives of the citizens of the country. Apparently it is being applied in this country.

Unless I hear from you before five p.m., April 30, 1942, I will punch the clock for the last time, after seventeen years, four months and five days of continuous service. . . .

This man has the courage of his convictions, for he adds:

Please have my pay cheque ready for me at that time.

I wrote this man asking for particulars in regard to his economic condition, his family affairs and so on. He wrote me a fairly complete reply, from which I will read just one paragraph:

In case of the possibility of my reinstatement to my former position, I wish to make this point clear for you in case it might come up in the discussions. As I left the job for the principle of freedom of action, I will go back on the same job when the imposition in dispute is lifted, as I have handled that job for seventeen years, four months and five days. I still can do it again. . . .

You can coerce people who are not much good, people without spirit; but it is the man who will not follow the crowd, the man with some spirit, who has to take the rap. I think coercion in this connection should stop.

I mentioned conscription of wealth, and I should like to say a word or two about that. Until this budget came down, evidently no one knew what conscription of wealth was, but the moment it came down they recognized what they had not known immediately. This budget is not conscription of wealth as we understand that term. I do not think I can do better than to read to the house some paragraphs from a speech made by Sir Richard Acland, an outstanding Liberal in the British House of Commons. Speaking on the address in reply to the speech from the throne on November 12, 1941, he said:

We are to have a debate on production. I wonder whether in that debate anybody will mention the root cause of the difficulty. The root cause does not lie in ministerial incompetence, or in absenteeism, or in managerial inefficiency, or in the overlapping of departments, or anything of that kind. It lies in the fact that you are trying to get the maximum production of the whole, through the instrumentality of men who must have one eye resting on the post-war capital value of the particular part which they control. I want to keep a sense of proportion. I am not for one moment supporting those exaggerated statements which hold up every shareholder as being a conscious and deliberate saboteur of the war effort for his own individual cash benefit. Of course not. But there is an association of ideas in the minds of those who take for granted that the old system will go on after the war which leads to a conflict of interest altogether too great to be tolerated throughout a long war. It may not matter if there is to be a collapse of Germany in twelve months, but it does matter in a long war.

Let hon. members think of these points. It is in our interest to postpone every postponable repair; it is in the interests of the owners to get every repair done and have it charged up to the excess profits tax. It is in our interest to work the good seams in the coal mines now; it is in the owners' interests to postpone work on the good seams until after the war. It is in our interest to share trade secrets; it is in the owners' interests to preserve them. It is in our interest to concentrate output in every factory on one or few products; it is in their interests to keep the factory flexible by making as many different products as possible. It is in our interest that skilled men should spend part of their time teaching their skill to unskilled men; it is in the owners' interests that skilled men should be kept on direct production all the time. It is in our interest to save paper by cutting down advertising; it is in their interests to spend money which belongs to us—because otherwise it would go in excess profits tax—in advertising things like aeroplane parts.

That is what we consider as conscription of wealth. The government of this country should direct, for the purpose of winning the war, the resources of the country without interference from private owners.

About a week ago when I was absent from the house—I think I have lost two days since the session began, and that was one of them—mention was made of the Japanese evacuation from the coastal area. The only reason why I mention this matter now is that I would have spoken at that time had I been here. Possibly before the session ends, although I am not hoping for it, I may have occasion to differ from and disagree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell). Therefore I want to say now that I think his department has handled a most difficult job in an efficient manner. The removal of the Japanese is one of the biggest war jobs that any department has had to handle since the war began. We uprooted and removed a population of nearly 25,000 people. Someone referred to it in a letter to me as the "expulsion of the Acadians". The removal of these people began in a strained atmosphere with a population that was almost hysterical, sniping at those carrying out the operation.

The point that should be remembered is that a great many of these people are Canadian citizens no matter what the colour of their skins may be, and they are entitled to the treatment that would be accorded to a Canadian citizen whose skin is white. We should also keep in mind that when the war is over, we shall have to continue to live with these people, as we shall have to continue to live with our enemy nations unless we are going to be continually at war. This is not a British Columbia problem alone. The people of the other provinces should have recognized this as a national problem and been more cooperative. They are coming somewhat to their senses, and I hope the matter will be adjusted from now on.

I should like to draw attention to the unreasonable lengths the Canadian people have gone in their treatment of Canadian-born persons of Japanese origin. I have in my hand copies of two letters that were given to me by a young Canadian of Japanese origin who had made application for admission to the bar of Nova Scotia, which application was refused. I should like to put these two letters on the record. As I say, he was refused admission to the bar, and then he tried to get into the Canadian army. The military authorities would not tell him either that he was accepted or that they would not take him. His application has been in for months, and I do not know yet whether he has been informed as to acceptance or rejection.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is he Canadian-born?

Mr. MacINNIS: Canadian-born. The first letter is signed by Vincent C. MacDonald, dean of the faculty of law, Dalhousie university, and it reads:

To whom it may concern:

This is to certify that according to our records Mr. George T. Tamaki was born in New Westminster, B.C., and was awarded the degree of Bachelor of Arts with honours in economics and political science by the university of British Columbia in 1938. Mr. Tamaki graduated from this university with the degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1941. He led the classes of his first year and also of his third year and in his third year was awarded the Sir Joseph Chisholm essay prize.

I regard Mr. Tamaki as a very able and industrious student of wide interests, and as a young man of excellent character.

Vincent C. MacDonald,
Dean.

That letter is dated April 10, 1942. The next letter which bears the same date, is from the president of the Nova Scotia barristers' society, and reads:

George Tamaki, Esquire,
Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Dear Mr. Tamaki:

With reference to your application for admission to the bar of Nova Scotia, I wish to advise you that the matter has been very carefully considered at three different meetings of the council of the Nova Scotia barristers' society. Finally, a decision was arrived at yesterday. This decision was that it would be unwise for you to be presented to the court for admission at the present time. And I was, as the one who should present you to the bar of the court, instructed accordingly.

I may say that no member of the council had anything to say against you personally. It is a matter of deep regret that the international situation is such that it should be deemed advisable to reach the decision arrived at by the council.

You will be free to make application again when conditions have changed.

What has the international situation to do with a loyal Canadian citizen born and educated in Canada—that is, if he is dealing with reasonable people, people who have the least spark of British traditions in their makeup?

I see, Mr. Speaker, that my time is up, and I will close by joining in the sentiment expressed by the leader of this group yesterday in speaking on the anniversary of confederation. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked the government to take the house and the members into its confidence and let us know, not what it may do, but what its actual plans are. When we know these plans I am satisfied that the members of this house will be willing to cooperate as, in fact, we have cooperated with the government ever since the war began.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. ROWE: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Under section 35 of the standing orders of the house, I request that you give the floor to the hon. member for Gaspé who has just risen for the fourth time to address the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, does your honour not think...

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I will call on his honour the Speaker to rule on the point of order.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Speaker, may I ask that you give a decision on the point of order raised?

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull) (acting Speaker): (Translation): If I may be permitted to do so, I shall ask the Speaker to take the chair and render his decision.

And Mr. Speaker having taken the chair:

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed that there is some misunderstanding with regard to who has the floor. The Acting Speaker has informed me that he saw the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), and therefore, I would ask him to proceed.

Hon. W. E. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, (Mr. Ilsley) has presented to parliament a budget more extensive in scope than any other budget that has ever been presented to this house. This is necessitated by the grave and difficult times through which we are passing. I am sure it will bring a realization to the people of this dominion of the magnitude of the task that lies ahead and the gravity of the crisis in which we find ourselves. Reference was made to that by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and indeed every day we receive news of ever-increasing gravity which should make us all ready to shoulder the burdens and sacrifices and obligations involved in this budget. But I do feel, Mr. Speaker, that as the people of Canada accept the tremendous burdens which this budget imposes, they should have full confidence that the vast machinery of government which we are now creating will be our servant instead of our master; for otherwise the morale necessary to achieve victory will not be sustained.

In that event I am sure we can make a total war effort in this country and meet all the obligations which this budget imposes, though sometimes it seems that it will take all the vast resources of this dominion, of the factory, of the farm and every other productive facility, to meet the great challenge that is now ours. It is true that the effort we shall make will not actually consume all this tremendous store of wealth, but this budget and the other necessary measures that will be brought down to provide the money required will encumber the vast resources of this country and place an open-end mortgage upon them, the extent of which can scarcely be appreciated yet, and the maturity of which is indeed unknown. It is not a mortgage on any particular government, but a mortgage on the Canadian people, that we must assume. A gigantic task lies before us.

Before dealing briefly with the ways and means proposed in this budget for raising the amount of money required, I feel we must consider the purposes for which we are raising the money, and that is the maintenance of the productive capacity of this dominion. In that connection I wish to refer to one particular phase of production which I think is in jeopardy at the present time, namely, our agricultural production. It is not in any spirit of pleading for a particular class of people, or of emphasizing equality of service and sacrifice, that I say that the farmer in this country has been the one who has been more or less forgotten. It is most essential, viewing the broad picture, that we have a planned economy and that we maintain our productive capacity as a vital necessity for the war.

Some time ago, Mr. Speaker, I advocated in this house that we should establish a food production committee for farm products. It is true that we have many special committees at work now, but I have long felt that we should establish a food production committee, representative of producers from all the different parts of this dominion and of consumers as well, to meet the challenge that is flung to-day at the great basic industry of agriculture. I would again urge upon the government that even at this late day they give careful consideration to the establishment of such a food production committee. No longer can we leave the agricultural economy of this dominion in a haphazard condition. It must be organized for the future and planned now, if we are to meet the requirements of the war and what will follow the war.

I do not believe that we shall cope successfully with this important aspect of our war effort by the hand-to-mouth policy which has been followed thus far. It seems to be a month-to-month policy to face a year-to-year war obligation. We have our own troops to feed; we shall have to send much more food to Britain as the years pass. We have been told to-day that we are facing a long war, and there is not one of us who is now so optimistic as to believe that victory can be won in a short time. We must at once do some long-range planning. We must organize the agricultural economy of this dominion on a basis which will create more certainty and less uncertainty for the producer. If I were to apply the term "equality of sacrifice" to any one class, as working harder than another, I know there is not an hon. member within sound of my voice who knows anything about the farming communities of this dominion, whether i Quebec or Ontario or the west, but will agre that no class of our people is struggling hard and enduring more difficulty, so far as securin help is concerned, than the farmers. The have to compete against the higher price which are offered for labour in manufacturin plants—all essential, it is true, to our effort But I do feel that the government must give careful consideration to the position in which the farmer finds himself to-day. I know many farmers who are paying at least twice as much for hired help as they paid prior to the war.

It is true that the prices of some of the commodities the farmers are selling have risen to some extent. I am not pleading that the farmer should make a lot of money out of the war. Neither is he. He is waiting, he is willing, he is desirous of giving his war service at home, as his boys are giving them overseas. He is not asking for a large profit, but merely for the assurance of some security, for the opportunity—which I submit he has not now —to make both ends meet. It is all very well to say that he should carry on with production from the point of view of patriotism and loyalty. There is not a more loyal and patriotic class of people than those who inhabit the open spaces of this country, and who by the nature of their toil have the time and opportunity to meditate upon the issues involved.

Very little consideration has been given to the position in which the farmers found themselves when this war began. We have seen no sign of a plan to rehabilitate the farmer after the period of low prices so that the needed production may be had when prices are somewhat higher. The farmer has been the victim of periods of deflation, and he is now to be the martyr of a period of inflation. In view of the fact that ceiling prices have been placed on the products he has to sell, without any ceiling on the cost of the labour he has to buy, is it any wonder he feels he is being asked to produce more for less?

Some may say that the ceiling is placed higher than the prices of some years ago. To my mind that is only an empty gesture, and is so understood by practically every farmer. He pays one hundred per cent more for his labour; he finds a ceiling price is put on the products he has for sale—and he is singled out in that respect. Not only that, but the ceiling is going lower, and promises to go yet lower and lower, as is the case at the present time with the price of beef.

I am not pleading the cause of the individual farmer who, as probably some have done, put $5,000 into a number of feeder cattle and is now likely to take a real trimming, and robably is in a difficult financial position ith the bank. I say I am not pleading for ndividual cases of this kind, although I know ome who are going to lose half the money they wn, because the farmer to a certain extent s a gambler. He is a gambler on the weather. f he buys five or six carloads of cattle, and has some pasture to put them on, he hopes that the selling price of his commodity will be more than the price he pays for it. But I am pleading for consideration by the government of the effect on our whole war effort, in respect of our production capacity; because when you fix a ceiling price on beef, and then lower it a cent in July, another cent in August, and a cent and a half in September, someone might figure out for me how a man who bought stocker cattle in March and April and May is going to make any money when he has to sell them in the fall.

I do not know who is advising the government. I know that the wartime prices and trade board, having fixed a ceiling, is reducing it month by month, making it possible for the government to place a ceiling and invite the packers to place the floor. There is no floor placed by the government on the price the farmer will take. I understand that the government contract price for beef to the government has been about 21½ cents, but we were warned that after July 13 it will not be more than 19¼ cents dressed; then it will be reduced to 18¼ cents; then to 17¼ cents; then to 16¼ cents. I know it has been said by no less an authority than the Minister of Finance that there is no fixed price on cattle; there is only a fixed price on beef. But the situation is more ridiculous than that. The government fixes a ceiling for the beef and the packer fixes a floor for the cattle, and there is no reason why he has to pay more than 7 cents, if he can buy them. When they are butchered eventually they will be sold I assume, at 3½ cents less than 19¼.

Mr. GARDINER: Why say 7 cents when he did pay 13?

Mr. ROWE: Because you have done nothing to prevent him from paying 7 cents if he can buy them at 7 cents. You have made it impossible for him to pay 13 cents, and you have so ordered things now that he must reduce the price to the farmer at least a couple of cents, and if he wants to reduce it more he can do so.

I say again that I am not pleading that the farmer should make more money. I am not even urging in this instance equality of sacrifice, though I think it would be a fair plea to make. I realize that the situation is grave. I realize what the government are endeavouring to do, but I do not agree with the methods they are employing. I say that they are unfair to the farmer and equally prejudicial to the war effort of this dominion, because no person can tell me—dozens have already told me the reverse—that this will improve agricultural production.

Mr. EVANS: On what basis would the hon. member set a floor on the price of cattle?

Mr. ROWE: I would say it was just as fair to set a floor on what the farmer has to sell as to set a ceiling on what the packer has to buy.

An hon. MEMBER: How would you place a ceiling on beef?

Mr. ROWE: The ceiling is now set, and the floor could be set as well. It will simply mean that, as regards the man who bought his cattle last spring, he will not buy any next spring, and he will sell cattle that are half-fattened now and take a loss of one cent a pound rather than endure a loss of two and a half cents or more. There will be thousands of pounds of beef that would otherwise have been produced this summer that will not be produced. I am not pleading for a reckless rise in prices. It is true we had a rise in prices in the last great war; but I am wondering, from the point of view of the war effort, whether the setting of a ceiling will help our war production when there will be thousands of starving people in Europe, when our troops will be wanting foodstuffs, and when our own people are doing without beef now in certain parts of the country. Imagine the pass we have come to when our own people are looking for beef and cannot buy it. That is the climax to the lopsided development of agriculture which we have had in this country for a number of years, and now we have this fantastic method that will definitely result in lower production. The people will be discouraged, and why not? The farmers are faced with a great many uncertainties at any time, but this uncertainty is the greatest with which any industry has had to cope. There is not an industry in Canada that has been told, "Your product will go down a cent a pound one month, a cent a pound the next month, and will keep on going down until next winter". High prices were maintained when the farmer was buying; low prices are imposed when he has to sell. The government should give careful consideration to these novel methods in connection with its agricultural policy, instead of looking for advice from men who are not practically engaged in agriculture.

We have eight boards. We have a book full of them. There is not one single practical farmer on any one of these boards; that is, any farmer who is actually dependent upon agriculture for his living. I am urging upon the government a policy that will meet this situation squarely, because we might as well face the facts, and the outstanding fact is that we are likely to be in this war for a long time. There are thousands of acres of land now lying idle in my own county and thousands lying idle in counties all around. There will be thousands of cattle turned on the market unless the government establishes a floor. The floor will be placed by the buyer at a point away lower than farmer's cost. What is being done now will put a damper on cattle feeding right across the dominion, and not only as regards grass-fed cattle. There will be fewer cattle fed next winter. The same principle applies all the way down the line.

I realize that the purpose is to avoid inflation. Someone will say that we must not allow runaway prices to control our commodities, because that will be the beginning of inflation. Again I urge the government to reconsider the whole matter and to take stock of the farmer's position. His farm was mortgaged when the war began, and he is now paying double and, in some instances, three times the price for his help which he was paying at that time. I know one farmer who is paying $1,000 to his man besides providing a house, a cow and a garden. He knows this is a high price; he knows it is two and a half times what he paid the man before, but he had no alternative except closing his gate. He says, "I cannot make money, but with my boys overseas I feel that I owe it to my country to keep the farm functioning and I cannot do it myself".

Members of this house are receiving letters from men working from four o'clock in the morning until twelve at night, struggling with large dairy herds, ploughing hard and difficult summerfallows, and still they are behind. Indeed, many of them will be unable to get their wheat in because of a shortage of labour. If these men want to continue operating, they have to pay wages commensurate with the competitive prices offered by industry. I have made the statement before, and I repeat it now, that even with the high prices that farmers are now paying for labour, they are not as high as industry can and does pay under present union wage scales. There is not, with present prices, a single farm commodity that would give the farmer a higher return than would represent a reasonable profit on his investment, maintaining the wage scale he has to pay in competition with the market, interest on his investment and a reasonable wage for himself and his wife.

The reason for this novel type of policy is that we have not one practical farmer representing agriculture on any of the boards we have in Canada, either agriculture or any other. I maintain that the industry which we have talked about as the backbone of the dominion, the industry that is now depended upon to produce commodities that are, we are told, as important to the country as shells and guns, should be better represented. Hon. gentlemen told the farmers in their campaign of the importance of agriculture to the dominion and urged them to keep on producing. Well, if the farmer belongs to such an important class of citizens, it is passing strange that we cannot find among the hundreds of thousands of them one farmer who is fit, if not to represent some other important branch of our natural resources, at least his own industry. The steel producers have representatives on boards; the pulpwood people have their representatives; the timber men have their representatives, and so have the merchandisers, the drygoods men and the Canada Packers. It is high time that the farmer in Canada got a square deal, and a square deal not only in a period of crisis but normally.

Mr. EVANS: Is not Mr. Taggart a representative of agriculture?

Mr. ROWE: He is an ex-minister of agriculture, but he is not dependent on farming for his living—no more dependent upon it than the present Minister of Agriculture of Canada.

Mr. EVANS: He operates a big farm, though.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, but he has not been close to farmer problems in the last many years, as other men have been who have been dependent upon farming and upon farming alone.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are many farmers on advisory committees. I will get a list of them.

Mr. ROWE: Yes. I have a list of them, but they are not trusted on the main committee. They are on advisory committees, and their advice is not listened to. I could point to a thousand who are on advisory committees; you will meet them in the country later. The farmers are up in arms because of the novel policies that are carried out by men who are merely theorists without practical experience.

Mr. ILSLEY: No representative of any industry is on the wartime prices and trade board. They are all civil servants. They are not representing any industry.

[Mr. Rowe.]

Mr. ROWE: What about your dollar-a-year men? I have no objection to the dollar-a-year men. There are some excellent men—

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): You should have objection to dollar-a-year men.

Mr. ROWE: My hon. friend perhaps has had some experience with some of them which I have not had; but I believe, despite what the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix) says, that there are some able men who are giving their service to the country. Perhaps there are some who are not as good as might be desired. But I do not believe that these boards are any better off, so far as agriculture is concerned, for having civil servants on them. I do not know that a civil servant who has been receiving from $6,000 to $8,000 a year, while farmers have had mortgages on their farms in the last ten years, is as well qualified to meet the problem of production at the present time, as the man who is going through the sweat and toil of actual experience, without help, and who has had to put up with these difficult years. From the point of view of our war production it is high time the government listened to the men who know what it costs to produce a bushel of wheat or a pound of butter rather than say haphazardly when beef goes a little high, "we will put a price on it." Butter is now fixed at 35 cents a pound—

Mr. GARDINER: It is not fixed at that; that is the ceiling.

Mr. ROWE: Yes, and it can go as low as it likes.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a floor under it too.

An hon. MEMBER: Now the minister is going to bonus it.

Mr. GARDINER: No, I am not going to bonus it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was against bonuses in 1935.

Mr. GARDINER: There is a war on now. I was against a lot of things.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister had a political war on then.

Mr. GARDINER: My political wars have been about as successful as yours.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Probably more so.

Mr. ROWE: I do not intend to pursue the issue further. I warn the government, if they do not want the most important branch of our production to go down in dismal failure, to beware of fixing prices, while the farmer has rising costs which, by the very nature of the industry, the government cannot fix. I am not asking the government to fix the hired man's wages when he can get more money at the factory, but while the farmer has that uncertainty, do not impose on him another uncertainty which will cripple his ability to produce what is so essential to victory and equally important in peace.

The minister has a difficult task. Probably the most painful thing a minister has to do is to impose more taxes. I realize that the government must give some consideration with regard to taxing enterprises to the limit of what they can stand, or even "killing the goose that lays the golden egg". I am alarmed at the amount that is being spent for ordinary services, despite the war requirements. It is necessary that the nation be assured that the money is spent honestly. I am not charging that it is not, but the next thing to dishonest spending is reckless and extravagant spending for civilian purposes and services that we could do without at this time.

I give this suggestion to the minister in all sincerity as a solution of the problem of avoiding diminishing returns, namely that in the taxation of industry there might be some exemption made for post-war rehabilitation, research and so forth, so that they can be ready to give employment to the thousands of returned men after the war. Such action would go a long way to warn enabling industry to equip itself to compete in post-war markets and provide openings for our returned men, many of whom will be skilled mechanics.

I compliment the minister upon the compulsory savings feature. I mentioned it in the house some time ago. He did not think as much of it when I mentioned it as I did when he put it into effect. But I give the minister a further suggestion. I urge him to give further consideration to the exemption of life insurance premiums. I compliment him upon exempting the premiums of those who are of more mature years, but I urge and plead that he give consideration to the young men getting married now. In these days of uncertainty, surely if you, Mr. Speaker, and I are entitled to exemption, what about the boy who has not a home to live in, who cannot find one even if he could afford to pay for it, especially in Ottawa, and who takes to himself a wife? He has to pay all the income tax we have to pay and, if he wants to put $3,000 on his life in order to give his wife a little security, he does not get the same privilege as those who have carried insurance for years. I do not think we should be exempted if the same privilege is not extended to him. I think upon further consideration the minister will include that. I realize that he might be afraid of people taking out large policies, but that could be overcome by regulation, limiting the amount or limiting it to men of a certain age.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. gentleman think there would be any objection on the score that the government would be giving a tremendous impetus to the life insurance business by such a measure as he suggests?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be the result.

Mr. ROWE: I understand the minister perhaps being alarmed or feeling that he was doing almost a favour to the life insurance companies. But what sounder way is there for a man to save? What better security and what better provision can a man make in case anything should happen to him? Succession duties bring most of it back to the treasury anyway. It makes a liquid asset when a man dies, so that the estate does not have to sacrifice assets on account of market fluctuations, and I believe that any slight advantage it gives to the life insurance companies is not hurtful because if we strengthen the insurance companies of this dominion, we strengthen the economic and financial fabric of the dominion. I am not speaking for any insurance company; I have paid them more than they have paid me so far, fortunately. But if the government is going to restrict rigidly the income of individuals by taxation, it should go a long way also to encourage thrift among our people, and I do not know any way that it can better encourage thrift than by that process.

I also urge the minister to consider exempting, to the extent of the compulsory saving tax, war savings certificates that may be purchased during the year. I have had some experience with the sale of war savings certificates, and I know the minister knows, without admitting it, that thousands upon thousands of war savings certificate holders are selling them rapidly at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that true?

Mr. ROWE: Yes, and they are going to sell them. I do not criticize the minister for not including it—

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member does not mean selling them?

Mr. ROWE: Yes, selling them; thousands are selling them and refusing to buy more.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not transferable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member means cashing them in.

Mr. ILSLEY: Redeeming them.

Mr. ROWE: They have to cash them in. I urge the minister to give consideration to exempting war savings certificates. I think the result would be almost the same to the treasury. Deduction could be made at the source as now, thus avoiding a tremendous amount of additional detail work. The compulsory savings are repayable two years after the cessation of hostilities, whereas war savings certificates are redeemable after seven and a half years. The adoption of this suggestion would encourage people to buy even beyond the amount they now buy, and leave it as a voluntary operation.

I leave that thought with the minister. He may have the matter well in hand, but I would also suggest that in maintaining a balanced economy it is essential that every effort be made to place new bond issues outside the banks. In the first place it is an essential check on inflation, and in the second place the responsibility now on the banks is tremendous and will become greater as the war progresses. To meet this requirement, consideration should be given to issuing, in the future, securities that will be more attractive to non-banking lenders and less attractive to banks. I think that could be arranged. The minister might also give consideration to issuing registered bonds, non-negotiable for a period of time, to which commercial banks would be forbidden to subscribe or to hold for a stated period. These bonds could be kept on sale continuously, like war savings certificates, and subscriptions applied for could be fully allotted at all times. I am not going to enlarge on these suggestions; I had not intended to speak at this length. I believe, however, that an issue of this kind would check further expansion of bank deposits and would be particularly attractive to insurance companies and other investors outside the banks. I believe borrowing from bank credits as an alternative comes close to outright inflation, and as such is a hazardous course to follow unless it is considered absolutely necessary. Borrowing from the banks does not reflect itself in direct sacrifices by the people, with the result that huge expenditures are made without an actual realization by the people of the seriousness of the situation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me say that I am not at all discouraged or pessimistic about this country being able to meet the obligations placed upon it by the minister. We are going to win this war. Our national determination, together with our great resources, will enable us to carry forward our war effort if only we have full equality of sacrifice and opportunity for service. In that regard I again urge the government to be careful to see that the agricultural producers of this country are given a square deal, not only in fairness to these people themselves, but for the more important consideration of the victory that is ahead.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank you for the decision you rendered a short time ago, ruling that I should be allowed to speak at this time. I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon his presentation of the budget. One can well imagine the tremendous amount of work that had to be performed in carrying out his thankless task, which is to provide the money required by the government.

It is not my intention to undertake a survey of the budget. In that regard I feel as a man might who had reached the foot of the highest mountain in the Rockies. He would not feel like trying to put that mountain on his shoulders, to carry it to some place where the surface was more level. This matter is too important for me to try to cover everything, but I should like to add a few remarks to what has been said by those who have already spoken. I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) made an admirable speech, in which he brought out some of the weak points of this taxation scheme. In the course of his remarks he touched upon the income tax as it affects married people with children, and dealt with its effect upon those with more than three dependents. I shall not repeat all his arguments, Mr. Speaker, since I understand it is your desire that we should not speak at great length, but anyone looking over the speech of the hon. gentleman can see how he dealt with these measures of taxation. He had this to say, as reported at page 3793 of Hansard, with regard to large families:

> People cannot afford to have children. If Canada is to be a great nation in the future she must have greater population, and the most satisfactory way to achieve an increase in population is to encourage the raising of children steeped in Canadian tradition rather than through immigration of persons steeped in the traditions of other lands.

Surely that is a good principle. Moreover, I should like to point out that it is from these large families, which are ordinarily found in Quebec, where they have ten, twelve and fifteen children, we find as many as five or six brothers in the army. I could name, offhand, several families who have contributed several sons: the Guertins, the Lemieuxs, the Chenels, the Fourniers, the Reeders, the Pattersons and the Keaneys. So we realize the importance to the nation of large families such as these; and I do not think there is any fairness in taxing the father of ten or twelve children to within a few hundred dollars of the amount we tax a single man. I believe the government should look into this taxation scheme and see if greater fairness could not be achieved in connection with those of our people who are heads of large families, and who constitute more than one-half of our population, and the most important capital of a nation.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, when the house rose at six o'clock I was about to make a few comments on the speeches of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore). However, since I have agreed with the hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Raymond) to be as short as possible, I shall defer my remarks for the time being. Those speeches were truly Canadian and should prove an inspiration to the population of Canada. I should like to refer also to the speeches made yesterday, the 75th anniversary of confederation, by the leaders of the different groups. I think those speeches should also prove an inspiration to the whole of Canada and I hope they will do some good. I had intended to make a few remarks about the inequalities of the sugar rationing system, but I may have an opportunity to make them on the resolution stage. The importance of the budget has been stressed by the leader of the opposition pretty well in this phrase. The leader of the opposition generally speaks quite well when he gets away from the conscription of men for overseas. He said this, as reported at page 3789 of Hansard:

> Just imagine a total budget expenditure of almost four billions of dollars for this little nation of less than twelve million souls—more than $333 for every man, woman and child in Canada! What a task to raise by various means, this vast sum of money!

This matter has been so well stressed that it does not call for any comment from me. I wonder if there is going to be anything left out of these vast sums to provide for the equipment and the defence of our two coasts which are threatened by invasion? Half of it is destined for England, and a considerable proportion of the rest is to be used to equip, maintain and increase our armed forces overseas with volunteers and conscripts as well. There will not remain much for the defence of Canada, and to take care of the most imperious need in our national economy. I shall probably have further opportunity to discuss the defence of Canada on the committee stage of Bill No. 80.

I should like to say a few words in connection with the important problem of supplying oil for our own needs and the needs of our allies. I refer hon. members to the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene). He demonstrated our need for oil and the importance of the government discovering new sources. Although I have great esteem for the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe); I appreciate the great task he is doing, but I do not agree with him when he answered, as he did on June 8, a question put by me and also one put by the leader of the Social Credit group about the necessity of securing some oil. His answer was that the government had no tools or would not be doing any drilling to discover oil.

There is no reason why the government should not make an effort to discover new sources of oil. The supply of oil will have a bearing upon the survival of the allies. I think everyone will admit that oil is the most important factor in victory. The government had no tools to build ships and tanks or to make guns and many other articles, but government companies were formed and the same thing could be done here. It would appear that the allies are about to lose their last sources of oil in Iraq and Iran, so it is about time that something should be done. In 1941 Mr. Cottrelle, the oil controller, is reported by the newspapers to have said that there would not be one cent of government money spent in prospecting for oil as long as he was in that position. Where does that gentleman get his authority to control this house and the government? I do not think we should listen to him. We should take immediate steps to provide new sources of oil. For this reason, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe):

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following words substituted therefor:
> "It is expedient that proper measures be taken in order to secure new sources of oil from all possibilities offered by petroleum areas that Canada may have."

Mr. MAXIME RAYMOND (Beauharnois-Laprairie) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) recalled last Monday that the figures quoted by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the ministers of the various defence departments and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), established that our country, taking into account the size of its population, was furnishing a greater effort in this war than any other of the united nations. That is a statement we should do well to ponder when the Canadian people are being asked to make new sacrifices totally out of proportion with their means. Indeed the new budget calls for such an increase in taxation that a large number of families will be unable to meet their obligations; and if we compare it to the budgets of other allied countries, we must conclude that our war effort is increasing in a much greater degree than any other.

I demonstrated to the house last year, not without scandalizing a certain few, that the fiscal demands made on the Canadian taxpayer by the war were greater than those made on the English taxpayer. At the risk of scandalizing the same few, I now intend to show that the present budget further augments the Canadian taxpayer's burden to an extent not yet reached by the English taxpayer.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Ferland) quoted certain figures showing that the single man is more heavily burdened in England than in this country, but to arrive at such a conclusion he had to deduct from the Canadian tax the amount representing the minimum savings requirement, a deduction he omitted in the case of the English tax. The parallel he drew is thus fundamentally wrong and proves nothing. The figures I shall quote include those released by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Kingsley Wood, in his budget address of April 14 last and in the accompanying white book, as well as those furnished to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on June 23.

In order to determine the extent of the fiscal demands made upon us by the war both in England and in Canada, let us first examine the situation that obtained in the fiscal year which preceded the conflict, noting the sum total of the taxes levied in both countries in the year 1938-39 and comparing them with those of the following periods. I wish to place on Hansard, if I may be permitted to do so, a comparative table of national or federal taxes for the years 1938-39, 1939-40, 1940-41, 1941-42 and 1942-43.

TABLE OF NATIONAL OR FEDERAL TAXES

BRITAIN (in millions of £)					NATURE OF TAX	CANADA (in millions of $)
(1938-1939)	(1939-1940)	(1940-1941)	(1941-1942)	(1942-1943)		(1938-1939)	(1939-1940)	(1940-1941)	(1941-1942)	(1942-1943)
226	262	305	378	805	Customs	79	104	131	142	135
114	138	224	325		Excise	51	61	89	112	135
21	17	14	14	15	Stamps and other excise taxes	40	29	41	116	123
–	–	–	–	–	Exchange	–	–	62	101	95
399	460	600	845	991	Income tax (national defence tax for Canada and surtax for Britain included)	142	134	248	510	768
22	27	96	270	425	Excess profits tax (British national defence tax included)	–	–	24	135	440
Included in Excise tax					Sales tax	122	137	181	236	218
36	34	38	38	38	Motor vehicle duties	Collected by the provinces
77	78	80	91	90	Succession duties (in Canada the major part of these duties are collected by the provinces)	–	–	–	7	15
4	1	1	1	1	MISCELLANEOUS	2	2	2	2	16
899	1,017	1,358	1,962	2,365	TOTAL	436	467	778	1,361	1,945

Please note that this table refers solely to Canadian federal taxes and the British national taxes, the only ones related to the war effort, although we have in Canada various provincial taxes which have no counterpart in Britain.

The table shows that British taxes have climbed from £899 million in 1938-39 to £1,962 million in 1941-42, an increase of 118 per cent, while Canadian taxes have risen from $436 million in 1938-39 to $1,361 million in 1941-42, which represents an increase of 212 per cent. Now a comparison between the tax revenue estimated for the current year, 1942-43, and that of 1941-42, the last fiscal year, shows that the increase in fiscal charges for Britain is 20 per cent, while for Canada it stands at 43 per cent. With the consent of the house, I shall place on Hansard another table showing the gradual increase in taxes both in Britain and Canada, in the form of index figures based on taxes paid in 1938-39.

Index of Gradual Increases in Fiscal Charges

	Britain	Canada
1938-39	100	100
1939-40	113	107
1940-41	151	178
1941-42	218	312
1942-43	263	446

The comparative increase of budget expenditures charged to the taxpayer also shows a higher rate of progression in Canada than in Britain.

We often hear that income taxes are steeper in Britain than in Canada, but it must be kept in mind that such taxes are Britain's main source of revenue, while there are in this country a great number of additional fiscal charges unknown in Britain.

Now a glance at the table I have placed on record shows that the income tax in Britain is at present only two and a half times what it was before the war, while in Canada it stands at five and a half times the pre-war figures.

With the permission of the house, I shall place on record another table showing the amount of income tax payable in Britain and in Canada during 1942.

COMPARATIVE STATEMENT OF INCOME TAX PAYABLE IN CANADA AND BRITAIN FOR THE YEAR 1942

Revenue	Single person		Married, childless		Married with three children
	Britain	Canada	Britain	Canada	Britain	Canada

It will be seen that in the case of unmarried persons the income tax, contrary to what was said by the hon. member for Joliette, is higher in Canada than in Britain, except in the case of a small income of $534 and of very large incomes exceeding $200,000.

The same situation obtains as regards married persons without children. Generally speaking, the average income is more heavily taxed in Canada than in England. From $3,500 to $25,000 the Canadian tax is higher. That also applies to married persons with three children.

It should be especially noted that the income tax rate has not been increased in Britain while it has been substantially raised in Canada. According to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the income tax for 1942-43, computed at last year's rate, would have yielded £915,000,000 while it will only yield £913,000,000 at the rate set in this year's budget—a decrease of £2,000,000. On the same basis of comparison, tax revenues will be much higher in Canada.

The brief survey I have just made of the British and Canadian budgets clearly shows that the increase in the tax burden is much greater in Canada than in Britain; that the Canadian taxpayer is much harder hit than the British; that while British taxpayers are called upon by their government to bear a 20 per cent increase in taxation, Canadian taxpayers must bear a 43 per cent increase due to the fact that the balance sheet submitted by the British Chancellor of the Exchequer included, under the head of revenue, an item of one billion dollars as a contribution from the Canadian government, while on the debit side of the Canadian ledger there appears the same item of one billion dollars as a gift to Britain.

As a result of that gift, the income tax rate was not raised in Britain while it is substantially raised in Canada. As far as I am concerned, and I know that I am voicing the feeling of many members of this house who did not want to delay proceedings at this stage, I am not prepared to support a further increase in the all too heavy burden which the Canadian taxpayer has to bear, so that a gift of one billion dollars may be made to an allied nation which is now lending money at interest to other allied countries. And I feel obliged, Mr. Speaker, to voice my disagreement.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, we meet to-night in the greatest crisis that has visited this empire at any time in our history. We are discussing the largest budget which has ever been presented to a Canadian parliament, in order to ensure that Canada's contribution shall be all that it should be in the battle for the survival of freedom.

It is a tremendous budget. I congratulate the minister upon the courage he has shown in introducing this budget, bringing home to the Canadian people the awfulness of the prospect before us unless victory is ours. I congratulate, too, the Canadian people upon the reception they have given to this budget which will mean so much to them.

But this evening I am not going to discuss or to make any recommendations or suggestions in connection with the budget as such. That I shall reserve until the matter comes into the resolution stage. I intend to discuss a trend which is gradually becoming more pronounced as the war goes on and is against the full operation of our parliamentary institutions and all that they stand for in the democratic way of life.

Parliament has a serious responsibility. This parliament represents the people of Canada; it is the repository and trustee of their hopes of survival. Economic freedom is very important, but important, too, is the matter of our political and personal freedoms, and these things must not be lost sight of during these trying days of war. I have no apologies to offer for speaking on this subject; for this is the only place, the only forum, where one can express one's views, where one can make one's criticisms, where one can advance constructively such ideas as one believes are in the interests of the country as a whole.

To-day, in the British House of Commons, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, referring to the debate which has gone on there during the past two days, said that he was "in favour of freedom of expression" in the commons, and he pointed out that "no other country would use or dare to use such freedom in times of mortal peril" such as those through which we are passing. We hear too often that parliament is not living up to its responsibilities, and I think that we who enjoy the privilege and responsibility of being members have the right to place before the country our views in regard to the necessity of the retention of those rights—rights for which this empire fights—so long as thereby the war effort is not impeded. I believe it will be agreed by all hon. members that the progress of Canada's war effort has been in large measure due to criticism offered in this house and by the press, resulting in the formation of public opinion.

Churchill to-day received an overwhelming vote of confidence in the British House of Commons. He has always appreciated and welcomed criticism and has often stated that one of the salient differences between the axis nations and countries belonging to the united nations is that the former fear and the latter invite criticism. Parliament is being criticized in the press and throughout the country for failing to appreciate the responsibility which rests upon it. I think in this parliament we have the right to the expression of our ideals, our conceptions of those freedoms for which we fight, so long as we do not thereby impair the war effort or give benefit to the enemy.

To-day the government exercises a greater control over parliament than ever before in the history of this country. It exercises a greater control over the freedom of expression of the press and public men throughout Canada than ever before. But if there is one thing which we as members must demand, it is that criticism shall continue, that criticism shall not be curtailed so long as it is designed to spur on the government to greater effort; and we have the right to demand that in so far as conditions permit, legislation passed in respect of matters particularly domestic shall be passed by parliament and not through the instrumentality of orders in council.

There is a tendency on the part of this government not to give the attention to parliament that it should, and we are approaching a state where parliament need not be called together except for the purpose of voting supply.

In support of my statement that there is a trend away from true parliamentary government, I refer once more, what I have referred to at other times, to the attitude of the government in continuing in ever-increasing measure to govern by order in council, with the result that we in this parliament are denied the opportunity of debate on matters which affect the welfare of the people as a whole.

As an example of this trend, the wartime prices and trade regulations which were introduced by order in council while parliament was sitting. Many difficulties have arisen in connection with the administration of these regulations, all because of the fact that parliament was and is denied the opportunity of debating them. Only to-day the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) drew attention to the effect of arbitrary regulations passed by boards and commissions on the agricultural industry. When one considers that while parliament is in session, orders in council are being passed with ever-accelerated regularity, I think the time has come when we as members of parliament should ask the government to give more consideration to parliament in the passing of legislation.

There is not a lawyer who is able to advise a client as to what the law is in reference to any statute in Canada without looking into the matter of orders in council. When only the other day I asked a question of one of the departments of government as to what orders in council had been passed that affect the statutes under its jurisdiction, the answer was that many of them had been placed in the Canada Gazette, which implies that many have not received publicity in that publication.

Further, as indicating the trend, I would point out that we as members are gradually having our rights curtailed through the denial to us of private members day. I realize the need for action and for immediate action in many matters. I do think, however, that if the rules of parliament which permit forty-minute speeches are found difficult of operation during war time, then there should be a revision of the rules; but the right of private members day should not be denied, and it should be recalled that it was not denied in the last war except, in part, until the last six months.

The denial of the right of those who do not belong to the government to utilize the radio of this country in order to place their points of view before the country is another matter. It is true the situation in this regard may not be as serious to-day as it was a few months ago, but the withdrawal of that restriction came about only in consequence of criticism in parliament. The government, when asked questions, many of which by no stretch of the imagination can be interpreted as being contrary to the public interest, in increasing measure relies upon the excuse that it is not in the public interest to reveal information. What does that mean? It means that the government can deny members of parliament information upon the basis of which criticism might be levelled against the administration as a whole.

Then there is the further attitude, displayed more particularly recently by the government, of being allergic to fair and constructive criticism. It has seen fit to prosecute various newspapers in Canada under the defence of Canada regulations, and the reason has been the fact that these newspapers have been criticizing the government in a manner that did not appeal to it. In connection with the investigation into the Hong Kong expedition the attitude of the government in refusing to table the evidence has resulted in preventing discussion in parliament, thereby preventing criticism based on the facts as revealed by the evidence, although I do realize that in time of war it is necessary to exercise discretion and not to permit the publication of evidence that might in any way injure the war effort of the country or be of benefit to the enemy. The position of the Canadian people so far as that report is concerned is that they are denied the opportunity of seeing all pertinent parts of the evidence, while they are permitted to see a part of the evidence that bears out the decision of the commissioner in charge.

A further example might be mentioned in passing. There has been a change in this respect since the present Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) took office. It is that of men who were interned after having their cases brought before committees set up by the minister, and although no wrong doing was established against them, yet in certain cases the minister refused to carry out the recommendations of the committee. On the other hand in Great Britain, Sir Norman Birkett has stated that the practice is that no man has been interned or proceeded against for merely criticizing the government, for words spoken, but that such proceedings are taken only for overt acts. I realize that in war time censorship is necessary; criticism should not be made which might in any way impair the war effort. That is why the defence of Canada regulations were passed by order in council under the powers contained in the War Measures Act. Those regulations were intended to cover dangerous men and their activities and to permit the government to act quickly without having to have recourse to the ordinary channels of the criminal law. Under the criminal code there is provision for the prosecution of men who endeavour to undermine the country in time of war. There is provision to deal with treasonable offences, and with sedition, which require proof on the part of the prosecution of circumstances from which the wrongful intent of the accused may be deduced. The defence of Canada regulations give to the government of the day, through the Minister of Justice, the power to proceed by way of action against men, however honest their purpose, however patriotic their desires, who say anything that the government does not consider in the public interest; and the only defence they have is the right to prove to the satisfaction of the court that what they have said was said in good faith and merely to criticize or to point out errors or defects in the conduct of the government. I now draw attention to the two pertinent sections in our regulations and compare them with the corresponding sections in England. Section 39A reads:

No person shall—
(a) act in any manner, spread reports, or make statements or utterances intended or likely to cause disaffection to His Majesty or to interfere with the success of His Majesty's forces or of the forces of any allied or associated powers or to prejudice His Majesty's relations with foreign powers.
(b) act in any manner, spread reports, or make statements or utterances intended or likely to prejudice the recruiting, training, discipline, or administration of any of His Majesty's forces;

The question of intent does not enter into the matter at all. The mere making of a statement or a criticism, however honest and honourable it may be, permits of the prosecution of the man who makes such statement or criticism. By reason of the fact that it is an extraordinary power to deny to the accused the right to be proceeded against under the criminal code, there is a prerequisite which the prosecution must be able to establish. I quote:

A prosecution for an offence against regulations 39, 39A or 39C of these regulations shall not be instituted except by, or with the consent of, counsel representing the Atorney-General of Canada or of the province: Provided that this paragraph shall not prevent the arrest or the issue, or the execution of a warrant for the arrest, of any person in respect of any such offence, or the remanding, in custody or on bail, of any person charged with such offence.

In other words, the position is this, that any man in this dominion to-day, any man in this parliament, any loyal citizen of this country, can be proceeded against, brought before a court of law and found guilty if the statements that he made are "intended to or likely to" have resulted in a diminution of recruiting. There is not a member of this house or a member of a legislature anywhere in this dominion who voices, inside or outside this house, a criticism, the effect of which might be likely to interfere with recruiting, who might not be convicted under these regulations. It does not require any intent.

Let me call attention to a judgment based on a similar section of the regulations. The reason why I do this is to say to the government that they should never use these regulations unless there is no other means open to them, unless to proceed by way of indictment under the criminal code is not available because of the dangerous nature of the acts committed by the accused. In a judgment of the court of appeal of Ontario in Rex v. Stewart in 1940, a judgment of the chief justice of Ontario concurred in by the other judges, the judgment indicates that a man with an honest motive, a desire to help, a wish to contribute to the war effort, would be guilty of an offence under this section even though he had no intent or guilty mind, and the chief justice of Ontario said:

(The regulations) were made in the emergency of war then threatened and now in progress. They prohibit, in terms that are absolute, certain acts that may interfere with or prejudice the preparations and efforts made for the successful carrying on of the war, or that may be prejudicial to the safety of the state. It would seem plain that both the subject matter and the purpose of the regulations, as well as the terms in which they are expressed make it necessary to hold that their prohibitions are absolute, and that it is not a defence in a prosecution for their breach to say that what was done was done in ignorance or without intending any harm. The acts prohibited are to be stopped.

That judgment shows that if the Minister of Justice of Canada in his capacity as Attorney General, or the attorney general of a province, looks into the matter and decides, by reason of what a certain man has said, that he is dangerous, this particular section, far from being a protection in time of war, can become an instrument of tyranny against those with whom the government disagrees.

They have no such provisions in England. The provisions there are that:

No person shall—(a) endeavour by means of any false statement, false document or false report to influence public opinion . . . in a manner likely to be prejudicial to the defence of the realm or the efficient prosecution of the war.

In other words, in England there must be an intent, in that there must be falsity in the statement made by the person accused.

I wonder how many hon. members realize that under the defence of Canada regulations to-day a man might make a statement that was absolutely true and yet be guilty of an offence if in the estimation of the attorney general of the dominion or an attorney general of a province he should be prosecuted if the statement made was "intended to or likely to" impede the war effort. I think the time has come when we as members of parliament should protest against the use of these sections for the prosecution of persons other than those who seek to undermine the government of the state or the war effort. However high-minded and patriotic the accused or his purpose, he is guilty if certain results flow therefrom or are "likely to".

These are extraordinary sections. They were never intended to be used for the prosecution of political opponents. Their use should be circumscribed within the limits of the section itself. There is not a member of this house, there is not an honourable, patriotic citizen anywhere in Canada who may not be convicted of an offence under these sections if they are used against him and provided the Minister of Justice sees fit to consent to proceedings being taken against him. I say the time has come for hon. members to stand up for their rights and the rights of loyal citizens all over this dominion, and to secure from the government the assurance that these sections will no longer be used against loyal citizens of proven patriotism. If we do not do that, the day of freedom of political speech and the independence of patriotic citizens and newspapers throughout Canada in voicing fair criticism in order to improve conditions and to spur on the war effort of this dominion is past. I think we as a parliament should take a decided stand that we will not give approval to possible future political prosecutions, and that stand must be taken now. These sections are necessary in order to assure that our war effort shall not be undermined; but as members of parliament, irrespective of party, it becomes our duty to tell the government now and finally that we will not tolerate their use in order to proceed against members of this house or honourable citizens outside the house whose purposes in making criticism are high-minded and patriotic.

I make no suggestion that these sections are being so used, but I do point out the danger of their being used against political opponents in time of war. I suggest that even the appearance of the government playing politics in matters such as this is dangerous to the unity of the war effort and will of the Canadian people. I further say that political prosecutions—or persecutions if you will—whether of members of parliament or of public men are dangerous to public morale when the public, or a large portion of the public, believe, whether rightly or wrongly, they are being used for that purpose. This is the only place where these things can be asserted; and as members of parliament irrespective of party we should take our stand and say to the government, "So far you may go in the interests of the safety of the state, but in proceeding against citizens of proven honour, patriotism and integrity, if an offence has allegedly been committed, the proceedings should be under the criminal code". Surely parliament is not to be denied the right; surely members of parliament are not to be denied the right, to criticize the possible use of these sections for improper purposes. A government that indicts an honest, patriotic citizen under these sections indicts itself as being fearful of criticism. I ask hon. members in all parts of this house to take the attitude that has been taken in England since the beginning of the war and now, so well epitomized in the words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, speaking in the House of Commons on January 22, 1941, when he used these words:

> His Majesty's government welcome all the impulse which the House of Commons and press and public opinion of this island can give to us in driving forward our war effort and trying to gain an earlier inch or a more fruitful hour wherever it may be possible. But I have no doubt that the house, in its overwhelming majority, will wish to give its tribute of encouragement, as well as its dose of correction, and will lend its own heave of loyal strength to the forward surges that now have begun.

We meet here in difficult and trying times. If ever there was a time when we should be united in a common purpose, that time is now. If ever there was a time when the provisions of these sections should not be invoked against citizens who are known for their loyalty and devotion to their country, it is now and in the trying weeks that are to come. I have pointed out the trend. I think as members of parliament we have a right to insist that the trend away from true democratic principles shall end, except where the public interest and the safety of the state demand a departure therefrom.

Mr. GORDON B. ISNOR (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I fully realize the awkward position in which I find myself, having to follow such a brilliant speaker with the legal training of the hon. member (Mr. Diefenbaker) who has just resumed his seat. I do not propose to try to follow his reasoning; I am going to stay as closely as a business man can to the subject before the house and deal with the budget, and only the budget.

As a background to what I have to say may I give a little of my own history. From 1928 to 1935 I was a member of the Nova Scotia legislature. For five years I sat in the opposition there, facing, among others, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) who now sits in this house as a member of the opposition. In 1935 I resigned my seat to become a candidate in the federal general election, and have been here since that time endeavouring to represent the constituency of Halifax, along with my colleague from that city. I well recall that during those seven or eight years, as a business man I was interested in financial matters, and particularly in the budget; and during the whole time I was in the legislature, both as a member of the opposition and while sitting on the government side, I took an active part in the budget debates. They were quite different there from those that are carried on here to-day. As the hon. member for Cumberland will remember, it was a matter of the opposition criticizing the government in power over the amount of the funded debt; pointing out the extravagant expenditures, as all opposition members do, and so on. At the same time I believe I did offer some constructive suggestions, and I believe the government of the day appreciated that fact. I am sure the hon. member for Cumberland would say that in my remarks I always endeavoured to be fair.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): That is quite correct.

Mr. ISNOR: So with that background I approach the present budget, but before discussing it I should like to go back and look at some budgets previously presented in this house. I have in mind the budgets presented by such outstanding ministers of finance as the late Hon. W. S. Fielding, Sir Thomas White, Hon. E. N. Rhodes, a former premier of Nova Scotia, and Hon. C. A. Dunning, as well as by our present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I should like to direct attention to the figures contained in those budgets. I well recall that in 1897, the year after Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government came into power, the Hon. W. S. Fielding presented a budget amounting to $38,000,000. The budget presented by Sir Thomas White in 1913 was for $112,000,000. There was a gradual increase in the revenues, until in 1932 the Hon. E. N. Rhodes presented a budget amounting to $311,735,000, while in 1936 the Hon. C. A. Dunning presented a budget amounting to $452,123,000. Just last week the present Minister of Finance, another Nova Scotian, presented a budget amounting to $3,900,000,000. That is a staggering figure, one hundred times the size of the budget presented only forty-five years ago.

I should like to refer briefly, perhaps not as eloquently as the last speaker might, or as many others would, but nevertheless as sincerely as any hon. member could, to the hon. gentleman who presented this budget. Last week the Financial Post referred to the Minister of Finance as tall, sandy-haired and serious; a Nova Scotia lawyer, forty-seven years old; first elected to the federal parliament in 1926, becoming a member of the King government in 1935. I recall 1935, Mr. Speaker; we in Nova Scotia knew the present Minister of Finance, and we were not at all surprised when the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) selected him as his Minister of National Revenue. I believe it was because of the thorough, sound judgment displayed by the minister then that when it came time to select a minister of finance the Prime Minister put his hand on the minister's shoulder and said, "Carry on in the same able manner as did Mr. Fielding," that esteemed, highly regarded Nova Scotian, "and the Hon. E. N. Rhodes," who made such a name for himself as Minister of Finance.

The other evening the Minister of Finance outlined a comprehensive scheme to not only provide money but to expend it. When he was speaking I looked round at the faces of hon. members on the government side; I looked at the faces of hon. members of the opposition, and I allowed my eyes to wander toward the galleries. I could not help but be impressed with the serious manner in which the words of the Minister of Finance were being received and the close attention that was being paid to his remarks. Everyone was following him most intently. I know the same feeling was evident throughout Canada the following morning when the people read the speech of the minister and appreciated the informative material contained therein.

At the close of the presentation by the Minister of Finance the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) rose in his place, and as one maritimer to another complimented the minister in that generally fair manner of his. He stated that he hoped the people of Canada would read, digest and take to heart the words of the Minister of Finance. I believe the leader of the opposition was sincere at that time, and I regretted that he could not have followed immediately with his own remarks. Had he done so, I believe his speech would have been different from that presented a little later when he found fault with certain provisions of the budget. Even at that the leader of the opposition approved in a large measure the general principles and provisions of the budget. I believe the people of Canada appreciated that attitude, and I think it is the attitude of all members of the opposition as well as of all other members. It is necessary to have the wholehearted support of all Canadians if we are to accomplish the results that we desire in raising the $3,900,000,000 required under this budget.

I was interested to know where this money was coming from, and I believe the people of Canada also are anxious to know. I wish to give credit to the Financial Post for the figures that I shall give. I find that in 1938 we received 26 per cent of our revenue from the income tax, and in that year it was necessary to go to the country and borrow only 9 per cent. In 1939 we borrowed 17 per cent; in 1941, 31 per cent, and to-day I understand the minister to say that we shall have to borrow something like 50 per cent. With a budget of $3,900,000,000, we shall have to go to the country and borrow $1,850,000,000 in the next nine months or so.

In addition, I was anxious to know where the money went to. I recall that in 1928 or 1929 the then Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who is once again the minister of that department, introduced in his defence estimates an item to take care of the Royal Canadian Air Force. Then came that period of depression and another government came into power. This item was completely forgotten; it was completely done away with for reasons of economy. In 1938 our total defence estimates amounted to only 6 per cent of our revenues; in 1939, when the clouds of war were on the horizon, those estimates increased to 17 per cent; in the following year they increased to 60 per cent; last year they increased from 60 to 74 per cent, and this budget calls for war expenditures of 88 per cent. Think what this means. I should like every Canadian to realize that out of every dollar that goes into the treasury of the Dominion of Canada, 88 cents is spent to carry on the prosecution of this war to a successful issue.

Last year our revenues amounted to $2,400,000,000. This meant that every Canadian family was paying to the government at the rate of $16.80 a week in order to carry on the war. This year, with an increased need of $3,900,000,000, each and every family will be paying each week for war expenditures a total of $23. With a budget of $3,900,000,000, I can appreciate why newspapers and individuals refer to it as a staggering amount. But I believe we will raise this amount. A short time ago, the New York Times, referring to the successful prosecution of the war by the united nations, said:

> Every one of the united nations will have to yield in non-essentials if the one essential of peace is to be made secure.

That is the reason why each and every family will do its part to carry on this war to a successful issue. The leader of the opposition and others have referred to the hardships that this budget will impose upon the working classes. If I remember correctly, the leader of the opposition referred to three classes upon whose shoulders this burden would fall most heavily, the working classes, the middle classes and the small retailers. While this budget will entail real sacrifices and impose a great burden, I do not think we need worry about the two latter classes of our people. They will take care of themselves. I think the leader of the opposition had in mind the difficulty of a workingman carrying out his monthly payments.

If the same budget had been placed before Canada two years ago, there would have been some justification for worry on the part of the leader of the opposition and others. In fact, I would have doubted if Canada could have carried a budget of this kind at that time. It will be recalled that from 1930 to 1936 great numbers of workingmen were unemployed, but at the outbreak of the war employment increased to a marked extent, by 22 per cent if I remember correctly.

It increased by leaps and bounds so that practically every employable man who had a trade and every skilled labourer was given employment at a very fair wage, and the result was that during the period from the commencement of the war up until a year ago they were able to take care of all their bills which had accumulated and were outstanding; to refurnish their homes and provide themselves with clothing and other essentials, and, generally, to reestablish themselves upon their pre-depression level. Now that they have done that, they can meet what I am sure they will consider are their just obligations under this budget.

What I have said about the rehabilitation of the working classes applies equally to the stores. Like the workingmen, the stores also went through a period of depression for five years. Their stocks became depleted, and they had customers owing bills, but with the increased spending power brought about by the war the stores were able to increase their stocks on hand, take care of their bills, and come back to their pre-depression level. But they suffered from one handicap. Because of the increased business that was offering they had to fill up their stocks to a very much larger extent than before, and because of the increased business they were compelled to carry a larger amount of credit. Their bills receivable grew to almost alarming amounts, and I venture to say that if the Minister of Finance had attempted a year ago or two years ago to tax the retail stores as he is doing to-day, it would have been almost impossible for them to carry on. But they had this period of readjustment during which their bills receivable were paid. Now, owing to the very wise business planning by this government, and the monthly instalment plan, they are able to meet their obligations under this budget, and while it will mean some sacrifice, they will be able to carry on and will not, as the leader of the opposition stated, be driven out of business.

I should like to refer briefly to the price ceiling brought into effect by the government, the wage-freezing order and the instalment buying regulations. These regulations for the ordinary storekeeper doing that kind of business were a godsend, and I believe they were a blessing in disguise also to great numbers of people who were subject to high-pressure salesmanship which had been spreading throughout the whole country. The credit regulations whereby purchases made in one month had to be paid for the next month were also beneficial both for the store and its customers. All these regulations have, I believe, made it possible for the businessman or storekeeper to carry on and meet his obligations under this budget.

I was rather surprised at the criticism made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) and by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) in regard to the effects of the change in exemptions for dependents. I shall only touch upon that briefly because the Minister of Finance will deal with it much more fully and clearly than I can; but from what study I have been able to give it, the wage-earner in the $2,500 income bracket, a married man with one or two children, is in a much better position under the new exemption provisions than he was under the old. Under the old provisions he had an exemption of $400 for each child, which at 15 per cent meant an exemption of $60. That is $20 less than under the present arrangement, which allows a deduction of $80 for each child, and I am not taking into consideration the deduction under the normal or national defence tax which may also be coming to him.

I wish to congratulate either the Minister of Finance or his advisers or the government —it really does not matter to whom the credit is due so long as the plan is a good one and brings the desired results—upon introducing the compulsory savings feature in connection with the income tax. I believe it is an extremely fine plan which will be helpful to both the businessman and the average wage-earner, and I congratulate the minister upon introducing this provision in his comprehensive plan of budgeting.

There was a doubt, I think, in the minds of one or two speakers as to the effect which this compulsory saving might have on savings bank deposits and the purchase of war savings stamps and war savings certificates. Naturally the compulsory saving will be reflected somewhat in these other directions; but whatever effect it might have had upon bank deposits and the purchase of war savings stamps and certificates a year ago, I believe that the benefits to-day will more than outweigh any disadvantages.

I want to say a word about tax deductions at the source. I have had experience in dealing with deductions in connection with the national defence tax, and I have also had to make deductions from the pay of employees for the purchase of war savings stamps. This tax deduction feature has, I believe, been welcomed by all classes of our people who have to pay taxes. It is just one more step in the direction of facilitating and systematizing the collection and payment of taxes. Only a few days ago I noticed in the press that a survey had been made and a large number of persons interviewed and asked their opinion with regard to this question: Would you prefer having your income tax deducted regularly from income at the source? As I looked over the long list of those interviewed, I found that without exception everyone favoured such a plan or scheme. I was particularly impressed with the interview granted by J. W. Berry, general manager of the Guaranty Trust Company of Toronto. Mr. Berry said:

> I would prefer to have my income tax deducted regularly at the source. Personnally, I recognize the necessity of providing for income taxes and would welcome an orderly progressive discharge of this obligation.

He goes on:

> From the national viewpoint, I think income tax deduction at the source equally preferable in that such a plan would firstly, provide the government with a continuous flow of revenue to be used in its pay-as-you-go plan; secondly, would simplify collection methods and eliminate the possibility of arrears and loss. Thirdly, it would help curb purchasing power which is vitally necessary if living costs are to be controlled and income directed into those channels which provide the sinews of war.

That statement expresses my view in as concise and definite a manner as I could express it were I to spend a week in trying to compress it into a paragraph or two. Mr. Berry in this interview strikes at the root of this whole budget scheme when he remarks, "It would help curb purchasing power which is vitally necessary if living costs are to be controlled"; and that, I think, is a feature which the Minister of Finance had in mind when he introduced this budget plan.

Will this budget prove a success? I believe it will. I believe so for the reasons already outlined, namely, that general employment is up 22 per cent and employment in manufacturing is up 30 per cent over last year. I understand that general manufacturing employment has gone up something like 80 per cent since the beginning of the war. Retail sales as I have already indicated, went up 20 per cent last year, and since pre-war days have increased by something like 50 per cent.

All-over control by the government of prices and wages, as I have already mentioned, is the third feature of it.

I might mention another important factor which the Minister of Finance brought to our attention when he presented the budget, namely restrictions in connection with travel. He stated—and I was astonished at the large amount—that in the two years in which the foreign exchange control board has operated, it has saved to the country something like $100,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He does not say how much was lost.

Mr. ISNOR: It is not so much what you lose as what you save that helps you to pay your bills.

Mr. ILSLEY: There was not much lost by that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Ten dollars for one saved.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. no.

Mr. ISNOR: In times such as these, with heavy war expenditures, heavy taxes naturally follow. No one should complain about them if the money is to be used to win the war. Speaking of my own province, I think I can say we realize that there is a war on. From the very outbreak of war members of the various branches of the service were seen in numbers on our streets. We have watched them come by train and leave by ship for overseas. We see our ships entering and leaving the harbour. I believe that the people of Halifax, and of Nova Scotia in general, realize to a greater extent than other people just what this war means, and that is why I say I believe that in so far as Nova Scotians are concerned, the Minister of Finance need not worry about their taking their part in carrying the load and shouldering their portion of this budget.

I should like to mention my interest in social security. I do not know whether this is the time to do so. I had to face that question; I debated in Halifax whether this is an opportune time to bring in unemployment insurance. I think the main argument which convinced me that now is the time was the fact that there is a large amount of money in circulation, that wage-earners are earning steadily and in large amounts, and that, therefore, this is a good time to set up a reserve to take care of needs which may arise following the close of the war or if we should again be visited, which I hope we never shall, with another period of depression.

For the same reason I would suggest to the minister that he and his government give serious consideration to the matter of old age pensions. I do not know whether I care to define at this time a particular age to which they should be lowered, but I believe it should be not more than sixty-five years, with a broadening of the provisions to take care of unemployables even at the age of sixty. Throughout the country there is a number of persons, suffering real hardship, who are unemployable. Not being returned soldiers, they do not receive any special consideration. I think that this class, though its numbers may not be great, should receive favourable consideration in this regard, and I hope the minister will take the matter into consideration for action at some future time.

May I also suggest that he should reconsider the amount paid. I believe that $20 a month is too low; and of course everybody does not receive $20; in Nova Scotia, I believe, the average is only $14.86 or $14.87. I think the minister should consider increasing the amount to $30. I know that the provinces, particularly those which have not now recourse to certain sources of revenue which they formerly could tap, may strenuously object to any such increase in so far as their contribution is concerned. For that reason I suggest that the federal government assume 85 per cent of the payment and that the provinces' share be reduced to the remaining 15 per cent. In other words, of a grant of $30, the federal government would contribute $25.50, and a province, $4.50, instead of $5 as at the present time.

I have one other suggestion to make, relating to retirements. In times like these, when young men, or men in certain age brackets, are required for active service and other duties of a strenuous nature, we should retain in the government employ those who are capable of carrying on their duties efficiently instead of permitting them to retire, as under the civil service regulations, at the age of sixty-five. I was particularly surprised the other evening to read in the paper that the Department of National Defence had retired a colonel at fifty-six years of age. I do not wish to give his name. I do not know the reason. I do not know the gentleman. But on general principles it struck me that this was not a time to retire men at the age of fifty-six. Surely the government could find some useful place in another department for any man of that age.

I commend the minister for the action he has taken in exempting all pensions of ex-service men both of the last great war and of the present war. That is the proper thing to do and it has been well received. Several members who have already spoken have complimented the government in that regard. I suggest that he enlarge that a little to include all persons receiving pensions for total disabilities. I have particularly in mind the victims of the Halifax explosion, a large number of whom lost limbs—a leg, an arm, a hand or an eye. I do not think it is fair to tax such a person on the pension he or she receives. That is a special case which deserves special consideration.

I should like to have quoted, in closing, the last paragraph of the minister's speech, but time will not permit my doing so. However, I might call to the attention of the house the words of Mr. G. W. Spinney, chairman of the national war finance committee:

War is never cheap, but surely it is a thousand times cheaper to win than to lose.

If I have been at all convincing to those who have listened to me, whether in the opposition or in other parts of the house, I shall have done my duty if I have induced in them that frame of mind which will incline them, instead of being critical, to cooperate and to make known to the people of Canada the magnificent effort which the Minister of Finance has made in placing before the Canadian public a budget built along such comprehensive lines. I believe that with the cooperation of all it will be carried through to a successful issue. I am reminded of the words of J. Mason Knox:

> It is not guns or armament
> Or the money they can pay,
> It's the close cooperation
> That makes them win the day.
> It is not the individual
> Or the army as a whole,
> But the everlastin' teamwork > of every bloomin' soul.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been considering the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy). The motion before the house is:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself again into committee of ways and means.

The amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspe, seconded by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) is:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following words substituted therefor:

"It is expedient that proper measures be taken in order to secure new sources of oil from all possibilities offered by petroleum areas that Canada may have."

Standing order 48 provides:

When a question is under debate no motion is received unless to amend it; to postpone it to a day certain: for the previous question; for reading the orders of the day; for proceeding to another order; to adjourn the debate; or for the adjournment of the house.

Citation 395 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms reads:

It is an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed. Every amendment proposed to be made either to a question or to a proposed amendment should be so framed that if agreed to by the house the question or amendment as amended would be intelligible and consistent with itself.

If the house agrees to the amendment, it denies the right of the government to provide ways and means, or it postpones that period. The amendment is not relevant to the question before the house now, and there is a further objection to its relevancy. In its form the amendment is a substantive motion. At page 420 Bourinot states:

The ordinary rules of debate are applicable on this occasion—

That is, with regard to an amendment on going into supply.

—for instance, a matter already decided by the house, or of which notice has been given, or which stands upon the orders of the day, cannot be discussed.

The same rule is stated in May, 13th edition, at pages 525-26, and in citation 398 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which states:

An amendment cannot anticipate a notice of motion on the order paper.

I find on perusal of the order paper that, under "notices of motions", there is a motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene), which reads:

Whereas the largest known supply of gasoline and petroleum products in Canada, perhaps in the world, is procurable from the tar sands of the McMurray, Waterways and Fort McKay areas along the Athabaska and Clearwater rivers, in the constituency of Athabaska, Alberta, some three hundred and fifty miles from the city of Edmonton.

Therefore be it resolved,—That, in the opinion of this house, for the carrying on of our vital war effort, and supplying the needs of our farmers, manufacturers, transportation systems and tourist trade, the government should take into immediate consideration the advisability of assisting, by way of financing or otherwise, greatly increased production in this area of the gasoline and petroleum products so necessary to the people of Canada.

It is true the resolution on the order paper refers to a particular area, but the discussion of that resolution would, of course, involve the discussion of other oil areas of Canada, and the house would be asked to act accordingly. For the reasons I have given, and on the authorities I have cited, I must rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. ANTHONY HLYNKA (Vegreville): The 1942-43 budget is only a new edition of another debt-creating and tax-draining document. The only difference between this budget and those which the government has brought down in the past is that this one is much larger and heavier. It calls for greater expenditure than did the budgets which have preceded it, but in principle the present budget is framed identically along the same lines that all other budgets were, which were brought in by this government.

I must say that there are three good features about the present budget before the house. In the first place it will authorize the government to raise the necessary amount of money to carry on the war and to take care of all other governmental expenditures. I do not believe there is one hon. member in this house who will not agree with this particular feature of the budget, because we are providing the money necessary to carry on the war.

In the second place, by means of this budget the Minister of Finance will, in my opinion, induce many Canadian people to study the monetary reform economics more than anyone else has done for a long while, with the one exception, the greatest man in this field in Canada. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Aberhart, Premier of Alberta. The minister should be congratulated upon this, even though it was perhaps his intention to guard against this very thing.

In the third place the budget, by its very construction, underlines the faulty principles of the present outlived financial system. It is only six or seven days since this budget was brought down, but I have already been approached by a number of civil servants and a great number of members of this house, who in the past have been deaf to everything this group has said about monetary reform. The civil servant class have in the past been drifting from day to day; all they had to worry about was to adjust themselves to the new party when a new party came into office, but I believe this budget will wake them up. In fact, there is evidence of this already. I believe that many of the thinking and progressive people of Canada will from now on explore every feature of the monetary reform proposals that this group has been placing before the country for the past seven or eight years. I cannot believe that the people of Canada will accept this budget in the best of spirits, even though I do not doubt their sincere willingness to carry the greatest of burdens in time of peace and much more so in time of war. But it seems to me that the financial institutions are taking advantage of the loyalty of our people. I mean to say that they are taking advantage of this weakest moment in our entire history, in this the greatest crisis that the British people have ever faced, and through the medium of this budget they are saddling the people of Canada with a debt which, as it is predicted, will rise to the amount of twelve billion dollars before the war is over.

This document should not only be termed "a budget," "an orthodox budget," but it might as well be called a mortgage upon every man, woman and child in Canada for generations to come. I understand that a number of hon. members are anxious to have this debate close to-night. I would not hold up the closing of this debate at any cost if I felt that this budget were less important than was the political stunt called the plebiscite. The debate on the plebiscite took three or four weeks and, in reality, it simply meant nothing, but this budget proposes to impose upon our people heavy taxes and a debt that they will carry for generations. So it seems to me that a measure of this kind should receive more consideration than it seems to be getting in this house.

One cannot fail to appreciate the efforts of the Minister of Finance to make the old cart, the old money system, keep on working, but I am afraid that his effort will result in bitter fruit for the people of Canada after this war is over. I am of the opinion that had the minister pursued a different course, he had a chance of becoming one of the greatest men in Canadian history. He has the makings of a great man; he has the ability. But at this moment, when this nation and, indeed, the entire British commonwealth of nations are faced with this great crisis in their history, the minister chooses to bring in a budget which places a mortgage upon the nation. He had an opportunity of scrapping this budget and, throwing it in the waste-paper basket; he could have brought in his own budget before this house and he could have told hon. members and the people of Canada that we have come to a point where the life of the nation is more important than all the financial considerations put together. Had he brought down a budget of that sort, I am sure the people of Canada would have supported him, and we would then have been sure to do our part in this crisis in a much better way than we may now be able to do.

I am afraid that it is the old financial system which has placed this nation and the rest of the British Commonwealth of Nations in the position in which we find ourselves to-day; and if we get any set-backs in the future, I believe it will be the fault, not of the people of the British Commonwealth of Nations, but of those who are in control of the financial system and who have reduced our standard of living to the lowest possible point, so that at the present time in the province of Quebec only forty-eight per cent of those who are called up for military training are found medically fit for training. Is that not something to think about? If we take Canada as a whole, I believe the figure is 63 per cent. Only 63 per cent of our young men are physically fit for military training; yet this government has the audacity to bring in a budget which will impose upon this nation an additional debt of $1,850,000,000, and the people will be taxed year in and year out to pay the interest on that mortgage. It is about time we woke up, and I feel that I would not be doing my duty as a member of this house if I did not protest against this imposition in the strongest possible terms.

I should like to deal with a few of the points in this budget that seem to me to be of the greatest importance. I do not believe that the people of Canada would object to these taxes, heavy as they are. They have indicated their willingness to cooperate, and I believe they have been cooperating magnificently since the beginning of this war. If any trouble has developed, it has been caused by the politicians. Generally speaking, the taxes have been increased on all classes of people, but the minister has not forgotten, as usual, to impose additional taxes upon the wage-earners in the lower income brackets. That is a specialty of the old-line parties; they never forget the man earning the lower income.

As I have said, the people of Canada do not mind the imposition of additional taxes. They would not object to having much of the purchasing power siphoned away from them, so long as their standard of living was not reduced too greatly. But since this government is so ready to withdraw this purchasing power from the general public, because it believes it may cause inflation, I would suggest that in the twelve years perceding the war this same government should have seen to it that wherever there was a shortage of purchasing power, additional purchasing power should have been funnelled into the hands of the people. That is the point I wish to impress upon the house in this connection. It is not enough to withdraw purchasing power from the people and give the people the excuse that it is done to avoid inflation. You must also give them sufficient purchasing power in times of stress, times such as we had before the war and such as we certainly shall have after the war, to enable them to get along. I suppose the government will say that this situation will be remedied after the war. Then I would ask this question. If the situation is to be remedied by our employing the same system that we have employed in the past, why, then, was it not remedied during the twelve years preceding the war? Why did we let our boys down, those young chaps who were riding the rods from Halifax to Vancouver? Why did we forget them? That is something we should think about now. Would anyone seek to convince the house that the system which failed these young men before the war will carry them through the war successfully and take care of the post-war situation when it develops? I fail to see how that will be possible, with the same system and the same men at the helm, in reality in control of this government.

To drive home this point as firmly as possible as I should like to do, I wish to read from a clipping taken from the Edmonton Bulletin of October 13, 1931. The clipping of newspaper articles happens to be my hobby; I save a number of these clippings, and, believe me, they are of great value. This is something we should consider when dealing with the question of money, or when speaking of remedying the situation when the war is over. This clipping reads:

> Ottawa's ban on rod riding is too severe.
> 32 harvesters trying to get home with stake are sent to jail.
> A problem fast becoming a national issue and perplexing local courts and law enforcement, subject to dictation from Ottawa, was graphically brought to the fore Saturday morning when thirty-two hard-working harvesters, homesteaders and farm labourers who have rustled all summer to stake themselves off the winter bread lines, came before Magistrate Colonel P. C. H. Primrose in police court and pleaded guilty to breaches of the Railway Act.
> The penalty was $4 fines for each man with the alternative of ten days in jail for those who had under $5 and thirty days for those with more.
> These men were not drifters, bums and tramps that rod-ride in the summer, but workers who had made a little money and were trying to get back home with the least expense, saving their stakes for winter food and clothing. They were taken off Canadian National and Pacific freight trains around Edmonton Friday night by Canadian mounted police.
> Total assets of the thirty-two accused, the majority of whom were English-speaking, was $390.06. Some were on their way home, others seeking further employment to swell their meagre rolls.

Mark this:

> One man, an ex-army officer, a married man with a family in British Columbia, had worked in the harvest fields and saved $60.75. He was trying to get back to his family with his stake intact. "I can't pay $4," he told a city policeman, "I need every cent. My family needs the money. The fine would buy a week's groceries.' Another, single, and a homesteader, carried $4.10 on him when mounted police frisked him. "What will I have left after paying $4," he asked the reporter. Still another homesteader who in the past few months has gathered in a $56 grubstake for winter, was equally reluctant to part with any portion of his hard-earned money.

I am not going to quote further from this clipping, but it portrays the conditions that existed in the past, and it is up to us to see that these conditions do not occur in the future. As I pointed out, an ex-army officer was among these men, and that was not the kind of treatment he should have received. We are being told that immediately after the war everything will be taken care of; "be a good boy and we will do it". It is our job now to see that these things are not repeated.

I should now like to deal with the forced loan feature of the budget. In his speech the minister said, as reported at page 3579 of Hansard:

> We can and must rely upon other than economic motives to a large extent these days.

By that he intimated that the chief purpose of imposing these forced loans upon the people of Canada was not to raise money. The government will raise about $95,000,000 by this method, which is only a small portion of what will be raised by other means. The purpose of imposing these forced loans is to withdraw purchasing power from the people. In the last victory loan campaign the government called for $600,000,000, and when the quota was raised there was no difficulty in reaching it. If I were not convinced that the imposition of these forced loans would impose a hardship upon some people I would not have mentioned them. The government proposes to pay 2 per cent interest on these loans. Where is the government going to get the money with which to pay this interest? It will tax the same people and pay the money back to them. That is called a wonderful business.

There is another point which I should like to bring out, something that was mentioned the other day by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) when speaking in this debate. I should like to compare this rate of 2 per cent with the rate of more than 2 per cent which was paid by the Alberta government on bonds held by people throughout Canada. When Alberta was forced to reduce the interest rate on bonds, the same men who approve this 2 per cent rate criticized Premier Aberhart because he would not pay more than 2¼ per cent or 2½ per cent on the bonds purchased in that province. They wanted to see Alberta pass from the "bond age" to "bondage"; they wanted to join the two words together. The premier and the government of Alberta woke up to the issue and reduced the interest rates. In my opinion, these interest rates were excessive. It also surprises me now that we agreed to pay 5 per cent on bonds issued during the last war when in this war we are able to get money at 3 per cent. If these gentlemen were so patriotic, why did they not let the country have the money at 3 per cent during the last war? But they will always try to get as much out of the people as they possibly can, even in the most tragic times.

There is another psychological aspect to these forced loans. The government has raised the tax which the people must pay, and they were naturally bound to feel a little downhearted. But when they realize that they will get back some of this money, plus 2 per cent interest, that makes them feel much better, and they are not so apt to complain about the heavy burden being imposed upon them.

There is another psychological aspect to this matter. The people will have an investment in these forced loans, and after the war they will almost be compelled to perpetuate the present debt-creating system. It was in the interests of the financial institutions to see to it that the people made investments in these forced loans so that after the war they will be compelled to defend the old system. This forced loan business is also designed to serve as a shock-absorber after the war. It is expected that a depression, or whatever you may call it, will result in the change from war time to peace time production. The government carefully planned this matter so that a certain number of people will have savings put away which will enable them to pull through for a time immediately after the war. Then the financial institutions will again go ahead and tie up these people to more debt and continue the present system. I feel I need not say much more on this point.

I come now to the cost of the war. In 1938-39 we spent for defence 6 per cent of our total expenditure; in 1939-40, 17 per cent; in 1940-41, 60 per cent; in 1941-42, 74 per cent, and in 1942-43 it is estimated we shall spend at least 88 per cent. I wish to commend the government for appropriating this large portion of our national expenditures for war purposes. After all, we must make financially possible what is physically possible. But I protest against the method by which this money is raised, particularly the raising of money by loans. Of the money budgeted for in 1938-39, 9 per cent was raised by way of loans; in 1939-40, 17 per cent; in 1940-41, 31 per cent; in 1941-42, 22 per cent, and this year it is expected that over 50 per cent will be raised by loans. There will be raised by loan, $1,850,000,000 this year. This means that there will be imposed upon the people of Canada a mortgage of $1,850,000,000. In other words, as the hon. member who preceded me said, the war expenditure alone will cost the people of Canada $6,300 per minute or $23 per family per week, as compared with $16.80 per family per week last year.

Some hon. members and certainly members of the cabinet will say: "But we cannot possibly change from the present system in the middle of the stream, so we must continue with this borrowing and we will take care of everything when the war is over. After the war we will give the people a new deal." But how can they give the people of Canada a new deal, when they are using the same old deck of marked cards and the same old tricks are being employed? It may be a new deal, but, believe me, the common people of Canada will not be any better off.

Mr. HANSELL: And they are stacked against us!

Mr. HLYNKA: Yes. I should like to be optimistic and feel that this young nation of perhaps as fine a people as one can find anywhere in the world will emerge from this crisis to live comfortably in the future and build up a strong and a powerful nation. It is not merely a matter of getting by, because in the present world we must build a nation that will be powerful enough to compete with other nations, and be able to fight against them for its life. Unless we develop our resources, our aggressiveness, our educational capacities, and unless we are prepared to fight, we cannot possibly survive among the other nations of the world. We must either fight or die. That is the law of life, and we must realize it.

Before the war we could not distribute the goods of which we had an abundance, of which we had more than we ever needed for ourselves, because the financial system did not work, and now these same gentlemen come to us and tell us that they can take care of the money mechanism which controls the very lives of the people of this nation. They tell us they can carry along with the same old system and get us through. But again I say I should like to feel optimistic about that.

This war should not place any debt burden whatsoever upon the people of Canada. The Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Churchill, has spoken of "blood, sweat and tears," and he has written a book under the same title. He might have added "the material resources of the country." Beyond the blood, sweat and tears and the material resources of the country which are spent, this war should not cost the people of Canada anything. After the conclusion of the war, Canada should not owe a cent to anybody. This idea of telling the people of Canada, or of any other country for that matter, that they must be subjected to heavy taxation and the heaviest of debts—and we do not mind taxation as much as the debt—in order to pay for the war is all hay-wire. There is no need at all for this debt pyramid. Let me illustrate.

A farmer decides to build a log house for himself. He has all the logs on his own farm. He supplies his own labour. Perhaps he has to sell some of his farm produce in order to buy nails and shingles. Then, with everything necessary to build the log house, he goes ahead and completes it. After he has completed it, there is no reason in the world why he should owe anybody anything, having built it out of his own materials and by his own labour.

Similarly, the Dominion of Canada in this war is using her own natural resources, her own materials and her own labour, and with that she is building aeroplanes, ships and tanks. Yet every year we are going into debt. Why are we going into debt? What are we going into debt for? I should like to know. Of course, if we have to buy a certain amount of needed materials from the United States, we must pay for them, and in that one instance we would be incurring a small debt. But paying even for these things which we buy from the United States we pay with the exchange of goods. It follows, then, that the whole debt structure narrows down to an exchange of goods between the two countries in order that we could get the materials we require. Therefore there is no reason in the world why this government should be mortgaging the people of Canada to-day and the future generations for years to come.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, this budget clearly shows that the government is not deepely concerned about the difficulties experienced by our farmers in hiring the help they need. The government gives no indication of the means it intends to take in order to secure for agriculture the labour supply it needs. Agriculture feeds our armies and our civilian population, and it remains our first line of defence. What is the administration doing in order to maintain and stimulate that essential source of supply, that powerful factor so essential to the triumph of our arms? I cannot find in the entire budget a single resolution providing against the shortage of farm labour. I have searched in vain for such provision. How can we explain such indifference concerning a situation as alarming as the shortage of farm labour? Is the government blindly leading the country to decay, starvation and defeat? When will they open their eyes to the unfortunate lot of our farmers whose production is falling off daily and to such an extent that, in a country like ours, rationing even of farm products has already become necessary for the army and the civilian population? How often have we not pointed out to the government one of the essential duties they must fulfil, that of maintaining agriculture as our first line of defence? How often have we not urged them to stop calling up for military service young men whose labour is essential on the farm? It was a waste of time. However, no one can charge us with neglecting our duty in that connection.

There is another restriction which could easily have been avoided in Canada. I refer to the rationing of oil and gasoline. Our country's oil resources have scarcely been developed. Governments of every political stripe have shown the same lack of foresight in that respect. Why is it that our oil fields are almost untouched in many areas of the country? Who has prevented the development of such an asset as valuable in peace time as in war? We are reaping to-day the results of the culpable negligence of men whose prime duty was to ensure the development of our raw materials. And now the restrictions placed on oil and gasoline threaten the very life of our industries and our trade. They will soon affect our agriculture as well. The shipment of farm products will be greatly hindered by all those restrictions. Agriculture itself will be placed under a severe handicap. And has any thought been given to our mechanized army? The future is far from reassuring in that respect. Such are the reasons impelling me to vote against this motion.

I shall certainly not vote for this measure which is, on the whole, a challenge to the most elementary principles of political economy. Never in the history of Canada have taxpayers in the lower brackets been so cruelly and so unjustly burdened. Nor does the government give the slightest indication that it intends to prepare the people for this war's terrible aftermath? That is undoubtedly of importance to the administration at the moment. Such, however, is not our opinion, and we are determined to recall the government to reality as often as we deem it necessary. Before concluding my remarks, I shall move an amendment to the motion before the house.

Mr. Speaker, concluding my remarks, I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), the following amendment:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that, owing to the difficulties experienced by farmers in securing farm hands, the food production will be decreased as a consequence of the compulsory service to such an extent as to endanger the victory of the nations who are fighting the axis powers."

Mr. T. V. GRANT (Kings): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to follow the remarks of the last speaker, the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), because he has no followers, but I should like to put a question to him. The question is, what was the cause of the fall of France? As far as I can find out, the cause of the fall of France was, "too many political parties".

I happen to belong to an ever-increasing majority of the Liberal party; I belong to a group which seldom has a chance to speak in this house. We instinctively feel that we should allow the government to get on with the war. But the tragic part of it is that, if we happen to articulate while some of those with the gift of the gab are talking, we are told that we are not fit to represent the district which sent us here. In fact, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) himself has been guilty in that regard. But I would point out to him that if he will look up the main estimates, he will find therein that more money is provided for the little constituency of Kings which I represent than for the whole province of New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What an accomplishment!

Mr. GRANT: I did prepare a speech on the draft address, and I read it over so many times that I got sick looking at it. But I did not have an opportunity of delivering it.

I wish now to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) upon the manner in which he presented the budget to this house. I think he is a philosopher, because he knows that God gave him a brain which is adequate to overcome all such difficulties as are connected with matters of that kind. In other words, he knows that it is just a case of mind over matter. Personally I feel rather like the poor cripple who once attended a revival meeting. All the people were getting up and telling what the Lord had done for them. Finally it was this poor cripple's turn, and he said, "Well, he may have done a lot for you people, but he darn nigh ruined me."

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRANT: An hon. member in this part of the house suggests that the hon. gentleman laughs like an Indian, and he is right. My hon. friend laughs like Lord Haw-Haw. I agree with the budget in principle, but I do not think the people are taxed quite equitably. For example, take a married man with four of a family in institutions of learning. Three are over twenty-one, and he is exempted only for the one under twenty-one. This family cost that man a great deal of money, but he has no exemption in regard to three of them. Take another family, all under eighteen. Perhaps their parents did not endeavour to send them to school; perhaps they are earning a little money and bringing it into the home; yet that father is exempted for all of them.

I think the timely action of the government in controlling prices, profits and wages was well received by the people, especially the labouring classes. We are told now that the annual revenue from taxation is three times greater than it was before the war, and I believe that the lower and middle classes, although they are taxed three times as much as they were before, are more than three times better off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRANT: Yes, and they are living more prosperously and more comfortably in their homes. We are told that our farmers are being asked to produce for patriotic purposes. That is not so. Our farmers are not producing for patriotic reasons alone, because they are receiving as good prices as they ever received at any time between 1920 and 1930. They are sending their sons overseas for patriotic reasons, and that is sufficient.

In the budget, we are told that the Canadian National Railways would have had no deficit this year were it not for the cost of upkeep of the Prince Edward Island terminals and car ferries. I think I could make a suggestion that would relieve the government of the deficit at these terminals, and I am not going to follow the argument used by the leader of the opposition. I do not suggest that we should immediately build a great car ferry costing perhaps $5,000,000, equal to the one that was lost. My suggestion is that when the war is over, the government should continue this taxation for a week or ten days longer and build a tunnel from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island with the money thus accumulated in those few days. I believe that will be done if we all stick together and see that it is done. The project has already been engineered, and the cost would not be too great. The little province of Prince Edward Island has led the whole of Canada in sending her sons to the war. In the navy, the air force and the army she has led. Prince Edward Island has led the whole of Canada in Red Cross work. Prince Edward Island has led the whole of Canada in subscriptions to victory loans. The sons of Prince Edward Island have measured up in the fighting forces; the physically fit are 71·5 per cent, whereas in the rest of Canada they are only 44 per cent physically fit—even including Alberta where the interrupters come from. I think the leader of the opposition will agree with me that the first thing to be done after the war is to build a tunnel from New Brunswick to Prince Edward Island, so that we shall not be hampered for hours daily and people will be able to cross to and from the little island without so much trouble and delay.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Win the war first.

Mr. GRANT: Yes, win the war. But this has been brought up before, and I want to settle it right now. Prince Edward Island is the cradle of confederation, the million-acre garden of Canada. It is a province that could support, instead of 80,000 people, half a million people in comfort.

The leader of the opposition would have made a fine speech on the budget if he had not taken so much trouble in trying to belittle the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). When he was speaking I knew, as everyone else knew, that he was not speaking for himself. I do not believe that, when he referred to the two great statesmen who were at the conference at Washington, he was speaking for himself. Members around this part of the house, especially from Quebec, reminded him that there were three great statesmen at that conference, but he would not admit it. He would not say there were three. He was speaking, not for himself, but for Arthur Meighen. The voice was the voice of Jacob, but the hand was the hand of Esau—and the hand of Esau was hairy. I would remind the hon. member that the Prime Minister has the confidence of the people as well as of his party. Examples of this will be found in the recent by-elections and in the plebiscite. I would also remind the hon. gentleman that he has not the confidence of his party; he is there because they are not able to elect a man in Canada to put in his place.

Mr. GRAYDON: The plebiscite had nothing to do with confidence.

Mr. GRANT: Had it been a "no" vote, the hon. member would have said it was no confidence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have another glass of water.

Mr. GRANT: The leader of the opposition is here only until another man can be found to take his place; by that time he will not be there, and I do not think it becomes him to try to make out in his speech on the budget that the Prime Minister is hindering the war effort.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) made a very fine speech. He went to a great deal of trouble to tell the house that he had nothing to do with placing the Russian flag on parliament hill. I just thought at the time that "a guilty conscience needs no accuser."

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do you object to it?

Mr. GRANT: I object to his, or the C.C.F. party, trying to persuade the people of this country that they are not socialists—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Do you object to the flag on the hill?

Mr. GRANT: —because that is the policy on which they tried to win the last election.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): We were at least honest about it.

Mr. GRANT: The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) is in his seat. He made his annual stump speech on the budget. It is always getting better; he is always adding to it. It reminds me of a plant; there is first the root; then the stem and the branches, and then the dollars for leaves, and the Bradburys for fruit. But the dollars dry up and blow away, and the Bradburys are "canned."

It appears to me that it is not the Conservative members of this house, but a certain element of disgruntled politicians out of office, who are urging the leader of the opposition and his followers to try at all costs to discourage the Prime Minister of this country, to make him lose confidence in himself and the people to lose confidence in him. The slogan is, "Destroy King first and then win the war." It is no laughing matter. The public know it and we know it. They say he had no right to put the country to an expense of $1,500,000 for the plebiscite. Well, I think the people of this country, and even the Conservatives and the other groups on the other side of the house, should be proud to have a prime minister whose word is worth a million and a half dollars. I believe the Prime Minister of Canada would rather be in his grave to-day than break such an important promise to the people of Canada.

Hon. members opposite admit that the Prime Minister was a good peace-time leader, but they say he declared war on Germany and Japan too soon—in too much of a hurry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Who said that?

Mr. GRANT: You said it right over there. We have heard it several times, that he was too hasty in declaring war on Germany, Japan and Italy. But in years to come it will be said of the Prime Minister, even by his opponents, as was said of George Washington, that he was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

I see the Social Credit party are amusing themselves. I did not have time to reply to the speech made by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Hlynka), but, Mr. Speaker, he put such physical energy and such convulsive effort into his speech that I was reminded of John Hay's description of a steamboat which he once saw stranded on the shoals of one of the great lakes. He said:

> She hove and set and hove and set
> And high her rudder flung;
> And every time she hove and set
> The worser leak she sprung.

The leader of the opposition has spoken of two great statesmen, but when the history of this country comes to be written the names of two other great statesmen will be closely linked in connection with responsible government in Canada. First, I refer to the name of William Lyon Mackenzie, who fought and suffered for responsible government in Canada and afterwards sat in a duly elected parliament; and second, sir, I refer to his illustrious namesake and grandson, the present Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has spent the greater part of his life in seeking to maintain and improve responsible government in Canada.

We are told that we should have a national government in Canada, and that then everything will be peaceful and harmonious. What is the state of affairs in Britain to-day, where they have a national government? Are they not every day asking the Prime Minister of England to resign, and offering votes of want of confidence in him? Of course, we all want to win the war, and I believe we shall. But let us not depend upon Providence; let us not depend upon the slogan that England always wins the last battle. In the words of John Bright, as nearly as I can remember, I would say, "Let us not lay all our difficulties at the door of Providence; man must do his part". We must do our part. We must retrace our steps; we must shun the blunders.

and then and not until then we shall see in this country an enduring edifice of victory and peace.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have been considering the amendment moved by the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe), which was:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that, owing to the difficulties experienced by farmers in securing farm hands, the food production will be decreased as a consequence of the compulsory service to such an extent as to endanger the victory of the nations who are fighting the axis powers."

This amendment is on the same lines as the amendment which I have already ruled out of order this evening. It is an amendment which cannot be moved on going into committee of ways and means; it is a substantive motion, and it has no bearing upon or relevancy to the question before the house.

I also think this amendment is subject to the same objection which was taken to the former amendment, namely that the amendment moved by the hon. member is along lines similar to the notice of motion which appears on the order paper in his name, and which reads as follows:

Mr. Lacombe—The following proposed resolution: Whereas agriculture is essential to the upkeep of the armies and the welfare of the civil population.

Therefore be it resolved: That, in the opinion of this house, farmers, farm employees and all persons engaged in industries connected with agriculture or with war industries, should be exempt from military service and that exemption tribunals should be set up in each constituency in the country to investigate each case on its merits.

The same subject matter is contained in that notice of motion, and in accordance with the rules of the house already quoted—Beauchesne, citation No. 398; May, 13th edition, pages 525 and 526, and Bourinot, page 420—I must rule the amendment out of order.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understand there is a general feeling that the debate should be concluded this evening, and that we are near the end of it now. I therefore move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley):

That the house do not adjourn at 11 o'clock p.m. this day.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall be glad to support that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I believe this motion is debatable, and I wish to say just one word. I am one of those who have given up their place on the list of speakers, in order to save time. I have done so with the understanding that we shall have the widest latitude in discussion when we are in committee.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I intend to be very brief, Mr. Speaker. I am sure every hon. member will join in applause when I say that the mantle of Ulysses Grant has evidently fallen upon the shoulders of his namesake who has just spoken in this debate.

This is a budget so considerable in scope, sir, that it deserves close study, and it is impossible to say in a few words all we have to say in a debate such as this. Everyone realizes that with the country at war we have to assume obligations that are out of the ordinary; but when we are told that we must bear sacrifices it should be understood that the sacrifices which are made or are to be made must always be useful to the community. It was said again and again during and after the last war that one-third of the moneys voted for that war was stolen, one-third was wasted and only one-third was spent for real war purposes. At that time there were detailed estimates and public accounts. At the present time there are no detailed estimates, and the public accounts give very little information. I complained about this situation last year and was promised that there would be an improvement. There was none. I was told by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that the limit below which the details were not given was $35,000. Later this statement was corrected by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who said that items of less than $25,000 were not appearing in the public accounts.

This is an abnormal situation, and the war is not an excuse for it. Even if no one reads the public accounts from the first line to the last, they provide security for the state in that the figures are given to the public, and everyone has an opportunity to learn what is being done with regard to the spending of public money. Recently I read an article which appeared in the Monetary Times of May 30 of this year, the title of which might be taken as the text of the few remarks I have to make:

When Deceit is a Virtue

The art of camouflage flourishes during war time until it becomes exotic trickery, flinging the cloak of invisibility over once visible objects. It is as ancient as war itself and just as difficult.

We live in times when things are not called by their own names. It seems there has been a shake-up of the dictionary, and it is most difficult for any one of us to know exactly what is going on behind the curtain. Members of parliament are not consulted; their advice is not sought before policies of great importance are drafted and submitted to this house. We have the feeling of doing nothing, while we are willing to do our very best to help the government; and those who are substituted for us are men without contact with the people, men whose heads are filled with theories that may bring this country to disaster. I remember that the day after the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) announced that this country was to make a gift to Great Britain of a thousand million dollars, a dispatch appeared in either the morning or the afternoon newspapers to the effect that the news had been received very coldly in Great Britain. It was only after this that the newspapers published the cablegram which was sent by Mr. Churchill.

That is not all, sir. It is the poor who have to pay to the rich. This was the policy enunciated by Mr. Bennett, who thought those who should be taxed were not the rich but the poor, in order to make them realize the importance of raising public money and of taxation in government business.

That gift of one billion dollars is an absurdity. There is no precedent for it. I have no objection to helping Great Britain, but why do we not have a recognition of that gift? It would have put Great Britain to no embarrassment, and it would have given us an opportunity to discuss peace with Great Britain and the other countries on business terms. I should like to quote from the great English financial weekly, The Economist, of April 25, 1942. A report from their Ottawa correspondent, dated March 19, reads:

> At the present rate of British procurement in Canada, this sum will last for something less than twelve months. An extension of the gift policy can be foreseen when the amount is exhausted, unless in the meantime an arrangement by which pooling of production surpluses of the united nations is then in operation. Conceivably, the Canadian surplus might then be pooled and drawn on by the United Kingdom and other allies under terms not yet executed. Other heavy customers of Canadian war materials at present are Egypt, India and Australia in the sterling area and Russia and China outside it. The new Canadian proposal is designed to avoid the growth of an unmanageable war debt between Canada and Britain. Logically it should apply to other allies who share access to Canadian war output. There is a growing sentiment at Ottawa that an allied pooling arrangement should be effected speedily. Negotiations with Washington and London are leading to some such arrangement.

It is a yearly instalment, and we shall have to expect more of that absurd policy. It is suggested that it should be extended to other countries. Have we the means to do that? My answer is "no." What was the purpose of doing it? It was to redeem securities held in Great Britain. I should like to remind the house of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said on March 20, 1941, as reported on pages 1868 and 1869 of Hansard. He said:

> My hon. friend—

That was myself.

> —refers to Sir Edward Peacock and to the mission on which he is engaged in the United States. There has been no suggestion that his mission will be extended to Canada, nor have I any expectation that it will be so extended.

In the Montreal Gazette of June 25 I noted that the great financier, Sir Edward Peacock, was here along with Sir Arthur Salter; that both were at the Ritz Carlton in Montreal. A number of questions asked by me were answered in return No. 290 of May 23. The question I asked was:

> Did Sir Edward Peacock come to Canada on or about June 25, 1941? If so, did the Honourable Minister of Finance meet him? If not, was he met by other members of the cabinet?

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) reported no information. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) reported that Sir Edward Peacock was met by the minister himself. I would not be surprised if the Minister of Munitions and Supply met Sir Edward Peacock when he was in the United States and when he was doing some business with him regarding the amalgamation of the railways.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am authorized by my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, who is not present, to say that he had no discussion with Sir Edward Peacock on any occasion with regard to the amalgamation of the railways or the repatriation of the Canadian Pacific Railway stock.

Mr. POULIOT: The answer is given by Mr. Sheils, the deputy. I asked:

> Did Sir Edward Peacock come to Canada on or about June 25, 1941?

And the department answered "yes". My next question was:

> If so, did the Honourable Minister of Finance meet him?

The answer given was:

> To be answered elsewhere.

The next question was:

If not, was he met by other members of the cabinet?

The answer given was:

Yes, by the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Did Sir Edward Peacock come to Canada just to meet the Minister of Munitions and Supply and say, "how do you do?", and hear him say in reply "how do you do?" When I asked if Sir Edward Peacock would come here, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told me that he did not believe he would, and yet we have the statement that the Minister of Munitions and Supply met him. That statement is more authoritative than hearsay evidence from the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance cannot speak from his own personal knowledge because he was not in Ottawa at the time.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. POULIOT: There was a reply from the Department of Transport that they had no information regarding the visit in question. There is also a memorandum dated May 5 and addressed to Miss Breen, which reads:

Referred for the desired information, please, so far as questions 3 and 4.

That is signed by A. J. Maingot, for the deputy minister. Then there is a note to Mr. Maingot which reads:

The minister did not meet Sir Edward Peacock on or about June 25, 1941.

That is signed by L. Breen. Why was the Minister of National Defence appointed Acting Minister of Finance? How is it that the Minister of National Defence has enough spare time to be Acting Minister of Finance in times like these?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of National Defence is always the Acting Minister of Finance in the absence of the Minister of Finance and has been since he was Minister of Finance. He is always the Acting Minister of Finance when he is here.

Mr. POULIOT: It is worse than I thought.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a long standing arrangement.

Mr. POULIOT: It is absurd. The Minister of Finance should look after the Department of Finance and, if he is absent, he should have an acting minister who is not as busy as the Minister of National Defence. The Department of National Defence is the most important department in this war, and I do not see how the Minister of National Defence has the spare time to look after the Department of Finance, the wartime prices and trade board, and all the other things that come under the finance department. There is something else I should like to ask the minister. If he likes he may answer me after I am through, or he can take a note of it. How is it that the Minister of National Defence was appointed Acting Minister of Finance precisely at the time when Sir Edward Peacock was in Montreal?

Mr. ILSLEY: He was appointed as soon as I became Minister of Finance; he has always been the Acting Minister of Finance in my absence, and was long before Sir Edward Peacock came to Montreal. It was in the summer of 1940.

Mr. POULIOT: Both got two degrees later on at Lennoxville; they got two mortarboards, one for each head. Why was the Minister of National Defence the Acting Minister of Finance at that very moment? The Minister of Finance knows very well that it is not the practice of the Prime Minister to appoint an Acting Prime Minister unless he leaves the country. When the Minister of Finance was in this country, in his native country, I do not see why the Minister of National Defence was appointed as his deputy while Sir Edward Peacock was here. There is no record in the Prime Minister's office or in the Department of External Affairs about this matter. I wonder if there is any record about it in Laurier house—but I shall not go as far as that. I am really concerned about this whole business of the amalgamation of the railways, which is being done in the dark. I am sorry to see the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) smiling, because the bank of Montreal, of which he was a director, is greatly interested in this amalgamation of the railways also in the Canadian Pacific Railway. I shall not go further on this occasion, but I may on some other occasion.

The reasons why I have always been opposed to national government or union government or any government of the kind are three. It is that in the first place I do not want the opposition to be destroyed. Under our system of government an opposition is necessary, provided it is not composed of yes-men to every measure of the government, and provided also that, instead of making absurd suggestions to the government, they make constructive suggestions.

The second reason why I have always been opposed to national or union government is precisely that I am opposed to conscription for overseas. The third reason is that I am opposed to the amalgamation of the railways, for I know very well that if that is done, it will be done not for the public benefit but for the benefit of private individuals who desire to make lots of money at the expense of the Canadian public.

I read in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday—and this shows the absurdity of the billion-dollar gift to Great Britain—"United Kingdom treasury income rises £235,000,000 during first quarter." The dispatch reads as follows:

London, June 30 (CP Cable)—Exchequer returns isued to-night showed a net increase of more than £235,000,000 ($1,045,750,000) in total ordinary revenue during the first quarter of the current financial year as compared to the same quarter a year ago.

Receipts advanced from £319,157,988 to £554,710,654.

Of the total net increase, £98,000,000 came from the Canadian government, which is contributing £225,000,000 to Britain's treasury during the year.

The total ordinary expenditure during the period was £1,295,390,988 against £1,074,280,716, with the supply services taking £1,198,277,500 against £985,444,300.

In Great Britain the revenues are, of course, much greater than ours. Here our deficit reaches the astronomical figure of four billion dollars in this budget.

I do not have the time to say all I have to say respecting the boards that have been created by this government. My idea of government is that the government shall act as a pendulum between the people and big business, and between labour and capital. At the present time the men who are on these boards are men who are engaged in private business and who have not enough public spirit to determine the policies of this country. In my humble view, no policy should be enacted before the members of parliament, who do not suffer from agoraphobia, have had an opportunity to explain it to their constituents. The members are in close touch with their constituents and can listen to their views and afterwards inform the government what they think should be done.

I hold in my hand a weekly from Winnipeg. It is a most interesting article entitled "Big Business and the Wartime Prices and Trade Board". What is known is that the rulers in that board at the present time are E. G. Burton of the Robert Simpson Company, Toronto, and George Young, of Eaton's. They are the men who decide upon the retail trade policies that are followed by the government. Do you know what is my experience, Mr. Speaker, with this board with very few exceptions? When I desire to get some information from one of these so-called big men, I have to call at least ten persons. When I reach the tenth one, the expert, the one who knows all about the matter, his answer is, "I know nothing about it. Ask my secretary", and the secretary sometimes knows more than he does.

What is done in other countries? As soon as any other country does anything, even Germany, it has to be copied here. There is a complete lack of imagination, which I think is most unfortunate. Once when I was addressing a group of Canadian mayors here in Ottawa I was asked by a mayor from one of the maritime cities this question, "Are you ready to suggest that everything that is done in the United States shall be copied by Canada?" My answer was, "No, we should copy only what is the very best." But here is a thing that was done in the United States that should be done here. It was done by a man whom I am proud to have met and who, with General MacArthur, is one of the great soldiers of the day. I refer to Lieutenant-General Brehon Somervell, who made a success of the WPA in the city of New York, and who was the engineer responsible for the building of LaGuardia field in the vicinity of New York. I quote from the New York Times of June 21, an article headed "'Curse of Army' Scrapped—Rubber Stamps go on Pile", and reading as follows:

Washington, June 20.—Lieutenant-General Brehon Somervell looked on approvingly to-day as workmen threw hundreds of rubber stamps on the rubber scrap pile, collected from the war department's thirty-two Washington buildings.

"There goes the curse of the army," he remarked.

Holding a rubber stamp between thumb and forefinger, General Somervell, commander of the army's services of supply, posed for photographers with the 15-ton pile as a backdrop. He asked that the picture be captioned, "Rubber Stamps Going into Discard."

Would it not be a good thing to have the same thing done in this country? But who would have the courage to do it? I urge upon the Minister of Finance the necessity of following the example of that great man. If he does so, he will surely be approved by the Canadian public.

I want now to refer to a front-page article in the five o'clock edition of the Ottawa Evening Journal of July 3, 1940, two years ago to-morrow. The article is entitled: "Want Canadians to Halt Nazis if they Land—Dominion Troops have 'More Novel Conception of Warfare'." The article reads:

London, July 3.—Lord Mottistone, who as "Jack" Seely commanded the Canadian cavalry in the first great war, suggested in the House of Lords to-day that Canadian troops should be chosen to engage the enemy if he lands in Britain because of "their more novel conception of warfare".

He recommended the Canuck soldiers not because he served with them in the last war for three and a half years and so knew their value, but because amongst these Canadian divisions—and this also applies to other divisions overseas where there are wider spaces—there are people with more novel conceptions of warfare.

Lord Mottistone said he had made the suggestion to a Canadian officer with a distinguished record, who had replied, "that just suits me".

He was introducing a motion in the upper house asking the government to take prompt action to increase the offensive power and equipment of the citizens of Britain. Equipment had been greatly increased, he declared, but the method of meeting an invasion needed more consideration.

This was said by Lord Mottistone. What did Herbert Morrison say in London? It is reported in the morning press of July 1. I have a Quebec paper in my hand, I do not have an English clipping; but this is what Mr. Morrison stated:

He declared that if a second front is opened it will be the Canadian troops who will constitute the spearhead of the allied armies that are to invade Europe.

The word "spearhead" is just the expression which was used by General Crerar a month and a half ago.

I was very sorry to read in the press yesterday and to-day what the Prime Minister said in the house. It was a hint that the time for action in Europe was closer for the forces of Canada. Plenty of water has been running under the mill from July 3, 1940 to July 1, 1942. Now we see the effect of the propaganda which has been made by paid agents with this government and other influential people to induce them to forget that Canada is their country, and to put to shame Canadians who desire to stress the necessity of defending this country. We have the lesson of all other countries in the world, and I find it most illogical that the nearer the danger is to us the more men are sent overseas. What was the solemn promise which was made to the British government by the Minister of National Defence in the first winter of the war? He never told this house. I asked him once, and he did not answer me; he just mentioned a promise, without telling what it was, at a meeting which was held in the committee room, after the adjournment of one of the sessions, and at which were present the two hon. members for Ottawa. But we as members of the House of Commons had no details about it. At that time the number of recruits that were to be called up was only one-half of the number that we have now. Therefore I wonder whether a second promise has not been made by some member of the government to send all our men overseas and to keep nobody here to defend this country or to operate war industry. Can you expect, sir, men coming out of the Lady Grey hospital here in Ottawa, sufferers from tuberculosis, or from the Lake Edward sanatorium in the province of Quebec, to act as brakemen or firemen on the railways? Railways are a war industry. That was admitted by the Minister of National Defence himself in the railways and shipping committee. Therefore, sir, that work should be done by men who are fit, and this is the more necessary because of the tremendous amount of traffic that we have now. What about the other industries in which we need able-bodied men to do work which is to help the army as well as the civilian population? But this, sir, does not count. You cannot put men who suffer from tuberculosis, men over the military age, men unfit for military service, in these very responsible positions. And this is the idea of sacrifice! One day I said that the "Isaac" atmosphere of sacrifice was all wrong; and the reporter put "Isis", but that is not what I said. We should not consider these matters from the sentimental point of view. Everything should be reasoned precisely in war time. Military science is just the application of common sense to the realities of life.

What I fear, is not what is done openly but what is under camouflage, what is hidden because one is afraid of telling "the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth" to the Canadian people, who deserve to hear nothing than that.

I regret that I am very miserable in the house since I have lost a very dear friend, one who was most unselfish, who was a friend of every hon. member and the sanest adviser the Prime Minister ever had. At times I did not agree with him on certain matters, but it was possible to discuss things with him, although I did not abuse the privilege. He was a big brother to me, and he was the right hand of the Prime Minister. I know the Prime Minister feels his loss very deeply. He will remember also that during the Christmas season when he went to Washington to meet Mr. Churchill as well as President Roosevelt, I sent him a telegram of good wishes, and I added to it, "Please, sir, when you get to Washington do not forget the memory of Ernest Lapointe, who was your best friend as well as mine." There is a saying to the effect that the dead go fast, but in my view, sir, if Mr. Lapointe had been alive, there are many difficulties which we would not now have to face.

There is another thing that I want to say. At home I have a picture of the first cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, taken in the council room, and on the wall there is a painting representing Our Lord among the doctors of law in the temple. I wonder if that painting is still there or if it has been removed. At any rate, it was an inspiration for the ministers of the day to have a reminder of Christian ideals while they were discussing national problems. I hope that if the picture is not there, the idea which it portrays has not been forgotten, and that in all the policies that are to be submitted to this house the first consideration will be, not of any other country, but of Canada first. I have never said this so loud, but it is time now to come down to earth. What is the difference between a statesman and a politician? A statesman is such a great man that his head is above the clouds and he does not see what happens on the earth; a politician is a smaller man, with his head under the clouds, who sees what is going on. I suggest to the ministers that they be not influenced by the flattery of interested men who want jobs, contracts or favours. Let them not forget that quotation from the scriptures that "the wounds of those who love are better than the kisses of those who hate".

Mr. ST. LAURENT: As a matter of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state for the information of the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) that I was for a few months a member of the board of directors of the bank of Montreal; that I resigned therefrom when I became a member of this government; that I never at any time discussed any matter, relating directly or indirectly to amalgamation of the Canadian railways, with anyone connected with the bank of Montreal, nor did I at any time hear any matter, relating directly or indirectly to any such amalgamation, discussed by any person connected in any way with the bank of Montreal.

Mr. POULIOT: I would not have said it if the minister had not smiled when I was speaking seriously.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RALSTON

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. POULIOT IN DEBATE ON JULY 2

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, on a matter of privilege I should like to make reference to a statement which was made by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) last night about a matter to which he had previously referred but to which I had not paid any attention because a return had already been brought down in the house with respect to it.

Some time ago the hon. member indicated that I had met Sir Edward Peacock in Montreal in June, 1941, and discussed with him the amalgamation of the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific railways. That reference is at pages 3211 and 3212 of Hansard. The member had also intimated that I had met Sir Edward Peacock on that occasion in my capacity as Acting Minister of Finance. A memorandum from my office was quoted by the hon. member at page 4209 of Hansard indicating that I did not meet Sir Edward Peacock on or about June 25, 1941. Notwithstanding the statement made in the memorandum which he himself read, the hon. member brought up the matter again last night and asked the question:

Why was the Minister of National Defence appointed Acting Minister of Finance? How is it that the Minister of National Defence has enough spare time to be Acting Minister of Finance?

Later he said:

I do not see why the Minister of National Defence was appointed as his deputy—

That is, deputy to the Minister of Finance.

—while Sir Edward Peacock was here.

The implication is that by some kind of skullduggery I was appointed acting Minister of Finance in order that I might discuss with Sir Edward Peacock the amalgamation of the railways. I think it best once and for all to deal with all these matters together.

I want to say to the house that I was not appointed acting Minister of Finance for any purpose connected in the remotest particular with any discussion of the amalgamation of the railways. My appointment as acting Minister of Finance was made in 1940 and took effect automatically in any case in which the minister was absent; that I never saw or had any communication directly or indirectly with Sir Edward Peacock in June, 1941; that I never at any time saw him, or anyone representing him, in my capacity as acting Minister of Finance; and that I never at any time, either as a member of the government or personally, discussed with Sir Edward Peacock, or anybody representing him, the amalgamation of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways or anything relating to the railways.

VANCOUVER ISLAND

ENEMY ATTACK UPON ESTEVAN POINT TELEGRAPH STATION ON JUNE 20

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence to representations which have been made to me which indicate that residents on the west coast of British Columbia are disturbed over the length of time it took the military command there to send planes to Estevan Point at the time of the recent shelling of that locality by an enemy raider. Could the minister make a statement which would allay any existing doubts or fears as to the adequacy of our defences to meet such situations as the one mentioned?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend gave me notice that he would ask a question of this kind. In the absence of my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) I had inquiries made with regard to the messages which were sent on the night in question, and I have satisfied myself that they were sent promptly. I would not care to give the house details of all that took place, because I am advised that the information is secret and would be useful to the enemy. But I can say that the messages were sent and were received and that the matter was considered on the spot. The flying conditions were unsuitable at air bases nearest to Estevan Point at the time of the attack, but aircraft were out at dawn next morning and searched the ocean areas off the west coast of Vancouver island, without detecting the enemy ship. A bomber was dispatched from an air base more distant from the point to which the hon. member refers, but it crashed in taking off. The officers advise me that it is doubtful if it could have arrived in time to locate the raider.

ARMING OF VANCOUVER ISLAND VOLUNTEERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In that same connection, may I make an inquiry of the minister? I have had a communication from a prominent gentleman of Courtney, which I believe is on Vancouver island, regarding the arming of the Rangers, which is a volunteer establishment set up, I believe, for home defence, and especially against invasion. May I ask the minister if any arrangements are being made to issue arms in the nature of, say, rifles and the like, to the Rangers?

Mr. RALSTON: Arrangements are being made to issue arms in as great quantities and just as fast as possible. I may say that special arrangements were made the other day with regard to some special arms, in that connection.

GASOLINE

USE OF TRUCKS BY FARMERS ON SUNDAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): On June 12, I asked the Minister of Munitions and Supply what attitude the government intended to take regarding the removal of the discrimination against farmers with regard to the use of their trucks for transportation purposes. On the same day the Minister of Finance finally stated, as reported in Hansard, page 3307:

> The matter will be looked into, and in so far as there is discrimination that it is practicable to remove, it will be removed.

The same state of affairs still prevails and is causing a great deal of trouble among farmers all over the country—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And dissatisfaction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And dissatisfaction as well. Is the minister now in a position to say whether the removal of this discrimination has been considered, and if so, whether an order has been made, or will be made at once, to remove this source of annoyance and difficulty?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, just after the hon. gentleman discussed the matter in the house I made inquiries, and I was informed that an order had been issued authorizing certain regional officials to make provision for certain cases, and that that order was outstanding at that time. The hon. gentleman's remarks were brought to the attention of the proper officers, and I was told that provision had already been made for attending to particular cases. The rule was not changed, as far as that goes, but certain discretionary powers were vested in the regional officers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is not good enough.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If I may be permitted, the only order I know of is that a farmer may apply, for instance, in any one province, to an official at the capital of that province, for permission to use his truck on a particular Sunday for transportation purposes. That is quite an impossible situation. I again ask the minister to bring to the attention of the authorities the difficulty experienced by farmers through the failure of the government to remove this regulation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

STATEMENT AS TO DISTRIBUTION OF FRENCH TRANSLATION OF BUDGET RESOLUTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Quebec West and South (Mr. Parent) yesterday, before the orders of the day were called, complained about the failure of the government to make available in the French language the ways and means resolutions. His words were these—Hansard, page 3865:

> How can we judge the importance of the budget until we know the items which will be fought out, or amended if it is possible, without having knowledge of the budget in itemized form? I believe this situation should be remedied without delay, and for my part I am not prepared to support the budget until I have read what is in it. Until that time I must be counted as against the budget as a whole. When it comes into committee of ways and means, I reserve my right to discuss the items after I have been able to read them in my own language.

I find that all the ways and means resolutions were printed in the French language on June 23 or June 24, as part of my budget speech, in Hansard, and I find also that they were printed in French on June 23 or June 24 in Votes and Proceedings. It is true that subsequently they were again printed, separately, for convenience of hon. members; the separate printing in English was made available about Tuesday of this week, and I was informed yesterday that they would be available in French to-day.

JACK SIMON

The house in committee on Bill No. 31, for the relief of Jack Simon—Mr. Bercovitch—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. HANSELL: Mr. Chairman, since you are on Bill No. 31 I wish to make a few remarks in connection with these bills in general. I might have done so before Mr. Speaker left the chair, but I simply choose this bill, not because it is in any way particularly distinct from the others, but because the evidence submitted is so voluminous that it attracted my attention. Usually when I receive the printed evidence in these cases I immediately consign them to the waste-paper basket, on the assumption that if you read one of them you have read them all. This particular case, however, is fatter than the others; it takes 140 pages to cover the evidence.

I have taken the trouble to read every bit of the evidence in this case, and I find nothing in it which could be taken as a reason for the granting of a divorce. As we all know, in Canada the only ground upon which a divorce can be granted in any province or by this parliament is proof of adultery.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not the only ground.

Mr. HANSELL: If I am not well informed in that regard, I stand corrected, but that is my understanding of the matter. I have tried to be a bit of a student of this subject. How successful I have been is of course a matter of opinion, but I claim that the survival of a nation or a race is dependent very largely, if not entirely, upon the moral character of the people. Conversely, the downfall of a nation is caused, I venture to say, entirely by its loose character, its loose living, its disregard for the divine prerogatives of God our Creator and Father.

I am not alone in my alarm at the extent to which divorce is becoming a subject of meagre concern to the people of this country, and, as the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) interjects, to this House of Commons. I agree. I noticed when you were reading these bills, Mr. Chairman, it was as though you were reading a book. It is all a matter of routine. We have approximately eighty-nine divorce bills to pass this afternoon. We regard it as a matter of routine, a matter of course; all we have to do is to read the names, call the sections, and presto! the man or woman is separated from wife or husband as the case may be.

That is not good enough. We have to regard things a little more seriously than we do. I believe I am right in saying that practically all British law is based upon the laws given by the greatest of all law givers, and the laws given by Moses were not merely the product of human thinking. In my opinion at any rate, very largely the ancient Jewish race was the race used by Almighty God through which he might deal with the world, and in the giving of laws through Moses there was the basis upon which the Creator of all mankind was thenceforward to establish a properly constituted government of the human race.

I claim that the laws of Moses in respect of the matter of divorce are, shall I say, a reflection of the mind of the Creator. Of course I shall be open to question in respect to that interpretation. But the laws of Moses regarded the matter of divorce as so serious that the penalty imposed for adultery was none other than death by stoning. Of course I am not recommending that. My friend interjects that there would be a lot of dead men in Canada if that were done. Nevertheless that is the basis of it all. It is a crime against the human race, and I say again that I am alarmed at the loose way in which this entire subject is handled. I shall come back to that in a moment.

I have chosen this case because it seems to be outstanding in its lack of evidence that adultery was committed. The woman of course was seen alone with a man. What man among us has not at some time or other been seen alone with a lady friend? This lady happened to drive this man home several times while her husband was out of town. That was all brought into the evidence. Now, that sort of evidence is pretty scanty. While the bill is not based entirely upon that, it is based partly upon it. I will read some passages that show that point.

Mr. CLEAVER: Give us the Saturday night and Sunday morning episode.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know what my friend is talking about.

Mr. CLEAVER: I am asking the hon. member to give us the evidence on which this divorce application was founded.

Mr. HANSELL: I will read some.

Mr. CLEAVER: Yes, you will leave out the important part.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend can speak if he wishes and bring out further evidence if he thinks it necessary. It is some time since I read this, and I have not every page at my finger tips. An hon. member says, "Don't waste our time." I am not concerned about that remark. I have as much right to sit at my desk or stand and speak as any other hon member. I did not waste any time last night when I gave up my place in order that the budget debate might be concluded.

I have been unable to find any specific evidence in this case which could be regarded as proper ground for divorce. This lady drove a man around alone—she admitted it. I think it was about five times in the course of three months.

The divorce committee sized up this evidence in a very peculiar way. That is what I am more or less taking objection to. I like to weigh a case on grounds indicated by evidence, but in this case I do not find any. I could read a lot of little pieces from the evidence that might be regarded as spicy, but I am not going to do that. But any hon. member can go through this case and I declare he will not find any evidence of the ground upon which we in this country grant divorces.

Let me read something from page 122:

Q. Did you at any time—I am sorry to put this question to you—

I will not read that. The woman denies the accusation.

The Hon. Mr—perhaps I better not read the name; call him Mr. X. It is one of the gentlemen on the committee in the other house.

An hon. MEMBER: A senator?

Mr. HANSELL. Yes. It is page 122:

Hon. Mr. X.:
Q. Did you kiss Charlie?—A. No.
Q. Ever?—A. No.
Q. Did Charlie kiss you?—A. No
Q. Put his arms around you?—A. No.
Q. I should like to ask a question about something that puzzles me. Why did you keep going out to the race course and giving Charlie rides? You were a married woman and you knew your husband would object to your meeting Charlie and taking him. Why did you do it?—A. I didn't keep giving him rides. I mean, it happened on two occasions.
Q. You met him quite often at the race course?—A. Twice.
Q. And you went to the Pot-au-Feu and had meals twice?—A. Those were the only two times.
Q. And the policeman caught you. That was three times. And you picked him up and drove him down the road, and you admitted you were driving when you were followed by the green car. That was another time. That sort of thing extended over a couple of months. Why did you do that? You were a married woman, with a baby. Why did you do that?—A. I knew him, and if I was driving that way I stopped and picked him up.
Q. But you made it convenient to be always there when Charlie needed a car. Why did you do that?—A. I imagine he needed a car at other times.
Q. Yes, but every time you had a chance you were there. Why did you do that? You gave Charlie how many rides altogether, from the date your husband left until July 25?—A. About five times.
Q. You are sure not more than that?—A. Yes.
Q. Why did you do that? Did you write your husband and tell him you were doing that?—A. No.

The woman was perfectly honest in what she was answering.

Q. You never told you husband until long afterwards, did you, about Charlie? Did you ever tell your husband about him?—A. Yes, I told my husband about Charlie.
Q. When?—A. In fact, I asked him if I could not play golf with him.
Q. When?—A. Some time in June, I believe.
Q. After he came back from the coast?—A. Yes.

I do not know how much of this I should read.

Q. The thing that puzzles me, as one of the judges here, is why you kept giving this man rides, why you went to the Pot-au-Feu and had meals with him, why you were worried about that green car following, and why you were worried when you were caught by the policeman. Why did you do those things? Your brother-in-law was ready to go driving with you, and —— was ready to go driving with you. But you took Charlie. Why did you do that?—A. It was in the day time. If he had any place to go, I gave him a lift, that was all.

Q. That does not satisfy me. You knew that your husband would not like it, your driving Charlie like that, because you had been discussing this divorce business before, you had been discussing it over three or four or five years?—A. Well, my husband had been discussing it.

Q. You knew it; you had taken part?—A. Yes.

Q. And you deliberately went out with Charlie, after those troubles with your husband. You have to satisfy me on that before you get my vote.

Before she could get the vote of one of the members of the committee she had to satisfy him as to why she drove out in her car with Charlie. That had nothing whatever to do with any evidence of actual adultery.

You have not done it yet.

That is, she had not satisfied him.

Supposing your whole story is true, I am not satisfied about those incidents. You and your husband had discussed this divorce business over a period of four or five years, and yet you deliberately took Charlie out on four or five occasions. . . . Why did you do that?

Hon. Mr. Y: And the detectives swear it was many times more.

Hon. Mr. X:

Q. Yes, the same detective agency that you mentioned, which confirms their story that they were following you.—A. Yes, I knew they were following me.

Q. Then why did you keep picking up Charlie, with those facts before you? That is what you have to explain to this committee.

I claim that was not proper evidence to be brought out before that committee.

You have to get rid of that onus.

That is, the onus of driving that man around.

Hon. Mr. XX:

Q. Were you doing it for pure cussedness? Some women would. Were you?—A. No.

I shall conclude with just a few more lines. Listen to this:

Hon. Mr. X:

Q. I cannot imagine Charlie getting in that car so many times and not kissing you. My senses say that this cannot happen.

Imagine that going into the evidence.

A. Why can't it happen?

Q. I do not see how it could happen. But, leave that out. You knew in June you were being followed?—A. Yes.

Q. And you still persisted in those drives with Charlie?

Hon. Mr. Y: We cannot understand why Charlie would be so different from the members of this committee in the same circumstances.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose I shall ever be a Liberal; in fact I know I never shall be. I do not suppose I shall ever be a Conservative. Therefore I do not suppose I shall ever reach the senate. But if I do reach the senate I trust I shall not be placed on a committee such as this, if they have to weigh evidence of this kind and make statements like these.

Hon Mr. XX: Mind you, Charlie is twenty-seven; don't forget that. Pardon me for interrupting. I want to give the woman a chance and tell her the difficulty that is in my mind. She was warned.

The difficulty that happened to be in that hon. gentleman's mind was not the question of whether or not this woman had committed a crime, and I call it a crime regardless of whether it is so regarded in the criminal code; the difficulty this committee member had was that she was going out for rides with some other man twenty-seven years of age. That, Mr. Speaker, is the sort of thing that is inflicted upon this honourable house when we grind through the mill some ninety divorce cases, as we are asked to do this afternoon. I appeal to the house—I should not say in order to show this country that we are not simply a divorce mill—to take some of this evidence into consideration and turn down these bills where adultery has not been absolutely and positively proved. I for one am going to vote against this bill, as I will vote against most of them. If adultery has been committed, however, then I believe divorce is the proper thing.

Just one further word before I sit down. I believe most of these bills give those concerned the right to remarry, a matter which has been discussed in this house previously. Some time ago I referred to the laws of Moses, under which the penalty for this crime was death. I need not say to this honourable house that the Creator of all mankind desires to have in existence a pure and unadulterated race; notwithstanding that, some of these persons who are granted divorces reek from head to foot with social disease. We give them the right to marry again; yes, and as an hon. member suggests, they can be divorced the second or third time, if they wish. I say that sort of system is entirely too loose for a nation which expects to enjoy the smiling countenance and approval of Our Father and God.

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec - Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Chairman, we are being asked to consider ninety divorce bills. I listened attentively to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) and I protest vigorously against the wholesale passing of these measures.

Who are those called upon to judge the evidence given in these divorce cases submitted to the Senate and the House of Commons? Senators who have reached a certain age, old fizgigs who for the most part have a certain decorative value but who are in no way qualified to interpret the laws of evidence and treat with contempt the testimony they hear, as the hon. member for Macleod pointed out a moment ago. They assemble in Ottawa where they sit for a very few days before returning home and, presto, we have about ninety divorce bills dumped into our laps, all to be passed within the space of fifteen minutes or so!

Mr. Chairman, the House of Commons is not a divorce mill. It is true that the province of Quebec has no divorce courts and we desire none, for the sanctioning of divorce goes against the principles of our religious faith. Personally I oppose divorce, but if the law makes such a procedure mandatory let us at least entrust to a qualified agency the consideration of these divorce cases.

Since I have been here in Ottawa, I know for a fact that the House of Commons has passed as many as 200 divorce bills in a single session. Mr. Chairman, it is high time that something were done. That is why I intend to move that a vote be taken on each of these bills and particularly on Bill No. 31, the evidence concerning which has just been submitted to us and appears most insufficient to my mind.

I may say in passing that I regret to see certain hon. members accept, thoughtlessly I am sure, the chairmanship of house committees of this nature. I note that it is the custom to pass these bills in a wholesale fashion, more often than not without discussion. That is a mistake and we should have started long ago to vote against these divorce bills.

Mr. LALONDE (Translation): I wish to join the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) in protesting against the wholesale passing of the divorce bills now before us. Last year, and this year again I believe, I was appointed to the divorce committee of the House of Commons but I never sat there. I have always refused to sit on that committee and I will not change my mind. I have no wish to sanction decisions that exemplify the deplorable conditions prevailing in our Christian society. I agree with what the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) has so aptly said, and I shall vote against this bill. I take this opportunity to point out that the time has come for all hon. members, whatever their race or religion, to do something for the improvement of our society. There is an urgent need for the reconstruction of Christian society on a sound basis despite the fact that, owing to some differences on matters of principle, divorce is recognized in certain provinces while Quebec opposes it on many grounds.

As I said, I wish to join in the protests that have been voiced this afternoon and I repeat that if a vote is taken I shall register my opposition to the bill.

CANADIAN DENTAL ASSOCIATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 42, to incorporate the Canadian Dental Association —Mr. McIlraith—Mr. McCann in the chair.

On section 1—Incorporation.

Mr. STIRLING: I wonder if the sponsor of the bill would be good enough to make an explanatory statement? My recollection is that he did so on a previous occasion, on the second reading, I think, but I am unable to turn it up in Hansard.

Mr. McILRAITH: On May 29. To save time I might give the explanation again. The bill is very simple. The Canadian Dental association has been in existence as an unincorporated body since the year 1902. The dental profession have incorporated bodies or associations in each of the nine provinces, and these provincial associations have been consulted and have consented to the present bill. The membership of the association is in the neighbourhood of 4,000. The scheme of the bill follows exactly the scheme used in the Canadian Medical Association Act, which act will be found as chapter 62 of the statutes, 8-9 Edward VII.

The objects are set out in detail in section 2 of the bill. It will be seen from these objects that the licensing and control of qualifications and the practice of the dental profession are not covered by this act but are left with the provincial associations. I think that is perhaps all that I can usefully say at the moment, but if there are any questions I shall be very glad to answer them so far as I can.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the passage of this act mean the setting up of a body to pass on the qualifications required by this association?

Mr. McILRAITH: No; this association will have no control over the licensing or over the qualifications of the profession. The real object behind the incorporation arose from practical difficulties in connection with the publication of their magazine. This magazine has a wide circulation, but when it came to making contracts for advertising and other matters in connection with the magazine it was necessary to have the contracts signed by each of the nine provincial associations or incorporated bodies. This involved a great deal of delay and many practical inconveniences, and it was because of these difficulties that incorporation was sought.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is this body to deal in real estate? Section 6 provides that the association may:

(i) acquire by purchase, lease, gift, legacy or otherwise any real and personal estate and property,—

And:

(iii) sell, manage, develop, lease, mortgage, dispose of or otherwise deal therewith in such manner as the association may determine:

Provided that real estate held by the association shall not exceed in value at any one time the sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. McILRAITH: That section I believe is copied from the act of 1909 incorporating the Canadian Medical association. I know that it is not the intention of this association in any way to deal in real estate, but it is the practice in these acts to enable the association to hold real estate for its own purposes as incidental to the main purposes of the organization, and that top limit of $500,000 is put in as the limit for any real estate the association may own. That is my understanding of the purpose of the section.

Sections 2 to 7 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SAGUENAY TRANSMISSION COMPANY, LTD., SAGUENAY ELECTRIC COMPANY AND ALUMINUM POWER COMPANY, LTD.

Mr. J. E. A. DUBUC (Chicoutimi) moved the second reading of Bill No. 99, respecting certain transmission and distribution lines of Saguenay Transmission Company, Ltd., Saguenay Electric Company and Aluminum Power Company, Ltd.

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): I wish to make a few observations with regard to this bill—not, I may say, with any desire to oppose it. I understand that the companies named in the bill have from time to time constructed their electrical transmission lines over certain streams or rivers which are now declared to be navigable, and the object of the bill is to remove any doubt as to their right so to construct them. I understand that the applicants are subsidiaries of the Aluminum Company of Canada, which in turn is a subsidiary of the Aluminum Company of America.

Power has been developed on a big scale in that part of Quebec's hinterland known as the Saguenay river basin. Owing to the demand for aluminum in the construction of aeroplanes, power construction has been stepped up very considerably, and within the last year or year and a half, a million horsepower has been developed in that area, making a total development of approximately 1,750,000 horse-power of electrical energy.

The 1941 production of aluminum at the Arvida plant was 500 million pounds. It is estimated that 1942 production will be between 700 million and 800 million pounds, and that this amount will provide all the aluminum that is required for approximately 80,000 planes.

There are huge dams, reservoirs and power stations stretching from lake St. John right back to James bay. For this undertaking there were shipped into northern Quebec some 1,900 tons of equipment, approximately 750 men, and a large number of horses and oxen, by aeroplane. It is probably the largest aeroplane movement of freight ever undertaken in Canada. From this it will be gathered that it is a tremendous undertaking. In recent months the aluminum company was searching for additional power which it endeavoured to obtain in Manitoba. Arrangements could not be made there, and I was surprised to find within the last couple of weeks an announcement in the Financial Post that the aluminum company had decided to develop a site at Toronto covering some 48 acres and had started construction of office and other buildings at a cost exceeding $500,000.

The area involved indicates another huge undertaking of a war character being developed in eastern Canada. May I emphasize the fact that already one million horse-power have been developed in the Saguenay area, and there must be some close association between the location of this new plant at Toronto and the recent announcement of the Ontario government that it proposes to develop the Carillon site at a cost of $40,000,000.

This parliament is being asked to approve the use of a natural resource for the development of power in an area which four years ago had a surplus of power which the producers sought to export, because we were told that hundreds of thousands of horse-power were annually going to waste. If that is so, then I suggest, and I suggest it forcibly, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), that some direction should be given to these companies which are being heavily subsidized, to the end that future construction will serve some useful purpose in post-war development. It is but another step in the perfecting of that industrial Frankenstein which we are rapidly building up in Ontario and Quebec in war industries.

I am not critical of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, whose responsibility it is to obtain war production in the quickest way possible. But while that was true a year or two ago, it has not the same force to-day as it had then. War has broken out on the western front, and I suggest that the transportation of goods east or west and the possibility of attack on either the west or the east coast would justify the installation and establishment of some of these war industries in the prairie provinces, and particularly in Saskatchewan.

What relation has this request to the subject matter of the bill before the house? We have in Saskatchewan unlimited coal deposits that could be used to develop a very large head of power if an enterprise such as the aluminum company or some other company would undertake its development. There is no large head of power developed in Saskatchewan at present. It would have a post-war use, because the power could be transmitted to the farms and the small towns; it would be a means of inducing small industries to come into the province to supply the demand of its million people, and it would help as nothing else would to correct the badly balanced economy of the prairies. Everyone who has given the matter any thought has stated in the most emphatic terms that some development of that kind must take place, otherwise the plight of the people on the prairies, in Saskatchewan particularly, is going to be an unhappy one for years to come.

I ask pardon for intruding that thought upon the introduction of this bill, but I did want to bring it to the attention of the Minister of Mines and Resources and the Minister of Finance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

The house resumed, from Thursday, May 28, consideration in committee of Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. McCann in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GREEN: When this bill was before the committee on a previous occasion hon. members on all sides of the house urged upon the minister that the bill be extended so that fishermen on the two coasts of Canada might be able to get coverage. The section stood at that time with the understanding that the minister would look into the situation. We were all hopeful that he would be able to work out some plan whereby these fishermen could be protected. Is the minister in a position to make a statement?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes. We are on section 2, and some points came up when the section was before the committee last. The main point was the protection of fishermen. It was urged that the bill be amended so that fishermen could insure under it. I expressed my opposition to that suggestion on the ground that the bill is designed to cover property within the country, not property outside the country, because different considerations apply, different rates and so forth.

But I thought and, I believe, intimated that some plan might be worked out independently of the bill which would give a reasonable degree of protection to fishermen. I have conferred with my colleague, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), and we have worked out an order in council which I think fairly well covers the situation. That order in council has been passed, and my colleague will either read it to the committee or make some statement about it after I resume my seat.

That was not the only point which arose. Another matter which was discussed under section 2 was whether ships generally, any ships, should be covered by the bill. Certain hon. members pointed out the apparent discrimination between treatment accorded ships on inland waters and that accorded ships on the high seas. I found it difficult to justify the discrimination. From one point of view, of course, the coverage of ships on inland waters is defensible, because the degree of risk is certainly comparable with the degree of risk to buildings and personal property on land. At the same time I have said several times that it is not the object or intention of the government to supply coverage which can be obtained in a commercial way, and ships on inland waters can be insured with the insurance companies. In view of the fact that it is very hard to explain to a person operating a ship on the coast why he will be unable to get insurance under this bill, while a shipowner operating a ship on the great lakes can, I have decided that the best thing to do is to take ships, whether on inland waters or outside the country, out of the bill altogether. That does not apply to ships in course of construction, but it does apply to ships which have been launched. I shall propose an amendment accordingly.

The definition of "inland waters," the extent of the area covered by that term, has been reconsidered. The government has already made its selection of the advisory committee which is provided for under one of the sections of the bill, even though the section has not been passed by the house, because of the urgency of advancing the scheme. I have therefore had the benefit of the advice of the members of the advisory committee, which advice has been very helpful on a number of points, and as a result of discussions with them and consideration of the matter generally it has been decided to draw a line farther up the river than the line found in section 2 (f). I will propose an amendment in that sense.

When we come to the other sections of the bill—perhaps we shall not reach them this afternoon, though I hope we may—there are two or three other points I shall have to lay before the committee. I will do so after having given them all very careful consideration, and I hope the views of the committee will coincide with my own views. One suggestion relates to the question of taxation. Since the bringing down of the budget the reasons for leaving the section in the form in which it was originally drafted appear to me very much stronger even than they were before. Although the banking and commerce committee rejected that section, I am going to urge in committee of the whole that the section be restored in exactly or at least substantially its original form, because I think anything else under the present taxation provisions would be indefensible. I will propose one or two other amendments to the bill as we come to the various sections; but with regard to personal property on ships in inland waters it has not been deemed advisable, and I do not deem it advisable, to remove those provisions from the bill. Very awkward situations will arise if they are removed. For instance, grain is sometimes stored in ships. Grain will be insurable in elevators on the great lakes, and I consider it desirable that this coverage of grain should continue after it is loaded into boats on the great lakes. Therefore there will be provision that while ships in inland waters are not insurable under this bill, cargoes of ships in inland waters will be insurable.

I think that gives the committee a fair idea of the result of the thought that has been given to the bill, and perhaps now it would be advisable to have the Minister of Fisheries state to the committee the provisions of the order in council having to do with the protection of fishermen.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, when this bill came before the committee some weeks ago, several hon. members representing constituencies in which there were numbers of fishermen, made requests to the effect that those fishermen should be given protection against war damage. It was then stated to the committee that the persons of the fishermen were protected against war risks, if they met with accident due to enemy action; or, if they met with death, that their dependents were protected. In addition, their personal belongings are protected by virtue of a special order in council under the War Measures Act, because all these matters are really war measures.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister give the number of the order in council?

Mr. MICHAUD: I have not the number in mind at the moment, but if I have not already sent a copy to the hon. member I shall do so. It was also intimated that the boats owned by the fishermen should be protected, and it was suggested that they should be covered by insurance.

Mr. GREEN: That was only one of the suggestions I made.

Mr. MICHAUD: I then stated that the Department of Fisheries had contemplated some protection against damage resulting from enemy action to fishing boats of a class owned by people who could not well afford to insure them or of a class that would not be insurable against war risk. Since then as the Minister of Finance mentioned a moment ago, we have considered the matter and have recommended to council additional provisions for the payment of compensation to fishermen and others for the loss of boats and gear as a result of war damage. This was done because fishermen generally are not in a position to pay the very high insurance rates against war damage, and in most instances the boats that we intend to cover are not of an insurable class. That is, the companies that carry on marine insurance do not care to insure such small boats against such great risks. For that reason we have made provision for the compassionate relief of fishermen who, as a result of the state of war, suffer war damage to their fishing boats, vessels or gear, in order that these people may be enabled to continue with their calling and resume their operations as soon as possible after the damage is inflicted. They are a class of people who are engaged in an important primary industry, and it would be in the public interest to keep them producing as much as possible for as long as possible, with the least possible interruption through war damage to their fishing gear and boats.

For these reasons an order in council has been passed under the War Measures Act empowering the Minister of Fisheries to pay compensation to any person in an amount not exceeding $2,000 on each diminution of value caused by war damage in any fishing boat of which such person is an owner, provided that if any such person is a joint owner, his compensation hereunder shall be limited to his proportionate share of the amount of $2,000.

Mr. REID: That is free insurance.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is not free insurance; it is free compensation.

Mr. NEILL: As interest may appear.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. That is compassionate relief, by way of monetary compensation, to fishermen for the loss of their boats through enemy action. The limit is $2,000 per boat.

Mr. NEILL: What about the nets?

Mr. MICHAUD: There may be $400 paid for the nets, but no compensation shall be paid for any claim amounting to less than $25.

Mr. NEILL: In either case?

Mr. MICHAUD: In either case; because minor claims would be difficult to adjust and would be so numerous. They would not prevent people from carrying on their calling, even if they met with such minor damages.

No compensation under this order shall be paid in respect of diminution of value caused by war damage in any fishing boat or fishing gear, unless such diminution in value in either case exceeds $25. No compensation shall be paid in respect of diminution of value caused by war damage in fishing boat or fishing gear in respect of which the owner is indemnified against war damage otherwise than under this order.

That is, there would be no duplication. If a fisherman can afford to insure his boat he can collect from the insurance company. But he cannot at the same time expect to receive compassionate relief from the public treasurer.

Mr. NEILL: What about the excess? Can a man insure beyond $2,000?

Mr. MICHAUD: Certainly, he can insure beyond $2,000, but he will not receive $2,000 if that insurance is paid.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister think that is fair?

Mr. MICHAUD: I think it is—

Mr. NEILL: I do not.

Mr. MICHAUD: —because it is compassionate relief provided for people who cannot afford to insure.

Mr. GREEN: Why should this be called compassionate relief—

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. GREEN: —any more than the provision in the act for home owners? The home owner can get free insurance up to $3,000, and then he can insure at his own cost for a higher amount. Apparently the fisherman cannot do that. Anything he gets from the insurance company cuts down the free insurance that may be provided.

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not free insurance, at all. Fishermen are not asked as a class or individually to contribute to a fund out of which they will be compensated. Under the insurance scheme the public generally are being asked to contribute to the fund. And out of the general fund a certain class of owners are going to be compensated without contributing. But the public generally is making up the fund out of which they will be compensated.

Mr. GREEN: If fishing boats were included in the act it could be treated as free insurance which, I submit, is what should be done.

Mr. MICHAUD: No compensation shall be paid any person under this order in respect of diminution of values caused by war damage at any one time, of any more than one fishing boat owned by such person.

That means that a person who owns more than one fishing boat cannot collect compensation for each and every boat, or in other words for more than one boat.

Mr. NEILL: Why not?

Mr. GREEN: Yes, why not?

Mr. MICHAUD: Because he can carry on his business with one boat. If he owns more than one boat, he is carrying on a business in which he is supposed to be deriving enough profit to provide for replacements to his fleet of boats.

Mr. NEILL: You cannot carry on a cannery with one boat, and many of the canneries have to provide boats.

Mr. MICHAUD: But if a person who is operating a cannery depends upon a fleet of boats, he must make provision for insurance for this fleet of boats, or have a fund provided for the replacement of the fleet.

Mr. NEILL: That is putting the individual, whether he be a fisherman or a canneryman, who must have more than one boat to run his business, in a position where he must take the entire loss, which we have already agreed should fall upon the nation as a whole. It is pointed out in Mr. Leonard's report, and we were told on the last occasion the bill was discussed it was the view of the government, that a loss of that kind caused by war should not fall upon one individual, but that it should be spread over the nation. Now it is going to be pinned down to one man.

Mr. ILSLEY: I completely disagree with that. If that were the principle we had adopted, we would not have any bill at all; we would just compensate everybody. There would be no policy and there would be no premium. This is the only class of capital as to which there is free compensation—the only class.

Mr. NEILL: The only class of what?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only class of capital assets in respect of which there is free compensation. I refer to these fishing boats.

Mr. NEILL: Is not an elevator capital?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Is not grain in a ship, which we are going to take care of, capital?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: And is not the whole of this Bill No. 56 intended to protect the grain man?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is the point. In those cases premiums will be charged. There will not be one dollar of free compensation. There is free compensation to home owners for the residences in which they live, and fishermen will get that protection under this bill.

Mr. NEILL: No, they won't; they will get it only up to $2.000. Many of those fishermen live on their boats.

Mr. ILSLEY: The fisherman will get the protection for his home and his chattels under the free compensation provision, like any other people in the country.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, if the fisherman has a home ashore. But that is not so if his home is his boat, as is often the case.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am talking about his residence. If there were fifty thousand fishermen in Canada I am sure over forty-nine thousand of them would have residences ashore.

Mr. NEILL: No, not on the west coast.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, of course.

Mr. NEILL: Not on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not wish the hon. member to apply the provisions of home protection to this class of case. This is a capital investment; and the owners of boats, or fleets of boats, will be expected to take out insurance—not get free insurance. If that were so, I do not know where we would stop.

Mr. NEILL: Will the minister answer the point I made? Did not Mr. Leonard say in his recommendation that it was desirable that these war losses should be shared by the nation as a whole, and not put upon one unhappy man? We compensate our soldiers' widows because they have suffered something for which we are all responsible.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think Mr. Leonard said that, and certainly I never said it. I wish my hon. friend to understand that if that were the principle we would not have the bill. We would have free compensation for everybody, from the aluminum company, down.

Mr. NEILL: And why not? It is a debt of war.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. If the committee wishes to challenge the principle on third reading, well and good. It may, if it wishes, challenge the principle of war risk insurance premiums.

Mr. NEILL: We cannot do it. It would be out of order, because it would involve an expenditure of public money.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member may vote against it, if he wishes to.

Mr. NEILL: That does not do any good.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing out of order in connection with voting against it. But I thought we had passed that stage of the matter, and had adopted the principle, not of free compensation but of insurance.

Mr. NEILL: Here is the paragraph in the report to which I have reference:

For reasons which I could set out more fully I think the government should accept the principle that the loss ought not to be left to lie where it happens to fall, because the particular person damaged is but the casual victim of a general peril which the state is doing its utmost to resist and counteract.

Then he goes on to say that the country as a whole should accept it, and not the lone fisherman.

Mr. ILSLEY: The country as a whole should furnish insurance privileges; that is what it means.

Mr. NEILL: But that is not what it says.

Mr. REID: Is it not a fact that fishermen are in a class by themselves? Here we are insuring homes. Homes are anchored to the soil, and we protect them up to $3,000. On the other hand, ships go out into the open, into dangerous zones. If there were no compensation, these fishermen might very well say, "We are not going out into the danger zone." Therefore I say they should be treated differently. We are told that if a man has two boats and loses both of them, he will be compensated for only one. If he wishes to insure for more than $2,000, he will get no insurance at all from the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. REID: It cuts him out completely.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. REID: I also say it is not fair to the fisherman, because he may not want to go into dangerous waters to fish.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Minister of Fisheries will argue the point, but I may point out that the ground upon which the request was made was that this particular feature had reference to fishermen whose boats are their all. If a fisherman's boat is gone, he cannot fish. It certainly was put up to us that we must not let that happen. It was pointed out that we must not let that prevent his fishing. But when the fisherman moves into the investment class or into the business class I say he should be treated like other persons. We will protect him to the extent of $2,000 on one boat. That will take care of the great majority of them. Certainly I would not like on behalf of the government to assume the obligation of further compensation to some fishing companies that own boats and are insuring them at the present time, and that can insure them, and expect to insure them. This is a matter of looking after the small man.

Mr. NEILL: But they cannot insure their boats at the present time. That is the trouble. I quote from sessional paper No. 245, which is a return tabled by the Minister of Finance. It is a copy of the report on war risks and bombardment insurance by Mr. T. D'Arcy Leonard. He says in section 6:

Accordingly—

That is, after having stated his case:

—we ought to endeavour to distribute the loss or damage as far as possible among our people as a whole in the fairest and most equitable manner.

Mr. ILSLEY: What about section 8?

Mr. NEILL: They took various views and advanced various schemes of compensation such as 10 (a):

Schemes of compensation, whereby the damage in whole or in part is repaid out of the general revenues of the state;

That was the first recommendation. And then (b):

Reinsurance, whereby ordinary commercial insurers reinsure a portion of the risk with the government.

But then look at section 4:

Up to December 7, 1941, there was available in Canada insurance against war risks to property. Since that date the insurance companies and underwriters have stopped writing new policies and therefore at the present time citizens and commercial concerns cannot protect themselves against the hazard.

That makes it quite evident that it is up to the government. We are at war, and we are protecting our men and women and children against risks, but when it comes to protecting the fishermen against this particular risk we say "no". But in Britain they have compulsory insurance, and here you are insuring the fishermen's boats in safe waters in the middle of the country in the great lakes. As this man says, the risk ought to be borne by the nation as a whole. But you are insuring the fisherman's boat only up to $2,000, which is from one-third to one-tenth of what they are worth, and that applies to only one boat. Bill No. 56 was introduced originally for the purpose apparently of giving a tremendous advantage to the owners of grain on the great lakes, and it has still to be provided that they can get payment for their wheat when it is stored on these boats. One of the objections that we took to the bill originally was that only the vessels of the fishermen on the great lakes were protected. That is a huge expanse of water where, if anywhere, a boat ought to be safe; yet the man who operates his boat in dangerous waters in British Columbia and the maritimes is ignored. I can quote half a dozen instances where the minister said that he did not visualize that. Now pressure is brought that he ought to do something. If he is going to do it, for heaven's sake do something; do not just make a vague gesture.

The minister has read portions of the order in council; but here we are going to pass this thing, I presume, in twenty minutes, and we shall have to rely only on something of which we have heard extracts read. That is not satisfactory to me. I want to see it down in black and white. These boats run up to $25,000 in value. A good seine boat with net will cost more than that. They have to have powerful engines because the boats go out from thirty to fifty miles to sea, and they are very valuable boats. There was the case the other day where a fisherman bought one of these boats for $26,000. And all you are offering him is $2,000. You want the fish; Britain is crying for the fish, but you will protect the fishermen only up to $2,000, and you will not let him insure beyond that. A submarine can come along and attack a fleet of 150 of these boats and clean the whole lot out. Perhaps the fisherman has a mortgage on the boat, and he has to protect himself. If he does, you will not give him even this paltry $2,000 compensation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me set the hon. member straight. In the first place Mr. Leonard in his report was not reporting on sea risks at all, but on land risks. He expressly recommends that we do not go into the sea risk business.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Not by this bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not by this bill, and the reason is that marine risk insurance is available.

Mr. NEILL: Marine risk is not available.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not under this bill, but it is available commercially.

Mr. NEILL: He says "no."

Mr. ILSLEY: Where?

Mr. NEILL: I have just read it. For some time it was available, but now it is stopped.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the land risk.

Mr. NEILL: It does not say so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Read the whole report. Marine insurance is available. I thought my hon. friend understood the principle of the bill. Let me read section 8 of Mr. Leonard's report:

> In the second place, it is my considered view that the property owner is not entitled to compensation out of the ordinary general revenues of the country beyond an amount which would represent provision for essential shelter and necessary household goods; and that in order to receive compensation in excess of that amount, he, along with other property owners, should make a special contribution proportionate or related to the indemnity he would get.

With regard to a man's business premises, anything in the nature of capital assets, there is no free insurance to anybody except the fisherman. The request of the members of the committee was that the small man—not the man owning a $25,000 boat—be protected. I did not hear anything about that when this matter was up before. I know that some of these schooners on the east coast will run up to $75,000 in value.

Mr. REID: And they can get insurance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, and they do get insurance, and can pay the insurance, but the small man cannot, and therefore we are giving him up to $2,000 compensation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What about the owner of a $25,000 boat?

Mr. ILSLEY: He will take out insurance himself.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He cannot get it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, he can from the company.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What company?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that the insurance is available.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: On the last occasion when this matter was up the minister said that the only company that was writing marine insurance was a San Francisco company and that they had stopped issuing insurance. Those were the minister's own words; I am speaking from my memory.

Mr. ILSLEY: Your memory is bad.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not think so.

Mr. MacINNIS: It seems to me that the discussion has altogether changed since the last time we were considering this bill. I am sorry I was not in when the Minister of Fisheries was discussing the matter. What we objected to when the bill was previously under consideration was that the fishermen on the east and west coasts were excluded from the insurance that was given to shipowners on inland waters and on rivers. I have the section before me. Section 2, paragraph (i) says:

"property" means buildings, machinery, fixtures or other structures erected or placed upon, in, over, under or affixed to land, and all movable corporeal property in Canada, but shall not include:

(i) land, exclusive of any structures aforesaid;

(ii) growing crops, plants and trees;

And then:

(iv) ships, other than vessels used solely in docks, ports, rivers or other inland waters or inland waterways;

I understand the suggestion was that fishing boats be included in the bill. I did not hear anything the last time about free insurance for fishing boats, and I cannot understand how it has come in. If the fishing fleet can get marine insurance at reasonable rates, I do not think we are on sound ground in asking that they be given free insurance under this bill, because no other commercial property receives free insurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. MacINNIS: But if fishing boats cannot get marine insurance at reasonable rates, they should be brought in under this insurance scheme. I think that is all that the fishermen can reasonably ask for and all that their representatives can reasonably ask. They should not receive special treatment under the bill, but I can see no reason why the fishermen on the west coast, where there is great danger, should be treated differently from the fishermen on the great lakes.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman came in after I spoke. Under the proposal no ships are to be insured on the great lakes. That will eliminate the discrimination. There is something in what the hon. member says; there is an argument for his position that free insurance should not be given to anybody. But the fact is that unless we provide free compensation for the owners of small fishing boats we know that they will not insure. That is the reason for making special provision, up to a limited extent, for this great number of small fishermen. It does not apply to the man who has a fairly substantial investment. He will go to the commercial agency where insurance is available.

It may be said that insurance is too expensive. If a situation arises where marine insurance generally is too expensive, perhaps the government could give consideration to the setting up of a different scheme. But I have the most deep-seated objection to mixing a marine insurance scheme with a land insurance scheme. They do not do it anywhere, so far as I know—neither in Great Britain nor the United States nor anywhere else. The two kinds of business are different. Everything about a marine insurance scheme is different from a land insurance scheme, and I must stand firm on that—that we shall not run these marine risks in with land risks. What is proper for a certain rate on land is different from a rate on water. The risk is different, the nature of the business is different, the adjustment is different, the rules are different. For one thing, losses on land are adjusted on the basis of actual loss. It is like fire insurance: if I take out $10,000 insurance on my house, and it burns down, and the house turns out to be worth only $6,000, then I get only $6,000. The reverse, I am told, is true of marine insurance; the value is determined in advance and adhered to regardless of what the actual loss may be. That is a vital distinction. I cannot mix up these two plans.

We have no Canadian government plan of marine insurance, but commercial insurance is available. They have, I believe, a plan in Great Britain: I think they have a plan in the United States; but nowhere do they mix up the two, and I cannot run these fishing boats into this scheme. I have met the thing in what I thought was a very much better way. I have provided for the small man. I have no intention of providing free insurance for men who are heavy or substantial investors. We made inquiries and found that $2,000 would reasonably meet the great majority of these people. You cannot provide for everything, unless you just open the doors wide and say, "Whatever you lose we will pay"; but I think we have gone a reasonable distance in making this provision.

Mr. GREEN: The Minister of Fisheries was in the middle of his explanation of the order in council when these interruptions took place, and I fear we are hardly giving him a fair chance. The situation seems to me to be this. The danger on the sea coasts of Canada is greater at the present time than the danger on land. In other words there is greater urgency for some protection against marine risks, and yet, as the minister has just said, Canada has no scheme whatever to cover ships, although both the British and the United States have such schemes. I do not think it makes much difference just how the situation is met, but it must be met, and quickly, by the government. I understand that in the United States the policy of the government is to make marine insurance available at reasonable rates if it cannot be obtained at reasonable rates from the commercial companies. That sums up the policy, as I understand it, as carried out by the United States maritime commission. Why can we not have some such commission set up in Canada?

The minister has said several times this afternoon that this insurance can be obtained now. My information is that it cannot be obtained in Canada—on the west coast, at any rate—at reasonable rates.

I have here a press dispatch from New York dated June 25, which reads as follows:

A 50 per cent increase in premiums for cargo war risk insurance on shipments moving along the Pacific coast north of San Francisco was made by marine underwriters to-day.

That is about ten days ago. There is the position that we are met with on the coast. Our merchant ships are being sunk, our coast is being shelled by submarines, yet the government calmly sits back and says, "We have no plan for marine insurance; we will give it consideration"—which means that perhaps a year from now we may have some scheme. Steps should be taken at once to provide war risk coverage for all boats on the two coasts at reasonable rates.

So far as the order in council which the Minister of Fisheries was reading is concerned, it has several of the earmarks of a cheese-paring officialdom, may I say, as regards some of the restrictions—for example, restricting it to a boat in which there are not more than two persons, and restricting it to one boat only, although a man may own two, and not allowing a man to insure for anything over $2,000, in that if he does so, he is penalized by the deducting of what he gets from the insurance company from what he would get from the government. But it does help out. However, I want to emphasize the urgency of some action by the government to provide for war risk insurance against marine risks.

Mr. ILSLEY: Most of the insurance on marine risks taken out in Canada is obtained in Great Britain and the United States.

Mr. GREEN: At very high rates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, rates which are competitive with the government schemes in those countries. What my hon. friend is asking the Canadian government to do is to supply a low land rate, lower than the rates which are set for us by Great Britain, and—

Mr. GREEN: The minister must not put those words in my mouth. I did not say a low land rate; I said reasonable rates. That is the basis, I believe, which is adopted in the United States. I have here a quotation from the Commercial Fisherman's Weekly of June 12, 1942—

Mr. ILSLEY: Do we not get the benefit of those United States rates and of the English rates as well?

Mr. GREEN: This quotation reads:

Machinery to provide war risk insurance and reinsurance on American ships, including fishing craft, was set up by the United States maritime commission, which announced January 15 last that a $40,000,000 fund established for such a purpose was open to ship owners unable to obtain adequate insurance for their vessels at "reasonable terms and conditions" from commercial underwriters.

We maintain that on the Pacific coast we cannot get that coverage at reasonable rates, and we say that the government should provide a scheme whereby insurance can be obtained at reasonable rates.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend has no idea of what reasonable rates would be? He has no figures?

Mr. GREEN: There are no figures here.

Mr. ILSLEY: The government's scheme in the United States is the regulating factor with respect to commercial rates, which are available to Canadian ship owners. That is the whole thing. I hesitate to say that there is no demand that the government go into marine risks, but there is not. It may be that if property owners generally thought that by making a demand they could get a rate lower than the English or the American rate there might be a demand. But what obligation is there on the Canadian government to supply a specially low marine rate? The reason we make this provision for fishermen is that we know that no matter what the rate is, whether low or high, if there are thousands of fishermen—ten thousand, twenty thousand, thirty or forty thousand—having small boats worth $200 or $400 or $1,000, they will not take out insurance, and perhaps they could not get insurance, because the companies would not want to be bothered with writing these very small amounts.

Mr. GREEN: Why leave it all to the companies? Why give them so much power? Why put the boat owners in the hands of two or three commercial companies?—which is the situation on the Pacific coast. Is that fair?

Mr. NEILL: I have a suggestion to make which may meet with the approval of the committee, but before I offer it, perhaps I might make this statement. It has been put up to us to-day that this bill has nothing to do with fishermen, and we have been asked why we should bring in the fishermen. The answer is that fishermen were spoken of the last time the matter was under discussion, because the word "ships" is actually used in the bill. We talked about the great lakes. That was when the subject first came up. We were discussing an enormous body of water large enough to take in Great Britain, and the subject naturally extended to fishermen. There is no question that fishermen were brought up. This will be found by reference to section 2. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) quoted the statement that had been made by Mr. D'Arcy Leonard. This is what Mr. Leonard said:

> I do think however that we should canvass the possibility of making an arrangement with either the maritime shipping commission of the United States or the British war risks insurance office to make sure that cover is available at reasonable rates to Canadian hulls and on cargoes in which Canadians are interested.

That is a definite report, submitted after careful study, and that has not been done. All that we get is something read from an order in council which we have not seen. How did the minister expect this bill to go through when he knew that there were a number of members interested in the subject? He did not let us have a chance to read the order in council, but on the strength of certain extracts from that order in council we are supposed to accept the bill and keep quiet. That will not satisfy me. I suggest that in order to get some harmony, and so that we may have an opportunity of knowing what we are doing, the minister should read the whole of the order in council and have the committee adjourn until Monday. This would give us a chance to look into the order in council. Perhaps the matter is not as bad as it appears and perhaps it is worse, but at any rate we want to see exactly what it is that the order in council says, and to what we are committed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot object to that. I knew I was going to be held up on this bill until provision was made for fishermen, and hon. gentlemen can hold me up as long as they want to—

Mr. NEILL: I rise to a point of order. It is not fair to say that we are holding up the minister. We have not spoken an hour, and all we have received is the suggestion that we are holding up this legislation. God knows we have sat here long enough and we do not want to hold up anything.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not take it back, and I do not make the statement resentfully. I said that I knew, what is a fact, that I would be held up on the bill until provision was made for fishermen. If hon. gentlemen want us to wait in order that they may see the order in council, that is all right. I do not say that they should refrain from talking; I do not expect it. That is their right and privilege. We have tried to make reasonable provision for fishermen, and if hon. members do not think it is sufficient and would like to exercise their privilege of talking on the subject for any length of time, I cannot help it. I have given my reasons why I think this is the best we can do. With regard to marine insurance generally, the demand was for land insurance. There was an insistent demand beginning from Pearl Harbour, not for marine insurance, because that was available—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Where?

Mr. ILSLEY: From any commercial agency.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: At what rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot give rates.

Mr. GREEN: You should know them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I should or not. They are the prevailing rates, and they are available to hon. gentlemen.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Are they subject to war-time price control?

Mr. JACKMAN: Yes; that is very important.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I was a member of the committee that considered the bill, and no representations were made to the committee on the part of the ship owners. The first time any demand has been made on the government for the protection of ship owners on both coasts is to-day in the house.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): On the last occasion—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You ought to attend the house more often.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): On the last occasion there was some reference to fishermen, and remarks were made on their behalf; but if there is one class in this dominion who do not require any special protection it is the ship owners. Everyone knows that the price of shipping has gone away up, but there is insurance available and shipowners can take advantage of it. Naturally they have to pay a higher rate as the war risk increases, and I say that both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coasts there is no difficulty getting that insurance. The hon. member for Vancouver South has quoted certain rates—

Mr. GREEN: The minister's plan covers only very small fishing boats. I was referring to fishing boats as well as other ships.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): Insurance is available to-day for fishing boats. The Lunenburg fishing fleet and the trawlers that operate out of Halifax are insured. Not a single representation, so far as I know, was made to the committee that considered this bill on behalf of that class of people. Representations were made by members of the committee on behalf of small fishermen, but not fishermen of the class referred to by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), with boats worth $55,000. The government is protecting the small fisherman, the man who is not able to pay premiums on insurance in order to protect himself. The government makes provision for such men, and instead of this provision by order in council being at once accepted, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) are criticized by members from the west coast. Insurance is still available and always has been so far as marine risks are concerned. I can appreciate the point made with regard to discrimination between ships in coastal waters on the Atlantic and the Pacific and ships on the great lakes. Now whatever discrimination there was, is being removed.

Mr. GREEN: By chopping off the heads of the great lakes fishermen, taking something away from them. We were not trying to do that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): It was the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. MAYHEW: Part of our difficulty seems to be due to the fact that in this bill we have failed to give a definition of a ship. Some are thinking of cargo ships, but in the house and in the banking and commerce committee we were referring to them as fishing boats. Here we refer to them as ships. As I understand it, the purpose of the $3,000 on the house was to ensure shelter to the people. In this case you are providing $2,000 for shelter for the fisherman in his boat, but you are taking it away again if he is able to get insurance above that amount. I think he is entitled to free insurance at least up to the $2,000, and I would say up to the $3,000.

Mr. NEILL: The latter sum would be reasonable and fairly satisfactory.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think he should be insured up to the $3,000 on the same basis.

There is another aspect of the matter that should be considered. The bill makes it possible for a man with an investment of half a million on shore to get additional insurance at his own expense at a reasonable rate. In your marine bill you are not making it possible for him to get it. If what the hon. member says is correct, that there has been a 50 per cent increase in cargo war risk insurance rates, if would mean, according to Mr. Leonard's statement in the banking and commerce committee, that fishing boats in the Prince Rupert area would be paying 45 per cent premium. He said that there were three different sections: 12 per cent at the southern end of the island, 20 per cent about the centre and 30 per cent at the northern part, so that adding 50 per cent would mean that a boat out of Prince Rupert would be paying 45 per cent. That is hardly a reasonable rate. The government should endeavour to provide enough competition so that the private enterprise will at least come to a reasonable base and not overcharge a man who is trying to earn a living.

There is another reason why I think the fishermen should be encouraged. They have made very good money up to date in the fishing; many of them have made as much money this year already as they made all last year. They are not going to continue to risk their boats without any insurance and pay practically 100 per cent of their earnings to the government. That is human nature, but it is a fact that must be taken into account.

Mr. POTTIER: If they are making so much money that they are going to stop working, it seems to me the least they could do is to stay at work a little longer and pay an insurance premium and save the government from having to dip into the treasury in order to provide more money for them. I am not objecting to the order in council referred to by the Minister of Fisheries, because I think it is a great step in behalf of the small man, who is the one we have to protect. Let me give an idea of the number of boats by counties. In Shelburne county in my riding we have 708 fishing boats and 100 larger fishing boats. In Yarmouth county we have eighty-eight fishing boats and ninety-three larger fishing boats. That is the picture of the state of affairs along the shore of the maritime provinces. For these fishermen, their total assets, their livelihood, what they educate their children on, their working capital, are represented by these small boats. And they are not insured. They each own a boat worth perhaps $2,000 to $3,000. The operation of large numbers of boats to the value of $75,000 or $80,000 each, which apparently is the style in British Columbia, is something we do not know anything about. We have a few, not many.

I hope we do not get to the radical point—the "gimme's" such as we see from western Canada. That is apparently what this is developing into—"give us this", "give us that". I am willing to back them up in what is reasonable, but we cannot adopt a policy of digging into the treasury to support this and that and extend this and that luxury to this and the other; we have to be reasonable. Under this order in council we are trying to keep alive the man who is not insured at the present time. And as a matter of fact while the insurance companies would insure the small boat, they say—I have had experience of it—that they do not want to be bothered, that it is too much trouble, that there is too much bookkeeping and detail. The result is that these small boats are not insured. Under the order in council such a man would be protected to the extent of a reasonable amount. I think $2,000 for these small men is a fair amount; it goes a long way toward taking care of a situation that needs to be taken care of, and I hope none of the remarks made to-day will cause any retraction of the order that has been announced.

Mr. MAYHEW: I did not ask that the man with a fleet of fishing boats should get free insurance. He should be considered on the same basis as the man with that amount of capital on shore; I quite agree with my hon. friend on that. The only point I raised was whether a man who uses his boat as a shelter on the sea should not get the same privilege as the man who uses his home for shelter on land.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to ask a couple of questions. I represent fishermen—I do not know how many boats, but from Vancouver north I have no doubt as many as the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare. I quote the words of the hon. member as reported on page 2855 of Hansard: "I think we should leave it as it is now."

Mr. ILSLEY: Leave what?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member said:

> I rather agree with the last speaker. I do not think that just because you cannot get what you happen to want you should take anything away from anyone else. It seems to me that if there is any chance at all of fishing boats getting any protection it will be because somebody else has somewhere similar protection. If we take out of this bill the road leading half way to where we want to go we abolish our only chance, and there never will be any opportunity for fishing boats to be insured. I think we should leave it as it is now, . . .

If that is satisfactory to the maritimes it is not to British Columbia. We are accused of saying "gimme" all the time, but the only place where Japanese submarines are active to-day is on the west coast, so far as Canada is concerned. We are accused of having the "gimme's". I should like to ask any hon. member from Nova Scotia what subsidy the fishermen of British Columbia got when the lobster fishermen of the maritimes were even having their advertising paid for, and now you cannot buy a tin of lobster because it is not available. But we and the rest of Canada paid the cost of advertising that part of their lobster catch that had to be canned.

The question I desire to ask the minister is this. He referred to fishing boats costing from two to four hundred dollars. So far as I know there are no boats of that class operating in my constituency. I do not class myself as an expert with regard to fishing, like the hon. member for New Westminster or the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but I believe that in British Columbia they fish with either gill nets or seine nets.

Mr. MICHAUD: And trolls.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Yes. I may be corrected if I am wrong, but I believe the gill net is the least expensive net, costing at pre-war prices from $600 up. I should like to know of any boat used on the west coast of Canada, costing from two to four hundred dollars and making use of a gill net costing $600 at the very least.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no knowledge of the value of gill nets on the British Columbia coast, nor did I purport to be expressing any opinion in that regard.

Mr. MARTIN: Possibly this discussion between the salt water fishermen of the Pacific and the Atlantic should be balanced by someone speaking for the fresh water fishermen in between. The minister has said that ships on the great lakes have been taken out of the provisions of this act because it was felt that there would be discrimination against ships operating on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Surely that is no argument for denying to the ships on the great lakes the advantages offered by this legislation, and which they would have received if they had been allowed to continue under its provisions. This is not a case of the "gimme's" as far as the great lakes are concerned. The government would still get the money paid in by the ship owners on the great lakes, who I believe would pay a smaller premium. I do not see why hon. members either from the east or from the west would wish to have this discrimination operate against the great lakes fishermen, and certainly the minister has not yet satisfied me that the mere fact that there would be a discrimination is sufficient reason for excluding shipowners on the great lakes from the operation of this legislation. In effect he is saying, "We cannot give you what we think you are entitled to, because we see no reason for according a similar privilege to those on the two coasts." I suggest to the minister that if there is any stronger argument he should give it to the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is the main argument, but I believe it is a strong one. I do not think we would ever hear the last of it if we provided a government scheme at what would be represented as bargain rates for marine insurance on the great lakes, and did not make the same provision on the coast. From the governmental point of view, the parliamentary point of view, that is an excellent reason. I was impressed by the argument advanced by the hon. member for York South in that regard. He took an interest in the debate; and while I do not think he had any interest from a constituency point of view, he did raise the point of discrimination the other day, and I found my own answers to him not quite as convincing as I should have liked them to be. My answer was that there was no reason why we should not extend the same rates to ships on lake Ontario, for example, that we extend to buildings in Toronto. Nevertheless I have stated repeatedly that it is not our aim to supply insurance facilities for persons to whom commercial facilities are available. Commercial facilities are available to ships on the great lakes; and I think we would be accused, and justly accused, of discrimination if we provided insurance for them and not for ships on our coasts. I have taken the matter up with the members of the advisory committee; it has been fully discussed, and I have come to the conclusion that we should take those ships out. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni moved an amendment the other day, to have those ships taken out, and now I think I shall agree with him on that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If you take away the opportunity for war risk insurance on ships I do not see why you should not also take away the opportunity for war risk insurance on cargo. I do not think the two things should be mixed up in this bill at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: There might be some demand for that, I do not know; but from the point of view of cargo, particularly grain, the flow is so continuous—it goes from the elevators into the boats, where it is sometimes stored—that I think we had better leave in cargoes on inland waters. We could never get this so that someone would not accuse us of discrimination. Just as soon as we become too generous in one line, that is used as an argument why we should be generous in a number of other lines, and we are pushed from one point to another. I cannot have a light regard for demands on the treasury. I must have some sort of control or rein on such demands, and I think we have gone as far as we should be asked to go in this matter.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government given any consideration to the setting up of a Canadian maritime commission, or some other organization which could handle marine insurance in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GREEN: Has any consideration been given to the suggestion made by Mr. D'Arcy Leonard, which is contained in paragraph 19 of his report, as follows:

> I do think, however, that we should canvass the possibility of making an arrangement with either the maritime shipping commission of the United States or the British war risks insurance office to make sure that cover is available at reasonable rates to Canadian hulls and on cargoes in which Canadians are interested.

Has any attempt been made to come to some arrangement with either the United States maritime commission or the British war risks insurance office?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no demand. As I say, we might stimulate a demand, or the members of this house might create a demand for it, but up to the present there has been no demand. Let hon. members just think of the situation. We are not going into this business for the fun of it; we are going into it to meet an urgent, pressing, almost desperate demand that arose after Pearl Harbour, for a class of insurance which was disappearing, because it was being cancelled right and left. That is war risk insurance on property on land. That did not apply to property at sea; and we get the benefit of the government schemes in Great Britain and the United States, because the competition of those schemes brings down the commercial rates in those countries, and it is insurance granted by companies in Great Britain and the United States, to a large extent and almost entirely, that is taken out by insurers in this country. Just as the hon. member for Halifax says, they can get insurance. I do not want to set up a bargain rate on marine insurance, nor do I want to go into a scheme of marine insurance if I can help it. It is going to be difficult enough, goodness knows, to operate the scheme we have here, which we have to operate because of the terrific demand for it, but I do not want to go into that other scheme.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister allow that order in council to be placed upon Hansard?

Mr. ILSLEY: Very well.

Mr. MacINNIS: About twenty minutes ago the hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggested that the Minister of Fisheries should be allowed to read the order in council so that we might be able to examine it over the week-end. Then we would know what it is all about and would be prepared to act accordingly when next the bill is under discussion. I believe the house will be adjourning in a few moments, and I suggest we might have the order in council read. I do not believe hon. members from the west wish to be at all unreasonable; certainly I do not. I have no doubt we shall be prepared to cooperate with the minister, because we appreciate that where there has been no past experience in such matters the minister has a difficult task. If the order in council were read, we would know at our next meeting what we have to deal with.

Mr. MICHAUD: The order in council will be in to-day's Votes and Proceedings, and hon. members will have ample time to familiarize themselves with its provisions. However, I would call their attention again to the fact that the purport of the order in council is to bring compassionate relief to people who might lose property because of war activities, and who could not afford to insure or would have no means of insuring such property. That is the underlying principle of the order in council. It is compassionate relief to fishermen who own fishing boats or fishing gear but who cannot afford to insure, or whose property is not insurable.

Mr. NEILL: Is the word "compassionate" in the order in council?

Mr. MICHAUD: "Compassionate relief."

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to support the plea on behalf of shipowners on the great lakes. Their risk is coming into prominence because the great lakes are now included in the term "high seas." Anyone who has sailed lake Superior will know that the risk is just as great there as it is on either the east or west coast. I am sure the minister will take that point into consideration.

Mr. POTTIER: The hon. member for Fraser Valley quoted my observations at page 2855 of Hansard, as follows:

I think we should leave it as it is now.

True, the hon. member quoted at some length following that, but he did not explain the point to which I was referring. I was pleading on behalf of the fishermen so that they would have insurance. I was objecting to an amendment the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had suggested, in which the word "ships" would have been stricken out altogether. My contention was that the word should be left in, because if it were we might have a chance to have fishing boats insured. That was the time I said, "I think we should leave it as it is now." Certainly I did not say that we should not get insurance for the fishermen, or that I was satisfied with the bill, as it was, without insurance for fishing boats. I thought the retention of the word "ships" gave us a chance of securing that kind of insurance, and that was when I made the statement. I should like to correct the impression which might have been left from the interpretation of my remarks given by the hon. member for Fraser Valley.

Mr. HAZEN: We have not made a great deal of progress, and I would suggest to the minister that the bill be brought before the committee again at as early a date as possible. I have received letters from business men in my constituency who say that their policies with Lloyds are now expiring, and that it will be impossible to get more insurance until the bill becomes law. For that reason I believe it is essential to many people that further discussion be held at as early a date as possible.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am just as anxious as the hon. member to get the bill through, and it will be brought up again as soon as possible.

Mr. MARTIN: There is one point which should not be overlooked, and which possibly might come more correctly from hon. members on either coast. However, it should be said that there seems to be a disposition to hold up passage of part of the bill, and that that part should be held over for further refinement. But why should we delay passage of that portion of the bill to which there could be no objection. If those uncontentious parts could be accepted, we would avoid a continuation of risks which are now most serious, in the light of the world situation.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Shall the section carry?

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. GREEN: Could not section 2 stand?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it certainly will.

Section stands.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. McCann): Section 3, insurance against war damage.

Mr. NEILL: Well, there is no use debating that at this time of day. It is almost six o'clock. Surely it is not proposed to enter into an extended debate at this time, because that is the main part of the bill. Surely it is not intended to pass the rest of the bill in three minutes.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, July 6, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received a communication from two members, notifying me that the following vacancy has occurred in the representation, viz.:

Of the Honourable Pierre F. Casgrain, member for the electoral district of Charlevoix-Saguenay, by acceptance of an office of emolument under the crown.

I accordingly issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

INDUSTRIAL COUNCILS IN WAR INDUSTRIES

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. In what major war industries have industrial councils representing management and organized labour been set up to date for the purpose of securing maximum production in these plants?
2. In what government-owned war industry plants are organized trade unions recognized as the bargaining agency between workers and management?

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Speaker, question No. 1 is answered, as follows:

Shipyards in Vancouver; four operators on Queen Charlotte islands; coal mines, Vancouver island; Victoria Machinery Depot, Yarrows; aircraft factories in Montreal under Mr. Ralph P. Bell's scheme.

The whole matter is receiving active and immediate study. Selective service is trying to follow up, indicating different methods as to how this can be done and is working to enlist the support of both manufacturers and labour to accelerate the formation of these committees.

Question No. 2 will have to stand as an order for return, to be answered by my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. HOWE: Supplementing the answer of my hon. friend, we have no record in the Department of Munitions and Supply as to what plants have a unionized bargaining agency between workers and management.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are there no records regarding the conditions in the government-owned plants directly under the government?

Mr. HOWE: Oh, government-owned plants.

Mr. SPEAKER: No. 1 answered; No. 2, order for return.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many men between 16 and 69 were unemployed at the time of the recent enumeration by the Department of Labour?

2. Of these, how many are considered to be unemployable?

3. What are the numbers by provinces of, (a) unemployed, (b) unemployable?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. and 2. The Minister of Labour dealt with the subject matter of these questions on June 25. See Hansard, pages 3683-3684, stating in part "At the close of business on June 11, 1942 . . . . the total number reported as being unemployed in Canada was 59,933 men." It was pointed out that this was a preliminary return and that it appeared that some 50 per cent of the number of men registering were totally or partly unemployable.

3. Subject to the foregoing the number of men registering in each province were:—

Prince Edward Island	234
Nova Scotia	1,715
New Brunswick	1,033
Quebec	11,965
Ontario	22,285
Manitoba	6,279
Saskatchewan	3,808
Alberta	4,156
British Columbia	8,458
	59,933

Mr. COTE:

1. Has the government taken any steps to bring about a settlement of the strike at the Distillers' Corporation, Limited, Ville LaSalle, Verdun county, Quebec?

2. If so, what steps have been taken?

Mr. MITCHELL: The distilling industry does not come within the purview of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. The dispute is therefore within the jurisdiction of the province of Quebec and no steps looking towards a settlement have been taken by the dominion Department of Labour.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS—CHARGES AGAINST RENE CHALOULT AND COLONEL DREW

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Has a special counsel been retained to prosecute Mr. René Chaloult?

2. If not, who is directing the prosecution?

3. Why did the government appoint special counsel to prosecute Colonel George Drew?

Mr. St. LAURENT:

1 and 2. Yes.

3. In pursuance of the usual practice of the department.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Stand.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked my hon. friend the other day to consider either dropping this motion or proceeding with it. I have no objection to his dropping it and putting it on the order paper again if he wishes to renew the motion, but it should not stand on the order paper week after week.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will take the matter into consideration and decide in two or three days.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said that the other day.

Motion stands.

CANADIAN FORCES—MEN DISCHARGED OR STRUCK OFF STRENGTH

Mr. ROSS (Souris):

For a return showing the number of persons by military districts and/or provinces who have been discharged or struck off the strength of, (a) the navy, (b) the army, (c) the air force, by reasons of (1) medical unfitness, (2) desertion, (3) other causes, and, in the case of military districts Nos. 4 and 5, and/or the province of Quebec, showing the number in each category (i) of French-Canadian origin, (ii) of origin other than French Canadian.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said he would consider whether he would wish to go ahead with this motion in its present form.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wonder if the same procedure could be followed with regard to this matter as was adopted on June 17, as reported at page 3407 of Hansard with respect to a question that appears there.

Mr. RALSTON: That is to say, using names as giving some indication of origin? So far as the army is concerned, that could be done.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If it is worked out on that basis it will be satisfactory to us.

ACCELERATION OF MEDICAL COURSES BY SHORTENING OF SUMMER VACATION

Mr. HAZEN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, and other documents pertaining to the scheme for accelerating medical courses by reducing the normal summer vacation to a minimum, that passed between the dominion government and Dalhousie university, the faculty of medicine of Dalhousie university, the province of Nova Scotia, and the province of New Brunswick.

CROWSNEST PASS FLOOD CONDITIONS

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—BAKING INDUSTRY

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of a report or reports by J. D. Woods of the wartime prices and trade board, regarding the baking industry.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot agree to this motion, because this is a privileged document, a confidential document. It relates to reports of conditions existing in certain private enterprises or businesses, and I object to making it public.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before it is dropped I want to point out that I asked for this from the wartime prices and trade board. It was understood at the beginning that it was a confidential document, but a member of the advisory council of the board circulated it among the employers, and if the employers have seen it, then surely the employees, who are also vitally concerned, should see it. I am taking the only course that seems open to me in asking that the report be tabled, since it has been made public to one section of the people concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was informed that it was not made public with the authority of the board, if it was made public. I have no knowledge that it was, other than what the hon. gentleman has just said. I did gather from what was said to me by the board that one copy may have got out—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is right.

Mr. ILSLEY: —but it was not with the authority of the board. However, I will make inquiries and see whether, in view of that fact, there is any way in which it can be made available to my hon. friend. But I have taken the stand on a question of principle that reports of this kind are not producible in the house.

Motion stands.

PRIVILEGE—MR. RALSTON

REFERENCE TO NEWS DISPATCH IN "L'ACTION CATHOLIQUE" OF JULY 4

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My attention has been called to the fact that in the issue of L'Action Catholique of July 4 there is a news dispatch from Ottawa under the date line July 4, marked (DNC), which I understand means "from our own correspondent". I will read the translation:

Ottawa, July 4 (F.O.C.) (D.N.C.) Hon. J. L. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, announced yesterday in the House of Commons he had discussed—when he was acting Minister of Finance—the amalgamation of Canadian Railways in the course of an interview with Sir Edward Peacock, English director of the Canadian Pacific.

An accusation along that line had been made against Colonel Ralston the day before by Mr. Jean François Pouliot, Liberal member for Témiscouata.

I wish to point out that what is herein stated is directly contrary to the facts, as appears from Hansard itself. I assume that the dispatch appears as it stands either through a misprint or through an unintentional misreading, because I am sure that no responsible correspondent or publication would publish an incorrect statement of that kind. What I did say will be seen in Hansard at page 3910. I said—

. . . that I never at any time, either as a member of the government or personally, discussed with Sir Edward Peacock, or anybody representing him, the amalgamation of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific railways or anything relating to the railways.

METALS AND MINERALS

PRESS REPORT AS TO ARRANGEMENT TO INCREASE PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) a question based on a press dispatch of this morning's date which reads:

An arrangement has been made to increase Canada's production of war metals and minerals, which will probably result in the opening of certain marginal and sub-marginal deposits, the munitions and supply department announced last night.

The question I should like to ask the minister is this: What is the arrangement; will the government finance the investigation and development of mineral areas; and is it intended by the government to encourage production of war metals and minerals in all provinces in which they are procurable?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This seems definitely a question for the order paper.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Monday, June 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Mr. J. A. BONNIER (St. Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, to resume the thread of my remarks at the point where they were interrupted by the closing hour last Friday, I was speaking at the time of the former Minister of Public Works and Transport (Mr. Cardin) and of the stand he adopted when he saw that the government, following a change of policy, intended now to pursue a course of action diametrically opposed to that which the Liberal party had followed for over twenty-five years. Despite the gravity of the situation, he unhesitatingly obeyed the dictates of his conscience and resigned from the cabinet. This act alone took on considerable import, and the address he delivered on June 11 was not of lesser moment.

As Minister of Public Works and Transport and as a member of this house, Mr. Cardin rendered countless services to members from all parts of the country during a period of thirty years. He was the most popular of the Prime Minister's colleagues, especially since the passing of Mr. Lapointe. His speech was thus listened to respectfully and, I might even add, with admiration by the entire house. No one can gainsay the sincerity of his decision.

What we have been unable to do throughout the country, the former minister may be able to achieve in the house. We have failed to reach the people of the country at large but, in the commons, Mr. Cardin and those who share his views will be heard by that country's representatives. Shall we succeed in convincing the majority of our colleagues of the merits of our cause? Let us hope so, yet we cannot be sure of it.

Now more than ever the unity of all men of good will is urgent not only in Ottawa, not only in Quebec, but in the whole of Canada. We rejoice in the fact that our province is no longer divided against itself as it was in the past.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the speech delivered by the former Minister of Public Works and Transport has made the Canadian people think and that they will realize the French Canadians have done everything in their power to promote friendly understanding throughout the country. For the last thirty years, the former Minister of Public Works and the late Mr. Lapointe have preached unity and mutual understanding in our province and throughout Canada, in order to increase the strength and prosperity of the nation. To attain this ideal, each one of the parties to confederation must do its share and be tolerant towards the others. It should not always be the duty of the minority to be tolerant, and the privilege of the majority to use what may be termed strong-arm methods. In the present circumstances, if the English-speaking part of the population were really desirous of attaining that unity of which they speak so much, they would avoid the ever-recurrent issue of conscription. At every election, conscription has been damned up by our various governments and yet, as soon as Britain declares war, the issue always crops up again. It is well known that French Canada is opposed to the principle underlying such a method of raising men, for we have always been led to think that conscription would never be enacted and that enlistments would be voluntary. Why bring up then, every time our country goes to war, this issue of conscription which the French Canadians cannot endorse? They are willing to do everything possible through the voluntary system but are irrevocably against conscription. I wonder whether the advocates of conscription are quite sincere. If they want unity in this country, let them stop talking about conscription and we shall accept everything else for victory and the efficient administration of Canada. As everyone knows, we have no wish to stir up trouble but we do not want conscription. Why this persistence in trying to foist it upon us?

Besides, the voluntary system has been satisfactory so far. The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) has emphasized, after his colleagues, that there is no possible comparison between the voluntary system and conscription as regards military efficiency and quality of personnel. In the air force especially, coercion would give poor results, a remark that also applies to the navy. It is therefore preferable to stick to the present methods of recruitment which have so far proved more than adequate in bringing the active army up to strength and have afforded the required supply of labour for agricultural and industrial production.

The government, led by the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is endeavouring to balance and coordinate our war effort as much as possible, which is the best way to ensure its complete success. Conscription for overseas service would be a harmful measure and, in placing their trust in the Prime Minister, the Canadian people no doubt wish that its enactment will never become necessary, however grave the situation.

On April 27 last, the province of Quebec voted "no" on the plebiscite while the other provinces gave an affirmative answer. The results in my constituency were as follows: 9,851 ayes, 22,071 nays and 690 spoiled ballots. I left my constituents free to vote as they thought best and, abiding by their verdict, I must now voice my opposition to Bill No. 80 which we are considering and which is but a further step towards conscription.

Much is made of the fact that eight provinces voted in the affirmative, but a close analysis of the results shows that the "no" votes in Quebec cancel out the "yes" votes in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Which reduces to a great extent that impressive majority of eight to one. Moreover, the plebiscite vote was not taken on the direct issue of conscription. On the contrary, our leaders emphasized time and again in their radio addresses that its purpose was not the immediate enforcement of conscription but merely to obtain release for the government of commitments made before 1940. The picture might be different if the enacting of such a measure appeared necessary, but the voluntary has been fully adequate until now and that is why the province of Quebec voted in the negative. Indeed all the reverses our allies have suffered can be traced to the lack of artillery and motorized units and not to their need of man-power.

The advocates of conscription claim in every one of their speeches that they wish to maintain harmony and unity in this country. Now is it fair to expect the province of Quebec to knuckle down every time there is a sacrifice to be made? Let our friends from the other provinces who never stop talking about Canadian unity lead the way to a better understanding and cease all this chatter about conscription. That would be the best evidence of the fact they are willing to make some sacrifices for the sake of national unity.

Mr. Speaker, the cabinet has a new member who seems determined to run the whole show. There was a man down our way named Aubertin, who called such people who cannot refrain from throwing their weight around in any group they belong to "the man in the straw hat." I think this new minister should drop his managerial attitude and withdraw from the stand he has taken on conscription. Perhaps he is actuated by some hidden motive. Perhaps he wishes to step into someone's shoes. Let him beware. After the death of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, one of his lieutenants, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, endeavoured to take over as leader of the Liberal party. However, you may remember that a convention was held to find a new party leader. What happened? Delegates were appointed. I was requested to appoint one myself. After the meeting our delegate was instructed not to support anyone who had voted against Laurier on the conscription issue. When the time came to select the leader, the Hon. Mr. Fielding seemed to have a clear field. However, at that time, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe was living and very active in political circles and so was the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). They pointed out that in 1917 Mr. Fielding had favoured conscription and had forsaken Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Mr. Fielding was put aside and the present Prime Minister was chosen as leader of the Liberal party for his devotion to Liberal traditions and his stand on conscription.

Let the Prime Minister keep that in mind lest the same thing happen to him. The province of Quebec has a long memory.

In conclusion, I repeat that there should be an end to these requests for all-out sacrifices on our part during this war. We are not opposed to the budget in spite of all the sacrifices it will mean for us. Our people are by no means in affluent circumstances. Most of my constituents are working men but they nevertheless accept every sacrifice necessary to win the war. However, a matter on which we disagree is the method of conducting this war. On that point, we disagree with our English-speaking fellow citizens. We support the voluntary system of enlistment while they favour conscription.

In every victory loan and Red Cross campaign launched in the country, we have exceeded our quotas. We can surely not be accused of having failed to contribute our share. The former Minister of Public Works has always done everything he could, and he remembers the pledges he gave in the province of Quebec. He has waged many political campaigns in every part of the province. Everywhere he was scheduled to speak, the people were eager to hear him. The same could be said of the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe. Were he still alive, he would speak along the same lines. His words are sacred and no one can overlook his statements. Lapointe and Cardin had both promised that there would be no conscription. The former Minister of Public Works did not hesitate to resign when he saw that the enforcement of conscription was advocated. We are fortunate in having Mr. Cardin to uphold our cause. We are prepared to follow him, and all my constituents have intimated to me that they are pleased by the stand taken by the former Minister of Public Works.

Not long ago, Mr. Speaker, I heard the hon. member for Laval Two-Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) and the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) criticize the former Minister of Public Works. Such criticism is regrettable. People who have the same purpose in view should try to get along with each other. Mr. Cardin has given up his portfolio and I would ask those two hon. members to maintain a friendly attitude toward a man who thinks as they do, who has one wish and one purpose in common with them: opposition to conscription.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Speaker, it will not take me very long to state my position with regard to the bill now before the house for second reading. Its purpose is to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 by repealing the restrictive section which stands in the way of posting a trained man to a unit which is to serve overseas, which restriction was placed in that act because of a commitment the government had previously made and which it found was an obstacle in the path of a total war effort. To rid itself of that commitment it held a plebiscite. We did not agree with the holding of the plebiscite; we argued against it, and stated our objections. However, those objections were overruled and the plebiscite became law. We threw ourselves with considerable energy into the campaign, which was to endeavour to facilitate the getting out of the vote all through Canada so that the electors might state their answer to the question being asked them. As everybody knows, the result of that plebiscite was a strong affirmative vote. We still believe that the government did not follow the right course in not energetically and courageously taking the steps which it considered should be taken, and, if necessary, asking parliament for its opinion thereon.

Certainly I support the bill. But the situation does not seem to be quite as simple as that. Speaking on the plebiscite bill in February the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stated that in the opinion of the government it was not necessary to introduce conscription, that if that time did come the government proposed to state the facts to parliament and let parliament decide. On introducing this bill a month ago, however, the Prime Minister, although stating again that the government felt that conscription was not necessary, went on to say that in his opinion this was the time and certainly this was the place in which the question of conscription should be debated, and that as he did not want conscription to be twice debated, perhaps in the same year, now was the time to debate it. It has been debated to some extent. Debates culminate in votes. Therefore this vote, which will be taken perhaps to-morrow, being a division on the second reading of the bill, will have to be used by hon. members to answer two questions. It will not be an entanglement for me because I am prepared to support the bill and all that the bill entails, but I can well imagine that there may be hon. members who desire to support the bill which removes the commitments of the government but who are not prepared to vote for conscription.

It is a matter worth recording that ever since the beginning of the war the government has proceeded nervously and haltingly toward a total war. The extent to which Canada's war effort has been magnificent does not appear to me to have been due so much to the effort of the government as it has to the strident expressions of public opinion which have reached us from the country. It will be recalled that on May 22, 1940, the date on which in the parliament of the United Kingdom an emergency bill containing very wide powers was introduced, passed through all its stages, and received the royal assent, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked the Prime Minister whether the government had considered the advisability of doing likewise. The Prime Minister replied that consideration had been given to measures of a sweeping character, but that he could not say more until he had seen the United Kingdom legislation.

Four weeks passed and then at an interview with the Prime Minister, sought and obtained by the leader of the opposition, somewhat detailed proposals were made to the right hon. gentleman that the government should bring in a measure which would give it very wide powers indeed to cope with the alarming situation. By the signal mercy of God alone the British and allied troops had been evacuated successfully from Dunkirk, but Britain then stood alone faced by a powerful enemy drunk with success, and the only assistance then forthcoming—France was tottering to a fall—was from the dominions, which were gradually gathering in force. I was present at that interview, and a discussion ensued between the Prime Minister and his colleagues and the leader of the opposition. The leader of the opposition pressed upon the Prime Minister the desirability of creating for his government far wider powers than they then had.

The Prime Minister suggested that the matter might be allowed to rest for twenty-four hours before the Leader of the Opposition made any public statement thereon, and that was acceded to by the colleagues of the Leader of the Opposition after he had discussed it with them. On the following day, June 18, 1940, the Prime Minister introduced the national resources mobilization bill, and the house gave it first and second readings. It was printed and distributed; the house gave it third reading on June 20, and it received the royal assent on June 21. The official opposition had proposed it to the government. A month later it had pressed it on the government and only then was it introduced; and, warmly supported by the opposition, it became law.

The first notable action under the mobilization act was the holding of a national registration, a numbering of the people, an effort to find out just exactly what people there were and what they might be able to do best. It was announced by the Prime Minister on his introduction of the bill, in these words:

> A national registration of Canada's manpower will accordingly be instituted at once. Let me emphasize the fact that this registration will have nothing whatever to do with the recruitment of men for overseas service.

The registration took place on August 19, 20 and 21 of 1940. But it must be remembered that just about a year before, that is a day or two after Canada entered the war, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) advocated just such a numbering of the people. This was his phraseology:

> A general survey of all skilled labour and man-power in order to throw light on the adequacy or inadequacy of Canada's resources and to plan in advance the proper allocation of our man-power between the ages of eighteen and sixty-five.

That was on September 9, 1939. Eight months later, nothing having been done in that direction, he placed a question on the order paper asking whether such a registration would be undertaken, to which the Prime Minister replied that "it was not customary to announce government policy in answer to specific questions on the order paper".

On the 27th of May, the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) again emphasized the necessity for such a registration, for the reasons already given, but also for another reason, namely, to enable the government to tackle the question of the fifth columnists, which at least in some parts of Canada was causing considerable alarm to the people. And he also would have liked to have the registration include all men and women above the age of sixteen.

On the same day the leader of the opposition appealed to the Minister of National Defence asking for a comprehensive survey of the availability and suitability of industrial activity to help win the war, to which the late Hon. Norman Rogers replied that national registration "had received the careful study to which it was entitled".

Thus again the official opposition, carrying out its expressed determination to do all in its power to help the government in its war effort, proposed in detail action which, months later, was effected.

The registration was the basis for placing young men of chosen ages and of certain medical categories in training camps, and the first period of that training was a thirty-day period. It must be remembered that the Prime Minister now refers to the placing of the men in training camps under the 1940 act as an acceptance of the policy of conscription. The first phase was for thirty-day training periods; that was in October of 1940. Almost at once a clamour arose in the country that a thirty-day period for training was utterly inadequate, that these young men after but a few days of actual training work would slip back into civil life and that their work would largely be lost.

On November 12, a month after the camps started, the leader of the opposition asked that the training period be extended to four months, half of which should be training of a preliminary character and the other half training of a more detailed nature, graduation being required from the one to the other. That suggestion also was adopted, and the four months training period began in February of 1941. But at the end of the period, whether it was thirty days or four months, the trained men would return to civil life and a good deal of the training work that had been accomplished, costing time and money on the part of the taxpayers and the men and the instructors who were appointed for that purpose, would largely be lost; and once more it was the leader of the opposition who first drew attention to the necessity of retaining the services of these trained men, and who put it into words in this form when he was speaking in the house on March 14, on the war appropriation bill:

> Under these regulations in a limited sense that is true; but the country has no right under these regulations to use these men to defend this country abroad, and that is the weakness of the whole position. The country has the right to utilize the services of these men in the event of an invasion of Canada. But time and again we have had it explained in this house by the ministry that the first line of defence in this country is not here but over there. Why, then, has the government not had the courage to go the whole way and retain the absolute right to utilize the services of these men for the defence of Canada over there, after giving them four months' training and spending the huge sums of money that have been spent on military education? That is going the whole length and putting the thing in a nutshell.

Two months after the camps started on a four-months basis the announcement was made that the trained men would be retained in the active army for the duration of the war.

There are four occasions on which the official opposition pressed on the government schemes and suggestions, some detailed in extent, and urgently demanded in the country, and which, after a lapse of months, were adopted and put into operation by the government. And they were not the only suggestions made to the government. The official opposition was by no means the only body of thought in this country which was pressing suggestions on the government for a more rapid mobilization of all that Canada had and could use. Those manifestations were growing before 1941 particularly, and hon. members will not forget the statement put forward by the Canadian Legion, which seemed to pick up all those thoughts which were raging through the country and bring them under one head. Let me read one phrase which occurs toward the end of that call, so well-known throughout the country as the Canadian Legion's statement:

> Canada needs and is seeking a courageous, a moral and a spiritual lead. You yourself, sir—

The statement was addressed to the Prime Minister.

> —have forcibly and repeatedly made known your own clear knowledge of the issues at stake and of the terrible dangers which lie ahead. Canada wants you to implement to the full your inspired pronouncement: "There is only one way to meet 'total war' and that is by 'total effort'—effort not for a day, or a week, or a month, but every day until victory is won."

I have no doubt that I am not singular amongst hon. members in having been literally deluged with resolutions from societies and associations of every description, who seem to have been impelled, after that call from the legion was put forth, to add their support, by resolution, by letter, by postcard, by word of mouth. They came in every form and description of manifesto that could possibly be used, and indeed another eruption of postcards is taking place at the present time, all emphasizing the same note—total effort for total war. The pressure that the people of Canada have brought to bear on Canada is the measure to-day of Canada's war effort.

Now I come to occasions when greater activity was urged upon the government to provide more materials for war.

On May 28, 1940, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked for a statement from the government on the production of tanks. On the same day the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) alluded to the shortage of tanks for training. He also asked a question on the order paper, followed a few days later by a question by myself, for the relevant papers connected with the correspondence between the manufacturers and the government on the subject of tanks, to which the minister a few days later replied that search was being made but that so far no relevant documents had reached him. The following day the hon. member for Parkdale returned to the subject and gave details of firms capable of undertaking such work if directed to proceed, remarking—so truly—that there was no manufacture that Canadian industry could not undertake if it was directed so to do. That is a fact which Canadian industry and Canadian labour have proved up to the hilt. The gist of the minister's reply was that it was not so far the policy of the government to proceed with the manufacture of tanks; that Canadian industry was becoming increasingly busy in making things which it had never made before; that the difficulties connected with obtaining the necessary raw materials and the designs, tools and machines, were very great, but were gradually being overcome. But Dunkirk had been evacuated; France had fallen; the United Kingdom had lost $2,000,000,000 worth of equipment. The policy of the government changed, Canadian industry was directed to make tanks, it was assisted to make tanks, and Canadian industry and Canadian labour to-day are making tanks. I read in the Montreal Gazette of June 30:

The cruiser tank, made in Canada, is of Canadian design. Its cast steel welded armour plate, which makes the use of rivets unnecessary, presents no flat surface. The rounded contour renders it less vulnerable to direct hits.

Not only is Canadian industry being directed and assisted to make tanks; Canadian industry and Canadian labour are making tanks which are being used on many fronts to-day, and those tanks are actually made to the design of Canadian designers who, making use of the information and knowledge gleaned so far, have been able to adapt their special knowledge to the furthering and the proving of design of these instruments of war.

I go a little further, with regard to shipbuilding. Hon. members will remember that, not so very long after the outbreak of war, Canada embarked on the making of corvettes for Britain and for us, also the making of mine-sweepers, patrol ships and a great variety of smaller craft. But she did not get busy with the building of freighters. The toll of sinkings rose, and every now and again became so intense that it was a larger figure than the output of the shipbuilding yards of the allied countries. The Canadian government did not seem to be ready to go into the building of freighters. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), speaking in this house on June 14, 1940, said—Hansard, page 785:

I would ask the minister if it would not be possible for Canada now to enter upon a programme for the construction of ships up to, let us say, 10,000 tons.

On March 10, 1941—the question was still open after ten months—the leader of the opposition used these words—Hansard, page 1391:

I believe that the genius of our people and their desire to see a rehabilitation of this industry in the maritime provinces is sufficient to overcome what are insuperable difficulties in the minds of some persons, but which fade into insignificance when one gets down to realities.

The following day the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) said—Hansard, page 1450:

In my judgment . . . the minister will find shortly that the whole shipbuilding programme will have to be revamped with the objective of perhaps making it one hundred times bigger than it is to-day.

It would not be so very much bigger, seeing that practically none were being built at that time. On April 1, 1941, the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), said—Hansard, page 2077:

If shipbuilding is as urgent as we believe it to be, the number of ships being built in Nova Scotia should be manyfold the number being built to-day. The minister says that the shipyards of Nova Scotia should be humming. Why are they not humming? Because there is no humming on the part of the minister and the government and those associated with them.

There are four instances, over nearly two years, of endeavours on the part of members of the opposition to get the government started on the building of freighters, against the day when the submarine menace—and it has unfortunately come true on the west side of the Atlantic—would be sinking ships at such a rate that the shipbuilding powers of the allies would not keep up with it. Again the minister made his defence. He stated that the difficulty so far was to find the necessary labour to keep the repair yards going, and that until that difficulty had been met it would not be possible in his opinion to proceed to shipbuilding. But that difficulty was surmounted, the registration had taken place, and if it was possible then and in subsequent months to find and adapt the necessary labour, I maintain that it would have been possible a year beforehand to do so.

I do not place these things on record at this time in a spirit of belittlement of what Canada's effort has amounted to—not at all—but because there seems to be surrounding this government a mutual admiration society of supporters who do nothing but nauseatingly stroke the back of the government and place it on record that the government and the government only is responsible for what Canada has accomplished. I do not put this on record for the purpose of patting the opposition on the back—the opposition was merely carrying out its distinct statement to the government of its desire to help—but because through this country there are organizations in great numbers, besides individuals, who from the beginning have endeavoured to bring pressure to bear upon the government to get busy and busier than they had been up till then. And now the government wants to remove the hindrance.

In approaching the question of an amendment to the mobilization act we have listened to speeches from three service ministers and several of their colleagues—most interesting speeches—and the comparing of the one with the other gives food for a great deal of thought. But I notice that in the speech of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) he was expressing some dissatisfaction with what he called the conscript. He used the illustration of the commanding officer of a unit in need of reinforcements who would certainly choose the volunteer before he would choose the conscript. But does he shut his eyes to the fact that in this country to-day units of the Canadian active army are composed in just that way? They are composed of volunteers, augmented by compelled men; and if it is a difficulty in the one case it is certainly a difficulty in the other. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) the other day called the attention of the house to difficulties that were arising in the units within Canada with regard to their training, with regard to their relations the one to the other, with regard to the duties to which they are put. It certainly is not a happy condition and there is but one way in which it can be overcome, and that is by the use of the policy of conscription, which the Prime Minister says was included in the 1940 act at the time of its passing.

I now come for a few moments to the question of what the electors of Yale, whose mouthpiece I am in this house, meant by their vote. The Prime Minister had asserted again and again that they were not asked to decide on conscription, but just whether they were ready to free the government from its commitments. I wonder how many times I was asked: "What does this question mean?" I wonder how many times I was asked "What will the government do if the answer is 'yes', or if the answer is 'no'?" I wonder how many times it was said to me, "Well, I know what I mean by voting 'yes' on this plebiscite". To all these queries there was only one answer I could give; I could only quote the sphinx. They had to take the answer as best they might. But they went to the polls, and they went to the polls in greater numbers than I had expected, in greater numbers than in recent general elections. I had certainly been afraid of the apathy that might have been shown by the people of Canada with regard to this plebiscite, but in all Yale 77 per cent of those who could vote did vote. In the city in which I live, 92 per cent of the people who could vote did vote, and 84 per cent of them voted "yes". In Vernon, to the north, 85 per cent voted "yes", in Penticton to the south 88 per cent, and in all Yale 83 per cent voted "yes".

What do I take it that they meant by their "yes", vote? Judging by conversations, correspondence, resolutions, representations through their press, I take it without any doubt whatever that Yale voted five to one "yes" because it was desirous of releasing the government from anything that stood in its path, so that it might proceed to make use of the very wide powers contained in section 2 of the act, powers so wide that the government is empowered thereby to make use of men and women, their possessions, everything that Canada has and can use, which can be adapted to the purposes of total war. That is what they meant by voting "yes". It is quite true that a certain proportion of those who voted "yes" wanted something more than that. They wanted compulsion for service anywhere. How large that fraction is neither I nor anybody else can say, but I know something of the reasons why those who held that view did hold them.

I do not think it was for the purpose of increasing the size of Canada's military forces overseas. I do not think they knew the facts sufficiently. They have no opinion with regard to that. What the government had undertaken to do on Canada's behalf, and how far they had succeeded in doing it, nobody knew. We did not know it in this house. We have been listening to the speeches of service ministers and others for months past, interwoven with figures of man-power, and I know that they have baffled me. We asked supplementary questions, and answers were not always given, but those that the ministers considered could be given were frequently for some period which did not fit into the general picture. We could not fit them into the picture of those who had been discharged from the service, those whose medical category had been changed, those who were placed in certain work which it was not proper to divulge to us. So we could not get, at least I have never been able to get, a clear picture in my mind as to how the Canadian military forces are divided, where they are, and in what numbers they are proceeding overseas. I do not think, therefore, that that was the reason why the people of Yale so largely voted "yes."

There were three other reasons. One was that they were looking at what they believed to be their best men going and their less worthy men remaining behind, and vacancies in labour being filled by those who in their opinion might have gone. In the second place, they were listening to the stories of their men on leave, their men in their correspondence from active service units, describing just what the hon. member for Vancouver South described of what was going on in the active service units within Canada doing their training here. And they even went so far in many cases as to allege that the presence of these compelled men in a unit, who would have to be removed before that unit could be sent overseas, was having the effect of preventing that unit from being included in overseas contingents. The third reason was perhaps the strongest of the three. They did not know the extent of the commitment of Canada's military forces overseas, but they read, and they are proud to read, that it is perhaps the finest and the best trained and best equipped force that modern warfare has ever seen, and they know that when the time comes it will be used in the forefront of the battle. Sadly do I remember that that means casualties, and I wonder how you can possibly fill the vacancies caused by casualties if you do not start now to do the training. If you wait until too late to train these men for modern mechanized war we shall but have a repetition of some of the saddest incidents in Canadian military history. I think there is no doubt, if I read the minds of those in Yale constituency who voted "yes," that the majority of them desired conscription, although I am not in a position to say how large that number is.

There is another phase of this matter to which I want to devote the closing minutes of my time. Some week or two ago in this debate I listened to a speech by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. McDonald). It was a bitter speech, and I imagine that the old-fashioned way of answering would have been for a similarly bitter speech to be made from this side of the house. Alas! there is ample material for such a speech—but it would have done no good. It would but add another handful of fuel to the flames of controversy. The hon. member told us that seared into his mind there were utterances of his opponents. Does he think he is alone in that? There are certain phrases seared into my mind which were used by a prominent Liberal French leader in the by-election in Rimouski, which was followed a few months later by the by-election as a result of which I found myself a member of this House of Commons. I do not repeat those dreadful words. I shall not repeat them; they would do no good. But if I am ready to endeavour to forget such things and to move forward on a better road, may I not appeal to the hon. member for Pontiac that he also should endeavour to forget such things as he remembers were spoken by his opponents, so that together, and supported by what I believe to be a tremendous number of people of this country, we should move along a road which will lead to better things?

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), who left his seat in the government because be believed his leader had misled his people. He spoke of the French Canadians having made concession after concession. He surely does not think that they were the only ones who made concessions. He spoke of the accident of nature whereby my blood is apt to tingle when British institutions are in danger, whereas by another accident of nature he has to make use of his reasoning powers before he can express his admiration for British institutions. As he spoke I wondered whether, being no less intelligent than I, he had made use of all his powers in endeavouring to withstand those awful inaccuracies used among his compatriots, that the great war was an imperial war. An imperial war? With British troops, supported by troops from the dominions, endeavouring, shoulder to shoulder with French troops, to repel the invaders of France—and that this war is an English war! Did you ever hear such nonsense? An English war more than an American war, more than a war for the allied countries, every one of those countries that wants above all else to return to a condition under which they may have liberty to think and worship as they will?

On Saturday the United States commemorated their great day. There arrived in Ottawa 200 of their soldiers, and their band, to take part with us in army week. Did they come up here with an idea that this war, in which we and they and seventeen other nations are engaged, was an English war? Surely the hon. member and those other great leaders of French-Canadian thought on whose words his compatriots hang, surely if they had made in the twenty years before 1938 speeches such as some have made since 1938 we should not be face to face with such a conglomeration of falsehood as apparently rules in some quarters of this country. I make an appeal to him—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on. Finish.

Mr. STIRLING: May I finish that sentence?

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is unanimous consent.

Mr. GARDINER: I object. The hon. gentleman cut three minutes off my time the other day.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): I feel impelled to offer you, Mr. Speaker, my apology for injecting myself into a debate which has been protracted beyond reasonable limits. If I do so, and crave your indulgence for a few minutes, it is not for the purpose of throwing any new light on the subject, because I feel that all that could be said pro and con on the question now before the house has been said. If I take the privilege of placing my views on record it is more for the purpose of preventing my silence from being misinterpreted in the future.

In the few moments which I shall take I shall use the English language. I would much prefer to use my own mother tongue; I would feel more at ease and I would have at my command a much broader vocabulary with which to express the shades of my thought. However I realize that were I to speak in French only thirty per cent of the members of the house would follow my remarks, while by using the English language I am presumptuous enough to hope that all those who are within the sound of my voice will be able to understand what I have to say. The fact that if I use my mother tongue in this instance I would not be understood by seventy per cent of the membership of this house is, under the present circumstances, not without its significance. And it is for the purpose of answering the appeal made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) that I will try to convey my thoughts in a language which is not my mother tongue, but which I have adopted and which I delight to use even in the poor manner which is at my command.

I want to make plain at the outset that I am not speaking for any particular section of the country or any particular group in the country. What I have to express are my own personal views, which I believe are shared by many Canadians, wherever in this country they may happen to live or whatever may be their ancestral origin.

The question now being debated, which has been discussed in this parliament and out of it for many days, has, more than any other matter that has arrested public attention within the last twenty-five years, served to emphasize how difficult it is to administer a country like Canada, so diversified from the point of view of geography, so diversified from the point of view of the different racial elements composing it, and so diversified because, being a young country, it has not yet attained the full maturity of nationhood and the various component elements have not yet been melted into one nation, thinking alike from coast to coast throughout an area extending for more than three thousand miles. It has also emphasized how difficult it is for anyone to undertake to lead a government such as the government of Canada; to mould and bring together different shades of opinion, the views expressed by different elements in the country, and to arrive at one expression which will be the expression of the whole Canadian nation. Nothing more emphasizes this difficulty than a question such as this. Even in connection with a matter of life and death for the nation, we find people professing to be united as to the object desired, but so divided as to the means of attaining that object that one is led to believe that sometimes the end is lost sight of in the mass of details with regard to methods and means of attaining that end. In order, therefore to indicate fully my conclusions I want again to place the question on record, because one is apt to forget what this discussion is all about if once in a while the real question is not brought back into focus before the eyes of those who have to consider it.

We are asked to approve legislation amending an act of parliament assented to on June 21, 1940, and entitled The National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940. Section 2 of that act, which contains the substance of it, reads as follows:

> Subject to the provisions of section three hereof, the governor in council may do and authorize such acts and things, and make from time to time such orders and regulations, requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of his majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada, the maintenance of public order, or the efficient prosecution of the war, or for maintaining supplies or services essential to the life of the community.

Section 3 of the same act, which we are now asked to remove from the statute, reads as follows:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

The reasons for which we are asked to remove this section were enumerated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on June 10, when he moved the second reading of Bill No. 80, which is now under discussion. At that time the Prime Minister referred to the speech from the throne, in which are found the following paragraphs:

> My advisers believe that the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort is being obscured and impaired by controversy concerning commitments with respect to the methods of raising men for military service which were made prior to the spread of the war to all parts of the world.
> The government is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should in this connection and irrespective of any previous commitments, possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

Then the right hon. gentleman went on to say, at page 3227 of Hansard for June 10:

> You will observe that there were three purposes in holding the plebiscite. The first was that nothing should be allowed to obscure or impair the magnitude and balanced nature of Canada's war effort; the second, that the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should possess complete freedom to act in accordance with this judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise in the prosecution of the war; and the third, which has a direct bearing upon the first two, that the government and parliament should not be bound by past commitments, but be free to discuss and to decide, on its merits, the extent of the use of conscription.

Apparently there is unanimity in this house and in the country with regard to the necessity of the government having a free hand and being in a position to take whatever steps are necessary to conduct the war and clear the way for our march to victory. Nevertheless, when we come to consider the means to adopt to attain that end, we find that various opinions are offered and that the nation is apparently divided not simply into two factions but into half a dozen factions at least. May I indicate and underline the main points on which the people of this country, through their spokesmen in the House of Commons, are divided?

First we have a group which suggests that nothing should be done, that section 3 should not be eliminated, that the government should not be given a free hand until finance and industry have been mobilized and conscripted.

We have another group which holds the view and advocates that the government should have no right or power to mobilize man-power for overseas service until industry and finance have been mobilized and conscripted concurrently with man-power.

We have a third group which holds that man-power only should be conscripted, and mobilized by compulsion now.

As between these three sets of opinions there is much difference. There is no one view which commands a strong enough body of opinion in the country to justify its adoption by the government as the expression of the will of the majority of the Canadian people. If the government were to predicate the mobilization of the army upon mobilization of all the other resources in the country, I am sure that would not meet with the approval of the majority of public opinion, because, whatever may be the merits of such a policy, public opinion is not yet ready to accept it. On the other hand, as to total mobilization of man-power now for service anywhere, it has not yet been demonstrated that the need is urgent or that this step is necessary to make the war effort total.

In the face of these divergent views what is the Prime Minister to do? Before going any further, may I refer to another set of views which is held by a large percentage of our population—complete opposition to compulsory service for overseas. In order to understand fully this attitude and these views which are held by Canadians of French origin in this country, let me open up the background and show where these views have their origin and where this opposition to conscription for overseas service takes its root.

It cannot be said that Canadians, whether of French or of British origin, are unalterably opposed to conscription, because they are favourable to compulsory service for the defence of their country. They have approved it in the mobilization act, and they still approve it so far as compulsory service is applicable to the defence of our own country. They are in favour of conscription for the defence of Canada. On the other hand, they are opposed to conscription for overseas.

What does "overseas" mean? To the French Canadian, to those whose racial roots have grown in the soil of Canada for over 300 years, to the descendants of those who came here from 300 to 400 years ago from the land of their forbears to which they never returned and have never shown any inclination to return, overseas means the land of the French revolution with all its terrors, the land of perpetual war and social upheaval, the land whence came their conquerors, the land of the imperialists, whether British, French or German. For a people like the French Canadians, not internationally minded, overseas wars have never had any appeal. French Canadians have never thought that it was their national duty to enlist to fight overseas wars, whether they be for the support of British, French or German imperialism. The French Canadian has never considered it a part of his national duties to accept any obligation to fight in a war beyond the territorial limits of his own country.

In order to indicate the opinion of those who write and are in position to speak for the Canadian people, in order to show how little internationally minded are the French Canadians, I should like to quote an excerpt from an article by the Abbé Arthur Maheux, published in a booklet entitled "Food for Thought", put out by the Canadian association for adult education. I quote:

From the beginning the French Canadians were far from being internationally minded. The first settlers who came from France in the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries were mostly craftsmen who became farmers in new France. Even in the homeland their outlook had been local rather than national. They were more interested in Normandy, Perche, Anjou, Poitou, Aunis, Saintonge, than in France as a whole. Other countries were of little concern to them.

In new France they virtually lost sight of Europe. For them Europe meant only wars into which they were forced against their will and against their immediate interests. France controlled their life, dictated policies, and forbade the development of desired industries. The result was that the settlers soon became North American in outlook. That spirit grew stronger with the cession of Canada to England in 1763. Then they were really Canadians in name as they had been in feeling and tradition since perhaps 1698 or the treaty of Ryswick.

That serves to show some of the background of the French Canadian and explains his objection to fighting either overseas or beyond the limits of his country. Canadians of French origin have always been willing to bear arms for the defence of their country. In 1760 they fought against the British and lost, but sixteen years later they fought with the British in order to prevent the invasion of Canada by another branch of the British family living to the south. In 1812 they again took up arms for the defence of their country and to support the British crown and British authority in Canada. This has happened all down through history. Perhaps I may be permitted to mention another instance where Canadians of French descent fought to uphold the British crown and British traditions in Canada. I refer to the incidents which preceded the signing of the Webster-Ashburton treaty on August 9, 1842.

On August 9 of this year one hundred years will have elapsed since the last regretful incident between the United States and Canada. The Ashburton treaty settled many questions, but one important one from the Canadian standpoint was the dispute over the international and the north-eastern boundary between the state of Maine and the province of New Brunswick. In 1820 Maine was made a state in the union. A large wooded territory extended to the Quebec border and to what was then New Brunswick, but the exact line of demarcation between the three countries had never been clearly established and located.

United States citizens from Maine came north to settle upon what French settlers, who had been there for several years, considered to be their land. For fifteen years United States citizens tried to take possession of this territory by hoisting the United States flag on the north side of the St. John river. This land was inhabited and settled by French fugitives from old Acadia, by people who about twenty-five years previously had seen their lands and property destroyed. They had had to take refuge in the hinterland in order to escape the persecutions of British bureaucrats who thought it profitable to take possession of their lands and scatter the owners through the forests. For fifteen years this territory had been defended by people of French origin, by people who not long before had been looked upon as rebels, by people who had been chased over the ocean and who had found their way through the forests and had tried to take possession of land which they thought belonged to them. In 1842 this part of New Brunswick and Quebec was saved to the British crown by the loyalty and persistent determination of the French settlers of that country who protected it against the invaders, against the Bostonians as they were called.

It cannot be said that the French Canadians are not loyal, are not true to their land and are not ready to defend their country. Like many others, Canadians of French origin have not yet fully realized that this war is no longer a British or European war, but has become a Canadian and world war. To support this statement I should like to quote not a Canadian of French origin but an article written by Mr. Leslie Roberts and which appeared in the Toronto Saturday Night of January 17, 1942:

From its inception, the war has been hammered home to Canadians as an empire war. We are far less Canadian than we were in 1939. The words "British" and "empire" occur in almost every sentence of the war news and the newscasts. Practically nobody has stressed the fact that this is a Canadian war, which Canadians are fighting in order to save the Canadian way of life for the people of Canada.

We have facing us, and we have to contend with, four different suggestions as to what should be the policy of the government in waging total war to save the Canadian way of life. There are those who suggest that material, financial and industrial resources should be mobilized first, and next, human resources. We have the suggestion that all resources, whether material or human, should be mobilized concurrently but that the mobilization of man-power should not take place before the mobilization of material resources. We have the suggestion that the mobilization of man-power should be compulsory and immediate. On the other hand we have the suggestion that man-power should not be mobilized for overseas or for service outside the territorial limits of Canada.

In the face of such a jigsaw puzzle, what is the duty of the leader of the government? What is the duty of the government? It is to find a place for each piece and a piece for each place; and that has been the policy pursued by the Prime Minister. Notwithstanding the fact that he has been attacked from within and without, he has persistently and consistently tried to mould and integrate each set of views so that each should fit in its place and a place should be found for each, so that it would be possible for the Canadian nation to offer to the enemy a picture which would spell in bold letters Canada's total war effort. In the working out of this puzzle the Prime Minister has proceeded on two basic principles: unity and balance. The war effort of Canada cannot be total and complete unless it is properly balanced, unless each department having to contribute to the effort is properly balanced both in materials and in men. The war effort of Canada cannot be said to be total and complete if it is not the expression of the wish and the will and the work of all sections of this country and all elements composing the Canadian nation.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I feel that, notwithstanding the difficulties which have to be encountered, notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister and the government have been criticized and vilified for not adopting, to the exclusion of all others, one set of views, by those who are preferring them, I feel that he has followed the right policy. He has followed the policy which has characterized the Canadian statesmen who have achieved something and who have their names on the roll of history. He has pursued the patient, reasonable and tactful way which was followed on occasions not as difficult as the one we are going through, but nevertheless, difficult according to the times, by Sir John A. Macdonald, by Cartier, by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and also by Sir Robert Borden until he made the mistake of yielding to an element which caused him to bring about during the last war a policy which inflicted such a deep wound in the side of the nation that after twenty-five years it is not yet healed.

So long as our Prime Minister continues to follow such a policy of prudence, of trying to get all the different viewpoints and to induce all elements to unite in the war effort, I shall give him my full support.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, conscription, to me, is neither a fetish, a symbol, nor an article of faith; it is merely a method of levying men and goods required to support the war needs of Canada. Whether or when this method should be resorted to depends on circumstances which may exist at a given moment. So far we have been fortunate enough to have carried on our war effort without having recourse to compulsory measures for overseas service. We have raised an army which is a credit to our country without having recourse to compulsion, and it is my hope and wish that we shall never have to resort to compulsory measures to fill the ranks of our army. Were such a method instituted at the present time, before the Canadian public fully realizes how difficult the situation is, how necessary it is to do everything possible to defend our country, it would be suicidal instead of being helpful; it would impair our effort rather than help it. Nevertheless, in time of crisis, I feel—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Fournier, Hull): The hon. gentleman has spoken forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MICHAUD: In time of crisis, I feel the government must have full and unlimited authority to work for the security of the nation, and the security of the nation should be the ultimate law. That is why I support the measure which the government has presented to the house, in order to give the government, the Prime Minister, whoever may be at the head of affairs, full and complete authority to do the best under the circumstances when they arise.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the time is so limited. I had a few more remarks to add, but I will reserve them until we sit in committee.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this group has not taken a very great part in this debate between two wings of the government party, but an amendment has been moved and we thought we should make our decision on this amendment clear. The amendment was moved on June 18 by the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy), and it reads:

That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"This house is of the opinion that the policy of the government respecting mobilization, instead of drawing closer the union of the two races in Canada has fostered dissensions which might cause an internal war, thus destroying the ideal set forth by the fathers of confederation."

This group endeavoured to move an amendment to the motion for second reading which would indicate our attitude to the bill, but in that we failed. However, we must say that we cannot support this amendment because, though we disagree with the bill as it now is, we cannot give our support to the idea that any section of the Canadian people is entitled to oppose legislation that has been brought into being by the will of this parliament. When we do not agree with legislation we state our position here; but when parliament has passed it, then we feel bound to accept such legislation. So we cannot oppose this bill on the basis that it might cause strife within Canada. If any measure is administered equitably, then the will of the majority must always prevail.

As I mentioned, we tried to state our position in relation to the bill as it now stands, and we failed. One of our reasons for opposing the bill is our belief that a conscription measure of this nature is of sufficient importance that all the regulations incidental to it should be placed before this house before they become law.

Within the last few weeks there has come to my notice a scandalous misuse of the national war services regulations in Canada. So, in addition to stating our position on the amendment already mentioned, I wish to draw these matters to the attention of the house because I do not believe that such procedure should be allowed to continue.

During the discussion on the war appropriation resolution I drew to the attention of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) what at that time I believed to be a misuse of the regulations for the purpose of removing a labour organizer from his functions as such. The minister investigated the matter and found that in his opinion the national war services regulations have been used for that purpose; and, acting on what he found, he sent the following telegram to the person indicated therein. I am quoting from a return to a motion moved by myself in this house on June 19. I am reading a copy of a telegram from the Minister of National War Services to the Hon. A. M. Manson, chairman of the national war services board, division K, Vancouver:

Re Alan C. Wright: Your telegram dated yesterday received and contents noted. I confirm directions contained in my telegram re this man. Please comply with directions contained therein immediately. Notify all persons concerned that notice to report for military training has been cancelled with cancellation effective morning May 21.

J. T. Thorson,
Minister of National War Services.

I also wish to read from a letter addressed to Major-General L. R. LaFleche, D.S.O., associate deputy minister of national war services, Ottawa, Ontario, and signed by A. M. Manson, national war services board, Vancouver. I will not read the whole of the letter because it is rather long. I will quote two paragraphs which would indicate that if what the boards are doing in other parts of Canada is the same as what the board is doing in Vancouver, it is time the boards were changed and people put in charge of them who have some idea of proper democratic British procedure in such matters. Referring to Alan C. Wright, I quote:

Some nine months ago this board arrived at the conclusion that there were several hundred young men in this province who had come in from other provinces and had not notified the registrar of the fact that they were resident here. We were firmly of the opinion that they had not in all probability notified the registrar of the administrative division from which they had come that they had moved to British Columbia. We have been in touch with the employment service of Canada with a view to rounding up as many of these nomads as possible. We were of the opinion that they were a disorderly element and that the situation was not satisfactory.

I did not know that, if someone considers a person "disorderly" that is sufficient reason to notify such persons to report for military service. It is not even in the order in council that being disorderly is a reason for being called up for military service. There are other remedies, and the chairman of the national war services board is not the man to put these remedies into effect. It is none of his concern; it is none of his business.

Early in this year we called in the Vancouver chief of police for a conference and asked his assistance in cleaning up the situation; he had had considerable trouble with young men who were at loose ends.

That is, young men who were out of work.

We suggested to him that in all such cases he should have his officers ask men of this class to produce their registration cards and furnish information from these registration cards to our registrar. The chief thought the idea was an excellent one and has been cooperating with us along these lines. I would just add that all through the depression—

To justify his action the chairman goes back to the depression from 1930 on.

—and subsequently Vancouver city has had hundreds of drifters come in from other provinces as far east as Quebec, and they have been a source of great trouble.

Why have they been a source of great trouble? Because the government of this country could not or would not find for them the wherewithal to live.

The letter continues:

I gathered from the press that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police approached the above named Wright some weeks ago and asked for the production of his registration card. That was not done on instruction or suggestion of our registrar or of any member of this board. However it was reported to us that Wright was of callable age and had been in this province for some time and that he had come here from the east. It was further reported to us that he was engendering trouble in our war industry. Upon being assured that we had no record of a change of address, I personally requested that his registration card should be sent from administrative division B to this registration division; that was done in April and his card disclosed that he was of callage age.

I submit that is not the business of the chairman of the national war services board to ask that any card be moved from one district to another. There is a procedure for that, but it does not lie with the chairman of the national war services board in any division.

The Hon. Mr. Manson was rather peeved at the attitude of and the action taken by the Minister of National War Services. I wish here to congratulate the minister upon the action he took; I doubt whether there is another minister in the cabinet who would have taken the same action upon finding the same condition. So the chairman of the board sent a long telegram, three foolscap pages—I suppose this is an example of war economy—to the minister, justifying his position. I shall not read the whole telegram. It is dated May 22, 1942, addressed to Hon. J. T. Thorson:

Re Alan Chamberlain Wright, K 2683. Respectfully draw attention facts following information given me April 21 last that above-named had been here some time and that he was registered electoral district 166 B division. I requested B division transfer card here which done April 27. Found callable and I then requested my registrar send notice medical which done April 29. Doctor reported May 2 category A and Wright called May 6 for camp May 21. On May 4 registrar received letter from Wright requesting postponement for at least three months and stating resident of Toronto and here temporarily on organization work for steel workers organizing committee and stating reasons postponement. Day or two later board heard two gentlemen who requested permission make representations on Wright's behalf. Day or two later again Wright with four others attended before board for an hour. Board formed very unfavourable opinion Wright as obviously bitter hot-headed and temperamentally unsuited for work on which engaged.

I should like to tell the chairman of the national war services board that perhaps there are two people who are unfit for the work on which they are engaged. Mr. Wright may be, but Hon. Mr. Manson definitely is, and nothing could more definitely show that than his own statement.

The telegram continues:

Later board ascertained this man's activities definitely subversive.

Something had to be found on this man. They called him up so that he could not carry on his work as organizer, and so something had to be found to justify the action taken.

Later board ascertained this man's activities definitely subversive industrial peace in two or three plants. In the first two the government and particularly the admiralty had demanded top-speed production. Later information disclosed that in plant which is one of two in the world producing a weapon which the admiralty regards as the most effective defence weapon available against aerial attack this man's activities had resulted in 25 per cent slow-down of production and some sabotage of tools and materials which almost irreplacable and certainly irreplacable for some considerable time. My board realized this slow-down and sabotage would cost the lives of our own and allied men and might easily cost the loss of the finest ship in the British navy. The board unanimously concluded no sound reasons for postponement put forward and request was refused on eighteenth. With this decision representative of national defence department and representative of national labour supply board attached to our board were in entire accord.

But it was not until after they had called up this man and after all the preliminaries had been gone through and after he had been told to report for military service that they found all this out. If this is true as stated in this telegram, Wright's place is not in the army; he should have been arrested and tried in a court of law.

Now I have the minister's reply to Hon. Mr. Manson. I shall not read the entire letter; I shall read just the pertinent paragraphs:

Ottawa, May 23, 1942.

Hon. A. M. Manson,
Chairman, National War Services Board,
Vancouver, B.C.

Re Alan C. Wright

My review of all the facts with regard to this matter which have been brought to my attention has led me to the conclusion that it may reasonably be inferred from the facts that this man's card was transferred from division B at Toronto to division K at Vancouver for the purpose of giving your board jurisdiction to order him to report for military training and thereby to remove him from the labour activities in which he was engaged.

I say again that I congratulate the minister upon his courageous action. The minister goes on:

I do not dispute the statements that this man has been troublesome nor do I have any doubt that you and the members of your board were actuated by motives that commended themselves to you.

On the other hand I am of the opinion that there is grave doubt as to the regularity of the proceedings that were taken in this man's case. The national war services regulations are of great importance at the present time and it is essential that they should be administered with such regularity and uniformity as is possible. Moreover, they must not be administered for any purpose other than the purposes for which they were designed. They must not be made the instrument of settling disputes. They must not, for example, be made an instrument for interfering with or attempting to settle labour disputes. Indeed they must not be used for any purpose which is ulterior or foreign to the true intent and spirit of the regulations.

In my opinion it may reasonably be inferred from the chain of events in this particular case that a definite plan of action was conceived in Vancouver to remove the above from his activities as a labour organizer by the expedient of using the machinery of the national war services regulations for the purpose and that you, as chairman of the national war services board, took an active part in this plan.

I submit that after the minister sends a letter like that to the chairman of a national war services board with an accusation of that importance, the next step for the minister to take is to ask that chairman to resign, because he has demonstrated by his own words that he is unfit for the position he holds. The people, the fathers and mothers of the young men who are called for service in this country and who have the misfortune to come before Mr. Justice Manson, should insist that he resign that position and give his attention to some other work that comes within the measure of his intellect and understanding.

Mr. THORSON: Would my hon. friend think it fair to allow one incident, one error, let us say, to offset the excellent service that the chairman of the board has given under very difficult circumstances?

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister suggests that this is just one case, one instance. How do I know it is only one instance?

Mr. THORSON: It is the only one I have heard of.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, it may be the only one. In his letter to Major-General LaFleche, I think it was, Mr. Manson said that on this particular occasion they had called up 126 men. Those were perhaps men who did not have the intelligence, the drive and the initiative that Alan Wright had, and consequently did not make an issue of it. But the whole tenor of Mr. Manson's action was to get rid of Wright, as the minister very properly said, because of his labour activities.

Mr. SLAGHT: I should like to raise a point of order, if the hon. member will permit me.

Mr. MacINNIS: I cannot prevent it.

Mr. SLAGHT: I came into the chamber on purpose to listen to my hon. friend discuss Bill No. 80, because I have regard for his views on many matters. But while the subject with which he has occupied his time may be of interest and may be of importance, it does seem to me that it has nothing whatever to do with Bill No. 80, which proposes to strike out section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act, which section places a restriction on where men who are called up may be sent to serve. Surely we are far afield in this discussion.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, Mr. Speaker, surely this short bill, No. 80, cannot be taken by itself. It must be taken in connection with the bill it amends; and the bill it amends gives the government the right to do anything mentioned therein. The calling up of men for military service is mentioned in the bill, and surely the way in which these men are called up is a proper subject for debate when this bill is under discussion.

Mr. SLAGHT: Again on a point of order, I appreciate what my hon. friend says; but under the present law men are capable of being called up, and the case in question occurred under the existing law, which it is not proposed to disturb at all by Bill No. 80. I still think my hon. friend is out of order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Until you rule otherwise, Mr. Speaker, I am going to carry on; but if I am out of order, the hon. gentleman is rather late in drawing that fact to your attention, because a great variety of subjects has been covered during the discussion of this bill.

I have another matter to which I want to refer, one which was brought up here the other day, and which is much further removed from this discussion than the matter I have been considering. If this bill passes, the Minister of National War Services will have to administer the National Resources Mobilization Act. I am drawing attention to what is happening under his administration now. I might quote just two other short paragraphs from this letter.

> The quick succession of events with regard to this man seems to indicate a definite plan to dispose of him under the national war services regulations, and so remove him from a field in which it was considered he was creating trouble. This, in my opinion, casts grave doubt upon the regularity of the proceedings taken in this matter.

I think that is sufficient to show that there is something seriously wrong. I have a great deal of material here in the same connection. Mr. Wright was trying to organize the employees of the ordnance plant of the Dominion Bridge company, in addition to some others. I have before me a copy of a notice sent out to all foremen and chargehands in the plant, signed by the manager or superintendent, and reading as follows:

> Although apparently it has generally been felt that apart from finish machining operations it has not been a serious matter if the tolerances were exceeded, this is not the case, as in most instances subsequent operations are dependent on the previous operation for their own accuracy.
> Our apparent success in persuading the inspectors to accept material not strictly to drawing may have given the impression that the tolerances given are unnecessary. This is not so, and now we are working on many components on the finishing operations, is reflected in the fact that our rejection percentage is sharply increasing now we are having to work to closer limits.
> Will you all, therefore, do your utmost to impress upon your men that these tolerances must be maintained and that a much more rigid inspection must be expected from now on.

Possibly that was what interfered with production, rather than Wright's activities. I have drawn this matter to the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), who has informed me that he will have it investigated.

Mr. MITCHELL: You have not the dodger that Wright circulated among these employees, saying that they had brought the government to terms in the National Steel Car matter? These things work both ways.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that a crime, to say that it was this organization which brought National Steel Car—

Mr. MITCHELL: No; the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: —to time? Possibly that is why the chairman of the national war services board made the statement he did in his telegram.

Mr. MITCHELL: What I want to point out is that my hon. friend knows something about industrial organization, and he knows that these things work both ways. Sometimes things are said on both sides which should not be said.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite right; but that is no reason to grasp a man by the collar and shove him into the army.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am not talking about Wright; he can take care of himself. He is in the service now.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so. That is "British principles" again. The Hon. A. M. Manson is a judge, and he should know better. In the last part of his telegram to the Minister of National War Services to which I have already referred, Mr. Manson says:

> Respectfully urge you reconsider your wire and discuss with Howe and Mitchell or if need be in council. Meantime shall wait further word. Might be wise consult justice department as to powers under latter half of regulation twenty-two sub one in light of what is now fait accompli.

"Fait accompli"; wonderful words to come from the lips of a judge; the thing is done, so why bother about it. I wonder why the Minister of National War Services should have to discuss a matter of this kind with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. THORSON: I did not have to.

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister did not have to, but evidently Hon. A. M. Manson discussed it with the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Mr. MITCHELL: I suggest to my hon. friend that his sense of fairness is running away with his discretion, because it was never discussed.

Mr. MacINNIS: I can only draw my own conclusions, and this smells so strong that anyone can draw conclusions with regard to it.

Mr. MITCHELL: Then I would add that my hon. friend's case smells at the moment.

Mr. MacINNIS: We have insisted, during this debate, that all regulations putting conscription into effect should be brought before the house. In that connection I believe we are on very sound ground. Many quotations from Hansard have been read here against us in order to show that during the last few years we have changed our opinions. Well, it is no crime for a person to change his opinion; it shows that he has an opinion to change.

I have in my hand an extract from Hansard of June 17, 1920, which I think is apropos of the matter we are discussing, namely, that the regulations should be a part of the bill and passed by this house. On that occasion the house was discussing the third reading of a bill respecting the director of coal operations, confirming a series of orders in council and orders of the coal director, and the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on that occasion said, as reported, at page 3691 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should not like the third reading of this bill to pass without once again stating my objections to the measure. In the first place, as I mentioned on the second reading of the bill and in committee, it seems to me that parliament is acting blindfolded in this matter . . . It is beneath the dignity of parliament—indeed, it is bringing parliament into contempt—to ask us to enact as a law a code of regulations that we have not even perused. I hope I shall never see the day when as a member of this parliament I shall be prepared to consent to any legislation without knowledge of the particulars to which it is proposed to give the force of legal enactment.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, no one could more strongly support the position which this group has taken than the Prime Minister did by that statement! He said he hoped he would never see the day when as a member of this parliament he would be prepared to consent to any legislation without knowledge of the particulars to which it was proposed to give the force of legal enactment. All I can say is that the right hon. gentleman must have lived too long, because not only has he lived to see that day but he has lived to propose that very thing to this house himself—legislation by orders in council which, as the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) said the other day, would be kept in a drawer after they were passed.

I wish to say a few words about another matter which was mentioned in the house the other day by the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill), when there was an exchange of words between him and me across the floor. The hon. member said that this group in 1934 voted for a privately-owned central bank as opposed to a publicly-owned central bank. I disputed that statement, and now I want to substantiate what I said. I said there was no Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group in the house at that time; and I still maintain that, because this group did not come into the house as a group until after the elections of 1935. The position that confronted us when the Bank of Canada bill was before the house was not the choice of voting for a privately-owned bank as against a publicly-owned bank or for or against an amendment that would make it a publicly-owned bank, but of voting for a bank over which the people of Canada would have some control as opposed to the chartered banks, and the hon. member for Kamloops and his friends voted to leave all banking to the chartered banks.

Mr. O'NEILL: The hon. gentleman said, "the hon. member for Kamloops and his friends." I was not in the house then.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then I will say, my hon. friend's friends. I am glad of the correction. It was not the first time that he made this assertion. He made it several times in his constituency where the people have not the same access to the facts that we have in this house. When the central bank bill came before parliament in the first instance, the then member for Macleod, Mr. Coote, was at that time with the party known as the co-operating groups in this house, and he moved an amendment to refer the bill back. His amendment read:

> That all the words after "that" in the main motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
> In the opinion of this house the government should give further consideration to the matter of providing that the stock of the proposed central bank should be owned by the government and that the governor and directors of said bank should be appointed by the governor in council.

Mr. Rhodes, who was piloting the bill through the house, took exception to the amendment and was supported by the present Prime Minister, who was then leader of the opposition. Mr. Rhodes said:

> I am sorry that I am not in a position to say the same to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) who has, I respectfully submit, failed to appreciate the distinction between a debate upon the principle of a bill and the question of the details of a bill, however important or vital they may be, because the fact remains that at the moment the principle which we are discussing is: shall we have a central bank?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: And that is the only principle.

Evidently, to the leader of the opposition at that time and his party, whether the bank should be privately or publicly owned was merely a matter of detail.

Mr. O'NEILL: Mr. Coote voted against you, though, and with the leader of the opposition, the present Prime Minister.

Mr. MacINNIS: Quite so. Now I want to—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman has spoken for forty minutes.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has another five minutes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I took the time when the hon. gentleman began. When I called the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) to order, it was exactly ten minutes past five o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the minister spoke for a few minutes after you had called him to order. I think I am right in that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may proceed only by unanimous consent.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am in the Speaker's hands, but surely my time should begin from the time I began to speak, and not from the time Your Honour called the Minister of Fisheries to order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may proceed by unanimous consent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. O'NEILL: I think he should be allowed to proceed. There are only a few minutes left before six o'clock, and that time is no good to anyone else.

Mr. F. P. WHITMAN (Mount Royal): Mr. Roosevelt, our good neighbour, has referred to this war as a war of survival. He did not mean the survival of England or of Norway or of Canada, but the survival of the United States, and men are being conscripted in the United States to-day to fight for the survival of their own country. If and when conscription comes in Canada, it will be to fight for the survival of Canada and the right of Canadians to evolve to a better and a more efficient civilization.

The term "equality of sacrifice" has been much used in this house of late. Except for political advantage the term is, I think, hollow and meaningless. Many young men have gone overseas from my division and have given their lives, and the same is true of all Canada. Can anyone go to their fathers and mothers and say that there is any such thing as equality of sacrifice? Or can anyone in this chamber go to a man in uniform who has volunteered to go overseas and say there is any such thing as equality in effort? No, Mr. Speaker, I believe that instead of using the term "equality of sacrifice" as we do in this house, we should adopt a different slogan for Canada. I suggest that we adopt the slogan of a maximum individual effort. If we adopt that slogan and work for it, we shall then have an approach to total war that will be satisfactory.

I was surprised and disappointed at the speech made a week ago to-day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he referred to only two of the three statesmen who had gathered recently below the boundary line to discuss a united war effort. Presumably he deliberately omitted his own Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Further on in his speech he referred to the lack of leadership in our Canadian war effort. I should like to ask the leader of the opposition if he is prepared at this time to assume the office of Prime Minister, and does he suppose that the people of Canada will be willing to entrust that high office to him? I say to the Prime Minister: do not be too perturbed over this criticism. Mr. Churchill is criticized, President Roosevelt is criticized, and our Prime Minister has been criticized by men smarter than the leader of the opposition. Many of those who have criticized our Prime Minister in the past have been relegated to the discard. Some with ability have even been given responsible positions by this government.

On April 27 last the plebiscite was held. In Mount Royal constituency, which I have the honour to represent in this house, there was a total poll of over 82½ per cent out of a possible 54,235 votes. Of that 82½ per cent, over 81 per cent were "yes" votes. This result is significant when it is realized that only about 60 per cent of the total vote were English-speaking or of English extraction. On February 10 of this year I asked the government to enact any powers that were necessary to provide a maximum war effort. This Bill No. 80 will permit the government to provide a maximum war effort. This bill will give them the power to enforce conscription of Canadian soldiers, if and when necessary, for service anywhere in the world. In my opinion it will become necessary. I believe that if and when conscription for overseas service becomes necessary, and when the people of Canada including Quebec realize that conscription is necessary, there will be very few, if any, who will not accept it willingly. I know that Mount Royal will accept it 100 per cent. I am speaking as a Canadian with four generations of Canadian ancestors lying in the cemeteries of Annapolis county, Nova Scotia. I speak as one who was privileged to serve in the last great war. I am a Canadian speaking English, not an Englishman or an English Canadian as some of my hon. friends refer to me.

I should like to pay a tribute to our fighting ministers, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston); the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald). I do not like calling them ministers of national defence; I would rather call them minister for the army, minister for the air force and minister for the navy. The navy is in the unique position of not requiring great numbers of men for its service. The number of men required is governed principally by the number of ships available. Likewise the air force does not need great numbers of men. The men in that service must be technically trained; they must understand motors; they must be navigators; they must be qualified to use machine guns, and so on. On the other hand, the army must train men to be proficient in the art of self-defence with rifle and bayonet. When a man is in a corner with a rifle and a bayonet he learns very rapidly.

Canada is fortunate indeed in having three ex-servicemen as her fighting ministers. I should like to say a word about the Minister of National Defence. I met an officer who served with him in the last war, and his description of our minister was, "Ralston's battalion would go through fire and water for him." I think I am echoing the sentiments of this house when I say to the Minister of National Defence, "This house will go through fire and water to assist you in the job you have undertaken to do."

In connection with conscription I should like to suggest to the Prime Minister that possibly conscription could be enforced to bring men into the cabinet. That is as far as I want to go on that particular subject.

In conclusion, I wish to make my position absolutely clear. I shall support Bill No. 80 because it gives the government the power to send Canadian troops anywhere in the world for the defence of Canada. I think the government should have had that power from the beginning of the war.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. E. O. BERTRAND (Prescott): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak briefly in this important debate, which has lasted already very long and in which so many things have been said, my only desire is that my contribution should be of some help to render our war effort more nearly unanimous, and stronger than ever before, if this is at all possible.

In this country of ours, Canada, all of us, I am sure, desire to build a great nation. To whatever race we belong, our aim is to make Canada the best place in which to live in the whole world. To accomplish this it is necessary to win the war, and to do so we must keep Canada united in its population and its territory.

French Canadians have been on this soil for over 400 years. Two hundred and twenty-five years after their arrival the Anglo-Saxon race took possession. These races have lived side by side ever since, each having its own history, traditions and aspirations, and in order to build a nation in our country these privileges must be preserved to both and to each.

If this is the fact, let us consider the reason for the differences of opinion which have been expressed in the present debate. But before doing so, I wish to make a few comments on the result of the vote given on the plebiscite. The population of Canada was assured that this vote was not an expression for or against conscription, but simply to relieve the government of certain past pledges; that the question of conscription for service overseas would be studied only when circumstances justified that such action be taken, and that then parliament would decide. For that reason I supported and campaigned in favour of a "yes" vote on the plebiscite. We now find that this is the last opportunity which this parliament will have to discuss conscription for service overseas during this war.

To accept the proposed amendment to Bill No. 80, by deleting section 3 and otherwise amending the act, is to open the door to conscription for service overseas, said the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) on Friday, June 26, when speaking in this debate. So this is the time to express one's opinion on this far-reaching measure.

The conscription issue is for the French Canadian a false issue, for this reason. The real point about which French Canadian leaders have been worried and have the right to be worried is the question of the survival of the French Canadians as a group with distinct characteristics. Only when French Canadians face a national policy which threatens their existence have they the right to oppose it to the point even of threatening to break confederation. Are they now justified to do so? Let us examine the question.

British people everywhere would do well to reflect on one fact which this war has brought strikingly to light, namely, that the non-British people who are supposed to enjoy the blessings of the British empire do not seem to appreciate those blessings as much as we have been taught that they did. The Irish underwent British rule for over 800 years, and in this crisis they prefer not to fight or to fight hardly at all on the side of Britain. The Boer leader Hertzog advocated neutrality for south Africa in 1939, and though Smuts found enough support to defeat him there is still a very dangerous anti-war element in that dominion. The great Indian leader Nehru was in gaol for a long time because he refused to fight for India on British terms, and he recently rejected the Cripps offer of dominion status as inadequate. The Burmese, after a hundred years within the empire, seem actually to have fought with the Japanese invaders. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, not to be scandalized if French Canadians in this instance are inclined to oppose conscription for overseas in this war.

Since confederation, and before, the spirit of equality between the two groups, French and English, should have inspired all Canadian policies. But that spirit has not existed. Difficulties were found in every phase of life—in language, in education, as well as in business, and in the economic field, as well as in the governmental services. At present many French Canadians seem to aim at securing appointments in the civil service numerically equivalent to their proportion of the population—that is, about thirty per cent—and English-speaking Canadians are not lacking who are willing to take much more than proportionately is due them, and leave the remainder to the French Canadians if that is unavoidable.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the hon. member read a little louder, please?

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): I thank my hon. friend for his good advice.

On the part of the French Canadian there has been the pressure of an inferiority complex, and also a lack of proper vocational training, especially in the natural and social sciences. Now that the French Canadians are making good some of their past deficiencies, their English-speaking compatriots must be ready to trust them further than they have done and to accept them as partners. That is the need—really to accept the French Canadians as equal partners in confederation, no more and no less.

In certain quarters we hear of French Canadian domination. It is a myth, Mr. Speaker. If the French Canadian wanted to dominate, he could well do so in the province of Quebec; there, he could very well try to impose his views and his ways upon his English-speaking and Protestant fellow-countrymen. Yet it is a fact that these people are left entirely free in their manner of religion, education, language and ways of life. All the French Canadian is asking for is to enjoy, in this province and elsewhere in the dominion, the same treatment that English-speaking people enjoy in the province of Quebec.

Some English-speaking groups express the fear that the Catholic religion will dominate in the Dominion of Canada, and that Canada should not risk domination by Roman Catholicism, particularly of the brand practised in the province of Quebec.

Such fears or such derogatory remarks are certainly quite out of place. It was the same derided Roman Catholicism which effectively advised its adherents to stand by the British empire at the time of the Pontiac rebellion in 1764, again during the American revolution, in the war of 1812-15, and against the "patriots" in the rebellion in 1837-38. Its voice was clear and firm during the great war of 1914-18. It is no less clear and firm when it speaks through the mouth of His Eminence, Cardinal Villeneuve, and the whole Roman Catholic hierarchy in the present war. Simply to make good my words, I would quote from the pastoral letter of the Roman Catholic bishops published on the 31st day of May of this year. My quotations will be rather short. One passage reads:

> One has only to study the anti-Christian doctrines and principles of nazism in the light of the encyclical "Mit brennender Sorge" of Pope Pius XI, and of the statements of the German hierarchy, and of the record of oppression and destruction in every country which has come under the yoke of nazism, to realize the extremities of barbarism, persecution and irreligion to which it would reduce all nations in the world, conquest of which it dreams and towards which it strives.

Is this not a strong statement against our enemies? Again:

> Consequently, dearly beloved in Christ, we were not surprised but sincerely and deeply elated at seeing you, from the very beginning of the conflict, generously respond to the call of your country. Truly a glorious page in our history will recall the devotion, courage, and heroism aroused in our people by this present war.

Is this not an appreciation of what our armies are doing in this war? Again I quote:

> Our heart with holy and great expectation; generous courage in defence of the fundamentals of Christian civilization, and confident hope in their triumph.

Yes, "confident hope in their triumph". Therefore, in spite of what is being said and written in many parts of the country, the cry and appeal of the Roman Catholic clergy to-day is, first, against our enemies, second, appreciation of our armies, and third, prayers for victory.

In my opinion, had the French Canadians given an affirmative vote on the plebiscite on April 27, the unity of this country and the survival of French-Canadian culture would have been assured for all time; for real national unity is born, not out of eloquent orations but in the utmost collaboration in the common struggle for survival. That is why I was so strongly in favour of a "yes" vote on the plebiscite. But my French compatriots chose to vote "no".

I understand that it is a source of irritation to observe that certain powerful minorities may seem to thwart the wishes of the majority and hamper them in the performance of what they consider their national duty and their national mission. I also agree that this war is not primarily a war for the defence of the tight little island in the North sea. It is essentially a war for the survival of civilization itself, a war to maintain the liberty and dignity of human beings. To help to fight this war, Mr. Speaker, there are two of my sons in the forces—Guy, a pilot in the air force, and Rene a coder in the navy. Both are in the active service without commissions, and both volunteered. I am proud of them, but I am also proud of thousands and thousands of other French Canadians who have volunteered to do the same job. May I also say that I am proud of hundreds upon hundreds of men of all races who have volunteered from the constituency I represent. Among them I want to call attention to one name in particular, the name of Jean Paul Sabourin, of St. Isidore de Prescott, who enlisted at the beginning of the war. He became a pilot in the air force and was sent to England. He fought over Germany and again in Libya, and in both places he bagged numerous enemy planes and was decorated. He is still in Libya as pilot-instructor to teach new pilots who are going to the hot sands of north Africa. He deserves our appreciation.

This is a war which everyone of us as a Canadian citizen must see through to a successful end. But to-day there is need of the best understanding of our problems in this country. I speak of problems which we have to face, but probably I should change that expression and say that we have to face a situation in Canada as disclosed by the result of the plebiscite. It is true that the vote gave an immense majority in favour of "yes," but it is also true that the vote in the plebiscite was 2,900,000 "yes," in round figures, and 1,600,000 "no," in round figures. In other words, more than one-third of the total vote was "no." Eighty per cent of the "no" vote was given by French Canadians. I want to emphasize this: they were French Canadians not only from the province of Quebec but from all over Canada, no matter in what section of the country they are living.

This was not an accident. I say also that it was not the result of the campaign carried on by the league for the defence of Canada for a "no" vote. This result has far deeper roots than that. I said something of what might be the cause in other countries, when a moment ago I mentioned Ireland, South Africa, India and Burma where there are also difficulties. In this plebiscite French Canadians were not voting to choose between two parties or two or more candidates in their constituencies. They were going to the polls to vote according to their national conscience, and according to their past history, traditions and aspirations. They want no conscription for service overseas, although they are willing to cooperate and collaborate to the fullest extent for a full effort in this war. They have good reasons for that.

May I be permitted to quote briefly from the speech of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) in this debate? On June 16 he said, as reported at page 3391 of Hansard:

> Though some would volunteer to fight for France for sentimental reasons, no one would dare to say that it was a national duty for Canadians to fight for France.

I agree with the statement of the minister, for France is no longer our homeland.

I also wish to say that I agree with the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), speaking in this debate on June 11, when he said, as reported at page 3278 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, yourself and most hon. members of this house belong to the British race. You are proud of it, and I compliment you upon it. You have many reasons to be proud of being descendents of the great British race. But it is not your fault; it is an accident of nature. I am a descendent of the founders of Canada, those who first discovered and established this country as a civilized country. I am proud of my race. It is not my fault; it is an accident of nature. But when we come to consider problems such as the one confronting us at the present time, immediately any man who has any elementary knowledge of psychology will understand that your response is going to be much quicker than mine. Why? Because I have to reason in my mind why I have to support the British flag and spend my energies for the defence of British rule in this conflict, or perhaps elsewhere. It is the result of thinking, the result of reasoning, if I come to that conclusion; with you it is the impulse of the heart. Your heart becomes inflamed as soon as the name of England, of the British empire, is mentioned. It is quite natural, it is in your blood; it is your blood that makes that impulse. It cannot be the same with me. It would be against nature. I have to reason why I should take that step or not take it. I hope that my position is understood from that point of view. My position being understood, the position of the French Canadian is also understood.

Why? Because England is not our homeland. The same reason applies to France. Our homeland, our native land, our country, is Canada.

When His Majesty the King was making an address to the cadets last Saturday he said that it was the duty of a citizen if necessary to die for his country and his compatriots. I hope no one will claim that this is not a declaration on which we stand, to say that we are not going to participate in this fight. But if, due to their past history, French Canadians do not want to participate upon compulsion, their viewpoint should have attentive consideration. The two quotations I have made explain clearly why French Canadians do not want conscription for service overseas.

Is conscription for service overseas necessary at this moment? Well, the Prime Minister and eight ministers of the crown all said in this debate that there was no urgent need at present, and that it may never become a necessity; so why amend a law that would so greatly disappoint one-third of our whole population? Are we short of men for military service? The figures given so far in this debate would indicate that we have all the men we can clothe and train in the navy, in aviation, and we have enough men through voluntary enlistment in the army. Our sailors will be found wherever they are needed, our aviators anywhere on the battle fronts of the world, and our French Canadians are willing to do their share under the voluntary system in any of the three services.

When section 3 is deleted from the mobilization act it will stand deleted not only for this government but for any government that may replace this one. It is to be the law of the land, as was said by the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères; and any government succeeding the present one, any prime minister succeeding the present Prime Minister will be in a position to apply the principle of conscription simply by order in council. That is the position; so has spoken the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères. I approve his attitude on this bill, and I shall vote against the amendment to the act. In the last war conscription for service overseas was considered an error by Sir Robert Borden, as stated in his memoirs. It has been the cause of discord and misunderstanding; so why take this risk again?

French Canadians are willing to do their share voluntarily. Why not let the leaders of French Canada be in a position to appeal with force and success to their compatriots in favour of an all-out war effort? Why not continue the good work done by our Roman Catholic French clergy in that magnificent appeal made in their pastoral letter of May 31, 1942?

The war will prevent the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of confederation this year. One thing we can do. We can concentrate our minds on the problem of a better understanding between French and English, between Roman Catholic and Protestant. Our main objective must be to rid our minds of at least some prejudices. Once the ground is clear of bias it will be possible to erect the solid framework of national unity. For this I appeal as strongly as I can to my French compatriots to join the army, navy and air force in large numbers, in order to defend the liberties of mankind threatened in this war. I also appeal to those in favour of conscription for service overseas to scrutinize carefully the point of view of the French-speaking population. I appeal for better understanding and unity between the two great races in this country. I appeal for the building of a nation in Canada, a nation with its own flag, with its own national anthem, a nation where the two great races will have equal rights and privileges all over Canada. Then, for my French compatriots the word "conscription" will no longer be a symbol which means, forced to enrol, to train, to fight and die in some other land for some other cause than that of their own country.

Mr. SARTO FOURNIER (Maisonneuve-Rosemont): This is the second time within a period of twenty-five years that the Canadian parliament has been called to decide upon a measure involving compulsory military service for Canadians overseas. The first occasion was in 1917, in the same circumstances and for the same purposes. Therefore we have a test case of brutal historical fact, a precedent that took place twenty-five years ago, which is a rather short period in the history of a nation, so that no dust has yet accumulated on the memory of this calamitous event. You, Mr. Speaker, know the meaning of "precedent' 'in a British parliament. How is it that through all the speeches delivered by those advocating or supporting a similar proposal to-day no one dared to suggest the repetition of that phase of our history? The reason for this is most simple; it is that we remember, and we know that the people of this country remember. That explains why the supporters of this bill are creating something like a new type of precedent, which consists in ignoring another precedent. By the fact that the whole nation is at war, the conduct of the war is a Canadian affair; and those upon whom is placed the burden of the responsibility of framing the national policy are bound to be logical and true with themselves as well as with the facts. It would be a crime on their part to forget that great principle of wisdom and common sense, which is as old as the civilized world, that the same causes always have the same effects. What in former times was already recognized by the unanimous consent of the nation as a bad, useless and harmful experience both for the prosecution of the war and for the post-war development of the national life of this country, is still bad to-day; it cannot be otherwise.

Here, sir, experience meets and joins with reason to condemn Bill No. 80, as it is presented by a government which seems to be frightened by the blackmail and the threats of a little group of money makers and blackmailers, to whom the national welfare of the population of this country is the least of their cares; and who, by dint of manoeuvring and bargaining, have succeeded in forcing the hand of the government to the point of inducing them to introduce into this house a measure of legislation which, according to the testimony of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, according to the evidence given by almost every one of his ministers, according to the testimony of past experience and common sense, is not necessary.

That is the position; but whether we like it or not we have to consider the question properly, upon its merits, in the light of circumstances prevailing in Canada, and take the best possible decision in the interests of the country. Since this question of conscription of men for military service overseas is a war measure closely and intimately connected with the whole problem of the man-power of the nation, it becomes ipso facto a problem of the highest importance. The problem is common to all the nations at war. It is the beginning and end of a nation's war effort. Because of the new aspects created by the unexpected magnitude of the conflict, this question, as never before, has attained a high degree of importance in itself, and of danger and difficulty in discovering a proper solution. No greater organizational problem has ever been faced than the marshalling, the direction and the conservation of all this human effort. In dealing with such a tremendous question, we must remember that we are not simply juggling with figures; we are trying to find a solution as to the best possible use that can be made of the very human capital of the nation. In this connection no error is permitted. Man-power is the number one raw material of war, the only resource for which no substitute can be found; and it has to be utilized, accordingly, to the fullest capacity and, I repeat, in the light of circumstances prevailing in the country.

These circumstances are not the same everywhere. In Great Britain they differ from the circumstances in Australia; and there we all know to what extent they are contrary to the methods prevailing in Germany, where they have a particular way of dealing with the question, which way does not resemble the methods prevailing in the United States. Here in Canada the very nature of the problem is such as to make it first and last a Canadian problem. Since we have entered this war by the exercise of our own free will, in order to preserve the survival of our Christian, civilized and free way of living, the conduct of the war is a Canadian affair, just as it is a Russian problem in Russia, and different things in the different nations. We cannot be too prudent and take too many precautions in analysing the real conditions prevailing in the country. If we want to do that in a proper and honest way, we must make a necessary distinction between the real conditions as they exist, and some new, artificial conditions shining in the light of statistics newly obtained under false pretences by the holding of a plebiscite which has cast its sense just as at this season of the year the foxes shed their coats.

To take advantage of such artificial circumstances, which do not reflect either the feeling or the will of the nation, is the use of a power which has not been given or authorized by the people but is furnished by statistics only. The figures are there to help the government lead the nation properly; but if the government should decide to give up its duties and its responsibilities and call upon Mr. Symbol, who has no soul and no brain, to lead the nation, where are we going? After all, Mr. Speaker, who is running this country; who is carrying on this war on behalf of the Canadian people? Symbols? Statistics? Newspapers? Political parties? Arguments? The government? No, sir. All these are more or less useful and necessary elements which are supposed to make their contribution to the winning of the war; but this Canadian war effort is actually and really made by the Canadian people; and we have no right to forget its will, because it is the will of the nation.

We could undertake the responsibility of declaring war, organizing our war effort, prosecuting hostilities, and transforming the economy of our country until to-day she is rightly considered the arsenal of the united nations. We could raise by way of loans and taxation the enormous sums of money required to meet the expenditures necessitated by our magnificent war effort. We could raise all the men required for the three different branches of our armed forces. We could do all that and excel in many other splendid achievements which have been duly praised both in foreign countries and here in Canada by everybody who knows what he is talking about, and we could achieve all that because behind the action of the government there stood the will of the nation.

For nearly three years we have got along successfully under the voluntary system. But to-day, for reasons that have never been made clear, and in spite of the most solemn pledges given repeatedly time and again to millions and millions of Canadian citizens, the government proposes to repeat the shameful action, the great mistake of 1917, while at the same time stating that it is not necessary. Of course, it is not necessary and it never would be necessary provided the government had the courage to master that big-name, high-pressure, imperialist propaganda campaign which was started two years ago in this country by a little group of people whose patriotism is nothing but the heroism of others. That disaster can be avoided provided the government stands to its initial position and keeps the Canadian war effort geared to the will of the nation. So long as the nation refuses to accept voluntarily the principle of compulsion for military service overseas, any attempt on the part of the government to overthrow or crush this legitimate desire of the people constitutes an act of tyranny, a deplorable abuse of confidence, and the official recognition in this free country of that basic principle by virtue of which slave nations are governed. What adds to the danger is the fact that some people are going to be enriched by getting and filling contracts to equip those who are being compelled to die. As one of that younger generation, and on their behalf, I urge upon the government, before it decides to cross the Rubicon, to consider well the consequences of the act which it is on the point of performing. When Canada is now writing another great chapter in her splendid history, why should we blot a fresh page with the ink of infamy, while those who did this once before, are yet living, buried under the contempt of two generations? When all of us know these things from past experience, surely we should not repeat the same mistake and hazard again the future of our nation for many years to come.

I wish now to deal with the same problem considered from the angle of actual war reality. Modern technical warfare is based on three main principles which have conditioned and determined the outcome of every battle which has taken place since the outbreak of the war. They constitute the basis of the value of an army. They are horse-power, man-power and brain-power. Since all these three are equally essential and, therefore, absolutely necessary, it is the duty of the government to see that our armies are sufficiently provided with them in adequately balanced proportions in order that we may have an effectively and intelligently directed effort down to the last unit of man-power that can be mustered.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, future historians of this war will rightly point out that the reverses suffered by our allies were due to a lack of equipment and machines, to insufficient horse-power. We have never possessed until now the physical power, the necessary requirements in horse-power. If I may be allowed to do so, Mr. Speaker, I would like to give you an idea of a modern army's requirements from the point of view of horse-power. I shall take the liberty of quoting an excerpt from an address delivered last December, in Detroit, by Mr. Paul Garrick, vice-president of the General Motors Corporation:

> War now is a war of horsepower. In 1918 an infantry division had equipment of 3,300 horse-power. Now an armoured division has 400,000 horse-power.

Mr. Speaker, we are short of horse-power. So far, our armies have lacked physical power or strength. That explains the downfall of France. France did not lack men; she had all the soldiers she needed; neither did she lack courage or patriotism. She fell, vanquished by twenty thousand German soldiers. At that time she had at her disposal two million soldiers. But France fell because she lacked the necessary equipment, because she did not have the required machinery, because she was short of the horse-power without which modern armies have no chance of success.

If Italy has lost so many of the battles she has fought since the beginning of the war, the explanation is not that she lacked horse-power, that her forces were inadequate, that she was short of machinery, or that she lacked men—in these respects she was amply provided with everything she needed to vanquish her opponents. Italy has suffered humiliating defeats because the Italian nation lacked brain-power, because her soldiers would not shoot at British or French soldiers, because never, or at least for quite a number of years, the Italian people never had any serious differences with the French or the British. But horse-power and brain-power can neither be conscripted nor coerced. Conscription measures written into the statute books of our country cannot increase the effective power and horse-power of any army sent overseas or elsewhere; such legislation cannot inspire our fighting men with the essential virtues of valour, courage and dauntlessness. The passing of a measure such as is now submitted to the house had already been forecast for a later date at the time of the plebiscite, as was so ably pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). It was to come later! That apparently meant, in the minds of those who made the statement and in the explanations which were given to us, when it should become "necessary", when new events should occur to render it absolutely necessary. Now these events have not come to pass, Mr. Speaker. Circumstances have not changed and yet this bill is upon us, this measure will be adopted, and "later" has become "to-day". On a matter such as we are now discussing, when the government is asking for power to adopt conscription, to enforce conscription in the country at any time, I fear that the word "later" when used during this debate offers no safer guarantee than it did at the time of the plebiscite. When one considers, Mr. Speaker, a modern army's great need of proper equipment, how it has to be in the pink of condition, it seems there is need and great need for increasing, improving and adding to the equipment supplied at present to our armed forces both at home and overseas, whether they are made up of volunteers or not.

The word has long gone around: Remember Hong Kong! We shall not fail to remember Hong Kong, but wishful thinking can be of no avail, even though coupled with a desire for vengeance. We shall not forget that disaster due to the insufficient training and especially to the lack of equipment under which our men laboured unsuccessfully at Hong Kong.

Do we realize, Mr. Speaker, that in addition to equipping our own forces we must equip the British and Russian armies, send men and equipment to Australia and that over and above what we have to give to our own allies we shall probably have to send equipment to still other allied nations? Let us not be astonished at the disaster of Hong Kong. Let us not be surprised at the quick defeat which met our troops there. Should we send troops elsewhere, in any part of the world, under the same unfair conditions, with the same training and with the same equipment; should the same conditions prevail in the future, fresh disasters await our Canadian armed forces. It is not the number of soldiers that counts, it is brains and brawn, whether that army be large or small. But what is needed above all is equipment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what number of men can we reasonably contribute to this war, whatever our system of recruiting, whether conscription or voluntary enlistments? What is the potential capacity of the Canadian nation as regards man-power for our armed forces? Mr. Speaker, the problem of a nation's man-power has this in particular that it may be accurately appraised, accurately determined and calculated, and it may be defined in a practical way. No one can tell what the limit to our production of raw materials may be nor to what extent our soldiers may be courageous, but it is possible to determine the number of men it is convenient for us to raise. With regard to army requirements our maximum contribution may be determined. Mr. Speaker, in so far as our soldiers are concerned, we cannot go beyond certain limits.

Our American friends are a practical people. They started by taking a national census on the basis of their war needs. The census indicated a total population of 134 million inhabitants. Then they went about it logically, properly asking themselves how many men, how many women out of the total population must produce something for the immediate needs of the war. They left out children under sixteen years of age and persons over sixty, they left out married women whose duty it is to remain at home and look after the education and health of their children; they eliminated those living in hospitals, the weak and gaoled criminals.

After all these deductions, they found that the man-power, the effective strength of the American nation is about 71,700,000, or 54 per cent of the whole population. Canada has a population of about twelve million. If we take the American basis—and we can safely take it—if we take 54 per cent of the whole population of our country, we find that we have in man-power an effective strength of 6,500,000. How many of these people shall we send on the battlefields? How many shall we take into the army? We have to employ some in the mines, in the workshops, in the industries and all the other activities which are essential to our national life. Of these 6,500,000 men and women, how many shall we induct into our army as fighting strength?

I have before me, Mr. Speaker, a circular letter issued by the Royal Bank of Canada which no one has yet taxed with ultra-nationalism. The officials of the Royal bank analyse in that booklet published in May, 1942, a certain aspect of the man-power problem in a nation. I quote:

> We are often told of the highly technical nature of modern warfare, and of the necessity for organization of the home front to support the fighting services. Calculations have been made, showing that every man on active service must be supported by the efforts of eighteen men at home, in industry, agriculture and transportation, while only five workers were required for every fighting man in the world war of 1914-1918.

According to the Royal Bank of Canada, eighteen men are needed on the home front to maintain and reasonably equip a man on the fighting line. Others suggest that eight would be sufficient. I believe that both these figures represent extremes. It would seem to me much more fair and reasonable to strike off an average, to use a middle term, and say that thirteen persons are sufficient to maintain a soldier fighting for our defence on the field of battle.

Our effective man-power of 6,500,000 people should therefore enable us to have an army of 500,000 men. But we have that army, Mr. Speaker, or we should have it. However, according to the figures quoted the other day by my hon. friend the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) our actual man-power is inferior to what it should be; instead of having 6,500,000 people to draw from, we have only five millions. Where are the others? Where are the missing 1,500,000 persons? I would like to know. No one yet has been able to give us the answer. Yet, the health of our people cannot be inferior to that of our neighbours. The figures given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply indicate that we are below the average, and those given by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) reveal a still worse condition.

It is stated by the Minister of Agriculture that we soon shall have 750,000 men under arms. On the other hand, the Minister of Munitions and Supply states that our available man-power, as regards our war needs, amounts to five million persons.

It is plain, Mr. Speaker, that we have not very many more persons behind each soldier than we had during the war of 1914-1918. We must have a full war effort in every sense of the word. We must therefore use common sense, intelligence and justice. It is a mistake, a terrible blunder and an injustice to send our fellow citizens to the front without giving them the full guarantee that the country will provide them with all they need to accomplish their purpose.

Our cause is just; we must defend it and it must triumph by fair means. In all justice to our soldiers we must guarantee that behind each one of them stand at least thirteen of his fellow citizens who spend their days and nights to support him, to feed him, to provide him with the necessary tools and the mechanical power he needs to fight with a reasonable chance of success against a powerful enemy.

The courage of our soldiers and the superiority of their equipment alone will give them victory. No legislation will give us that. And, in that regard, Bill No. 80 is unfair, useless and humiliating to the Canadian people.

Several members have tried to explain why Quebec objects to conscription; many theories have been expounded; it was even claimed that the province of Quebec was against conscription because her political leaders had deceived her for over twenty-five years.

Yet, Messrs. Lapointe, Dandurand and Cardin were always honest with the people of Quebec. Those who would have us believe that we were deceived are precisely the ones who are trying to mislead us to-day.

The province of Quebec was not deceived before, but it is being deceived right now. It is not being deceived by its own representatives, but by people who are interested in doing so. We have always been and still are against conscription for overseas service, because our reasons for opposing conscription still exist. This piece of legislation is unjust, useless, stupid, and it will prove just as disastrous as ever.

We are against conscription because we do not suffer from megalomania, because we have retained a sense of proportion and because we know it is useless to ask the people to give an effort so violent that it will prove impossible to sustain should the war last a few years longer.

It has been stated that everything we have we owe to the mother country. Indeed, we share that opinion. But the mother country, as we understand it, is nowhere but in Canada. There is our only and our true mother country. This land is where we wish to live even as did our forefathers before us. As Russian soldiers fight for Russia, the English for England and Americans for the United States our fellow-citizens in the province of Quebec fight for no other country than Canada. For the defence of Canada no more devoted, no more understanding and no more enthusiastic citizens are to be found than those who live in the province of Quebec.

We have voluntarily entered this war for the defence of our country, that of all Canadians, and not to service as tools for the enemies of our race, our faith or of our religion. Our disdain for them is equal to theirs for us. We know their mentality is not characteristic of the majority of our English fellow-citizens. They talk of a show-down against us at the very moment when the nation is fighting the most redoubtable foes it has ever known. Quebec, for them, is Canada's first line of defence in this country. It entails no danger for them, they are not risking one cent. Theirs is a special brand of courage! they seek for a fight which will not take place and they know it beforehand. May history be kind to them.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding these humble remarks, I would like to quote a few lines of a speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this house on July 24th, 1917:

> I oppose this bill because it has in it the seeds of discord and disunion; because it is an obstacle and a bar to that union of heart and soul without which it is impossible to hope that this confederation will attain the aims and ends that we had in view when confederation was effected.
> All my life I have fought coercion; all my life I have promoted union; and the inspiration which led me to that course shall be my guide at all times, so long as there is a breath left in my body.

This explains perfectly the sentiment of the people in the province of Quebec and the position they have taken on the bill that the government now asks us to pass.

Mr. F. G. HOBLITZELL (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my remarks on the issue before the house, may I express my appreciation of and the gratitude of my constituents for your indulgence in permitting me to speak at this time, because every normal avenue and procedure to do so was obviously purposely barred to me by the Liberal whip appointed under democratic parliamentary rule to facilitate the opportunity for a representative of the people to speak before this honourable assembly.

May I say at once without any doubt or hesitation that I support Bill No. 80, repealing section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has told us that support of the bill now before the house does not mean conscription for the present—that it may never mean conscription. The people of Canada thought they were voting in favour of conscription, no matter what statements may be made to the contrary. The constituency which I have the honour to represent, Toronto-Eglinton, polled the largest percentage of "yes" votes of any constituency in the dominion. From the hundreds of letters I received I know the vote meant only one thing to them—the immediate application of conscription. The people of Quebec were sure they were voting on conscription, and posters throughout that province asked them to vote "no." For that reason our allies and our enemies believed that we were voting for conscription, and in friendly countries the press announced that we had voted overwhelmingly in favour of an all-out effort. I opposed the holding of a plebiscite because I believed it was the duty of the government of Canada to adopt the one fair course and to assure equality of service and of sacrifice in every field of our war effort. Everything that has happened since has convinced me more and more that it was a sorry day for Canada when the government decided to side-step its responsibility by adopting this device. Now we are going through the last stages of the colossal confusion.

During the plebiscite itself the people of Canada were exhorted to vote "yes" as a national duty so that the government would have a free hand toward an all-out war effort. A second group were demanding a "no" vote to make sure that there would be a definite limitation to our effort. Not being told definitely what the vote was intended to mean, the people made it clear what the vote did mean to them. When the people voted "yes" by a huge majority in most of Canada they left no doubt about the things they said, that they were instructing the government that they wanted no further delay in dealing with conscription.

We have now before us a bill to remove any limitation on the field of service of those who are drafted under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and at the same time we are told that if the bill is passed it means nothing for the present and may never mean anything at any time. We have been told by the Prime Minister that the passing of this bill does not mean the adoption of conscription; in other words, the debate is not to decide conscription. Nevertheless we are asked to debate conscription so that the issue will be decided once and for all. The course we are now following is just as indecisive and just as far from reality as was the plebiscite itself. We are asked to debate conscription and then to vote on something else. We are asked to say when and how compulsory service should be adopted, and at the same time we are told that what we say and our vote on the bill itself will have nothing whatever to do with, when and how it is adopted.

That sort of indecision and uncertainty in parliament has destroyed democracy before and it can destroy democracy again. It is time this parliament realized what effect this is having on our people and on our friends. We have been told that conscription is not needed to supply man-power for our forces already overseas, and that it is possible it may never be needed. But if we wait until it is needed it will be too late. We must not blink facts any longer. A Canadian army has been created in England. If that army is engaged in direct contact with the enemy, we might need 100 per cent in numbers of the total force as reinforcements in one year. We have not that number of trained reinforcements outside of the units now in other divisional formations in Canada. It is possible that I have far underestimated the requirements of reinforcements. But it is certain that we cannot go on assuming that our land forces are going to suffer no substantial casualties. Wars are won by fighting, and in the fighting which will lead to victory the unhappy truth is that we cannot avoid heavy casualties.

But there is another point which is not being considered sufficiently in the discussions which are taking place. Even if it were certain that we would not need to send another man overseas for a long time to come, there could still be no excuse for not putting conscription into effect without any limitations. We have now a draft system which invites a form of compulsion which I think is a disgrace to every Canadian. Talk to any young men in the training centres and they will tell you of the methods that are adopted to force men drafted for home service to enlist for service overseas. I do not suggest that this is done under instructions from national defence headquarters. It is the inevitable result of placing young men side by side, some of whom are available for service anywhere and some who have been drafted under a system which limits their field of service.

That creates a sense of unfairness in the minds of those who may be called upon to go anywhere, and they adopt methods which young men find easy to devise to persuade other young men to do their will. We have even heard the strange doctrine voiced in this debate that conscription for service anywhere on the north American continent is acceptable, but not conscription for overseas. It would indeed be a shameful day for Canada when it became the accepted policy that we were quite prepared to conscript our young men for service in foreign lands but were not prepared to apply the same principle to our partners in the British empire.

We are not fighting only for Britain when we send troops to Britain. We are fighting for that partnership of free men to which we belong as a sovereign nation. It happens that Britain is the bastion of freedom which is holding back the armed forces of Germany from our shores. Where better can we fight for the defence of Canada than there? When the time comes to launch the offensive to crush the hated hun, where can our men start that offensive better than from that line of freedom on the British coast?

It is time for us to stop talking apologetically about our men being in Britain, as though we were ashamed of that partnership. Every Canadian who has helped to maintain the freedom on the soil of Britain has helped to maintain our freedom in Canada; and even if we were not fighting for ourselves, why should we not fight side by side with Britain when they have fought side by side with us to give us that place in the world which we hold so proudly to-day.

There is another thing we must not forget in this debate. Our Prime Minister himself has told us of the value of our friendship with the United States, and how important it is that we should be held in high regard by the people of that great country. He has told us that it has been possible for him to be of special service to Canada because of his friendly contact there. How, then, can we ignore the attitude of the people of the United States? Surely no one is any longer in doubt about what they are saying there. They do not understand all these fine arguments about the advantages of voluntary service. They are very proud of their own institutions, and they believe that their freedom and their way of life are second to none.

Mr. FLEMING: The hon. member is reading his speech.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming) read his speech, too.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. member that it is against the rules to read speeches.

Mr. HOBLITZELL: I am just following some notes very closely the same as some other hon. members, and I hope the same privilege will be extended to me.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. gentleman states that he is only consulting his notes, I must accept his statement.

Mr. HOBLITZELL: How do you think, Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States regard the suggestion that there is something shameful and improper about compelling young men to serve their country anywhere at any time that the enemy may be destroyed?

The people of the United States know that they have been at war for six months and more, and that their men are drafted for service anywhere at any time. They cannot understand why we are not willing to put aside our prejudices. All these distinctions between compulsory service for the defence of our own country and for service elsewhere are meaningless to them. Their young men are being drafted without any limitation upon the field of service. Already large numbers of them are in Australia, in Alaska, in Ireland, in England, in Africa and the far east. It is only necessary to read the press of the United States to know what they think about the matter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I do not believe I can accept the view that the hon. member is only consulting his notes; I think he is consulting them very assiduously.

Mr. HOBLITZELL: All the speeches that have been made about the value of Canadian contracts, the number of men in arms, and what these would mean if multiplied by the number of times their population exceeds ours, fall on deaf ears. Let there be no mistake about it; we have a very poor press in the United States at the present time. That will not be cured by high-paid agents writing stories about Canadian industrial production and what our men will do when the time comes. This one issue of conscription hangs like a cloud over everything.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. gentleman should deliver his speech, not read it.

Mr. HOBLITZELL: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am following my notes. It is not fair that the flower of our youth should answer the call of duty—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has heard the ruling?

Mr. HOBLITZELL: —while others who do not hear the call of duty so clearly remain at home to take over the jobs of those who have gone. We are told that man-power is needed. Of course it is. But the way to assure man-power is to have a uniform system of compulsory service that will place every man in the job that he can do best.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I shall have to ask the hon. member to resume his seat unless he obeys the ruling of the Chair. The hon. member may not read his speech.

An hon. MEMBER: Unless he supports the government.

Mr. J. LEO K. LAFLAMME (Montmagny-L'Islet) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill now before parliament calls for the repeal of section 3 of the Mobilization Act, 1940, which limited to Canada the mobilization of man-power. It is under this act that the authorities have already called to the colours a considerable number of young men.

According to the report of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) 312,649 men have answered the call to report for medical examination. With the exception of those who enlisted voluntarily, we may say that almost every young man of military age has been called up.

The reason put forward for the repeal of that section is that as a result of the plebiscite we must remove any limitation in the government's power to mobilize all the country's resources, particularly its man-power. Even if the plebiscite has given a majority of "yes" votes, the government, in my opinion, is not justified at this time in moving this amendment. Since the affirmative majority vote is construed in most places as a vote in favour of conscription, we may wonder if the majority vote given in the province of Quebec against the plebiscite was not cast against this method of recruitment, against conscription for overseas service.

There is no gainsaying, Mr. Speaker, that when war broke out, a part of our population favoured immediate participation in foreign wars, especially under a system of conscription for overseas service, while another part opposed such participation and the recourse to conscription. We were told by our leaders that both groups had come to an agreement and that this agreement should be respected. May I quote, among other statements, that uttered in a radio broadcast on October 9, 1939, by the late Mr. Lapointe who said:

> I am opposed to conscription now as I was then. I stated in the house that I would never be part of a government which would impose conscription and that I would never support such a government. The Prime Minister has stated that the present administration would never resort to conscription. My colleagues and I enjoy the respect of our colleagues from the other provinces and I feel justified in saying that I enjoy the confidence and regard of my English-speaking fellow citizens throughout Canada, and I believe I have been successful in convincing them, and that we have convinced them, that Canadian unity demands that there be no compulsory service overseas.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that this statement of the former leader of the province of Quebec is sufficiently explicit and worthy of belief. He said: "We have convinced them, we have managed to convince them, that Canadian unity demands that there be no compulsory service overseas.

Inasmuch as our section of the population fulfilled its end of the bargain, I wonder why the other section should fail to do the same. If there are serious reasons for a change of attitude in that regard, it is fitting that such reasons be divulged. So far, everything has shown that the voluntary method of raising men for overseas service has been highly successful. It does not appear necessary, under the circumstances, that the method be changed; nor does it seem imperative, since the voluntary system has been successful, that we undertake new commitments with our allies.

Recent events have shown that the enemy does not want our country, any more than the United States, to be used as an arsenal for our allies fighting on other continents. It follows that our country can play a very important part in this war by steadily producing the tools of war, as Mr. Churchill requested that we do when he visited us, and especially by steadily supplying man-power under the voluntary system of enlistment. A close study of figures showing the number of men called up and of those likely to be so, enables us to state without exaggeration that, at best, coercion or conscription of man-power would enable us to raise a force of some 50,000 men. Is such compulsory contribution worth while under the circumstances, endangering as it does the country's unity? Is not national unity really much more valuable than this enforced contribution of man-power for military service?

One of the reasons put forward for drafting men for service overseas is that there must be equality of sacrifice. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that there can be no equality of sacrifice when sacrifices are made under compulsion. Sacrifice is the voluntary renunciation of liberties and privileges which we hold dear, in order to give anmple proof of courage and self-denial. It is not through coercion that we can induce men to agree to equality of sacrifice, and I believe that the generous offer to serve made by our volunteers cannot be compared to the spirit of those who might be forced to do likewise.

There is another argument set forth by some people and, although it may lack cogency, it is nevertheless worth looking into. Questions put on the order paper, Mr. Speaker, clearly show an ever-recurrent desire to criticize the province of Quebec in connection with the country's all-out effort. Some seem to complain about our province not supplying men in sufficient numbers under the voluntary system, and this is being used as an argument in favour of conscription. I sincerely believe that those who hold this view are greatly mistaken and that they entirely disregard certain facts which show that the effort made by our province has no doubt been important and genuine and that if it is not as great as one might have wished, this is because a very important factor is being ignored in this effort.

Let us remember that most of our young men from the city as well as from the country speak only French. It is hard for them to be enthusiastic about the army especially when military training is given in English. Our young men who don't know a word of English feel lost among the rest. Moreover, as the great majority of our people speak only French, discipline seems very irksome to us when orders are given only in English. I am positive that if the authorities took pains to consider seriously that situation, it could be improved and that they could establish staffs of officers comprising only French Canadians. It would be easy to teach military discipline to my compatriots through the medium of their language, if care were taken to train bilingual officers and non-commissioned officers able to transmit the orders given by the higher authorities. If that were done, I am convinced that this important section of the Canadian army where French-speaking Canadians would form the majority, would play a great part and would certainly show itself worthy of those who preceded it at the different war fronts. I wonder if certain people do not apprehend a repetition of the glorious history of the 22nd French-Canadian regiment.

No one can seriously claim that it is impossible to do this. Do our friends, our allies, the Free French not receive their training in their own language and do they not perform in this conflict a praiseworthy and enviable effort. Do our Norwegian, Polish and Dutch allies not have their separate units? Yet their effort is second to none. Therefore, I believe it is possible to improve the voluntary system and, without making any other pledges to the allies, we can establish a truly Canadian army by giving even more consideration to the French-speaking element.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has devoted his life to the establishment of national unity in this country. His constant efforts are an example and it would certainly be unfortunate should present circumstances destroy all the good work that has been done. One cannot conceive national unity without understanding between the different groups and particularly between the two main ones, the English-speaking and the French-speaking groups. Events prove to those who wish to see that the British empire, as some still call it, cannot survive the serious blows it is receiving.

Nevertheless, one forgets that there exists at present, especially since the Westminster statute, an association of free peoples which is a commonwealth of British nations composed of England and her crown colonies as well as the various autonomous and independent dominions. Even though they are associated, the latter have the right and the duty of remembering that should history repeat itself and should the British empire disintegrate, they must ensure their own security and organize the defence of their own territory for the very purpose of constituting anew, after the war, that same association of autonomous nations under the British crown. There is no lack of loyalty but rather a true manifestation of it in giving material and financial aid by every means at our disposal, and in contributing volunteers, while attending to the protection of each country.

In any country, if the citizens are to share in a common conception of the nation, one way to attain this result is to have a flag representing the country in the eyes of each citizen. So long as our country proves incapable of having its own flag, so long shall we find it difficult to reach unity of thought, a common conception of country and a common view concerning its defence. Let our English-speaking fellow-citizens seriously ponder this point, and let them remember that when our American neighbours invited the French Canadians to join them at the time they were seeking to achieve their independence, our people turned them down. Let them also remember that in spite of the vexations to which they have been subjected, our people have rejected the subversive ideas which have been spread in this country during the last few years. We have done that because our country, Canada, is the prime object of our love. We are proud to live in it and we claim for others as well as for ourselves freedom of thought, freedom of speech and freedom to act in accordance with our conceptions, our traditions and our racial characteristics.

Some day it will be possible to assign the responsibility for the situation now existing in this country. There is no doubt that statements made to the Quebec people, especially since 1917 when the Liberal party was represented, at least with the implied approval of Liberals from other provinces, as being opposed to conscription for overseas service, will weigh heavily in the balance when the time comes to assign such responsibility. Those who have fostered the separation idea, especially for some time past, will also have to bear a considerable share of that responsibility. But it should not be forgotten that our English-speaking fellow citizens will also be held responsible for having consistently refused to recognize the French-speaking group in Canada.

The decision I have taken is based on my personal conviction that compulsory service outside our borders should not be enforced in this country; that the voluntary system, properly organized, will yield all the men we need to help our allies. Realizing those facts, I cannot agree to vote for the amendment, that is for Bill No. 80 amending section 3 of the mobilization act, because it would mean endorsing the principle of conscription for overseas service.

Personally, I believe the majority of Canadians oppose this method of raising men for military service outside of Canada. I find it impossible to consider that conscription will help us win the war, but I remain convinced that national unity, realized through the observance of pledges given at the outset of war, will contribute to an allied victory and I believe my attitude is the best under the circumstances.

War will always be the most terrible scourge visited on the human race. The conflict we are now engaged in is accompanied by confusion and disastrous contradictions. An instance of this is evident in our own country at the present time. Were we really imbued with the Christian principles for which we claim to be fighting, we would first apply them in our own country. Our national life is a denial of the very principles we aspire to uphold. All things considered, we should not hope for victory without reparation and without relying on divine Providence.

Mr. JOSEPH LAFONTAINE (Mégantic-Frontenac) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, the bill now being considered by the house is of such grave import and its consequences are so far-reaching that I believe it my duty to voice here, at this time, an opinion which is shared by almost every one of the constituents whom I have the honour to represent.

My decision to participate in this debate on Bill No. 80 was not arrived at with a view to delay the proceedings of the house. Last week, certain hon. members, and particularly the leader of the opposition last Tuesday, showed signs of impatience at the length of the discussion on this measure. Still, Mr. Speaker, there have been lengthy debates on other matters and we from the province of Quebec have sat through them without complaining, or at least without overtly alluding to their tediousness in the house.

This is the first time I have taken the opportunity granted to each member of expressing his views as well as those of his constituents, and in doing so I intend, Mr. Speaker, to comply as far as possible with the rules of the house.

We are free to disagree on the subject of this measure which, if passed by the house and subsequently enforced, may undermine the very foundations of our constitution and even bring about serious changes in our national life. We are free, I repeat, to disagree without being for all that hostile to the cause of the united nations.

If such differences of opinion were not respected in this house and country, the sacrifices already made and those we are about to make in support of the effort Canada is putting forth to ensure the survival of all freedom-loving peoples, would be to no avail.

On the ultimate goal to be reached, there is and can be no discussion. Certainly no one in this house dares to imagine that any member, whatever his views on this question, may be pulling for an Axis victory. No, Mr. Speaker, we all want to win the war although we disagree at the moment on a measure whose purpose would be to uphold our war effort, in view of the needs of our allies and especially of the trend of present day events. Yet we must bear in mind the peculiar position in which Canada finds herself, give special attention to the essential problem of national unity, and remain true to the principles of our federal constitution as well as to the pledges given the Canadian people on more than one occasion.

Any discussion is idle unless we admit that those who are against Bill No. 80, as I am myself, are just as sincere and honest as those who are in favour of it, and that we are seeking as loyally as they do a solution to the difficult problems which confront us in this period of our history.

Since the beginning of this debate I have followed the discussion closely; I have listened attentively to the numerous speeches delivered, many of which I have read over several times. I have weighed the arguments advanced in favour of this measure, and I regret to say, Mr. Speaker, that these have not shaken the opinion I had formed at the time the first reading of this bill was moved in the house.

I still feel that I should oppose this amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act because Bill No. 80 involves the principle of conscription, because this amendment grants to the present government or to any future government powers so vast that it may, simply through an order in council, send overseas not only our volunteer troops but every man who has been called under the 1940 mobilization act and to whom that act was a guarantee that he would be compelled to serve only in the defence of Canada and her territorial waters.

This would mean a breach of the pledges given by the Liberal, the Conservative and the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation parties during the 1940 election campaign.

The only party whose platform included conscription was the Social Credit party, one of whose members, the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Shaw), told us on June 23rd how proud he was that his party had taken such a stand and that it should have advocated ever since 1937 the enforcement of conscription for overseas service in case of war.

Mr. Speaker, once this bill is adopted, if the present government or any other government avail themselves, as was done in 1917, of the powers granted by this act, we shall have conscription. Whether it be in 1942, 1943 or 1944, if the measure is enforced it will still mean conscription.

If I were to support a measure such as the one now submitted to the house, if the powers requested were to be exercised, that is if conscription for overseas service was adopted by order in council, my electors and fellow citizens would consider me as an imposter. I do not hesitate at times to take an attitude that does not meet public approval. I have done so more than once, but I will not take up the time of the house in recalling those instances. I will say though that on such occasions I always strove to fulfil my duty as I saw it. Such has been my line of conduct in the past and I intend that it shall be so in the future. Moreover, if I stand opposed to this measure embodying the principle of conscription and also to the enactment of such legislation, selfishness or personal interest have little to do with it for, as the hon. member for Prescott mentioned a moment ago, I have two sons in the armed forces. I am only fulfilling a pledge and honouring commitments made to my constituents.

It has been said time and again that the present amendment is the logical result of the affirmative vote of April the 27th last, and some hon. members even claimed that the electorate voted then for conscription.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept such statements because in none of the speeches delivered during the plebiscite campaign were the voters told that an affirmative vote would mean the striking out of article 3, nor were they told that an affirmative vote would mean conscription for overseas service. I look upon this matter in the same light as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the hon. member for Algoma-East (Mr. Farquhar) who in their speeches had the courage to point out to the house that the results might have been different if the issue had been put squarely, if the voters had been asked to say if they were for or against conscription. In my constituency, although only a few affirmative votes were cast, I can assure you that the number of such votes would have been much smaller if the question had been squarely put, because those who voted "yes" were not voting for conscription, far from it, or for the cancellation of article 3.

The minority, some claim, must not be allowed to dictate our course of action. All the minority in this country desires is the honouring of the pledges it has received. It has been said too that the opinion of the majority must prevail in this country. The report of the director general of the plebiscite is very interesting in that regard. It appeared in a special edition of the Canada Gazette dated June 23.

The report shows that, with the exception of Quebec, the other provinces were more or less indifferent. Here is the percentage of the votes in each province compared to the number of voters appearing in the list:

	Per cent
Ontario	63·9
Quebec	75·75
Nova Scotia	45·46
New Brunswick	62·9
Prince Edward Island	57·2
Manitoba	67·0
British Columbia	68·7
Saskatchewan	59·9
Alberta	64·9
Yukon Territory	61·9
Percentage in all provinces	66·5
With the exception of Quebec	62·87

Am I not right in saying that outside of the province of Quebec the voters remained more or less aloof from the question? Although the leader of the opposition and the members of his party say that they made a vigorous campaign in order to get a "yes" vote, which I do not doubt for a moment, let me tell them that theirs was not a wonderful success if we take into consideration the total number of voters on the lists. For example, the leader of the opposition, in his own constituency of York-Sunbury, succeeded in bringing to the polls only 15,474 voters out of a total of 25,603, which means that more than 10,000 did not heed his pressing appeal.

What about Nova Scotia where the votes numbered only a little more than 45 per cent of the names entered on the lists. Mr. Speaker, taking into account the total number of voters entered on the lists, we find that the "yes" votes represent only 41·44 per cent. Consequently the "no" votes added to the number of electors who did not vote represent 48·46 per cent of the total. Which shows that even if all the affirmative votes were given to approve conscription for overseas service or to amend the mobilization act, they do not represent the majority of the voters listed. I think we should cherish no illusions concerning the meaning of the plebiscite vote on April 27 last, notwithstanding what has been said. If the question had been squarely put, a goodly number of yeas would have turned into nays, and a large number of those who abstained from voting would have replied in the negative.

I maintain that Canada has magnificently done her duty since the declaration of war. She has done as nobly as any other country of her size. Has it ever occurred to you, Mr. Speaker, to draw a parallel between Canada's war effort and that of the United States, with due regard to the population figures of both countries? Granting that Canada has about 12 million inhabitants and the United States approximately 140 million, the latter should have 1,200,000 men under arms for every 100,000 that Canada can muster. Now since the Canadian armed forces, army, navy and air force, numbered 502,340 men on June 1 last, the United States should have 6,000,000 men in its armed forces at the moment.

This comparison gives a true picture of our war effort and shows that the United States still has far to go before surpassing it, although it is still voluntary.

Since then, certain statements have been made contrary to the principle involved in Bill No. 80, suggesting that circumstances have now changed and that events have occurred which require new measures. But these changes have not taken place outside Canada only; some have occurred also in our own country. What I find astonishing and quite disconcerting is the number of people who seem to have eyes only for what is happening outside this country and who are blind to everything that goes on here at home. I am of the opinion that Canada's effort to date far surpasses anything that would have been thought possible at the beginning of the war and this effort is constantly increasing as time goes on. There are nevertheless people to be found who are still unsatisfied, who judge our effort insufficient. Pity the blind!

On June 10 last, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when speaking on this bill stated that this legislation merely stood for a policy of appeasement. I wonder whom this legislation has managed to appease. Indeed, if one can judge by the tone of the hon. member's speech on June 10, this measure did not succeed in appeasing him but achieved quite the contrary. I can think of no measure which could appease the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and his supporters. The only appeasement policy which could satisfy him would be the formation of the union government he desires so ardently, provided of course that he be included in it and the present Prime Minister (Mr. King) were sacked. That would be the only way to appease him. God forbid that such an event should come to pass and I appeal to the Prime Minister to remain deaf to his pleadings and to his hysterical entreaties.

It would be highly desirable that certain members of this house, that certain newspapers and individuals should cease their insulting remarks, their false and biased statements concerning the Canadians of French descent in this country, and particularly the French Canadians of the province of Quebec.

It is true that the province of Quebec has her own extremists, while the other provinces, and especially Toronto, have theirs. The French Canadians love their country, their native province, their homes, and respect their clergy. Thus when a certain magazine attacks their priests, representing them as fifth columnists and declaring that the Catholic religion stands for exploitation and organized robbery, the French Canadians become indignant; such statements make them bitter and are certainly harmful to national unity.

During his speech of June 16 last, the Minister of Justice read into Hansard certain documents which clearly indicate that the clergy of Quebec is not at all what certain people have tried to make it.

I would like to add to the minister's remarks certain words spoken neither by a Liberal, nor by a French Canadian, nor yet by a Catholic from the province of Quebec, but by a non-catholic Christian; the gentleman I am referring to is none other than the Chinese generalissimo Chiang-Kai-Shek. Lecturing to the younger members of his staff on the duties they would be called upon to fulfil, he said:

> I propose to speak to you to-day on what should be the personal conduct of every man of honour, and I know of no better models for you to emulate than the Catholic missionaries in China. They are truly magnificent men, in the fullest sense of the word.

[Mr. Lafontaine.]

Such impartial testimony avenges the grossly untruthful accusations levelled against our clergy by the individuals I mentioned a moment ago.

After the results of the plebiscite had been made public, a certain Toronto newspaper, in an editorial entitled: "What is the Matter with Quebec", had nothing but contempt for the French-Canadian element. I should think the author would have the common sense to realize that every citizen was free to vote as he wished.

(Text) Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, may I ask what the hon. gentleman is reading from?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is the hon. gentleman raising a point of order?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, I would like to know what the hon. gentleman is reading from.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

Mr. POULIOT: He is quoting from a speech by the hon. member for St. Paul's.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: If the hon. member is raising a point of order will he kindly state his point of order?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member must state what he is reading from.

An hon. MEMBER: Chiang Kai Shek.

Mr. LAFONTAINE (Translation): The Quebec people voted according to their convictions and their conscience as they always do. But in 1939 when the premier of Quebec, anxious as he was to hide the shameful abuses of his administration and in his desire to trick the people into renewing his mandate, announced a provincial election under the pretext that the province of Quebec should have an opportunity of protesting against Canada's participation in the war, as approved by the Canadian parliament, our ministers in the dominion government took a very active part in that campaign. They explained to the voters of our province that our participation was voluntary and that compulsion for military service overseas would never be enforced in Canada.

At that time there were no editorials with the caption "What is the matter with Quebec?" There were no such editorials when the Quebec electors turned out of office the leader of the "Union Nationale" because of his isolationist policy. No, there were no editorials asking "What is the matter with Quebec?" Mr. Speaker, Quebec was then lauded for its good work. Let this underground effort to pit the English element against the French Canadians come to an end, and national unity will strongly benefit therefrom.

The French Canadians do not oppose the sending of Canadian troops overseas as suggested in certain quarters. No, Mr. Speaker, they have supported that policy and they will continue to support it, but they are opposed to conscription for overseas service believing as they do that if they must fight, shed their blood and die on foreign soil overseas, they should do so voluntarily.

Before I conclude, may I say to the advocates of conscription that such a measure would not speed up our war effort but would rather tend to hamper it, that it would endanger national unity which is so essential in these critical times.

I have a last word to say, Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat. I wish to tell the Prime Minister how sincerely I sympathize with him.

While I must vote against this bill, I still trust that with his tact, his skill and his sound judgment, he will be fortunate enough to lead us safely through the perils which now beset Canada.

Mr. T. P. HEALY (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to express to this house my views regarding the deletion of section 3 from the mobilization act, I do so realizing that the remarks I am about to make are of a most serious nature affecting the present and future of our dominion.

The Quebec riding which I represent in this house is one of the oldest on the island of Montreal. Close by my home stands a schoolhouse which the good Sisters of Notre Dame, founded by the revered Marguerite Bourgeoys, erected over 244 years ago and in which were instructed Indians and French Canadians, the original settlers of our country.

We had migration to our land of many nationalities, and to-day my riding is composed of 50 per cent English-speaking, 40 per cent French, and the other 10 per cent Polish, Italian and Ukrainian.

During the plebiscite campaign I asked the people of my riding to vote in the affirmative. I explained to them that it was not a vote for or against conscription. It meant exactly what was marked on the ballot, "Are you in favour of releasing the government from past commitments?" Those commitments, it will be recalled, were made by both parties during the last election campaign in the year 1940.

I should like to be permitted to read a letter which I had published in the French and English press of Montreal on April 25. The heading is:

Healy urges "yes" in St. Ann division.

Mr. HANSELL: Who is Healy?

Mr. HEALY: The member for St. Ann. The letter reads:

Monday the people of Canada will go to the polls to register their decision on the appeal of the government for a release from commitments made during the election campaign of 1940.

As your elected representative in the House of Commons, I urge you as true Canadians to give this matter very serious consideration and to cast an affirmative vote.

In the last general election the people of Canada by an overwhelming majority placed their confidence in Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and the Liberal party to guide the country in its war effort. Since that time the whole aspect of the security of the entire world and especially that of our country has undergone a great change and our shores on the east and west coasts are in grave danger from enemy aggression.

If at that time you had confidence in your leader the same should apply in a greater measure today as our country together with the allied nations are in greater peril than ever before in our history.

I appeal to you, ladies and gentlemen, electors of St. Ann's division, regardless of your political belief or of race, creed or religion to go out and vote on the 27th and to see that all the members of your family also do their duty as citizens of our dominion by exercising the franchise—a privilege denied to so many people in Europe because of nazi aggression. I know that in voting "yes" you will show Hitler and his satellites that Canada is united with the other allied nations in the determination to defeat him and to bring peace once again to the world.

The future of this country depends to a large extent on the result of this vote and I feel that the people of St. Ann's division will join with the rest of the dominion in voting an overwhelming "yes" and giving to our government a free hand in the prosecution of our war effort.

I am anxious to see the people give an answer worthy of our glorious past. We are all sons and daughters of the same country. This war is our war. We must be united.

The government has stated that the voluntary system has been successful so far and that under that system we are getting enough men to satisfy the quota needed for our armed forces, and it has been repeated by our Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other members of the cabinet that conscription is not necessary and that the voluntary system is the best method.

It will be noted that in the speech delivered by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) in this house, he said that after the next call for men for the army there will not be many more eligible men who can be spared from essential activities in connection with the war effort to the armed forces.

In my riding I received a majority for the "yes" vote on the plebiscite, and I feel that I am expressing the wishes of the majority of my people in voting in favour of this bill to give the government a free hand in helping to conduct our war effort and join with the allied nations in bringing this war to a successful conclusion.

Our worthy leader and other members of the cabinet feel that conscription is not necessary at present, and I am prepared to accept their word. I am sure that the compulsory method would not accomplish a great deal in my riding, because thousands of the young men have joined either the army, the navy or the air force, and many more of them are engaged in essential war industries. French Canadians and those of English-speaking races work in harmony, and I would not want to see any dissension among them after all the efforts that have been expended to create the unity which now exists.

As the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) stated, conscription in the last war did not accomplish anything like the voluntary system is doing at present.

Our worthy Prime Minister and his cabinet also know what it accomplished. That is the reason why it will not be put into force unless it is absolutely necessary for the protection of our dominion, and I am sure that no hon. member would object to have our boys protect our Canadian homes, and our women and children.

Canada's contribution to the war has been acknowledged as an outstanding one, and, as Winston Churchill said in this House of Commons, "Canada is doing a magnificent job". Also, quoting Mr. Balfour, he expressed the sentiment that Canada's war effort is wonderful. In every manner we are helping the allied nations, and for a young country with fewer than twelve million people we are doing everything possible to help to win this war. We have at present over half a million men in the armed forces and 800,000 working in essential war industries supplying guns, tanks, boats, planes, and other war machinery and dispatching these commodities to the places where they are most needed.

When our Prime Minister and his government kept their promise to ask the people, through a plebiscite, to release them from commitments made by both parties in 1940, it was an assurance to me of the sincerity of the government, and I am prepared to accept their word that the compulsory method is not yet necessary. The long record of our leader in public life is sufficient assurance for me, and I am prepared to support the bill.

[Mr. Healy.]

May I conclude with a plea for national unity and for a united effort of all Canadians and a sympathetic understanding of the problems of all.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, conscription is the result of our participation in the war outside of Canada. On September 9, 1939, I moved the following amendment to the address, as reported at page 73 of the debates of the second session of that year:

> That this house regrets that the government did not deem it fitting to advise His Excellency the Governor General that Canada should refrain from participating in war outside of Canada.

At that most critical moment I declared, as reported at page 70 of the debates of the second session of 1939:

> Does anyone really believe that our contribution will be limited to voluntary enlistment? Should the war be a long one we shall inevitably have conscription.

My first vote was cast against any participation by Canada in war and against the odious conscription act of which I was an unfortunate victim along with the men of my own generation. Twenty-two years will soon have elapsed since the day I began to fight against the compulsory Military Service Act, which unfortunately was adopted after a desperate fight in which deceit and falsehood vied with the pathetic seriousness of the hour.

In the fall of 1917 I put forth all my small ability and the ardour of my youth—God knows that one has plenty when one is twenty years old—to ensure the triumph of a Canadian mentality and to contribute as far as possible to the safeguarding our young men, who soon afterwards were to be ostracized, pursued, tracked down, and torn from their homes, to be thrown into barracks by conscription. Even when hostilities had ceased, prison terms were imposed on young men whom the government were unable to force into service—shameful reprisals, unworthy of a power that had boasted of having contributed to the triumph of liberty and civilization. However, like the youth of to-day, young men of twenty years ago were loyal to their king; but, likewise, they believed that they could best serve him in no other place than Canada, their only country.

As happened twenty-five years ago, the young farmers of this country are being tracked down now and torn from their homes, after having made an application for postponement which was very often unjustly refused them. Agriculture being essential to the upkeep of the armies and the welfare of the civil population, why not create exemption tribunals in each constituency in the country to investigate each case of a young farmer on its merits?

The actual events constitute a solemn confirmation of my position. They show that I was right on September 9, 1939, when I asserted:

> Should the war be a long one, we shall inevitably have conscription.

I was right also on June 18, 1940, in stating in this very chamber, during the debate on the mobilization act, as reported at page 874 of the debates of the session of 1940:

> This parliament has no right to order the mobilization of man-power and wealth because it lacks the necessary mandate. The Canadian people whom we represent in parliament never endorsed such mobilization. On the contrary, they voted on March 26, 1940, for a moderate voluntary and free war policy. Consequently I am strongly opposed to such a mobilization so long as the Canadian people have not endorsed it. Besides, has it been shown that voluntary enlistment is not sufficient for the defence of the country? Until such time as proof to the contrary has been adduced to the people I shall have the feeling of discharging a sacred duty towards my electors and my country in opposing that policy with the utmost vigour.

Moreover, on the same day I moved the following amendment, as reported at page 874 of the debates of the session of 1940:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the bill be struck out and replaced by the following words:
> "The war policy of the Canadian government must remain free, voluntary and moderate."

The day after, on June 19, 1940, I moved a second amendment, as reported at page 924 of the debates of that year:

> That all the words after the word "whereas" in the preamble of the bill, be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "The government's war policy must be free and voluntary."

This amendment was ruled out of order as was the other. I appealed from the ruling of the Chair, and the ruling was confirmed by the following vote: yeas, 202; nays, 2.

Mr. Speaker, it was the so-called generous help which we received in connection with our opposition to that measure, which was exceedingly serious. My hon. colleagues in the Liberal party will permit me to call their attention to a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in this very chamber on June 19 last. He asserted that conscription had existed and exists in this country since June 21, 1940. Once more the Prime Minister's statement and the actual events constitute the solemn assertion that I was right in opposing the mobilization act with the utmost vigour. However, it is a most deplorable fact that in these extremely serious times I receive from my hon. colleagues, who have asserted time and time again that they are opposed to conscription, such poor support. On June 17 last I made an appeal to them. I repeat my appeal at this moment: Join our ranks without any further delay. Join the Canadian party now, in the best interests of Canada. I know my hon. colleagues are all true Canadians; that is why I implore them, because they assert very often in this parliament their anti-conscriptionist feelings, to join our exclusively Canadian party.

I seconded the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé which reads as follows:

> That all the words after the word "that" in the motion be deleted and the following substituted therefor:
> "This house is of the opinion that the policy of the government respecting mobilization, instead of drawing closer the union of the two races in Canada, has fostered dissensions which might cause an internal war, thus destroying the ideal set forth by the fathers of confederation."

In the name of national unity which must survive in Canada I beseech my colleagues to support that amendment, because the welfare of Canada and our people demand that we do so.

I should now like to refer to the speech of the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Jean) on June 18 last. My hon. friend asserted that we voted unanimously for participation in the war. Such a statement is absolutely contrary to the facts. The hon. member cannot deny that on September 9, 1939, I moved an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) that Canada should refrain from participation in war outside of Canada. The people of this country have the right to know the truth, all the truth concerning this capital question of participation in war outside of Canada. The population has been betrayed long enough with false statements regarding past and present political events.

(Translation): When Sir Wilfrid Laurier died in February, 1919, disowned by a group of conscriptionist Liberals, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was chosen as leader of the Liberal party. Hon. members recall the convention which was held in this capital city in the early summer of 1919. The Hon. Mr. Fielding was a candidate to Laurier's succession, but was defeated by the majority of the delegates for his opposing his leader on Borden's conscription policy. The present Prime Minister was elected against Mr. Fielding and so, by their condemnation of Mr. Fielding's anti-Canadian attitude, the majority of the delegates then and there proclaimed their unalterable opposition to conscription. How ironic fate can be! To-day, we see Laurier's successor himself endeavouring, at a single stroke, to do away with our last legal protection against conscription. This from the man who, between 1919 and 1939, unfailingly repeated that never again would Canada take part in any external wars. Needless for me to recall his many solemn promises so often quoted in this house. Here is the very same man who, with the help of the late Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, was the choice of the 1919 convention, ready to trample down the sovereign right of parliament of which time and time again he declared himself the protector. It is the present Prime Minister who will deal a fatal blow to responsible government by the repeal of section 3 of the mobilization act of 1940, thereby vesting in the cabinet the right to send willy-nilly our soldiers overseas, far away from our first line of defence.

What extraordinary event has happened? How can one explain the Prime Minister's cynical reversal of form? It can be explained by the predominance in Canada of military and financial imperialism. Our foreign policy is dictated by London and Washington. The government of Canada is a mere puppet in the hands of foreign powers. We are no longer self-governing. In less than three years, our nation has lost all the privileges it had acquired after years of struggle. The Westminster statute is nothing more than a joke to our Prime Minister who sacrifices day after day a portion of our right to self-government. The so-called administrative commissions and an invidious bureaucracy have everywhere replaced the representatives of the people. Responsible government has all but vanished under the leadership of William Mackenzie's grandson.

The repeal of section 3 of the mobilization act will empower a servile cabinet to conscript our sons, not for the defence of Canada, but for the protection of wealthy and powerful nations and their colonies all over the world. The repeal of section 3 is equivalent to sacrificing the very nation for the benefit of foreign countries to the detriment of our own defence. Never shall my name be associated to such a betrayal. I have always condemned such a vile policy, and I can never have too much contempt for it. The imperialists have brought Canada to the brink of ruin. The conscriptionists will give her the "coup de grâce."

All true Canadians must unite to crush the head of the conscriptionist viper which hides under the green foliage of civilization and liberty, ready to dart forth its poisonous fangs into our constitution and our rights.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) is the solemn warning given by Canadians worthy of the name to all those who believe they would better serve Canada by emasculating her own defence. On this seventy-fifth anniversary year of confederation, we declare that millions of Canadians will never consent to compulsory service for overseas. I say that confederation would not survive such disregard of the liberty of this country conquered, developed, settled, civilized and evangelized by our people. We are masters in our own house and we will not emigrate to a wretched Europe with our last cent, our last son and the last shred of our Canadian country.

These politicians who have gained power by hatefully deceiving the people had better resign themselves to the inevitable: the unity of the country will survive only if all races are assured equal rights. Proud of their respective pasts, the Anglo-Saxon and the French races have but one sacred heritage to defend. It is the spiritual and material heritage of a united nation. It is the constitution, the religion, the language and the rights of a nation and not of a vassal in the tow of the empire. It is the only country we have, Canada.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) reads:

> This house is of the opinion that the policy of the government respecting the mobilization act, instead of drawing closer the union of the two races in Canada, has fostered dissensions which might cause an internal war, thus destroying the ideals set forth by the fathers of confederation.

This debate has been rather lengthy, and I intend to say only a few words on this amendment, which has been supported by the hon. member (Mr. Lacombe) who has just spoken. We have heard a great deal about national unity from various corners of the house. That expression was discovered by Mr. Bennett; once when he had nothing else to say, he declared that we should have national unity in Canada. I remember that speech, which went into the waste-paper basket some time ago. But later those words became a slogan. Everything was to be done for national unity. Everything was to be done on account of the province of Quebec, because the feelings of the province of Quebec were supposed to be different from those of the rest of the country. That was a great mistake. The feelings of the province of Quebec are exactly the same as those of any other part of Canada. The only difference is that the people of Quebec sometimes stop to think and reach their own conclusions, which would be the conclusions of the good farmers of western Ontario, the prairie provinces, the maritimes and every other part of Canada, if they did the same thing.

The trouble is that we live in atmospheres. To-day we have the atmosphere of sacrifice, while during the plebiscite campaign we had the atmosphere of treason. All those who were not supporting the government were supposed to be traitors, as those who do not agree with the government here are not supposed to be generous enough to make sacrifices to win the war. I find it all wrong. All things should be considered objectively. We all realize the atmosphere that exists in this house. It requires someone with the armour of determination to rise and disagree with any government measure here. It also seems to be bad manners to disagree with the government, though what we tell them is for their own good; and even though they do not listen to us, later on they recognize that we were trying to help them. It was the same during the last plebiscite campaign; and I do not think this bill will do any more to destroy what is called national unity in this country than was done during the plebiscite campaign, when committees which were subsidized by the government were picturing those opposing the plebiscite as friends of Hitler, who had medals pinned upon their lapels by Hitler himself. That was done by the government; it was paid for by the government, but it was destroying national unity. I remember the lady member for North Battleford (Mrs. Nielsen) comparing the French Canadians to Quislings. Later she tried to make love to us, but without success. That is the way we were spoken of; and even a minister of the crown said that Hitler would vote against the plebiscite, meaning that those who voted against it were friends of Hitler. That was the propaganda which was used, the propaganda which was subsidized by the government. It was just as bad as that of Ti-noir Desjardins twenty-five years ago, when he tried to blow up Lord Atholstan's house at Cartierville. They were agents provocateurs.

Mr. McCANN: On what does the hon. member base his statement that this propaganda was subsidized by the government?

Mr. POULIOT: I can tell the hon. member that there were national committees, and if they were not subsidized by the government they were not disapproved by any minister of the crown.

Mr. McCANN: That is entirely different.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. gentleman, who is fair-minded, knows very well that a minister of the crown said that Hitler would vote against the plebiscite.

Mr. McCANN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me another question, would he not agree that the word "subsidized" presupposes the payment of money; and was any of this propaganda paid for by the government?

Mr. POULIOT: Yes; and I will quote another example, one that I have already mentioned here. It is the case of one of the men paid by the government, who is in the information bureau and was on the plebiscite committee, who tried to give some explanation to the effect that he was addressing himself to those in the province of Quebec who did not love England, meaning that the French Canadians of Quebec do not love Great Britain. I complained about that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Who said that?

Mr. POULIOT: It is on record, and I can give it to the hon. member if he wishes. It is in a publication which I received under the frank of the Secretary of State. Later the wording of it was changed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should like it now. Who said that?

Mr. POULIOT: If my hon. friend will be kind enough to wait until the house adjourns, I will give it to him. It is no secret. It was published and later changed by replacing "England" with "empire", or something like that, after I complained about it. But when I mentioned the name of the man concerned there was no contradiction by anyone. I mentioned that name in public, and it was reported in several newspapers. I know very well my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) would never use language like that. I know him as a fair-minded Canadian citizen, who does not like or appreciate things like that, which are beneath him. But those things should never happen in this country. They create ill-feeling between those who should live together like brothers. One may disagree with someone else and both may remain friends, provided they discuss the matter objectively.

My idea on rising to-night is precisely to discuss these matters objectively and to address myself through you, sir, to all hon. members who are open-minded and who have not already formed an opinion on the matter. The province of Quebec has been misjudged from beginning to end. We are all in the same boat. If Canada wins the war, we all win the war; and if Canada loses the war, we all lose the war. Therefore we all have a common interest in winning the war. But in trying to win the war there is one thing we must not lose—we must not lose our heads. A pertinent remark was made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in 1940 when he said that we should discuss everything relating to the war with calm and with clarity of mind. That was indeed a very good suggestion. We should not get excited over any matter which comes before us, because that may have a bad effect on our judgment and decision.

During the plebiscite campaign we heard speeches that were like the overture to Tannhauser. Some speakers talked one way, while others at the same time said something entirely different, although both were pleading for the same answer, an affirmative vote. But to some people a "yes" vote meant no conscription, while to others "yes" meant conscription. I admit that even some speakers may have been deceived by the explanations given to them; but nevertheless the Canadian people were greatly embarrassed how to answer the question. I am told that an old gentleman who was in the inner councils and who died not so long ago said that the question asked in the plebiscite was purposely ambiguous to give the speakers an opportunity to say everything about it. It reminds me of the conundrum, "what is round like an egg, has a shell like an egg, has a yolk and a white like an egg, and barks?" The answer is "an egg." "Oh," you will say, "an egg does not bark." Quite so, but putting that in makes the conundrum a little harder. That is the way in which the question was put to the people in the plebiscite.

Here is something that is very interesting. It is a report of the Prime Minister's speech over the radio on April 8, 1942. The heading in the Ottawa Journal says, speaking of the Prime Minister:

> Pleads for affirmative answer to the plebiscite question—Mackenzie King declares it essential that Canada send an army overseas.

The headline across the top of the page reads:

> Final battles may be fought in Canada.

I have another headline from the Montreal Gazette of April 25:

> Premier King makes plebiscite test of confidence.

He said in that speech that the draft is not an issue in the plebiscite campaign. That speech was given wide publicity and was made over a national hook-up on the Friday before the plebiscite was taken, and the report of the speech appeared in every Canadian newspaper on Saturday, two days before the voting. Of course, a correction was made of the statement that the plebiscite was a test of confidence, but the statement was distinctly made by the Prime Minister that the draft or conscription was not the issue.

Here is a headline from the Montreal Gazette of April 28, the day after the vote was taken:

> Premier states will of majority prevails—says plebiscite was "national expression of view on national issue," and should be viewed in all its aspects. Declares vote was taken in democratic fashion.

The vote was taken in democratic fashion, if by that is meant merely the polling of the vote. The people, I presume, went to the polls and put their ballots in the boxes, and in that way may be said to have voted in democratic fashion. But the appeal to the people to vote "yes" on the question submitted was most undemocratic, because the people were told that it was in their own interests to vote "yes", and publicity was spread all over the country to inform them that if they did not vote "yes" they would be traitors and would be voting just as Hitler would have voted had he been a Canadian citizen. That was pretty hard, and the consequence was that English-speaking Canadians were biased and prejudiced by such appeals. The campaign was not waged at all in accordance with real democratic traditions. I regret that, sir. It was to my great sorrow; I have never been as sorry over anything else that has been done in politics as I have been over this matter.

The question is now before us to repeal section 3 of the mobilization act. Section 3 reads:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

The marginal subtitle is as follows: "Limitation in respect of service overseas." In addition to the propaganda that was used during the plebiscite campaign, I know there were lobbies by propagandists of almost every description who tried to make the members of the government forget that Canada is our country and that in war we should have as our policy, Canada first, which of course does not exclude any help being given to our allies in this war.

The mobilization act, part of which we are being asked to repeal, is legislation which was not absolutely in accordance with the traditions of the Liberal party, for this reason, that all the leaders and all the members of the Liberal party, including myself, had said during a quarter of a century that with the Tories in power we would have conscription, but with the Liberals in power we would have none.

There was no distinction made between conscription for overseas service and conscription for home defence; it was conscription that was objected to by the leaders of the party as well as by their followers. In spite of that, after the capitulation of France when the government came out with a measure of conscription for home defence, I supported the measure, because in my view, as in the view of French Canadians, Canada was my country. We are not different when we express a view like that. The defence of country is a national duty. No one can be accused of being narrow-minded or parochial when he says, as the French Canadians have said, that the shores of British Columbia and the maritimes as well as any part of central Canada shall be defended at the cost of his life. That is their understanding. Propaganda to lead the Canadian people to believe that anyone is parochial because he is opposed to conscription is wrong. Such propaganda has been inspired by nefarious paid agents who want to destroy patriotism in the hearts of Canadian citizens?

What is patriotism? Patriotism is love of country, the country in which one was born or the country which one has adopted to make it his own, and which must be considered in the first place when making any important decision. The view is expressed at times that the duty of legislators is to lead the people. However, a distinction should be made, because one of the most notorious leaders of men is Hitler. He does not give his people an opportunity to think; they must follow him and abdicate entirely their personal views. If they do not do so they are considered guilty of a crime, the penalty for which at times is death. Under the democratic system everybody is supposed to be free to express his own opinion; everybody has the right to say what he thinks.

If the plebiscite had any meaning, it was a confirmation of the theory that the people are at liberty to give their own views to the government. If the government desires to ask the views of the people, it should take advantage of the answer only when the question asked is clear enough to be understood by all. If that is done, then you get the real opinion of the majority of people in a democracy. If this question had read, "Are you in favour of conscription for overseas?" and if there had been a majority of "yes" votes, I would not be speaking to-night. I would consider that the people had spoken and I would respect their views. But it is because the plebiscite campaign was carried on as it was that I must protest. The result of that plebiscite does not give the real opinion of the Canadian people about conscription for overseas service.

I admit that opinions are free, but there are some that cannot be expressed without thinking of a certain decency. There are some men who have a right to say that they are in favour of conscription for overseas service, but I contend that that right does not belong to all citizens of the country. It belongs only to those who served in the last war or in this war in a theatre of war, or to those all of whose children of military age are now in active service in a theatre of war, and a theatre of war includes the navy. A bachelor who did not serve during the last war or who is not serving in this war in a theatre of war, or a married man who did not serve in the last war or in this war in a theatre of war, or a married man all of whose children of military age are not at present fighting overseas or on the high seas is not qualified to say that others should be conscripted for overseas service. The greatest preaching is by example. Most hon. members will probably remember the Latin poet who said suave mari magno. It is a pleasure to look at those who are on the high seas when a storm is raging, provided that you yourself are under shelter safely on the shore.

On motion of Mr. Pouliot the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, July 7, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

THE WAR IN CHINA

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF JAPANESE ATTACK—TRIBUTE TO CHINESE RESISTANCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Five years ago this evening, Chinese and Japanese forces clashed in a skirmish which marked the beginning of a war which has brought as much devastation and death as was witnessed in the first world war. This house will, I believe, wish me on this anniversary to pay some slight tribute to the indomitable spirit of the Chinese people and their brave leaders. The five years that have elapsed have shown that nothing can daunt their courage or shake their resolution.

On November 3, 1941, I remarked in this chamber that "the uncomplaining courage of the Chinese has not been surpassed in the annals of human resistance", and that "the Chinese continue to die in staggering numbers in defence of their humble habitations and the good earth which for countless generations has given to the ancestors they revere and to themselves their scanty sustenance." Another eight months have passed, and the courage and resolution of China are as fresh as ever.

Most of the great industrial centres, and most of the fertile land of China, are now occupied by the invader; the principal supply routes have been cut off; the loss of Burma has increased Chinese difficulties in obtaining the weapons and munitions of war; bombings are a part of the expected daily routine in the Chinese capital; death or slavery has been the lot of uncounted millions of the Chinese people.

Out of all this suffering and anguish China has given and is continuing to give to her allies an example which serves as little else possibly could to sustain their hearts in these dark days. It is the example of a nation endowed with an ancient and splendid culture, and devoted to the arts of peace, defending itself tenaciously, skilfully and boldly against a barbarous foe which has no thoughts except those of ruthless aggression. Such is the spirit of China in this hour.

Chinese resistance is a proof of the moral stamina of democracy. China may be assured that her resistance will not be in vain, and that no matter what the cost, or what the duration of the ordeal, the united nations will continue at her side until freedom again becomes the portion of all.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, just a word in commendation of the remarks of the Prime Minister. The people of Canada will join with the Prime Minister and the members of this house in expressing admiration of the indomitable spirit of the Chinese people. Those of us who have had occasion to read the history of China know of their contribution to civilization. It is the prayer of every one of us that that noble nation will survive.

MILITARY SERVICE

CALLING UP OF SINGLE MEN AND CHILDLESS WIDOWERS FROM TWENTY TO FORTY YEARS OF AGE

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): I desire to lay on the table copy of order in council P.C. 5840, extending the application of the national war services regulations to unmarried men or widowers without child or children who are twenty years of age.

I also desire to lay on the table copy of order in council P.C. 5841 providing for the issue of a proclamation under the national war services regulations calling out men who were on July 15, 1940, unmarried or widowers without child or children and who were born in any of the years from 1922 back to 1902, but that persons born in the year 1922 shall not be called out until they reach the age of twenty years.

WAR MEASURES ACT

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED BETWEEN APRIL 1, 1942, AND JUNE 30, 1942

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On April 21 last I tabled copies of orders in council passed under the War Measures Act between January 16, 1942, and March 31, 1942. I now table copies in English and French of the orders in council passed under the same act between April 1, 1942, and June 30, 1942.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF RALPH P. BELL AS AIRCRAFT CONTROLLER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): On Thursday last when the Minister of Munitions and Supply was absent I asked certain questions with respect to the appointment of an aircraft controller, as reported at page 3863 of Hansard. The matter was by agreement allowed to stand as a notice to the minister. I desire now to direct his attention to the three particular questions which were asked: Has any situation arisen which makes it imperative to create this new authority and to clothe the controller with such wide and unlimited powers? If so, what is that situation? I should be glad if the minister would answer this inquiry.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): The necessity for a controller in that particular field arises from the fact that as the volume of production grows there is a tendency for one contractor to move in on the supplier of another contractor. In other words, one factory may be making parts for one aircraft, and without any knowledge of the department in Ottawa a second contractor may place work in that factory beyond the capacity of the equipment, which results in the work slowing down for both contractors. Such cases have arisen, and it is with the desire to make sure that contractors are protected to the extent that their subcontractors are not overloaded that the appointment has been made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And these are the only reasons?

Mr. HOWE: That is the only reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was there not full power in Mr. Bell, as director of aircraft production, to take care of any such situation?

Mr. HOWE: No, Mr. Speaker; Mr. Bell as director of aircraft production had no authority over a plant that did not have direct contract with the government.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ORDER IN COUNCIL CONFIRMING EMPLOYER-EMPLOYEE AGREEMENTS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA SHIPYARDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I understand an order in council has been passed confirming certain agreements between the employers and employees in the shipyards of British Columbia. Would the Minister of Labour table a copy of the order in council?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to do that to-morrow.

MOBILIZATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REPEAL SECTION 3 PROVIDING LIMITATION IN RESPECT TO SERVICE OVERSEAS

The house resumed from Monday, July 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the second reading of Bill No. 80, to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act, 1940, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Roy.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I hold in my a hand a clipping from the newspaper L'Evenement-Journal of Quebec city, under date of October 30 last, in which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), who had just returned from abroad, is quoted as comparing the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to Hitler and blaming him for a lack of energy. According to that clipping the hon. gentleman, who had just arrived from England, said that he had been requested to ask for conscription. Then, sir, I have another clipping from the Ottawa Journal of June 12 of this year, in which it is stated that the Conservative vote will be cast to save the government. We see what quantities of water ran under the bridge during that period of time. Now, sir, I hold in my hand a copy of the Canadian Mining Reporter of January 16, 1942, published in Toronto, in which appears an editorial headed "The Pro-Conscription Banquet", in which these words appear:

> It was a meeting largely composed of people too old to fight and, therefore, exempt from military service, called for the purpose of making military service outside of Canada compulsory upon those who are not too old to fight.

Then it continues:

> It is one of the strangest things that a group of men and women—

That is, the committee of two hundred.

> —so highly placed as are the people attending this banquet to promote conscription (to use the exact name) should be so blind to the unethical import of their action in urging the government of Canada to violate its solemn pledge to the people of Canada not to introduce conscription without first consulting the people of Canada. One of our chief taunts at Hitler is levelled at his breaking of pledges and violation of treaties. Yet this honourable company of citizens, too old to fight, sees no inconsistency in seeking to bring sufficient pressure to bear upon the government as will compel them to betray the people of Canada who voted for them on the understanding that conscription would not be introduced without a mandate from the people.

Sir, I obtain my inspiration from what was said by the Prime Minister himself in this house on June 19, 1940, at page 922 of Hansard:

> An hon. member on this side of the house made the statement publicly this morning that he felt he could go into his constituency and, by making it known to his constituents that this measure had to do with the protection of Canada and our own Canadians soil—

That was the mobilization act.

> —bring forward in a very short time men from the forests, from the fields and from the factories, all prepared immediately to join the Canadian forces to resist any possible invasion, and that he would be prepared to guarantee that that could be done in constituency after constituency throughout the country, once it was understood that there was the necessity of defending our own Canadian shores. I pointed out to him that in doing that he might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest; that, to win this war, we might wish to keep at work in the forests the men who are now working in the forests, to provide the timber which will be required for docks and wharves and required immediately; that the men who are working in the factories may be a thousand times more useful to the government of this country in giving their skilled labour to the manufacture of aircraft, munitions, or other weapons of war than they could possibly be in lining up and presenting themselves for military service; equally, that on the farms, if we are to perform what will be expected of us, we shall need all the production that can be effectively and rapidly carried out on the farms of our country.

This part of it should be completed by reading a letter which I wrote to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) on May 16, 1941, when he asked us to help him in the recruiting of volunteers for service abroad.

Ottawa, May 16, 1941.

The Honourable J. L. Ralston, K.C.,
Minister of National Defence, Ottawa.

My dear Minister,

Referring to your letter of May 11, there is something that I do not understand.

Eleven months ago, the Prime Minister pointed out to me that in doing voluntary recruiting for the defence of Canada, I might be making the greatest mistake possible with respect to the national interest.

Would there be no mistake possible with respect to the national interest in doing it for overseas service? In other words, how can I do, at your request and for another country, what I had been precluded to do by the Prime Minister for our native country?

Then at page 1905 of Hansard for April 23 of this year another hon. member of this house quoted what was said by General Browne:

"The reserve force may have to fight and it must be ready to fight as soon as possible," he said.

"After all, there is no more war overseas than there is here now, and we may have some here sooner than they have, in view of the threats to our coast."

Then Hon. Mr. Godbout, premier of the province of Quebec, on February 20 stated that Quebec was open to attack from the Atlantic. That view was supported by Rear Admiral G. C. Jones, commanding officer of the Atlantic coast, who with Rear Admiral P. W. Nelles does not rule out the possibility of German submarines and a supply ship penetrating into the gulf of St. Lawrence this summer. Everyone knows that submarines have come very close to my constituency. Unfortunately they caught the navy napping at the time, because I understand they were chased by a boat that was not sufficiently speedy. Then there is something else of the utmost importance; it is a question that I directed to the Prime Minister in this house on February 16, 1942, appearing at page 598 of Hansard:

Mr. Jean-François Pouliot (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private Liberal member of this honourable house, may I ask the government if the Canadian people, following the deplorable fall of Singapore and the notorious escape of a German naval squadron from Brest, can secure a definite guarantee that this country will not be invaded before the end of the war; and if so, what is it? If not, is it the policy of the government to create a large number of mobile units and to improve at once all means and ways of communication throughout this country?

Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on these questions of strategy and war policy, questions that affect other parts of the world as well as Canada and other nations as well as our own, I do not think any question should either be asked in a form which is likely to cause embarrassment, or answered, or attempted to be answered, if there is the slightest possibility of either the question or the answer being misunderstood in any part of the world. I am afraid that my hon. friend's question has been asked on the spur of the moment, and I for one would certainly not wish to reply without due consideration.

The question was put on February 16, and I have received no reply.

Then, at Selkirk, the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) said that Canadians were the most mobile of all allied armies. Surely they are; they are all outside of Canada. What is needed, sir, is a decentralization of the army in this country. We need good military roads and we need men who are fit to defend our own country.

Here is another question, which I put on June 20, 1940, two days after the mobilization bill was brought up. I said—Hansard, page 1053:

Mr. Pouliot: I want to make myself as clear as posible, I am speaking only of mobilization for home defence, and I want to know if a man not in the class that may be called for military service in connection with home defence may enlist just the same, without being obliged to agree to overseas service.

Mr. Mackenzie King: The answer is yes.

Well, now, what appears in the enlistment form? Here is the declaration to be made by a man on attestation:

I, ... do solemnly declare that the above particulars are true, and I hereby engage to serve in any active formation or unit of the Canadian Army so long as an emergency, i.e., war, invasion, riot or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists, and for the period of demobilization after said emergency ceases to exist, and in any event for a period of not less than one year, provided His Majesty should so require my services.

We are told that Canada is just lacking in draftees; that is the news which appeared in the press on June 3. On the first page of the Ottawa Evening Journal of yesterday I see that men of special ages will be drafted for the reserve—"Government to follow call-up plan made by George McIlraith." All the cream of our youth is sent overseas, and all we have to defend this country is just the skimmed milk, men who have passed the military age or who are unfit for military service when the distance to be covered by Canadian units is so great.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I want to interrupt and say that this statement is just as untrue—

Mr. POULIOT: That is all right. I have no time, and he will answer afterwards. I have only two minutes left, and I do not want to be interrupted when I have something to say. If that is not so, the minister had only to deny it on the orders of the day.

Mr. RALSTON: I am denying it now. It is just as untrue as it is mischievous.

Mr. POULIOT: What I want at the head of the Department of National Defence is not a negative minister as much as it is a positive minister.

Mr. McNEVIN: Well, you haven't the say in this matter.

Mr. POULIOT: I will ask my hon. friend to keep quiet. He represents the county of Victoria, Ontario, which was Sam Hughes' constituency. We should exhume or resurrect Sam Hughes, to improve the department.

In the Journal we find an article about ministers who are favourable to conscription. They are all named, and there are nine of them. Do they forget that it is time now to look after the defence of our own country? But they are the victims of propaganda. I pity them. We have their names here, in an editorial on June 13: they are all for conscription. Sometimes they say they are for voluntary enlistment, and sometimes they say that conscription will be required if voluntary enlistment is not sufficient. Well, at the rate it is going on, voluntary enlistment will not be sufficient for a long time, because after our resources of men are exhausted what can we do for the defence of this country?

There is only one other thing I will say now, though I shall say something more afterwards. I hold in my hand a newspaper of November 10, 1917, with a report of a meeting held in Quebec city, addressed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the one leader who can be compared with Sir John A. Macdonald. We are just as proud of Sir Wilfrid as we are of Sir John A. Macdonald. He said at that time that conscription for overseas was not necessary.

What we need is to proceed according to the act that we have on the statute book. Nothing has been done for the defence of Canada under the mobilization act which we are about to change, but pressure has been exercised on the trainees in the camps so that they shall enlist for overseas. And we call it voluntary enlistment—voluntary enlistment! Farmers who have joined up have in many places no opportunity of getting leave. In many cases it has been denied to them when it should have been given to them. What will happen to the army and to the civilian population if the farmers cannot work on the land?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a question of privilege, if I understood the hon. gentleman correctly he stated that on one occasion I compared the Prime Minister to Hitler. I should like to say that at no time, at no place, on no occasion did I ever compare the Prime Minister to Hitler.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): I had not intended to speak again in this debate, but I felt that it was very necessary to correct a statement made by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) who has just taken his seat. When he was speaking last evening he said that I had compared French-speaking Canadians to quislings. I take great objection to that remark. I wish very much that the hon. member for Témiscouata would have a little more regard for the truth when he makes statements to this house.

Mr. POULIOT: The hon. member is not a gentleman!

Mrs. NIELSEN: No, I do not happen to be. It is true also that I have spoken in other places besides this chamber on the question of conscription, but never have I made any statement which would lead people even to infer that I regarded French-speaking people as quislings. I have said, and I will repeat, that unfortunately there are a few among the French-speaking people of Quebec who are playing a quisling role. But that is a very different thing from grouping all French-speaking people together. That has never been my intention. At a time like this, when we read in our daily papers of the fall of Sevastopol and how the Libyan campaign is going, any person or any group of persons in this country who does one thing to retard or to impede the total war effort of our people is playing a quisling role. I would not say that those playing this quisling role come only from among our French-speaking people or from the province of Quebec, because that would be incorrect. I say most emphatically that there are others in this country who are trying to impede and restrict the war effort of our people. I was not prepared to speak this afternoon, but I would mention just casually that I regard the Toronto Telegram as being among this class. For a year or more it has been carrying on subtle propaganda calculated to impede and to retard our war effort and to divide our people. There is no doubt about that.

There is a great difference between the attitude of many French-speaking people and the odd one or two among them who are seeking to create prejudices and to confuse their own people.

Since I am on my feet I should like to say a word or two about the amendment moved by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). With reference to the policy of the government it states:

—instead of drawing closer the union of the two races in Canada has fostered dissensions which might cause an internal war, thus destroying the ideal set forth by the fathers of confederation.

In my opinion any hon. member of this house who would intimate that the two great races of this country might be led to internal conflict is playing a role which I cannot call by any other name than a quisling role. This whole amendment is decidedly against any increased collaboration or unity and against improvement in the feeling between the two peoples, and for that reason I strongly condemn it.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): Mr. Speaker, John Stuart Mill wrote somewhere that even when there is apparent unanimity in the world on any subject, it is probable that the dissentients have something worth listening to and that something would be lost by their silence. I shall be satisfied if after I have finished some hon. member believes that I have said something worth listening to. Beyond that my ambition does not go.

I had prepared with great care a written speech in English which I thought in my naivete to be fairly good, but because of the stern determination of the Chair that hon. members shall abide by the rules, I decided to throw the whole thing into the waste-paper basket. I know your sincere desire, sir, to have representatives from Quebec speak more frequently in this house, and I am rather ill at ease in meeting that desire unless I am able to obtain the indulgence of hon. members. In order to urge that indulgence, I do not think I can do better than to quote the immortal Burns and say to you:

Thou know'st that God has form'd me
With passions wild and strong;
And listening to their witching voice
Has often led me wrong.
. . . .
Where with intention I have err'd
No other plea I have
But thou art good; and goodness still Delighteth to forgive.

I do not think it is enough to consider this conflict only as a Canadian. In order to have a complete and perfect view of this world conflict one must consider himself a citizen of the world. After careful study of the world situation if we want to maintain our standard of life, if we want to survive, if we want to preserve our human personality, if we want to prevent slavery and paganism, in my view our duty is simple. We must do everything and we must give everything. As Canadian people we must cooperate with the other nations of the world who believe in democratic principles. We must unite and fight our common enemies wherever we can reach them.

In order to be enthusiastic about our activities in connection with our war effort we must first convince ourselves that this war is a Canadian war, that it is not a war of imperialism against another form of imperialism. We must convince ourselves that when we as Canadian people are contributing to this war to our limit we are fighting for our own liberties. So far as I am concerned I am firmly convinced that if there is any part of the Canadian nation which reveres liberty, which cherishes these attributes, it is the race to which I belong. We have many reasons to cherish those liberties. I have not the time to go into details in that regard, but it is well known to every good citizen of the French race in this country.

Having said this, Mr. Speaker, I should like to discuss the measure now before us. The effect of the passage of this amendment of the mobilization act will be to adopt the principle of compulsory service for overseas. I have asked myself, is this a wise measure? Is it necessary to adopt such a measure now? Many times I have asked myself why the Canadian government should force this measure upon us. I am not among those who would impute motives to the ministry, nor am I among those who would charge the ministry with sombre designs. I know perfectly well that every one of them is a good Canadian, just as sincere and just as patriotic as I am myself, and that each of them desires the success of our cause and the ultimate prosperity of our common country. There can be no doubt about that, and if they have seen fit to present this measure, while they might be wrong in their judgment—because as human beings we are all apt to err—neither their sincerity nor their motives, I submit, can in any way be questioned.

Some sections of this country are strongly opposed to conscription for overseas service, and may I repeat what many other members have said, that those who oppose conscription for overseas service are not to be found in the province of Quebec alone. We from Quebec do not like this measure, for certain reasons; but in other parts of the country there are other people who do not like this measure for other reasons. What I resent very much, Mr. Speaker, is imputing to the people of Quebec sentiments which are foreign to our nature. I fancy that some would say—I should like to be wrong—that Quebec is against the bill because the people of Quebec are against our war effort, because they are slackers, cowards and quitters. It is useless for me to hide my thoughts; it is just as well that I should speak openly and frankly in this house. Unhappily, sir, it is true that some of our fellow Canadians share the sentiments I have just expressed, and when they are so strong for putting this measure upon our statute book it is because they want to get these slackers, these quitters and these cowards into uniform. I resent that very much, and I am sorry that it becomes necessary for me to raise my voice to answer such an attack upon the people of Quebec.

The people of Quebec, slackers, cowards and quitters? Just look around this house, Mr. Speaker, and put that question to any member of the province of Quebec who has children of military age, and you will find that the majority of them will rise at once and reply that their children of military age have answered the call.

Quitters? Just go into my province. Go into the parishes, see and speak with the families and ask their views, and you will discover that if there are any people in this country who are anxious that we should win this war, they will be found in the good old families of Quebec.

Slackers? Mr. Speaker, I hate to speak about my own humble person, but I may be pardoned for saying that in my own families I have over twenty relatives serving under the flag. My great grandfather, a captain of militia in my own home town, joined de Salaberry in 1812 and was there at Chateauguay to repulse the invader. Slackers? His son, also a captain of militia, formed a company in my own district and fought against the Family Compact and the bureaucrats of 1837. Slackers? Quitters? No, Mr. Speaker. God be praised, you will not find them in the province of Quebec. There might be, as the lady member (Mrs. Nielsen) suggested a few minutes ago, a few exceptions, but God knows exceptions prove the rule. While there might be a few exceptions, I read not later than last week an open letter to the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), written by the Reverend Doctor C. E. Silcox, and what did he say? He said in part:

> The majority of the English-speaking people of this dominion were born in Canada.

And he continues:

> Not a few of them are loud in their denunciation of imperialism; many others have imbibed the "isolationist" attitudes. . . .

Quitters to be found only in the province of Quebec? No, Mr. Speaker. They are to be found in any democratic country. They are to be found even within the one family. It might happen that one member of the family has not been favoured by providence to the same extent as other members of the family. If such exist, I do not blame them; I pity them.

Let me for the purpose of my argument try to give the relationship of our nation towards the world and towards the united nations in this conflict. The whole world is now divided into two conflicting groups. On the one side there are the axis powers, with a total population of 196,000,000 people. They have already conquered, either in a diplomatic way or by force of arms, countries with a total population of 157,000,000, who are now under Hitler's heel.

On the other end there are in the united nations 1,294,000,000 people, and excluding from this huge number those who for one reason or another are not available, we have left, as a reservoir of man-power, a population of 600,000,000. That is to say, the comparison is 600,000,000 people in the united nations as against 196,000,000 in the axis countries. That means that as regards man-power we are now three to one. What is our relationship to the united nations as regards population? The population of Canada, in round figures, is 12,000,000; that is, 12,000,000 to 600,000,000 now fighting against the axis. In other words, comparing our population with that of the united nations, we are as one to fifty.

Now, we have in the active service, having enlisted voluntarily, over 505,000 soldiers, airmen and sailors, and I understand that the object of the Department of National Defence is to have about 600,000. To reach that goal would take approximately 100,000 more men. Let me point out to hon. members the uselessness, the futility of the measure now before the house, from the point of view of its results. And by the way, I may digress a moment to say that the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) gave the other evening forcible evidence of this futility when he compared what is going to happen, if this bill is put on the statute book of the country, with what happened in 1917.

By this measure the country is threatened to be divided for many years to come. What for? Merely to obtain by force the enlistment of about 100,000 men, when we know that in 1917, at a cost of many million dollars, and over a period of a year or more, the Canadian government of that day obtained not many more than 60,000 men by force, whereas, during the same period, 101,000 young men enlisted voluntarily. One has only to read the daily reports to be convinced of what I am saying.

Just read the reports in the newspapers and listen to the radio and what do you find? What is the urgent need? Not men. They are telling you that we are short of equipment, short of tanks, short of ships; we are short of guns, aeroplanes and munitions. We are not short of men. Just one of our allies, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, according to an official report, has 17,000,000 men enlisted. Do you mean to say that these 17,000,000 men, brave and gallant soldiers, if they were properly trained, equipped and fed, would not be able to do better than they are doing to-day?

This is not a mere academic argument; it is a very serious one. It is sufficiently serious for hon. members and even for members of the government to pause and ponder the question. Otherwise it may happen that we might fail in our duty in the matter of production. We on this continent have been called the arsenal of democracy, and while we have been so described, have we been doing our full duty in the production of armaments and of every form of equipment possible to help our allies? I do not think we are doing our duty. We are spending our time discussing the question of raising a few more men by force, but the worst result will be not the raising of a few more men but the raising of prejudices of one race against the other, one religion against the other, one class against the other; and in so doing we are doing what German propaganda is so anxious to see in any country before the Germans take over. This propaganda, as shown by Doctor Karl Hanshofer in his treatise, is the propaganda used by the enemy to conquer the nations of the world. I have seen with my own eyes and have read letters from Hitler and Mussolini to their agents in this country and in the United States, advising them to be skilful, to use all their tact and their refinements, to insinuate themselves into high social circles in order there to stir up prejudices—the English against the French, the French against the English, Catholic against Protestant, Protestant against Catholic, and everybody against the Jews. That is the order they have given to their agents. And, mind you, notwithstanding the great and important work done by our Royal Canadian Mounted Police, one of the best police corps in the world, there are still in this country German agents who are doing that work to hamper our war effort. And we are to-day, with this measure, doing exactly what Hitler desires—dividing each other on a silly matter like this. It is our serious, our sacred duty to stop helping the enemy in that way, and to proceed, as a real arsenal of democracy, to build more ships, more submarines; to make more guns, produce more food, and supply these to our allies overseas. This, I submit, is our sacred duty.

I sincerely believe that this measure should be abandoned. I do not say this because I am afraid of conscription. Let me repeat here what I have said in my own riding, that if ever this country were threatened, if ever such a state of emergency arose that we should be convinced that conscription was the last recourse to save our democracy, I would be for it and my people would be for it. It is not that I am afraid of conscription; it is not that the people of Quebec are afraid of conscription. They are enlisting in thousands freely to fight anywhere in the world, and they will continue to enlist.

Might I give a piece of advice to the Canadian government. I was speaking a few minutes ago of German propaganda. Among the worst kinds of propaganda in this country are the slogans which are whispered by the agents of the enemy and then unwittingly taken up by otherwise good, but not well-informed people and spread among our families and on the street and everywhere. One of the statements, for instance, which I know to be untrue is that "England is sending her young boys to Canada while we have to enlist to fight the wars of the empire." That is one of those slanders spread by Hitler. If our Canadian government does not stop that kind of thing, does not get the official evidence with authentic facts and documents to repel such false information, it is very severely to be blamed.

Another slogan, another whisper, is that Canadians are put in the first rows whenever there is danger in an encounter between the united nations and the enemy. This is absolutely false, and it is the duty of this government to give the evidence of its falsity through authentic facts and documents. I am going to say something about Hong Kong. I am proud to say that among those brave Canadians at Hong Kong are to be found two officers from my riding. Their parents, who live in Marieville, have never heard any news from them; they do not know whether they are alive or dead. But German propaganda is spreading in this country the information that at Hong Kong there were only colonials—not a single British soldier. This is completely wrong. To help enlistment in Canada we ought to repel and deny with official documents this false information.

We are all of us sincere Canadians; irrespective of party allegiance, irrespective of religion or of race we are all for an all-out war effort. Our ultimate and sincere desire is for victory. Nothing but victory over our enemies will bring peace and harmony and prosperity in this country; otherwise we are doomed to destruction; we shall go back a thousand years to the days of paganism. Our supreme ambition, our sole purpose, is victory. But if the victory is to be complete, effective and fruitful, it must be a victory of justice over injustice, of lofty sentiment of the soul over the lower instincts of human nature, of genuine responsible government over bureaucracy and nepotism. To summarize, it must be a victory over ourselves. Every one of us will gladly make every possible sacrifice for freedom; but when the storm is over, when the sunshine in the sky of liberty reappears, the man who went through these terrible times, gratified with that inestimable gift of regenerated Christian freedom, adorned with living charity, will turn his back on the past, and with his eyes fixed on the infinite where faith never vanishes, with indomitable courage, sustained by legitimate ambition, he will undertake anew to climb the hill of success and to reach the horizon of his dreams.

During the war of 1870 a great writer and patriot, Paul Déroulède, had a vision which was never realized. May I be allowed to quote his dream which he wrote in his immortal poem:

Lorsque nous aurons fait la guerre triomphante,
Et que notre Patrie aura repris son rang,
Alors, avec les maux que la conquête enfante,
Disparaîtra l'horreur qui suit le conquérant.

Alors notre Patrie aimante et sans rancune,
Semant ses jeunes blés sous ses lauriers nouveaux,
Fêtera le Travail, père de la Fortune,
Et chantera la Paix, mère de longs travaux.
Et notre Nation lasse de funérailles,
En exaltant ses morts calmera ses vivants,
Et nous ne voudrons plus qu'on parle de batailles,
Et nous désapprendrons la haine à nos enfants.

May I be allowed to paraphrase him and say:

Oh oui! puisse aujourd'hui, tout à l'heure, à l'instant,
Le Canada s'élancer de victoire en victoire,
Puisse—son fier triomphe à jamais établi—
Mon nom être englouti dans ce torrent de gloire,
Et mon discours inconnu se perdre dans l'oubli!

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): After listening to the many admirable sentiments expressed by the speaker who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Dupuis), I find it difficult to arrive at the same conclusion as he does. He speaks of the part which this country is playing, and the great man-power of the united nations, which he calculates in hundreds of millions; then he goes on to make a comparison, dividing our population into the total and multiplying our contribution in armed services by the dividend. It shows that we are indeed making an admirable contribution to the war effort, but we cannot take that as our guide; it is fallacious, for many reasons, if one examines the facts—the fighting qualities, if you like, of the people who go to make up the united nations, and the industrial contribution which those nations individually can make to the common cause. I agree with him that French-speaking Canadians are second to none in the many admirable qualities of courage, fortitude and bravery; the history of this country is evidence of that fact. But it is difficult for English-speaking Canadians to understand how the contributions of French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians can be considered to be equal. It is surely the war of both peoples who make up this common nationality, but according to a return recently tabled in this house we find that enlistments in the province of Quebec since the war began total 74,415, of whom 36,235 are considered to be French Canadians. I do not know the exact relationship which the English-speaking population bears to the French-speaking population of the province of Quebec, but when the figures indicates that slightly over one-half of the enlistments in Quebec are from the English-speaking minority, it surely does not do credit to our French-Canadian compatriots.

There must, of course, be a cause for this. Looking at the individual qualities of the French-Canadians, the cause cannot be found there, so that it must be in the leadership which they have been receiving and to which they have been subjected for the last twenty-five years. On February 5 when I had the privilege of speaking on the plebiscite, I had no hesitation in committing myself to the principle of the conscription of wealth, industry and man-power for service wherever those materials or that man-power could be most effectively used. To-day, however, we have seen the result of the plebiscite vote; and we find that the Prime Minister is still counting noses and determining the course of action that will be followed according to his count. The Prime Minister endeavoured to tell the house that the plebiscite was not a vote "yes" or "no" on the question of conscription for overseas. However, in discussing this simple amendment now before the house the Prime Minister has asked that we include the discussion of the whole principle of conscription. The two are utterly indivisible, and so they were in the minds of the people on April 27. That vote undoubtedly was a vote either for or against conscription, and we know how the people of this country expressed their will at that time.

An analysis of the vote on the plebiscite reveals that the leadership which Canada has received from the Liberal party has not been the leadership which is required when we are fighting for our survival. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Whitman), speaking last night, referred to the fact that there was no one who could replace the Prime Minister of this country, certainly no one in the ranks of the official opposition. Be that as it may—and we may have different opinions on that question—certainly so far as representing the will of the people is concerned there can be no question that the Conservative party to-day stands for the will of the people in a way that the Liberal party does not. I do not suppose, sir, that ever before in the history of the world has any nation been faced with national peril, even the possibility of extinction, and at the same time suffered a government so lacking in leadership and in preparation for defence, as has Canada. Nothing better exemplifies this lack of leadership than an analysis of the result of the plebiscite vote on April 27. Of the 245 constituencies across Canada, 182 returned a "yes" vote and 63 a "no" vote. No constituency represented by a Conservative member returned a "no" vote. All the constituencies which voted "no" were represented by members of the government party, which government with all its strength advocated a "yes" vote. But its sudden conversion and realization of the necessities in regard to Canada was too late to be of avail. In making a belated appeal to the highest sentiments of both national honour and self-preservation the Prime Minister indicated in no uncertain terms what he believed and knew to be in the best interests of the people; and the response to that appeal is an indication of how these sentiments of honour and self-preservation were considered in various parts of the country. The record, therefore, shows that of 185 Liberal constituencies, 63, or more than one-third, voted "no". In the province of Quebec, where 64 of the 65 seats are represented by Liberals, 57 constituencies voted "no", including three represented by ministers of the crown. What retribution for the false political leadership which the Liberal party has given that province for over twenty-five years!

Now the Quebec Liberals refer to the bargain, the contract, the promise which allegedly was made at the time of the declaration of war in 1939, at the time of the Quebec provincial election and again at the time of the general election in 1940. Did the Prime Minister authorize the making of a bargain with French Canada to the effect that Canada would wage only a free, moderate and voluntary war? And did he do that at the same time he was telling the rest of Canada that we were waging total war? It is little wonder that to-day the Liberals in French Canada have no trust in the word of the Liberal party. Knowing the intentions of Germany, as they were known to everyone after the invasion of Poland, how could the Prime Minister have believed that the democratic world was not faced with the greatest struggle for its existence that it had ever known? Having watched the course of international events, the seizure of Austria, the Munich agreement and the violation of Czechoslovakia; having personally visited Hitler in Berlin and seen how Germany had been waging a total but undeclared war for five years prior to the firing of the first shot, how could the Prime Minister not realize that we were faced with the bitterest and most sacrifice-compelling struggle of all time? But what do we find? In his opening campaign speech over the radio he said to the people of Canada that a national government would bring about conscription. Well do I remember when those fateful words were uttered. As one who had tried to keep abreast of international developments and to understand their significance, my heart sank within me that anyone, for base purposes, political purposes, would trifle in this manner with the destiny of our nation.

The most immature politician knew that the people of Canada, after two decades of peace talk and of pacifism, were not prepared to accept in those days, when the false security of the Maginot line was uppermost in their minds, the bitter necessity of conscription. There was always the hope that economic strangulation of Germany might bring about an early termination of the war. Nor am I proud of the record of other political parties in regard to the issue of conscription, which issue was forced upon them by the Prime Minister.

Let me continue, sir, with an analysis of the plebiscite and the effect on the national spirit where Liberalism prevailed.

In the province of Ontario, out of 84 seats only 2 voted "no"; these two constituencies were represented by Liberals. As regards the Ontario constituencies of Cochrane and Nipissing, we find, in the first one, 15,536 "yes" votes and 11,730 "no" votes, and in Nipissing 22,252 "yes" and 17,468 "no" votes. Only by a slight margin did they come into the "yes" bracket. We find that the province as a whole voted 84 per cent "yes". In Hamilton West, represented by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), we find a vote of 21,531 for and 3,937 against. Compare this with the constituency of Lincoln, represented by a Conservative, and similar in many ways to the other; there the vote was 23,702 for and 2,771 against. Take two other constituencies which are closely parallel and represented respectively by a Liberal and a Conservative. Waterloo North, represented by a Liberal, gave 13,077 "yes" votes, 7,055 "no" votes; Waterloo South, represented by a Conservative, 13,297 "yes" votes, 2,334 "no" votes—about the same number of "yes" votes but less than one-third the number of "no" votes.

I go across the country to Manitoba and point to the "yes" votes recorded in the Conservative constituency of Souris—8,046 "yes" to 479 "no"; the second highest percentage in Canada, as compared with that represented by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), with 8,829 "yes" against 1,870 "no" votes. Contrast either of these with that of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson): 11,873 "yes" to 5,860 "no". Truly, Mr. Speaker, leadership counts in this country.

Then we go on to Saskatchewan. There we find that Lake Centre, so ably represented in this house by a Conservative, polled 8,673 "yes" votes to 2,165 "no"; while in the constituency of Melville, represented by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the voting was 8,599 "yes" and 6,470 "no". About the same number voted "yes", but three times as many voted "no" as in the other constituency to which I have referred, in the same province. Then we find at Prince Albert, represented by the Prime Minister, 9,884 "yes", 3,195 "no"; Saskatoon City, represented by a Conservative, 16,710 "yes", 2,074 "no". In an area adjacent to Saskatoon City, that of Rosthern, represented by a Liberal, we find 3,527 "yes" and 3,988 "no"—the only constituency in Saskatchewan failing to come under the "yes" banner.

In British Columbia we find the same thing. In Vancouver Centre, represented by the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), the result was, 21,961 "yes" and 4,922 "no", whereas in Vancouver South, so ably represented in this house by a Conservative, there were 31,986 "yes" against 4,680 "no"—about the same number of "no" votes in both constituencies, but the Conservative member polled 10,000 more "yes" votes.

It is the same story from one end of the country to the other, and nothing is more indicative of the lead which a party or a member can give to the people than is the vote on the plebiscite.

Let me take the results in my own city of Toronto. There the same tendency is shown. The highest "yes" vote in that city, as well as in the whole of Canada was recorded in the riding of Eglinton, represented by a Liberal, but by a Liberal, as we found out last evening, to the chagrin of every right-thinking member of this house, who has found it necessary, on this nation-saving principle of conscription, to differ from a government which refuses to give voice to the will of the great majority of the people. He has given a leadership equal to that which has been forthcoming from Conservative members who refuse to put party before principle. The constituency of Eglinton adjoins on the north my own constituency, and in the north end of that constituency, I am glad to report, there was at least one polling subdivision where not a single "no" vote was recorded.

The other two ridings in the city of Toronto which are represented by Liberal members are Trinity and Spadina. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) made a speech in this house on the plebiscite which was the most perfect example of mugwumpery that I have ever seen. It was in two parts, one being a high-class exposition of the merits of conscription, and the other an equally high-class exposition of the merits of the continuance of the voluntary system. The people of Trinity, however, returned a vote of 90 per cent in favour of the affirmative. The hon. member has seen fit to be led by rather than to lead his people. How typical of the whole attitude of the Liberal administration. As a result of such leadership, Trinity and the neighbouring riding of Spadina returned the two lowest "yes" votes in the great city of Toronto.

Although apparently the need is still great, time does not permit me to appeal to some quarters of this house on the reasons why we are at war and what we have at stake. With the enemy knocking at the gates, there is time only for action. As I said in the plebiscite debate on February 5, 1942, the Prime Minister and the other ministers of the cabinet failed, without even trying, to inform the people of Quebec of the true issues at stake in this struggle for survival, and the effect on them personally should we not carry the war to a successful conclusion.

Why are the ministers of the crown not telling the people of Quebec what the issues are and what defeat will mean to every one of us? I do not think this government has failed in any more signal instance than in its refusal, its complete failure, to tell the people of Quebec just what are the issues at stake—just as the hon. member who preceded me made a perfectly splendid case not only for Quebec but for the war, and then went on to show that the war is still not Canada's war, and that we are better off in building up an army to defend ourselves on the shores of Canada. I could quote a memorable passage from a speech of the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin) to the effect that we cannot possibly defend ourselves on the shores of Canada against an enemy if that enemy breaks through the line either in Great Britain or on the Pacific.

The leadership which the Prime Minister has given has been far short of what the people as a whole expected. Certain elements in the community have been appeased by the result of the government's incredibly slow and unrealistic policy which has brought about a feeling of complacency and dampened the ardour even of the most loyal and patriotic citizens. This slowness of action and the policy of playing for time recalls one of Pope's great verses, which I shall quote with the substitution of one word:

> Complacency is a monster of so frightful mien,
> As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
> Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
> We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

On the other hand, the Conservative party has not only given leadership to the people but it has not hesitated to advise its supporters, as well as all the people of Canada, in connection with what it believes and knows to be in their best interests, no matter what the sacrifice may be. And the Conservative party does this, not on a single occasion when the enemy is already knocking at the gate, but even when the enemy is far off and there is still time to protect our country with a minimum of loss and full assurance of victory.

I wish to draw attention to the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), who said that Canadians of French origin had to think out the reasons why they should support this war by fighting the enemy wherever the enemy was to be found, whereas Canadians of British origin rose spontaneously to the aid of Great Britain. In support of his argument he quoted an editorial which contained the following reference to the Prime Minister:

> If he had tried to keep this country out of a war in which the safety of Britain was at stake he would have been swept out of office by a tide of anger which neither he nor his government could have withstood.

He quoted that editorial as being descriptive and typical of the mood and thought of English-speaking Canadians. Without considering the time, September 10, 1939, the events leading up to the declaration of this war, the attempts of Great Britain to keep the peace of the world, and the well-recognized German aim of world domination with its herrenvolk, second class peoples and bartered slaves, his deduction would be quite correct. In the light of the surrounding circumstances, however, his deduction is wholly unwarranted.

Well I remember returning from a tour of Great Britain in 1937 with the reflection that in that country there was too much champagne at the top and not enough milk at the bottom, a condition which is happily being rectified. English-speaking Canadians have had no concern with British expeditions in Waziristan and elsewhere where it was necessary to suppress foreign-inspired and foreign-supported wars against Britain's far-flung possessions. This world war, in contrast, is a war for our survival and the survival of our children. A little later in the same speech the Minister of Justice recited how the French-speaking Canadians had on more than one occasion helped to save Canada from outside aggression. At the same time he pointed out how in 1849 a group of Montreal merchants showed so little loyalty to Britain that, when that country withdrew a preference on Canadian wheat and butter, they signed a petition for annexation to the United States. Almost in the same breath he speaks of the strength of the blood attachment of the English-speaking Canadians to Great Britain and then points out that such sentiment does not exist where there are economic interests at stake. Of course, there is an attachment to Great Britain, because Great Britain has in the modern world been the mother of democracy, the mother of parliaments, and the protector of the small nations and minorities. But no one has given a better demonstration than he of the fact that English-speaking Canadians fight not only for their economic welfare but for their right of survival as a free nation.

The ministers of the crown in the debate on this bill have given us a series of speeches on the subject of conscription for overseas service which are utterly confusing. Some argue against the very principle of conscription while we already have conscription of wealth, industry and man-power for everything except overseas service. There is no uniformity of opinion or of sentiment in the administration of this land. While the outcome of the vote on this matter is not in question, the time of the implementation of conscription for service wherever the enemy is to be found is still in the lap of the gods, as long as the Prime Minister refuses to heed the will of the people and prefers to play politics, always in the hope that time will be in his favour. Time and our preparations for survival are fast running out.

I wish to draw particular attention to the statements of one of the ministers of the crown, as well as of several private Liberal members, all of whom are in their hearts right-thinking individuals, but endeavour to excuse their lack of forthright attitude by arguing that a voluntary army is better than a conscript army, and by pointing out that the volunteers who were serving in the front line in the last war did not look with favour upon the conscript reinforcements. Do they not know that before this war is over, every available man who can be spared will be required to fight the enemy? By their own reasoning, therefore, is it not far better that Canada have one army of soldiers who are selected because of their fitness, rather than two armies, one of volunteers and one of conscripts? The sooner Canada gets away from this invidious distinction the sooner the difference which they themselves brought up will disappear in its entirety. Let us do as the United States does and have universal selective service, where every man and woman will be told to serve in the field, in the factory, or in the forces, according to his or her ability to best serve his or her own country.

The Prime Minister has said that the Canadian army overseas, composed entirely of volunteers, is the finest fighting force in the world. I hope it is, for there are no finer fighting men on the face of the globe, but can we yet say that it is superior to the British or American armies, where the men are selected by a just and equitable law? The Prime Minister's statement is an affront to the American nation, which is a true democracy, the people of which believe in the elementary principles of justice and equality. I have not heard the point raised in the present debate, but any member who does not believe in the principle of selective service might ask himself whom he is endeavouring to protect. Is he protecting those who have already volunteered to keep the enemy away from our shores, and who, when the fighting starts, will require reinforcements unless they are to bear the brunt of the battle without rest and without relief? Or is he, on the other hand, seeking to protect those who do not feel the call of duty to protect themselves, their parents, their brothers and their sisters; those young men who are content that others should die that they may live? When such a question arises I thank God that my heart and my head both cry out for justice and equality. This inequality is not confined to any one section of our country. It exists in greater or less degree in all parts, and for various reasons. But to-day there is one reason for compulsory selective service which dwarfs all others, and that is the preservation of our nation from a vicious and so far victorious enemy. Inequality is the greatest cause of disunity.

Where there is a difference of opinion, everything must be done to bring about an understanding of the different points of view. But there are some principles and some laws which do not admit of compromise, and one of these is the law of self-preservation. As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) stated, "We can pay too high a price for national unity." I think he might have added that if we must choose between having a nation or national unity, we must choose to preserve the nation.

I should like to ask the following questions, which I have asked before but to which I have received no answers. What does the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), from whom we hear so much, report now as the present opinion "of the entire rural population, where there exists a strong sentiment in favour of annexation to the United States, or at least of a formal alliance with our powerful neighbours?" That was his statement to this house on June 18, 1940. Are his constituents who were willing to join the United States willing to be led by their laws now, just as are the million or more French Canadians in the New England states?

And I wonder what is the opinion of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), who stated on the same day, "Why not continue with our voluntary participation and wait at least until the United States enacts conscription of men?" He was then taking shelter under the Monroe doctrine. Is he now willing to fight for it? It is only in the province of Quebec that one hears the expression "national unity". Elsewhere it is accepted as a fact.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the rule against reading speeches. The hon. member is reading his speech, and I would ask him to refrain.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am glad, Mr. Speaker, that you drew my attention to the rule, because we find that the ministers read their speeches in the house, and it is a very bad example for private members.

There is no one who strives more heartily than I do for the principle of national unity. I believe that those who raise contentions against it do not have that principle at heart as much as I have myself. Certain members who raise this question would do much to destroy national unity; they exercise an influence out of all proportion to their true worth in this house, and members of their party, all of them being on the government side, do little or nothing to offset the influence which their contentions exert.

If there is one thing which the debate on this amendment to Bill No. 80 has brought out, it is this: It has given the lie once and for all to the contention that it was because of the Military Service Act of 1917 and the method of its enforcement that conscription to-day is a subject abhorred by the French Canadians. The French Canadians are now represented in the government party to the extent of sixty-four out of their sixty-five seats. It is their own Liberal ministers who have the enforcement of conscription if this bill passes, and yet we find on their part the same reluctance and the same complete lack of confidence which they claimed followed from the policy of the Union government in 1917 with respect to the enforcement of the Military Service Act. The fact is that the French Canadians as a whole have so far been against conscription and are unwilling to have it, no matter which party, no matter whether a national government or a union government, brings it into being. The reason for that, of course, is that they are willing to fight for their country once they realize the necessity of doing so. Once they come to the belief that the war overseas or the war in the Pacific is about to approach Canada, or that if we fail there it will approach Canada, then they are quite willing to have conscription. But surely they must know that if we do not stop the enemy abroad we cannot stop him on the shores of Canada.

Let everyone in every part of this great partnership, this great Dominion of Canada, go forward hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder to face the common aggressor. Let no one falter or fail. Let each strive who can do the most, not who can do the least. We owe it to others that the road is still open. Let us with honour keep that road open and defend it with our united might, so that no enemy, east or west, shall traverse it to devastate our land and our homes.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, we are nearing the close of the debate on the bill to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act. There can be no doubt about my supporting the bill. The problem of man-power will then pass from parliament to the cabinet. My remarks to-day will be directed, sir, specifically to what in my opinion should be done after the act is amended.

I wish to assure the house that my argument in every particular will give the strongest possible support to a programme of action for immediate maximum preparations to destroy the enemy where he is, in Europe and elsewhere, before he can reach our shores.

Some persons look to the past for direction, some have confidence in the methods of the present, while others feel that we should try to redouble our efforts in anticipation of a situation that will become more desperate in the future. I shall consider, briefly, the past and the present, but in the main my remarks will be directed to our policies for strengthening our war effort in the future.

The past. Some look to the past for excuses, some for inspiration. Here, at this time, we find the no-releasers. They say the government is bound, and by their votes it will continue to be bound.

The present. Here we find the reservationists. They will support compulsory service should the necessity arise. They give reasons for delay. One is that Australia voted against compulsory service in the last war. But Australia then had Japan as an ally and France as a formidable ally. To-day our two most powerful allies, Great Britain and the United States, have compulsory service. The reservationists say that men who are called up for service may not make good soldiers. Does anyone ever question the valour of the soldiers of John Bull and Uncle Sam, of Tommy Atkins and the Doughboys? What is the attitude of the Canadian Legion towards military service?

These are the men who served voluntarily in the last war. Do they fear that Canadians called up for service will falter? Surely not, when they passed resolutions at Winnipeg and at Drummondville, Quebec, demanding conscription of money, materials and manpower.

The future. I come back to the reservation respecting compulsory selective service to be resorted to only when the necessity arises. These very words presuppose a situation more critical than the situation we are facing to-day. These words carry the implication that when the war situation is more hazardous, more terrible, then we will do more. Let me urge, let me implore, that whatever more we can do we do to-day while yet there is opportunity. Could the situation be ever more critical for Canada than it is to-day, unless the enemy landed on the British isles and the whole world, not excepting this continent, was overrun by the axis powers? Then we would be throttled and strangled commercially into serfdom.

The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) is right in saying that our only safe line of defence is the English channel. Let us be realists in this dire situation. Let us do to-day what in utter defeat we would do if we still had the opportunity. Let not the day come when in the agony of regrets we may cry, "Alas, too late!"

This brings me to the question: what more can we do? The first step should be to eliminate internal diplomacy. That is cabinet responsibility, and I fear that too often the cabinet refuses to listen to the voice of parliament and to the urgings of the majority of the people. Internal diplomacy dampens the fighting spirit of our ministers of defence for army, navy and air. Nor is it approved by others of our aggressive ministers. They are frustrated in places by the waiting policy —"We will do more when the necessity arises."

My constituents are expecting to-day in their government the courage and determination of Marshal Foch when at the Marne in 1918 he said, "My centre is giving way; my right is pushed back. Excellent! I will attack." Are we blind to our fate if the English channel is lost? Can we not be a unit, exerting all our strength right now to stop the Hun where he is? Shall we risk further the destruction, the rapings, the wholesale murders of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, France, and in turn on to Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario and the west?

The blessings of freedom were precious to those peoples. Shall we turn a deaf ear to them and pray that through some miracle we may be permitted to exist in isolation? I have referred to Poland. What about that desolate land? What is the appeal of their leaders who still survive and struggle in exile, as represented by the Polish national council in London, England, of which the chairman is Professor Stanislav Grabski? It can well be recorded in a motion tabled recently in the British House of Commons. I quote:

> German atrocities in Poland—that this house, having learned with indignation and horror that during the occupation of Poland the authorities of Hitlerite Germany have, for no crime other than that of being Poles, officially executed more than 140,000 men and women, tortured many more in prison and concentration camps, deported 1,500,000 to slave labour in Germany, robbed more than 2,000,000 in the western provinces of all they possessed before expelling them to central Poland, thus in every way outraging both international law and the laws of humanity itself, expresses to the Polish people its heartfelt admiration for their inspiring example of continuous and unflinching fortitude, protests in the name of civilization the policy of deliberate extermination of the Polish people, and pledges its word to heroic Poland that her sacrifices will not be in vain and that due retribution for all these crimes will unfailingly be exacted.

The plight of the Polish people will, I am sure, enlist a similar response in this part of Canada. Knowledge of such heartrending conditions ought to sink into the consciousness of any here who would falter, and strengthen their determination to assist the people of that persecuted nation.

Democracy entrusts government to parliament, and parliament delegates administration to the cabinet. There the curtain is drawn, and we know not of the cooperation, the domination and the diplomacy. What we do know is that tens of thousands of civilians have been brought to Ottawa for all manner of service in capacities administrative, expert and clerical. It ought not to be an offence to say that the hugeness of some departments makes it utterly impossible for the minister or his deputy to become aware of any weak spots with anything like the speed that war demands. It ought not to be an offence to say that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is so burdened with responsibilities in a large way that he cannot possibly check on the many things that disturb our people and undermine their morale. If ever there was a time for Canada to follow the time-tested practice of the British parliament in creating parliamentary secretaryships, surely it is now when this nation is in peril.

The Prime Minister in 1936 proposed adopting this system, but apparently one or two of his ministers of the day dissuaded him against his will. He will meet similar opposition to-day from at least one of his ministers who undoubtedly needs such assistance. I do not propose to argue the point further, except to say that there is growing discontent among private members that the service of more members is not utilized to a greater extent, at least in order to ferret out inefficiency.

The army is being made the subject of attack just now. The outstanding minister and his capable deputy must shoulder the blame, if any. In passing, may I comment on the notable efficiency of the minister's secretary. I urge upon the minister that as a war measure he take steps immediately to get the help of two parliamentary secretaries, one for Ottawa and one with freedom to visit anywhere. There needs to be some uprooting of the armouries' officialdom of peace days. This is no social picnic; we are at war.

It has been my privilege to serve on the war expenditures committee. We had before us as witnesses some dynamic men; we had others who are wrongly placed in the service. When this committee was set up again this session the various opposition parties stressed that the committee and its successors should sit continuously for the duration. They sat for a few weeks last year and then adjourned, against the better judgment of some of the members. The same course appears to be in prospect for this year. The committee is divided into three subcommittees. One of the subcommittees effected savings of several million dollars as a matter of ordinary business adjustment. The entire cost for the whole committee was $17,713.46. In my opinion the committee should take up continuous work when parliament adjourns, and remain at it until the opening of the next session of parliament. The work has been barely scratched.

I have been offering suggestions for improving our war effort. My suggestions and criticisms have been given merely as examples. Suggestions to some extent carry the flavour of criticism. I have spoken with restraint in order not to injure the war effort in any way. The task of the government to-day is so tremendous that errors and shortcomings on the part of individuals are inevitable. It is utterly impossible for the Prime Minister to pass upon or even have knowledge of many things that are done or left undone. That is why I feel strongly that the cabinet should recede from the seemingly immovable stand they have taken, and delegate some greater responsibility to hon. members who are elected by the people and who must answer to the people. I hope the Prime Minister will pay heed to the admonitions of private members and thereby obviate the necessity for more plain speaking and hurt feelings or worse.

It would be unfair for me, in my desire to help our war effort, to overlook the bright side of the picture. Canada has a record of achievement in many fields of which we all should be and are exceedingly proud. Some critics are ignoring this and doing very great damage. Our Prime Minister and all his cabinet have planned and worked unceasingly during these critical years. It is amazing how well they have stood up under the terrific strain. We are deeply grateful that the Prime Minister appears to be in such good health at present. We realize to-day more than ever before the value of his leadership in pre-war days in knitting together the English-speaking nations for the preservation of civil and religious freedom. History will accord to our present Prime Minister a high place among world statesmen who have striven to promote peace and good-will among nations.

I have already paid tribute to our three ministers of national defence. May I be permitted to single out one or two other ministers for much merited praise. Our Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has given a demonstration of accomplishments possible only through a combination of high qualities. His pioneering in controls has become the example for similar action in the United States. Our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) surely was born and trained for the great undertaking which is his responsibility. Who will say he has any superior anywhere for his great work? I pay tribute to his administrators, his technicians and his great, loyal organization.

I pay tribute also to the men and women of the war industries, whose skill I have seen in many factories. He who would belittle our war effort needs only go through one of our great war industries to be convinced of the amazing contributions Canada is making. The same applies to agriculture, with its phenomenal increases in the production of bacon, cheese and foodstuffs generally.

A few minutes ago I said that internal diplomacy dampens the fighting spirit of our ministers of national defence for army, navy and air. I said that the consideration should not be and must not be, "we will do more when the necessity arises"; it should and must be, "we will do immediately all that can be done."

The question is, what more can we do? Surely it will not be sufficient to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act and then dismiss parliament, possibly until 1943. Something more is needed to uplift the morale of the people. If reverses continue, the people's confidence in eighteen ministers who are waiting for the necessity to do more will be shattered. What may have been sufficient in administration before the war cannot be regarded as sufficient for the present herculean ordeal. As a humble member of this parliament I appeal to the Prime Minister to replace his proneness to overcaution by a policy of greater boldness and greater trust in the people whom we represent. Scarcely a week passes without an election being called by Prime Minister Churchill. We would be better with frequent by-elections in Canada. Many elections are needed now in connection with a dozen or more vacancies in the other house, and to bring new and more persons into the administrative circles of government. The country will welcome some assurances in this regard. The other house should be used or disbanded. There are highly qualified and experienced men in that house who should be given an opportunity to render service to Canada. We are paying them and letting them die of dry rot.

This is a programme that I lay on the conscience of every cabinet minister. The only alternative, in my estimation, is that parliament do now prorogue to be called in extra session in September. I beseech the Prime Minister that extraordinary measures be taken for the greater assurance of the men and women of Canada who trust him, who pray for him, and who feel that, with the billions being expended, there should be a broadening and strengthening in administration.

I must now commence to shape my remarks toward a conclusion. I have spoken frankly my views as to the inadequacy of our administration respecting the volume of detailed responsibility during this crisis. I am much concerned about future days and what I have chosen to describe as internal diplomacy. Make no mistake about it; Canada will be saved only by the men behind the guns, shooting outside Canada, on the warships, in the bombers and fighters, and with the shock troops.

Shall we place limits on our gratitude to Greece for her heroic delaying action? Shall we place limits on our efforts to bring relief to Russia before she is crushed? These nations and many others have become martyrs for our freedom. We draft men for service in Canada and territorial waters; shall it be said that we limited our compulsory service to the last area, where we hoped there would never be any fighting? No; that spirit can never win on the fighting fronts, nor can it maintain respect for Canada among free nations if freedom survives. Moreover, it will be heartbreaking to our brave men on the fighting fronts.

Maximum strength in this war is our imperative duty to ourselves and to our allies. That maximum strength may well be the strength of eight provinces united, rather than of nine provinces with reservations. Is Canada to be in the position of saying to the nations who are defending us all round the world, "We cannot send more men until they volunteer to go, but we will sell you food and guns and bombers and ships." Or shall we, as a soldier said to me in a smoking-car, "use the sneaking way of pressing the lads to go active?"

Russian women are shouldering guns to destroy the enemy, whose plans call for our destruction in order that he may possess our fair land. The Prime Minister, the Minister of National Defence and others have emphasized that the matter of compulsory service for overseas has been magnified beyond its real importance. I agree that it represents but a fraction of the great contribution Canada is making in this war; but it has been seized upon by some as a focal point for attack upon the government in a way that reflects upon Canada's whole war effort. The ill effects of this criticism have spread to the United States. Editorials are being published in that country, one of which I have in my hand which appeared in the Arizona Daily Star of Tucson, Arizona, and which constitutes an undesirable reflection upon Canada as a whole and upon one of our provinces in particular. This ought not to be. Our airmen, our sailors, our soldiers, and the men and women of all services created a great and glorious record for Canada long before our great neighbour and ally came into the war. But we must guard against any recession from the high place we have earned in the eyes of the world.

My original plan in preparing this speech contemplated concluding at about this point, but happenings of recent days impel me to emphasize a suggestion I have already made. Some days ago a lady wrote me protesting against certain expenditures for advertising. I replied, giving the best explanation I could obtain from the department concerned. The lady wrote me again, and I will quote one paragraph of her letter:

> I appreciate your courtesy in replying to my letter, but your explanation left me cold. All the more so after Mr. McLean's exposure of a day or so ago. Is there no way of ending this sort of thing which I feel, during war time, is absolutely criminal.

This brings me again to my suggestion that parliamentary secretaries should be appointed, at least during war time. A similar plea was made by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) in a speech in this house on February 12, 1942, after his visit to the British isles a few months earlier. As reported at page 539 of Hansard the hon. gentleman said:

I was in Mr. Herbert Morrison's room, and there was with him a young gentleman, a member of the house, whom he introduced as his private secretary. Mr. Morrison turned to him at times for verification of certain figures, and this young gentleman was very helpful. I said to Mr. Morrison, "I don't suppose you could carry on without your private secretary." He answered, "Carry on? I could not possibly. I have three private secretaries, and with them I find it difficult to do all the work I have to do."

Then let me quote one paragraph from the speech of the hon. member for Simcoe East (Mr. McLean), in this house on July 2, 1942, as reported at page 3872 of Hansard:

I suggest that in this one comparatively small department of which I am speaking, $150,000 a year would be a very, very conservative estimate of what could be saved if we exercised the same care in the supervision of the work of this branch that any member would exercise in his own private business.

This saving in one department alone would more than pay all added costs in connection with the necessary parliamentary secretaries. But seemingly the protests of hon. members are to be of no avail, nor have they been under previous governments. There is no existing legislation providing for the appointment of parliamentary secretaries, but I suggest that, if the government so desired, the authority could be obtained before this parliament adjourns. Or, I repeat, are we to adjourn in a few days, possibly until 1943, without any strengthening of the administration? The time of some key ministers is so occupied with details, to their distraction from major planning, that they are unable to take long range views and make preparations to keep the enemy from shooting us down on our very doorsteps. Should there not be ministers without portfolio, who would be free to substitute for ministers who might be absent through illness, or on government business, possibly outside Canada? What is the situation to-day in two departments, namely those of transport and public works? We all regret that the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin), who occupied the two portfolios, was seriously ill for several months. Some months ago the deputy minister of public works died, and as yet no permanent appointment has been made. All this has occurred during a period of much needed, rush construction for war purposes. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) is the Acting Minister of Public Works. The vacant position of Minister of Transport is placed on the overburdened Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). Why should all this be, during a period when ministers are so hard driven? Why should the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) have had to become Minister of National War Services for many months while this important department was being organized? Why do we continue to add to the tens of thousands of civilian employees and minimize supervision by the elected representatives of the people?

Mr. Speaker, the need for compulsory selective service for overseas is not chiefly or solely for men for our fighting forces overseas; it is for the highest efficiency anywhere and everywhere. Ernest Bevin said, "We can recreate wealth but we cannot recreate liberty". If we place reservations on our assistance to the allies now, how can we expect them to do otherwise with us should the enemy reach our shores?

The constituency which I have the honour to represent bears the historic name of Wellington. We voted 90 per cent "yes" in the plebiscite. In the matter of enlistment we are standing united for total war, regardless of ancestry or religion. I must hold high the torch thrown to us by the men who fought in the last war. I must see that we do not fail or falter in the support of the men who have fallen in this war and others who are now pledged, if needs be until death, that liberty and justice shall not perish from the earth.

Mr. J. A. BLANCHETTE (Compton): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, the first of July, this country celebrated the three-score and fifteenth year anniversary of the founding of its federal union. It was only fitting that we should have done this in times of crisis, as it is always proper that we do so also in ordinary times. It is fitting and proper that the reverence due our forefathers for this confederation act should be reflected not only in our words but, even more, in our thoughts and actions.

Shall the confederation of 1867 remain, what it was intended to be by our forefathers, a federated union of all Canada? Shall the confederation of Canada be preserved and revered as it has been in the past? Shall confederation continue to be the modus vivendi of the citizens of this great dominion? The answer, Mr. Speaker, remains with each and every one of us, depending upon the stand we take whenever questions of importance, such as the present bill, shall come before us.

There is not an hon. member or a Canadian worthy of the name who does not believe and wish that Canada and the allied nations shall achieve victory. Being all agreed upon the aim we have in view, the division or difficulty, at least as I see it, is rather one of means.

It seems to me that, if national unity in time of peace is not only necessary but indispensable, as I believe it is, in time of war it should not be thrown to the four winds in the presence of an immediate danger or of such calamities as the present war has brought to our very doors. On the contrary, I maintain that the greater the danger, the more unity should be enhanced, for it is in danger that fortitude and strength are needed and should be marshalled; and, just as force is the result of a series of weaknesses joined together, likewise as a corollary is weakness the resultant of disunited forces of strength.

Had I not had occasion to express my views oftentimes on the floor of this chamber on the subject of conscription, I would deal perhaps more lengthily with it at present. I will, however, content myself with merely summarizing the reasons which I mentioned on September 8, 1939, while having the honour of seconding the address in reply to the speech from the throne on that occasion, reasons which I reiterated on February 16 last on the floor of this house.

I have been opposed to conscription in the past, just as I am to-day, because I do not believe that it is conducive to Canadian unity, because it proved almost a failure during the last war, and because present enlistments show that it is not needed at this time. In making my assertions in opposition to conscription, I feel that I am in rather good company, since, of the ministers who have spoken thus far, the large majority have expressed themselves as being of the opinion that conscription is not at present necessary; some of them, and not the least of the members of the government, going so far as to say that it may never be necessary.

That conscription is subversive of our national unity I shall not labour lengthily to prove. We have had most positive proof of this in this very house since the debate began, just as we have had all the testimonials for which one could wish from the press of the country. If conscription is proposed at the present time, be it by this or any other government, a total war effort in its true sense will be but vain words, a thing of the past, an effort which we possessed and which we threw to the four winds, a mirage which we may always see before us, but which, try as we may, we shall not attain.

The charge is sometimes made that Quebec wishes to dictate to the rest of the country by the attitude which it has taken on the plebiscite, in giving a majority "no" on that question. Quebec does not wish to dominate the rest of the country any more than Ontario or some of the other provinces did when they refused to consider the findings of the Rowell commission when all the provinces gathered together here in Ottawa a few months ago to discuss this important matter. Ontario, through her leaders, signified her opposition to this report. I do not believe anyone could have justly accused Ontario of wishing to dictate to the rest of Canada. In like manner, I do not think it can be truly said that Quebec by voting "no" wishes to dominate the rest of Canada. It is true that the holding of the plebiscite cost a lot of money, but likewise the Rowell commission cost an enormous sum of money. There is this distinction. Whereas in Ontario the "no" in connection with the Rowell commission was given by the leaders, in Quebec the "no" was given by the people themselves.

When the framers of confederation established English and French as the official languages of the Dominion of Canada, it was a great step toward national unity. Since 1867 this fact has played no small part in contributing toward national unity. A few days ago I had occasion to attend the graduation exercises at a French institution in Ottawa, and it was with great satisfaction that I heard the announcement made that La Société St-Jean-Baptiste had put up a prize for the student of that institution who had shown the greatest progress in the study of English during the year. That was a contribution toward national unity. On June 22, 23 and 24 last there was held in Montreal in the Sun Life auditorium a conference of different groups which put on a programme under the title of "Pull together, Canada." This was a complete success, and at the end of the conference all the actors, who were Anglo-Saxons, came before the curtain and sang "O Canada" in perfect French. The audience rose at the first note and properly stood at attention. That also was a step toward national unity. Trivial things, trivial tsetimonials you may say, but was it not Daniel Webster who stated so correctly:

> Great events happen seldom, and affect few; trifles happen every moment to everybody; and though one occurrence of them adds little to the misery or happiness of life, yet the sum total of their continual repetition is of the highest consequence.

Did not another author ably and truly state:

Think naught a trifle, though it small appear;
Small sands the mountain, moments make the year.

And trifles, life. We have, and rightly so, certain weeks of the calendar devoted to certain purposes, such as victory loan week, Red Cross week and, recently, army week. All of these are most efficacious in bringing about a certain awakening of our efforts in a given direction, and help to intensify our war effort. At times I ask myself whether it would not be advantageous to the unity of the country for us to set aside a national unity week, when efforts could be made to cement more closely the unity of the country and to destroy the agencies of disunity which are gnawing at our existence. During this proposed week of national unity programmes and functions could be arranged which would perhaps help greatly to bring about a better understanding. Perhaps a golf game could be arranged with the editor of the Globe and Mail and the editor of Le Devoir of Montreal on the one side, and the president of La Société St-Jean-Baptiste and the grand master of the Orangemen on the other. I feel certain that once such a contact was established and continued, there would result a better understanding and a greater tolerance of one another's views upon national questions, whether they be political, racial or religious.

As I see it, national unity can exist only if there is perfect harmony between the natural and historic rights of one group and the political rights of the other group. Rights, duties and obligations are not necessarily dependent upon a majority-minority norm, unless we have a leaning toward nazi philosophy. These same rights, duties and obligations are based upon the more sacred law of justice. Let there be equal rights for the co-partners who have made this nation, equal rights in language, in the benefits and advantages of confederation in all its spheres and domains. This must be predicated upon the logical deduction of equal rights and sacrifices. As Mr. Leslie Roberts has so truly said:

Canada has not been truly represented as to whether she is fighting this war as a British colony or as one of the united nations, and it is the continuing element of colonialism in Canada's war effort, real or apparent, that is causing so much trouble.

Frank R. Scott, commenting upon this attitude, states:

We have not made up our minds to be an independent nation in world affairs and consequently everything we do looks as though it were done for somebody else and not for ourselves. We have failed even to provide ourselves with the symbols of nationhood. Service across the Atlantic represents the imperialist time and looks like defence of the British empire rather than the defence of Canada or Canadian interests. Who will decide the use of Canadian troops overseas? Who will decide when they are to go and where they are to go? These questions touch the realities of the problem in Quebec. The more Canada insists on having a voice of her own in the joint allied councils, the more she gets away from the old military tradition that her part is just to offer troops for Britain to use where Britain wants them, the easier it will be to bridge the gulf between Quebec and the other provinces. This is not a new issue in Canada; it dates from 1763. All that Quebec means by the "no" vote is that she does not wish her children to die for any country other than their own. This is nothing very startling.

We have throughout the world, in many countries, many who desire the realization of Tennyson's dream of "the parliament of man, the federation of the world". This is a highly altruistic view to take, and would that it could be realized. Any system or plan that may be formulated, however, either as a world plan or as one for our own country, which does not take account of the historic, cultural and political differences of people will fail.

The June, 1942, "Fortune Survey" speaks of Canada's divided loyalties and states:

Question some Canadians, and you find them more royalist than the king. Talk with others, and if you interpret them shrewdly, you find them more American than Chicago.

Although there may be a great deal to be said for such an attitude, I feel that the loyalty which we owe ourselves first and foremost is that due to Canada, if we wish this country to continue to progress as it has done in all its fields and endeavours.

Coming to the second division of my remarks, namely, that conscription was not a success in the last war and that it is not at present needed, I will not annoy this house with arguments already presented in this sense by previous speakers. It is a well known fact that the last conscription measure in the great war brought us at the most some 25,000 men, and I am one of those who believe that were conscription resorted to at this time, the results obtained in additional men would be more than offset by the disadvantages of the measure in other domains and fields of our war effort. No matter what government may pass and enforce a conscription bill, there will be numerous exemptions, as there should be, of those engaged in agriculture, fishing, necessary basic war industries, munitions works and shipbuilding, so that when all is said and done, the additional men brought in by the enforcement of such a measure may again, as was the case in the last great war, compel all those who were in its favour to affirm that, after all, this measure was not necessary and that it was a terrible mistake to have had recourse to it.

As stated by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) present plans are to have under arms by next March some 600,000 men. Under date of May 7 last the Ottawa Evening Citizen published the following item which most hon. members have undoubtedly seen. It is entitled, "Recruitment jumps sharply with 609 enlistments in a day", and goes on to say:

A total of 609 men, the highest figure in any one day since the outbreak of the war, with the exception of some days during the recruiting campaign of last summer, enlisted Tuesday in the Canadian active army, the defence department announced last night.

Speaking of military district No. 5, including Quebec city and taking in quite a number of the counties in the province of Quebec, the Montreal Gazette as late as June 29 last published a news item headed, "Quebec district becomes one of the best". It goes on to say that this has been accomplished under the direction of Brigadier Vanier, soldier and diplomat, and that Lieutenant-Colonel J. P. J. Godreau has been appointed head of the recruiting office, a man of extraordinary initiative and activity, who has made of his new appointment a great success. It further states:

Day after day recruits come to give their voluntary services. Recruiting in the month of May, 1942, doubled that of 1941.

With reports such as these undoubtedly coming in from all the military districts, I cannot fathom, Mr. Speaker, why there should be any need for conscription. At the present rate of enlistments, surely there will come a saturation point in the number of men that Canada will be able to furnish for overseas service, and we do not know at what time we may need an active defence force for our own shores. I heartily agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) when he stated last week that he is asking himself if we are not doing too much for a country of our population and our resources. That was also referred to by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe).

A few days ago I had the opportunity of meeting on the train on which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) often travels, a member of the Canadian munitions board during the last war, and I believe he is acting in the same capacity to-day. This gentleman in conversation with me stated that three years after the last war a cable was sent from London to Canada advising us not to send more men but to send more food, and we may again find history repeating itself in that respect. In view of the number of men we already have in the service, I am wondering whether we should not concentrate most of our efforts now on the supplying of food, munitions and equipment to the allied countries.

At times I ask myself whether some of those outside this house who demand immediate conscription have not motives other than military as their reasons for asking for conscription now. I also ask myself whether, if this measure were passed, they would cease their agitation. Already we have heard and read statements as precursors which indicate that they will not cease the agitation that has been made but that it will continue to be made against this government.

Although I feel that the present government has given us a balanced war effort such as no other government could have given us, and having at all times had confidence in its leader, I sincerely hope that in the event that this bill is passed its principle will not be applied.

For my part I am not able to reconcile the syllogism that conscription is not at present necessary, that it may never be necessary, and that, therefore, we should vote for conscription. I have received an express mandate from my constituents with regard to the matter, and my intentions are to respect what the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) has termed, and rightly so, the supreme wish of the majority of the electors of the constituency.

My intentions are to vote against the bill as it is at present drawn.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Before the house adjourns I should like to point out the difficulty that arises in determining whether a member is reading or delivering his speech. The desire of the Speaker is always to apply the rule. Remarks have been made to me as to why I was not calling to order certain members who appeared to be reading their speeches. The reason lies in the difficulty of determining whether a member is consulting his notes or reading, and the Speaker sometimes refrains from intervening before being certain of an obvious violation of the rule. Our desire is, at all times, to impartially apply the rule, to which we repeatedly draw all hon. members attention. These remarks are made now because my attention has been drawn to an apparent inequality of treatment meted out to hon. members. I want to correct that false impression.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I intend to make to-night only a few brief remarks. The debate has already been somewhat prolonged, largely by the amount of discussion that has been undertaken by members on the government side of the house, which indicates the disagreement there is in the government party and which, I presume, reflects to some extent some difference of opinion in the government itself.

Since I last spoke in this house, when I had the privilege of outlining a detailed total war policy, the military situation has become very much worse. In our opinion this demands immediate action on all fronts, in our own dominion and elsewhere; and I would suggest that this house should not adjourn without taking all the action necessary to meet the critical situation which now faces this country as one of the united nations. To leave the matter to some subsequent decision of the government, by order in council, is, as I said on June 11, something of an abdication of the rights of this parliament and of the responsibilities which we owe to the Canadian people who sent us here.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself on more than one occasion has condemned the practice of doing by order in council what should be done in this parliament. My colleague the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) yesterday quoted from a speech which the Prime Minister made in this house on June 17, 1920, as reported at page 3691 of Hansard, and which I recommend to the attention of the house at this time:

> It is beneath the dignity of parliament—indeed, it is bringing parliament into contempt—to ask us to enact as a law a code of regulations that we have not even perused.

That is precisely what we are asked to do now. If we support the amendment contained in Bill 80, we give to the government the right by order in council, by regulation, to bring into effect something which may affect the lives of hundreds of thousands of young men, and without any reference to this house at a subsequent time. The Prime Minister went on:

> I hope I shall never see the day when as a member of this parliament I shall be prepared to consent to any legislation without knowledge of the particulars to which it is proposed to give the force of legal enactment.

To-day we are being asked by the Prime Minister, and by the government of which he is the head, to enact legislation which gives that government the right to pass regulations which shall have the force of every kind of legal enactment without any reference to this house. That, I say, is wrong. To postpone the decision and the formulation of a definite and adequate policy at this time would also, in my opinion, be a betrayal of the urgent and immediate needs of this war.

It has been said that the war will be won or lost by the campaigns this summer. I do not believe that to be altogether true, but I do believe that the campaigns of this summer will have a profound effect, at least upon the duration of the war, and that we in this house at the present time should take upon ourselves the responsibility of seeing to what extent we as a nation can make our best contribution to this great struggle.

What are the compelling needs of the situation at the present time? The situation in the middle east, which we have been following with almost bated breath during the last two weeks, again indicates that the primary need in relation to the war in that area is the right kind of equipment in the right place at the right time, and those of us who this evening listened to the news as it come over the British broadcasting system at a quarter to seven will have noted that the Russian papers to-night reported, as did the Russian government, that the situation was one of extreme gravity as far as Russia is concerned. The crying need of Russia is, and will be if the railway line is cut between Moscow and the south, more and more of the right kind of equipment and supplies to assist the armies of the gallant Russian people.

This afternoon in the house the Prime Minister lauded the efforts of the Chinese republic, which for five years has been withstanding the most dreadful kind of invasion and the most dreadful kind of war. During those five years China has cried aloud, not for men, for she has many millions of them ready to fight, but for guns, for tanks, for aeroplanes, for everything and every sort of equipment in order that she may wage the modern kind of warfare. We say that in this country we ought to have mobilized our industrial strength to a greater extent than we have done no matter how well we may have done up to the present time.

We require now, it seems to me, a complete mobilization to make the supreme effort this year. I am not forgetting, of course, that this means that we require transportation, both to transport the equipment and the weapons of war and to transport the men who will use those weapons. So to-day we need to speed up our shipbuilding industry. Let us not forget that while we are doing much now in the way of shipbuilding, yet for a considerable time we did not do nearly what we might have done. We need, too, a planned use and conservation of raw materials.

The statement of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), reported in the press—I think it was yesterday—brought that very forcibly home to us all. He warned industry that the shortage of raw material might in all probability mean that some industries would have to close down. We have been using these raw materials at a prodigal rate. We have been using them not for our war effort but for all kinds of peace-time needs, because in most instances it was more profitable to make peace-time goods than to produce war equipment. The vital need to-day which is recognized by everyone, I believe, and projected by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Great Britain, is that something shall be done to relieve the pressure on the eastern front in Europe by an attack on Hitler's armies in the west. For this we have men trained for many months, trained, indeed, for years; but we are told that up to now we have lacked the ships and the equipment in order to make such a project successful. For this ships and equipment and men are needed, and I believe I have placed them correctly in the order in which they are needed.

What should this house do? In our opinion, this house should decide now, at once, without further delay, for total mobilization of industry, of wealth and of man-power. But what are we doing under this bill that we are discussing? We are merely allowing the government once more to postpone its decision on one phase of the mobilization that I have mentioned, and that not the most important. This, it seems to me, is distinctly an abdication of the responsibility of this parliament; it is undemocratic, it is unworthy of our tradition. This is the place where these grave decisions should be taken; this is the place where the policy should be laid down; this is the place where every regulation to be used under that policy should be carefully scrutinized by members of this house.

I know it was suggested recently that the government should not act finally under the powers it now seeks, until it makes further reference of its policy to this parliament. Then why this debate? Why this debate which has engendered across this country a great deal of bitterness, a great deal of unnecessary bitterness, sowing seeds perhaps of further bitterness? Let us do what it is necessary to do now, in the light of the circumstances which confront us. The course proposed by the government of getting the power now, of waiting and of coming back again perhaps to this house at some future date to discuss the issue anew, is a course, in my opinion, of procrastination born of political expediency, with further bitterness in the offing, and future unnecessary debate.

I want to make it very clear, as I said on June 11 when this measure was under discussion then, that we do not propose to be parties to this kind of political manoeuvring, for such it clearly is. We shall make our protest to-night by casting our vote against this measure. As I have said, we need definite measures placed before this house for the scrutiny of parliament and for the total mobilization of all our resources now; placed before this parliament now, while it is in session, and then the guarantee of immediate action following whatever we decide to do. I am sure that this would inspire our allies, would help to confound our enemies and would give our people that dynamic and that challenge to go forward which they desire. It would show that we are aware of the critical condition of our common cause, and would enable us to hammer out in this house a policy that would suit the peculiar needs of the country in which we live. It would enable us to maintain our unity, to pull our maximum weight and to help to turn the tide decisively in the direction of early victory for the allied nations. If the government will not give such leadership to the country at this time, let it make way for a government that will.

Mr. CHARLES E. FERLAND (Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. 80, which we are now considering, involves the principle of conscripting men for service overseas by order in council, without the approval of parliament. Since I have always opposed the drafting of men for service overseas and since the citizens of my constituency of Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm, whom I have the honour to represent, are equally opposed to such a measure, I wish to state from the very outset that I cannot support this bill and shall vote against the government. However, it is with the deepest regret that I find myself obliged to take issue with our leader, for the Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) has always enjoyed my trust as he still enjoys the respect and general confidence of all the provinces in confederation. The Prime Minister, I am pleased to say, is an honest man, a perfect gentleman, a sincere and far-sighted statesman. He is easily one of the greatest premiers in the British commonwealth. On an issue such as this, however, I regret that I cannot follow his leadership.

Hon. members will recall the famous reply of Aristoteles, that prince of ancient scholarship, who, although filled with a pious admiration for Plato, his revered teacher, refused to endorse his every pledge and error: "Amicus Plato, sed magis amica veritas!" I love Plato, but I love truth even more!

Mr. Speaker, the truth is that this bill opens the door to the adoption of conscription for overseas service; the truth is that, once this measure is passed, we shall have conscription for overseas service in 1943, if not by the end of 1942. The truth is that the government seem to be too easily influenced by the conscriptionists, the Anglo-Canadian press, the minority who, in this country, have been clamouring since the outset of the war for conscription for overseas service.

I supported the plebiscite bill last February. At that time, the government promised that if they were released from past commitments, from their anti-conscription pledges, parliament would be consulted if conscription of men for overseas service ever became necessary; the question would be decided on its merits, not by the government or through orders in council, but by parliament. The government must have changed its policy in the matter since plebiscite day. It now seeks from us a power of attorney. Under the Bennett regime, our leaders and the Liberal members were scandalized because the administration had obtained a blank cheque in connection with the distribution of unemployment appropriations. To-day, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of distributing our man-power outside of Canada, on all theatres of war. Is this not of greater national importance than the distribution of a few million dollars? I repeat that the government has changed its stand. On April 7 last, the Prime Minister made the following statement over the radio:

> The question of conscription, properly viewed, is a military question. The place to discuss it is in parliament. What the government now seeks for itself and for parliament is freedom to consider and debate and decide this question, like all other questions concerned with the war, unrestricted by any pledge and in the light only of the needs of national security.

And he went on to say:

> The only place it can satisfactorily be decided whether a particular step is necessary or a particular measure needed, is in parliament. In parliament, the government can state its case and provide the information on which a wise decision can alone be made.

We all recall, Mr. Speaker, the words spoken in this house on February 27 by the right hon. Prime Minister, on the question of the plebiscite. We recall his asking us in whom we could trust during these critical times, if not in our government and in our parliament?

And so before the holding of the plebiscite, parliament was to make the decision. Consequently I wish to state once again that the government have changed their attitude and their policy, that they are adopting a new policy, that they are even adopting conscription, contrary to the decision they had taken in January last, namely, that this vital question, this question of national importance would be dealt with, judged on its merits and approved or rejected, not by order in council but according to the expressed will of parliament.

I have always opposed conscription, Mr. Speaker, and I feel that I am in good company in maintaining such a stand. Indeed as I review the policy of the Liberal party since 1914, I find that all the great leaders of that party in the province of Quebec have always opposed conscription. Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself, in July, 1917, expressed the true doctrine of the Liberal party when he stated:

> I oppose this bill because it has in it the seeds of discord and disunion; because it is an obstacle and a bar to that union of heart and soul without which it is impossible to hope that this confederation will attain the aims and ends that we had in view when confederation was effected.
> All my life I have fought coercion; all my life I have promoted union; and the inspiration which led me to that course shall be my guide at all times, so long as there is a breath left in my body.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier was not alone in teaching that doctrine. It was endorsed by Sir Lomer Gouin, by the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, a former Speaker of this house, as it is nowadays by the Hon. Adelard Godbout, premier of Quebec, and by our revered leader the Right Hon. Mr. King, who has spent the last twenty-five years expounding it. No one should be surprised if the province of Quebec, subscribing to the political doctrine we have advocated in the past and to a policy which barred conscription for overseas service, remains unalterably opposed to this war measure.

I feel that in view of the Liberal party's teachings during the last twenty-five years and especially in view of the plebiscite vote, I would not be worthy of sitting in this house as the representative of my constituents, if I were to support this conscription measure. The legislation now before us is entitled "The National Resources Mobilization Amendment Act, 1942." It strikes out of the National Mobilization Act, 1941, section 3, which reads as follows:

The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

Henceforth the government will be empowered by this measure appearing in our statute books, once clause 3 has been deleted, to enforce conscription by order in council. They will be empowered to send outside Canada and her territorial waters, anywhere, on all theatres of war, our recruits and soldiers who have been mobilized for military service since June, 1940, under the legal and solemn guarantee that they would never be called upon to serve outside this country.

As we are about to vote on this important measure, it is fitting to draw certain conclusions. We are now aware of the attitude of most hon. members of this house and we have to admit that it has been shown conclusively, in the light of actual requirements, that conscription of men for overseas service is not yet necessary. The Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has often stated during the last few months, as he did only a few days ago, that conscription of men for overseas service is not yet necessary and that it will perhaps never become necessary. Have not most of his ministers taken the same stand and made the same statement? All of them have told us that for the time being the voluntary system is satisfactory, that we have sufficient volunteers to meet every requirement and that conscription is unnecessary.

Faithful to their age-old policy, the Conservatives told us that immediate conscription for overseas service was necessary. It is their creed and a favourite theory of theirs. They are being logical since they have taught and advocated this theory for the last twenty-five years.

As for the Liberal members from the province of Quebec, they have logically continued to respect the traditions and the consistent teachings of their leaders, against which no protest has arisen during the last twenty-five years. They have continued to oppose conscription. What about the English-speaking Liberal members? If we except a few who could be numbered on the fingers of one hand, most of the English-speaking Liberal members have supported the present policy of the government concerning the voluntary system of recruitment and most of them have acknowledged and stated that, at the present time, the conscription of men for overseas service is unnecessary. Thus has it been proved and recognized by the great majority of the members of this house that the measure we are requested to pass to-night is unnecessary. It is generally admitted that this measure of conscription for overseas service is not neeeded. Nevertheless, it will be adopted and a consription bill will be introduced in the statutes of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, although I do not wish to take up too much time, I would like to refer to the statements made by certain members of the cabinet. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) stated in the course of this debate that numerous and strong reasons existed for our country to concentrate on the supplying of allied nations with war materials, instead of neglecting this field for the purpose of sending an insignificant number of men overseas, when the total strength of the opposed armies is taken into account. Canada's task, he said, consists in maintaining a proper balance between the production of munitions and supplies and the mobilization of recruits.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) stated that under the present system of voluntary enlistments, it would be possible to raise an army of 750,000 men without conscription and that, by the end of the year, 600,000 soldiers would already have enlisted. What did the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) have to say? Together with the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture, he made one of the strongest cases against conscription ever heard in this house. Here are a few of his statements: all the arguments of the imperialists and the tories are conflicting. Especially do these arguments mistake total war for conscription. I feel he said, that the adoption of conscription at the present time would not constitute a step toward a total war effort.

I could quote others. I could quote the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who, in a splendid speech, ably stated the views of French Canada; clearly showed not only that conscription is unnecessary at this time but that it would hamper our war effort and endanger national unity. And did we not hear yesterday the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) tell us that conscription at this time would mean suicide for the Liberal party? Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of joining the suicide squad and I am quite determined to vote against this conscription measure.

I submit that in this measure the government is unfortunately departing from the principle adhered to by the Liberal party for over twenty-five years. I consider that this measure is anti-Liberal, anti-democratic and anti-national, and that the decision on such an important matter should be left to the people, through their representatives in parliament, rather than to the cabinet. Canada is putting forth a total war effort which is satisfactory in my opinion. I support the government in their general policy of participating in this war, of helping our allies and of providing for the defence of Canada. But our country cannot be both the greatest granary and arsenal of the British empire and the best provider of soldiers for the allied armies. Our population is only 12,000,000 in round figures. Our neighbours to the south are 134 million strong and the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated in the course of this debate that the United States would equal Canada's war effort only when they have placed six million men under arms and in service on every allied theatre of war.

Our resources are limited. There is no limit to the good will of the Canadian people, it is true, still it does seem to me that certain of our opponents are desirous of forcing the government to put the whole country to fire and sword and thereby cause among the Canadian people great resentment against the Liberal party once the war is over.

There will be antagonism as between the English-speaking and French-speaking provinces. Racial strife and disunion will be rampant. National unity will be disrupted by this measure of coercion and all because the government will have listened to a minority in this country which is urging without respite, as without necessity, the passing of a conscription measure. I have purposely referred to a minority. During this debate, we have heard hon. members state that the affirmative vote given by the Canadian people on the plebiscite meant their acceptance of conscription. Whatever interpretation may be given to this measure, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the affirmative vote on the plebiscite was given by a minority only.

The voters' lists contained 6,800,000 names of men and women, and only two and a half millions out of that number voted "yes". Even at that, these two and a half millions did not specifically tell the government by their vote that they were in favour of conscription. It was a plebiscite and not a referendum on the question of conscription as the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier requested in 1917. The right hon. Prime Minister, and a great number of other speakers told the people that by answering in the affirmative they were not voting for conscription but simply showing their confidence in the government, in the Prime Minister and in parliament which was going to discuss this matter and decide on it.

Mr. Speaker, I must conclude my remarks so as not to prolong this debate further. It was Napoleon I who, although he had re-established the law corporations which had been suppressed during the French revolution, was in favour of cutting off the tongue of any lawyer who criticized the government. In closing, let me say that I am opposed to this measure and that I shall oppose any other conscription measure, even if my tongue should be cut off.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I appreciate the opportunity, Mr. Speaker, of again voicing my sentiments, on behalf not only of my constituents, but of the Canadian people, in asking, pleading, yes, and demanding that those in authority over us give us more and more of an all-out war effort. I was privileged on armistice day some nine or ten months ago to make that plea. I did so in no uncertain terms, and I should like to be privileged to do it again to-night. My sentiments were reiterated in February, March, April, May and are again to-night.

I am not so much concerned about the amendment as I am about the main motion. I feel disposed to vote for the main motion, but before I cast my vote I want to hear from the lips of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he will carry out his pledge to the Canadian people and give us action on the motion which eliminates section 3 as well as action on the mobilization act while we are here. He should not wait until parliament prorogues. To my mind, the travesty of the whole situation is that for six long weeks or more we have listened to the pros and cons of an issue which has stirred up our people in different parts of Canada. A vote is to be held toward the close of the session; recess will be declared; and then, because of the procrastination of our leaders, the country will dilly-dally along for another two, three or four months before some action is taken on something which is vital to our country. The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) intimated that it might be 1943 before we, assuming our duties as members representing constituents, shall have an opportunity of voicing our opinion upon whether the government is going far enough, and perhaps some of us passing our opinion that the government is not going far enough.

I am sorry to say that Hitler has made some progress with an all-out effort on behalf of his people. Anything less than that on our part, any half way measures will place this nation in a position similar to the positions of those other nations of which we have read. We can hardly imagine that what has happened there could happen here. To read the press is like reading ancient history, like reading of something that did not happen in our time. I wonder if we are not going to know what is going on in this world until the enemy comes up the St. Lawrence and bombards those shores, or comes up through the lakes to Kenora. Are we not going to wake up to the situation until that time? Are we going to sit and argue about what happened hundreds of years ago, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) was trying to tell us a few days ago? Should we not be realists and realize what is going to happen? The Aleutian islands have been attacked and the Japs now have a base there. If we do not attend to the situation along with our cousins to the south, the Japanese will be able to make an entry there.

What are the people of British Columbia thinking? They are thinking as they have always thought, that we as part and parcel of a section of the civilization of this world should, side by side with Britain, protect ourselves. Many of these people came from Great Britain, but many others are of the race represented so well in this house by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson). They are ready to do their part to serve this general cause. They did not vote "yes" on the plebiscite because they were afraid, because they were nervous; they voted "yes" because they had red blood running through their veins. I was going to say "red corpuscles", but they have red blood running through their veins. These people have assimilated the ideas of Canadianism, and they see a great future for everything that Canada holds dear. Not only are they ready to fight and work 100 per cent for the cause, but they feel that the elimination of section 3 should make it possible for all of us to do that. They look to us for help on that particular coast.

The people in the three prairie provinces voted "yes" on the plebiscite for a similar reason. In my opinion, they voted "yes" for conscription. There is not a list of casualties overseas that does not contain the name of someone from Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba. If the records are searched it will be found that the people of these three provinces have come to the front, particularly in connection with their defence, perhaps quicker than any others. My hon. friends in front of me come from down by the sea, the maritime provinces. I do not know whether they have in their hearts and minds the ideas that were given last night to this honourable chamber by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud). I feel that I know these people because I know some of their history. I think of them as the sons and daughters of those who came over on the ship Hector many years ago. Running through their veins is the blood of the highlanders who fought on the Plains of Abraham. When they voted "yes" for the plebiscite, in my opinion they voted for conscription.

We all know what the answer was in those two keystones of the arch of confederation—Ontario and Quebec. We have heard it said as to how Ontario feels. I hesitated to participate earlier in this debate because I felt that the house was getting too much of a feeling from Ontario, particularly the central part. I deprecate with all the intensity I can put into my words some of the utterances which have been made in this honourable chamber with regard to Toronto. Toronto is no mean city. The citizens of Toronto are no mean people. They contribute much. Even some Ontario members criticize the one-tenth of Canada's population which happens to be in that particular centre of Toronto. There are others who may have a little more cause to criticize because of press statements and other utterances which have emanated from that particular centre. But to them all I say, "you are doing an ill service, a disservice, when you criticize the effort and energy that the Toronto people are putting into the war effort".

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Hoblitzell) has been favoured with a seat behind the treasury benches. Of course he could not put across his full message last night, but we all know where he stands. When the hon. member for Eglinton rose in his place to make his speech, in his first sentence he gave credit to you, Mr. Speaker, for finding a place and giving him time in which to speak. But before that sentence had come to a full stop, there was a suggestion that he was not having the full accord of the whips of the Liberal party who are at present charged with the responsibility of arranging the list of speakers. My point is that he represents a large body of Toronto electors, as I do, who voted "yes" on the plebiscite by twenty to one, and they also thought they were voting "yes" for conscription. So much for the people of Ontario.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that I know my good friends in the province of Quebec. I challenge anybody to produce any sentence of mine in a period of two decades which casts any reflection on their Canadianism, on their fixity of purpose, or on their anxiety to serve this country in every field in ordinary peace time.

At the same time I make this general observation that the leadership they have been getting has not been of a kind which would tend to let them come to their own conclusions in a quiet way. True are the words of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) when he said that it is the 10 per cent, these demagoguges, who are the ones that are saying things and giving leadership of a kind in the province of Quebec; but the sound-thinking people of that province—and that takes in, he said, 90 per cent of its people—have a love and admiration for British institutions and are devoted to the constitution and to British ideals, but the leadership they have been getting across the whole of Canada has not given them much to look up to.

What has the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who was leading the house a few moments ago and who is not in the chamber at the moment, to his credit in the matter of leadership in the matter of unity in this whole dominion? Where does he stand in this debate? Of course he is going to vote for the elimination of section 3. But how does he stand on conscription? How does he stand on the plebiscite? We have yet to learn whether he is of the right blood and the right stuff. He has not given the leadership we would like to have, and I feel badly for the people of his province for the leadership they are getting in these difficult and trying days.

I might almost join the three prairie provinces. I did not like to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) say from his place in the house the other day that any party in this country which would impose conscription must have no political past and would certainly have no political future. I wonder whether he would pin his faith and his action and his war effort on a political sentiment of that kind.

There is quite a diversity of opinion when one comes to Manitoba. What is the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) doing to make sure we get an all-out war effort? I would like to let the women of Canada answer that. What do the Canadian Women's Voluntary Services think of the effort he is making on behalf of Canada at this difficult time? When they of their own free will and by their own efforts were organizing the women of Canada as best they could to carry on patriotically in this war, suddenly they found themselves bereft of their name, and their objectives taken away from them, through the formation of the Women's War Services of Canada. The Canadian Women's Voluntary Services were doing all their work voluntarily, free of cost to the government, at their own expense; yet they were supplanted overnight by an organization that pays some $4,800 for a chief, $3,600 for an assistant chief, and salaries to many others. It may have been necessary to put that work in some sort of order, but would not the better way have been to use the Canadian Women's Voluntary Services, which was already in existence?

Again, referring to a committee on which I have the privilege to serve, I find that in the division which has to do with national salvage and which was under the supervision of a dollar-a-year man, one Mr. Mark Cohen, who was doing a real service to the country in that position and knew something about the business, he has been supplanted by a Mr. Laferle, at $5,000 a year. He was transportation manager for one of the large companies, but I have not yet been able to find out whether he knows a great deal about the job of work he is now doing.

The idea I want to leave with this house is that the Minister of National War Services, with his past history and his isolationist speeches in this house, and by his very make-up, is not of a kind to stiffen the backbone of the Prime Minister so that he may give us the all-out war effort that our people demand.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), who served in the last Union government, a valuable man of great experience, has been in many grooves of thought, politically speaking, and has hopped from one to the other faster than a grasshopper out west can hop. I think one more hop from him would be a good thing for Canada, and that is if he were to hop across the Hall of Fame to the senate chamber and allow another minister to take his place. I say that with all kindliness, because I have a great deal of admiration for him, but he lacks the push and drive needed in a minister in war time. He is not as young as he used to be.

I come now to my hon. friends who twin up as the exemplification of youth in this cabinet, gallant and honourable men, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock). Let them rise in their places and show their youth; let them not only show that they have running through their veins the white corpuscles of famous grandsires, but let them try to dig up a few red corpuscles also. So far in this debate we have only had manifestations of the white atom in the ministerial blood stream. I should like to see, especially in this time of stress and strain, the red corpuscles, diatoms or dyads, coming to the surface in these two youthful ministers to prove that they are worthy sons of worthy grandsires.

My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), gallant gentleman that he is, served in the navy and shows some independence of thought. He has a grip on his department, but let me tell him, Mr. Speaker, that he is not simply operating a department in these serious days but is helping to decide policy on behalf of a nation that is in peril. When he put out to sea as he did in his fine speech the other day, so far, so good. It was too bad that he had to limp back to port. He did not stick to his guns, But he has a chance to redeem himself yet and to come out for an all-out war effort.

My hon. friend (Mr. Howe) who operates the greatest spending department of all in the government should have more help and assistance. I am not going to say very much about him. I would hesitate to harass any minister of the crown, and anything I do say I hope will be of a constructive nature. If it is not of a constructive nature, I trust at any rate it will be of the kind that will rouse hon. gentlemen from their complacency and impel them to more and more concerted action.

From the province down by the sea comes the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who is doing a good job in his department, though whether or not he is more of a tax collector than a Minister of Finance is something we have yet to find out. If I could be as modest as he looks in carrying that portfolio, I would feel that perhaps modesty was a blessing under every circumstance. I say to him that he should carry out the ideals of a Minister of Finance, the ideals that he has in his mind and heart, so far as the conduct of the war is concerned. If he does, the Prime Minister will be greatly assisted in observing the pledge which he gave to the Canadian people when he spoke on this particular measure, declaring that he wished to be free. As I remember his words, he said that in the light of the discussions which would take place in the house in this debate—and he invited speeches from all hon. members—he was determined to give us action.

My leader (Mr. Hanson) on June 9 made a statement which was repeated to-night by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), and when the Prime Minister makes his statement in closing the debate I would ask him to reiterate what he said with regard to such action as would be taken after the casting of to-night's vote. I have still an open mind, in view of all these discussions, as to the way in which I am going to vote. I feel like voting for the elimination of the section, and supporting the main motion, but as regards the amendment I am not quite so sure. Once this discussion is out of the way, I hope that we shall have some action on the part of the government, which will result in revitalizing the people throughout Canada and inspiring them with the confident belief that we have an active government that will support the war effort in every possible way.

I have a couple of minutes to spare, and I will therefore come back to the Department of Munitions and Supply. I made a suggestion to the minister in charge of that department and coupled it with a suggestion to the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). The condition that obtains to-day with respect to those employed in munitions and supply is that they are taking young men of military age for the production of commodities we need in the war—munitions and supply. But old men are not wanted. On Saturday morning last a man named Francis Wilmot, about fifty years of age, applied to the John Inglis company for a position, but he was rejected on the ground that he was too old. To-day in my mail comes a letter dated July 4, from a young man. I will give the letter to the minister in confidence, because I do not want this young man to be prejudiced in his position with the John Inglis company. This letter will explain the point I am trying to make. In the course of it this young man says:

> The John Inglis Company where I am employed in . . . division, under . . . has taken notice of my application for postponement of my military duties.

This young man is twenty-two years of age, and he was called on June 30. He has eight days from June 30 in which to appear. He wants a postponement and he is of military age, but an older man of fifty years cannot get a job in the plant. The munition plants are filled with young men who should be serving in the ranks in the army. Can you build an army with men of forty to forty-five? To a degree, yes. At twenty-five I could swim a mile, but at fifty I can swim only a quarter of a mile.

An hon. MEMBER: Can you prove it?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I can prove it. In your salt water, with the buoyancy, I might be able to manage a little more. However, my point is that the Prime Minister could not run one hundred yards as fast to-day as he could twenty-five years ago—

An hon. MEMBER: You don't know the Prime Minister.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I could say something rather unkind but I will not. It might depend on who was chasing him. The house has the sense of what I am saying.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The older men, I contend, should be put into the munitions plants, and the younger men should be serving in the defence of their country.

Going down again to the province by the sea, we find the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who knows pretty well the conditions that exist there, and his views with regard to the plebiscite and conscription are well known. They are not quite as clear, concise and powerful as I should like to see them driven home to his colleagues in the House of Commons. They are not quite as clear, concise and powerful, or as well driven home, as the views of the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) who gave the honest and frank statement of a statesman. They are not as clear, concise and powerful, either, as the views of his colleague (Mr. Macdonald, Kingston City), who comes from down by the sea. He gave a frank statement and, as I understood it, he expressed himself bluntly with regard to the question of conscription. We have three more ministers, hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec. There we have a review of the situation; there we have a picture of the Liberal party in action. So much for the treasury benches; so much for the picture of the Liberal party in action.

Then we had the speech this afternoon of the hon. member for Wellington South, and other speeches mostly from hon. members from Quebec. We had one from the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Fleming), and a few from hon. gentlemen from other parts of the country who were not quite sure which way they ought to jump.

I like the rugged honesty of the ex-Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Richelieu-Verchères (Mr. Cardin). He told us in precise terms that he had divorced himself from every other consideration in his older days in the determination to stand by his people. He said he would translate to the house the ideas which actuate the people of his province. In other words, he was the mirror image and reflection of his people. I do not agree with the sentiments he expressed. I like far better the courageous attitude taken by the Minister of National Defence for Air. He is a Canadian from the province of Quebec, as is the ex-Minister of Public Works, but he also remembers that he is a Canadian first and a Quebecker second.

Where does the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) stand? What is he? I listened and tried to understand his position, but I could not form a conception of just where he stands. I wonder what attitude he will take with regard to the defence of Canada league, or some such organization, which is at present working in the province of Quebec. The people in that province have subscribed to four principles, one of which is that they will not stand for conscription. As to the other three, hon. members will find them set out in the press. I will not trespass on my own time in order to recite them.

I wondered when I read those four clauses which it is suggested might be read from the church steps on Sunday whether the Minister of Justice will take them under review and see if they are not much more of a hindrance to recruiting than anything that fell from the lips of Colonel Drew. I am using that only as a parallel. The solid thinking people of Quebec have no leadership, have no head; they have had twenty-five years of listening to leadership of a kind that has made for disunity in this country. I think on mature reflection, after a little more experience in the Canadian House of Commons, the Minister of Justice will not carry us back to 1849, to two or three hundred years ago, as he did. That will not help in any way the unity of this country. To my mind it does not help at all; it hinders recruiting; it hinders Canada from going forward in the way she ought to go. I hope the good people of the province of Quebec will frown these resolutions down:

1. Firm determination never to accept conscription for overseas service nor any measure which leads thereto or renders its application possible;

2. To demand of the government that it do not amend article 3 of the mobilization act;

3. To recall to the government that the adoption of any such measure of conscription will forever compromise the unity of Canada; that it may perhaps lead French Canadians to doubt the accuracy of the allied war aims because the government will assume an attitude contrary to that defined in the Atlantic charter by Roosevelt and Churchill;

4. To give to the present resolution the greatest possible publicity in order to inform the public, either by reading the resolution at the doors of the church on Sunday or by distributing copies or by publishing it in the local and parochial press or by means of posters.

I hesitate to mention the church of any denomination, but I take my lead from the Minister of Justice when he referred to the church in this chamber and what the church thought about things.

I ask, who is the King of Canada at the present time? King George. When the oath of office is taken, hon. members who occupy a seat in this chamber swear allegiance to King George. Whom then are we fighting for? Are you going to fight for your king, or are you going to go back on your oath of allegiance? Listening to some of the speeches in this house or reading the translation of some of them, I say with due respect to my colleagues that in the heights of eloquence to which they rose some of them forgot the oath of allegiance which they had taken. They forgot where they are heading. These leaders who will make these speeches on the church steps about these four resolutions, where are they going to lead you? Can you go to the United States? You do not want to go to the United States; your church does not want you to go there. The Minister of Justice will remain here in Canada; he is of Canadian birth. Do my hon. friends from Quebec want to have an independent republic within the confines of Canada? By no means. We can work together, but we cannot do so if a leading minister of the crown states from his place in this house in effect that, "we are impossible of assimilation". That is not so. I know it is not so. From the very depths of my soul I say, after twenty years here and after doing business for over thirty years with people of Quebec, that assimilation is possible. Some of my best business associates and friends are French Canadians. If, Mr. Speaker, you will pardon a personal reference, an associate of mine earns a salary by teaching the French language. That is the way we can get along together. I say to the Minister of Justice, do not speak about the possibility of separation. I am glad to see the minister shaking his head, saying "no". I exhort all my fellow members when making speeches to remember that they swore to be faithful and bear true allegiance to His Majesty King George VI, but bear that allegiance and do that work side by side with your fellow Canadians of English-speaking origin and side by side with Britain in an all-out war effort. Hitler trampled on the nations which were giving a half-out effort. Do not let it be said that we Canadians in our day and generation in like manner gave only a half-out war effort and found ourselves trampled under his feet. When Mr. Churchill spoke to us in this chamber, his last words were, "Hitler asked for total war; let us give it to him."

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will please say "aye."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those against the amendment will please say "nay."

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the "nays" have it.

Mr. ROY: I ask that the vote be registered.

Mr. SPEAKER: It requires that five members shall stand in order to have a recorded vote, and since only two are standing, I declare the amendment lost. The question now is on the main motion.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in bringing to a conclusion the debate on the second reading of the bill which is before the house, I do not intend to review in detail the arguments which have been presented from different sides. In all that has been said, I have found no reason to alter any of the statements or opinions I expressed in introducing the bill on May 11, and in opening the debate on the second reading on June 10.

I believe the debate itself has more than justified the wisdom of the course the government has adopted in bringing before parliament for consideration, the methods of raising men for service overseas.

It has been recognized from the outset that the question is highly controversial. Had its controversial character been the only factor of which the government was obliged to take account, the task would have been comparatively simple.

In opening the debate, I stated that changed conditions in the character and scope of the war were sufficient of themselves to make necessary at this time the fullest consideration of the question by parliament. I carefully refrained from saying anything of other factors which had forced the issue in a manner which has served to emphasize rather than to lessen its controversial character. I still propose to refrain from saying anything about this particular aspect of the controversy beyond drawing the attention of hon. members to how wholly unnecessary and misleading it has been.

In the present war, the issue of conscription for service overseas was first raised, not in parliament by the responsible spokesman of any political party, but outside parliament altogether. The effort to make it a political issue became evident a little over a year ago in the course of my visit to western Canada.

On each occasion when the issue was pressed to the fore, the method adopted was the same.

An attempt was made to identify the single question of the method of raising men for service overseas with "a total effort". It was asserted that the need was an immediate one, and would have to be met immediately.

Conscription for overseas service was certainly not necessary when the agitation was started in Calgary, over a year ago. At that time, those who were responsible for the agitation asserted that conscription for overseas service had become imperative. It certainly was not necessary at the time the new leader of the Conservative party issued his manifesto for National government and an all-out effort. It certainly was not necessary when, as a part of the same campaign, the committee of two hundred in Toronto sought to identify "total effort for total war" with the immediate introduction of conscription for overseas service. It certainly was not necessary at the time the government's intention to hold a plebiscite was announced in parliament. Nevertheless we were told by hon. gentlemen opposite that, considering how long the plebiscite would take, the government should be censured, and the plebiscite itself condemned. It certainly was not necessary at the time of the by-elections in Welland, in York South, in St. Mary's, Montreal, and in Quebec East, though we were told, at the time, by its advocates that conscription was the real issue of those campaigns. It is now clear that conscription for overseas service was not necessary at the time the result of the plebiscite was announced.

In the present debate there are two things which have been proven beyond all shadow of doubt. The first is that the use of the method of compulsion for raising men at any time up to the present, has not been necessary to obtain the men required for overseas service in any of the armed forces of Canada; in the air force, in the navy or in the army. The second is that the totality of Canada's war effort would not have been, in any particular, increased, through an extension of the principle of compulsion to service overseas. Indeed, by resulting dissension, it might have been considerably reduced.

I mention these facts first of all to make perfectly clear that the government has meant what it has said when it has stated, as up to the present it consistently has, that conscription for overseas service was not necessary, either on the ground of obtaining the necessary recruits, or to enable the government to meet its objective of a properly balanced total war effort.

I mention these facts, also, to make perfectly clear that in asking, as is being done by the present bill, that, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, the government should possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise, the government is doing so not in response to political pressure or popular clamour in any part of the country. The government is asking for this freedom solely because it is of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, it is in the national interest that the power should be possessed by the administration.

There is nothing to which some of my political opponents have devoted more of their time and attention than in seeking to make the public believe that, as the head of the administration, I have been actuated primarily by considerations of party interests. It is represented that my aim, above all else, has been to maintain the unity of the party which I lead, in order that I may retain office at the head of a party administration. I do not deny that I have, at all times, striven to maintain the unity of the party which has honoured and entrusted me with its leadership. I owe that duty not only to the party but also to the country, more particularly as my following in this House of Commons is the foundation of the administration which was entrusted by the people, in war time, with the task of government. However, I deny most emphatically that, at any time in the course of my public life, I have ever placed any interest of party above the national interest. Least of all have I had any such thought in conducting the affairs of the country at this time of war.

It surely cannot be said that, in asking by means of a plebiscite for release from any obligations arising out of past commitments, I was acting from motives of party advantage. Nor can it be said that in introducing the present bill at the time it was introduced, I was seeking, as some hon. gentlemen opposite and their press continue to say of me, to appease the large following I have in the province of Quebec, and in virtue of which, they like to say, I am able to keep myself in office.

In the last general elections, I did win the support of the province of Quebec to the extent of all but one of its entire representation in this house. Perhaps this might not be an inopportune moment to remind hon. members and the country that apart altogether from the political support obtained from the province of Quebec, I was accorded, in the other provinces of Canada, a considerable majority over and above that of the combined representation in this House of Commons of the Conservative party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and the Social Credit party. Indeed the supporters of the government from the provinces other than Quebec number all but half of the total membership of this House of Commons. Secure as I have felt in the confidence thus accorded me by the Canadian people as a whole, I have considered that it increased my obligation to endeavour to see that all questions of national importance were determined solely in the national interest. This, I have felt, was a special obligation of the Prime Minister at a time of war.

I have had no more trying experience in my political life than the realization that the course which I believed it was in the national interest for the government to follow at this time was one which would occasion a division in the ranks of my loyal followers. On the other hand, realizing Canada's position as I see it in the present world crisis, I should have felt as false to the interests of every member of my own following as to the country itself, had I not sought from parliament at this time the powers which the bill asks should be given to the administration.

I have no doubt whatever that the events of the war will more than justify the course which the government has thus far pursued, and is pursuing to-day. I know that the government's present course is already justified in the eyes of the very large majority of the citizens of Canada who have expressed the view that the government should have complete freedom in meeting the different situations of the war as they may arise. I believe that the wisdom of the government's course will become equally apparent to most, if not to all, of those who have been unwilling, or still hesitate to trust the administration with so wide a measure of discretion. The results of the plebiscite showed that, as respects the application or non-application of conscription for overseas service, the vast majority of the people of Canada were prepared to trust the judgment of the present government. I should not like the debate to conclude without expressing, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, our appreciation of so great a trust.

It is true that the present bill is a logical sequence of the plebiscite, but its origin is not to be found in the results of that measure. Because the results of the plebiscite have, by some, been represented as a mandate for conscription for service overseas, the significance of the present bill has, as a consequence, been distorted in the eyes of others. Both the plebiscite and the bill have, in fact, a common origin. Each owed its existence to the policy of the government as set forth in the speech from the throne at the opening of the present session of parliament. Each was a necessary step, but only a step in the accomplishment of that policy.

This is the statement of policy as it appears in the speech:

> The government is of the opinion, that at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should . . . possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as it may arise.

The one and only particular in which the administration was not free to act in accordance with its judgment was with respect to the methods of raising men for military service.

So far as the government's policy as expressed in this bill is concerned, it is not a new policy; it is identical with the government's policy as set forth in the speech from the throne, which parliament approved by the adoption of the address. Because of prior commitments regarding the methods of raising men for military service overseas, the necessary freedom could only be secured in two stages.

The one stage was to seek from the people release from a moral obligation arising out of past commitments, and the other stage, to seek from parliament the removal of a limitation expressed in existing legislation. The former—the release from the moral obligation—was sought and obtained by the plebiscite; the latter—the removal of the legal restriction—is being sought, and I hope will be obtained, by the present bill. But while the second step—the bill which is now before the house—was a logical sequence of the results of the first step, namely, the plebiscite, it does not owe its origin to that measure, but to the policy of the government as set forth in the speech. And may I say to my hon. friend and former colleague the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin) that he was with me and with all of my colleagues at the time when the policy was settled, and he agreed with all of us at the time that it was a desirable policy for the government.

The government's policy as set forth in the speech from the throne was due not to any political pressure or popular clamour but to what the government, as a result of the changed conditions of the war, had come to recognize as the only sound policy "at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history."

In all sincerity, may I ask would any other policy be justifiable in the face of conditions as we have seen them develop from month to month, and from year to year since the commencement of the present war, and as we know them to-day? If after almost three years of conflict, the course of the war had been different; if, for example, Germany, after overrunning the most of Europe, had been driven out of some, or even one of the countries she has subjugated; if Germany was now more concerned with her own defence than bent, as she continues to be, upon further conquest; if Japan had remained out of the war, instead of challenging the might of the United States, as well as that of the British commonwealth and other of the united nations, there might have been reason to question the need for removal of any limitation upon the complete freedom of the administration to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of situations as they may arise. But when the very opposite is the case, when the war, instead of remaining upon a single continent has become a war which is world-encircling, embracing all continents as well as all oceans, a war in which all of the great powers of the world have either been partly destroyed, or are fighting for their very existence, and in which the survival of civilization itself is at stake, would it not have shown a lack of responsibility had the government not sought from parliament, in plenty of time, the widest possible powers to cope with any and every situation as it may arise?

A government is responsible not only for what it does, but for what it fails to do. A like responsibility, it seems to me, rests upon the parliament of the country, once its members are appealed to by the government to assist the administration in helping to accomplish the defeat of the enemy, and thereby to preserve the nation's security, and it may be its very existence.

On June 11, the former Minister of Public Works, objecting to the introduction of the bill at the present time, exclaimed, as reported in Hansard at page 3277:

> In the name of heaven, what is the use of having a dead principle in our statute books?

My hon. friend, in asking that question, was thinking only of the application of conscription for service overseas. He entirely overlooked one very important aspect of the bill. The present bill seeks to remove the limitation on compulsory military service outside Canada and its territorial waters. It will not only remove the statutory limitation on compulsory service overseas; it will equally remove the restriction on compulsory service elsewhere in this hemisphere. In so far as service in other parts of north America and the adjacent islands is concerned, the amendment of the mobilization act, once it becomes law, will in no sense be "a dead principle in our statute books."

At any moment, its application may become an urgent necessity. Recent events, no less than a glance at the map are enough to disclose that, in a tactical sense, the defence of our east and west coasts is inseparable from the defence of the adjacent territories of the United States. We have recognized from the beginning of the war that the same is true of Newfoundland and Labrador. To strengthen our own immediate defences, it will be necessary to extend the scope of compulsory service to these areas. In the event of actual hostilities on any considerable scale in this hemisphere, any restriction on the movement of troops back and forth between Canada and neighbouring territories would be intolerable.

It is true that before the plebiscite was held, I said that the government, in an emergency, would authorize such action by order in council under the War Measures Act, and would later ask parliament to amend the mobilization act. But that surely is an undesirable method to employ if parliament has the time to give to the government the necessary authority in advance.

Moreover, the government has equal power to follow the same procedure in the case of compulsory service overseas. It is because of its deep sense of its responsibility to parliament, that the government is seeking, for the one case as for the other, the requisite authority from the present parliament.

The debate has shown that objection to the present bill is due in the main to one of four reasons. There may be others, but they have not been set forth in a pronounced way in any of the speeches which have been made.

The first two of these reasons for opposition represent the extremes of widely divergent points of view. At the one extreme are those who object that the bill does not go far enough. At the other extreme are those who say that the bill goes too far. Those who hold to the first of these extremes wish to have the principle of conscription applied immediately to service overseas, regardless of whether or not compulsion is needed to obtain the necessary enlistments, and regardless as well of prejudicial consequences which might arise from an unnecessary application of conscription to overseas service. Those who hold to the opposite extreme are unwilling to have the principle of conscription applied to service overseas not only immediately, but at any time, and this regardless of the consequences whatever they might be.

In referring to those who take this extreme view, I wish to differentiate sharply between hon. members who are in accord with the government's policy of a total war effort, but who honestly and sincerely believe that conscription for overseas service will not increase our total effort, and might even serve to prejudice that effort, and those others, happily very few in number, who have indicated clearly by their attitude, not only in the present debate but in the past, that they are prepared to see Canada risk defeat rather than accept conscription for service overseas. In 1937, in 1938 and in 1939, some of these hon. members opposed the preparations for the defence of Canada because they maintained that Canada was in no danger. If I interpret their words aright, they are still prepared to overlook the designs of the enemy, and to discount his strength, despite the fact that his design of world conquest is increasingly clear, and despite the continued success of his arms. They are prepared to leave to others to do for Canada, for their homes and their families what they are unwilling to do not only for others, but even for their own country, and for themselves. They refuse to see the need to bring about the destruction of the enemy as speedily as possible, and as far as possible from Canada. They are prepared to risk subjecting the Canadian people to the fate of those countries which, in such numbers, have already experienced the terrors of invasion, and of conquest, by a ruthless and relentless foe.

The members who are thus unwilling to look beyond the shores of Canada have referred repeatedly to Australia which country, at an earlier stage in the war, sent troops overseas, and has since been obliged to recall some men for her own defence. But why did Australia send her troops overseas if it was not that she recognized the need of a collective defence? Why, may I ask, was the United States so ready to send an army and naval forces to Australia in her hour of need? Was is not because the United States realized that unless the enemy were defeated overseas, he would have to be defeated on American soil; and was it not also because Australia had earned the respect and help of other nations by sending her armed forces overseas against the common enemy?

And here let me protest equally against the deliberate misrepresentation of Canada's position which continues to come from many who represent the other extreme. Some hon. members opposite have said, and the press which supports them keeps repeating the statement, that the government is unwilling to send men overseas. They seek to create the impression that, because Canada has had no occasion to resort to conscription for overseas service, that no Canadian troops are being sent overseas. This obviously is being said solely for political purposes, for they know full well that such is not the truth, and that a false impression is thereby being created.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will the right hon. gentleman point out a single speech by any member of this party to the effect which he has just now stated.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The hon. gentleman, sitting I think two seats behind my hon. friend, said the other day that I was not willing to have men sent overseas. His speech was quite clear on that point, and he made the statement in this house.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: If the Prime Minister is referring to me, such a statement was never made by me, directly or indirectly.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Or by any other member.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was going to quote what my hon. friend had said to-night, but I refrained from doing so, not wishing to bring any hon. member's name into the discussion. But when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked me to name any one member of this house who had made a statement of the kind, I was obliged to make the reference I did.

Mr. STIRLING: That does not make it right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall give my hon. friend the quotation.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Put it on Hansard.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall put it on Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Put it on Hansard to-night.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I ask the Prime Minister to withdraw his statement or to produce the statement alleged to have been made by me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, the Prime Minister must accept the member's statement or quote that statement which he alleged was made. I heard the Prime Minister's statement with the greatest surprise. I have followed this debate most intently, and I do not recall any such statement on the part of anybody in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I might be permitted to proceed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we ought to have a ruling.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not propose to do other than proceed with my speech at the present time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I suggest that the right hon. gentleman—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who said "sit down?" I have the right to rise on this question, and no member of the government or anyone else has a right to tell me to sit down. The Prime Minister must accept the statement of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) or produce the evidence upon which he bases his assertion. I do not recall anything of that sort from any hon. member on this or any side of the house.

Mr. POULIOT: An hon. member is supposed to withdraw any language that is unparliamentary. When a statement is made in parliamentary language by an hon. member and it is denied by another hon. member, the matter is closed.

Mr. SPEAKER: A point of order has been taken, and the Prime Minister has indicated that he would like to continue his speech. I suggest that the Prime Minister be allowed to complete his statement, and then the matter can be taken up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With great respect I suggest that that is not good enough. The Prime Minister made a statement and, when challenged to name the hon. member concerned, he indicated the hon. member for Lake Centre. The hon. member for Lake Centre denies specifically having made any statement such as that attributed to him. The Prime Minister must accept that statement and withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: That is not according to the rules of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the leader of the opposition will allow me, I shall now read the statement to which I made reference. It will be found on page 3329 of the House of Commons debates of June 15, 1942, in the first paragraph of the hon. member's speech. He said:

> Up to the present time the only two ministers who have spoken in this debate on behalf of the government have been the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), both of whom have consistently opposed military service overseas, and from whom, having regard to the speech to which we have listened to-day, we cannot ever expect in my opinion to have military service overseas regardless of what the people may demand.

Mr. ROWE: That is not at all what the Prime Minister said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is no such inference in that at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This statement that I have consistently opposed military service overseas is made in the face of the fact that I have since the beginning of this war done all that lies within my power to see that the largest possible number of men were sent overseas in the navy, the air force and the army; and the numbers of men who have enlisted for service anywhere in the world to-day is the answer I make to the member who has just interrupted.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

An hon. MEMBER: Apologize later.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is nothing to apologize for. On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the context shows that the reference was entirely to compulsory service for overseas.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But what is the result? False impressions are thereby also being given to other countries. This is most detrimental to Canada, and is most unfair to Canada's magnificent army overseas.

No one can object to the honest advocacy of conscription by those who believe sincerely that it will advance the country's war effort. But surely there are better ways to advocate conscription than by belittling the Canadian army, and seeking to create the impression that because the men who are steadily going forward have offered their services voluntarily, Canada is not sending troops overseas.

Both extremes, for opposite reasons, are helping to create the wholly false impression that Canada is not sending or is not willing to send her men to meet and defeat the enemy overseas. Both, for political ends, are prepared to discredit their own country in the eyes of the world.

These two extremes can never be reconciled. The debate must have made it wholly clear even to those who support either extreme, that the adoption of their views would only serve to weaken, and perhaps to destroy, the national unity which all should wish to see maintained. It would be equally destructive of an effective war effort.

Were this House of Commons, on grounds of national necessity, or for any other reason, obliged to yield to either extreme, many hon. members might well find their present position one of considerable embarrassment. Their embarrassment, however, both in the present and in the future, is more likely to arise, indeed, is, I believe, certain to arise, should they fail to lend their support to a policy which avoids extremes, and which, at this time of war, alone gives hope for the preservation of national unity. National unity, it seems to me, can best be preserved by hon. members giving to the government charged with carrying on Canada's war effort, the support which the government must receive from parliament, if its great responsibilities are to be discharged in a manner which will truly serve the national interest.

If, in reference to the very difficult question of service overseas, anyone can conceive of a policy which is better calculated to serve the national interest than the one the government has formulated, and which is clearly and concisely expressed in the words: "Not necessarily conscription, but conscription if necessary", I shall be first to advocate its acceptance. I can only say that nothing of the kind has been proposed by any hon. member in the course of the debate. Nor do I believe that anything better can be suggested. Indeed, the events of the war, as well as all that has been said in the course of the debate, should have made it wholly apparent that, all circumstances taken into account, it is the only sound policy.

We are not dealing with theories, either of government or of war, upon which, without grave risks to themselves and others, men can afford to continue to differ. We are faced with conditions which actually exist, and which have to be met. They must be met with as large a measure of general consent as may be possible, if both Canada and our allies are not to suffer. It is from this point of view that, regardless of any position thus far taken with respect to the present bill, I now ask all hon. members to view their obligations alike to their constituencies and to Canada.

I said that objection to the bill had been raised on four grounds. I have dealt with the first two. Those who oppose on other grounds do not differ fundamentally with the policy of the government with respect to service overseas: "Not necessarily conscription but conscription if necessary". But they assert that, if the bill is to receive their support, something more is required. The assurance demanded, in the one case, is that if provision is to be made for the conscription of men for service overseas, then provision must equally be made for what is generally termed "the conscription of wealth"; that the two must go together. That, as I understand it, was the purport of the amendment proposed by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group.

First of all, may I say to my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group, and to those who share views similar to his own, that the power to conscript wealth at whatever time, and to whatever extent may be deemed advisable and necessary, is already in the act which the government is asking parliament to amend, not by further limiting its provisions, but by extending their application.

The power to conscript wealth will remain unrestricted. There are no limitations upon this power other than such as may result from the judgment of the government in exercising its discretion. The legislation itself as I have pointed out is enabling legislation, and as respects both the conscription of wealth and conscription of man-power will, if the bill is adopted, remain enabling legislation. The government in both particulars will be free to exercise its discretion as the needs of the war may demand.

I need not, I know, remind hon. members that the ground on which, on its second reading, a bill merits support or rejection, is one of principle. It is not a question of additions to or subtractions from its provisions. These are matters to be dealt with when the bill is in committee. What, so far as principle goes, the government is seeking by the bill is exactly what the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation implies the government should have, namely, complete freedom, subject to its responsibility to parliament, as respects the application of conscription in any direction. To impose conditions of any kind upon the exercise of the government's discretion, other than such as attach to its responsibility to parliament, is to destroy altogether the all-out freedom of action by the administration which it is the principle of the bill to secure.

If this year's budget does not serve to convince hon. members and the people of Canada generally of the government's readiness to conscript whatever wealth is necessary to distribute the burden of Canada's war effort as equitably as possible, it is difficult to imagine what more in the way of assurances to this end would be regarded as adequate.

I come now to the last of the reasons which have been urged by some for not supporting the bill, and by others for hesitating to give their support until the government's exact intentions are more fully known.

From both sides of the house, objection has been raised to the possibility of resort to conscription for overseas service at some future date without a further reference to parliament. When, however, hon. members speak of coming again to parliament, some appear to have one thing in mind; and others quite another.

All are agreed that the present bill, if enacted, will give to the government the power to make conscription applicable to service outside Canada, whenever and to whatever extent in the judgment of the government it is necessary and advisable. Some contend that should the government decide that conscription for overseas service has become necessary and advisable, the government should before any action is taken, announce its decision to parliament, and, at that time, by further legislation, define the terms and conditions of such service, or at least permit a second debate on the question of its immediate application. There are others who do not advocate a second debate on conscription, much less further legislation, but who maintain that a due recognition of the ministry's responsibility to parliament demands that, as soon as possible after the government's decision has been reached, it should be communicated to parliament, and before effect is given thereto, that opportunity should be given hon. members for an expression of their views.

May I say, as emphatically as I can, that in no case would I wish to countenance a second debate on conscription.

In setting forth the reasons why the government had not proceeded by stages, in removing the limitation in the mobilization act with respect to service outside Canada, I made the statement that such a course would not have met the purposes of the plebiscite as outlined in the speech from the throne, one of which was to ensure to the government complete freedom of action, subject only to its constitutional responsibility to parliament.

I gave, however, another and very important reason. I said that to amend the act in any particular would necessitate a debate in both houses of parliament—a debate moreover which would inevitably be a debate on the question of conscription; that this would mean going all over the same ground again. Speaking on this aspect of the matter on June 10, I said:

> Unnecessary discussion and prolonged debate in parliament at a time when our country is hourly being drawn into greater danger would not serve to place Canada's war effort in its true light, either before our own people, or before the people of other countries, nor would it gain respect for parliament.

Whatever may have been said or thought of the truth of this statement at the time it was made, after all that has since been said in the course of the present debate, for and against conscription for service overseas, it will, I think, be agreed that on this question little more, if anything of value, could possibly be added. It must now be wholly apparent that this House of Commons itself, not to speak of the country, would be impatient of any attempt to traverse the same ground anew; and that public opinion would strongly resent any such procedure.

It is well, therefore, that it should once again be clearly stated that while this bill does not, regardless of circumstances, commit the government to conscription for overseas service, parliament, by enacting this bill, is placing it within the discretion of the government to impose conscription for service overseas, if, in its judgment, the needs of the situation as they may arise should so demand.

This is one of the reasons why the government has been ready to allow to hon. members on the second reading of the bill, the fullest latitude to discuss from all possible angles, and on all possible grounds, the question of the application of conscription to service overseas, and has not sought, in any way, to curtail the debate. It would be unreasonable to suppose that a like opportunity could be afforded at any other time.

If, at some future time, it became necessary in the judgment of the administration to apply conscription for service overseas, that step, it is to be presumed, would be to meet a situation which would permit of little, if anything, in the way of debate. Debate would involve delays at a moment when time had become a vital factor. Knowing that this is likely to be the case, had the government sought to postpone debate on overseas conscription until the hour of an emergency, hon. members might well have complained that on so controversial a question they were not being treated with the consideration to which the representatives of the people were entitled. It might have been said that their hands were being forced.

There is an additional reason why the debate on conscription for service overseas should take place upon the present bill rather than at a time—should the situation so demand—that the government may have reached the decision that the application of the compulsory method to military service overseas has become necessary. That reason is that the need would almost certainly arise in circumstances in which military considerations would prevent the disclosure in open debate of the factors on which the decision of the government was based. The government's judgment in the matter will necessarily depend, in very large part, on military information of the highest degree of secrecy. There is nothing more important in the movement of troops at a time of war than that all matters pertaining thereto should be surrounded with the utmost secrecy. Moreover it is not only Canada's position, and considerations of special interest to Canada, that have to be taken into account. Very careful account has to be taken of the hostile use the enemy may make of information disclosed, and of how far any disclosures on military matters may affect the position of every one of the united nations.

It has, I think, been made abundantly clear that, so far, at least, as the present administration is concerned, any decision respecting conscription for overseas service will not rest solely with the military authorities, but that any action taken under the present bill must and will be authorized by the Governor in Council. In other words, the decision will be the decision of the cabinet, subject always to its responsibility to parliament.

I have also already given to hon. members an assurance that all relevant factors would be taken into account by the cabinet in reaching a decision.

In speaking in this house on the purpose of the plebiscite, I said as reported in Hansard of February 25, 1942, at page 830:

> What we shall do at any particular time will depend upon the course which we think at the time is necessary and advisable, and most effective in Canada's war effort. That decision is not going to be made in the light of any one factor. It is going to be made in the light of all conditions as they exist, and as they are known to the government at the time.

And later:

> The government is going to do the thing that it believes is going to further to the uttermost Canada's war effort, all circumstances considered.

I added:

> May I say that when I say "all circumstances considered", I have in mind the conditions as they exist in respect to the war in different theatres, and the conditions as they may exist in Canada itself.

It is perhaps well that I should remind hon. members that these statements were made as early in the present year as February 25. They were repeatedly referred to in the course of the campaign on the plebiscite in explanation of its objectives, and of how the government proposed to exercise its power, if given a free hand. It cannot therefore be said that the government's policy, as it finds expression in the present bill, was not fully known both to parliament and the public, before and during the time the plebiscite was held.

As to the right thing being done by the government at the right time, and in the right way, that, it seems to me, as I said in opening this debate, necessarily comes to be a matter of the degree of confidence which parliament and the people have in the administration charged with the responsibilities of carrying on the war. This does not constitute a reason for a second debate on the conscription issue. It is, however, the strongest of reasons why a government, once it has reached a decision that the needs of a situation demand a certain course of action on which opinion may be divided, should take the earliest possible opportunity of making perfectly sure that it enjoys the confidence of parliament, and that it may rely with certainty upon the support of parliament in giving effect to the decision reached. Especially is this the case where widely divergent views have previously been expressed in the country, and also in parliament, on the wisdom of any discretionary power being given the administration; and where it is to be expected that differences will still exist concerning the wisdom of the decision.

A second debate on conscription is one thing. A vote of confidence in a government before it undertakes to enforce a particular course of action is quite another and wholly different thing.

If an administration is to begin to carry out its duties in the prosecution of a war, it cannot afford to be left in any doubt, at any time, as to the adequacy of its support by parliament, and least of all in a time of peril. The assurance of the confidence of parliament is particularly necessary to the leader of a government where there is the slightest reason for him to doubt the extent to which he may be able to rely upon the support he will receive in the House of Commons.

In the speech from the throne, it was stated that the government was of the opinion that, at this time of gravest crisis in the world's history, the administration, subject only to its responsibility to parliament, should possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment of the needs of the situation as they may arise.

As to the importance to be attached to the words "subject only to its responsibility to parliament" as they appear in the speech from the throne, there may well be differences of view. The responsibility of the ministry to parliament would be the same whether these words were there or not. Their presence in the speech would seem, however, to endow them with special significance.

How important may be the significance to be attached to them, each hon. member will necessarily decide for himself. For myself, and in this I speak only for myself, holding the views I do, and the views I have always held concerning the responsibility of the executive to parliament, I do not believe that this House of Commons would feel it had been shown the degree of confidence it had a right to expect from the ministry, if, in a matter of so great concern to the whole of Canada, the government were to act before so important a decision had been made known to the house.

While it is true that if the present bill becomes law, the administration will possess complete freedom to act in accordance with its judgment, I can imagine what would be said by some hon. members opposite, and indeed by many hon. members on this side of the house as well, if, with parliament in session, and before acquainting hon. members with the decision of the government, I were to sign an order in council putting into effect conscription for service overseas, and immediately thereafter were to come to this house and inform hon. members of the action the government had already taken.

If the need should arise for sending overseas as reinforcements men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, the procedure should be as open and above board as it can possibly be made. Unless it is understood that parliament will be informed in advance, all kinds of suspicion will be aroused and all sorts of rumours will be in circulation from day to day.

The right of the public to be informed of the decision of the government before it is enforced was set forth clearly in the address I made in opening the plebiscite campaign on April 7. Speaking on this very matter in a nation-wide broadcast, I said:

> The people of Canada are not going to hesitate to take any steps which they believe to be necessary for the preservation of their freedom. They are certainly not going to hesitate to adopt any measure needed to preserve their national existence, but they will wish to know, and they have a right to know, that before any step is taken, that step is necessary. This is particularly true in the case of a measure which has been the subject of bitter controversy and the source of disunity in the past.

I intend, therefore, if the time should come when the government decides that it has become necessary to send overseas men who have not volunteered for general service, and I should be in office at the time, to ask my colleagues to join me in seeing that parliament is immediately informed of the government's decision. If parliament is not in session, I would do whatever lies within my power, to see that parliament is informed as soon as possible after the decision has been reached.

I intend, at the same time, to see that, before the administration assumes the additional responsibility of enforcing its decision, hon. members are given an opportunity, not for any second debate on the question of conscription, but of showing their confidence or want of confidence in the administration.

In following this course, I hope it will be agreed that I am fulfilling the spirit of an earlier undertaking given to parliament on February 25, that "when we find that we cannot raise the required numbers of men for enlistment overseas by the voluntary method, and it is absolutely necessary to raise more men by other methods, then we will make our decision, present it to parliament, and have it discussed on its merits". The debate on the merits of conscription has, of necessity, come on the present bill. What really is important hereafter is that the government's decision should immediately be presented to parliament, and that the government should be prepared to stand or fall on its decision.

It may be said that such a course will involve a delay; and that what is needed is action. It will quite rightly be said that if action had not become imperative, the government would not have reached a decision. Such an objection might justifiably be raised if a second debate were to be permitted on the question of conscription. It is not, however, an objection to the course proposed. If the government decides that it is necessary to apply conscription for overseas service, there need be no delay in enforcing that decision. And unless it became apparent that the ministry had ceased to enjoy the confidence of this House of Commons, there would be no delay.

Even if parliament is not actually sitting, it can be brought together in a few days. Under our war-time practice of adjourning rather than proroguing the session, there would be no opening formalities. There would be no need of further legislation, merely an expression of confidence in some form. It is virtually impossible to conceive of a situation in which the lapse of a week will affect sending reinforcements overseas, since arrangements to that end could proceed concurrently with the reassembling of parliament. As the former Minister of Public Works himself suggested on June 11, as reported in Hansard at page 3277:

> In seven days, conscripts are not going to be sent overseas. . . . Nothing would prevent the government from preparing the machinery the moment they decide to have recourse to conscription.

Debate of course would have to be curtailed. Following precedents established at Westminster, I would feel that, if any, at most a very short time should be allotted for discussion.

No matter how drastically discussion might have to be restricted, every member by his vote would have the opportunity to express his confidence or lack of confidence in the government. There need, in fact, be no debate.

Within the past week, a resolution of non-confidence in the government was debated in the British House of Commons. It arose as a result of criticism directed against Mr. Churchill on account of his continuing to hold the office of Minister of Defence in addition to that of Prime Minister. The debate was definitely limited in time. In less than two days, hon. members found ample opportunity for an expression of their views.

As to the means by which this house, with respect to the government's decision, could be given the opportunity to express its confidence or lack of confidence in the administration, hon. members are well aware that it is possible at any time for any hon. member to move a vote of want of confidence on a motion to go into committee of supply. Should the government deem it advisable to proceed by that method to ascertain the opinion of the house, the government would so arrange. If, at the time, there were no estimates before the house, the government could bring in a special supplementary estimate, and immediately move to have the house go into committee of supply. Any hon. member who wished to do so, could then move a vote of want of confidence.

There is another, and a more direct method of procedure. That is the method which was followed in the parliament at Westminster in January last, after Mr. Churchill's return from his earlier visit to the United States and Canada. On January 27, Mr. Churchill expressed to the House of Commons his desire to be sustained by a vote of confidence.

The following day, Mr. Attlee moved:

> That the proceedings on the motion relating to confidence in His Majesty's government be exempted, at this day's sitting from the provisions of the standing order (sittings of the house).

This was agreed to.

Mr. Attlee then moved:

> That this house has confidence in His Majesty's government and will aid it to the utmost in the vigorous prosecution of the war.

Debate took place on January 28 and 29. At the end of the latter sitting, the house divided: ayes, 464, and noes, 1.

Hon. members will, I believe, be interested in Mr. Churchill's own appreciation of the importance and significance of the vote he was asking from the House of Commons. On January 27 he said:

> From time to time in the life of any government, there come occasions which must be clarified. . . .

Since my return to this country, I have come to the conclusion that I must ask to be sustained by a vote of confidence from the House of Commons. This is a thoroughly normal, constitutional, democratic procedure. A debate on the war has been asked for. I have arranged it in the fullest and freest manner for three whole days. Any member will be free to say anything he thinks fit about or against the administration or against the composition or personalities of the government, to his heart's content, subject only to the reservation which the house is always so careful to observe about military secrets. Could you have anything freer than that? Could you have any higher expression of democracy than that? Very few other countries have institutions strong enough to sustain such a thing while they are fighting for their lives.

I am unable to indicate, at present, which procedure will be followed in the event of the government reaching the decision that it should have recourse to conscription for service overseas. That must depend upon the circumstances at the time. In a matter which relates to a future decision of the cabinet, and so immediately to the confidence which others may have in my judgment and my fidelity, I obviously can speak only for myself. No one can say what the course of the war will be, or what, at any time, conditions may be in our own or other countries. In seeking to free the government from one commitment, I do not wish to be drawn into making another. I wish, however, to leave no doubt in the mind of any hon. member that, if I am at the head of the administration when such a decision is reached, I shall ask to be assured of the confidence of the House of Commons before the government proceeds to enforce the decision.

This is not a new attitude on my part. It is one that I have repeatedly expressed, and to which I intend at all times to adhere. I so expressed my attitude in this very matter to the Canadian people, on April 24. In my final broadcast in the plebiscite campaign, I said:

> This is not an ordinary time; it is a time of war. The whole world is in a state of rapid change. At any time the responsibilities of government are heavy enough. They are greater to-day than they have ever been. For my part, if I did not believe that as head of the government, I continued to enjoy the confidence of the people, who, time and again, have returned me to office, I would not wish to remain in office an hour longer.

I might point out, that in January last, when Mr. Churchill sought a vote of confidence in his administration, none of his critics had even suggested that he should resign, and that someone else should take his place. He felt, however, that criticism of himself and of certain aspects of his administration had reached the point where he required the assurance that he was sustained by the support of those from whom in parliament his power was derived. I believe that the leader of a government charged with great responsibilities in a democratic country feels, at all times, the need of such an assurance, and at no time more than on the eve of embarking upon added responsibilities.

Mr. Churchill, I think, had this very much in mind when, answering his critics in the House of Commons at Westminster on Thursday last he said:

> Everything that can be thought of or raked up has been used to weaken confidence in the government. . . .

And later, referring to himself as the prime minister, he added:

> . . . and then to undermine him in his own heart, and, if possible, before the eyes of the nation.

But there is another reason why Mr. Churchill has felt from time to time the need of being sustained by a vote of confidence of fellow members in the House of Commons. Parliamentary responsibility is twofold. Members as well as ministers have their responsibilities. Mr. Churchill felt that the people of the United Kingdom had a right to know where their representatives stood, and what support they were prepared to give to the administration in its grave task of carrying on the war. He felt the people of the United Kingdom were equally entitled to know what support was being withheld from the administration, and why it was being withheld. The same I believe to be true at this time of war of the parliament and people of Canada.

As I conclude, may I repeat what I said to the people of Canada in appealing, on April 7, for an affirmative vote on the plebiscite:

> To those who, beyond the events of to-day, are able to look into the future, it is no longer the unity, it is the very existence of our country as a free nation which they see is in danger to-day. We are no longer in a world where even the most powerful nation is able, by itself, to save itself from the ambition and greed of the aggressor nations. For the preservation of its very existence, each free country is going to need all the help that other free countries can give. It will require the utmost cooperation on the part of all free countries to save them from becoming victims, one by one, of the gangster nations whose undoubted aim is world conquest. With our immense territory, great resources and small population, no country may come to need the help of the other countries more than our own. Unless we continue to do all we can to help others, we shall have no right to expect them to do all they can to help us. Until the present tide of conquest is turned into overwhelming defeat for the enemy, no country —and assuredly not Canada—can consider itself secure.

I did not use those words lightly. I appeal to every hon. member to ponder their significance in the light of what has since occurred and of the situation as we know it to-day. Who can doubt that our security, that the security of this hemisphere depends upon holding the German and Japanese forces in check in the old world until, from the new, sufficient strength can be gathered to overcome their terrific power.

The machines and weapons of modern war have annihilated space; they have all but destroyed time. Remoteness and distance provide no protection. In this war "overseas" has in reality lost its meaning. The conflict is one, single and indivisible, whether it is fought on the sands of Egypt, on the steppes of Russia, in the depths of China, on the islands of the Pacific, in the arctic wastes, or in the skies over Britain and Germany and the conquered countries of Europe. There can be no security for us, for our homes, and families, until the forces of the enemy are defeated and crushed.

The government and people of Canada have a heavy responsibility to the half million young Canadians who have offered their all for our safety. We owe them all that we can give. Wherever they are fighting, they are fighting for Canada, for their own country, for its safety and for its future as well as for freedom for other lands. That future is in our keeping; and we, in this parliament, owe it to our gallant young men, when the war is won, to hand on to them, so far as it lies within our power, a free and united Canada.

The house divided on the main motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. COTE: I am authorized by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard) to say that he was paired with the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). Had he voted, he would have voted against the motion.

I am authorized by the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Hallé) to say that he was paired with the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch). Had he voted, he would have voted against the motion.

Mr. DUPUIS: I was paired with the hon. member for London (Mr. Johnston). Had I voted, I would have voted against the motion.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move, Mr. Chairman, that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Mackenzie King moves that the committee rise—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before this motion is put, Mr. Chairman, if I may, I should like to make this statement. Because of the speech that was made by the right hon. the Prime Minister to-night concluding the debate and at a time when no one else could reply, a speech in which it was indicated that the government has looped the loop three times—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The motion has been put to the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the motion was put, Mr. Chairman, I was on my feet. I take exception to your statement, Mr. Chairman. The motion was not put to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. leader of the opposition is too old a parliamentarian to challenge the authority of the Chair when the Chairman is standing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a question of fact.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. I have put to the committee the motion made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, it is not put yet.

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling from which the hon. member may appeal is that the question was put to the committee and that it is not debatable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I leave it to the judgment of the house whether the motion was put to the committee. I was on my feet before the Chairman put the motion.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I desire to appeal from your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENCE: It is a political gestapo.

Mr. ROY (Translation): Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission, and with all due respect, I should like to ask you what stage of the proceedings we have reached. The noise that is prevailing has prevented us, in this part of the house, from hearing anything. Would you please tell us what stage of the proceedings has been reached?

An hon. MEMBER: We are taking a vote.

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair, and the Chairman of the committee made the following report:

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) was addressing the committee when the Chairman called him to order on the ground that a motion that the committee rise had been made and was not debatable. Mr. Hanson claimed that the question had not been put and appealed from the Chairman's ruling.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I expressly dissent from the statement read to Your Honour by the Deputy Speaker. The Deputy Speaker as Chairman of the committee of the whole had not put the motion. I was on my feet before he had put the motion. It should read: He claimed he had put the motion. The report is contrary to the facts, and that is why we are appealing from the ruling.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. McGREGOR: More gestapo.

Mr. SPEAKER: The report as I have received it is:

Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury) was addressing the committee when the Chairman called him to order on the ground that a motion that the committee rise had been made and was not debatable. Mr. Hanson claimed that the question had not been put and appealed from the Chairman's ruling.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Chairman be confirmed? And the ruling was confirmed on the following division:

First report of standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Mr. Bertrand (Laurier).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

DUFFERIN SHIPYARDS—CARLSON, HERRMANN, ARNOLD AND KILKENNY

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Are Messrs. Carlson, Herrmann, Arnold and Kilkenny employed in the Dufferin shipyards?

2. If so, what are their positions?

3. Are they British subjects?

4. If not, what nationality are they?

5. What qualifications have they for their positions?

6. On whose recommendation were they brought to Canada?

7. What salaries do they receive—also what expenses?

8. Are they paid in Canadian or American funds?

9. Are these salaries subject to Canadian income tax?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The above persons are employed by Toronto Shipbuilding Company, Limited (formerly Dufferin Shipbuilding Company Limited).

2. H. R. Carlson, works manager; L. G. Herrmann, assistant works manager; E. C. Arnold, general superintendent; T. F. Kilkenny, fitting-out superintendent.

3. No.

4. Citizens of the United States of America.

5. (a) H. R. Carlson—He has been in the shipbuilding business on the west coast of the United States all his life. He is now a man of about forty-six years of age. He has a thorough technical training and is a trained naval architect and at the time of his employment was production manager for Los Angeles Shipbuilding Company, Limited, San Pedro, California, U.S.A.

(b) E. C. Arnold—He has nine years' experience in shipbuilding. He is a skilled director of mechanical labour. He came from the same yard as Mr. Carlson where he was the superintendent on the second shift. As the said yard employs approximately five times as many men as Toronto Shipbuilding Company, Limited, even a shift superintendent has a very big job.

(c) L. G. Herrmann—At the time of employment Mr. Herrmann was working at a shipyard in Los Angeles. He is thirty-two years of age, has a degree in business administration, has been working for eight years in the United States on personnel administration and for two additional years in the shipbuilding business. It is because of his experience in training personnel that his employment was recommended.

(d) Thomas F. Kilkenny—He is forty-eight years of age. He was not employed at the time he was contacted by Toronto Shipbuilding Company, Limited, but was on his way to a job in a San Francisco Shipbuilding Company. He has twenty years' experience in shipbuilding. He is an engineer whose line has been mechanical work in connection with shipbuilding. Fitting-out is primarily the mechanical end of shipbuilding operations.

6. Mr. Carlson was employed on the recommendation of Mr. D. A. Clarke, director general, shipbuilding branch. Messrs. Herrmann, Arnold and Kilkenny were employed on the recommendation of Mr. Carlson.

7. H. R. Carlson, $700 per month; L. G. Herrmann, $500 per month; E. C. Arnold, $500 per month; T. F. Kilkenny, $400 per month.

They are also entitled to receive out-of-pocket expenses when travelling on business for the company.

8. Canadian funds.

9. Yes.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—J. E. COYNE

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. Is James Elliott Coyne, deputy chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, a permanent employee of the government, or of any government agency?
2. If so, what salary and other allowances does he receive?
3. Is he married, or single without dependents?
4. How much income tax will he pay on his 1942 salary, if that be his entire income?
5. What is his age?
6. Has he served in the armed forces, or has he been rejected as physically unfit?
7. Was he employed as counsel, or otherwise, with the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations?
8. What total salary or fees was he paid for this work, and on what basis were these calculated?
9. By whom has he been employed during the past five years?
10. For how many years has he been employed by the government or governmental agencies?

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to raise a question of principle concerning this matter. Questions such as No. 6, for example, which have nothing to do with government business, should not in my opinion be asked, and if asked I do not think the government should answer them. Otherwise hon. members will probably be asking about an unlimited number of civil servants, and featuring them in such a manner as to indicate to the public that there is something unpatriotic or unworthy about their conduct. On the other hand, if it were asked whether a person had been certified as eligible for appointment to the public service because, although physically fit and of military age, his appointment was necessary in the public interest, I think that would be a proper question, because that is done under order in council as a matter of public business. I suggest to the hon. gentleman who put this question on the order paper that he should reconsider it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That applies only to part 6 of the question, I understand.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There may be something in what the minister says, but on principle that would not appear to be a proper answer to make on a question of this kind. Here is a young man who perhaps may be of military age, physically fit, who ought to be under arms, let us assume.

Mr. ILSLEY: That cannot be assumed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Very well, but the government has within its knowledge whether or not that is the situation. I object to the minister's limitation. With respect to the other questions I assume that there is no objection. I will look into what the minister has said, and perhaps question No. 6 can be redrafted. In the meantime perhaps the whole question could stand.

Mr. ILSLEY: Question No. 4 is a matter of computation only. I would object to answering anything about the income tax anyone would pay, but this is a matter of computation and therefore should be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we will think about that, too.

Question stands.

"O CANADA"

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Will the government soon reach a conclusion as to the status of the national hymn "O Canada", which according to the Minister of National Defence has been referred to the government by the defence council for consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A statement will shortly be made.

HONG KONG COMMISSION—COUNSEL

Mr. BRUCE:

1. What are the names and addresses of the counsel engaged in the Hong Kong investigation?
2. What fees were charged by each and have same been paid?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1 and 2. George A. Campbell, K.C., Montreal, $9,568.20; R. L. Kellock, K.C., Toronto, $7,298.77; R. M. Fowler, Toronto, $4,084.26; Lt.-Col. George A. Drew, K.C., Toronto, no account submitted.

Payment has been made in full settlement of the accounts of Messrs. Campbell, Kellock and Fowler.

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

Mr. HOWE: I may repeat what my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said, that there is no small arms ammunition workshop at Parry Sound, Ontario. As a matter of fact, all small arms ammunition workshops happen to be in the province of Quebec. I would ask that the question be dropped.

MILITARY SERVICE—PERCENTAGE OF ENLISTMENTS FOR ACTIVE SERVICE

Mr. CORMAN:

What are the percentage enlistments for active service in each military district in Canada, as compared with the total enlistments from the whole of Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): It is assumed that this question refers to enlistments in the Canadian army. As of 31st May, 1942:

Military Districts	Percentage

ASSISTANCE TO GENERAL DE GAULLE AND FREE FRENCH FORCES

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Did the government have a conference with Admiral Muselier, the commander of the Free French navy? If so, where and when?

2. What members of the government did he confer with when here?

4. Is any form of assistance being given to aid General de Gaulle in his work for our allies in this war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

3. No action was taken.

4. It is not considered in the public interest to answer this question at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Practically all of the information asked for in this motion is contained in the auditor general's reports, or other reports; and if the motion is passed it would be only on the distinct understanding that it would be answered simply by reference to those reports. Perhaps my hon. friend does not want that, but if he does not I would have to ask that the motion be not passed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The objection really is, I assume, to the amount of labour involved. It seems to me, in scanning the motion, that the only branch omitted from it is the legislative branch of the House of Commons. The hon. member might confer with the minister, and perhaps they may be able to reach some arrangement. I realize that it would be a tremendous job to get all this information and put it in concrete form. I should like to see some of the information brought down; I am sure the hon. member wants something concrete, so I would ask him to consult with the minister.

Mr. CHURCH: I would ask the minister to give me the pages in the auditor general's report. The information is not in that report, nor is there any reference in that report to any commission. This is purely special pleading by the minister, trying to keep the public from getting the facts.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will write the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHURCH: That is what it is; and the minister is very expert at that, too.

Motion stands.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

Mr. CHURCH:

For a complete copy of the records and of all the evidence given before the royal commission, appointed under the Public Inquiries Act, regarding the Hong Kong expeditionary force, together with all papers, letters, telegrams, and other correspondence relating thereto, and a copy of the addresses of counsel in the case, other than that already tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already given the house, on two or three occasions, the reason why much of the information asked for in this motion cannot be given. The order asks for a complete copy of the record and of the evidence given before the royal commission regarding the Hong Kong expeditionary force. The record, as my hon. friends must know, includes many communications from the British government to the Canadian government and other communications that are of the most confidential character and which could not possibly be disclosed without giving to the enemy information which should not be given. The commissioner, the chief justice of Canada, has embodied in an appendix to the report those parts of the evidence which he regarded as essential and in the public interest to publish; and I should think the known standing of the Chief Justice of Canada, who was commissioner in that inquiry, should be sufficient reason for the acceptance of his statement that the information which is essential is included in the report.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to take issue with the Prime Minister with regard to the substance of his statement. In the first place the Prime Minister indicated, in reply to an inquiry by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that some facility would be afforded for discussing the Hong Kong report. At the same time, on every occasion on which this material has been asked for, the government has taken every means within its power to frustrate any debate on this important topic, first by withholding the evidence or such portion of it as it would be in the public interest to have tabled here, and second by resorting from time to time to an alleged rule that a certain inquiry is sub judice and therefore cannot be discussed. A further reason advanced has been that the inquiry was held in camera. That I submit is no reason at all why we should not have the evidence. All these factors combine to make it impossible for this House of Commons, denied all the evidence and all exhibits, to come to any real conclusions as to justification for the report, not of the Chief Justice of Canada but of a royal commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act.

Since when has there been a rule that this House of Commons should not criticize a report of a royal commission? The implication that is made by reference to the Chief Justice of Canada is merely a method to evade a proper discussion of this report; and I protest against it. It is not the Chief Justice of Canada who made the report; it is a royal commissioner appointed by this government. Further, if we are to have any debate on the Hong Kong report, how in the world can we arrive at any dependable conclusions; how can this House of Commons come to any conclusions at all, unless we have the evidence before us to ascertain whether the conclusions of the royal commission were justified or not?

I submit that it is within the right of this House of Commons to order that the evidence, such as is not inter-governmental—and I reserve judgment on that for the moment—should be tabled. Without that the government makes it impossible to discuss this report or to arrive at any just or dependable conclusions with respect to the accuracy or otherwise of the report of the royal commissioner. I submit that this motion, either in its present form or in some amended form, should as a matter of right be passed by this House of Commons.

Mr. CHURCH: Under the rules of the house, I admit, I am bound by the Prime Minister's statement. It is about the same as that which was given in the British House of Commons on June 11 by Mr. Attlee in answer to Mr. Stokes. I should like the Prime Minister to look that over. I may say that on March 11, Mr. Eden, in the British House of Commons, gave details of the whole story. It is no reflection on anyone in the government here, but if the information had been given to the country weeks before that, Singapore in my opinion would not have fallen. It would have been better if the men at Singapore had died with rifles in their hands so as not to have the murder of prisoners as at Hong Kong, and Singapore would have been saved. What was done at Hong Kong with our men was known to Canada, because the same thing was done to the Chinese in 1933, and it shocked the whole civilized world. While I am bound by the rules of the house on a motion of this kind, I urge upon the Prime Minister the advisability of acceding to the request that has been made. I do not wish to embarrass the government but I really think that in the future it would be far better to let the people of Canada have the whole facts. No one knows what the Japs may do next. If they come to Canada we may expect the same savagery.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all, may I say to my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) that the government has not sought in any way to frustrate a debate on the subject of the Hong Kong commission's report.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I said was that the effect of the government's attitude was to frustrate it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I indicated that opportunity for debate would be given, and it will be given. My hon. friend requests that all the evidence be tabled. May I remind hon. members that when the subject of the inquiry into the Hong Kong expedition came before the house it was at first suggested that the investigation should be by a committee of this house. On reflection, all leaders of the different parties in the house were agreed that it would not be advisable to have the inquiry made by a committee of the house, in that among other reasons, much of the information that would be essential might, if given in public, afford information to others, the enemy in particular, which it was not desirable they should have. Much of it would necessarily be confidential, and it was decided that it would be better to have the inquiry conducted by a royal commission.

The next point that came up in considering the personnel of the commission was whether or not the inquiry would necessarily be in camera or in public, or in part one and in part the other. There again the understanding, or at any rate the feeling, was that the inquiry would necessarily have to be at least in part in camera, and that the commissioner himself should be the judge of the extent to which publicity should be given the proceedings. It is in that connection that I referred to the office which the commissioner holds at the present time.

The commissioner was the Right Honourable the Chief Justice. The Right Honourable Chief Justice Duff was chosen for that position as commissioner because it was felt that his knowledge of procedure in matters of the kind, his judgment as to what it might or might not be in the public interest to disclose with respect to the significance of the Hong Kong inquiry, would not be questioned from any source.

If I am not mistaken, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition said from his seat in the house—if he did not say it from his seat in the house, he said it to me personally—that in his opinion no better choice could possibly be made than the chief justice to conduct the inquiry, that he had implicit regard for the integrity of the chief justice, and that no question would likely be raised with respect—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No one is attacking his integrity.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, but I am explaining the reasons why it was thought advisable to appoint a royal commission, and why the chief justice was chosen. It was the knowledge that of necessity the inquiry would have to be held in camera, if not in whole at least in part. So that to that extent at least there are the strongest of reasons why only such evidence should be produced as the chief justice himself has thought advisable. The commissioner, in addition to his report, has presented an appendix to the report which gives what he, the commissioner, says is the evidence that he regards as all that is essential to make public. This does not mean that what the commissioner has withheld is something that is withheld for any political reason. No one in the world would say that Chief Justice Duff, as commissioner, would withhold any evidence from a motive of the kind. Any evidence which the commissioner had not thought it advisable to have made public, and which is not published in his report, has been withheld undoubtedly for reasons which in his judgment are of first importance in the public interest. That reason and that reason alone is the one which actuates the government in declining to place further evidence on the table.

Mr. HOMUTH: The Canadian end of it should not be secret.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not propose to set my judgment up against either my hon. friend's or that of the commissioner.

Mr. HOMUTH: It would not compare very favourably.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If I had to choose between the two I should prefer to take that of the commissioner. As to there being a right to criticize the report, no one has said that this House of Commons has not that right. Any hon. member may say whatever he pleases with respect to the report and criticize it in any particular. That is his right and, may I say also, his responsibility.

My hon. friend speaks of the matter being sub judice as having been made an excuse for not having a debate on the subject. The matter is not sub judice at the present time. The report has been laid on the table of the house and it is available for discussion. The reason for our not having had the discussion up to the present time is that matters of more immediate importance have been before the house since the time the report was laid on the table.

In conclusion, may I remind hon. members that following the procedure the government had before it the example of another inquiry which, if not of greater significance, was at least of equal significance. I refer to the inquiry made by the government of the United States into the Pearl Harbour situation. A judge of the United States court and others were appointed commissioners. The inquiry was held in camera. The commission made its report, and so far as I know no request has been made for the production of the evidence. Certainly the commissioners have thought it inadvisable that the evidence should be made public.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They took action.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What action does my hon. friend propose that we should take?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Let us have the evidence.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend cannot suggest any other action but, "let us have the evidence." Where he stated that the United States commission had taken action, it was immediately after I had said that none of the evidence was placed before the country by that commission. However, this is not the time to argue the matter of the Hong Kong inquiry. For the present, all I wish to say is that the government does not feel that it is in the public interest to comply with this request, and the government will not agree to the motion.

Mr. CHURCH: Was a copy of the Duff report and blue book sent to the British government?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All these important matters are communicated to the British government.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the right hon. gentleman be good enough to look at Mr. Stokes' question in the British house on June 11, and Mr. Attlee's reply? I sent it over to him. He says that the Chief Justice of Canada wired to ask the British government to release the telegram which was sent by Great Britain asking for this expedition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have just been handed a copy of the Parliamentary Debates of the House of Commons of Great Britain, official report, dated June 11, 1942, from which I quote:

> Mr. Stokes asked the Prime Minister whether the decision to reinforce Hong Kong shortly before its fall was recommended by his military advisers; and how long it was anticipated that such reinforcements would enable Hong Kong to hold out?
> Mr. Attlee: His Majesty's government have no further statement to make on this matter at the present time.
> Mr. Stokes: Are the government likely to receive a copy of the report by the Lord Chief Justice of Canada to the Canadian parliament on Hong Kong, and will they study it?
>
> Mr. Attlee: There is a later question on that subject.
> Mr. Stokes asked the Prime Minister whether his attention had been called to the report of the Chief Justice of Canada, made to the Canadian House of Commons, on the organization, authorization and dispatch of the Canadian expeditionary force to Hong Kong; and why permission to reproduce the telegram inviting the Canadian government to send reinforcements to Hong Kong was refused by His Majesty's government?
> Mr. Attlee: Yes, sir. As regards the second part of the question, it was felt by His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom that publication of the document in question would be contrary to the public interest at the present time.

Mr. COLDWELL: When will an opportunity be afforded to discuss this report? The Prime Minister says that it is on the table; will there be an opportunity to discuss it at an early day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be some special reason why my hon. friend feels that the discussion of this report should proceed before discussion on such important matters as the budget and the amendment to the National Resources Mobilization Act are finished. When the report was tabled I intimated to the house that those two matters would be disposed of before the Hong Kong matter would come before the house for discussion. I cannot see that any interest, either Canadian, imperial or international, will be adversely affected by what to that extent there may be in the way of delay.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not suggesting that these other important matters should be delayed, but I do want to be assured that some opportunity will be afforded by the government, which arranges the business of the house, for a discussion of this matter before the house adjourns.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have given that assurance to the house on at least two or three occasions, and I referred to it again this afternoon. If my hon. friend cannot accept my word, I am afraid there is nothing else I can do or say.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped on division.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA COAL MINING AREAS—BANKING OF COAL, AND CREDIT ARRANGEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to make an inquiry of the Minister of Labour, arising out of press reports, particularly in Nova Scotia papers, to the effect that certain credit and banking arrangements in connection with coal have been made by the government in order to relieve the acute situation that exists in Nova Scotia. In view of the fact that this matter has been discussed in the house on several occasions, I should like to know if the minister is in position to make a statement as to just what arrangements have been made.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have stated previously in the house that the reason for this condition is a lack of transportation of a particular kind. It is hoped that an early improvement will result because of efforts that have been made to make greater use of the railways. A plan is now being studied to provide additional transportation by rail. I assure my hon. friend and the house that the several departments of the government having to do with this problem are leaving nothing undone that might bring about a solution.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that there are facilities for the banking of 500,000 tons of coal which will be urgently needed this year, and that the cost of banking and loading would be about $1 per ton. It is in the national interest that this should be done. Why is it not being done? Why are these miners being allowed to work only one or two days a week? The situation down there calls for immediate attention. These measures are open to the government at any time and could be put into effect by the stroke of a pen.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will be frank and say that I have no knowledge of what my hon. friend says, but I shall be glad to look into that aspect of the question.

Mr. GILLIS: I realize the government is doing everything possible in connection with the marketing problem. According to reports I have seen, certain subsidies have been granted in connection with the banking of coal, and credit arrangements have been made for the customers who might purchase coal ahead of time. The minister should place on the record exactly what these arrangements are.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think we all understand what is the real difficulty in Nova Scotia. It is brought about by conditions over which neither I nor anybody else has any control. As I said before, the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition will be looked into. Hon. members may rest assured that the government are just as much interested in the miners of Nova Scotia as any hon. member of this house. I want to state that quite clearly.

CANADIAN NAVY

QUESTION AS TO COOPERATION WITH FREE FRENCH FLEET ON ATLANTIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) what cooperation or active help is being given by the Canadian navy to the free French fleet which is helping our allies guard the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic and the islands off Newfoundland?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be placed upon the order paper.

Mr. CHURCH: That means it will never be answered, because I did try to get it on the order paper.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

The house resumed from Friday, July 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.—Mr. Ilsley. —Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, when the house was in committee on the bill on Friday last I was not able, owing to arrangements I had made, to be present during the discussion. But I have read the debate since, and I find that in answer to requests that individual fishermen owning boats or gear should receive some protection from this type of measure an order in council was passed, quite independently of the scheme, under which payments on the basis of compassion are to be made to fishermen through the Department of Fisheries at the will and pleasure of the Minister of Fisheries.

I read the minister's statement in giving that information, and I gather that the order in council was not available at the time the discussion took place on Friday last, and has only since been distributed, but I am unable to arrive at a proper comprehension of the reason why this method was adopted dehors the bill itself and why it should not be made part of a comprehensive scheme of insurance even if the anticipated recipients are not paying any premium, and of what the insuperable difficulties are to including this provision in the statute itself rather than in an order in council which may be repealed at any moment at the whim and pleasure of the minister.

The objection to this method of procedure by order in council is that it is the most temporary kind of legislation. It can be wiped out by a stroke of the pen. There is no certainty about it. It has not the force of a statute inasmuch as a statute can be repealed only by parliament, while this may be repealed by council on the recommendation of the minister, and I take the ground that that is not good enough for these fishermen if they are in a position where they require protection of this kind.

Furthermore, I object to this order in council on the ground that it leaves everything to the whim of a minister, who, if he wanted to be arbitrary, could take action whereby not one dollar of compensation could be paid to any person. The power is purely discretionary on his part. Section 2 of the order in council reads:

> The minister may pay compensation to any person in the amount, not exceeding $2,000, of each diminution of value caused by war damage in any fishing boat of which he is the owner; provided that if any person is a joint owner his compensation, hereunder, shall be limited to his proportionate share of the said $2,000.

The compensation with respect to gear must not exceed $400, and in no case shall small claims less than $25 be paid. The whole thing is left to the discretion of the minister.

Mr. POTTIER: In the insurance bill it is the same way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be. I am dealing with one particular thing, and may I say with great respect to the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, that I am asking the minister for an answer to my question just why this method was adopted, and why this protection is not incorporated in the bill. Would it upset the whole balance of the scheme to include it in the bill? I have not formed an opinion, because I realize that this is a technical matter, and I presume that there have been calculations, mathematical, actuarial and what-not, in relation to the whole scheme, and that this is an intrusion on the scheme; I think it is fair to say that. It is a new element being injected at the demand of hon. members who, very properly, have made this demand. But just why is it impossible to put this in the bill and make it part of a statute instead of an order in council, which depends in large measure upon the good-will and bona fides of a minister?

If I wanted to be very critical I could say this, that in the hands of a politically-minded minister—and we have seen this sort of thing worked in days gone by in other fields of activity, not particularly in the maritime provinces, but further west, we will say—the granting of public money might be open to the very gravest abuse, open at least to charges of favouritism, open at least to pressure, open to some form of duress, especially if pay-day came around about the time of a general election. Can one imagine any instrument in the hands of an unscrupulous minister that would be better fitted to drive right into the ballot boxes the votes of the would-be recipients of this largesse, because it is to be granted on grounds of compassion; it is not a grant ex gratia, not a grant as of right.

The principle seems to be absolutely wrong, and unless there is forthcoming a satisfactory answer I do not think we can accept this.

assuming always that the principle contended for is a correct principle, namely, that there shall be compensation under an enlargement of the scope of the original scheme which was set up in the bill now before the house and which was given careful study by the banking and commerce committee. I wish the minister would be good enough to let us know the exact position.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Chairman, the provisions of the order in council referred to by the leader of the opposition were carefully considered. Members of this committee will recall that when the insurance bill was first before it, several members representing constituencies where fishermen reside pointed out that there was no provision in the bill for state insurance of fishing boats.

It was then stated by the Minister of Finance at my suggestion that the matter of protecting fishermen against loss by war damage was under consideration; that damage to the person of a fisherman by war accident was already provided for by order in council under the War Measures Act; that the protection of the personal belongings of a fisherman when lost by reason of war activity was also provided for by order in council; that the matter of protecting the implements of his trade—his boat and his gear—was under consideration, and that it was the intention of the government to provide some compensation to those who would lose through war activities the implements of their calling. The principle was to provide for replacement at government expense of whatever implements of trade might be destroyed, in order to keep these people in production without any delay, because most of the fishermen who carry on this occupation as a method of earning their livelihood would be too poor to replace their implements if these were lost in large quantities. On that basis it was thought in the public interest to give assurance to the fishermen that they would be taken care of; that their implements would be replaced if they were lost; that that would encourage them to stay in the industry, which, we were told, some were threatening to abandon because of the great risks to which they were exposed.

At the time this matter came up, the whole of the regulations of the scheme had not been embodied in any legislation or order in council but was being elaborated by the officials of the Department of Fisheries. Since then we have been able to bring into concrete form what we thought would be fair provision to compensate those who might suffer losses of their fishing gear. This is the reason why this was presented in the form of an order in council under the War Measures Act, as a sequence of other measures taken for the protection of the persons and personal belongings of fishermen.

As to why the administration of the provisions of this order in council is left to the Minister of Fisheries, I see no special reason, except that apparently the governor in council had enough confidence in the minister of the department to leave this function in his hands.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the minister's department put it up to the government.

Mr. MICHAUD: It was proposed to the governor in council, and somebody had to be designated to administer it. Practically all matters of this kind are left to the administration of the minister of the department under whom they come. For example, the insurance provisions will be administered under the authority of the Minister of Finance; provisions regarding the administration of regulations to compensate farmers are to be administered by the Minister of Agriculture. Otherwise there is no particular reason why the administration of these provisions is left to the Minister of Fisheries.

As to why the provisions are not included in the insurance bill, that is a matter for the Minister of Finance to explain to this committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has added just exactly nothing to the sum total of the information which we have.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is not very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, no, I would not say that; he has not added anything to our knowledge. The fact of the matter is that this is in the form of a dole handed out at the whim of the minister, exactly on the basis of some of the doles which have been distributed among the agriculturists of this country under other forms of order in council. Now he says that damage to the persons of fishermen was taken care of by an order in council under the War Measures Act. I submit that that was an emergency procedure, in anticipation of enemy action, but that this is a scheme looking toward compensation and protection of the fishermen of this country, on both coasts and, if you will, in the interior as well. I see the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) raised that question the other day in the house. This should be part and parcel of a general scheme and incorporated in the bill, so far as I can understand the position. Why it has not been done I would not expect the Minister of Fisheries to state, and I am not criticizing him in that regard. But I do object to the principle of a sum being allocated to one minister to hand out here, there and everywhere, wherever he wants to, under a provision of an order in council.

The whole principle of dealing with public money on this basis is wrong. It should be done under a statute, and it should not be left to the discretion of the minister no matter how fair-minded he may be. The principle is wrong: it is wrong in the fisheries department, in the agriculture department, in every department of government. You are dealing here with taxpayers' money. I wonder what the people of this country, who are now being called upon to pay more and more and more in the way of direct taxation, will think when they find out that 25 per cent of all the taxes they pay for the purposes of the war effort is being diverted to other objects. That is the indictment against the budget: 25 per cent of the money which the people are to contribute is being frittered away on useless agencies which are costing huge sums of money and are in no way connected directly with the war.

It will be argued, of course, that this arises out of the war. In a measure that is true, but I think there are many instances where large amounts of public money, contributed by people who are already being taxed up to the limit, will be paid out under the authority of orders in council for purposes not directly connected with the war. The people of Canada are willing to give to the war, but they are not willing to give carte blanche to this government or any minister of this government to switch war taxation to purposes which are not directly connected with the war.

I object to the principle of this order in council. I object to the power being left to the minister. With respect to the order in council passed under the War Measures Act, compensating for life or property damage of fishermen or others, that ought to be included in a statute of this parliament. The principle of legislation by order in council has gone absolutely beyond all limitation in this country.

Our control over government expenditures is gone. I wonder if the public realize that. I cannot emphasize it too much. I am not saying it especially in connection with this bill, but we see the principle illustrated every day—violation of the right of parliament to deal with public expenditure in matters that are really not war expenditures at all. I protest against that principle and against the operations under it. It is a wrong principle, and the operations are wrong. Parliament should not give its imprimatur to this class of legislation. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg says, "Is this wrong?" No, this is right; the theory underlying it is absolutely right. The fishermen have to be protected. That is why hon. members on all sides raised this question, in order that the government should do something. But I am objecting to the method, not to the principle. I believe I am right, and I think in his heart the hon. member knows I am right.

Mr. KINLEY: Like the leader of the opposition I did not have opportunity to be here last Friday, having been in Nova Scotia. But I read the record in Hansard and I know what the discussion was about. I shall not attempt to discuss the bill, which I think is a splendid piece of progressive legislation, especially beneficial to the maritime provinces in war time. The leader of the opposition talks about extravagance. I know there is extravagance; we all know there is extravagance in war. But when he says this is not war-time legislation, I think he is at least exaggerating. I am sorry he picked out the fishermen as the object of his complaint about extravagance—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member cannot attribute anything like that to me. I think the fishermen ought to be looked after, and I did not say anything which could be interpreted in any such way as the hon. member suggests.

Mr. KINLEY: I admit that the hon. gentleman is very sympathetic with what we want to do for the fishermen. But he made an oration about extravagance, and coupled it with a little bill to give war-time protection to the fishermen of the maritime provinces. It did not sound in harmony, that is all.

An hon. MEMBER: This is an order in council, not a bill.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member says that it is an order in council. We have a bill before this house. In the committee some hon. members who are especially interested in the fisheries said there was a problem with regard to shore fishermen on our coast. We find that complementary legislation to look after the fishermen has been brought down by order in council. Much has been said about orders in council in war time, that we are governed by order in council. It seems to me that in war time the order in council procedure is especially needed. This legislation, because it is an order in council, will have more flexibility. If you put a law on the statute book it is fixed; it cannot be changed except by the House of Commons and the Senate, whereas the minister and government can amend this legislation in a moment if the occasion calls for it. In this serious crisis we might have damage on the coast that would demand further action. We think the order in council method is commendable for that reason, because by it the government can deal with the situation at a moment's notice.

The leader of the opposition talks about the powers of the minister with regard to this legislation. I have always been taught that an order in council had the same effect as a statute, that the minister is governed by the provisions of an order in council just as he is governed by the provisions of a statute. That being so, all he can do is act as trustee and administer the order in council according to its provisions. I do not think the fishermen of Nova Scotia or of Canada generally would expect anybody to do better in this regard than the head of this department, who has special knowledge of and is especially concerned with the problems of the fishermen.

The words in the statute and the words in the order in council are the same—"may" in each one. The hon. gentleman, who is an astute lawyer, has overstated his case a little with regard to the difference between the statute and the order in council.

We must remember, in thinking of this legislation, that the fisherman has the same protection with regard to his house and furniture and chattels as is accorded to other citizens. To an extent this is extra legislation for the benefit of the fishermen, but only to an extent. Let us look at the practical end of it and see how it works out. The shore fisherman lives in remote fishing districts, on the headlands. As a rule he has a humble house. His house and furniture are not worth a great deal of money. In my county the houses of the shore fishermen are clean and sanitary, but not expensive. The hazard to the fisherman's property so far as a war damage insurance scheme is concerned is not as great as in the towns where buildings are closer together and extensive damage can be done. So that there are two reasons why the fisherman's situation is different: his property is not worth as much as property in the town, and the hazard is smaller because his dwelling is in a remote place.

Under the general law we agree to pay to the extent of $3,000 on real property, according to the assessed damage. We pay up to $800 for goods and chattels, and $400 if a man is married, $100 if he has a child. So that a married man with one child—this includes the fishermen—could get $1,300 for his effects. But there are very few shore fishermen on our coast who would be able to show an assessed damage of $1,300 on the effects they have in their homes. On the other hand the fisherman's floating property is excluded by Bill No. 56. A fisherman who has a humble home might still have fishing gear worth thousands of dollars. He cannot get insurance on his gear. The shore fishermen in Nova Scotia, even in peace time, were unable to get insurance on their boats and equipment. This order in council provides that $2,000 can be paid to a fisherman in respect of loss of his boat by war damage, $400 for the loss of gear—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not as insurance.

Mr. KINLEY: It is compensation; that is the word used in the bill. The question has been raised that only one boat can be included. I think this is a weak feature of the order in council, because a poor fisherman may have two or three small boats, and the more prosperous fisherman may have a boat worth well on to $2,000. In that case the better-off fisherman could receive up to $2,000 and the poor fisherman could get compensation for only one boat. In Nova Scotia the fisherman usually must have two or three boats. I am told that it takes eight boats to haul and spill a fish trap, and a man who has a purse seine will need more than one boat in order to carry out his operations. Then usually in the poorer districts there are no wharves for a boat to use, and a fisherman must moor out in the stream, so that he must have a boat to return to his fishing boat. Usually he should have a dory in which to take his fish ashore, a small boat that can go up on the shore and also can be easily handled in the surf.

I am saying these things because this is legislation by order in council; and while I do not want the bill amended, I believe that when you go to council you might be able to amend this order so that the standard will be the amount of the insurance. That is, you give a fisherman $2,000 compensation for war damage. If he has in his possession fishing boats that are damaged to the extent of $2,000, he should get that $2,000, but it seems to me it is not fair to say that he can get compensation for only one boat. The principle of the order in council is that the government is willing to pay $2,000 to a fisherman for war damage; and if he has fishing equipment which is damaged he should be able to invoke the aid of this legislation.

I understand there is a problem on the Pacific coast. I do not know much about that coast, and I am not going to speak about it. But in Nova Scotia we have a deep sea fleet. In my own riding, in Lunenburg we have sixty-eight vessels in the deep sea fleet and in Queen's another eighteen, while in Lunenburg we have 651 fishing boats getting the bounty and in Queen's another 167, making a total of 818 boats and eighty-six vessels. The lobster fishermen are not included in that number, and there are many boats in the lobster fisheries which will be covered by this legislation. Deep sea vessels cost about $50,000 to-day. They can get insurance from the line companies—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: At what rate?

Mr. KINLEY: I am not sure about the rate; it changes according to the hazard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It has gone up, anyway; there is no ceiling on it.

Mr. KINLEY: I know that they usually insure with American companies, and that we follow very closely the practice in the United States. A vessel of more than ten tons can be registered, and I believe that a registered vessel can get insurance. I am not concerned, for the purposes of this debate, with the rate; this legislation was intended for the protection of property in Canada, where private enterprise has failed to provide the protection. It was pointed out to the committee that boat fishermen could not get insurance, and this legislation is to provide protection for those fishermen. I do not think I would like very much to get only $2,000 as a start for insurance on our Lunenburg fishing fleet, but they can get private coverage; they are getting it, and they are doing very well. It is a question of expense. It seems to me we have gone a good way when we accept the idea that in this legislation we should not invade the field of private enterprise, where that private enterprise is being restricted because of increased hazards and because the volume of business is decreasing.

There is one part of the bill about which I should like to be sure; that is, what damage will be insurable? I know the Department of Transport is now changing the method of life-saving in the province of Nova Scotia. The old idea of a life-saving station is now outmoded, and they have the idea of getting the fishermen of the province to keep their boats ready for rescue work if a ship should go ashore or be attacked by a submarine on our coast. I should like to be assured that if these fishermen suffer damage while engaged in that work, they will be protected under this order in council, as I believe they will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know how.

Mr. KINLEY: I will read the clause to my hon. friend; it is paragraph (ii) on page 4 of the order in council:

"War Damage" means,—

(ii) damage occurring, whether accidentally or not as the direct result of measures taken under proper authority to avoid the spreading of, or to mitigate the consequences of, such damage as aforesaid.

It seems to me that is broad enough to include life saving in the province of Nova Scotia.

I do not wish to deal with the problems of our friends in British Columbia, but representing perhaps the largest fishing interests on the eastern coast and perhaps the greatest number of deep-sea and shore fishermen, I think this bill will be eminently satisfactory if the minister will extend it so that it will not be confined to one boat. It is very easy for us to get up here and say we want something better. We speak without having the responsibility of government, without handling the money of this country. Hon. members of the opposition talk about extravagance on the one hand, but at the same time they ask for greater expenditures in certain directions. I think this legislation is a step in the right direction; I believe it is good legislation. Let me say to my friends in British Columbia that when I was home over the week-end I was confronted with this question: "Why are the fishermen in British Columbia given a bounty of $150 per ton to build fishing vessels there, while there is no such legislation applicable to Nova Scotia?"

Mr. NEILL: If I may ask the hon. member a question, do not the maritimes get $160,000 every year for that purpose?

Mr. KINLEY: No.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, you do.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What do you get for lobsters?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No subsidy for lobsters.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There was last year.

Mr. KINLEY: This $150 per ton is a big subsidy to build fishing vessels, and that legislation was initiated by the minister who is promoting this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the question of subsidies is a little foreign to the subject matter before the committee.

Mr. KINLEY: I am not complaining; I am comparing, as I think I have a right to compare, the minister's actions in connection with this measure with similar legislation affecting another part of the country. We did not complain about that other legislation. I would not complain if the minister gave British Columbia more, but representing a fishing district I do say we should support this legislation. Furthermore we should not forget that the government has passed an order in council protecting fishermen and sailors against enemy action to the same extent that soldiers, naval men and airmen are protected. This is new legislation, never before thought of in Canada—

Mr CRUICKSHANK: Did we ever have a war like this before?

Mr. KINLEY: When we talk about what is being done for the fishermen of this country we must not lose sight of the fact that the government has done a great deal; and while the leader of the opposition complains about the procedure, I am sure he is ready to approve the objects of the legislation.

Mr. REID: When this matter was before the committee the other evening the Minister of Fisheries stated that a fisherman could afford to insure his boat, and then if anything happened he could collect from the insurance company. The Minister of Finance also stated in answer to a question that the fishermen could obtain insurance for their boats. Since those statements were made information has come to hand from British Columbia. The information which I have before me is that a certain class of fishermen owning boats worth between $3,000 and $6,000 cannot obtain insurance, and that those who have boats worth between $3,000 and $6,000 are called upon to pay premiums of from 35 per cent to 45 per cent for their insurance. What does that mean? It means that if a fisherman who has a boat worth $4,000 and who is compensated only up to $2,000 under the order in council, wishes to insure his boat fully, he must forgo the free insurance or compensation. If his boat is worth $4,000 he will have to pay up to $1,800 or $2,000 by way of premium. What fisherman earning his livelihood, making perhaps altogether not more than $2,000, would pay up to $1,800 or $2,000 to insure his boat?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is that yearly insurance?

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): What would the premium be for war risk damage?

Mr. REID: That 45 per cent is on account of war damage. That would cover all.

Let us compare the fishermen owning one of these small boats with the owner of a house. The government has pointed out that houses are insured for $3,000. While we all agree that $2,000 in the case of the fisherman is splendid as far as it goes, at the same time we cannot help comparing that with the insurance in the case of the owner of a house, and looking at the matter from the point of view of the risk of the fisherman's livelihood. There have been submarines off the Pacific coast, and the fishermen know it. They are greatly alarmed about the presence of these submarines, because they realize that if they are out on the fishing banks and a submarine shows up it is not only the boat that is in danger, but their very lives, because a submarine might endeavour to sink the boat and drown the men so that no information will get back which will disclose its whereabouts. The fishermen have that in mind, and it is a serious thought. We are endeavouring to catch all the fish we possibly can in order to feed the people of Great Britain, and yet the fishermen are told that if they insure their boats to the full extent they will not be covered by this $2,000 compensation which the government has brought down by order in council.

We are not asking for something as a matter of the "gimme's"; the fishermen are asking for what is fair. Despite the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has said that we are insuring houses for $3,000 and that the fisherman's boat is in an entirely different class, I submit that we must consider all the circumstances when we compare the two. Homes remain stationary; if an aeroplane passes over and drops a bomb, a house may be demolished. That is true, but on the other hand the fisherman goes right into the danger, and that makes all the difference. I believe there would be greater satisfaction all round if the government would amend the order in council and put the fishermen on the same status as owners of houses that are insured. I do not think it is asking too much. The government could do this up to $3,000, and if a fisherman had a boat worth $6,000 he could go to an insurance company and insure for the other $3,000. Under the order in council, however, if he asks for more insurance he is deprived of the $2,000. There is no comparison between the compensation given the fisherman and that given the man who owns a home.

I was sorry to hear the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) bring in the question of boats being built in British Columbia receiving $150 a ton subsidy. I have always deprecated the cry of those in the east that the west gets too much, or that British Columbia is specially favoured. I have refrained from raising any such question in this house.

Mr. KINLEY: Mr. Chairman, I believe I said it kindly and not in a complaining tone. I said I was comparing, not complaining.

Mr. REID: But the mild language which the hon. member used did not detract at all from the fact that he was complaining.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was a little sting in it?

Mr. REID: May I tell the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg why that subsidy was given. At the outbreak of the war the naval department was short of ships, and a number of large new fishing vessels had just been completed. The naval department took them over without permission. They just notified the owners that they were taking over the new boats, some of which were splendid, new vessels costing as much as $45,000. I am speaking of the fall of 1939. Some of these vessels had only recently been launched. In my opinion it was a mistake to follow that policy. The government should not have bought these boats outright. The naval department should have leased them and had naval boats built; and, when their own boats were built, they could then have returned the other boats back instead of retaining fish boats in the naval service. These fish boats are not adapted to the protection of our coasts. They are good enough for surveys and for scouting, but it is not possible to place anti-aircraft guns on such vessels because it would shake them to pieces. The reason why the $150 subsidy was given is that, since 1939, prices have increased, and to enable the cannery men to order new fish boats adequate for their work an inducement was held out whereby the government undertook to pay the difference in price as between 1939 and 1942. There is nothing unfair about it, and I hope that we shall hear no more complaints from the maritimes about what British Columbia is getting. If ever that argument starts we shall have a free-for-all, and we can tell plenty about what the maritimes have received.

The minister, I submit, should reconsider the order in council. We are not asking too much when we plead on behalf of the great class of fishermen who own boats worth from $2,000 up, that the same provision be made for them as has been made for those people who own homes. These fishermen cannot obtain insurance. The statement was made by the Minister of Finance that they could, but they come back with a different statement, indicating that they are unable to procure insurance. In the light of all the facts; in view of the great danger that exists on the Pacific, and the fact that we want all the fish we can possibly catch, I urge upon the government the importance of reconsidering the order in council.

Mr. NEILL: May I take just a minute to deal with a personal matter? When this question was up before—in fact, when it was under consideration in May—I made a slip in connection with some figures which I should like to correct. I spoke about the Pacific coast boats numbering 1,800. I was thinking of a limited area. Taking all the boats on the coast, including halibut boats, the number would be between 8,000 and 9,000. It is impossible to tell exactly the number of boats in British Columbia. There are some 13,500 licenses issued, but some of these fishermen have two licenses and there is, therefore, some duplication. There are more boats on the Atlantic coast, but they are worth less because the boats are smaller and the engines are not so good. Apparently they do not need such expensive engines, because they do not go so far from shore. They get an old engine out of a Ford car, but on the Pacific they must have first class diesel engines. When we were dealing with this matter on May 28 the debate was adjourned. I had moved an amendment to eliminate the boats on the great lakes. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has since indicated that he will probably take this step, because it would be hard to justify including them in the bill and not including the coastal fishermen. By the way, I was criticized strongly for that.

I should like to deal with some of the arguments put forth by the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier), if they can be called such. When we were dealing with this matter in May he thought that everything was lovely, that this was the best of all things in the best of possible worlds, and the government was just all right. Apparently his party loyalty got ahead of his sound judgment; for he has the reputation of being a smart lawyer. He advised us to take what we could get—which was just exactly nothing—and hope for more. Did you ever see a man who had attempted to live on hope? Punch once published a picture which looked like a piece of attenuated rope, and they said that it was a picture of a man who had tried to live on hope. After representations had been made by British Columbia members the Minister of Finance kindly agreed to take some action. I give him credit for doing this. This is not a political attack; there is nothing in it of that kind for me. The Minister of Finance and the Minister of Fisheries got together and agreed to pay some attention to the representations we had made.

They decided to help the fisherman on the coasts. The only difference between us now, if there is one, is one of extent. This afternoon the Minister of Fisheries stated that it was intended to deal with those people who were too poor to build another boat. Can you tell me how a man who has a boat worth from $2,500 to $6,000 will be able to build another boat for $2,000? These men do not build boats just for the sake of appearances. They do not spend a nickel more than they have to, to make their boats strong enough to weather the storms. When a man spends $6,000 on a boat you may be sure that every dollar is required. A man cannot replace a $6,000 boat with $2,000. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare takes exception to the benefits now being obtained through the efforts—

Mr. POTTIER: On a point of order, I think that statement should be withdrawn. I never objected to any benefits being obtained by the fishermen, and my hon. friend knows that as well as I do. I think he should withdraw any implication of that kind.

Mr. NEILL: I will read what the hon. member said.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must accept the statement of the hon. member. If an hon. member says that he did not make a statement, attributed to him, his statement must be accepted.

Mr. NEILL: Unless you can produce the evidence.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I quote from page 3928 of Hansard, where the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Claire said: "I think we should leave it as it is now."

Mr. POTTIER: Leave what?

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) has quoted from one place in Hansard. I will later quote another. I do not see why the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare should take exception. Because of our efforts, the ministers have agreed to do something; when we try to get a more complete form of justice his party loyalty comes to the front and he says, "It is all right". In this case it is more than party loyalty, it is parochial loyalty as well. There is something here that definitely meets the needs of the fishermen in his riding. With the exception of 1·2 per cent of the boats there, they are all cheap boats. Consequently when the government passes an order in council providing for the payment of $2,000, he is quite satisfied. I am told on the best of authority, by a man who comes from down there, that you can buy the whole of that fleet for $2,000 a boat. Naturally he is quite satisfied. What does he care about British Columbia?

My hon. friend behind me, speaking this afternoon, taunted us about getting $162 a ton to help to replace boats taken away by the navy. The government are not doing this because they want to help the fishermen; they are doing it because they need more boats in order that more fish may be obtained for the British market. He forgets the fact that Nova Scotia gets $160,000 every year for the promotion of deep sea fishing. We are fishermen in British Columbia, but we do not share in any part of that.

Mr. KINLEY: Does the hon. gentleman refer to the fishing subsidy?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, deep sea encouragement.

Mr. KINLEY: That is an old story.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, it is an old story, and a sore one. I am not going to say anything more about that. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare says that he thinks that $2,000 is fair, for the reasons I have just given. Let me quote what he said. But here first, is an article in a paper giving a list of Japanese boats they are trying to sell in British Columbia, those that are left, the poorer and cheaper ones. Here are some of the values:

Glendale V	$14,500
May S.	8,750
Springtime V.	12,400

That gives you some idea of the value of the boats that we must have. Here is what the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare said, as reported on page 3927 of Hansard:

> I hope we do not get to the radical point—the "gimme's" such as we see from western Canada. That is apparently what this is developing into—"give us this," "give us that." I am willing to back them up in what is reasonable, but we cannot adopt a policy of digging into the treasury to support this and that and extend this and that luxury to this and the other.

Let me give you a picture of the "luxury" the hon. gentleman refers to, and I know of what I speak. The best fishing for these fishermen is for about an hour at dusk and an hour at dawn. They may fish in between, but those are the best hours. In order to get to the grounds at dawn they must leave at about two o'clock in the morning. At this time of the year dawn is about three o'clock and it takes about three hours to get to the fishing grounds, which are about thirty miles offshore. So that they must leave shortly after midnight. They fish on the way out for what they can get, then they fish for an hour or so at dawn. They then hang around all day, since it would not pay them to come back and go out again in the evening. They may fish through the day and get a few, but they generally try to snatch a few hours' sleep. They are out in the open Pacific where there is no barrier between them and Japan. They fish in what is known as the graveyard of the Pacific, where they are subject to the full swell of the Pacific ocean. You can imagine the comfortable sleep a man will get under conditions like that. At dusk he goes fishing again, and then he starts for home, getting in about ten or eleven o'clock. He may have a good catch, or he may have only three fish. I have seen a man come in with only three fish worth 45 cents apiece. He must sell his catch. He has to wait his turn. There may be 150 men waiting at the buyer's float. Then he has to go to another place to get his gas, and to another place to get his food. Then it is time for him to start out on his next morning's work. This is the day after day life of the fisherman which is described by the hon. member behind me as a life of luxury. If I could tell him what the western fishermen think of the life of a lawyer, and particularly a Nova Scotia lawyer, it would do him good, or at least would be illuminating. These fishermen take all the risks of the sea and of poor catches. However smart a fisherman may be, he is not responsible for the whims of a school of fish, which may happen to run 100 miles further out or fifty or thirty miles away. It may be that he has no luck at all, but fishes all season and does not catch enough fish to pay for his gas and oil, let alone the upkeep of his boat. On top of all that, he now has this further hazard of being bombed. The lighthouse that was bombed by the Japanese was in my district, right in the centre of the fishing industry.

I wish to quote from a letter I received the other day from the Kyuquot Trollers Co-operative association, one of the finest instances of cooperation I have ever heard of. Twenty years ago they were poor, dissatisfied, hard-luck people, barely able to make a living. Then they got together and said: "We will cooperate." Without any government assistance at all, they put in their nickels and dimes and dollars and established their cooperative organization, and now they have a fine business community. They run their own packer, and so on. This man writes on behalf of the whole association, and incidentally I might say to the Minister of Finance that this man would like to see insurance covering fish packers and seiners as well as trolling boats. This is the letter he writes to a member of the ministry:

As you may not be aware, the fishermen joined together in this association produced 3,500,000 pounds of salmon during the season of 1941; and that, owing to the removal of the Japanese fishermen from the west coast, the white fishermen now alone must brave the dangers of the sea, and in addition, be subject to surprise attacks by any lurking submarine, which may do great damage, and when fishing offshore, might prevent these small boats from reaching shore.

As all the salmon suitable for canning has been earmarked for British consumption, and the fishermen have been urged to go out and produce as much as possible, irrespective of the dangers to which they expose themselves, we were quite surprised to learn from the new proposed bill for "war risk insurance" submitted in the House of Commons that salt water fishermen had been excluded, while the inland fishermen, who might be considered almost out of danger, could have their boats and equipment covered.

We wish to point out that most of the fishermen have invested their all in their boats and equipment, and they are not alone risking their property, but also their lives in trying to produce the foodstuff which is so urgently required; also, we might say that they expose themselves to the same dangers as the naval forces, who at least will be looked after, and their dependents compensated in case of loss of life.

He goes on to speak of submarines being off the coast and says that the white fishermen have made a very successful attempt to replace the Japanese fishermen and that their output is on the increase. Then he says, and this bears out what the hon. member for New Westminster said:

As far as is known to the writer there is no "war risk insurance" available to this type of boat, varying in value from $2,000 to $6,000, and if it could be procured the premiums would likely be so high that the fishermen could not afford it.

If you could assure these fishermen that they would receive the same consideration as the other classes of Canadian citizens as regards property, although it may be classed as floating, we feel sure you will have rendered the producers of an essential foodstuff a great service and the returns from that source would justify your support for an all-out effort in production.

You should not forget that these small boats help to protect our west coast by assisting the naval and air forces with any information they may gather without any military standing.

Here is another letter, only a short one:

What in the world is the matter with the government, when they are prepared to insure boats on lakes and fresh water rivers but not those who go to sea?

Take the case of us fellows at Kyuquot, we are fishing daily, anywhere from three to twenty miles offshore in the open Pacific. If there is any commercial activity going on anywhere, that is exposed to as much potential war risk, I'd like to hear of it.

I value my boat at $5,000. It represents ten years of struggle and savings. I can't afford to carry even the ordinary insurance for fire and wreck for this district.

Ask the Minister of Finance to get out an atlas of Vancouver island, then run his finger along the west coast till he comes to the promontory of Cape Cook, then ask him how he'd feel, fishing offshore from there twenty miles, in a 36-foot troller.

Fishermen generally, accept as their lot the ordinary hazards of this business, but feel they should be covered by damage from enemy action.

That is a genuine man. I can certify that he is a first-class fisherman and a fine type of man.

The minister says that he is introducing this change by order in council. I do not go to the extent the leader of the opposition did in suggesting all the dreadful things the minister might do under the order in council. I think the order in council will be administered fairly. There is no reason why it should not be, but I regret that this scheme was brought into effect by order in council, instead of by legislation which we could have discussed. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, if you wanted to be mean—of course, you would not be—you could rule that it was out of order to discuss the order in council because it is not before the house. It is the bill that is before the house. Why was not this order in council or its contents put before the fisheries committee? Why has not the fisheries committee had a meeting for years and years? If we had had this order in council before the fisheries committee it would have been put into better shape, but it was not sent to that committee at all. It was sent to the banking and commerce committee composed mostly of financial men who would not know a fisherman from a haystack if they met one. A lot of time would have been saved if the order in council had been put before the fisheries committee; both the ministers would have then been better informed, and they would have had a better order in council to put before the house.

We asked that the order in council be read into Hansard, but even that was not done. We were told that, instead, the order in council would be put on Votes and Proceedings. But we cannot get Votes and Proceedings in any quantity without paying ten cents apiece for them, ten cents for a little bit of paper. The price is prohibitive if one wants to send two or three hundred to the fishermen. I was able to get only a dozen. The order in council should at least have been put on Hansard, and should have been sent to the fisheries committee, where we could have discussed it.

[Mr. Neill.]

I object very strongly to this compensation being called "compassionate relief". Where is the compassion? Where is the relief? Is it not a just and a right thing? Are you telling these fishermen that they are being treated compassionately? I object to the suggestion that it is a hand-out. It is not like the $160,000 down in Nova Scotia, two dollars and a half to this boat and eight and a half to that boat, engaged in deep-sea fishing. I would call that political relief, and it has been going on for a long time. If a soldier or a sailor or an airman is killed, we do not call the care that we take of his widow and orphans compassionate relief.

There is another objection to the order in council. It will not allow the fishermen to insure beyond the $2,000 that will be granted by the government. They allow a man to insure his house beyond that. The house owner can insure his house up to $50,000 if he likes, and why in all fairness should we not allow the fisherman to do the same? But if the fisherman insures beyond this amount of $2,000, he loses the compensation granted by the government. The fishermen cannot get commercial insurance anyhow.

Under the bill the government are going to have a scheme of insurance of their own on buildings. It is to be done through an insurance agent, but the government pays the money. If you can insure a house through the government, why not a fisherman's boat? The Minister of Finance says that marine insurance is a new form of insurance to him, with which he is not familiar and that he does not care to go into marine insurance. The marine insurance people will take care of that. All we ask the Minister of Finance to do is to foot the bill, and in the last resort it always comes to the government.

An hon. member sitting behind me has pointed out the objection to having only one boat insured. As I said the other day, a cannery must have a number of boats or it could not keep the cannery running; and if a fisherman cannot afford more than one boat the cannery will lease him one. The fisherman and the cannery man must be able if they need, to have more than one boat. By the way, the order in council reads differently from the statement made by the Minister of Fisheries—quite inadvertently, of course—in the house the other day. He told us clearly and distinctly that there would be only one boat and only two men on a boat. And now the order in council—

Mr. MICHAUD: Oh, never.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nothing about "two men".

Mr. MICHAUD: I don't think I said that.

Mr. NEILL: The minister did not say it would be for only one boat?

Mr. MICHAUD: One boat, yes.

Mr. NEILL: Oh, yes; I did not mean to say "only one man". You are allowed two men in a boat. The minister said they would be allowed payment for only one boat. According to the definitions in the order in council:

> "Person" means any person, firm or incorporated cooperative association or society of fishermen, excluding, however, any other corporation,

That is the definition of "person". Then the limitation states:

> No compensation shall be paid any person under this order in respect of the diminution of value caused by war damage at any one time, in more than one fishing boat owned by such person, except where such person is a firm or is an incorporated cooperative association or society of fishermen.

That seems to me involved. The definition distinctly says that "person" will include a firm, and then the limitation says compensation will not be paid for more than one boat "owned by such person, except where such person is a firm or" —not "and"—"is an incorporated cooperative association or society of fishermen." Take the position of a fishing firm, the B. C. Packers, which is a well-known firm out there. The point is a difficult one; I do not propose to express an opinion; but the minister certainly said compensation would be paid for only one boat.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the hon. member's point is well taken, and that "firm" is in section 5 by mistake. I believe it should come out. The intention is, if I am correctly advised, to give the privilege of more than one boat to cooperative associations only. But that is a matter which can be considered.

Mr. NEILL: I am glad to hear the minister say that as to the Co-op, but the cannery men need the same privilege. If the minister would withdraw that paragraph it would make that all right.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. NEILL: And if he would grant a fairer sum for compensation, the order in council would be a reasonable thing, but the compensation is too small. I understand the situation. The minister's advisers have been drawn largely from Nova Scotia, or other places in the maritimes, where, it happens, these boats are small boats of no great value.

Mr. KINLEY: I have eighty-two boats in my riding worth $50,000 apiece.

Mr. NEILL: And we have thirteen thousand.

Mr. KINLEY: You are talking about the whole of British Columbia; I am speaking of my riding alone.

Mr. NEILL: I state positively that the boats in the maritimes are worth on an average much less than those in British Columbia, and that two thousand dollars to them is a much bigger sum per boat than it would be in British Columbia. Therefore it would be only fair to raise the $2,000 to $3,000. Even then they would take a huge loss, and why should they take a huge loss individually for what is the common loss and debt of us all? I am not suggesting that $3,000 should be given to everyone who comes along; claimants will have to prove their losses, just as an insurance company makes you prove your loss, and if they do not have a boat worth $3,000 they will not get that amount. I think that would be the reasonable and fair thing to do. The minister, who has shown fairness throughout this matter, could well afford to raise the limit to $3,000. Even then, I may tell him, in many cases a huge loss would be sustained. As the president of this association points out, boats cost from $2,000 to $6,000 each. The boats to which he refers are what are known as trollers. Trollers do not need a net; they need only lines, which run out behind the boat, and they have hooks and lines and the expense is quite small. But there is the gill-netter, which has a net worth $250 or $300, and it is only good for one year. Then there is the seine, which will cost around $1,200—that is the salmon seine—and the herring seine costs a good deal more. These big boats which go out with the seines will run as high as $25,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: And some, $45,000.

Mr. NEILL: Then there are these packers as well, which this association asks me about. I believe that, legally speaking, they are not deemed to be fishermen, and yet they are employed solely in the fishing trade. Their business is to pack the fish which has been caught in a certain spot and take it to the cannery, and it has been found that it is cheaper to pack the fish to a cannery centrally located than to build the cannery in a remote spot. They are engaged solely in fishing, and I plead with the minister to include "seiner" as a fishing vessel, at least while employed in packing fish.

I have spoken with very little preparation, and have not put the matter as well as I would have liked. But I will take a chance on the order in council being administered properly if it is extended in these two points —increasing the amount to $3,000, allowing them to insure with the government, like property on shore, and also putting packers in the definition.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think we should have another bill, instead of the order in council, to take care of this question of war risk insurance only, for boats of one kind and another. A number of hon. members seem to be getting this question of rates for war mixed up with full marine coverage rates. Can the minister tell the committee what premiums are charged, for war risk insurance only, on boats on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts?

While I am on my feet I should like to say something else. To placate some of the people who are not covered under this bill in connection with boats, the minister has seen fit to withdraw the privilege of insuring boats on the inland waters. Well, the war risk attached to boats on inland waters is practically negligible, and by taking this step the government of the day are just throwing away two or three hundred thousand dollars in premiums which they might very easily have, and which would help to pay for the extra risk which is assumed by the boats on both coasts. There is far greater risk there.

I do not think this coverage for boats on both coasts should be dealt with by order in council. It goes much further than provision for fishermen. Either you can get insurance at the present time or you cannot. I should like to know. We have been told that it is not obtainable: then I think it is up to the government to introduce a bill which will make it obtainable, and to insure a great many boats on the great lakes so that the cost to the government will be cut down very considerably.

Mr. MICHAUD: Just before the Minister of Finance gives an explanation of the details pertaining to the insurance aspect of this question, I should like to say a few words by way of further explanation and try to satisfy the minds of some hon. members as to the terms of the order in council, what it is intended to cover, and what protection it is intended to give to fishermen.

There are about 32,000 fishing boats and vessels used in the fishing industry in Canada. No census has been taken of them, for the reason that boats of the smaller class are not registered. No provision is made for their registration under any law or under any regulation governing qualification for any bounty or subsidy. But occasionally officials of the department make a general survey of their districts and report to us the number of boats that they list. These boats are worth from $25 to $150,000 each. There is the small tender, twelve feet or over in length, used by a certain class of offshore fishermen—

Mr. HOMUTH: Does the question of registration affect the insurance?

Mr. MICHAUD: In regard to insurance, but not to the fishing boats; that is another matter. Boats of ten tons and over, large enough to register under the shipping act, are called vessels. Of course certain insurance companies and interests make provision for marine and war risk insurance of these vessels. In fisheries parlance we distinguish between a boat and a vessel. A boat is a smaller type of craft used by individual fishermen and offshore fishermen; a vessel is a craft of ten tons and over.

Mr. NEILL: And the insurance companies do not care about insuring anything that is not registered.

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes, that may be so. But it does not take a very large craft to be classified as a vessel of ten tons register.

Besides the small boat used by the Atlantic offshore fishermen we have boats powered with gasoline or oil engines, such as the schooner of the Lunenburg type, a particular type of large boat costing $40,000 to $60,000; some of them cost $70,000 in these days. We have also the still larger type of boat operated by steam.

On the Pacific coast there are used in the fisheries various types. First there is the gill-netter, used by those who fish with gill nets for salmon. They are the more numerous of the classes of craft used there. Next comes the troller. The troller is in some instances in a larger class than the gill-netter. Then there are the large purse seiners, the halibut fishing boats, the carriers that are used in the canning industry, the packets and the tenders.

In extending protection to the fishermen a line had to be drawn somewhere, and we thought we should draw the line to cover the boats which are more numerous and are operated by the larger class of fishermen, the class which is least in a position to replace them and could not insure them, but are the largest factor in the production of the raw material of the fishing industry. We drew the line at $2,000, because, according to reports and information we have been able to gather, it covers all the class of boats that we intended to cover. As to the Pacific coast there may be something in what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said. It applies to the Kyuquot district where they have cooperative trolling, a very successful organization of fishermen; they have been improving the quality and size of their boats, because they are very progressive, and their business has now been made very profitable on account of the method they have adopted. There is in that section a class of trollers which costs more than $2,000—between $2,000 and $6,000. The exact number of those boats we do not know, but we are getting the information. There may be some scope for reconsidering the order in council if it is found that these boats cannot be insured. They may call for some special treatment. As to the other boats, I think they are pretty well covered.

Mr. NEILL: What about packers?

Mr. MICHAUD: These come in the class owned by people who we think can afford to insure, or if the boats are not insurable they must take the loss, because we cannot cover them all. There are packers, there are purse seiners and all kinds of boats, and if we started to raise the level we do not know where it would stop, because naturally each branch that is interested is trying to get as much protection as possible. That is to be expected. But we had to draw the line somewhere, and I think that for the time being we should be satisfied to protect the largest class and the class which is least able to protect itself.

Mr. HOMUTH: What has this to do with war risk insurance?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is not insurance, but it is a war risk. It is protecting them against damage caused by enemy action.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Under the order in council the limit is $2,000, what has that to do with the thirty-five thousand?

Mr. MICHAUD: I am simply mentioning that as an example, to give a picture of the situation, and to indicate what part of the fishing fleet we intend to replace and protect by the order in council. As to the rest, that is a matter to be considered—whether they should be insured, and in what way, by public insurance or private. I am simply explaining the application of the provisions of the order in council for gratuitous bounty to, or gratuitous replacement of, boats for a class of fishermen who could not by themselves do it, and who could not be kept in production if enemy action destroyed their fleet.

Another point has been raised by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, concerning the small fisherman who has two or three boats, which we in the east call his fishing unit, the three of them together not worth more than $2,000 but needed in his operations. This will be looked into, and if in order to protect him—this is the very class we want to protect—it is necessary to amend the order in council, we will do so.

To give the committee an example of the general average value of the fishing boats on the coast, may I say that at the opening of hostilities we took away from the Japanese nearly 1,200 boats. We had them appraised by an independent board in Vancouver, composed of the best men we could find for the work. I think they did a good job. The average appraised value of the boats was $1,280 each. There were a few boats of the bigger type, not many, which were operated by the Japanese in a commercial way, and which were listed in the magazines and offered for sale by the board; but they were the same type of boats that are operated by canneries or companies on the Pacific coast, the type which it is not the intention of this order in council to cover. But in the average figure of $1,280 I think we get a fairly good appreciation of the value of the common run of fishing boats on the Pacific coast.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What would be the total value?

Mr. MICHAUD: Between one and two million dollars. We have disposed of some of them for nearly a million dollars.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The minister said we had 32,000 boats.

Mr. MICHAUD: In all the fishing fleets of Canada.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the total value of those boats?

Mr. MICHAUD: I could not give that figure, because some are worth $30 and some are worth $100,000. They range in between those figures.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question, though I do not know whether I am in order under this particular section. While I represent one of the largest fishing ridings in British Columbia, frankly I do not know anything about fishing. I am quite in accord with what has been said by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for New Westminster, because with the exception of the Minister of Fisheries they know more about fishing than anybody else in this house, and I endorse everything they have said. While I know nothing about fishing, I think in that respect my knowledge coincides with that of the Department of Finance. The question I wanted to ask is based on a wire which I received from the Vancouver board of trade. For the benefit of those who are not well acquainted with British Columbia, let me say that Vancouver happens to be the third largest city in Canada. I am not a member of that board of trade, though I do belong to another board. Perhaps one reason why I am not particularly familiar with the operation of boards of trade is that in western Canada they are generally regarded as Tory organizations. But when a wire comes from the board of trade of Vancouver, representing the principal business men and men in all walks of life—

Mr. HOMUTH: Tories.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There are many good Liberals in it, too.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Oh, I do not mind him. I am particularly interested in this wire, which was sent to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) with copies sent to each British Columbia member. It reads as follows:

Due to imminent danger further damage caused by raids either air or sea on this coast we strongly urge that insurance companies be instructed to immediately accept on behalf of government applications for war risk insurance. All applications to be accompanied by cheque amount this deposit to be set by government. This procedure will establish fair basis for considering claims made under the retroactive feature of bill if damage precedes passage of war risk bill. Cannot stress too strongly our recommendations. Situation urgent and public apprehensive.

In view of the fact that this telegram is dated July 3, that it comes from such a body as the Vancouver board of trade, and that at least one hon. member from British Columbia is rather apprehensive as to what may happen to-day or to-morrow, I think we are entitled to an answer on this point by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have been trying to get myself in a position to give a satisfactory answer to inquiries such as this for two or three months. I have been trying to get this bill through, and I thought I might shorten the discussion by sending the bill to the banking and commerce committee and having them discuss it there, but it has come back to the house and, as hon. gentlemen know, a considerable amount of discussion has taken place. We have passed only one section; we are now on section 2, and I want to get back to section 2 as soon as possible. But this debate on the protection of fishermen came up. As I said the other day I felt that we would have to meet the situation in some way, in order to clear the way and get ahead with the bill, though I hoped the discussion on that point would not last too long. Probably it was not strictly in order, though ships are referred to in this section. However, I could not really raise a point of order, because in any event the discussion probably would run outside the bill, and I had no objection to hon. members discussing this fisheries order in council.

I received the wire which the hon. gentleman has read, or one like it, and I replied to it at once, stating that I could not authorize the insurance companies to accept applications or to write insurance policies now, because I did not have any legislation. I want to remind the house that I had power, or the government had power to enact legislation by order in council. That was express power under legislation, not under the War Measure Act but under the War Appropriation Act. Section 2 of every war appropriation act from 1915 up to the present time has contained this as one of the powers granted to the government:

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever—

I hope I am not making a statement that is at all shocking to the democratic sensibilities of hon. members of this house, but if I had the matter to do over again, contrary to what was said this afternoon by the leader of the opposition, I would have drawn up an order in council. Then I would have had a system of war risk insurance in operation, and I would not be embarrassed by telegrams such as the one just read by the hon. member. We have done things almost as important, or more important, by order in council, but we decided to bring this to the House of Commons. As a result here we are, on the 8th day of July, considering the bill in this house for perhaps the fifth or sixth time, after it has gone through the banking and commerce committee where it was discussed day after day.

I am just saying this because I want hon. members to realize that it is very important that this legislation get through. The hon. member for St. John-Albert spoke about it the other night. It is all very well to talk about bringing everything before the House of Commons, but under conditions such as these the House of Commons must assist as much as possible.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to take four or five minutes with reference to this bill—

Mr. ILSLEY: I still have the floor, Mr. Chairman. That was just by way of answer to the hon. member for Fraser Valley. The hon. member for St. Paul's asked what the rate of insurance is on our coasts; that is, war risk insurance, not marine insurance. I obtained the information by telephoning to Montreal this morning. The rate of insurance on the Pacific is 1¼ per cent for three months, provided the vessel does not go west of cape Spencer, which I understand is on Skagway. I think only the large boats engaged in halibut fishing go that far, and if the smaller vessels wanted coverage the rate might be less. I have no information which confirms the statement made this afternoon that insurance is not procurable. My information is that war risk insurance is procurable at these rates, which are substantial rates but not beyond reason. If for instance a company or a fisherman or anyone else had a boat worth $3,000 which he wished to insure against war risk at this rate, it would amount to 5 per cent for the whole year.

That is $150 of an operating charge which he would have in this time of war, more than in time of peace. It is $150, but it is a business expense which is assumed by all kinds of owners of fishing craft. On the Atlantic coast the rate is 2 per cent for three months and, as the member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) said, they put it on. They insure their schooners there. What is being asked of the government this afternoon is in effect that we should cut down all these policies by $3,000, and pay the premium for these fishing companies on the first $3,000 or the last $3,000, because the moment we say that we will assume the first $3,000 free, then every policy of $20,000 comes down to $17,000, because they get the premium paid by the government instead of paying it themselves. They are not asking for that, and I do not want to do that.

The comparison has been made between fishing boats and houses. There is no comparison. The fisherman gets the same protection as everyone else gets on his house, the same protection as everyone else gets on his furniture. Further than that, he gets free compensation for certain effects if they are lost at sea, and he gets insurance against personal damage or death, the same as members of the forces under the Pension Act. Now we come along and are taking a piece of business property, a piece of his capital, and are giving him free compensation for that, in addition, up to $2,000. I do not think we should be asked to go further.

If marine rates go out of all reason and there is a need to be met there, then the government may be compelled to adopt and put into effect a government marine insurance scheme. But I certainly will not, if I can avoid it, incorporate that in this bill because it is a different class of risk, a different kind of business. I would have to have a different set of advisers, people who know marine insurance, rather than fire insurance, because this is comparable to fire insurance. Marine insurance is the sort of insurance we are dealing with here.

I suggest that hon. gentlemen accept what has been done and allow the government to get ahead with this important bill. The leader of the opposition asked why we did not put this provision in this measure. I made it clear that it does not belong in this bill. It is entirely foreign to the bill, and that is the pressure which I have been obliged to resist from the beginning, to incorporate into this measure provision for property which does not belong with the property covered under the bill, as to which the risk is different, the business is different, and so forth. It would ruin our whole scheme if we did that.

The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) said what was true when he stated that we are throwing away $200,000 or $300,000 of easy premiums by cutting out ships on the great lakes. Why am I cutting out ships on the great lakes? I am doing so in order to avoid the charge of discrimination. Would there be a charge of discrimination? Certainly there would be. There are such charges in two of the letters which were read to-day by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). The charge is that we are discriminating in favour of big companies against small people. There are $200,000 or $300,000 of premiums which, it is said, we might as well have as not, but we are eliminating the ships on the great lakes so as to avoid charges of discrimination. I cannot stand here and have it said that I am sacrificing the people on the coast in favour of big interests in Ontario and Quebec.

The hon. gentleman dug out something from the order in council to indicate that a firm can get free compensation for more than one boat while the poor fisherman cannot. If I have my way, that will come out to-morrow, so that the firm will get compensation only for one boat. That is what I will do, because I will not have charges made of discrimination in favour of the big people as against the small men, or in favour of inland as against coastal interests. I cannot do it. The government has to be careful about these things.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The question of these boats on the great lakes falls more within the category of inland transportation insurance. It is not really a matter of marine insurance. I think the minister could easily get over the question of discrimination and still obtain these premiums, which he is otherwise throwing away, by having it understood that it would be on that basis. Not only that; it is not a question of discrimination at all but a question of allowing these people in the interior of Canada to have an opportunity of contributing toward those people on the coast in connection with the compensation they get with respect to losses sustained.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is arguing as I did the first day on which the bill came up. Now I have abandoned that ground because I have heard two letters read from British Columbia this afternoon. Indeed, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has another, and I have one also, accusing the government of favouring inland fishermen as against those on the coast. I cannot have that. I am sorry. I should like to have that $200,000 or $300,000 in premiums but we have to forget it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The remarks I am about to make are not in any sense critical, but I would point out to the minister the view held by a representative body, the Vancouver board of trade, in this matter. As I understand their telegram, it is not with reference to small fishing boats—

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not fishing boats.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: We happen to be—

Mr. MICHAUD: If you let this bill pass you will have it.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: One thing I resent, and I resent it also on the part of the Minister of Finance, is the suggestion that any private member is tying up this legislation. Certainly, if there is any tying up it is not by the members from British Columbia. We are elected to protect the interests of our constituencies, our province and the dominion as a whole, and I repeat, if there is any tying up we are not doing it. I am not quarrelling with the order in council. This is one of the few times when, in my opinion, action can be taken only by order in council. Obviously, as the minister himself said, conditions may change. The amount might change to-morrow as war conditions became either more serious or less so, either on the Pacific coast or elsewhere. But if the government can do that, there is no tying up on the part of private members. The tying up is being done by the government itself if it cannot put into effect the request of the Vancouver board of trade, that the insurance companies be instructed immediately to accept, on behalf of the government, applications for war risk insurance, all applications to be accompanied by a cheque representing the amount of deposit. Surely the government cannot say there is any tying up. We are here representing British Columbia, and the Vancouver board of trade, a representative body in that province, is simply asking that this suggestion be put into effect at once and be made retroactive, to be paid for if the government sees fit, in connection with ships of $2,000 or $3,000 or $10,000. That can be covered when the time comes. In the meantime, the government or its advisers—so far as this bill is concerned—apparently do not realize or have never heard of Egypt, and they have certainly never heard of the Japs. The danger is imminent and we must have action now. Surely, therefore, the government can instruct the insurance companies to accept the risk, subject to any provisions of this bill or of any other bill or order in council in the future. I expect to have the minister's answer.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: There are no fishing boats in Toronto. I want the minister's answer. I should like to know if there is going to be some action in this matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it would be proper that the bill at this stage should be enacted by order in council, behind the back of parliament, in order to meet that particular situation.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not wish to interfere with the hon. member for Fraser Valley getting a reply. I have read what he said about this bill and I have respect for his views. I wish, however, to continue my protest of three weeks ago against the policy of this bill and the change in the definition by order in council, the change in the whole bill, from the first clause to the end. In the first place, by this order in council the government is changing every definition in the Interpretation Act. You have to read the order in council into the last clause of the bill, which is the most important one of all, and the regulations are set out in nearly two pages of the bill. Is this parliament going to act as a sort of agent, a sort of life-saver for the insurance companies of the country, at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer? The only insurance we have in Canada to-day in connection with war damages of all kinds for fishermen was restricted by the committee, in the bill, first, to inland waters and extended subsequently. This bill should have been extended in the first place to coastal waters and to fishing boats and appliances which are near the danger zone on the Pacific and the Atlantic. Are we now going to relieve these insurance companies? I attended one of the meetings of the committee, and I am surprised at the action of the minister. The minister has a likable personality, but he is always very clever at special pleading for what I call certain sections of the country. He is not slow to plead the case of his own section of the country in regard to apples, potatoes, codfish and everything else. But when it comes to the central provinces, who are paying such a large part of the taxes, they get little or nothing. I do not represent any insurance company or loan company. I suggest that if the minister had kept the loan companies' agents out of the committee, it would have been better for everyone concerned. This country cannot stand the expense which has been imposed by the minister, assisted by his controllers and bureaucrats. These things are done by means of orders in council passed by these bureaucrats over the head of parliament.

I have no objection to war risk insurance in certain cases. These insurance companies came to parliament and asked that all kinds of risks be covered which were never contemplated either during the great war or this war. They said they were prepared to cover these risks and private bills were introduced into parliament. I opposed three or four of them which originated in Toronto. This is simply a utopian scheme which will never be carried out. We do not know just what is the real situation on the Atlantic and the Pacific. I made an appeal to the minister. Dwellings are to be covered up to a value of $3,000, but I do not know of any industrial worker who has a dwelling worth that much. We all know the deplorable state of our finances to-day.

This order in council changes many of the definitions in the interpretation section of Bill No. 56. We have the diminution value covered, applicants and so on. Where is the minister going to get this insurance? Some of these large insurance companies have made fortunes out of the premiums paid in, and they are doing very little to help the war. They do buy victory loans with trust funds, with the people's money and not their own. By this bill and the order in council the minister proposes to give these insurance companies the power to act as agents in this particular class of insurance. Power is being delegated to them to collect premiums and there will be no check on them. These companies will be a law unto themselves.

When this bill was before the house previously I objected to the second reading. At that time I said that there were two classes in the country which were not being covered, and apparently they have no special pleaders in this house. I refer to the industrial workers and the soldiers. The industrial workers used to have some property, but if we have many more of these budgets and controllers they will have property no longer. If the minister wants to do something he should inaugurate a system of national insurance. That would do far more to cover risks on the homes of industrial workers than this bill. The rates now charged are 5, 6½ and 7 per cent; the minister should take advantage of the power he has under the War Measures Act and cut this rate to 4½ per cent. When it was proposed that an order in council should be passed under the War Measures Act in order to check insurance rates and mortgage rates and to institute a system of national control of mortgages, the answer was, "oh, no." These companies have made fortunes out of the poor people, and parliament should give the poor people some protection.

I know of men who have gone to the war leaving everything they had. Their property should have been covered by an order in council passed under the War Measures Act. They are more capable than three-quarters of the men in the minister's department; they gave up jobs that were just as good.

In conclusion, I say that this bill and the order in council are class legislation of the worst kind. They do not provide protection for the property of the people I have mentioned. In my opinion the government has adopted a wrong principle. I am a warm supporter of protection for the fishermen because I know of their sufferings. I have been to both coasts, and I know how they suffered during the depression. The best that this parliament can do for them is not good enough.

There should, however, be some protection for the other two classes I have mentioned. With the present budget the fisherman or the soldier or the industrial worker will not have any property. With these budgets and controllers any property owned by the small retailer or the small wholesaler will be eliminated.

So what is the use of talking about a risk up to $3,000 on a dwelling, or on a fisherman's property? Under the definition as amended, what is the use of owning anything? The right to possess private property is derived from nature, not from man, and he and all his regiment of officials cannot take away that right. It existed before he was born, when the people of England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales came out here as pioneers and settled this country. But to-day all incentive to thrift has been abolished in this country. This bill and the order in council help only 50 per cent of our population, and the other 50 per cent are left to shift for themselves. Here we are reversing the policy of Macdonald, Laurier and Cartier and all those other great statesmen. I should like to see everybody own some property, whether it be some small business, a retail store, a mill, farm machinery, or even a cow. It is the private ownership of property that has helped to build up this country, and now we are seeing private property abolished.

I can tell the insurance companies that they had better look at the handwriting on the wall. Some of these insurance companies invested in common stocks and lost millions of dollars of the premiums that had been paid in for life insurance, and the result was that some of these companies were allowed to come to parliament and get a certificate, to which they were not entitled, to allow them to carry on.

I have every sympathy for the fisherman but I do not believe the fisherman will ever get a cent under this bill. I do not think anybody will get a cent under this bill. It is a technical bill designed by the dreamers and utopians of all kinds who have been trying to meddle with private business in this country, with wholesalers and with retailers and the ordinary business man. The bill will never attain the objects for which it was designed.

Why is not something done about a national scheme of insurance for the soldiers? If you say anything about the soldiers, you are told: The soldier owns no property. But I know soldiers who have given up all their property, who have lost everything, even life itself, and nothing is done to insure them; but dreamers in the insurance department can present a bill like this to parliament. If this is the way we are going to do our business, it is no wonder that parliament is fast losing its influence and the respect of the taxpayers of this country. Here we are, after talking for several months, and we have not yet considered one dollar of the minister's estimates.

There is no protection provided for the industrial worker. He has lost his property already through taxation.

I suggest that this bill be left over until next year, and let us close up parliament and get home as rapidly as possible. If the minister persists in going on with bills like this we shall be here until next October. Some of these bills will have to be dropped if the house is to close within a reasonable time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments to propose to section 2 which I will ask my colleague to move. The first reads:

That paragraph (f) of clause 2 of Bill 56 be amended by deleting the words "a line drawn from Father Point to Point Orient" in lines 3 and 4 on page 2, and substituting therefor the following: "the west end of the Island of Orleans;"

Mr. MICHAUD: I move accordingly.

[Mr. Church.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment that has just been moved narrows the definition of inland waters. It has been considered that the present line, which is from Father Point to Point Orient, is too far east, and that there is no justification for drawing the line any further east than the last point of transshipment for vessels from inland waters to vessels that are seagoing. Quebec is the point farthest east where such transshipment takes place.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The next amendment is:

That paragraph (j) of clause 2 of Bill 56 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:—

"(j) 'property' means buildings, machinery, fixtures or other structures erected or placed upon, in, over, under or affixed to land, and all movable corporeal property in Canada, but shall not include:

(i) land, exclusive of any structures aforesaid;

(ii) growing crops, plants and trees;

(iii) ships or vessels other than ships being built or equipped in Canada prior to their being completed, launched and/or equipped;

(iv) machinery, tackle, fishing gear or furniture of ships or vessels;

(v) property or goods laden or freighted in ships or vessels other than goods laden or freighted in ships used solely in inland waters;

(vi) money, negotiable instruments, securities for money, evidence of title to any property or right or of the discharge of any obligation, or any documents owned for the purpose of a business;

(vii) such other property as may be excluded by the terms of any contract of insurance or by any regulation and does not include use and occupancy, profits, earnings, consequential loss, accounts, debts or any incorporeal property."

The main change that is being made by this amendment I have already explained to the house several times; that is, all ships are now taken out of the bill, but personal property, that is the goods laden or freighted in ships on inland waters, is still left in the bill. I have explained the reason for coming to that decision.

Before this amendment, paragraph (vi) in the printed bill included the words "does not include the use and occupancy of buildings," and so on. We have cut out the words "of buildings," because that is not necessary. Then we have put in that it does not include "consequential loss."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does not that have a technical meaning? There is a legal interpretation of it I think.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has a technical insurance meaning, and I am advised that it should go in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, I am not just sure what the meaning is. The minister has not the meaning before him?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MICHAUD: I move the amendment accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have just one suggestion to make to the minister, namely, that in paragraph (vi) he should include the words "evidences of indebtedness". I think it would be desirable to put that in.

Mr. ILSLEY: I accept the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, that "evidences of indebtedness" go in after "securities for money", so that paragraph (vi) will read:

money, negotiable instruments, securities for money, evidences of indebtedness, evidences of title,

And so on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would make it more certain. Otherwise that might be left out.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Has the minister excluded what is now subparagraph (vi), or included it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Now that becomes subparagraph (vii) "such other property as may be excluded . . ."

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 as amended carry?

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): There is just one question I wish to ask before this section is carried. Is it intended that damage occasioned by an accident such as the Halifax explosion of 1917 shall be insurable under the act? In other words, would the words "munitions or explosives being lawfully . . . transported in Canada" in paragraph (1), subparagraph (iv), include munitions or explosives carried in a ship under way or at anchor?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is intended to cover an explosion in a harbour.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is quite clear that it does.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Before the section carries, there is another whole aspect of it which I think should have some attention from the committee, and I fear that we shall not have time this afternoon to give it that attention.

I should like to say in a general way that I have been impressed by the work of the committee this afternoon. Those people who are running about the country talking about the deficiencies of parliament, its carelessness and so forth, would, I think, have been enlightened had they been here to-day and observed the solicitude with which the various hon. members were looking after the interests of their constituents. After all, that is what we are here for—to look after our constituencies, which comprise Canada. I think the minister has honestly attempted to be fair to all concerned. I think he has listened with due sympathy to the requests of the various hon. members.

The matter I wish to discuss is the meaning of "value" in this bill. I note that paragraph (m) of section 2 was deleted. I was a member of the banking and commerce committee which deleted that clause, but I was never satisfied as to the reason why it was deleted. It is, I think, an important matter. The paragraph served as a sort of criterion by reference to which the minister's agents might hope to determine the extent of damage which had been done to a given piece of property—the value of the property. I wonder what, in the minister's mind, compensates in the bill for the loss which it has sustained by the deletion of that paragraph from the section. What is there in the bill now to enable those who will administer it to determine the value of a given piece of property which has been damaged?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was informed that the section, perhaps, did not quite represent the result of the court decisions as to what is the value under an insurance policy, and I understood that the members of the banking and commerce committee felt that the definition should be eliminated, that there should be no definition of value, and that value should be settled now as it is under a fire insurance policy, in accordance with legal principles. I understand it is very difficult to define. I know that Mr. Leonard thought he had defined it about in accordance with the results of the decisions, but some members of the committee disagreed with him, and it was decided to cut it out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will leave the legal remedy. I think that is fair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It seems to me that the bill is decidedly deficient without some such paragraph in it. If what is to be used is the ordinary legal agreement concerning values as in a fire insurance policy, it should be so stated, but I certainly would not approve of it without some explanation that would satisfy me.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 2 carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, Mr. Chairman. I think this matter is important. Although I have sat as a member of the banking and commerce committee pretty well all through its deliberations, and listened with most attentive care to all that has been said here in connection with the bill, I find confusion resulting from an attempt in the bill to defer to two points of view. I should like to have a discussion to clarify certain matters before it is passed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask my hon. friend if when we meet again he will give his attention to subsection 3 of section 3 and explain the reason for that arbitrary power and let us know at the next sitting. I was a member of the committee but I did not attend.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, July 9, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ONTARIO AND QUEBEC BUS ROUTES

Mr. LALONDE:

1. What bus routes in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario have been cancelled or modified?
2. What different bus routes are operating in each of the said provinces at the present time, and of what mileage is each such route?

Mr. HOWE:

1 and 2.

(a) Total route miles operated by bus companies in 1941: Ontario, 7,587; Quebec, 8,725.

(b) Estimated bus miles per year saved by curtailments and abandonments to date July 1, 1942: Ontario, 2,527,402; Quebec, 1,769,962.

The above figures are exclusive of city curtailment because the service in most cases parallels street car lines, and because the problem is met by modification rather than abandonment.

In order to answer in detail the above question it would be necessary to require complete statistics from 125 bus operating companies in each province, the great majority of these having multiple routes.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

CANADIAN ARMY—ACCIDENT TO CADETS IN BATTLE EXERCISES IN OTTAWA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government order a military court of inquiry into the drowning of the cadets from Brockville, in the Rideau canal, Ottawa?
2. Will a public civil inquest be held into the matter?
3. Will pensions be given the next-of-kin?

6. What life-saving facilities had the city of Ottawa there?
7. What life-saving equipment has the city of Ottawa, the government or the Ottawa improvement commission?

Mr. RALSTON:

1. A court of inquiry has been convened on the order of the adjutant-general and is at present sitting at the city of Ottawa.

2. This is a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of the attorney-general of the province of Ontario.

3. This is a matter which comes under the Department of Pensions and National Health.

4, 5, 6 and 7. These are all matters which in so far as they are relevant are the subject of investigation by the military court of inquiry mentioned in paragraph 1.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—INTERESTS OF FARMERS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Are there any practical farmers on the wartime prices and trade board?
2. Will the government appoint an advisory agricultural committee to assist the wartime prices and trade board?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The wartime prices and trade board consists of twelve members, all of whom are civil servants or officers of government agencies. Two members of the board are senior officers of the Department of Agriculture.

2. For what classification of offences were prosecutions made to the number of 150, as set out in sessional paper No. 341, as follows: Nova Scotia, 8; New Brunswick, 1; Quebec, 22; Ontario, 96; Manitoba, 6; Saskatchewan, 8; British Columbia, 9: and on whose recommendation for prosecution?

Saskatchewan	8	5	2	1	..
British Columbia	9	6	1	2	..
	150	105	14	28	3

(b) On recommendation of officers of the board and officers of the attorneys general.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

POSTMASTERS—SALARIES AND COST-OF-LIVING BONUS

Mr. KIRK:

Due to the increased cost of living since September, 1939, has the government or Post Office Department given consideration to, (a) the matter of increasing salary of postmasters; (b) granting to postmasters a cost-of-living bonus?

Mr. MULOCK: (a) No. (b) A cost-of-living bonus has been granted postmasters.

RURAL MAIL SERVICE—REMUNERATION AND COST-OF-LIVING BONUS

Mr. KIRK:

Due to the increased cost of living and operating expenses since September, 1939, has the government or the Post Office Department given consideration to, (a) the matter of increasing the amount paid to mail couriers (apart from the 5 per cent increase to take care of increase in price of gasoline) who have been awarded mail contracts prior to first 5 per cent increase in cost of living and subsequent 5 per cent increases; (b) the matter of paying a cost-of-living bonus to mail couriers?

Mr. MULOCK: (a) and (b). Prices paid under mail contracts are determined by public tender and are therefore not uniform.

New contracts are regularly being awarded at prices based on present conditions.

In the case of contracts awarded when operating conditions were normal, at the request of the contractor consideration is given to the reinvitation of tenders for such contracts and the awarding of a new contract at an equitable rate based on existing conditions. The holder of the old contract is not excluded from tendering for the new contract.

2. What percentage of the total Canadian butter is manufactured on the farm (dairy) and in the factory (creamery)?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NOVA SCOTIA COAL MINING AREAS—BANKING OF COAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I should like to refer to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) yesterday, that there was storage available for another half million tons of Nova Scotia coal. I have had the matter looked into, and I am informed that the storage facilities are filled to capacity at the moment, with 700,000 tons of coal banked, and that until some of this coal is moved, no additional coal can be placed on the banks.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

CHARGES AGAINST COLONEL DREW—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I desire to move the adjournment of the house on a question of urgent public importance, namely, the conduct of the government in prosecuting Colonel Drew, one of the counsel engaged in the recent Hong Kong inquiry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman moves the adjournment of the house on a question of urgent public importance, namely, the policy of the government in respect to a prosecution under the defence of Canada regulations, which involves the urgent and vital question of whether Canadians are to be free to criticize inefficiency in the conduct of the war, without endangering their personal liberty.

This is a matter which has already been before the house; it is a matter of judicial inquiry at the present moment, and pending the decision of the courts it is not in order according to the rules. Therefore I must rule that there is no urgency in the motion made by the hon. member.

Mr. CHURCH: Might I ask the hon. and learned Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) if he would consider withdrawing the charge against the colonel?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

The house resumed from Wednesday, July 8, consideration in committee of Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.—Mr. Ilsley —Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. BLACKMORE: When we adjourned last evening I had raised the question of the reason for the deletion of subsection (m) as it stood in the bill sent to the committee. I pointed out that in my judgment the deletion of that paragraph left the bill deficient in an important respect. I also said that I believe the bill as it at present stands is confused, because of the fact that those who drafted the bill were endeavouring to defer to two principles. I desired that before I should consent to the passage of section 2 some explanation should be given which would clarify matters which to me seemed confused.

I think it can be safely laid down as a fundamental principle that no Canadian family should be obliged to suffer inequality of sacrifice for war damage. I believe this bill was designed to take care of that situation so far as it may be possible so to do. There are those who say that equality of sacrifice is completely impossible. Suppose we grant that as a government and as a parliament we ought to be guided by the general principle that wherever possible we shall ensure equality of sacrifice. This we certainly can do in financial matters.

I think we can lay it down as fundamental with respect to this bill that every Canadian family should be guaranteed the right to continue to possess and to live in its home. That is the first fundamental consideration. The second is that every Canadian community should be guaranteed the right to be able to supply as many people after war damage as it was able to supply before the war damage was done. I gather from the discussions which I heard in the banking and commerce committee and in this house and which I have had with other people that those two principles were in the minds of the men who drafted this bill.

As I understand it, the purpose of the bill is to empower the minister to bring about or to establish or to embody in his policy those two fundamental principles: first that every family in Canada shall be guaranteed the right to continue to live in its home as such; second, that every community in Canada shall be guaranteed the right to be able to support or supply with needed services as many people after war damage as it was able to supply before war damage. If such is the case, the primary object of this bill is to ensure human values rather than financial values. In this respect it differs materially from an ordinary fire insurance measure. A fire insurance measure aims primarily to reimburse, to the extent of his financial loss, anyone who has suffered damage from fire, the financial loss to be judged by the value on the open market of the property destroyed. The second objective of a fire insurance measure, I take it, is to enable a fire insurance company to carry the risk, as well as other risks, and not lose money but rather to make money.

If these are the objects of a fire insurance measure, while the object of this measure is fundamentally human values rather than financial values, it becomes apparent that if the principles which govern the drafting of a fire insurance measure are applied to this measure there will be inconsistency and confusion. I believe that in at least two respects the principles governing the drafting of fire insurance measures are being applied in this bill as a means of governing the kind of measure which this shall be.

I maintain that we need to define clearly what we mean by values. How important this is may be seen by reference to section 7, subsection 1, where the whole meaning and intent and efficacy of the measure depends entirely on the definition of "diminution of value" in the third line. If there is no means of determining what that value is, how can the clause have any meaning? How can the bill have any meaning? It may be contended that this bill is aimed to pay its way just as a fire insurance measure aims to pay its way. This measure by section 7 empowers the minister, for example, to pay $3,000 to one who has sustained war damage. No reference is made to the necessity of the individual who sustained the damage having taken out an insurance policy; the minister is empowered, without any reservation, to pay $3,000 in consideration of war damage. This seems to indicate quite clearly that we are not concerned about making the whole scheme pay. If we are not aiming to make the whole scheme pay, then we do not need to be greatly concerned with the definition of value as it stood in the original bill. The original bill defined "value" as the value which the property would bring in the open market. I maintain that for the purpose of this measure that is not a meaning of value that we are at all concerned about.

Again we find in section 10 an exception of $50; that is, if the extent of the damage is less than $50 no payment is to be made. I maintain that that exception might be quite in order in a fire insurance measure, a regular policy of a fire insurance company, but it is inconsistent with the spirit and purpose of this bill.

May I turn for a moment to a discussion of the question of value as I think it should be. There are two main types of value with respect to properties such as dwellings. There is the social or prestige value, and there is the utility or service value. We might add another class of value, namely, the combination of the two. To illustrate what is in my mind, I would refer to a case which came under my observation. A young couple purchased a house for $450 when they were first married. They lived in it for fifteen years. As several children had come along they had found it impossible to buy a more commodious home. At the end of fifteen years they simply had to have more room. They raised up the house and put under it a basement with a seven-foot clearance, large enough to make possible a considerable addition to the house. As the house then stood it had cost them about $850. They had to let the house stand as it was, without improvements for several years. By that time the resale value on the open market would be hardly more than $150, the amount for which a person could sell the material if he salvaged the house.

The CHAIRMAN: There is far too much conversation going on in the chamber.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I am surely glad you pointed that out, because the hon. gentlemen who are talking have almost completely destroyed my ability to present this matter this afternoon. If they want to talk, I think they should go outside. I could hardly hear what you were saying, Mr. Chairman.

As I was pointing out, the house I have in mind cost the family $850, plus their work, but if they had had to sell it on the open market they would have been able to obtain only $150 or $200 for it. If this house were destroyed because of the war, it is conceivable that all that family would get as full compensation would be $150 or $200. This would mean that they would have insufficient money to build a new house. They would have to suffer an almost complete loss; in effect, they would be on the street. This house as it stood, while it might be impossible to sell it for anything near what it was worth, had a value to that family of a house which might have cost $2,500 because in it they were able to shelter their children and get by, as many Canadian families have to get by. If this house, which cost $850 and had a service or utility value to them of $2,500, were damaged to the extent of $49, according to this bill these people would receive nothing for damage which might render their place of residence entirely uninhabitable.

I think the illustration I have given is sufficient to show that as the bill now stands it is a rich man's bill, not a poor man's bill; that the application of the bill would bring into existence many inequalities and injustices. In order to show how many glaring inequalities might spring out of the application of the bill, may I point out that section 7 permits the minister to pay $3,000 for damages. As long as that section remains as it is, and I have no objection to it, a man with a house costing $3,000 which was destroyed would receive the full $3,000. In other words, he would have 100 per cent protection under this bill. There are many well-to-do Canadians who would come in his class. They would own houses costing from $3,000 to $5,000.

There are other Canadians who are a little better off and who own houses costing from $6,000 to $10,000. If these houses are damaged in the war the owners will receive compensation which will go a long way toward covering the cost of repairing the damage. They will receive substantial benefits under the bill. It must be borne in mind that the man with the $3,000 house is probably in receipt of a salary of $3,000 a year, and consequently would be in a better position to repair damage than a man in the lower income brackets. The man who owns a house costing $6,000 or $7,000 is probably getting in the neighbourhood of $6,000 or $7,000 a year, and therefore would be able to repair any damage done to his house. When these facts are considered it becomes more evident how unjust this bill will be to a person owning a house worth only $450 which sustains damage of, we will say, $49. Such a man probably is receiving only a very small income and is not in position to rebuild or repair his house. His family is probably such that he has had to struggle all the time in order to make ends meet. This man will receive perhaps no recompense at all if the damage is under $50. If the damage amounts to $100 and he receives reimbursement he will not be much better off. He certainly would not be relatively as well off as the man with the house costing $3,000, or the still more fortunate man with the house costing $6,000 or $8,000, and which sustained damage to the extent of $3,000.

As the bill stands at the present time I think it is quite unjust. It discriminates against the poor man in favour of the rich man. I believe it should be amended in two important respects. It should be stipulated definitely in the bill just what is meant by value; I suggest that the wording of this stipulation should take some such form as this:

That the value with reference to a property means the amount which would be required to restore the property to the degree of capacity for utility or serviceability or habitability which the property had before it was damaged.

In such case if the house to which I refer, which cost $850 to construct and which enabled a considerable family to get by, were damaged, we will say to the extent of only $100, the bill would permit the minister to restore the house to a condition in which it would be able to render the same service to the family occupying it that it had rendered before the damage was sustained, regardless of the amount it might sell for on the open market. If that definition of value, or a similar one, were embodied in the bill, I believe it would help greatly.

Then I think the bill should be modified to eliminate almost entirely the $50 exemption. Many a poor man is living in a house that would scarcely sell for $200 on the open market. I think it is grossly unfair to refuse to pay any damages which are under $50 in value. Suppose the chimney were destroyed, or the door on the porch blown off, or a hole made in the basement; if the total damage were assessed at less than $50, that man would get nothing, and it might be impossible for him and his family to rebuild the dwelling so as to make it habitable.

Hon. members may imagine that there are not many Canadian people who live in houses of as small a value as I have indicated. But all they need to do is to go through the woods to see the number of very inexpensive shacks in which people are living, or see in the wide areas of the west the inexpensive shacks in which farmers and landowners are endeavouring to get by, or go through the outskirts of many of our small towns to realize the number of small, inadequate habitations in which many Canadian people are struggling to live. Even in this great city of Ottawa and our next door neighbour you will find a surprisingly large percentage of houses that are very cheap and probably assessed at anywhere from $175 to $250. If a dwelling of that sort were damaged to the extent of 10 per cent of its value, from a money standpoint that might seem very small, but from the standpoint of human values, from the standpoint of the ability of the family to continue to live in the house after the damage was done, or to rebuild it so that it would be in as good a condition as it was before it was bombed, it will easily be seen that it would be grossly unfair to apply rigidly this limitation that nothing shall be paid unless the damage is over $50.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the modifications which I feel should be made in the bill can be brought up under other sections. With that understanding I would say to the minister that I am prepared to allow section 2 to pass, and I will bring up the matters I have in mind under subsequent sections where perhaps they can be more appropriately dealt with.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, I rise not to discuss the questions raised by the hon. member for Lethbridge, but to point out that this is the ninth day of July and we are in the sixth month of the session. This is a business proposition we are discussing; it is not in any sense a political question. While members have quite properly occupied a substantial amount of time in discussing the rights of fishermen to protection, I do think the time has arrived when we as business men ought to get down to putting this bill through on its merits so that we can bring this session to a conclusion.

Mr. HANSELL: I should like to rise in support of what the hon. member for Lethbridge has said in respect to the valuation of houses and the damage that may be done in the case of a wealthy man's home as compared with the home of a poor man.

I see no reason why we should not indemnify everyone in Canada, be he fisherman, tradesman, farmer or what have you, for every cent of loss that may be caused through war damage, bombing, and so forth. I know that we have spent a good deal of time on this bill, but I am perfectly satisfied that we do not yet realize the serious damage that may be caused, since we are so far distant from actual bombing. But sometimes the seriousness of it can be brought home to us very forcibly. The other day I received a letter from my mother in England, telling me that my mother and father had been bombed out. They escaped or were rescued from the debris with nothing but the clothes on their backs. I am going to suggest to you, sir, that if the cities of Canada were afflicted with the bombings that have taken place in other parts of the world every member of parliament would be in his seat urging the government to pay compensation for any type of war damage sustained by our people. That letter from my mother brought the seriousness of the situation home very forcibly to me.

I assume that should there be much bombing of Canadian cities there would be set up an administration which would be running all over the place trying to adjust claims and to decide whether a window is worth 75 cents or $5, and all that sort of thing. We have had that sort of machinery set up in connection with the bonuses for agriculture in Canada, some of which are not yet paid. The people of this country would not stand for anything like that if this country were going through a bombing. I refer again to my mother's letter. In spite of the fact that my mother and father had nothing left in the world, they said, "The government administration here in England in behalf of bombed-out victims is marvellous." I sent my mother and father a little money, not because they were bombed out, but because I thought they needed it. It arrived a few days after they had lost everything, and my mother said, "You do not need to send us any more money, because we are well provided for." I know that there is a bombed-out victims' fund, but my mother went on to say, "The government are very apt to visit us and discover just what our loss may be, and urge us to put in our claim now." That bit of news gladdened my heart, and I trust that after this bill is passed the government will see to it that those who are the victims of war damage will not have to worry, worry, worry, as to when their claims will be settled and how much they are to get.

During the discussion on this bill I have noticed, as no doubt other hon. members have, that there seems to be a fear on the part of the government as to whether they will be able to meet all these claims. You see, Mr. Chairman, it is the same old story: Can we afford to pay for the damage done? It is the same old story—we have no money. It does not make any difference how much lumber or stone or cement we have for repairs, or how much skilled labour is available; we are afraid that maybe we will not have the money. The same financial advisers who were advising the government in pre-war depression years are advising them to-day, and are doing so in respect to the financing involved in the present bill, which may be described as partly a post-war measure.

I stand with the hon. member for Lethbridge in what he has asked the committee to do. I go further, and say that every nickel of damage done to anyone in Canada, be he fisherman, farmer or anyone else, should be paid promptly; and let our people know that if war should come to our shores we have a government which will stop at nothing to give them adequate and complete compensation.

Mr. FAIR: The hon. member for Macleod has just told us about his parents who were bombed out in England. I will take a couple of minutes to speak of a section of our Canadian people who have been blasted and bombed ever since Canada became Canada, and I see that they are being bombed once more on this occasion. I am referring now to paragraph (j) (ii). If this legislation goes through as it is at the present time, "growing crops, plants and trees" will be excluded from the benefits of the measure. I think the committee is well aware of the fact that 90 per cent of farmers are in debt up to their necks, in some cases a little deeper. One of my neighbours in Paradise Valley, who came to this country fairly recently, gave me a plan which he thought could be put into operation to burn out the crops of the countries which have been overrun by Germany. If that plan is feasible over there, as I believe to a certain extent it is, then it is possible that our enemies may put it into effect and burn out our crops here. I do not think it is necessary to point out how very easy it is to burn a field of wheat or oats, either when it is grown and ready for cutting, or when it is harvested and in the stook, or when it is gathered in around the farmers' buildings, either in eastern or western Canada. Because farmers are in debt to the extent they are, if a farmer loses his crop he is "on the road" or, if he is lucky enough, on relief. For these reasons I think the government should not exclude, as is now proposed, farmers' crops from the benefits of this insurance. Farmers up to the present time—and the days to come will be no exception—have paid directly or indirectly, or both, the weight of the taxes of this country. That statement cannot be successfully challenged. While they are working harder and longer hours than any other class, we find among them more poverty and destitution than among any other class. Therefore I appeal to the minister to remove paragraph (j) (ii) from section 2 of the bill and give farmers the benefit of this insurance.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 3—Insurance against war damage.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to ask the minister a question concerning two points. First, is power taken in this bill to bring in a compulsory insurance scheme? I do not interpret section 3 as giving that power, yet Mr. D'Arcy Leonard, who advised the government on this measure, recommended in paragraph 15 of his report as follows:

> Furthermore, the power should now be taken to institute a compulsory scheme or schemes; and in the event of the voluntary plan proving inadequate, a compulsory scheme could then be put into effect. With the advantage of the experience and preparation under the voluntary scheme, the compulsory plan would be on a more equitable basis than is now possible.

Is power being given to institute a compulsory scheme?

Then, this section is the one which gives the minister the power to enter into contracts of insurance, and specifies among other things the power to set the rate or rates of premium. I should like to know whether or not it is definitely understood that the premiums are to be the same in all parts of Canada. In other words, if a policy is taken out in Ontario or Quebec, will the rate be just as high or just as low as the rate paid in Nova Scotia or in British Columbia, which provinces are the ones in which damage is most likely to be suffered?

Mr. ILSLEY: On the first point, as I read the bill and as I understand it to read, there is no power to institute a compulsory system of insurance. I find no empowering provisions which would enable the government to levy compulsorily against all the property owners of Canada rates which would be used later for indemnity against war damage. If it becomes necessary to carry out Mr. Leonard's recommendation it will have to be done by some subsequent measure.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, his recommendation in that regard is not being accepted?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not as far as this is concerned, no. As I pointed out yesterday, we have the power under other measures to do that, if it should become necessary, by order in council.

Mr. GREEN: That is, under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, under the War Measures Act, and possibly under the War Appropriation Act—I do not know about that, but one step at a time. This is a bill to authorize the minister to enter into contracts of insurance, and that is all it is, as I read it.

As to whether the rate will be the same in all parts of Canada, the answer to that is, yes, it will be, for the same class of property. There will be no territorial discrimination. Inland points with low risks will get no advantage from that fact, and the coastal points with their high degree of risk will not be penalized because of that fact.

Mr. GREEN: The idea is to spread the cost across Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has any conclusion been arrived at as to what those rates will be?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not think I should state what I have in mind about rates; I think I should leave it until the rates are actually fixed before they are announced. Naturally the subject of rates has received a great deal of consideration, and my own opinion is pretty well formed as to what they should be. But I am not in a position to announce them, because I may change my mind on them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): They have changed them in England about three times, have they not—lowering them?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister will not tell us what is in his mind with regard to rates, perhaps he will tell us what is in his mind with regard to subsection 3 of this section, which reads as follows:

> The minister may, in his absolute discretion, refuse to enter into a contract of insurance with any person.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It may become necessary sometimes to refuse to enter into contracts in a particular district. But apart from that, the minister must not be put in a position where anybody can claim a contract as of right. The government might refuse to enter into a contract with a company who wished it to issue, let us say, a policy for $100,000,000. The section is simply to make it clear that rights are not given the subject as against the crown which the crown must recognize—rights to insurance policies in amounts specified by the subject, or rights to insurance policies at all. The crown is entering into a contract, and this is an act empowering the crown to do so. We do not want any action brought against us to compel us to enter into any particular kind of contract. With regard to districts, I have nothing in mind particularly. I do not know whether I should say this, but the United States had to discontinue writing insurance in a distant part of that country, and while we hope there will never be any such development in Canada, it is possible that there might be.

Mr. GREEN: Does that mean that if there were attacks on the British Columbia coast the government would refuse to write insurance in the districts affected?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not mean that the government might refuse to do so. It means that if a part of Canada were in the occupation of the enemy the government would not be compelled to enter into contracts in the writing of war risk insurance in that area. I do not say whether the government would or not, but I am saying that there might be an eventuality which would make it necessary for the government to cease writing in a certain area.

Mr. GREEN: There is no intention of refusing to write policies in a district in which attacks are made, in which there would appear to be more danger than in some other districts? The government does not intend to go that far under the subsection?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not said that the government intended to do anything about it. I have not said that the government intended to decline to write policies. This is merely an empowering section which empowers the government to do so under certain conditions which one cannot foresee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I take it this is the reply to the request I made last evening?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that the only thing the minister has in mind? When this bill was drafted there must have been definite reasons, either in his mind or in the mind of the draftsman, and communicated to the minister, for the inclusion of this subsection. I can quite appreciate the reasons given by the minister in case there was an invasion of Canada in any particular part. The government might in certain circumstances refuse to enter into a contract for insurance, but apart from that there is no intention on the part of the administration to utilize this section, although I suppose the insurance companies themselves always exercise the right to refuse to accept an application for reasons which they do not disclose—for example, if the moral risk is not very good, to put it mildly. I have known of many instances in which insurance companies have refused to accept a risk and declined to disclose the reason, but apparently the underlying reason was the one I have suggested. Is that what the minister has in mind? I refer to cases of apprehended fraud, if I may put it in that way.

Mr. GREEN: The minister went further than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not hear the whole of his explanation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I gave two reasons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I heard only one. What was the other?

Mr. ILSLEY: The first is the one I have been discussing in answer to the hon. member for Vancouver South. The other is in such a case as this, for example. A particular company or property owner might, but for some safeguarding provision such as this, come and demand a policy covering the property involved up to a certain value which the owner might represent to be its full value. It may not be possible, or at any rate it may not be desirable, for the government to insure the property up to its full value in every case, and they might wish to refuse to enter into that kind of policy, or into a policy to that extent, in every instance. This is merely to make it clear that there are two parties to the contract, and this does not create a right in the subject to a policy. The government has the power to enter into a contract of insurance, but if we were to go on the other assumption and declare that every property owner was entitled to it—it would have to be up to the full value, I presume—we might find ourselves with certain concerns in Canada, certain property owners, obliged to assume a liability for $100,000,000 or $150,000,000 which we might not consider it desirable to assume.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will not controvert that.

Mr. SLAGHT: I believe the power should be there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There should be some discretion.

Mr SLAGHT: No one should be able to come as of right and say, "I must have a full policy". But one would like to feel that if an eastern Canadian port were subjected to a preliminary attack and residents came in in increasing numbers and sought insurance, this power would not be used to say that if we accepted these applications Canada would be mulcted in a large amount of money. As I understand the principle, these blows that we are anticipating cannot be expected to fall generally. They will fall, as in the mother country, in places such as I had the horror of seeing a few months ago. I saw the results in certain places which were attacked because of their strategic position—such places as the ports of Liverpool, Newcastle, and Hull. The people had suffered awful losses, both in death and in property. I would take it that there is no thought of utilizing this section to protect the rest of Canada from the results of attack upon one particular part or place where attack seemed to be imminent. I fancy the minister would say that is not the purpose of it. It would be well if we could feel reassured in that regard. This is a national undertaking in the long run to indemnify people who are unfortunate enough, if danger comes, to be located in parts of Canada which perhaps they did not choose but which are subjected to grave peril and loss. We as a nation are by this very act, as I apprehend, undertaking to stand ready to indemnify such people, at least in part, for their misfortune in being in the forefront of the civilian battle.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section does not affect the free compensation, but relates to the issuing of policies. We might, and I think I am correct in saying that in the United States they do, require a certain interval to elapse between the making of the application and the occurrence of the damage before the policy will be effected. That is, when a property owner sees the bombers overhead he cannot wire the nearest insurance company or the government and demand and receive a policy. It must be applied for a reasonable time before the damage occurs. I think that condition may be imposed; otherwise I do not know why anyone should insure in advance. He could wait until the attack was near and then get his insurance.

Mr. GREEN: That is one side of the story, and I think the minister has considerable justification for the stand he has taken. But here is the other side. The minute an attack occurred on Vancouver island, let us say, what right would the government have to step in and say, "We will not insure anything on Vancouver island now." From the statement the minister made a few moments ago one might take it that the government wished to reserve that right, and I do not think it should. I think that would be most unfair to the coastal districts of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said if a district should be occupied by the enemy; I did not say if a district should be attacked.

Mr. GREEN: Well, what does the minister mean?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certain latitude must be allowed. If hon. members try to pin me down to exactly what will be done in every instance I am afraid I cannot tell them.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think this is a point on which the committee should have information as definite as it is possible for the minister to give. If it is the intention to use the power given by this section to refuse contracts of insurance to persons living in a certain area because that area is subject to terrific or devastating attacks, then in my opinion the whole purpose of the act is vitiated. The purpose of the act is to spread across the whole dominion the losses arising from enemy action. If the minister is going to make a reservation and say that the danger of loss in one particular district is too great and that therefore insurance will not be granted, then the purpose the act is supposed to serve just will not be served. I agree with the minister that if any part of Canada should be occupied by the enemy, and if the property there was not already insured—I am thinking now of property that would be insurable under contract, not under the free insurance—the minister would be quite within his rights in refusing to grant insurance after such occupation. But as long as the particular area in which the property is situated is not occupied; as long as it is on the same footing as the rest of Canada except that it is more likely to be bombed or attacked, I believe that unless we have some system whereby that property will be protected, and the persons in that area will be protected, the act will have lost a great deal of its value. I do not believe, however, that is the power the minister is reserving under this subsection.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): When the banking and commerce committee discussed this bill I do not believe they even thought of anything like that. If they had, I believe the members of the committee would have just quit cold, because that is discrimination against the sections that might be bombed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wholly agree.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a great deal of force in what these hon. gentlemen have said; and if the minister is not prepared to extend the scope of this section, I am going to suggest that he hold it over and give it further thought over the evening. Perhaps some course may be found that would in some measure take care of what these hon. members are urging. On its face this is a clause which gives absolute and arbitrary discretion to the minister, and apparently that is not what is desired.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder if this was considered fully in the committee.

Mr. GREEN: The point was never explained in the committee at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Last night I sensed that there must be a reason which was not disclosed by the language of the section itself, as to why this discretion is left in here. I was wondering if it was on the same basis as the commercial companies reserve the right to take applications. That, of course, was what I assumed would be the position. But here is a form of insurance—I am speaking now of the contractual insurance, not the free coverage—designed to give monetary protection to portions of the community which may be exposed to great hazard, at the expense of the general body of taxpayers. It is a national burden, and should be so shared. I really have not arrived at a conclusion as to how far we should go, but I do not think it should be left entirely to the discretion of the minister; I think he should have some obligation in the premises. Yet I confess that I have not found a solution, and I am not offering one at the moment. I thought perhaps he and his officials, who are much more versed in the matter than I possibly could be, in the light of the discussion might evolve something that would be reasonably satisfactory.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister has explored, and rejected, the idea behind the British system. There, as I understand it, the insurance is compulsory, and the difficulty of fictitious or excessive claims is gotten around by the fact that they go more or less according to the assessment rolls. While I am on my feet I should like to offer a suggestion. It has been suggested that this section should stand over and be further considered. Could not some language be found here and now that would meet the objections which have been raised? Could it not be put something like this: "The minister may, in his absolute discretion, for good cause" or something like that? I think I can say I know what the feeling is in British Columbia, which at the moment is the most vulnerable area in Canada. I think I can safely say that they would rather rely on the common sense and fairness of the Minister of Finance than have this bill delayed for another two or three days, because the situation is very urgent. When we are through with this measure it has to go to the senate for consideration, and we should like to see it put through as soon as possible. I think if we could find any language that would at all meet the objections raised by my hon. friends, the people of British Columbia would rather take a chance on, shall I say, the fidelity or perhaps the common sense of the Minister of Finance than have this measure delayed any longer.

Mr. MacINNIS: Just before the minister replies, I do not think the committee objects particularly to having this section in the act. All we want to have from the minister is a statement that it is not going to be used for a certain purpose, and if the minister makes that statement I think the committee will be prepared to let the thing stand as it is; at least that is my view.

Mr. GREEN: That is my position, too.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): We all feel that way.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ILSLEY: If I understood the hon. member for Vancouver East correctly I agree with him, and will give the assurance for which he asks. I do not know just what were his words, or how they appear in Hansard, but as I understood him he asked if the power given here to refuse policies would be exercised simply because a particular area was particularly likely to be attacked. The answer is, certainly not. We realize that the east and west coasts are more likely to be attacked than the interior. It may be that some waiting period will have to be insisted on—

Mr. MacINNIS: I agree with that.

Mr. ILSLEY: —as a necessary safeguard. But just as the hon. gentleman said, the very object of this measure is to provide insurance for people who are in danger of attack, and the object of this section is simply to make it clear that policies may be refused in some instances, that there is no statutory right to policies. If safeguards of all kinds had to be written in here it would be beyond my ingenuity, and I think everyone's, to devise them. Once they are written in I think it would be of considerable disadvantage to some applicants, because if they did not come within the conditions that we thought of, it might be argued that they should not be insured—

Mr. MacINNIS: That is why I think it is better to leave the section as it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni suggests the wording "the minister may for good cause refuse . . .". That would be what he considered good cause. It would not make any difference in the effect of the section. I think subsection 3 is inserted for greater caution anyway. I do not find anything anywhere which says that the minister has to issue any policy, but this provision is included lest it be thought that the government might be forced by an applicant under certain conditions—perhaps, as I say, when the news is coming that bombers are on their way—to issue perhaps a $50,000,000 policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That extreme case could be taken care of by limitation. I think this will have to stand as it is, or else the minister will have to make the position compulsory with a limitation. I have not crystallized my view on the point. In the absence of any really constructive suggestion I am willing to let this section go.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Will it be possible for the boards of fire underwriters in the various provinces to pass on these various risks?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. O'BRIEN: If they would refuse a fire insurance risk, I assume the minister would refuse this sort of insurance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. MAYHEW: Surely that would not apply. Take a particularly vulnerable spot, say Esquimalt, where the dock is; an insurance company might refuse to write insurance in that area. The minister does not mean that an area of that kind would be left out?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I was thinking of a dilapidated building that was not worth insuring, but that the owner might wish to insure.

Mr. ILSLEY: I imagine that we could not rule out risks because the buildings were of low value. We might disagree as to the value, therefore we are going to have these insurance companies working for us. They are going to be looking into these things and will give us the benefit of their experience in writing insurance. I do not think I can improve that section in any way.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In England have they not a compulsory system?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the objection to our doing it here? Is it because this is only an initial step, and we may proceed further along the line of the English system? If to have a compulsory system is workable there, it should be workable here. I think that would be the ideal thing; then we could give protection to everyone who is willing to pay for it.

Mr. ILSLEY: My recollection is that there are very powerful reasons against a compulsory system in Canada. I do not know that I can make a complete statement of those reasons, but to begin with, England is practically all subject to attack from the air. A great many cities in various parts of England, the western and central as well as the eastern sections, have been attacked from the air. The country is all subject to bombardment, and there is a fair distribution of the danger all over England. That is not the situation in this country. If we instituted a compulsory system we would be going all over Saskatchewan, for example, in northern and western Ontario, and so on, collecting little insurance premiums from farmers.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the northwest territories.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. This would be greatly resented by hundreds of thousands, perhaps millions of people who were perfectly willing to take a chance and who could not be convinced that there is any real danger to them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would make the rate very low.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I am sure it would not meet the wishes of the majority of the people of Canada. Apart altogether from that, consider the difference in the assessments here and in Great Britain. In the United Kingdom they have an accurate record of the value of all property, they get it in their income tax returns. The value of real property, and the rental value, is all included in the income tax returns; they have an accurate and long-standing record, and the assessment is uniform. If we took part of the assessment of real property as the basis for our premiums under the compulsory scheme, one city assesses to the full value, another city to more than the full value, and some cities to a quarter of the value. The same lack of uniformity exists in country districts, townships, municipalities, and small towns, all over the country. It would be thoroughly inequitable to take part of the assessment. The only alternative would be to set up our own assessment of real property. That is too great a thing for us to undertake.

These matters were all discussed in the banking and commerce committee and thoroughly considered before we decided on this voluntary plan. We could get a larger fund by a compulsory scheme, but we did not think it warranted in view of our conditions.

Mr. ROY: There are enemy submarines right in the waters where the fishermen of my constituency are fishing. There is a possibility of those boats being attacked. I should like to know if they can be insured under this scheme, and on what basis.

Mr. ILSLEY: Boats and vessels are not included in this scheme. Free compensation is provided for the loss of fishing boats up to the value of $2,000 each per fisherman. That is provided for by order in council, but not by this scheme.

Section agreed to.

Sections 4 and 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Limitation as to amount of indemnity.

Mr. GREEN: How long does the minister think it will take to get insurance actually in effect after the date on which this bill becomes law? There is the greatest concern on the Pacific coast with regard to this particular section, because it limits the compensation that can be paid to the sum of $50,000 for any damage that is done before the insurance policy is taken out.

Mr. ILSLEY: I dislike to make predictions, but I have gone right on with the organization of the scheme despite the fact that the bill has not yet been passed. I would hope that within thirty days after the passage of the bill it would be possible for policies to be issued.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has proceeded, without the bill being passed, to make certain arrangements. Why would it not be possible for him to go one step further and allow these firms to make application to their own insurance companies for the amount of war risk insurance they want and to pay deposits on account of the premiums? If there were damage suffered before an effective policy could be obtained, they should then be able to get compensation, subject of course to the payment of the balance of the premium. The minister said yesterday that he would not think of following this course, but this is a serious position. If some of these plants are destroyed by enemy attack, the loss may run into hundreds of thousands of dollars, and yet under this section there could not be compensation over $50,000. This is unfair, not only to the firms but to the men they employ, and it might prove to be disastrous for Canada's war effort on the coast.

Mr. ILSLEY: Until this bill has passed no one has any authority to accept any obligation.

Mr. GREEN: The minister had no authority to set up committees and so on, and yet he has done so.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is only when you are entering into contractual obligations that you must have authority. No contracts have been entered into because there is no power to do so. I have asked certain gentlemen to act as an advisory committee, and I have asked a certain gentleman to act as supervisor. He has done a lot of work, but it is just as though there was nothing in existence.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the government need not be bound by such obligations until the act comes into force, but I contend that the common-sense thing to do is to enable these people to apply to their own insurance companies, not to the government, for the amount of coverage they want, and pay a reasonable deposit on account of the premium. If we could get the Japs to wait until thirty days after this bill becomes law, there would be no need to worry, but they may attack the coast to-night or next week. There is no reason at all why a common-sense view should not be taken of the situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why the $50,000 limitation? Of course it is just an arbitrary figure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Absolutely arbitrary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister could increase that amount it might help the situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The new figure would be arbitrary too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would, but it would be more inclusive and provide better coverage. There must have been some reason for setting the figure at $50,000.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not much, I am afraid.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Damage to dwelling.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would not the minister be willing to put into this section some stipulation with respect to value? It seems to me that value could be defined under this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: We tried that, and all it led to was argument. Any definition of value that is put into the bill will lead only to argument. I understand that the supreme court of the United States has defined value as what a willing purchaser, not forced to buy, will pay to a willing seller, not forced to sell.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the standard definition of market value.

Mr. ILSLEY: That perhaps would be the test applied here. But the courts have to determine, in the event of litigation, whether proper principles have been applied to the determination of value. This is one of those cases where an attempt at codification of the decisions of the courts just leads to argument. Mr. Leonard drafted a definition of value which he thought was in accordance with the decisions, but there was disagreement and his definition was not considered to be a proper one. So that it was left as it is under fire insurance practice, where the value is adjusted by the adjuster and the principles of determination are applied. I presume that a great many factors enter into it, but this bill went through the banking and commerce committee and it was decided to leave this out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I appreciate that there is a real difficulty. The definition of value given by the minister is used in the courts of this country in the valuation of property expropriated by the crown. It is a definition of market value. Value for insurance purposes is quite different. A property may have different attributes—I am not referring to the value of affection and that sort of thing, which are extraneous matters—and in insurance law the question always arises as to how far the value of a property is affected by depreciation and things of that kind. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to put into the form of a code that would meet all cases. I am content to let the matter go and have it dealt with as it would be dealt with under a standard fire insurance policy. In any actions that I have had to do with I have never had much trouble about getting full value if it was a bona fide loss; there is no question of the quantum when the loss was bona fide. I do not think there will be much trouble with the standard companies of this country, and I am content to let the section go without it having any definition of value.

Mr. MacINNIS: I was a member of the committee, and I appreciate the difficulty in giving a definition of value. The hon. member for Lethbridge refers to a type of value that I have never come across in any work on economics. I do not know how you could appraise social or prestige value. There might not be so much difficulty over value when there is a contract, but when you are dealing with free insurance, where there are no contracts, and a home is completely destroyed, I do not know just how the value can be defined beforehand. In ordinary fire insurance the contract contains a description of the property, but unless there is a census taken, and I assume that this is not anticipated, there would be no description of many of these properties. I suppose there would be descriptions in the assessors' offices in the cities, but that would not apply to country property. I was just wondering how we could arrive at a correct understanding of the diminution in the value of a property when there is no particular description of the property before it was destroyed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think the description of the property in a fire insurance policy is much of a guide to the value of the property. The amount which an insurance company is prepared to write on a property is a guide to the value, but it is not conclusive. The loss always has to be adjusted, and I should not think it would be any more difficult for the adjuster to adjust the loss in case of bombardment damage than to adjust it under a fire insurance policy. He would have just as much to go on, except that in the fire insurance policy there is a description of the dwelling, giving the dimensions and the type of construction. That is about all it gives, and it is not of much use. I think the loss could be easily ascertained by the adjuster.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I suggest to the minister that the preliminary thing would be the value placed upon the property by the applicant in his application for insurance. That is prima facie. One of the elements upon which the policy is issued is the representations as to value by the applicant. That may or not be the correct value, but it is the initial guide to value, and the man is bound by his own report. If the property is worth more than he says it is, the principle of estoppel would immediately arise, but that does not often arise because the applicant usually errs on the safe side. I think that is the only guide you have in contracts of insurance, unless there is an agreed value, and I do not think I ever saw or heard of a policy which incorporated an agreed value.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I imagine that Lloyd's write them, though.

Mr. GREEN: This is the section which provides compensation for the house and there are one or two points which I think should be cleared up by the minister. First of all, just how wide is the word "owner" to be? Just what does it cover? For example, is it to cover a person who is buying a house under an agreement of sale, or a person who has a house subject to a mortgage? That is important, because under this bill unless a person is the owner of the house and, further, unless he is actually living in it, he cannot get this free compensation. It is of the utmost importance that this point should be cleared up.

Furthermore, the idea has gone out across the country that this free compensation applies to all houses; in other words, that if a house is destroyed, the owner can get up to $3,000 compensation for the loss. But that is distinctly not so, because you have to own the house, and in addition you have to live in it. I suggest that the minister have advertisements inserted in the papers, particularly in the coastal areas, pointing out that this $3,000 compensation does not apply to every house. Otherwise there will be many houses not insured which should be insured because the owner will think he does not have to take out a policy, since he expects

$3,000 free coverage, and if there is damage done he may find that he is not covered by the act. This should be explained most carefully to the people, especially in those provinces which are most exposed to war risks.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is a valuable suggestion. It would be worth the cost of advertising to do that, for the reason the hon. member gives, and I will bring his suggestion to the attention of Mr. Matson, who is to be the supervisor of claims.

As to the other point, the meaning of the word "owner", the hon. gentleman put the case of a person who has bought a house and lived in it but has not obtained the deed. He would be the owner under this, undoubtedly. He would have what we call in Nova Scotia a beneficial interest in the property. He is the beneficial owner of the property or the equitable owner of the property, and he resides in it. If the person who resides in the house has an interest in it, legal or beneficial, as owner, he would be covered by the section. If he was merely a tenant he would not be covered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have a suggestion to make to the minister. I should like him to give consideration to adding at the end of section 7 (1) the words "or has an insurable interest therein". That would cover the beneficial or equitable interest of the man who has purchased under an agreement of sale, and it would also cover the mortgagee. My attention has been drawn to this point, and I certainly think the mortgagee should be protected because he has his money in there.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not by free compensation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why should he not have some compensation?

Mr. ILSLEY: He is an investor.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And so can insure for himself. That, I presume, is the answer, and if so I am willing to waive that point. But to cover the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South I would ask the minister to consider adding at the end of subsection 1 the words "or has an insurable interest therein". I think that is a fair suggestion, and I do not see any great objection to it. I hope the minister will consider it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what to say about that. It might be entirely too wide. It might cover persons whom we do not wish to cover. I do not know whether a tenant has an insurable interest or not.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He might have occupancy but not ownership.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does he have an insurable interest?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, only so far as occupancy goes, which is an entirely different thing. You are not insuring against that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it would cover at least the case of a purchaser under an agreement of sale who was also the occupant. Does this not contemplate that the man who is to be paid is the occupant? Does this cover rented property?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it is not clear in the bill it ought to be made clear that he must be the occupant and either be the owner or have an insurable interest in the property under an agreement of sale. I suggest that the minister might incorporate in the section the words I have proposed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): If the suggestion of the leader of the opposition were adopted it would cover an occupant of the house who might have only a one-twentieth interest in the property. He would then have an insurable interest and would get the full compensation for that house. On the other hand, if he has purchased the house under an agreement of sale, he is the owner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The owner is the man who has the legal title. Let us not quibble about that. In equity, one man may have the equitable title and another the legal title.

Mr. GREEN: There is power contained in section 33, paragraph (e), for the governor in council to make regulations:

(e) to designate any person or class of persons who are deemed to be included within the terms "householder" and "owner" as used in this act.

Probably it could be covered by regulation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it would be better to have it in the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: I hesitate to adopt the language suggested, "insurable interest". All kinds of insurable interest arise. A creditor has an insurable interest, and he might be living in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not think an unsecured creditor would have an insurable interest.

Mr. POTTIER: In this section the wording is that the insurance or the compensation is payable in respect of war damage "to the dwelling house in which he ordinarily resides." Let us assume that a person in the summer lives in the country and in the winter lives in the city, and owns both houses. In that case is he to get compensation for both, or which residence is taken?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Just one.

Mr. POTTIER: Which one?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The one in which he ordinarily resides.

Mr. POTTIER: At the time of the damage?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not necessarily. He does not have to physically reside in it at the time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Ordinarily resident.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the one in which he ordinarily resides. If he resided 183 days in one and 182 in the other, I do not know in which one he would be deemed to be ordinarily residing, but that would be—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If he is in the one that gets bombed he won't want anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister promise to give consideration in the drafting of the regulations to the suggestion I made?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I certainly will. I understand that this very point was discussed in the committee at considerable length and it was decided, I believe, to leave it this way. There is power in the regulations.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There are some points about this section which are not quite clear. Suppose that damage were done to a considerable area in a city of, say, the size of Ottawa, which affected houses in what may be called the reasonably good areas, where values are from $3,500 to $4,000, and houses in the poorer areas, some being registered for insurance and some not, and the minister undertook to cover the cost of the damage; what procedure would he follow? Suppose some have insurance policies in both areas—in the well-to-do areas and in the poor areas; others have not; what procedure would be followed with respect to finding the value to be given to those who had sustained loss?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The fire underwriters' survey would cover that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the minister planning to have a survey of the whole country, say under the municipalities, so as to register all property with the value it is estimated to have?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, if he has no such criterion by which to judge, how is he going to tell how much is to be paid to a given individual in any particular area who has lost his home by bombing?

Mr. ILSLEY: The loss will be adjusted by competent adjusters, in the way that fire loss is adjusted.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose a home has been completely demolished.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will still be adjustable.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On what basis? There would be no record there.

Mr. ILSLEY: On the available evidence as to the value of it—of which there will be plenty.

Mr. BLACKMORE: And the main available evidence would be the assessed value in the community in which it was located?

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be one element; one only—very inconclusive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I assume that section 7 contemplates payment of compensation to owners of houses who suffer loss, regardless of whether they hold insurance or not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that it would be possible, I suppose, for a man to insure against loss and also to get this compensation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but not double indemnity. He would not get paid for more than his loss.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In any event?

Mr. ILSLEY: In any event.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because he did not have the insurable value?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that properly safeguarded?

Mr. ILSLEY: We will safeguard it in the issue of the policies. There will be no trouble.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are not putting it in the statute?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GILLIS: A few moments ago the minister, in answer to the leader of the opposition, stated that there was no protection in this bill for a mortgagee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say that. There is no free compensation to the mortgagee.

Mr. GILLIS: That is what I have in mind. I am purchasing a home; it is valued at $5,000; it is burned down. I have paid, say, $1,000 on that home; someone holds a mortgage on it for the remainder. Who is paid? Am I paid the $3,000, or where do the people stand who hold the mortgage?

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not stand anywhere unless they have insured themselves or unless you have insured in their favour. You get the $1,000; that is, your interest in the property, if there is disappearance of value to that extent.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Damage to chattels.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the minister also give publicity to the people who are covered by section 8. For example, as I understand it, this section provides coverage only for the householder, the person who is actually living on the premises.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: It provides coverage up to the sum of $800 for the householder, and another $400 if he has a wife, and another $100 for each child under sixteen years of age. But it would not cover rented furniture. For example, if a person is living in a furnished house, that furniture is not covered by this free insurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that that should be made clear to the public, so they will understand exactly what is and what is not covered.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I will see that that suggestion, like the other one, is given consideration. I must say it appeals to me as a reasonable and a valuable one.

With regard to this section I wish to submit an amendment, which I will ask my colleague to move:

That Bill 56 be amended as follows:

1. That subsection (1) of clause 8 be amended by adding thereto after the word "owner" in line 39 on page 4 the following words "and which are within the definition of 'property' in section 2 of this act";

2. That paragraph (b) of subsection (3) of clause 8 be amended by striking out the words "four hundred dollars" in line 12 on page 5 and substituting therefor the words "two hundred and fifty dollars".

This is out of balance as it is. The amount is limited for all the chattels, and the amount recoverable for these luxury items or valuable items should be limited somewhat. It automatically raises the limit for the less valuable article and makes a better balance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be true. I have not had time to think about it. I just want to make some observations on this.

In going over this bill when first printed, I wondered why the amounts specified in section 8 were based more on the status of a person than on the value of his chattels. I assume there is a reason. I wish the minister would tell us why the amounts are based on the marital status and so forth, without any particular regard—except in the latter part of the section, which he is just amending, and by way of limitation—to the value of the damage. Perhaps I have not made myself clear. Subsection 2 says:

> No payment under this section shall
> (a) in the case of any person other than a householder, exceed the sum of two hundred dollars;
> (b) in the case of a householder, exceed the sum of eight hundred dollars increased by a further four hundred dollars if he is married and if his wife is ordinarily resident with him and by a further one hundred dollars in respect of each child ordinarily resident with him, who has not reached his sixteenth birthday at the time of the occurrence of the war damage.

It is based on his status and not on the value of the loss he has sustained. That factor apparently has not been taken into account.

Mr. ILSLEY: To begin with, no one can get more than the loss sustained.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason why a person who is not a householder will not get as much free compensation as the householder is that the householder should be assured of a reasonable amount with which to start living in a house again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I can understand that. It is different with regard to the boarder.

Mr. ILSLEY: The boarder does not need any more. He can go and board somewhere else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He might lose his whole wardrobe.

Mr. ILSLEY: He can take out insurance if he wishes to. If he does not he gets up to $200, but the married man with a wife and a couple of children should have more than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that. I was thinking particularly of the limitation as being imposed because a man was married rather than on the basis of the loss sustained.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I am talking about. If we do not take the principle of this section, but the principle about which my hon. friend is inquiring, we will give to everyone, regardless of his status, up to a few hundred dollars free compensation, depending upon the loss sustained. It is perfectly clear that the limit of free compensation ought to be higher for the person with increased responsibilities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the minister will take that into account in the budget resolutions.

Mr. REID: Does this bill deal entirely with the house and the chattels in the house? A man's barn might be destroyed, with the stock in it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The free compensation is not limited to furniture or the contents of the house.

Mr. REID: Then property would include, say, a man's barn?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. It would include the chattels in the barn.

Mr. REID: But a man's barn might be damaged and the house not touched at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no free compensation for any buildings except the house.

Mr. GREEN: Not unless he lives in the barn. I would suggest to the minister, with regard to the amendment to subsection 3, paragraph (b), that he delete the word "books". I do not see why there should be that restriction with regard to books and printed publications. They are in a different category from works of art, gold and silver, jewellery and so on. There should not be the limitation of $250 on books.

Mr. ILSLEY: The owner can always insure his books if he has a valuable library. The idea in this section is to enable him to keep on living and to provide him with some minimum requirements. I do not know why he should have so many books. He should have the Bible and Shakespeare perhaps and a few other necessities to enable him to go on living, but apart from that he could insure his books.

Mr. GREEN: I can see the reason for the restriction with regard to other things such as stamp collections, jewellery and so on, but I do not think books should be put in the same classification. He would get a total of $800, or $1,200 if he were married, and he should be allowed to include books in that figure.

Mr. REID: Yesterday many of us, particularly from British Columbia, put up an argument on behalf of the fishermen. I do not want to start another debate to-day on that subject, but, voicing my own opinion, I do not think it is fair that a man's barn should not be taken into account, especially on the coast. A man with stock in his barn might suffer damage; the barn might be demolished and the house might not be touched.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all subject to insurance.

Mr. REID: He can insure his house and books and other effects for which compensation is given, but he might be put out of business by an aerial bomb. His barn might be destroyed and yet his house might not be touched at all. He might put more value in the stock than in the chattels in his home.

Mr. ILSLEY: But if he has insured the barn he gets paid for it under this act. He does not get free compensation for anything except his house. Every one of us in Canada lives somewhere and it makes it equal if you give free compensation for the house you own and live in. But there is a wide difference in the value of other buildings that we own.

Mr CRUICKSHANK: Does not the minister think that a barn is more important than jewellery, manuscripts, library and so on? There is free compensation for that.

Mr. ILSLEY: He gets free compensation for chattels, up to a limited amount; everyone does. The object of this section relating to works of art, and so on, is to limit the amount that can be claimed for articles of that kind. There are two reasons for the limitation. The first is that these things are not necessary to enable life to continue. The second is the difficulty in determining whether a claim in connection with articles of that kind is accurate. If persons of a certain class were making claims I am afraid that if they had some jewellery, or even some books, and knew they could claim up to $800 or $1,500 for them, they would claim right up to the limit for that sort of thing, and there would not be much chance of checking them. It would be a great deal easier to value their other chattels than to value chattels of that sort. The advice I got from a most experienced adjuster was that on this class of goods we could very well limit fairly rigidly the amount recoverable as free compensation.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not objecting to the limit; you could limit me to $8 for my jewellery and you would be overpaying me by $7. I am objecting to the principle of giving free compensation for jewellery or works of art—I do not know what that means, unless it would be the speeches of the Minister of Pensions and National Health—but you do not give free compensation in connection with those things on which a man depends for his livelihood, such as his farm implements, his barn and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: His farm implements are included in his chattels.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He does not keep them in his house.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing to say they have to be kept in the house.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then will the minister not consider protection for the barn?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I am sorry I cannot, for the reason I stated. You get an unequal coverage there. We all live in houses; everyone has to have a residence. When you have a barn—

Mr. MacNICOL: In the winter time cattle must have a barn.

Mr. ILSLEY: A barn is part of your investment. Sometimes it may not be a very profitable investment; nevertheless that is what it is, so that it is not in the same class as a residence.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 9 agreed to.

On section 10—Property damage only where in excess of $50.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wonder if the minister would not consider some modification of that $50 limitation?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the discussion was in the banking and commerce committee, but it was thought that we would have to get rid of a great multiplicity of very small claims. It does not seem to me a very great burden to impose upon people in time of war when we ask them to bear the loss to their own residences up to the amount of $50. It does not seem unreasonable to me. I think perhaps it would be going a little too far in time of war to try to make good such losses right down to the last dollar. We are not going to be able to do that for the people at large. All kinds of losses are going to be sustained and sacrifices accepted which cannot be made good, and I do not know why we should go so far in connection with property when people are suffering terribly, losing their lives and so on, and they cannot have those things made up to them. We cannot put dollar values on those things. We are going pretty far in this matter of protecting property, and is there anything so terrible when the country is under attack, when people are being killed all around you in that attack, in all probability, if the man who has his house damaged is asked to bear $50 of the loss himself? It will greatly simplify the administration if we retain this provision, and I do not think it is at all unjust.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That $50 might not be serious to the minister or to me; it might not be serious to a person with a good income, say $1,500 a year, but there are many people who have no such incomes, to whom damage of $25 to their houses would be a calamity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Home owners?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Owners of homes; people who have struggled all their lives in order to possess a little house, for which they have finally paid after fifteen or twenty years. If they sustain damage amounting to $25 or $30, with a number of children to take care of, it becomes almost impossible for them to meet the cost of repairs. Perhaps if the minister were to say something like this: Wherever the damage which has been sustained is such as to render the dwelling uninhabitable," then the damage would be repaired so that the home would be as habitable as it was before the damage was sustained. I see no reason at all why that should not be done. In connection with the homes of the well-to-do, homes worth $3,000, $4,000 or $5,000, the deduction of $50 could be allowed to continue.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the riding which I represent there are many streets on which there are many houses, some of which I have visited, in which I doubt very much if there was $50 worth of furniture altogether. If damage amounting to $50 were done to the roof or windows of one of these houses, I doubt if those people could afford any repairs at all. I should think there ought to be some provision for the very humble citizen. In my house or your house, or the house of the average man, $50 would not be anything at all, but in the houses of the humble working men in the congested districts of Toronto, Montreal and other cities, $50 would be quite an item.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the minister give this very careful consideration; for I think there is a great deal in what the hon. member for Lethbridge has said. As a solution I suggest that the minister fix the amount at say $25, and let it go at that; in other words, make it $25 deductible to use a term common in automobile insurance. I think that would be fairer. After all, $50 is a great deal of money for many people, and at that I think the way the section reads now one would have to suffer damage of $75 before one would get any compensation, $50 to the home and $25 to the furniture. In other words the householder would have to pay a total of $75 himself, which makes it that much worse. I do suggest that there should be the one flat deduction of $25.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister consider some amendment such as this: Right after the words "fifty dollars" insert words to this effect: "except in the case of a dwelling house where the damage is such as to render it uninhabitable."

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not favourably consider that amendment. The only amendment that in my opinion would be proper for consideration would be a change in the amount.

Mr. MacNICOL: From $50 to $25.

Mr. KINLEY: This was all discussed in committee, and $50 was agreed upon.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it went through the committee, and I do not think I would change it. If we experience some trouble it could be considered again. All these things can be done later. But I do not feel like making any change in that. We have had this bill here for two or three months; it has gone through the committee. I know it is the natural thing for hon. members to make as much provision as they can for the people in the bill, and I am not blaming hon. members for that; but as I said to the hon. member for Lethbridge, it does not seem to me to be an abnormal thing to ask the property owner to assume damage up to $50. If there is some bombardment in Halifax or Vancouver or farther inland and we find there is real, serious hardship as a result of the $50 limit, we shall have some experience to go on. I think this will work out all right. I do not think the people are going to be thinking about it when there is a bombardment, either before or after. It is the people as a whole paying the people who suffer loss. This money does not come out of the air; it comes from other people. I may not be able to convince the hon. member for Lethbridge of that, but I think I will stand by the taxpayer on this $50 limit until I see a more clearly demonstrated need.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The difficulty lies in this, that the humble men are paying the taxes. A man with a $450 house who has $45 damage done to it has sustained a loss of 10 per cent of the value of his property; the man with a $4,500 house who sustains a loss of $450 has sustained only a 10 per cent loss. He will get every cent of the $450 loss, but the man with the $450 house will get nothing. That is a gross inequity, a gross injustice. The man with the $4,500 house will probably, in 60 per cent of the cases at least, be able to make good his $450 loss with far greater ease than the man with the $450 house will be able to make good his loss.

The first thing that people with very small incomes will think of will be the damage to their houses. I have sat in houses and seen women break into tears because a windowlight was broken, because they knew that to replace it meant they would have to take the price out of the children's food. I do not know whether the minister and a good many hon. members who considered this bill have known what it is to go through hardships. I have the impression from the reaction toward it, that most of them would grow much wiser by having to go through real difficulty. I would like to have them follow the kind of life I had to live for fifteen or twenty years of my life; they would then realize how hard it is for such people to sustain a loss of $20 or $25. They would realize that the very first thing that those people would think of, in case a chimney were blown down for example, would be, "How in heaven's name are we going to live without that chimney?" especially if it were winter time. But if the cost of replacing the chimney is less than $50 they get nothing, notwithstanding that the habitability of their house has been destroyed. I do not wish to be overinsistent, but I believe there is great danger in this house of disregarding the sufferings of the poor. We ought to bear constantly in mind that the number of poor in this country is far greater than we ordinarily realize. The minister should make some modification which would not even exclude $25 damage. If damage is done to a house so that it is no longer habitable, especially in case the people are unable to repair the damage, that repair ought to be made by the government. The habitability of the house should be restored.

Mr. MacNICOL: When I was speaking a few moments ago I heard an interjection that the committee—I assume the hon. member meant the banking and commerce committee or whatever committee it was that considered this bill—had surveyed and looked into every angle of the legislation and sent the bill back to this house; as much as to say that the rest of us have nothing to say. There are not many members on the banking and commerce committee—

An hon. MEMBER: Fifty.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is fifty out of two hundred and forty-five. I was not on that committee, and I am not going to abrogate my rights in this house to that or any other committee. If I have any comment to make I will make it irrespective of anything the banking and commerce committee may do about a bill.

The hon. member for Lethbridge spoke of houses of a value of $450. I saw, in a small village north of Toronto, a very nice little house together with a lot sold recently for $250, and I venture to say there are in the coves and inlets of Nova Scotia and British Columbia many houses for which $250 would be considered a good price. If one of those little houses happens to be blown up, as is more likely on either coast than in York county, a loss of $50 would be a very large item on such a property.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the house were blown up, the owner would get the whole thing without any deduction.

Mr. MacNICOL: But damage of $50 to such a house would be a very large proportion.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the damage were less than $50, we would not recognize it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I endorse what the hon. member for Vancouver South said. What the minister wishes to do is to set some limitation. I agree there should be some limitation to prevent unfounded claims, but $25 would be just as good a limitation as $50.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Am I correct in assuming that under section 8, subsection 3 (b), any householder who sustains a loss of gold, silver plate, jewellery, furs, et cetera, will be reimbursed for that loss up to $250? A loss of $25 or $30 I presume would be paid; yet the poor citizen whose house may not be worth much more than $50 would not be reimbursed for damage up to that amount. I know many houses in York South for which I doubt if one would get $50 on the market to-day. I think the minister will have a good deal of explaining to do to that class of people if he puts through legislation which will grant a person who can afford diamonds and furs compensation for $25 or $30 damage to those diamonds and furs, but refuses to give a householder whose property may not be worth more than $50 or $100 compensation for damage under $50.

Mr. ILSLEY: The provision with respect to diamonds and furs to which the hon. member refers has a limitation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a ceiling.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a ceiling. It was $400; we cut it to $250. That does not necessarily mean he gets the $250; it depends upon other things.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: But there is no minimum.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a minimum of $25.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: That is, you may get $30 for damage to furs, but you cannot get anything for damage of less than $50 to your house.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the damage to your chattels as a whole is under $25, you get nothing. "Chattels" does not exclude this particular class of chattels, but there is a limit on the total amount that can be claimed for these chattels.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: My point is that compensation as low as $30 may be paid in connection with furs or diamonds, but damage to a house amounting to less than $50 cannot be paid. Is that not correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: For chattels as a whole, yes. Theoretically you can pick out such things. A person might have a fur or a diamond bombed. But this is a provision for chattels. I think it is unnatural to go fishing around among chattels, pick out furs and diamonds and say that a person could lose a diamond worth $30 and get the full $30. If a person owns a house and it is damaged to the extent of $45, he would not get anything. If that is discrimination in favour of the poor as against the rich; if that will give my hon. friend something to make a speech about, it is all right, but it will not worry me.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: This legislation is going to look bad to the poor people of this country, and I would hate to be a party to it.

Mr. GREEN: I was not a member of the banking and commerce committee, but I was permitted to sit in at the meetings. The impression I got in connection with this limitation was that it had been inserted to make it convenient for the insurance men to administer the legislation. I think this is an insurance man's section. You have that on the one side, and then on the other you have many poor people to whom $50 is a great deal of money. I know in parts of the riding which I represent there are many house owners who would find it very difficult to raise $50 to repair damage done by bombs. I urge the minister that he at least change this to $25, thereby giving the poorer people some consideration.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): The last speaker has suggested that this is an insurance man's section, but I think it is a taxpayers' section. If I were to suggest any change in this section, it would be to have $50 deductible from all property damage, and $25 deductible from all claims for damage to chattels. It is well recognized in some lines of insurance, such as automobile, that there is a tremendously excessive cost in adjusting and administering small claims, and it is almost universally customary to have a deduction of $25, $50 or $100. If a bomb should be dropped in a particular section, it is quite likely that the only damage to hundreds of houses would be a few panes of glass broken. It seems to me to be absurd that the country should be put to the tremendous cost of adjusting all these trifling claims. I hope the minister will not be persuaded to alter this section.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not wish to labour this matter too much, but there are plenty of people in my constituency who would suffer seriously from a loss of $40 to $50. I wish to draw the attention of the committee once more to the fact that $3,000 is to be paid without any question at all; but when it is suggested that compensation be paid for damage done to humbler homes, it is considered to be a waste of public money. How in the world can we get consistency out of a situation like that? If we were not giving $3,000 to the well-to-do and wealthy people, it would be a different matter.

Last night I said there was confusion in the bill because of an attempt to defer to two points of view. One view is that of the life insurance companies which is based upon two principles. The first is to replace the financial loss, and the second is to make a profit. This bill is guided by two entirely different principles. The first, as I said a short time ago, is that each family shall be guaranteed the right to continue to live in their dwelling. The second is that the value of any dwelling shall be restored. The wealth of Canada should not be depleted, because the wealth of Canada consists in its ability to produce goods and services and deliver them. The ability to produce services in a very humble house, costing probably only $250 but able to shelter a man, his wife and three children, is considerable. If that value is impaired, then, according to the second principle which ought to guide us, the damage should be replaced.

As I said, there is confusion because the minister in the bill is trying to apply the principles of fire insurance to this bill, which is not in any sense of the term intended to be a fire insurance bill. This bill is concerned with human value. Its main object is to enable the people of Canada to continue to live in their houses. If a bomb should be dropped in certain sections of Ottawa, there would be hundreds of houses which could qualify under the $3,000 provision.

Mr. MacNICOL: In Hull, across the river, will be found the cheaper houses.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly. Across the river there are whole areas where, if the house owners sustained a 7 or 10 per cent loss, they would get nothing. This may not worry the minister, but it certainly worries me.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This section reads:

> No payment under this act or under any contract of insurance shall be made in respect of war damage to property unless the total amount of the claim otherwise payable is in excess of fifty dollars.

Would it not be possible to add a stipulation, "except in the case of property of a value of less than $1,500 or $1,000"? Then, if a property were valued at over $1,000, the $50 stipulation would be all right. I mention this because I was the first one in the banking and commerce committee to bring up this matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: This bill passed the banking and commerce committee, and there are arguments both ways on it. I stand by my position, and I am going to stand up for the taxpayer. I am one of those in the house whose duty it is considered to be to stand up for the taxpayer, and I am going to do so on this occasion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How can the minister say that he is standing up for the taxpayer when he is willing to pay $2,500 or $3,000, and then refuses to pay a small loss to those who will find it far more burdensome? How can he say he is standing up for the taxpayer when people who live in humble houses are paying taxes which, to them, are just as burdensome as are those paid by the more well-to-do burdensome to them?

Mr. GREEN: I should like to move an amendment. I do not think the minister is quite accurate when he says that he is standing up for the taxpayer. What he is doing, in effect, is forgetting the little taxpayer who has his house bombed. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Davenport:

That section 10 be amended by substituting for the word "fifty" in line 20 the word "twenty-five".

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment is obviously out of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the theory that it increases the burden on the taxpayer. At the same time, out of regard to a very large class of people who may suffer damage beyond their ability, relatively, to bear, I think the minister might well accept the amendment. I am not unmindful of the point made by the hon. member for Simcoe East that in contracts of automobile insurance there are these limitations, but after all this is a gift on the part of the crown, and why should we be a little too cheese-paring? That is the impression it leaves on my mind, although I have not given it any great consideration. To accept the amendment would be a gesture that would not cost the treasury very much. I realize that there are difficulties with respect to the administration of small claims; of course there are.

Mr. ILSLEY: There would be a tremendous cost of adjustments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know that the automobile companies make you pay for it if you take out full coverage, and I know what that extra cost means in dollars and cents. But I suggest that in legislation of this kind the minister might very well yield to the supplications, shall I call them, of the members who have raised this question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am almost touched by the hon. gentleman's appeal. On several former occasions, after a large number of members had risen in their places and besought the Minister of Finance to do something that would ease the financial lot of those whose interests they represent, the leader of the opposition has come in at the end and made a persuasive appeal in line with hon. members who have preceded him.

The accusation of cheese-paring is noted—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister does not like that word I will take it back.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not mind it myself because I have a feeling that the period when it is popular to get ever-increasing expenditure out of the treasury is ended and that the minister who stands up for some cheese-paring by the government is going to be, for the first time in a great many years, on the popular side of the argument, and accordingly I look for a change in the spirit and tone of the House of Commons by the shrewd politicians in the house.

I am asking the people of Canada to do a lot of cheese-paring themselves this year, and I do not aim to have it said that they are going to do all the cheese-paring. I aim to have it said that the government is also going to do some cheese-paring.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is about time, and I am glad to hear that.

Mr. ILSLEY: If a city like Halifax is bombed and windows are blown out, the odd chimney topples over, and so on, there is going to be a terrific job of adjustments. The insurance companies have no interest in getting rid of this matter. It is not a move on the part of the insurance companies to get rid of the matter. As the hon. member for Vancouver South says, all that cost comes on the treasury. I am going to stand by the section because I am going to stand by the taxpayer, and standing by this section is standing by the taxpayer. If we find that there is widespread hardship we can always make a change by order in council, although I suppose we would then be criticized from the point of view that we were throwing the taxpayer's money out of the window by order in council.

The hon. member for Lethbridge says that it would not do some members of this house any harm to experience a little hardship, and as he was talking I was thinking of the people in Russia and the hardships they have gone through, and of how much interested they would be in the difference between $25 and $50 in a clause like this. I was wondering what they would think if they knew that in the capital of this dominion parliament was spending an hour or two in debating whether in case of a bombardment the property owner should not receive compensation if his loss were $25 instead of the $50 provided for in the bill. We are surely at a stage in this war and in the history of this country when a question like that is not important.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought that, too, when we were debating the plebiscite, and I am glad to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon a change of heart. Think of the days and weeks and weary hours that we spent listening to the debate on the address, and then again to the debate on the plebiscite, the worst farce ever perpetrated in this country, having regard to what we all listened to from that seat opposite me on Tuesday night.

Mr. KINLEY: The minister did not speak at all on the plebiscite.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now we are to have a new order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. It is not permissible in a debate to refer to a debate already concluded.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am through, Mr. Chairman, so that your ruling does not bother me at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not think it is proper for the hon. gentleman to say that a ruling of the Chairman does not bother him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If there was any discourtesy it was not intended. I do say, however, that I am not very much concerned over the ideas of the Chair about me after the exhibition we had here the other evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not believe the hon. gentleman can be allowed to use this language, and I regret to have to request him to withdraw it for the following reason—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You need not add the reason. I will withdraw it now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Order, the Chairman is on his feet.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman is only the custodian of the honour and authority and dignity of the house or of the committee. The person of the Chairman is not involved at all. I must correct the impression that might be implied from the words just spoken that the Chairman might cherish any resentment on account of anything taking place here. No such impression can be allowed to be conveyed to the committee. The Chairman or the Speaker attempts, at least, and conscientiously, to be impartial, and he applies the rules because he is bound by the rules. There would be no necessity for a Chairman or a Speaker if there were not rules to be applied, and the debate would soon become a pandemonium were not the Chairman to apply the rules when the occasion arises. I am sure that the hon. gentleman, who is an old parliamentarian, will readily understand that and will gladly withdraw his remarks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have withdrawn long ago, and I should like now to resume with some things I wanted to say. I thought that the case made by the hon. member for Lethbridge, the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Davenport merited some support, and I gave it such support as I could. It brought forward a declaration from the minister as to his future attitude toward the taxpayers of this country. I congratulate him upon that change of heart. I suggest that we now get on with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I must rule the amendment out of order, because it adds a burden on the public. Such an amendment can be moved only by a minister of the crown. Shall clause 10 carry?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I think that the minister's mention of Russia was one of the most unfortunate things he has done this afternoon. If the Russians were able to look in on the way we are cavilling about letting poor people have a little advantage, while we are turning to fairly well-to-do people and giving them a great deal of advantage, the reaction of the Russian people would be altogether to our discredit. I am going to read to the committee and the minister a little quotation from the Canadian Teachers' Federation bulletin No. 5, which happens to bear right on this question of what Russia thinks about human values.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. We have before us clause 10 of the bill; the hon. gentleman has set out his views on the subject, and the minister stated his decision. The remedy is, not a repetition of the same reasons, but a vote to test the views of hon. members of the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Wearisome reiteration.

The CHAIRMAN: There is a rule prohibiting the repetition of the same argument. As regards conditions in Russia, the minister, without exception being taken, made a brief, incidental remark in respect thereto, but this clause is not capable of justifying a general debate on conditions in Russia.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The whole question, Mr. Chairman, is whether or not Russia is concerned with human values as against tax values.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On division.

Mr. GREEN: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On section 11—Time when payments may be made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is contemplated with respect to the regulations authorized under this section, subsection 1, which reads, in part:

. . . specifying the time at which any payment under this act or under any contract of insurance shall be made. . . .

And then the overriding part which provides:

. . . the minister may, in his discretion, pay the whole or any part of any moneys payable under this act or under any contract of insurance at a time earlier than the time specified in such regulation.

Has the minister in mind the usual standard regulations contained in insurance policies, which I think would be reasonably satisfactory? If he has any other provision in view, I think we ought to know what they are.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it on subsection 1 that the question is asked?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, that the minister may make regulations specifying the time of payment. What is contemplated by that provision?

Mr. ILSLEY: What was contemplated under this scheme of insurance was to defer the restoration of property until after the war. In England they found that it was perhaps inadvisable to rebuild at once; they might be bombed again, and there were other reasons for deferring as much construction as possible. I think this is the section which provides for the making of the regulations for deferring payment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not just say, "for deferring payment"; it says, "specifying the time." Is it the minister's idea that it might become, in the case of a tremendous bombardment, too onerous and perhaps unwise, having regard to the danger of threatened rebombardment, to replace and rebuild?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to know what is meant by the provision. I am not questioning it at the moment, but under ordinary circumstances there would be a time limit in the policy under which payment would be made.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course, if it is intended to give the minister full power to make regulations deferring payment until after the cessation of hostilities, it might cause grave hardship.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And he only limits that, in the concluding portion of the paragraph, to an exercise of discretion in himself, or to avoid undue hardship, or if the amount does not exceed the sum of $400. It seems to me that that $400 could very well be raised to the price of a moderate house—two or three thousand dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is an alternative.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, yes, it is an alternative, but in any event I would assume that the minister would exercise a discretion in the case of the amount payable not exceeding $400. That, of course, is a small loss. Why should $400 be the limit? I think the amount should be a little more liberal in the case of rebuilding or repairing small houses where the damage would be more than $400.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; well, the minister has the right to do that for the purpose of avoiding undue hardship. He may pay at once, if the sum is under $400, whether there would be any hardship or not from withholding payment. But in all cases of undue hardship the minister has a discretion to bring the time of payment back before the period provided for in the regulations. I think the general idea of the section is that the normal thing will be to make regulations deferring the time for payment of loss, with the proviso that nevertheless the loss may be paid at once to avoid undue hardship; or, whether undue hardship exists or not, it may be paid at once if the amount involved is under $400. There would not be any sense in withholding these small sums.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government any definite policy with regard to administering this section? It does seem, from what the minister has said, that the tendency will be to withhold payments until after the war. The war may last a long time, and in the meantime people in British Columbia and Nova Scotia who lose their houses will need shelter and furniture and chattels of various kinds. I suggest to the minister that the policy of the government may not be wise in regard to this section, that there should not be so much emphasis placed on withholding payment until after the war. That may apply very well in Great Britain, and I assume that this policy is simply copying the policy of Great Britain.

I doubt very much, however, whether it is wise here in Canada. I sugggest that the minister be not too quick in adopting the policy of holding back until after the war; it may turn out to be very unwise.

Mr. ILSLEY: We cannot tell what the policy will be until we see what happens. This is the policy followed in England, and it is a good thing to defer building and so on as much as possible until after the war, because the more building you do now, the more drain you make on materials and labour and so forth. On the other hand, of course that cannot be carried to the point where people are left drifting around without any shelter. All these factors will be taken into consideration. The English policy is embodied in this section; and if the legislation comes into play at all, if there is bombardment doing damage here, I do not see any reason why the English policy is not the right policy for this country.

Mr. CHURCH: What is the meaning of the words, "if he is satisfied either that the replacement or repair of the property damaged is expedient in the public interest?" It is not in the public interest that we should have this bill at all. It is not expedient; this is the wrong time for it. It will be observed that the minister has power to make rules and regulations. The details are set out at the foot of page 11 of the bill, section 33, which must be read into subsection 1 of section 11. I would point out that the insurance companies are protected while the government is not. The companies are backed by indirect guarantee of the government. Suppose the owner of certain property becomes a soldier. What happens then, if default is made? The minister said yesterday that he could have done all this by order in council under the War Measures Act. If so, what is the use of us? He threatened us with the War Measures Act, if you please, if we continued to insist on safeguards. If you ask any questions under this bill you are threatened with something of the sort.

A large body of public opinion is wondering how the government can afford money for such an undertaking as this in conjunction with the insurance companies. Is it expedient and in the public interest that this parliament should put into the hands of the governor in council the power to spend up to $400 on such a risk or contract or policy for such a purpose? I say it is not, and this is not the time. According to the minister's report that is what can happen. I protest against this way of doing business. I protest against the creation of more boards of control and a whole lot of officials, in this instance enabling the government to pay out as much as $400 for such a purpose and in such a way. That is a lot of money. In my opinion this section, indeed the whole bill, should be rejected. It is not one that this committee should sanction at the present time. You, Mr. Chairman, are a lawyer, and you know, as all lawyers know, the difficulties that arise in connection with contracts of insurance on property and with insurance companies. On the back of the contract the insurance company sets out a long list of rules and restrictions to be read into the policy and contract, and I predict that the average working man who seeks to take advantage of this legislation will not know the meaning of it. He will not know what it is all about if he comes under this insurance scheme and has a policy. In my opinion the whole scheme is launched for the benefit of the insurance companies, and at greater cost to give them the cream of the business. It seems to me that the officials in the minister's department are simply creating further burdens to be put on the shoulders of the Canadian tapayer, at a time when it is neither expedient nor in the best interest of the public that we should pass a law of this kind. I do not believe in this bill; I do not believe it will fulfil the purpose for which it is proposed; I do not believe it is in the interests of the working classes of the country. In my opinion they will not be protected under this measure. On any contract of insurance with companies that are under contract with the government to do this work and take these risks, are the companies solvent, and can they carry out their undertakings.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Trustee, etc., may insure property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a new section. I am wondering why it was not put in the original bill. I did not follow the discussion in the committee, but I should think it is proper.

Mr. MACDONALD (Halifax): I believe some question was raised in the committee, but I do not know how sound it was. In some instances there is a doubt as to whether the executor has power to insure. This is to clarify the matter.

Section agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wish to insert a new section 14, which will necessitate the renumbering of the subsequent sections. I will ask my colleague the Postmaster General to move the amendment.

Mr. MULOCK: I move:

That Bill No. 56 be amended by inserting the following clause after clause 13 and by renumbering the subsequent clauses accordingly:

"14. Any property or goods laden or freighted in ships or vessels used solely in inland waters so long as they are in transit between two Canadian ports on the great lakes shall at all times during the transit be deemed to be in Canada; and any property or goods being carried between two points in Canada by the Canadian National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway shall at all times, during the transit be deemed to be in Canada."

We are taking the power to insure goods in Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a consequential amendment. It follows from some other change.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be necessary anyway; I do not think it is necessitated by any other change. It was to make it clear that the goods, even though they crossed the international boundary line and came back into Canada, did not lose the benefit of the insurance by reason of the fact that they had so crossed.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does United States insurance cover United States boats in the same way?

Mr. ILSLEY: I could not say. I do not know about that.

Mr. GREEN: What about boats going to Montreal or Quebec city?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is as between two Canadian ports.

Mr. GREEN: But is it not restricted to the great lakes, according to the amendment?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that "great lakes" is defined not in this bill but in another statute. However, I will find out between six and eight o'clock whether it is in the shipping act or in some other statute. It has been assumed that the definition would apply here.

Mr. GREEN: Why should the definition of inland waters, as amended yesterday, not be made to apply in this section so as to cover the St. Lawrence as far as the isle of Orleans? Why have to refer to another act?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the best thing would be to change "great lakes" to "inland waters". That would cover every case that could be imagined.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MULOCK: In view of the discussion that took place just before we rose at six o'clock I should like to move that the amendment I then proposed be amended by changing the words "great lakes" to "inland waters," so that the amendment would read "between two Canadian ports on inland waters shall at all times during the transit."

Mr. O'NEILL: Would that exclude shipments going to Vancouver island, or from Vancouver to Nanaimo, or between Vancouver and Victoria?

Mr. ILSLEY: In those cases neither the goods nor the ships are insurable. Let me make that clear. The bill does not provide insurance for ships at all anywhere, but there is a situation with regard to goods on inland waters which I thought made it very desirable to provide that goods on inland waters should be subject to the provisions of this bill. That is so for various reasons. In the first place there is the reason of convenience. One of the most important commodities concerned is grain. It is covered while in the elevators, and sometimes it is stored in boats on the great lakes. It would be very inconvenient—and there did not seem to be very much reason for doing so—to take off this insurance when the grain left the elevator and put it on again when the grain was put on shore somewhere else. So I thought we should cover the goods in transit in Canada. Goods on railways in Canada, which railways are competing with the boats, are insurable under this bill; and I thought it desirable, even though we have taken ships out of the bill entirely as I felt we had to do, to leave the insurance on goods which are in transit in Canada. This simply says that a movement of goods across the boundary line and back again between two points in inland waters, which would be between two points on the great lakes or between a point on the great lakes and a point on a river, shall still be deemed to be a movement within Canada. In the same way a movement on the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian National railway which starts in Canada and ends in Canada, shall be deemed to be a movement in Canada even though it crosses United States territory. That is all this amendment does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wonder why it was necessary to name the two railways in the latter part of the amendment. Why should it not read "any property or goods being carried between two points in Canada shall at all times during the transit be deemed to be in Canada"? I do not know the situation, but it might just happen to be truck traffic.

Mr. O'NEILL: Or it might be on the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, between Toronto and Moosonee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be within Canada all the time.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is very much easier to identify goods when they are carried on the railways. If claims were permitted for losses in connection with trucks travelling through the United States, claims might be made for goods which really were not on the trucks when they left Canada. I am afraid there would be much more chance for fraudulent claims than there would be in connection with goods carried on the railways.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There might be. I do not know if there is any traffic across Maine from Quebec to the maritimes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is the easy way to get to New Brunswick from Montreal by motor.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I just offer this as a suggestion to cover a possible claim, but if the minister does not care to accept it I am not going to labour the point.

Amendment as amended agreed to.

Sections 14 to 18 agreed to.

On section 19—Contract void for misrepresentation or fraud.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are these the standard insurance sections? Are these the ordinary statutory provisions which the provinces have enacted?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure. Perhaps some member of the committee would know better than I.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought perhaps the minister's adviser would be able to tell him.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say whether or not they are copied from any other act. They seem to be all right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think section 18, now section 19, is quite all right; I think that language is in the ordinary formula. Subsection 2 of section 19, now section 20, is a very proper clause; I agree with that. Subsection 1 of that section, however, makes a false representation or statement in connection with any claim an offence. Of course it means "knowingly"; the mens rea takes a little of the harm out of it. Does the minister think it is necessary to have subsection 1 and make false representation an offence? Under section 18, now section 19, the contract becomes void for misrepresentation or fraud. Under section 19, now section 20, subsection 2, makes the claim vitiated by fraud; but subsection 1 goes a long way in connection with a matter of this kind; it makes it an offence subject to fine up to $250 or imprisonment not exceeding three months, or both. I have some doubt whether we should do that. Does the minister think he has to have that when he has the other safeguards?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 19, now section 20, does not relate necessarily to the statement of the assured; it may be the statement of a third party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He would naturally be the agent or representative of the assured; you might say it was the assured.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is desirable to have a statutory offence here. If not, the only offence would be that of obtaining money under false pretences.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You always have that, or the offence of attempting to do so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am under the impression that there are difficulties about making out a case under a charge of obtaining money under false pretences, or attempting to do so, which might not exist under this provision.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems to me there is a variety of offences in the criminal code that would be applicable to a false or fraudulent claim of this kind, and under the criminal code the penalties would be much more severe. I should think there is ample provision in the code for any situation which conceivably might arise in connection with a claim of this sort. I dislike creating new offences, especially when the code is so full of provisions against dishonest or fraudulent infractions of the law.

I should have thought that the minister would be briefed on this point, because a question of this kind is bound to arise where new offences are being created by statute which may or may not in themselves be, shall I say, mala in se, if that is a proper term under the civil law.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must admit I do not know too much about some of these sections. They went through the committee, which I thought was a pretty competent committee, and do not seem to have attracted anyone's criticism.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There do not seem to have been any good lawyers on the committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: I assumed if there was anything wrong with this section there would at least have been some argument about it in the committee, or it would have been brought to my attention. I am not arguing the case for the sections, but they look reasonable enough on their face. It may be there are offences in the criminal code with penalties more severe; if so, the crown would have its option. But these provide for summary conviction, and I suppose that is desirable under certain conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only a method of procedure.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but it is important sometimes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would invite the Minister of Justice to give us the benefit of his opinion. I have great respect for the minister's position in the profession. I am sure any contribution he would make to this discussion would be of great value.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The present incumbent of the office must confess that his practice in the criminal field has been very limited. I know, however, that difficulties have been experienced to a certain degree in connection with false claims made against the workmen's compensation boards, which have had to prosecute persons for attempting to obtain money by false pretences, and it is a cumbersome procedure to have to resort to in a good many of these cases. If there had been such a provision as this, guarding against claims made falsely, I know it would have been a great convenience. The offence of obtaining or attempting to obtain money by false pretences has to be proceeded on under the code by way of indictment; that method is cumbersome, and a speedy method of dealing with small claims improperly asserted would seem to be more convenient. This provision would not oust the other, whenever there were grounds that would seem to warrant the more solemn form of indictment under the criminal code. I would think that relatively small claims made in circumstances which might be charged as wilful false representation could be more conveniently dealt with by summary conviction than by way of indictment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is, I think, dealing with it, not as a matter of principle but purely on the ground of expediency.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Not exactly on the ground of expediency, but on the ground of this being a more convenient method of dealing with an attempt at an offence that may not involve a large amount but that still should be prosecuted. There are cases under the foreign exchange control regulations which do not involve large sums, which have to be proceeded upon in a cumbersome manner and in which the time taken and the amount expended seem out of proportion to the amount involved. It may be said to be just a ground of expediency, but still there seem to be reasons in the public interest for not setting the machinery of the high courts of justice in motion in connection with small matters.

Mr. REID: Could the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Justice tell us if there is any other act on the statute books that goes as far as this is going? This seems to be something new. I question whether any hon. member, if he lost his home and chattels, could tell the exact facts about his loss. A man might stretch the truth a little; under this section he is going to be fined or imprisoned or both, and all his claim falls by the board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was just about to ask that question. I think this was put in by the draftsman to make it easier to get convictions for false claims. I doubt if there is a similar section in any other similar legislation, and I hate to see this parliament creating a new offence. My hon. friend the member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), the former attorney general of Ontario, must have had considerable experience in connection with matters of this kind, and I should like him to give us the benefit of his views. I solicit in advance his support of my contention against this section.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It is not often that my views are asked for, and I feel highly complimented. I feel very free to give them. There is nothing that I know of in the general insurance law, particularly of Ontario, which is now the common law of all provinces, that is comparable to this section. As I remember the general law, the common law applies. That is to say, if there is something obtained by fraud and it can be shown that it is fraudulent, that which has been obtained wrongfully is withdrawn. But this section goes further than that. I doubt if it is possible to make one of the usual claims under an insurance policy and at the conclusion of it be prepared to guarantee that every statement is correct. I imagine that a large percentage of such claims would show that something said therein was inaccurate and that the person who made the claim knew it. This is so because of the difficulty of making a claim. This bill does not change the procedure; this changes the substantive law, and it provides a penalty equal for a white lie or a black lie, equal for a big lie or a small lie; anything which is knowingly done, no matter how small it may be. The penalty is the loss of the entire claim, not that portion of the claim which was supported by fraud or that portion which was collected as the result of fraud; the untruth and the knowing untruth of any statement disentitles the insured to all the benefits. I think that is extreme, unnecessary and inadvisable. I believe we should rely on the common law.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree entirely with the hon. member, and I suggest that the minister delete this clause.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would be greatly surprised if even the statutes of Ontario did not contain a provision similar to this.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All the statutes have it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure they have not.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will send for a few and see. The leader of the opposition is talking about section 19, which is now section 20. The hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) is objecting to subsection 2.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was, in the latter part of his statement.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Trinity has no objection to subsection 1.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I was discussing subsection 2.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us deal with this patiently and carefully.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I have no objection to subsection 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the first place, what section are we talking about? We are talking about section 19, page 7 of the bill, which, because of the insertion of a new section, has been renumbered section 20. There are two subsections to this section. Subsection 1 creates a statutory offence which is something like the criminal offence of obtaining money under false pretences, but which extends beyond that offence because in obtaining money under false pretences the person liable is the person who obtains the money for himself. This section goes farther and makes liable also the person who helps out the person who is getting the money, the third party. This may be a witness, an agent or an accomplice. That probably is the chief merit of the section; it is probably in that clause that lies the chief necessity for the section. But apart from that altogether, it is desirable, and it certainly does no harm to create a statutory offence which is punishable upon summary conviction instead of putting the crown to the necessity of laying an information, seeking a commitment and going before a jury, with all the expense and delay that that entails. I am at a loss to understand what objection there can be to subsection 1 of section 19, now section 20. The hon. member for Trinity, whose advice was sought in this matter by the leader of the opposition, agrees with me. He has no objection to subsection 1. The leader of the opposition has not taken particular objection to subsection 1. Perhaps he objects to subsection 2?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not studied it, but I will after having heard the learned dissertation of the hon. member for Trinity.

Mr. ILSLEY: Subsection 2 reads:

> Any fraud, or wilfully false statement made under oath or in a statutory declaration in relation to any particulars or proofs of loss shall, notwithstanding any penalty under this or any other act, vitiate the claim of the person making such oath or declaration.

The hon. member for Trinity says that that draws no distinction between white lies and black lies, between little lies and big lies. If it is a lie he does not get any money. I do not know the distinction between white lies and black lies, but I should think that fraud would be a distinction. I should think that if a fraudulent statement is made, it would be a black lie, and it is only black lies that are covered by the section. Black lies vitiate claims for insurance, I believe in every province. My recollection is that under the fire insurance statutory provision of Nova Scotia, when a man makes a fraudulent or a wilfully false statement in his claim he vitiates the claim so far as getting his insurance is concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Fraud ought to vitiate a claim.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Trinity could not see any parallel in the statutes of Ontario. He may be right, but I will be surprised if he is.

Mr. MacINNIS: Not being learned in the law, I suppose I should not attempt to speak. But it seems strange to me that we should be listening in this house to arguments in favour of making it easy for a person to get something by, as the minister says, telling lies. This is the most amazing thing I have ever heard. There is one point which I think could be raised against vitiating a claim because a false statement had been made. There may be persons who have an interest in the claim but who had no part in the fraud perpetrated, if that is the right term to use. A claim may be made for insurance on a house by the head of the household. He may give false evidence and, if there is a family, the loss will fall not only upon that individual, but upon the family as well. I do not think it is right to punish all concerned for the fault of one. I think this situation could be met in subsection 2 in the same way as it is met in subsection 1, namely, by a fine or imprisonment. We passed over section 18, which is now section 19, very lightly, with scarcely any consideration at all. As now worded it is more objectionable than section 19, now section 20. It reads:

> If any person applying for insurance . . . falsely describes the property . . .

A person may, quite innocently, falsely describe a property. If he does so innocently, he should be protected, and he is protected in section 19, now section 20, which reads:

> If any person knowingly makes any false statement . . .

If a person knowingly makes a false statement, he is defrauding the state and should be penalized; but if a person applying for insurance, quite innocently, falsely describes the property, he should not be punished for that. I think the word "knowingly" should be inserted, so that it would read "knowingly falsely describes the property".

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member has overlooked the words "which is material to be made known to the minister".

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not think that helps the situation; but as I said before, I am not learned in the application of legal phraseology, and I shall have to leave it to those who are. But I say again that, with the exception of subsection 2, these are not unreasonable provisions.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ROEBUCK: I feel that I should make some reply to the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver East that we are arguing in favour of people getting something by telling lies. That is an extreme statement, and it is not what I was doing. The distinction between section 18, now section 19 and subsection 2 of section 19, now section 20, is this. In section 18, now section 19, misrepresentation of any circumstance which is material to be made known to the minister—that is, material to the risk—voids the policy, and so it does in the general Insurance Act. But subsection 2 of section 19, now section 20, says that: "any fraud, or wilfully false statement" of any kind, although it may not be material to the risk, vitiates the entire policy, even though nothing has been secured by such statement. If it is fraudulent, that is enough; if it is wilfully untrue, that is enough. The general insurance principle is that these acts which are untrue vitiate the claims which these untruths support, but it does not put the man out of court entirely with respect to claims which are truly supported and are just claims. That is why I objected to subsection 2, namely that any misrepresentation or any false statement, however immaterial, voids the entire policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I now have the statutory conditions in Nova Scotia and the statutory conditions in Ontario, and I think they are uniform throughout Canada. Section 16 of the statutory conditions of the Ontario Insurance Act reads:

> Any fraud or wilfully false statement in a statutory declaration, in relation to any of the above particulars, shall vitiate the claim of the person making the declaration.

The "above particulars" are apparently those in the sections relating to proofs of loss and the particulars of the proofs of loss which are found in the immediately preceding sections.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do they not apply to the application too?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. In this section we are talking purely of false statements in the particulars of the proofs of loss, and the section is part of the statutory conditions which are uniform, I believe, throughout Canada. These statutory conditions are identical with those in Nova Scotia. My hon. friend the member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald) advises me that they were adopted on the recommendation of the Canadian Bar association.

The section in the Nova Scotia act is the same as the clause here, to which the hon. member for Trinity takes exception, and which reads:

> Any fraud, or wilfully false statement made under oath or in a statutory declaration in relation to any particulars or proofs of loss shall, notwithstanding any penalty under this or any other act, vitiate the claim of the person making such oath or declaration.

It has not struck anybody yet that there was anything improper about that; and my recollection was, just as soon as I heard my hon. friend take exception to it, that that was one thing we always bore in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is not that declaratory of what has been the common law?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps it is; I do not know, but I had in mind that old provision in the statutory conditions.

Now let me go back to the other one to which the hon. member for Vancouver East takes exception. He takes exception to section 18, which is now section 19, and says that there should be something inserted about "knowingly", but that section is a copy of statutory condition No. 1, in the Nova Scotia statutory conditions, which reads:

Misrepresentation.—If any person applying for insurance falsely describes the property to the prejudice of the insurer or misrepresents or fraudulently omits to communicate any circumstance which is material to be made known to the company in order to enable it to judge of the risk to be undertaken, the contract shall be void as to the property in respect of which the misrepresentation or omission is made.

The section in the bill is identical with that except that the words "His Majesty" are used in the bill instead of the words "the insurer".

That leaves only the first subsection of section 19, now section 20, and it may be that there is no clause like that in the statutory conditions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agreed at the very beginning that section 18, now section 19, sounded like the statutory condition, and I recall that before the law was codified that was the common law, and the same may be said of subsection 2 of section 19, now section 20. The hon. member for Trinity evidently has overlooked what has occurred in the legislature of his own province. With respect to section 19, now section 20, I submit that it is not necessary to create a new statutory offence. I am doubtful whether you will find anything like that in the Insurance Act, although I say that with great reserve because I have not looked at it for years; but if it is there, I shall be very much surprised.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend the member for Halifax (Mr. Macdonald) points out the reason why there is no counterpart of section 19, renumbered section 20, in the provincial acts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The provinces would have no jurisdiction.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It is a provision of criminal law, while the other clauses are provisions of civil law.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite so. That is the reason why it would not be in. But behind that, is there not a reason that appeals to the minister? He is creating an offence that he does not really need. It is wholly covered by the provisions of the criminal law. I am not going to labour the point any further. I suggest that there is ample protection now in the criminal laws of this country, and we should not be adding one more offence to another.

Sections 19 to 24 agreed to.

On section 25—Officers, clerks, employees.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister appointed a new supervisor; how much salary is he going to be paid; and is it intended that the position shall be a permanent one? Are the clerks, officers and employees to be appointed by the minister or the governor in council? I suggest that the usual rule should apply and that we should, where practicable—I admit there are certain cases where it may not be very practicable to do so—make appointments by the ordinary law of this country through the civil service commission. What is it intended to pay to the new supervisor?

Mr. ILSLEY: Nothing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is refreshing. Another dollar-a-year man. Is he coming from the insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I commend that to my hon. friends on the left. I should like to know what they have to say about it. I think it is all right, if you get the proper supervisor.

Mr. ILSLEY: The supervisor will be Mr. James Matson, who is the general manager of the Royal Insurance company in Canada—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A good man.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and of the London, Liverpool and Globe. He is in my judgment an excellent man—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and is very anxious to do a war job, and his companies have agreed that so far as they are concerned he may come for nothing; that is, he will be paid his travelling and out-of-pocket expenses and nothing more. He is busily engaged at the moment in getting this scheme set up. He is not to become a permanent officer of the government or a permanent civil servant or anything like that; he is taking this on as a war job.

With regard to the other question; we have got away from the provision that these war bodies must go to the civil service commission for their staffs.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A good long way past it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is necessary to have some elasticity and not too much rigidity in that regard in time of war. When I say that I should say also that, despite the fact that the governor in council is given power by this section and by sections in a number of other acts to appoint officers, clerks and employees, the general practice, at least up to a fairly high salary level, is for the civil service commission to make the appointments. There is an order in council that the civil service commission shall make all appointments unless otherwise ordered by the treasury board or by the governor general in council—I think those are the terms—and the result is that the great majority of the appointments, all the lower ones and in some cases all appointments, are made by the civil service commission.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under sections 23 and 24, now sections 24 and 25, they are made by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is varied by order in council. There is an order in council providing that, with a clause like this, they are nevertheless to be made by the civil service commission unless the governor in council or the treasury board otherwise directs. That is, the governor in council has the power, if it wishes, to make appointments without reference to the civil service commission, and in the higher ranges, from $5,000 up, if there are to be any here, the chances are that we would not go to the civil service commission, but the probability is, and the practice is, that in all the lower ranges the appointments will be made by the civil service commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not objecting especially to that. I think there is a good deal of reason for the course pursued by the administration. If you give this appointment to Mr. Matson, who is said to be and, I have no doubt, is a very high type of man, and is coming here without remuneration, and you want him to do a real job, he ought to have something to say about whom he shall employ. It is a temporary position and not a real civil service appointment. If I were going to undertake a job of that kind I would certainly want to know who was going to work with me.

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Insurance companies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know what is contemplated or whether any arrangements have been made about remuneration. I do not understand that the companies are seeking to make any huge profit or any profit especially out of this arrangement, but I think it would be well and in the public interest if it were known what the arrangement is to be; or if it is not made, we should know that.

Mr. ILSLEY: No agreement is made with the companies. The companies and the agents have offered to work for cost.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very good.

Mr. ILSLEY: How costs will be arrived at is another question.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Largely a question of bookkeeping.

Mr. ILSLEY: An agent cannot add up his overhead and the stenographer's salary and that sort of thing and figure out how much it will come to on a policy. Therefore a percentage or something of that kind will have to be worked out which represents cost. It is a sort of service fee. But it will be based on the principle that it is no more than cost.

Mr. GRAYDON: Not cost plus.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not cost plus.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is there any limitation in this section with regard to insurance companies? It says "any insurance company registered and holding a certificate of registry from the minister." Is the minister given a discretion there as to what companies he can issue the certificate to?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Those are registered now with the insurance branch. But the minister has a discretion as to whether he will employ them all as his agents or not. He can pick and choose among them if he wishes to.

Mr. EDWARDS: What is the intention?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the intention is to authorize all the ones that are registered to write insurance. I would not care to be just held to that. There are some very small companies which are registered.

Mr. EDWARDS: There is a number of different kinds: the board and non-board companies, and the mutuals; some that are purely provincial or local in their operation, the foreign companies, and some that do business only in some provinces. What is the basis on which the minister is going to issue a certificate?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not going to. That is all done now. The companies which will be eligible under this section are registered now with the insurance branch.

Mr. EDWARDS: All the companies are registered now?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not registered pursuant to this legislation. They were registered before this measure altogether, and all these companies which are and have been registered, will be eligible for an agreement with the minister. The words are "holding a certificate of registry from the minister entitling it to transact the business of fire insurance in Canada."

Mr. EDWARDS: Is that not a certificate which will be issued pursuant to this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. EDWARDS: I can understand that a great number of insurance companies are registered with the department of insurance, and that registry is the registry contemplated by this section.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is correct.

Section agreed to.

On section 27—Inspectors' powers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Pretty full powers are given the inspectors, and I assume that is necessary. I notice, however, that paragraph (b) of subsection 2 has been added. What is the significance of the addition? Was it recommended by the committee? I am referring to the part that has been added, indicated by the vertical black line in the margin, under the marginal reference, "obstructing person having power to enter premises an offence." That seems to be creating another offence under the statute. Is it really necessary? I know that certain classes of legislation make such provision. For instance, in connection with crown land, a surveyor goes on the property and, if he is obstructed in the performance of his official duty, that is an offence. But what is the necessity for the creaton of such an offence here? Is it on the ground of expediency, as was the last one? Are these provisions in any other insurance acts?

Mr. ILSLEY: This was added by the committee on the committee's own motion. I was not present and I do not know why, except from what I see before me; but I would gather that some members of the committee felt that there was an omission from the section. Paragraps (a) and (b) authorize two kinds of entry. Paragraph (a) is entry before the damage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is inspection.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, inspection. Paragraph (b) is entry after damage. A penalty was provided for obstructing entry before damage, and I suppose the members of the committee asked themselves why there should not also be a penalty for obstructing entry after damage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think we should have two at all. However, if the minister wants it, I will not object.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that paragraph (a) did provide a penalty for both types of entry and that it was felt that the penalty should be heavier for obstructing entry under (b) than for obstructing entry under (a), and therefore (b) was added.

On section 28—Appointment of advisory committee.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What right has the insured, if his claim is disallowed, in whole or in part, to have recourse to the courts? Must the decision of the minister be final as far as he is concerned?

Mr. ILSLEY: He has a contract with the crown and, I assume, he would proceed by way of petition of right. He has an action against the crown just as anyone else who might have a contract with the crown would have an action against the crown.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Why should there not be provision in the bill giving him that right instead of putting him in the position of having to make an application for the right to proceed by way of petition of right? In this particular case the crown and the insured have between them a direct relationship. Why should an insured, who believes he has suffered as a result of the decision of the minister in refusing to pay his claim in whole or in part, be required to secure a fiat? Why should there not be provision in the bill giving the aggrieved person the right of recourse to the courts?

Mr. ILSLEY: I should not like to make such a provision in this measure unless I did it in a good many acts, because if we once begin providing in individual acts that a fiat is not required, then the standards of the Department of Justice will inevitably suffer transformation. There will be two classes of litigants having cases against the crown. There will be those who will have to come for a fiat and those who do not have to do so. I would feel that inevitably the result would be that, over a course of years, the Department of Justice would consider that, in the class of cases where a fiat was necessary, they had a high degree of discretion—they would have the right to refuse the fiat in cases where they did not think they would like to have a case brought against them. As it stands now, the standard of procedure is on a very high level. If a person has a case against the crown which is not patently frivolous a fiat is granted, as everyone knows.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A prima facie case.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does anyone know of the dominion government refusing fiats?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have heard of provincial governments refusing a fiat.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not the dominion government. I do not say that they never refuse a fiat, but if a lawyer came along with a case, which was no case at all—

Mr. GRAYDON: How would you know that?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Department of Justice knows when a case is patently frivolous, and it would be the proper thing to refuse a fiat. But I would not counsel disturbance of the practice of requiring a fiat. If we overthrow that principle we are going to do a lot of overthrowing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that, but the whole thing goes back to the day when you could not sue the crown. The crown's person and property and everything else were sacrosanct. It was a matter not of right but of grace to be able to get compensation from the crown. I suggest, however, that we have gone a long way from that, and we can go still further without doing great violence to the principle involved. We can go a long way in doing justice to the subject as against the crown. The minister has correctly stated that an excellent practice has been established over a period of years by the crown in the right of the dominion in the granting of fiats. I have brought a few actions against the crown, and I have never been refused a fiat. I will tell the committee what I have encountered. I have encountered a good deal of delay. That I do not attribute to the crown itself; I attribute it to what I may call, for lack of a better term, the system of red tape that obtains in government departments. But the situation is quite different with respect to provincial governments. There, a denial of justice often occurs. In my view, the day is coming in this country when the subject will have the right to sue the crown without the necessity of obtaining a fiat; without praying that right be done, and without the easement of fiat justitia. That day, I think, should be here very soon.

The minister says that the insurer has a contractual relation with the crown, and I would agree; that would be the basis upon which the claim would be made. I believe a just claim ought to be facilitated. If the minister takes exception to putting that provision in this special bill, perhaps he is right; but the day is coming when it will not be necessary to pray that justice be done in this country as against the crown. I have often thought, too, that claims against the crown ought not to be limited to the crown's own court, the exchequer court. The day is coming in this country when we ought to be able to sue the crown in the provincial courts of the country, for there is just as much justice done there as in the exchequer court. I say that with no intention of reflecting on the exchequer court, which I have found to be a very fine court in which to practise. But I am inclined to say to my hon. friend the member for Lake Centre that perhaps he could not just put that provision in this statute at this time without overhauling the whole machinery in regard to claims against the crown. I do say that the position should be reviewed, especially now that the crown has gone into big business—

Mr. GRAYDON: And little business, too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and very often little business, and undoubtedly will continue in big business. The biggest business in the country now is being operated by the crown; and the day is coming, and should be visualized, when the subject will not have to go to the great expense of making his claim to the governor in council for the right to obtain justice. I am not sure that these remarks will be pleasing to the hon. member for Lake Centre, but I do not think you could make a special exception with regard to this statute.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: With deference, I do not agree with the view of the leader of the opposition, nor is his view that of the Canadian Bar association. The view of the bar association is that the time has come when the subject should, as of right, have the privilege to take action against the crown. In this particular instance we have the crown entering into a contractual relationship with the subject, and placing the subject in the position that he is denied his right of recourse to the courts unless the crown grants him that right.

It has not been the experience of everyone that the crown has allowed the subject to obtain his rights by the granting of a fiat. I know of one very interesting case in connection with the Indians of this country. The Indians of western Canada obtained certain rights under a treaty, at the time when the great west from the Hudson bay to the Rocky mountains was ceded by the Indian tribes to Her Majesty Queen Victoria. In 1937 or 1938 those tribes found themselves in the position that the dominion government was derelict in its duty in not carrying out its obligations under that treaty and the act, and finally, after a very lengthy debate, the Indians of Mistawasis reserve were granted a fiat. The trial took place, and the judgment handed down was in favour of the tribe, to the extent of some $18,000. Then Indian tribes on another reserve in Saskatchewan, being in the identical position of the Indian tribe at Mistawasis, asked the crown for the right to take proceedings to recover the moneys due them, and for the assertion of their rights. To-day those Indians are in the position of still being denied justice, because of the fact that the crown has taken advantage of its rights and has denied them a fiat, or, in other words, has denied them recourse to the courts.

In recent years there has been a definite trend away from the courts, and I think the time has come when we in parliament should grant every individual the right of recourse to the courts of this land, and should not place any individual in a position where his rights may be determined by some administrative body or by a minister of the crown. I think the time has come when the whole matter should be canvassed, the whole situation looked into, in order to assure to the subject the right he is being denied in ever-increasing measure—that is, an appeal to the courts as a consequence of administrative bodies being set up. The other day the Minister of Finance referred to the fact that parliament does not occupy the position now that it occupied once. I think one reason for that situation is that we as members of parliament are too prone to allow matters with which we should deal to be placed in the hands of administrative bodies, independent of parliament and responsible not to parliament but, indirectly, to the minister. In this case what we are actually doing is allowing the minister to set up an advisory council responsible only to himself, and to no one else, to determine the rights of individuals. Against that I protest.

Mr. CHURCH: I am afraid that the advisory committee which is being appointed under this celebrated excursion into state socialism will mean nothing but a lot of figureheads run by bureaucrat officials, with the power centred in the minister and the governor general in council. We know what happens in actual practice. Under the Insurance Act the superintendent of insurance has jurisdiction over all these various insurance companies—fire insurance companies, life insurance companies and all the rest of them. We know that every insurance company, every bank, every trust company, every loan company or every other company of this kind has an advisory committee. No insurance company should be enabled to qualify for a certificate by reason of the money it may make out of the administration of this particular measure.

The Home bank, which was allied with an insurance and trust company, had an advisory committee, and all the inspection of it was of no effect whatever. Before the bank failed I was told that every bank or insurance company had an advisory committee and drastic federal inspection, and I can tell you that it will be hard to get good men on the advisory committee to be appointed under this bill, and they will be nothing but a lot of figureheads. You have to see the set-up of the whole statute to see how an advisory committee fits into the general set-up and structure of the bill. Under the set-up the governor in council, that is the minister, has the power to make rules and regulations and is in drastic control. On page 11 of the bill you see regulations that will be read into the section regarding the appointment of the advisory committee to advise the minister in the administration. But who is going to select this committee to supervise him and the legislation? The minister himself will have all control. I have seen some of these advisory committees, they and their set-up and the functions given them let this parliament and the banks and the loan and insurance and trust companies in for considerable criticism the way they are all interlocked.

I have been in parliament for a long time. I have seen something of the way in which this committee and parliament go over these measures. They read very well technically and in theory; the language is legal, but in practice they do not work out and we are not secure. The advisory committees of some of these banks and insurance companies and all that kind of thing who will bid for this work and contract from the minister are interlocked; trusts and combines have been flourishing like a green bay tree here in Canada ever since I came to this parliament. Instead of leaving these advisory committees to go over the contracts with the insurance company and pick out the company that in the opinion of the advisory committee is the best company to give security to the government and the policyholders who pay premiums, we are going to leave it with the minister or the governor in council; it will be a political appointment to administer a political measure. That feature of inspection and regulation was criticized by Sir Robert Borden in connection with the decennial revision of the Bank Act. These committees of an advisory nature are set up under the Bank Act and various other statutes. Are you going to leave it to these advisory committees to lay down the terms and conditions of administration of the bill? The minister is here to-day and away to-morrow. We have had two ministers of finance in less than two years. His department with him as the fountainhead, will administer this measure. He has departmental officials to advise him, because he cannot do the work himself, and when it comes to the question, "What shall we refer to this advisory committee?" as far as administration goes you will find there will be very little to refer to them. All they will have to do will be to agree to what has been done over their heads. I am very doubtful about the solvency of this fund from the start and whether you will be able to get able men to act on such an advisory committee under such a political set-up, where their hands are tied behind their backs and they have no real active authority. We have set up insurance companies under private ownership, and now the government is, by this legislation, embarking upon the field of public ownership. You have first a very wise act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, which no doubt will be a blessing in the years to come, but in this case the government should be very careful in this new excursion into state socialism. In letting this class of insurance in war time out to private companies to administer, we are on doubtful ground, and it will lead to a lot of litigation.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think I should not let this occasion go by without adding my commendation of the viewpoint of the hon. member for Lake Centre concerning the fiat. I think this case is different from many cases where fiats are required as petitions of right against the crown. When you analyse the bill you realize that the insurance companies with their adjusters are handling a particular portion of the administration of this bill, determining to a very great extent the rights of individuals who claim to have suffered by virtue of war activities. Let us assume that in a certain municipality or locality the adjuster, looking into the facts and circumstances, does not give the assured the decision that he feels he should have. The assured has to apply through his counsel to the crown, really to the Minister of Justice, for permission to sue the crown. As the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, the government has been delegating to boards, arbitrators and commissions a great many functions that should be administered by members of the House of Commons, by the people through their own spokesmen. Here we have a survival of the old autocratic role of former kings, the old way long since superseded in almost every other department of law, whereby you cannot sue the king—"The king can do no wrong". We have this relic remaining in a measure under which the government is actually going into the contracting business.

The fiat or petition of right procedure, the order, "let justice be done" as against the crown, the Minister of Finance says should be or is being continued. If this parliament is afraid to break that tradition, we are not keeping in tune with present-day views concerning the welfare of the people of Canada. When the crown places the responsibility of administering the measure on an insurance company under its officers or trained men, whether they be adjusters, administrators or advisory committee, it is going a long way from the tradition or the position taken by parliament when the petition of right or fiat was instituted. It stretches beyond all possibility of comprehension of a parliament of that day. That being the case, and when the government is entering into contracts such as we are dealing with, in view of the delay and the extra expense caused to the insured through such matters being tried by the exchequer court—and I have no complaint against that—surely the time has come that the courts of the provinces, the ordinary civil courts, with the respect in which they are held, can adjudicate upon such problems. Even under war-time conditions this brings a very fit and proper opportunity for hon. members to give to the people of Canada the assurance that this house has confidence in our provincial courts, and the people should have the right to seek their remedy as against the crown and the insurance companies in the same court as they do against their neighbour. Therefore I should very much like to add my commendation and exhortation to that of the hon. member for Lake Centre in asking that this matter of the petition of right and fiat be reconsidered by the government. Let us break away from this procedure now, and let right be done through the ordinary courts of the land.

The CHAIRMAN: I have allowed the discussion to proceed with regard to the propriety of retaining or abolishing the procedure by fiat, but I believe it is my duty to call to the attention of the committee the fact that we are dealing with section 27, now numbered section 28.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—Reference to committee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I notice the word "may" has been substituted for "shall" in subsection 2, which reads:

> The minister may refer to the advisory committee any application to enter into a contract of insurance under which the maximum amount of indemnity which may be payable exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. . . .

I also see that the minister "may" refer to the advisory committee all matters relative to the rate of premiums to be charged. I think the word should be "shall". In the ordinary insurance company there would be a board of directors which would adjudicate on such matters as that. Here you have one supervisor of insurance, and I think it ought to be obligatory upon him or the minister to refer matters such as this to the advisory committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: The banking and commerce committee changed "shall" to "may". I do not think I could agree to changing it back again. I had "shall" in the bill in the beginning, but the committee changed it.

Section agreed to.

On section 30—Premium deductible.

Mr. ILSLEY: This section was amended by the banking and commerce committee by deleting the words which appear in italics on the page opposite page 10 of the bill, and which read:

> but such deduction shall only be allowed to the extent that the total taxes payable by the insured under the said act are thereby diminished by 40 per centum of the said premium.

I went before the committee and recommended that there be no such deletion, but without avail. I was prepared to accept the action of the banking and commerce committee without further protest, but in view of the provisions of the budget I do not think I can. I regard it as of the utmost importance that these words should be restored to the section, and I am going to have an amendment moved to that effect.

Mr. MULOCK: I move accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want hon. members of this committee to understand the position we shall be in if these words are not restored. In the budget provision there is an excess profits tax of 100 per cent, with 20 per cent returnable. These changes in the excess profits tax throw a very large proportion of the corporations doing business in Canada into such a class that any premium that might be paid for war risk insurance will be paid out of excess profits which are taxable 100 per cent. In other words, if this clause remains as it is in the bill, without the restoration of these words, the crown will be giving free coverage but for the 20 per cent returnable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: Apparently we are going to have a debate on this. So far as I am concerned, I cannot possibly agree to having the clause remain as it is.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a rule of reason about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Do not let us do something that will be ridiculous. Let us forget the 20 per cent returnable feature for a moment and consider just the 100 per cent excess profits tax. Mr. Matson goes to a company and says, "we would like you to put on some war risk insurance". The company may see fit to put on $1,000,000 worth of war risk insurance. If the premium is, say 25 cents per $100, it would amount to $2,500. If the company did not pay that $2,500 to Mr. Matson as premium, they would pay the full $2,500 to Mr. Fraser Elliott as excess profits tax. If they paid it to Mr. Fraser Elliott as excess profits tax, the crown would not be liable to make good their $1,000,000; if they paid it to Mr. Matson, the crown would be liable. In other words, if you leave out the 20 per cent returnable feature, they are getting free coverage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same is true of ordinary fire insurance premiums.

Mr. ILSLEY: But the fire insurance premiums are not being paid to the crown. We cannot help that under the rules. I certainly am not going to be a party to giving free coverage, apart from the 20 per cent returnable provision, which does effect a slight modification. With this section as it is we are setting up a scheme whereby we would give free coverage to, I would say, nine-tenths of the corporations in Canada. That would be the situation under the new excess profits tax. Under the old tax it might have been only one-quarter or one-tenth, I do not know, but there were very few corporations of which it could be said that the premiums would be paid out of excess profits. Now it would apply to most of them. I want all corporations to be treated the same. It must be borne in mind that if I am right in my figure and there are nine-tenths of the companies in that category, there would be one-tenth not in that category. That one-tenth would pay Mr. Matson a premium and would reduce their tax liability by only 40 per cent of that premium because their rate is 40 per cent. I am submitting that the rate for all companies should be such that the tax saving because of paying a premium would be 40 per cent of the premium instead of having it 40 per cent for only a small class of companies and 100 per cent for nearly all classes. I think anything else would be utterly indefensible, and I do not see how we could defend it to the people. I am going to move that the words be restored.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the minister used all of this argument on the committee in which the government had a majority, and it did not carry conviction.

Mr. ILSLEY: That was before the budget.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has given one side of the story, and he has made out a very strong argument. However, he goes a long way when he says that these people are going to get free coverage.

Mr. ILSLEY: Apart from the 20 per cent returnable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the saving grace.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not enough.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister admits that ordinary insurance costs would be deductible under any taxation law, and I think it would be shocking if they were not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Any reasonable operating cost for fire insurance purposes ought to be a deduction.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not allow war risk premiums in England.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not care what they do in England. We are talking about Canada. In England they need the money. We need the money here, and that is the basis of the minister's whole claim. It is simply the doctrine of ex necessitate. It is not a question of justice at all. If you will examine and analyse the doctrine put forward by the minister, you will find that it simply is a case of saying, "I raise the taxes of this country. I want this money." That is the basis of his whole scheme. I admit we need the money; and if it is just and equitable that we should have it by this method, well, then, let us have it. But the same thing might be argued in respect of other expenses. Take the depreciation allowance on machinery. There is no reason why, if we need the money, we should not cut down the allowances made for depreciation. I remember that during the depression certain public utilities, like telephone companies, were operating under standard depreciation systems. A telephone company is subject to storms and other untoward circumstances which may cause a loss of thousand of dollars in two or three hours. The company has to sustain that loss, and therefore it is allowed a high rate of depreciation to cover these unforeseen circumstances. But on the doctrine of necessity we should cut down the allowance that is made. If the minister bases himself on the principle that we have to have this money, no matter where the chips fall, I have little more to say.

But let me ask the minister this. This government has established a cost-of-living bonus system for wages, and we are about to have a new application of that system. I have no objection to that because, willy-nilly, the cost of living is rising and will continue to rise in this country, let the government resort to whatever expedients it will, for example, subsidies that are going to cost this country perhaps $150 million or more. The minister allows this bonus for wages to be deducted 100 per cent for excess profit tax purposes. Therefore it might be argued with just as much force and effect that the treasury is bearing the cost of these bonuses. Let us have a fair application of the principle.

Here is an expense brought upon a property owner by no cause of his own. The country is at war; he undertakes to protect himself or his shareholders by war risk insurance, and that costs money. That, I say, on principle is just as much an expense as the salary of the janitor of the building and certainly just as much a deductible expense as the cost-of-living bonus which this government forces employers to pay. If this deduction is to be put back on the basis as originally drafted, then I suggest that the minister should deal with all in the same way.

What will happen? A man will have to pay this out of his capital. He cannot pay it out of his deductible operating expenses, and how long can that go on if the war lasts for any length of time, and if there is one deduction after another, and another after another, and another after another, payable out of capital? What is going to become, if that goes on, of these companies which give the necessary employment to the people of this country? If it is all going to go in taxation, let the hide go along with the carcase. It does not matter very much to me personally. I am simply speaking in support of a principle which I think is sound, and evidently that is what the banking committee thought.

Mr. McNEVIN: By a very slim majority.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is no use to say that it was a slim majority. It is the democratic principle that the majority rules. The principle of the thing must have appealed to the members of the banking committee. Of course, if the minister is so inflexible that he is bound to have this thing, he can put it through by force, by the majority in this chamber who would no doubt vote this amendment back into the bill again. But in every other case the minister has adopted amendments suggested by the committee.

I do not know by how much the treasury will be affected; I have no idea of what it will run to in dollars and cents. But I do say that the minister in reaffirming the original proposal is violating a principle which has been in the income tax law as long as we have had it—absolutely—and if he is going to do it in this case, he will have to revise his whole outlook. I can think of other cases where he will have to take some steps to protect the treasury for a similar reason. Why should he single out the case of those who are obliged to take out insurance by circumstances beyond their control, if they want to protect their property and cannot get protection anywhere else, and that will often be the case. Why should he penalize them? Why not make the same rule applicable to any kind of insurance? Employers' liability—I suppose we do not have that now since workmen's compensation acts have come into force in all the provinces —was an operating expense under the Income Tax Act. Ordinary fire insurance is the most apt illustration. If a company is entitled to deduct ordinary fire insurance, it is entitled to deduct war risk insurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have the English act before me. Section 84 provides:

> No sum shall be deducted in computing the amount of the profits or gains of any person for any purpose of the income tax acts or the profits of any person for the purposes of the national defence contribution or for the purposes of excess profits tax, and no sum shall be included in computing . . .

Et cetera, et cetera.

> . . . in respect of—
> (i) any payment made in or towards the discharge of any liability imposed on him under Part 1 of this act—

And so forth. The note to the section reads as follows:

> The contributions and premiums payable under this act are treated as capital payments and are accordingly not allowed as an expense for the purposes of income tax, national defence contribution or excess profits tax. This is in contrast to an ordinary fire insurance premium, for instance, which is allowable as an expense for such purposes.

It was represented to me by certain officials in the preparation of this bill that the English rule was the logical rule; that this damage not being of a normal or continuing type, such as fires, but being limited to the period of the war, the risk was of a highly exceptional nature and any payment made should be regarded as a payment made to secure the restoration of capital, and that therefore it should be treated as a capital payment, as was the case in England. On the other hand, other officials felt that it would be too much of a jolt, too much of a shock, to the business community of Canada, to ask them to regard payments for any kind of insurance as capital payments; that once they were told that that was the law they would shy off and we would lose in premiums more than we would gain in taxes, and that on grounds of expediency we should not adopt the English rule. There were others who thought that on grounds of principle we should not adopt the English rule.

After giving the matter some consideration, I felt that there was something to be said for both points of view, and I thought that a fair arrangement was the one which was suggested in the bill. We would make it deductible; we would allow it to be deducted from incomes for excess profits tax and income tax purposes, but only to such an extent that the tax saving would be 40 per cent. That would be the case with a number of companies—I think the great majority—at the time the bill was drawn.

But now I have brought in a budget which makes it quite apparent that the great majority of the companies—I said nine-tenths; that is merely a guess, for I have not got my mind down to it—under our new Excess Profits Tax Act, as foreshadowed by the budget, will now be making these payments out of the money which is subject to the 100 per cent rate. In other words, they will simply be withdrawing the money from us and paying it to us and getting a coverage. That is not what we are doing for anybody else. That is not what we are doing for the little man, or for the man not in business. I must make that statement always subject to this, that that is not quite true, by virtue of the fact that 20 per cent will be returnable, but that is such a small factor in the situation. Still, if I use the term 80 per cent instead of 100 per cent tax, we would have a great discrimination between one set of companies which are getting a tax advantage of 80 cents in every dollar they pay us, in effect merely paying us one-fifth of the premium we charge, and the other companies which are getting an advantage of 40 cents in every dollar, in effect paying us three-fifths of the premium we charge them.

The hon. gentleman says it is merely a treasury matter, a matter of trying to grab the money or keep the money. It is not that at all; it is a case of fairness; and if hon. members would divest themselves of their traditional habits of thought about these things and look at the matter freshly, how could they go out and defend it? How could I go out and defend it? If we went to a big company we might insure some property for fifty million dollars instead of a million dollars. Then the premium would be fifty times $2,500 and they would pay us that much in premium and that much less in taxes. But the same result would not at all follow in the case of a company alongside of them. I could not defend it, and so I am asking my colleague to move that the deleted words be restored.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I am just not convinced. The situation in England is not exactly the same as it is in Canada. There is one vital difference in England, that there is no corporation tax there; they take 100 per cent above the standard profits, but they leave to the companies the standard profits. If you apply that system to the people of Canada, I think they would be agreeable to it. It would leave in their own hands, not in the hands of the government to be passed back at some future date, the capital necessary to rehabilitate their premises, their machinery, their plant and so forth and to provide the employment which will be so necessary in this country after the war.

The minister says it will be a payment out of capital. Yes, it will be a payment out of their capital, but an impairment of their capital. What is the depreciation he does allow? Depreciation is set up for the protection of the capital invested, so that it can be written down and protected. That is the underlying reason for allowing the write-off, because if there were no depreciation of the capital assets there would not be any justification for writing off one cent.

The minister has now stated in explicit terms that he is bound to have this put through. I hesitate to hold up the committee on a discussion of this question. I want to say that the thing is not so wholly one-sided as the minister is endeavouring to convince the membership to-night. I am rather shocked to think that he takes so extreme an attitude as he does; and I come back to this, that the only reason the minister is doing this is that he needs the money and is going to get it, and he does not care whom it hurts. If that is not conscription of wealth, I should like to know what is.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is fairer than the other.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it is not more fair than the other. I put my business judgment against the inexperience of the hon. member and the purely theoretical knowledge he has about business. If the minister is bound to do this, it is useless for me to talk; I am not going to dash my head against a stone wall. Might is right in this parliament, as we know. We have had some exhibitions of might against right.

The CHAIRMAN: Order, please. I do not believe that that remark is a proper one to make—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the remark was not directed to anyone in particular.

The CHAIRMAN: —even to a committee of the house. Furthermore, it was directly addressed to the minister in charge of the bill. Shall the section carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to continue if I may. I am not going to be very long. I am trying to indicate that if the minister is inflexible it is not much good my wasting my eloquence on the desert air, and I do not intend to do so. I am not used to talking to a court that will not listen to me. I have tried to do that in days gone by and have found how ineffectual it is. But I suggest to the minister that if this is going to be put into effect and he is going to make companies pay as he originally proposed, there will be a large class of risks in central Canada which will not seek coverage at all, and he will lose a tremendous amount of income. They will not take out this insurance unless they get proper allowances. They will probably seek ways and means of protecting themselves otherwise, and he will be left with all the bad risks. You know there are two sides; indeed there are many angles to this story—many more than I can develop here this evening. If the minister is going to take this money out and make only the allowance that he suggests, he is going to be loaded up with a lot of bad, expensive risks, with this uniform rate across the country, because this is not compulsory.

Mr. MacINNIS: It could be made so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only those who have plants or property in exposed positions will seek this insurance. What is the hon. member babbling about? I am trying to give a reasoned argument here, and I do not like to hear this chatter that is going on and is intended only to throw a man off the thread of his argument. If the hon. member wants to speak, he can do so later.

Take the case of a company with a large number of branches. Many of these companies own subsidiaries situated in a local position, in different provinces. One will have a branch in British Columbia; another will have a branch in Nova Scotia. Most of the assets of these big corporations will be in central Canada. They will insure under their subsidiary in British Columbia and under their subsidiary in Nova Scotia, but they will not insure the main portion of their business, in central Canada. The minister will have all the bad risks and will carry all the load on a uniform rate, and he will lose the cream.

Mr. KINLEY: How does the hon. member know they are bad risks?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How does the hon. member know they are not? That is tit for tat.

Mr. KINLEY: Well, I don't.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The clamour which went up in this chamber for protection of fishermen on the east and west coasts rather reveals, I think, that hon. members from these localities believe there is danger; that is all I can say. I do not know where the Japanese are going to strike or whether Hitler will send his submarines up the St. Lawrence again. I rather gather that the military people take the same view. Let us not talk nonsense about this matter. We know what the vulnerable points are on both east and west coasts. The same applies in connection with this war damage scheme. The fact is that the minister needs the money and that is the only legitimate excuse he has for changing this provision back to the original draft. I suggest he ought not to press it.

Mr. KINLEY: The leader of the opposition proceeds on the assumption that the coast is the place where we shall have bad risks and that central Canada is safer. This came up in committee, and I made the suggestion there that the world is round and that the distance to central Canada over the top of the world is not very much greater than it is to the maritime provinces. We are poorer in the maritime provinces and have not large industries, and a bombing raid over the Niagara peninsula would do infinitely more harm than a raid in the maritimes. The idea that we shall get worse damage there and that we are the only insurance hazard is hardly justified. The other day in New York they discovered that the enemy had landed from submarines, and I believe it was the central part of Canada that was picked out as the section which they would attempt to destroy —the hydro in central Canada, and works in some other parts of the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those were fifth columnists.

Mr. KINLEY: This section was freely discussed in the committee. The ground was taken—I believe I took it first myself—that the amendment in committee was not in order because it would reduce the revenues of the crown. That question was discussed for some time, and the committee decided to consider it in order. A vote was taken. There was barely a quorum in the committee, and an amendment presented by one member carried. I think we must all admit that we are facing new conditions in business especially, and new conditions need new remedies. If the minister is going to protect his excess profits tax, I am sure he must do something to control in some way the expenses of business. He is starting on the war damage insurance bill. Some people argue that it should be taken out of capital because it is protection of capital under exceptional circumstances, and there is a great deal of reason in that.

The government is the biggest partner in nearly every business in the country. It is taking profits, and if I were the biggest partner in a business I would want to control some of the expenses and also share in some of them. When someone else is paying your expenses you are apt to be more extravagant than you would be if you paid it out of your own funds. I learned, in the municipal council, that the joint benefit fund was more freely spent by the towns and the county because all contributed to the fund. Speaking with some business experience, I think, if the minister is going to be practical and protect the revenues which we say he shall take from the people—and we have agreed to that—the time has come when he must protect the taxpayer and the revenues, and he must have some control over extraordinary expenditures. If I have control of a company and the government pays the premiums, I might be inclined to be generous about this insurance, more so than if I paid the premiums myself. The same is true of every expense you have, and expenses are being controlled one by one. If the country needs 100 per cent excess profits tax it should have it, and it is now taking it; but some incentive is being left to business on war profits by reason of the fact that they will get 20 per cent back after the war.

The minister in the bill says that industry should have a similar incentive to save in this connection, in that it will contribute towards the cost of this insurance. I think he is right, but he will have to go farther as time goes on, because excess profits are being made. It is natural that such profits should be made because the turnover is great and the demands for increased business in our war-time effort are such that profits naturally increase. If you can pay out the money in expenses the minister will not get it, but if he shares with you in regard to the amount to be paid, he is on safer ground, and this is legislation in keeping with the times. It is a control on the situation. It is brought forward because of the serious and abnormal conditions that prevail in the country, and for that reason I voted for the original clause in committee. I thought the provision was needed.

Mr. MacINNIS: The leader of the opposition suggested that I threw him off his argument because of an interjection I made which he called "babbling". The fact is that he did not have an argument. I have never heard such piffle as was used to-night to support the claim he made in comparing excess profits with the cost-of-living bonus.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not make any such comparison.

Mr. MacINNIS: It was mentioned that the cost-of-living bonus would be paid, and because it would be paid—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Out of excess profits.

Mr. MacINNIS: —people should get free insurance. I was the one who led the fight against the deletion in the committee, and possibly that is the reason why it did not carry. May I point out that the minister did not fail to convince the committee. That should be made clear, because he appeared and gave a resume of the bill.

Mr. JACKMAN: What did he say?

Mr. MacINNIS: As a matter of fact, my hon. friend did not discuss this matter when the minister was in.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister asked the committee to express its judgment on this particular section, and at the same time he said that in his own mind, for the time being, he thought it was one particular way. But he did not have any foregone conclusion on it.

Mr. MacINNIS: The point I make is that the minister did not appear and press for this before the committee when the particular section was being discussed by the committee. I asked that the vote be recorded. The banking and commerce committee is composed of fifty members. This vote was seven in favour and six against; it carried by one vote, while two members present at that meeting did not vote.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did the hon. member say the vote was seven to six?

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, seven to six.

Mr. MacNICOL: Out of fifty members?

Mr. MacINNIS: Out of fifty members. There is no doubt in my mind that if the minister had been there and had put the case as forcibly as he put it to-night, this provision never would have been deleted. We must remember that to-day the business of the country is war and that the persons who are making excess profits are making those excess profits out of war. Because these persons are making excess profits out of the war, the people of Canada are entitled to those excess profits, not the persons who control industry. That is the whole point.

Mr. JACKMAN: This is capital, not profits.

Mr. MacINNIS: In many instances the capital had to be provided or supplemented by the government itself. There were no excess profits in this country between 1930 and 1939. There was very little profit of any kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There were losses out of capital.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; but this business of looking at what is going to happen after the war is holding back necessary war production. This continual harping on what is going to happen to a particular industry after the war is over is a bad thing. It is time we got away from that point of view. What is important is not what is going to happen after the war, but what is going to happen if we lose the war.

Mr. NEILL: I think the amendment proposed by the minister is sound, and I will vote for it. I will vote for it because I think it is necessary under the policy laid down in connection with collecting these income and excess profits taxes. But I should like to ask the minister a question. This section says the premium shall be deductible as an expense of carrying on the business if the property insured under such contract is used in connection with and required for the purpose of the trade, business or calling of the insured. Should that not be applicable to any insurance policy that applies to a man's home? I have before me the Australian procedure, which is rather different. There premiums paid under these schemes are allowable as deductions from assessable income for tax purposes. I suggest that is the way it should be done here. Why make a distinction between an insurance policy on a man's warehouse and an insurance policy on a man's home? I suggest that, as in Australia, the premium should be deductible from the assessable income.

Mr. ILSLEY: Insurance on a man's home is not an expense of doing business, under any theory at all. Fire insurance premiums on a man's residence are not allowed as a deduction from his business income tax or from any other income tax.

Mr. NEILL: Apparently they are in Australia.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I think there must be some explanation for that which is not apparent in the reading of those words.

Mr. NEILL: This is taken from a government publication, the Commercial Intelligence Journal, and presumably the government knows what it is doing.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the minister is going to insist on his own way, certainly I do not want to delay the committee, because I think we should get this bill through as quickly as possible. If he is adamant about the matter; if he does not wish to have hon. members vote according to the way they think or as they might be persuaded; if he is going to insist on the opinions to which he has already given expression, then certainly I am prepared to resume my seat. Some of us may feel just as strongly the other way in regard to the amendment which has been proposed, but if the minister is going to insist upon it, I see no reason why I should reiterate any of the arguments that have been advanced, or seek to advance new ones.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is any argument that could change my view. I have given it a great deal of thought, and I feel that I would be almost ridiculous if I went around giving virtually free coverage, or paying four-fifths of the premium myself.

Mr. JACKMAN: Well, of course it is perfectly true that the government will be paying 100 per cent of the premiums in connection with companies that are in the excess profits tax bracket, but after you have squeezed 100 per cent of the blood from a stone you cannot squeeze any more. If you have a new cost in connection with your business, which is necessary to preserve your property, and for which you must pay premiums, obviously if there is nothing left, if all the money is taken away, the money for the additional cost must come from some other source, which means that it must come from taxation. That is why we are in this very peculiar situation, and I think the minister is looking at it in a rather wrong light. It is by reason of the war that we have this peculiar position of a company incurring additional expense, while the only source from which that expense can be met is from what otherwise would go for taxation. That is an effect of the war, and of the excess profits tax. So is this need for war risk insurance an effect of the war. Surely, therefore, the war should be allowed to bear some proportion of the cost resulting from the risk which is brought about by the war; yet the minister says that because some companies will be allowed to offset only 40 per cent of the premium against their taxation, while others, if they were allowed to put it in their expense accounts, would be allowed to offset 100 per cent, some inequality or injustice is thereby created. Well, there are still some companies in this country, and a great many private businesses, which have been blitzed by the war, by regulations, by the impossibility of importing goods and so on, which are not making any earnings. Yet they may have some plants, some warehouses or buildings of one kind or another, on which they would like to take out this war risk insurance, but if they do so they will have to pay the cost out of their own pockets. They are not in the same position as the companies in the normal tax bracket. There may not be many of them, but I venture to suggest that there are more than the minister has in mind. I can think of some of them offhand. So we cannot have perfect equality there; and if you take 100 per cent of the profits from a corporation in taxation, then you cannot expect that corporation to pay anything more out of its own earnings. Anything in addition must come out of capital.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Why not out of its normal profits?

Mr. JACKMAN: Then let us speak of those normal profits. We in Canada see our whole business structure being undermined. No one is more willing than I that it should be undermined as far as necessary in order to provide money for the war; but if we are going to look to private enterprise to carry the burden after the war, and not have state socialism, then we must keep the corporate structure in a reasonable degree of health. So the situation still is that a corporation or a business must provide out of its annual earnings sufficient to keep itself intact. It must allow for the wearing out of its equipment, of the machine which produces some material; it must provide for ordinary fire insurance, wages, materials and everything else. In the same way we have an unusual expense occasioned by the war, and a corporation should be allowed to provide for that expense as a charge against its annual earnings. Now we come to the very peculiar situation to which I referred in the beginning, and which the minister makes so much of in his appeal for fairness to all companies. That is, the government of Canada is now taking 100 per cent of these excess earnings, and therefore the company has nothing to which to charge an additional premium to pay for war risk insurance. I feel that the minister, while advocating certain principles of fairness, is proceeding on a very wrong assumption in the matter. I believe, if he would apply the same principles to what I should consider the true set of facts or circumstances in the case, he would come to the same conclusion as that to which I have come.

I do not want to go into the other arguments which have been raised by my leader, but I would put particular stress on the fact that inasmuch as there is uniform war risk insurance to be applied across the whole country—and with due respect to the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, while those of us who live in the central part of Canada do not fear bombing raids, we may fear sabotage as much as those in the coastal regions—it will be found that the government is insuring the bad risks, the ones likely to cause great loss, without having that general coverage which every insurance company needs to give a fair distribution of risk. If I were in the minister's shoes I think I would argue, as I am arguing; I would rather allow this extra cost for insurance premiums to go against the excess profits tax in order to have general coverage in the relatively safe parts of the country as well as in the relatively dangerous ones.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am in favour of this amendment. It acts as a limit and a check on the powers being granted. I do not think there is any hon. member who is not somewhat alarmed at the wide variety and extent of the powers granted. In the first place we have the appointing of a supervisor of war damage insurance by order in council. All the clerks, employees and officers necessary for the proper administration are appointed by order in council. The advisory committee, consisting of not more than fifteen members, is appointed by the minister and is given extensive powers. The minister may refer to the advisory committee all matters relative to the rates of premium, the settlement of the amount of compensation or indemnity to be paid, the manner of payment and generally the operation of the whole scheme; and the committee may make recommendations as to the amount of insurance to be accepted and the terms and conditions upon which such contracts shall be entered into. We have by this amendment a limiting clause which makes possible only that:

> . . . such deduction shall only be allowed to the extent that the total taxes payable by the insured under the said act are thereby diminished by 40 per centum of the said premium.

If the whole amount of premium is taken out of the excess profits, it might, as the minister pointed out, be returned; because 20 per cent of the excess profits tax is returnable. The element of fairness mentioned when the leader of the opposition was speaking appeals to me, because we are going to return 20 per cent of the excess profits tax and, as was pointed out, this might equal the total premium paid by some companies, which would mean nothing more or less than the government assuming the whole premium. This limits that. I acknowledge the long business experience of the leader of the opposition, but I would put my sense of fairness against his at any time if he is going to maintain that this it not a fairer way of dealing with the matter than the section would be without this amendment.

Mr. ROEBUCK: The leader of the opposition referred to the solid support behind the minister, and made some reference to might being right and that sort of thing, so it might be just as well for one who stands behind the minister at the moment to express an opinion. I was not on the committee that considered this bill. I knew nothing of this argument until I heard the various points of view put forward by the minister and the opposition. My judgment is that the minister is sound in the matter, and I intend to support him if it goes to a vote.

My reason is this: the opposition have been speaking as though the excess profits were the only profits of a company, and that therefore the premiums will be paid out of capital if not permitted to be paid out of excess profits. But that is not so; there is a standard period whereby normal profits are judged, and excess profits are profits above and beyond those normal profits. The theory is that the excess profits are made because of a condition of war, or made only during the period of war, and in excess of normal profits. These premiums for the protection of property against war risks will therefore in my judgment be paid out of the normal profits of a company.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the risk is occasioned by war, why should the premiums not be paid from war profits?

Mr. ROEBUCK: If there were no normal profits, the premiums would of course come out of capital. Even though a company does not have a standard period by which normal profits may be judged, it is allowed by the department to have normal profits before excess profits are charged. Therefore these premiums will be paid out of the normal profits of the company, and it is not a very great hardship to ask a company to protect itself against an unusual danger out of the usual profits.

Section 31 agreed to.

Section 32 agreed to.

Section 33 agreed to.

On section 34—Regulations by governor in council.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think the banking and commerce committee made a recommendation that the regulations should be tabled. I think it was to be included in the bill, that these regulations were to be tabled.

Section 35 agreed to.

On section 36—Coming into force.

Mr. NEILL: What is the idea of not having it come into force as soon as it is passed? People in many parts of the country are very anxious to see this passed. Why the delay, which may run to any unknown extent?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not considered desirable to bring it into force until the machinery is ready to function. I do not know whether it will be within a few days or not—

Mr. NEILL: Is it the minister's intention to bring it into force as soon as possible?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Would it not be wise to strike out that section and have the bill come into force as soon as passed?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all right to strike it out.

Mr. MULOCK: I move that section 36 be struck out.

Bill reported.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 64, to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where is the preamble?

Mr. MITCHELL: The preamble was eliminated on the advice of the law officers of the crown who thought it was unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN: We can discuss the preamble only at the end.

Mr. MacNICOL: We cannot very well discuss it when it is not in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: You may speak to the preamble before the title carries.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: First of all I want to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) upon introducing this most comprehensive piece of legislation. I should like to call the attention of the committee to the fact that education is a matter of supreme importance to the nation, but it is a subject which has occupied very little time in this house, either during this session or at other sessions. Because of that fact I crave the indulgence of the minister and the committee while I set forth a few facts pertaining to the bill.

The bill provides for financial support for education in the vocational field, and I would solicit the support of every hon. member for the bill. In case anyone is a little dubious because of the fact that education is a provincial matter, I would point out that this is not an innovation. We had the Agricultural Instruction Act of 1913 which provided for $10,000,000 from the federal treasury to aid agricultural education. We had the Technical Education Act of 1919 which provided for $10,000,000. Then we had the Vocational Education Act of 1931 which provided for $750,000, but which was never put into effect. We have had the youth training programme, the war emergency programme and other means by which the federal government in the past has supported education within the provinces. This bill simply extends the financial service of the federal government to education within the provincial field in line with the immediate and future needs of this nation. The object of the bill will be evident to every hon. member as it is discussed or comes up for review section by section. I shall not take the time to review the various objects of the bill, but I would point out that it does not provide for any interference on the part of the federal government with the right of the provinces in the matter of education. The bill provides at every step for co-operation and agreement between the federal government and the provincial departments of education.

However, the bill does recognize in a more general way than has heretofore been the situation the responsibility of the federal government toward education and the national importance of education. In my judgment that is a matter which should receive more consideration in this house than it has in the past. I think every member of this house will agree with me when I say that equal educational opportunity is the democratic birthright of every Canadian child, and by "equal" I do not in any sense mean "uniform." I believe that the educational opportunities afforded the young Canadian boy or girl in any province of this country should be limited only by the ability of that boy or girl to profit by the educational opportunities and by the ability of the province and the nation to provide those educational opportunities.

Education is a national responsibility because of its importance as a factor in Canadian unity. Within the past few weeks we have heard a great deal in this house about the lack of unity in this country, and we have had occasion to deplore that in spite of the fact that the two races have been living together for three hundred years, this country has not yet become a unified nation. On a former occasion I deplored the fact that the lack of unity within this country could be charged to a large extent to our systems of education. We must educate our boys and girls as citizens of Canada and not as citizens of the maritimes or of Quebec or of Ontario or of our western provinces. Nor must we educate them as citizens of any particular city or province.

We should draw from the races that make up the population of this country, not only from the French and English but from the other races, the best that they have in culture and in democratic principles. Democracy is not a monopoly of the English-speaking races. There is much that we can learn as democratic citizens from the French and other races represented in this country.

Education has become a national responsibility because of the movement to-day of population from province to province, from the rural districts to the urban districts.

It has been estimated that one out of every three persons in Canada to-day is living in a province other than that in which he was born. It therefore becomes a matter of extreme importance to each province within the dominion that every boy and every girl in every other province should receive a minimum standard of education. Every child in every province is a potential citizen, a potential asset or a potential liability to every other province. Education is a national responsibility because of the complexity of modern life, and because of that complexity it becomes important that every child in every province should receive a reasonable minimum standard of education.

Canada to-day is called upon to compete in the markets of the world. We are called upon to compete in the councils of the world. The boys and girls who were born in one province are called upon to compete in the labour markets of this country with boys and girls born and brought up in other provinces. All this would indicate that the education of any child in any province is of importance to every other province.

Canadian boys and girls, regardless of race, should be given the best possible education which the country can afford to give them and which they are capable of profiting by.

I should like to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to a few of the shortcomings of our present educational system, particularly in the matter of administration and finance. The administration and financing of education as it exists in Canada to-day is not very far different from the system which was set up in the pioneer days of this country, in the days when the one and only mode of transportation was the ox-cart. To-day we are attempting to administer a stream-lined system of education by the old administrative and financial methods adopted in the ox-cart days. We still leave our schools to be administered by a board elected from a very small school area, the same type of school area which was set up in the pioneer days of this country. That system still prevails to a large extent all across this dominion, with the single exception of the one province of Alberta and parts of British Columbia. We still leave those small municipalities and those small school sections to bear as much as 80 and 90 per cent of the cost of education within the schools of that area. As a result, we find that in the cities and in the prosperous rural communities we get good modern schools, with teachers reasonably well paid. But when we get into the poorer communities adjoining the wealthier ones and into the poorer rural areas, we find a deplorable situation.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have allowed the hon. gentleman to proceed because I thought he was making some preliminary remarks, but he is now going into a general consideration of the administration of our school system in the various provinces of Canada, which is certainly not the purport of this bill. The purport of the bill is the carrying on and the coordination of vocational training. Although some latitude is given on the clause that carries the short title, one must bear in mind that the principle of the bill must be discussed on the second reading. In the committee discussion of general considerations respecting the principle underlying the legislation is not allowed. The hon. gentleman is now going far afield and outside the scope of the bill, which is limited strictly to vocational training. I would, therefore, call the hon. gentleman's attention to the particular matter before the committee.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There is one particular matter I wish to discuss, Mr. Chairman, which comes I believe within the scope of the short title clause. This bill is to provide federal support for education in the vocational field. That is the one field of our Canadian education which has suffered most in the past by reason of the old system of administration and financing of education to which I have referred. A report prepared for the Rowell-Sirois commission by the Canadian Teachers' Federation showed that at that time in Nova Scotia only seventy-five rural boys out of 5,923 in grades 7 to 9 received any vocational training such as is being provided for under this bill, while out of 5,851 urban boys in the same grades 2,174 were receiving vocational education. I point that out to show how up to the present our rural population has been getting no vocational education, and I shall make application of that fact when one particular clause of the bill comes up for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. gentleman that general remarks on the legislation itself should be brief, and the complete review of the whole subject matter which, as I understand it, the hon. gentleman is now making should have been made on the second reading of the bill. It is permissible to make certain general remarks on the short title, by a usage which has become general, but I do not believe that we can resume the debate on the general principles as widely as is done on the second reading of a bill.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I shall abide by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and bring forward any such other statements as I want to make when certain clauses of the bill are under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may make such remarks as may be relevant to the clause under discussion. The hon. member will have a further opportunity on third reading.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I am going to say only a word or two; I am not going to make a speech. I spoke about vocational training away back in 1940, and I was pleased to see that this bill was coming up. I was on the committee which considered this bill, and I feel that it was thoroughly gone through in committee. We had many meetings; we sat for weeks on this bill.

One thing about vocational training which struck me when I went through different schools was that it was not confined to young boys; in some instances grey-haired and bald-headed men were taking this training. They were anxious to learn in order to get jobs, and they were obtaining jobs in various plants.

They were willing to take the classes even if they had to attend at two, three, four or five o'clock in the morning. I believe that the Minister of Labour will tell the committee later that in some places there was a series of classes sitting the whole twenty-four hours. In one school an Italian fruit-dealer, anxious to do something for Canada, his adopted home, but unable to get into the army, was taking vocational training with a view to doing his bit in a munition plant. Inside seven or eight weeks he was able to take a position in the plant. He underwent an additional course, and to-day he is a machinist, doing a wonderful job on 3·7-inch guns.

In these schools vocational training is given to girls and young women, including married women. It is not a case of training them so much as to get them accustomed to working in a shop, so that when they go into a plant they will not be nervous. These women have turned out to be wonderful workers, in many instances better than the men. I was surprised to see in one plant girls working on vertical turret lathes, something which the plant manager never thought girls could do, and doing a wonderful job. I saw one girl at a vertical turret lathe teaching two men how to run it. The girls are coming along all the time. A great number of them are married, and many have come from the farms. That may be why the farmers to-day need all the help we can give them. Indeed, not only the women but many of the farmers have left the land because it was not providing them with a living.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this bill as now drafted to apply to the same classes to whom the original bill applied and to whom the preamble referred, namely returned soldiers, and those who worked in munition plants, and does it cover these classes only?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, it covers all those, and also those in the armed forces, those returning from the war.

Mr. MacNICOL: Where in this bill does it say "armed forces"?

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member will come to it when he gets to section 3.

Mr. MacNICOL: I asked whether the bill refers only to returned soldiers and those who have been working in munition plants.

Mr. MITCHELL: No, it is very much wider than that. Under section 4 it covers youth training and a wide diversification of training which is carried on under the Youth Training Act for women, in the various provinces of western Canada, in agricultural pursuits, in home economics and many other branches of training comprised in the act.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the scope not limited in section 3 by reference to the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940, section 28, which limits training to those who have paid into unemployment insurance during the previous two years for 180 days?

Mr. MITCHELL: My hon. friend will find that when we come to that section. It consists of paragraphs (a), (b), (c), and (d); and only (c) refers to those who receive training pursuant to section 28 of the Unemployment Insurance Act:

(c) to fit for any gainful employment persons directed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission to attend a course of training pursuant to section 28 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1940;

And:

(a) to fit persons for employment for any purpose contributing to the efficient prosecution of the war. . . .

That is pretty wide territory. There is plant training, training in technical schools, training for men who are eventually going into the army, navy or air force; but section 3 covers undertakings carried on directly by the federal government; and when you come to section 4, that covers training carried on jointly between the provinces and the dominion, as was carried on under the old Youth Training Act which expired on March 31.

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out that this will come under sections 3 and 4? Section 1 is only the title; section 2 contains the definitions, and if we carry them we shall come to section 3 immediately. Shall section 1 carry?

Mr. MacNICOL: All right, but our trouble comes from there having been no discussion when the bill entered its second reading. We let it go into committee on the expectation that we would be able, on the short title, to say what we liked. If we are not to be allowed to do that, no bills will get second reading without discussion on second reading.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of curtailing the discussion but of bringing it under the proper clause; otherwise it is repetition. The questions which the hon. gentleman has just put are applicable to the scope of the bill which is covered in sections 3 and 4, where such questions will be in order.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I had in mind was that the hon. member for York South was shut off. Ordinarily he could have made all his speech in a much more extended manner had he done so on second reading; but like all the rest of us, when it was desired to get the bill into committee, he refrained from saying anything on second reading, and therefore he missed the opportunity of saying what he wanted to put before the committee. I assume that, having been an ex-teacher, he knows something about vocational training. He has taught in high school. But he has been shut off, and the committee has been denied whatever experience he had as a teacher in connection with vocational training.

I, too, was going to say something; I have had a very long experience in technical training. But at this hour of the night I would not say it. I am prepared to let the bill go through and refrain from trying to add anything to the discussion of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am in the hands of the Chair. I have no objection; in fact I welcome the experience of my hon. friends.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I also regret that further discussion is not permitted on the short title, because it was understood, when Mr. Speaker was in the Chair when the bill was before the house for second reading, that full latitude would be allowed at this time.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Was there an undertaking given on second reading?

Mr. MacNICOL: No, there was no undertaking.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The short title section states:

> This act may be cited as the Vocational Training Coordination Act, 1942.

I think this is one of the most progressive steps that has been taken for a long time. Those who have studied the educational systems of other countries realize that education is a matter of national concern, and I believe that, in drawing up the statutes which originally organized this country in its constitution, had the fathers of confederation made provision for equality of opportunity by such means as federal grants, much of the disunity which prevails to-day would have been avoided. This bill recognizes the principle of responsibility on the part of the federal government in making possible grants to provincial governments for educational purposes, but it does not interfere in those matters of controversy which usually prevent advances in education. When the nations guard so jealously the various rights they have, this bill leaves full administrative powers in the hands of the provinces. The matter of curricula is left in their hands, and this measure provides them with that much needed resource, namely, financial assistance. Any study of economic conditions in Canada shows us that various parts of the dominion are seriously handicapped by reason of the failure of crop conditions, or for some other reason, which hinders the provision of educational facilities. Those of us who have been in drought areas of the west have seen educational facilities ruined and educational systems badly broken down.

Another great thing which this bill recognizes is the fact that the greatest natural resource of a country consists in the brains, the ability and the skill of its youth and manhood. In so far as this bill recognizes that, we are taking a great step forward. There can never be democracy without knowledge, and there can never be true citizenship without knowledge. Where you have no knowledge you have fear. When we learn that the largest province of the dominion had no compulsory education up to a few years ago we cannot be at all surprised at the fact that we lack unity. In so far as this bill is taking, as it does, a broad view of educational opportunity, and the fact that responsibility rests with those in charge of the nation's affairs to recognize the national importance of education, it deserves the support of all.

Section agreed to.

Section 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Minister may undertake projects.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): This is to provide among other things for fitting persons for employment for any purpose contributing to the efficient prosecution of the war, whether in industry or in the armed forces. Some four or five years ago the Toronto school board requested that some aid be given them in connection with work they were doing in vocational training at the central technical school, more especially in connection with the training of aeroplane mechanics and artisans, but every time they came here they were turned down cold with one excuse after another. Last year when they came here they had a promise from the then Minister of Labour that something might be done so that they might be able to carry on this work in the schools. It was represented then that there was a difficulty inasmuch as it was not desirable to establish a precedent with regard to the erection of a building. On the other hand, it was suggested that the apparatus might easily be supplied. This has been delayed so long that we find this year when we come here that the priorities board have prevented the board of education from putting up their building. I wish to protest. I think the board of education of Toronto and those men who are doing that work in that technical school deserve the greatest consideration. The citizens of Toronto have spent their money on these vocational projects and have never had any help. I suggest that they would have gone much farther ahead and we would have had more men trained if we had had the slightest help from the dominion government. I protest against the delay there has been in this matter. The board of education of Toronto has been given the run-around by the dominion government.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no objection to my hon. friend's protesting in the most vigorous words. I have some recollection of the subject matter of which he has spoken. If I remember rightly, the request was first made in 1936—

Mr. MacNICOL: About 1931 or 1932.

Mr. MITCHELL: I suggest that my hon. friend look up the brief. However, it may have been before that. Be that as it may, since the expiration of the grant under the Technical Education Act, it has always been the policy of the federal government not to contribute to the erection of permanent buildings for educational purposes. That responsibility has always rested on the municipalities. When the war broke out, the board of education of Toronto came to the federal government and argued about some expenditure which was felt to be necessary because of war conditions. Of course the federal government took the same position as it did in 1936, or in 1932, as my hon. friend says. I want it clearly understood that I am offering no criticism whatever of the magnificent contribution made by the Toronto board of education toward the general application of the war emergency training programme and also of the programme prior to that. We felt that, notwithstanding there was a war, we could not break with the principle that the federal government would not contribute to the building of permanent school buildings in any city in this dominion. The matter was thoroughly explored both by the provincial authorities and by the federal authorities, and the conclusion was reached that there was ample room for any extension of the training facilities necessary in Toronto without putting up this permanent building, which would have required. I am given to understand, about eighteen months. That is the story as I understand it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is the story; I will be frank with the minister. He has been fair about it, and I do not think it came under his supervision. But the point is—and other hon. gentlemen will bear me out—that they were told they would be given a grant of money to help out in getting the machinery and the necessary appliances, and that is the least that could have been done. They have done a marvellous job, and they are doing it for the whole of Canada. It is the only place where the same thing is being done for the whole of Canada, and they should have had more consideration than they have received.

The CHAIRMAN: I have allowed this discussion, but hon. members will realize that under this bill we could not discuss subsidies sought to be obtained or granted for every technical school in Canada.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

Fourth report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Donnelly.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF WITHDRAWAL OF CHARGES AGAINST COLONEL GEORGE DREW

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I desire to inform the house that the proceedings against Mr. George Drew of Toronto for an alleged breach of the defence of Canada regulations, based on a statement given to the public press by him on June 5 last, relating to the report of the commissioner who inquired into the dispatch of the Canadian expeditionary force to Hong Kong, were instituted on the advice of Mr. D. L. McCarthy, K.C., of Toronto, retained as special counsel in that connection by the Department of Justice. This advice had been concurred in by the legal officers of the department.

Mr. McCarthy has since recommended that, in the light of subsequent developments, these proceedings be withdrawn, for reasons which he has set out in a letter to me of the 9th instant. This further recommendation has also been concurred in by the legal officers, and I have accepted it and authorized Mr. McCarthy to discontinue the proceedings accordingly. I desire to table Mr. McCarthy's letter, together with the concurrence therein of the deputy minister of justice.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: If hon. members desire that the letter be read, it is as follows:

Honourable Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C.,
Minister of Justice,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Minister:

Re: Prosecution of George A. Drew.

When advising as to the prosecution of Mr. George A. Drew in reference to the statements made by him to the public press on the 5th day of June last, the following facts and circumstances particularly impressed me:

(1) That this statement or utterance must be considered in its effect on others in the light of existing circumstances;

(2) That it alleged that the findings of the commissioner were not based upon the evidence; and further, that findings were made without evidence;

(3) That it alleged that secrecy was purposely imposed to hide from the public evidence of inexcusable blundering, confusion and incompetence;

(4) That it alleged that there were blood-curdling facts which the commissioner suppressed and which should have been made public;

(5) That it alleged that the government withheld information upon which a finding could be made;

(6) That the accused was a party to the inquiry having been appointed as counsel at the instance of the Hon. R. B. Hanson, the leader of the opposition in the House of Commons;

(7) That the accused is an ex-army officer and must be aware of the necessity of secrecy in war time;

(8) That he impugned the bona fides of the commissioner in holding the inquiry in secret.

In my view, the clear meaning of the statement is that the commissioner was corrupt or incompetent and that he suppressed or misconstrued the facts.

The commissioner is the Chief Justice of Canada and a member of the judicial committee of the privy council. Having regard to his long and honoured career on the bench and his well known ability to weigh facts, and his wide experience in the conducting of public inquiries extending over many years, it is quite unthinkable that he should be corrupt, incompetent or unmindful of all the facts presented before him.

In peace time these statements, while serious, have not the same effect as in war time. There was no doubt in my mind that under the circumstances, and considering the author of the statement, and the nation-wide publicity which the statement was given, it would be likely to prejudice recruiting in this country and the efficient prosecution of the war.

As I have already said, the statement was given to the press, obviously for wide circulation throughout this country, and in fact reached the press in the United States of America.

The report in question is unquestionably a report on matters in which the public have great interest; and particularly the relatives of those in the armed forces.

Since first advising in this case, matters have developed which in my opinion are of paramount importance, and which must be weighed along with the considerations which influenced me in advising a prosecution. There has been a widespread demand by members of parliament and the public and the press for a full and free debate and discussion of the commissioner's report. That these discussions, either in parliament, by the public, or in the public press cannot be freely and fairly carried on, while these proceedings are in progress, is obvious.

This is well illustrated by a report in this morning's press. While discussing the Prime Minister's promise that facilities for debating this question would be afforded to the house, the leader of the opposition, the Honourable R. B. Hanson, took the position that "the government has taken every means in its power to frustrate debate by withholding evidence and from time to time resorting to an alleged rule that a certain inquiry is sub judice".

No doubt the inquiry referred to is the preliminary inquiry that is pending as a result of the information that has been laid in this case. That is true that it is sub judice. It is a well-established and traditional principle of British law that there should be no comment on or discussion of matters relating to judicial proceedings while they are pending. It is plain that if the commissioner's report is to be fully discussed in parliament and in the press, as it should be, this principle of British law must inevitably be violated. Events that have taken place since the information was laid more than justify this conclusion.

On the one hand it is unfair to the public, members of parliament and the press that they should be put in the position at this time either to refrain from discussion of this important public matter, or to run the risk of committing a contempt of court, which is itself a breach of law. On the other hand, if these judicial proceedings are carried on while the debate in parliament and public discussion is taking place, it is obvious that the prosecution cannot continue in that freedom and independence that is so essential in our administration of justice.

Therefore, weighing the importance of free parliamentary debate and public discussion as against the continuance of this prosecution, at a time when matters affecting the carrying on of the war are of such vital and immediate importance, I am bound to come to the conclusion that it is in the public interest that this prosecution should be withdrawn and I so advise.

I am,
Yours very truly,
D. L. McCarthy.

Then there is a memorandum dated July 10, 1942, as follows:

For the reasons given by special counsel for the Attorney General of Canada, I concur in the opinion that the charge against Mr. George Drew under the defence of Canada regulations should be withdrawn.

F. P. Varcoe,
Deputy Minister of Justice.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to make just a few brief observations with reference to the statement just made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), but before doing so I should like to express to him my appreciation of his courtesy in sending me a copy of the statement and the letter which he has just read.

As to what took place in the court proceedings to-day, I have no comment to make, but I do assert that the reasons given for the withdrawal are untenable. The reasons given in the McCarthy letter perpetuate the allegations against Colonel Drew. That is unfair to Colonel Drew and the public will resent it. The fact of the matter is that the government made a grave mistake in starting this prosecution. An excuse for its withdrawal had to be found, and one excuse is just as good as another.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I wish to express my appreciation to the minister of his forwarding to me a copy of this communication, although I have not really had time to read it, because I have only just received it. The defence of Canada regulations are now before a committee of the house. This case, like others, was based upon the expression "likely to prejudice recruiting" or words to that effect. On several occasions I have tried to point out to this house that that is too wide a power for any government or any department to have. I hope the committee will consider the recommendation to the effect that the regulations be amended so that we may not have any more of these regrettable incidents.

SHIPPING LOSSES

SINKING OF SHIPS IN ST. LAWRENCE RIVER AS A RESULT OF ENEMY ACTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the government on a very urgent matter. According to information received from my constituency there have been some more ships sunk by enemy submarines since the time of the first attack on May 11 and 12 last. Still three more ships forming part of a fourteen ship convoy were torpedoed last Sunday night opposite Cap Chat in the St. Lawrence river. Is the minister disposed to make a statement to the house or to arrange for a secret sitting to inform the people's representatives as to the seriousness of the situation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I believe the hon. member was in the house when the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) made a statement as to the policy that will be followed with regard to the disclosure of any sinkings that might occur in the vicinity of Canada or in the St. Lawrence. The minister made it quite clear that there would be a proper time for the government to make an announcement of any event of the kind, but that premature announcements were only serving the ends of the enemy and would not help the ends of Canada's defence. If the hon. member will allow me to say so, I think he should have conferred with the minister before bringing a matter of this kind up in the way he has. The minister does not happen to be be in the house at the moment, but I may say to my hon. friend that any statement that has to be made in regard to this matter will be made by the minister at a time which he thinks will best serve the public interest.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. ROY: I rise to a question of privilege. I am most unwilling to disclose anything that might help our enemies. However, I think my constituents have a right to be protected. They are confronted with danger every day.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROY: I respectfully submit that I should be allowed to make my position clear. It will take only a few words.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has put his question and the Prime Minister has replied. I do not think the hon. member should enlarge upon a question which has already been answered.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

GIN—REFERENCE TO RETURNS BROUGHT DOWN IN ANSWER TO QUESTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I should like to refer to sessional paper 303-E of November 3, 1941, which deals with the requests and suggestions of a large number of temperance societies, organizations and leagues of various denominations and located in the various provinces. I do not know whether some of the letters I hold in my hand are accurate, and I ask the minister if he will kindly have them checked. If they are, I would ask him kindly to have the file completed and returned. I refer also to return 303-D of June 5, 1941. It has been stated by the department that it is not permissible to advertise John de Kuyper's compound gin as gin. Here are seven clippings from various French and English papers which show this product being advertised as gin, contrary to the law. I shall send the return with the clippings to the minister and I hope that action will be taken.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): I shall be very glad to make an investigation of this favourite topic of my hon. friend.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOBILIZATION ACT AMENDMENT BILL—BUDGET RESOLUTIONS—MORNING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I should like to inquire when Bill No. 80 will be brought up again?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Bill No. 80 will be brought up again in due course.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the ministry with regard to the remainder of the sessional programme. We have concluded what I consider were the major debates of the session. I am anxious to see the budget resolutions brought forward, and I should like to know whether they will be considered in the coming week. They are very important from every standpoint and should be brought forward as soon as possible. I hope that we can make a start on them on Monday.

Then there is Bill No. 80 and the departmental estimates. I think I am speaking the mind of most of the members of this house when I express the desire—perhaps I should limit this to my own desire—to see the end of this session. I must say that the labours of the session are bearing very heavily upon me physically and otherwise, and I am getting a little frayed. I would like to see this session over, and I do not think I am doing any violence to the public interest when I express that wish.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members feel as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition does —I am not referring particularly to being frayed, but I think hon. members generally would like to see the proceedings of the session terminated as soon as possible. If there is any general desire in the house that we should begin morning sittings soon I for one would be quite prepared to do so. I would like to say to my hon. friend that perhaps he and I and the leaders of the other groups might have a conference to see if we cannot plan the arrangements for the remainder of the session in a manner which will expedite business, and then an announcement could be made to the house as to any agreement we may reach.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly. Can the Minister of Finance say when the budget resolutions will be proceeded with?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I could go on at almost any time. I think I could go on with them on Monday or Tuesday.

MILITARY SERVICE

RADIO ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING CALLS IN MILITARY DISTRICT NO. 3

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National War Services. This morning there was a radio announcement that military district No. 3 would be the only district in Canada where men at present in the age group thirty-five to forty would be called for military service. Why is military district No. 3 picked out?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): There is no truth in the report.

AIRCRAFT INDUSTRY

MORALE-BUILDING CAMPAIGN—REFERENCE TO RETURN TO ORDER OF THE HOUSE TABLED JULY 7

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the house to the incompleteness and incorrectness of the return brought down to an order of this house on July 7, being sessional paper 274-C, pursuant to an order made on June 1, 1942, requiring the production of:

> A copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, memoranda or other documents in the possession of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Minister of Finance, the director-general of aircraft production, the comptroller of the treasury, or of any official of said departments in any way referring to the morale-building campaign by E. G. Hirst.

I am not entering into any discussion of the merits of that campaign, but I do wish to point out that a very considerable number of documents have been omitted from this return, and for that reason, being a breach of the privileges of the house, I now bring the matter to the attention of the house.

It is stated in sessional paper 274-A that the sum of $7,682.74 was paid to Might Directories Limited for four individual letters monthly to each aircraft company, but no copy of these letters is included in the return.

The first six pages of this return consist of a memorandum made on June 21, three weeks after the order of the house was made, and is a self-serving document explaining the circumstances, but the letters and the documents themselves are not included.

I point out that there are documents that are not included in this return which are in the possession of the Department of Munitions and Supply and in particular of Ralph P. Bell, director-general of aircraft production. I could name several of these documents, giving the dates, which are not included in the return, which consists in the main of literature put out in connection with the morale-building campaign. But what was asked for was the letters and the documents, many of which have not been brought down.

I think it is a serious matter, Mr. Speaker, when letters and documents in the possession of a department or departments of government are not brought down to parliament when an order of the house is made.

There are obvious omissions of letters from this return. It is an affront to parliament if government officials are permitted to sort out and determine what information or documents should be included in a return to be placed before parliament. It denies to parliament and the country full information to which hon. members are entitled when an order of the house is made.

Again not discussing the merits, I assert the right of members of this house to full information on questions asked, and not to selected information.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Mr. Speaker, the return was prepared in my department in the ordinary way. We have a senior officer of the department whose duty it is to prepare the returns. Without knowing anything about the matter personally, I have every confidence that the officer filed copies of all letters which were not privileged under the rules of the house. However, I shall be glad to explore that further and determine whether or not it is the case.

So far as the particular matter between Mr. Hirst and Might Directories, Limited, is concerned, Mr. Hirst was never an officer of the department, but he is an officer of the aircraft industry. Any letters that he may have written to persons outside the government are not in the possession of the government, and the government is not entitled to their possession.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: In that connection may I say that Mr. Hirst, three weeks before he received his appointment under order in council, which was passed on May 29, 1942, and brought down to the house on July 6, 1942, was sending out letters on the letterhead of the Department of Munitions and Supply, aircraft branch, from the office of the director-general, E. G. Hirst, director of personnel relations.

When the minister states that any documents that are not included in the return may have been privileged, I would point out to him that a letter written on February 3, 1942, by Ralph P. Bell, director-general of aircraft production, sent out broadcast, not to aircraft manufacturers, but to other manufacturers throughout Canada, is not included in this return. That letter reads as follows:

> Ed Hirst is contributing his services for an important special job of work in connection with the aircraft production programme; namely, that of director of the committee on personnel relations.
> Offhand, this may not strike you as a position requiring much time, but if you could study the programme that has been mapped out and visualize the tremendous organization work involved, embracing as it does industrial plants from Halifax to Vancouver, you would appreciate the fact that Ed is not going to have much time to attend to his own business.
> For some days we have been groping around for a plan whereby his income wouldn't suffer too drastically—

Mr. HOWE: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this letter was put on Hansard by my hon. friend earlier in the session.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: No, this is another one.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: On the orders of the day being called a question of privilege was raised by the hon. gentleman. The rules of the house are that a question of privilege must be briefly stated, and the grounds on which such question of privilege is raised should be very summarily stated. Such question cannot give occasion to a debate. The hon. member has stated his question based on the privileges of the house which he contends have been disregarded in the filing of the documents ordered by the house. The minister has promised to inquire and to give further information at a later date. That disposes of the matter.

Mr. HOMUTH: He said a lot more than that.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: For the time being, on the orders of the day, I think the question is now settled and closed.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): On the question which was raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), I should like to correct a statement which, in the best of faith, I made to the house on a previous occasion. The question arose in a previous debate whether there was some arrangement between the treasury and the Department of Munitions and Supply, or Mr. Bell specifically, about the charging of certain expenses as part of the overhead of companies. I made inquiry at that time from the comptroller of the treasury, who instituted an inquiry himself, and after two conversations with him I was authorized by him to say that no such arrangement had been entered into, or none of which he could get any information.

Since that time it has turned out that one of the treasury officials did agree that these charges would be a proper charge against the government by the companies and part of their overhead, and that agreement was contained in a letter written by the treasury officer to Mr. Bell.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well, that letter is not on file either.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would object firmly to the production of that letter because it is an interdepartmental letter, and the reason I am stating this now is that I made a statement inconsistent with it on a previous occasion. It was certainly not my fault, nor was it the fault of the comptroller of the treasury, who made, I am sure, every effort, as I did, to find out exactly what the facts were. I believe I suggested on that occasion that there might have been a general conversation about general principles, because I felt that Mr. Bell would not have made the statement he did in that letter if he did not have something to go on, and I was anxious to ascertain just what there was. It turned out that there was more than a discussion of general principles; there was some communication between Mr. Bell and this somewhat junior treasury officer, with the result that the officer wrote Mr. Bell a letter. I thought that in justice to Mr. Bell, and in correction of what I said before, I ought to state this.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister is quite right in saying that the minister should make that statement in justice to Mr. Bell. But is this house not entitled to the letter from the treasury official to Mr. Bell? I think it is. However, the minister has given the substance of it. The treasury did, rightly or wrongly, concur in this course of action, and the country is going to pay the bill.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has a junior or a subordinate official the right to commit the government by letter to expenditures? That is a strange thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not just sure of the extent of his authority. But I am informed, and I intimated to the house, that this was probably a proper charge. In the absence of other directions from the Minister of Munitions and Supply, it would be, I think, a proper charge. An hon. member for one of the Toronto constituencies, if I remember correctly, raised that point later in the discussion. A business expenditure for the purpose of increasing production is an expense of production, it is an expense of carrying on business; and that view seems to have been taken. On the previous occasion I was not going into the question of the propriety of the charge; I was trying to identify the specific transaction, and I could not, nor could the comptroller of the treasury, find there was any such, until later he found there was.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not criticizing the minister personally. I think it is quite proper and courteous of him to make the correction he has made to-day, and we appreciate it. But the point is this: has a junior official the right to commit the department to an expenditure of this description? The minister has answered that question.

Mr. HOWE: I might say that he was not committing the department to an expenditure. To determine whether such an expenditure would be a proper item of cost, the official would look at his general rules. There are very strict rules as to what is, or is not, a legitimate item, and the interpretation given by the junior official recites that that expenditure was a legitimate item. My hon. friend says the public paid the bill. The public did not pay the bill, because, when it was drawn to my attention, I issued instructions that it was not a proper charge to cost.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And issued an order in council ratifying everything?

Mr. HOWE: No, the order in council did not ratify anything. If the hon. member will read the order in council he will find that it specifically refers to the future and not to the past. The practice was regularized from that date. But all the money expended up to that time was charged to the aircraft companies, and cannot be passed on to the government.

GASOLINE

USE OF TRUCKS BY FARMERS COLLECTIVELY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): With regard to the regulations as to the use of trucks for transporting members of a family, in many areas throughout Canada, as the minister knows, farmers get together and instead of each one taking his own car to town they use one truck. I believe that the present regulations prevent that practice. I understood the minister was to make a statement to-day, or shortly, on that matter.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I was not aware that I was to make a statement to-day. I ascertained that there were carefully drawn regulations on the subject, which I sent to one or more members of parliament; and, on the representations of the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) I promised to look into the question as to whether or not a general rule should be made. At the present time permits may be issued in certain circumstances by the regional controller or administrator.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ADVISORY COUNCIL

The house resumed from Thursday, July 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 64, to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training—Mr. Mitchell—Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 3—Minister may undertake projects.

Mr. MacNICOL: The whole purpose of the bill is outlined in the various subsections of this section. The first purpose of the bill is indicated in subsection 1 paragraph (a); it covers the training of persons to fit them, by working at or on projects, for employment "for any purpose contributing to the efficient prosecution of the war whether in industry or in the armed forces". Under (b) provision is made for the training of persons who, I presume, have returned from the present war, of whom there are quite a number; under (c) there will be the training of persons recommended by the unemployment insurance commission; and (d) makes provision for the training of persons who, I take it, will participate in any conservation works which the government has in mind.

The minister should give some details of just how each of these training schemes will be carried out. If we are going to train persons first of all to work in industry, how will that be done? There are several schemes. If these persons are working in industry, you can have either vestibule schools attached to industry, or you can have technical schools equipped to teach young men to operate the various types of machines that will be required. I should like to know whether one or both of these methods will be followed, because any other method is not a very likely way of training people to work in industry. At any rate I know of no other method. We have had no explanation as to which of the two methods will be used in training men to work in industry.

If they are to be trained for the armed forces, how will that be done by the Department of Labour? I thought it was the duty of the army or the military authorities to give men training to fit them for the armed services. As to paragraph (b), "to fit for any gainful employment former members of the forces of his majesty domiciled in Canada," I am in accord with that. These young men coming back, discharged for one reason or another, should be trained, but I should like to know whether they are to be paid while training. If not, I suggest they should be paid; and, if so, I should like to know at what rates. Will they be paid according to the trade they are to learn, or will there be an even scale of remuneration all round?

As to paragraph (c), which covers the training of those sent for training by the unemployment insurance commission, that is rather limited, because it permits only of the training of young men who during the past two years have paid unemployment insurance for 180 days.

As to paragraph (d), the training of men for conservation work, I should like to know how that will be done. The universities all have classes for lines of conservation, one of which is reforestation. Are these young men to be trained in university classes in reforestation, or will they be sent out under foresters? The same will apply to flood control projects. Just what can they learn under such projects. Take on the Grand River; that is an engineering problem. I suppose a young man could be taught something of engineering in connection with such a project, but most of the work is rough work. How much would a young man learn that would be new?

Inasmuch as section 3 contains everything that is in the bill, or practically so, I suggest that we should have a fairly exhaustive statement from the minister on each of these subdivisions which I have indicated, showing how they will be carried out and what numbers will be employed in connection with each scheme.

I would also refer the minister to the report of the national employment commission, dated January 26, 1938, at page 39, wherein reference is made to rehabilitation and training measures. There are two statements in that connection, and one of them refers to permanent training. It states that permanent training measures should be the order of the government. Will any of these plans which the minister is going to put into operation result in permanent employment for young men? I hope so. The minister himself is a former employee, and he would naturally want to see the training of these young men result in permanent employment. To have permanent employment after the war, when we are likely to have a period similar to that which prevailed after the last war, I think the young men should be trained for more than one job. The more jobs a man is able to fill, the more trades he is able to assist at, the more likely he will be to have permanent employment. I want to find out, therefore, if the minister has, under his scheme, some method whereby these young men can be fitted for more than one job.

I should like to have an explanation of these various schemes. Perhaps the minister can tell us if he is going to use some such scheme as is now in operation in London, Ontario. I am not sure whether it comes under the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston); at any rate, I believe it is under one of the defence ministers. Young men are taught in a very efficient school by a very efficient method. I have been pleased by what they are doing there. They are being thoroughly trained by a visual system of teaching, with everything before them, to instruct them how to carry on all the various trades that are associated with aircraft or automotive production. Is some such scheme going to be used?

On project surveys there will be little possibility of training young men fully along the various lines of industry or engineering in connection with conservation or works of national importance. Perhaps the minister would give us some explanation along that line. When this subject was under consideration a year or two ago I took the stand that, through our labour department, we should have some such scheme whereby men obtaining jobs would have some hope of permanency. In Europe before the war, in quite a number of centres, there were excellent training schemes. They not only trained men but passed them on from the training centres into their positions. The minister is perhaps acquainted with the Sandvyk steel works in Sweden, one of the greatest undertakings of the kind in the world. I had long hoped that there would be some such scheme in Canada whereby young men, sons of fathers working in such plants, would be trained to work in great steel works through graduating from the training school, vestibule school or technical school associated with the works.

When one considers that that single works has not only trained its men but built for them some 1,700 houses—that is before the war; there are perhaps many more now—it has something there that is worth emulating in this country. As a former workman I look upon the industry as being thoroughly sympathetic toward any scheme that will thoroughly train young men for jobs, and for permanency in their jobs, liking for their work and promotion in their work, because in those vestibule schools in those great works in Europe they are trained all along the line.

Will the minister give us a good outline of what he proposes to do? He has a golden opportunity to do something worth while, and I look to him to do it.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My hon. friend has covered a good deal of ground, and I am glad he did. There are three types of classes already in operation: pre-employment classes; technical schools, which in some cities are running twenty-four hours a day; and plant training under the direction and advice of the federal and provincial departments of labour.

My hon. friend mentioned the armed forces. With respect to what we call pre-enlistment training for the air force, last year we trained 15,000 men. They are paid, through the labour department, a subsistence allowance of $10 a week for single men and $15 a week for married men.

Mr. MacNICOL: And they are graduated—

Mr. MITCHELL: Into the air force. In respect of the province from which my hon. friend comes I should like to mention the real contribution by the school in Galt, one of those that my hon. friend mentioned. We also trained 18,000 men for the army. The men are already in uniform and receiving pay and allowances given to a soldier. We trained 600 for the navy, and for industry in general we trained 40,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: What would the training for the navy consist of?

Mr. MITCHELL: Basic training for fitters, such as engineroom artificers.

An hon. MEMBER: Diesel engines?

Mr. MITCHELL: Diesel engines and those trades that are needed in the navy. My hon. friend will realize also the dearth of skilled men at the outbreak of the war. It is no use crying over spilt milk; the condition existed. With the tremendous expansion of the fighting forces and of industry we just had to face up to the situation, and I think the house and the country may be proud of the way in which both industry and labour, as well as provincial governments and municipalities, met an emergency and made possible the provision of training for men for the army, the navy and the air force, and of course for industry.

With respect to conservation, that is a matter which will have to be decided at the conclusion of the war. This bill, however, does provide for the establishment of an advisory council. It will be composed of representatives of labour, employers, veterans' organizations, women's organizations and educationalists to advise the minister on plans that may be necessary in the future.

I agree with what my hon. friend said about apprenticeship. I think the past attitude of the people and governments toward the establishment of systems of apprenticeship has been a tragedy. My mind goes back to the days when I was an apprentice. But in the last generation there has unfortunately been a great let-down of the principle of apprenticeship in the various trades, and in commerce also. It is true that apprenticeship has been maintained where trades have been highly organized; I know many that still continue to provide apprentice training with strict supervision by employers' and employees' organizations. They regulate the number of apprentices in proportion to the number of journeymen, and also the length of time that they consider necessary before a young man becomes an efficient journeyman workman. I think in a modified way the Swedish system of which my hon. friend spoke is in existence in this country. Those of us who have lived in industrial communities have seen the development of the apprenticeship system. I think it can be said that the two major railroads of this country have an apprenticeship system that is as good as any system anywhere. The trainees are largely made up of the sons of railway employees. I know in the city of Hamilton in which I spent the greater part of my life, in some of the great industrial establishments the majority of apprentices are the sons of men in the industry. That is all to the good; with that you get tradition and the love of the trade that is necessary to make a good tradesman. I only wish it was much more intensively developed throughout the dominion.

At the moment there are three provinces that have apprenticeship laws. I know more of Ontario, in which I have lived all the time I have been in Canada, where, through the cooperation of industry, the government and the employees, there has been at least a foundation laid of what might become, with careful supervision and nurture, a really successful apprenticeship system.

I think I have covered pretty well the ground my hon. friend asked me to cover. As we come to the various sections of the bill I shall be glad to discuss the matter further.

Mr. McIVOR: I commend this bill highly. It shows that the present Minister of Labour is willing to build on the foundation laid by the man who, in my judgment, was the greatest minister of labour who ever sat in this house, the late Norman Rogers, who knew youth and who during the years of depression planned accordingly so that throughout the length and breadth of Canada the dominion and provincial governments had their youth training arrangements in every province. This bill will be welcomed by high and public school teachers who love youth and follow them after they get through school. I think the minister is to be commended for this legislation because it will pave the way for the employment of youth after the war. It was often said during those years of depression by the youth themselves, and sometimes by their teachers also, that education did not count. We find that education does count, and when the Minister of Labour builds on a foundation like that laid by the late Hon. Norman Rogers he is building on a foundation that will stand.

Mr. GREEN: What is the policy of the government with regard to the training and employment of older men and women? As time goes on, it becomes increasingly evident that the older men and women can play a great part in the war effort, and one often wonders whether full use is being made of them. For example, I have a clipping from one of the Vancouver papers of an advertisement published under the title, "dominion-provincial government war emergency training programme." The advertisement states:

> Young women wanted to train for war industries. Ages 18 to 35. Single and widows without dependent children. Subsistence allowance paid during period of training. Full particulars and application forms.

Then the address is given. Now there is in British Columbia an organization known as the British Columbia women's ex-munition unit, many of the members of which are over the age of thirty-five years. They are very keen to take part in this war work, but they are not eligible for training, and presumably the government feels that they are not eligible to undertake the work. This seems to be a defect in the policy of the government, and I wonder if the minister could explain why this age limit has been set.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know the class to which my hon. friend refers, but I would imagine it is what they call a sponsored class. Under the agreements with the provinces, which naturally administer them, there is no age limit. Preference is given first to returned soldiers, next to older people, and then to younger people. We do not take in these classes able-bodied men liable for military service, so it will be seen that the policy is predicated upon putting these older people to work and also taking women into industry in a progressive way, to a greater degree.

While I am on that point, may I say that I am one of a great many in this country who, since the outbreak of the war, have thought we should move women into industry as quickly as possible. If we are going to raise the fighting forces that will be necessary to win this war, by the very nature of things some of the men engaged at the moment in certain industries, particularly the non-essential industries, must be moved into the armed forces or into essential industry.

In saying that, I should like to make this further observation, that I believe we have reached the stage when we must take extra special care in regard to what I may call the heavy industries. You cannot produce guns and aeroplanes and tanks and ships unless you have the basic materials with which to construct them, and of course those basic materials include steel, copper, nickel and so on. I believe that from now on we shall have to be very careful in regard to those whom we permit to leave those industries to go into the fighting forces. I think the reservoir will have to be found in the non-essential industries and in those light industries which can be operated by women, I may say, just as well as by men.

Mr. GREEN: But the minister has not answered my question. I am asking why this training should be limited to women under the age of thirty-five. These women must be trained before they are able to take jobs; yet women over the age of thirty-five, in Vancouver at any rate, are not eligible for training. The younger women are needed in the women's army corps, the women's division of the air force and the women's branch of the navy, and surely some use should be made of these older women.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have just looked at the advertisement which my hon. friend sent over. The province has been written to by the department with respect to this age limit of eighteen to thirty-five. There may be an answer to it. As a rule, as my hon. friend well knows, there is an answer to most of these things. I am not making this as a statement of fact, but it may be that in this particular industry younger women are desired because, as we all know, younger people are more dexterous with their fingers. However, I shall be glad to give my hon. friend the information when we receive a reply from this company. My hon. friend, the house and the country may rest assured that special emphasis is being placed upon the employment of first, returned soldiers; second, older men, and then, women.

Mr. GREEN: Is any age limit set by the government?

Mr. MITCHELL: No age limit whatever.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government given any consideration to arranging for an extension of the superannuation age limit in various industries in Canada. Men are continually reaching the retirement age, and is it a fact that they are being superannuated as usual? If so, it does seem that this must cause a great waste of men. During the war the superannuation age should be raised, which of course would release younger men for war service. What is the policy of the government in that respect?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know. I would think that this would boil down to a matter of common sense, and I do not say that in a critical way.

Mr. GREEN: Then that would probably not be the government policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think industries themselves probably will be the best judges in that connection. I cannot imagine a wise employer to-day superannuating a capable man at the age of sixty. Of course all men at sixty do not have another five years of useful work in them; judgment and discretion must be used. I should imagine any wise employer to-day—

Mr. GREEN: What about the government? They are supposed to be all-wise. What is their policy with regard to the civil service?

Mr. MITCHELL: I think my hon. friend will find that an order in council has been passed dealing with the very question he has raised, providing that people should not be superannuated if they can carry on their work.

Mr. GREEN: What about the railways?

Mr. MITCHELL: I believe the same thing might be said of them. I know we use a good many superannuated men for instructors in the classes under the youth training programme, particularly in connection with the metal trades. That was one of the first things we did; we got a list of all the superannuated railway employees in the metal trades, and from that list obtained a number of our instructors. But my hon. friend will understand that some men are better than others at sixty or sixty-five, so you cannot make a general rule for everyone.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no doubt that the government has recognized the position; I believe an order in council has been passed suspending the operation of the seventy-year rule, and I think that is all to the good. With regard to the railway position, I made some inquiry myself. The rule heretofore has been, and I think still is, imperative retirement at sixty-five. Railroading is a pretty difficult task. I was speaking to a friend in my own constituency who was recently retired. He offered his services in any capacity; he was taken on for a period of time, but found that he could not stand up to the work. If it could be arranged that selected persons might continue on, that might be a good thing; I have no opinion on the matter at all.

I have not followed the discussion on this bill very closely, but there are one or two matters I should like the minister to explain, though he may have done so last evening. I notice that section 3, which seems to be the enabling section giving the minister power to undertake projects to provide vocational training, has been redrafted in a degree. Paragraph (b) is new, having been substituted for what was there previously, and it is limited in its operations to:

> . . . fit for any gainful employment former members of His Majesty's Canadian forces or former members of any of His Majesty's forces who were at the time of enlistment domiciled in Canada. . . .

Then paragraph (c) empowers him to undertake projects:

> to fit for any gainful employment persons directed by the employment insurance commission to attend a course of training. . . .

Paragraph (d) seems to be limited in respect of employment for any purpose contributing to the conservation or development of the natural resources of the crown in the right of the dominion, as opposed to the natural resources of the country. Would the minister tell me why this change has been made?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. MITCHELL: The new wording in paragraph (b) is to clarify the matter. A man who has joined the Canadian army will receive training regardless of where he was living at the time of enlistment. If a United States citizen or an Australian joins the Canadian army, he will be entitled to training. If a man domiciled in Canada joins the imperial forces, he will be entitled to training. The section was reworded in order to clarify it. Paragraph (d) reads:

> (d) to fit persons for employment for any purpose contributing to the conservation or development of the natural resources of the crown in the right of the dominion.

My legal friends thought that the words "of the crown in the right of the dominion" should be incorporated in this paragraph. It deals more specifically with forestry, and possibly mining, and properties which are owned and controlled by the crown.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why the crown in the right of the dominion? Does not the minister think that that is very limiting? Nearly all the natural resources of this country which are not privately owned are owned by the provinces.

Mr. DONNELLY: There is a section covering the provinces.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that further down it is provided that arrangements may be made with the provinces to provide financial assistance. Just what has the minister in mind that may be developed or conserved under this section?

Mr. MITCHELL: Fisheries, forestry, mining, prospecting, parks and so on; it is quite wide.

Mr. SHAW: In answering the question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) the minister stated that it was not the policy of the government to allow men of military age—I am not sure that he used that expression—or men who were liable to call to take this training. Was he referring to men of twenty to forty years of age, or to those eligible for military training?

Mr. MITCHELL: Only those single men in the compulsory age group.

Mr. SHAW: A young man in my constituency seventeen years of age applied for permission to take a course, and he was advised that he must be eighteen years of age. When he became eighteen years of age he applied again, and was asked if he had been rejected by the army. He said he had not, and he was not allowed to sign up. I took the case up, and apparenty after that he was permitted to take the course. I should like to have this matter made perfectly clear.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is probably a local irregularity.

Mr. SHAW: It has been straightened out since that time.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the age limit apply only to British Columbia?

Mr. MITCHELL: No, to all provinces.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: There is a very real problem in connection with these boys of seventeen years of age. I know of a number of boys who are too young to get into the army and who cannot take these courses because by the time their training period is completed they will be old enough to enlist. I wonder if any consideration has been given to this particular age group?

Mr. MITCHELL: Some of the companies are a little dubious about taking on boys around eighteen years of age, because they know that as soon as they are trained for a particular job they may go into the army on a voluntary basis. I do not know just what we can do about it. It is one of those things over which, as long as we have a voluntary system of enlisting, hon. members or the government or the minister have practically no control. Any boy may join the army; it does not matter what trade he is following or what course of training he is taking.

Mr. STIRLING: There is a question I should like to ask with regard to the first part of section 3. I was called out of the house for a moment, and if this has been answered I can read it in Hansard. When the bill was first brought up the preamble seemed to imply that the object was to cooperate with the provinces, but now the wording of section 3 "the minister may undertake projects to provide vocational training" seems to me to cover a larger territory. Has the minister explained what he proposes to do with regard to undertakings which are not of provincial origin and which the dominion government will institute?

Mr. MITCHELL: We would do that only for war purposes. Section 3 deals specifically with dominion undertakings, while section 4 deals with undertakings which are to be carried on jointly by the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. STIRLING: I should like the minister to make some statement with regard to section 3. What sort of projects has the government in mind? Where will they be, and for what purpose will they be instituted? Of course I realize that the purpose is vocational training. Will these not necessitate the obtaining of land, premises, machinery, equipment and all sorts of things?

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will read Hansard he will see that I answered that question rather fully.

Mr. MARSHALL: Have arrangements been made with respect to the training of young men, particularly those who have taken about two years' university training for the medical profession? I have received a letter from a lady whose daughter wants to train as a nurse but is prevented from doing so by lack of finances. Is any provision being made for these two types of cases?

Mr. MITCHELL: Arrangements have been made already to assist students in medicine, dentistry, science and engineering.

Mr. MARSHALL: The young chap I have in mind has already taken two years' university medical training, but he is unable to take his third year until next spring. It seems unfortunate that this young man should be prevented from taking his third year. He is now working on the Alaska highway.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will let me have the name of that young man I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): These students must have their first or second year before they are taken on.

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. gentleman pointed out that this was a second year student.

Mr. DONNELLY: You must have two years pre-med and then your two years in medicine.

Mr. GREEN: In some centres there is a great shortage of nurses. Is the government taking any steps to train more young women in this profession? The problem is likely to become really serious in a short time, and it seems to me that this plan should be extended to provide for such training.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would imagine that that would come under selective service. If a girl is going to train as a nurse she should be trained in a hospital. I do not know whether there is any shortage of probationers in the hospitals, or whether the government could force girls to go into hospitals to train, perhaps against their will.

Mr. GREEN: I do not know that that will be necessary, but some assistance might be given such as is given to medical students.

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not think any girl who wants to be a nurse will have any difficulty in getting into almost any hospital. The hospital provides their board and room, and pays them a certain fee.

Mr. MARSHALL: May I ask the hon. member for Wood Mountain whether fees have not to be paid by the young nurses entering a hospital for training? If so, I would ask the minister if it would not be possible to have these fees waived, now that nurses are so badly needed.

Mr. DONNELLY: I do not think the nurse pays any fee at all. Most of the hospitals have a waiting list of girls who want to enter the hospital for training. The hospitals pay $10 or $15 and in some cases $5 a month to nurses while they are training, as well as providing board and room.

Mr. MARSHALL: I understand that young girls who have taken their twelfth grade in high school and wish to enter the nursing profession have to pay a fee to the hospital. I suggest that the fee might be waived in these times.

Mr. WRIGHT: I do not think the nurses have to pay any fees to the hospital, but they have to buy books and uniforms, which cost from $50 to $100. I believe that is the only expense to which they are put.

Mr. MITCHELL: I was a governor of a hospital in Hamilton for a good many years, and I know that we provided all the books and uniforms free. This is the first time I have heard that uniforms have to be provided by the nurses in training.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I think that is true. Most of the hospitals require the nurses to provide their own uniforms and textbooks. There are also certain small organization fees, which do not amount to much; but it does cost the girl from $100 to $150 a year to graduate as a nurse. I have a daughter who graduated this spring, and I know what it cost me.

Mr. McIVOR: That is not the worst part of it. When these girls go into training in the hospital they have to work twelve hours a day. That is something which the minister should look into.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not so in my city.

Mr. LOCKHART: This bill gives the minister very wide powers, and I think it is a very commendable piece of legislation. Hypothetical questions are being raised here this afternoon and much of the discussion is irrelevant. I cannot see any reason for bringing up all these trivial things. The minister will have ample power under the bill, as I think he will agree, to deal with any circumstances that develop.

Mr. GREEN: I raised the question of nurses, and it is not a trivial one. It will be a very serious matter for Canada if there is a shortage of nurses. Apparently the government has no plan for assisting in the training of nurses. All I ask is that the minister make an investigation and find out what the actual situation is, and if assistance is needed, let the government give that assistance.

Mr. MITCHELL: We have been asked for assistance by two provinces, and we are assisting them.

Mr. GILLIS: I agree that the minister has wide powers under this bill, but I do not think it is a waste of time if members of the house who have some knowledge of the problems of vocational training jog the minister with respect to specific things that have not been done and which might be done in the future.

Vocational training has been going on in the provinces for the past five years, practically on the basis proposed in this bill. I would mention one defect. There are many young men who are desirous of learning a trade but who have not the necessary grounding in mathematics to pass the first preliminary examination. The first thing required is that they go before a selection board, which checks on their aptitudes for certain trades and sets them an examination in mathematics. Many of these young men from seventeen to twenty-five years of age left school early, through no fault of their own, and have not been able to pass that examination in mathematics, and so have not been able to take the vocational training. I discussed this matter with the man in charge in Nova Scotia, and he admitted that there were numbers of very capable young men who would make good mechanics, welders, sheet metal workers, or other good tradesmen, who could not pass the preliminary test. He suggested that if the provincial government, in conjunction with the federal government, would authorize those in charge of vocational training to start a class in mathematics, they could short-circuit the school course by about 75 per cent, and thus in about three weeks or a month a good many of these boys would get the necessary grounding in mathematics, pass the test and be routed into some trade. This is an aspect of the matter which will have to be dealt with in the future.

This bill is going to take care of things after the war, when hundreds of boys—they will be young men then—will be coming out of the army who cannot qualify under the regulations to-day. Some provision will have to be made to meet that situation.

There is another matter on which I have recently corresponded with the department. The minister knows the mining situation in Nova Scotia. He knows that there are hundreds of unemployed men there whose services could profitably be used somewhere else. There are restrictions to-day on gold mining and on the base metal industries, and in consequence there has been an undoubted shrinkage in employment. Many of the men who were engaged in these base metal industries are now unemployed, and it would be well if they could take advantage of this vocational training. My correspondence with the department on July 7 was based upon inquiries I had received from many unemployed or partly unemployed miners in Nova Scotia who were desirous of going into some other industry. They can be paid from $8 to $13 a week subsistence while taking a course, which means going some three hundred miles from home and leaving their family behind. Thirteen dollars a week is not sufficient.

I suggested to the department at the time that they should be on the same basis as soldiers and be paid subsistence allowance during the time they were taking their training. Mr. Thompson, who I believe is the man now in front of the minister, wrote me a letter in reply to the effect that in Nova Scotia, at least, some arrangement unofficially was in effect with a new shipbuilding plant there, where men could be employed, if they had an aptitude for that class of work, receive wages, and at the same time take some training in the shipbuilding industry. "Unofficially" may be all right, but you are not going to get anybody to leave his home and his family at $13 a week, when he is dependent, for putting the thing through, on the good will of the employer. If this is a feasible arrangement some definite understanding should be had with industries that they will be prepared to accept men and step up their earnings while they are taking the necessary training.

These are two things which the minister, with the latitude he has under this bill, will have to take into consideration and try to have some understanding arrived at. The non-essential industries are shrinking. Many men will be unemployed who are not fitted to go into war industry because they have no training. Arrangements will have to be made to train them, and their families will have to be taken care of in the meantime. The matter must not be left to the good will of the employer. There must be some definite arrangement.

On section 4—Agreements with provinces.

Mr. WRIGHT: Will not the obligation on the provinces, under subsection 2 of this section, to supply 50 per cent of the money to carry on these agreements, militate against the successful operation of the act in certain provinces? Under the old vocational training scheme, instituted, I believe, in 1932, certain provinces were unable to take full advantage of it because of financial difficulties due to economic conditions over which they had no control. If this measure is to be successful, and it should be made successful, some provision will have to be made for certain provinces as regards the 50 per cent they are to contribute. Was that matter taken into consideration?

Mr. MITCHELL: For a good many years that was overcome successfully in provinces which were not able to raise the money. I cannot go any further than that. I suppose the hon. member is conversant with the method under which it was undertaken at that time.

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes, I am.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Chairman, I trust what I have to say will be in your opinion related to section 4, subsection (1) (e) and subsection 2. In subsection (1) (e) provision is made whereby the dominion government may assist after the war in "vocational training on a level equivalent to secondary school level", and subsection 2 provides for payment on a fifty-fifty basis as between the province and the dominion.

So far as those regulations go, they will be welcomed by educationists and all others interested in education, and, I think will meet a real need. Certainly it is my hope that the provinces will be sufficiently cooperative and the federal authorities will be sufficiently generous to provide under this bill vocational education for the boys and girls of rural Canada and the small towns of Canada.

I am fearful of the fifty-fifty basis because of what happened under the Technical Education Act of 1919. While that act was in force, only the larger cities of this country were able to take advantage of it, with the result that at present we have vocational education in most of our cities and practically no vocational education in any rural community or in many of the small towns across Canada. I think the time is coming when the federal parliament will have to face the proposition of providing federal support for education generally, not merely for vocational education, and on some basis of need instead of a fifty-fifty basis. Manitoba, for instance, has not yet been able to avail itself of all the money apportioned to that province under the 1919 Technical Education Act; other provinces required a renewal of the time limit under that act before they could take advantage of the money apportioned to them. So long as the small municipality has to pay the cost of education, or the major share of it, and the province only a small portion, the dominion also will be called upon to pay only a small portion on the fifty-fifty basis, and the burden of education costs will still be levied on the real estate owners within the municipality. There is no reason to-day why real estate in a municipality should be taxed for the education of children. Children are not educated for the benefit of that particular municipality; they are educated to be Canadian citizens, and as such their education should be provided by the provinces and by the federal parliament rather than by the local municipality.

I have before me a bill drafted to meet this situation in the United States. There the situation regarding education is practically the same as our own. The authority for education, the control of education lies within the power of the state; the federal authority has no more authority there than has the federal parliament of Canada. Yet here is a bill, read in the senate of the United States on February 11 for the second time, and then passed to a committee of the senate for further study. This bill provides for the annual payment by the federal government of the United States of $300,000,000 to assist in all branches of education down to the kindergarten, across that country, and that money is to be apportioned according to a formula stated in the bill, which will give on the basis of the state's need, so that the poorer states within the union will get the larger proportion of the grant. That, I submit, is the only common sense way to deal with this question of educational opportunity and educational equality.

As a result of our system of leaving education to the small municipalities, we have in Canada to-day 30,000 rural school-teachers, practically all of whom are receiving less than $1,000 a year; 19,000 of them are receiving less than $625, and 13,000 of them are receiving less than $520. That, Mr. Chairman, is the lowest salary paid rural teachers anywhere outside Canada in the British empire.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

The minimum salary paid to inexperienced women teachers in any other part of the British empire than Canada ranges from $700 to $800 per annum. As a direct result of this, we will have in September from 1,200 to 1,500 of our schools placed in charge of unqualified teachers who have had no professional education. It is simply impossible to-day, at the salaries paid, to get professionally qualified people to go out into the rural communities to teach boys and girls. I consider that a national calamity. Where is the point in fighting for democracy if we are to raise, during the years to come, a generation of children who will come under the tutorship of hundreds of teachers who have no special qualifications for their jobs? There is not another part of the British empire where educational finance is left in any respect to be a burden on the small municipality. In England, Scotland and Ireland from 50 per cent to 80 per cent of the total cost of education is borne by the national budget; in Australia 100 per cent of the cost is borne by the national or dominion budget; in south Africa 100 per cent is borne by the provincial and dominion governments. We are the only part of the empire where we still leave education to be paid for by the local municipality, with the result that we get only the type of education that the small municipality can afford. It is my hope that under this bill our rural communities and small towns and suburbs—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I did not wish to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he is clearly outside the scope of the bill.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I think my remarks come within the scope of section 4, subsection 1, paragraph (d).

The CHAIRMAN: No. In the first place, may I suggest that the hon. gentleman should resume his seat while I am giving a ruling. Second, I called his attention last night to the fact that the general scheme of education in Canada as compared with the general scheme elsewhere was not within the scope of the bill. Furthermore, the question as to how school teachers are paid here, there and everywhere is not within the jurisdiction of the federal parliament and is outside the scope of the legislation which the committee has before it.

Mr. SHAW: Are there regular periods within which payments of these grants are made to the provinces, or is it at the end of March each year, let us say?

Mr. MITCHELL: As the accounts are submitted and certified. In some instances we give an advance. The provincial governments sometimes run short of funds.

Mr. SHAW: I understand that payments have not been made to the provinces since March.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is correct. Certain payments cannot be made until this bill becomes law, although certain provinces have been given tentative grants.

Mr. MacINNIS: Possibly this question has been asked before; if so, I will look it up in Hansard. Does this bill apply to technical schools or to education carried on in technical schools in the various provinces, or will these grants be available for that purpose?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—council.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): As regards the advisory council, what assurance have the people of Canada that it will not be a political set-up?

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think that is a fair question. What is usually done under these circumstances will be done. I may say that as regards appointments that have been made to such boards, politics have played no part in them. On the national war labour board I do not know the politics of any member. What I assume we shall do is this. When the council is set up, the national organizations will be consulted as to the membership of the advisory committee.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The question I should have asked perhaps is this: They will be picked on merit?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Chairman and members.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subsection 3 provides that there shall be equal numbers of members on the council representative of employers and employees, and the remainder of the members may be representative of such groups of persons or interests as the governor in council may determine. That would mean that if there were five employers there would be five employees. That is quite in order, and that would leave four others of any other groups. Has the minister arrived at a decision as to the number of employers and employees who will be on the council?

Mr. MITCHELL: We were thinking of three of each.

Mr. MacNICOL: That would be six altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, three of each. The employers' side would be represented by the national organization of employers. I am thinking at the moment of the construction industry, the chamber of commerce and the manufacturers' association, and on the employees' side there would be the three national organizations of employees.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would the representatives of the employers be nominated by the Canadian Manufacturers' association?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: And the three representing labour would be nominated by the Canadian federation of labour or the American federation?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not a question of nominations; it is consultations. In the very nature of things the official decision has to be made by the government itself. These organizations will be consulted in the setting up of the committee.

Mr. MARSHALL: Will the provinces have representation?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. McIVOR: Will any salaries be paid these persons?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

On section 13—Repeal.

Mr. MacINNIS: I understood that under the Vocational Education Act of 1931 certain grants were paid for technical education in the provinces. As this has now been repealed, I thought this bill would apply in the same way.

Mr. MITCHELL: There has never been any money spent under the act of 1931; it has merely lain dormant.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Did I understand the minister correctly to say in answer to a question that vocational or technical education as carried on to-day in the schools would get no benefits from this bill?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, that is right.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Is not the purpose of paragraph (e) of subsection 1 of section 4 to enable the dominion government to enter into agreements with provincial governments for the carrying on of vocational education?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, that is true.

Mr. MULOCK: I move that the title of Bill No. 64 be changed to read: "An act respecting the carrying on and coordination of vocational training."

Mr. NEILL: I may be out of order, but there is one trivial point I should like to know about. This seems an excellent bill in every regard, but no provision is made for providing money—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, under section 12.

Bill reported.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF INDIVIDUALS WHO ENLIST FOR SERVICE IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES

The house resumed from Monday, March 9, consideration in committee of Bill No. 5, to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in His Majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment—Mr. Mitchell —Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister give an outline of what he proposes to do to carry out the purposes of this bill?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The bill is more or less self-explanatory. It applies to the reinstatement, upon the conclusion of the war, of men—and of course that includes women as well—who have seen service in the armed forces, the merchant service, and also of the firefighters who volunteered to go to Great Britain and assist there. The bill is along similar lines to acts now in operation in the United States, Great Britain, Australia and New Zealand. The bill itself is a result of a promise made, I think, by the former minister of labour to the leader of the opposition that the original order in council embodying most of the provisions contained in the bill should be enacted as an act of this parliament.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

The bill has been approved by the major labour organizations of this country, the employers' organizations and the Canadian legion. It has been before the canteen committee and has been amended in minor points to make its intended meaning more clear. As we come to the various sections of the bill, I shall be glad to make any explanations hon. members may desire.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is right in saying that this bill as originally drafted was brought down in compliance with a promise made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health. When the bill was before the house on a former occasion it was debated at great length. I have not followed its career in the committee to which it was referred, but I would assume that substantial changes have been made in the bill, judging by the reprint which I hold in my hand. It went to the special committee on canteen funds, and the definitions and interpretation clauses have been practically rewritten. I confess I have not before me the changes made, and they are not apparent from the reprint. I am pleased to see that in section 3 provision has been made for one right that I suggested, namely, the retention of pension or other benefits. I am glad that it has been decided that "service in His Majesty's forces shall be deemed to have been service with the employer", for pension rights.

Perhaps some member of the committee or the minister could enlighten me as to whether section 4 has been strengthened, that is, the defences available to employers. I do not want to go into a discussion of any particular section, but I did look upon that as rather a weak provision in the bill as originally drafted.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is paragraph (c)?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, all the paragraphs of that section deal with the question of defences available to employers, any one of the paragraphs could be urged. Is the minister of opinion that the weakness of the former bill has been removed? I think we should have some statement on that. For instance, the preamble is gone.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the suggestions made in the committee have nearly all been adopted. I agree that the bill has been strengthened by the suggestions made during the discussion in the house. Section 4 has been strengthened to provide more protection for the returned man who has found it necessary to have medical treatment. Section 4 (c) was the contentious section in the committee, but it was found that this language best suited the purpose of the bill. The language is identical with that used in the British act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the minister is saying in that regard is that the committee was unable to find any language better suited to the occasion. Section 4 (c) reads:

. . . that, by reason of a change of circumstances, other than the engagement of some person to replace him, it was not reasonably practicable to reinstate him or that his reinstatement in an occupation and under conditions not less favourable to him than those which would have been applicable to him had he not been accepted for service with the armed forces was impracticable, and that the employer has offered to reinstate him in the most favourable occupation and under the most favourable conditions reasonably practicable—

I have no concrete suggestion to offer, because I dismissed this bill from my mind as soon as it was sent to the committee, and I really have not thought about it since. I do suggest, however, that this is a wide open clause. We can understand this part of it—

—by reason of a change of circumstances, other than the engagement of some other person to replace him—

But when you come to—

—that the employer has offered to reinstate him in the most favourable occupation and under the most favourable conditions reasonably practicable—

That leaves it in the judgment of the employer.

Mr. MITCHELL: If my hon. friend will read section 10 he will see that we have provided that an officer of the department may take proceedings, if necessary, where an employer does not comply with the intent of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: Since we are dealing with the bill more or less at random I should like to ask a question with regard to the section referred to a moment ago by the leader of the opposition; that is, section 4 (c). Let me put a concrete case. Suppose a man was working as a mechanic before enlistment. When he comes back from the war the position of mechanic is no longer open. Can he say to his former employer, "Well, you cannot give me a job as a mechanic, I admit, but I could also be a clerk. I want you to fire this man," who may have been employed there for thirty years, "and give me his job". Does this provision extend to any position? Must the man get some job, or is it confined to a position of the kind which he left? If he was a mechanic, and should there be no mechanics employed in that plant when he returned, could he demand that a position be created for him, or could he demand some other position at the expense of a man who had been perhaps twenty years in the service of that employer?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would say common sense would have to be the rule. To deal with the hypothetical case cited by the hon. member, let us go back to the railway organizations, where they have seniority in the different branches of the service. A railroad engineer or fireman could not come back and put out a station agent, a telegrapher or a clerk. In the main I think common sense will have to rule in that regard.

Mr. NEILL: But the man might be a good enough clerk. Could he compel his employer to fire a man who has been in his employ for many years, in order to give him a job?

Mr. HAZEN: Has the minister had any opinion from the Department of Justice as to whether this bill is within the jurisdiction of this parliament?

Mr. MITCHELL: That is not being questioned. The law officers of the crown drafted the bill.

Mr. HAZEN: That may be so, but that was not the question. I asked if the minister had obtained any opinion from the Department of Justice as to whether this bill was intra vires of the dominion.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think we shall jump that hurdle when we come to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The point is a very important one, and I think it was raised once before. I believe the minister failed to get the point of the question of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Perhaps if the hon. member would restate his position the minister might deal with it; for I think the hon. member has a point.

Mr. NEILL: I did not catch the gist of the minister's reply. The position I have in mind is this. A man has been a mechanic, we will say, or anything else you like. He goes to the war, and comes back. He is entitled to be reinstated as a mechanic, but suppose there is no such job open to him, perhaps by reason of the position having been abolished or by reason of the company having abandoned that class of work which required the services of a mechanic. Is he then in a position to say to his employer, "I admit that you cannot give me a job as a mechanic, but I can do clerical work; I have the education for that." Is the employer then compelled to employ that man and perhaps have to let go a man who may have been his confidential clerk for twenty years? Or does this refer only to a job of the kind a man had before he enlisted?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am frank to admit that this is a difficult question to answer, but I still come back to the suggestion that common sense will have to rule. I do not think a man could do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The bill does not provide for it, I will say.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I hesitate to help the minister with his bill, but the fact is that it was considered very carefully by the special committee, and I think we were all of the opinion that it is in the best form that could be devised. The Canadian Legion submitted a brief to the committee, and in one of the paragraphs of that brief we have a good summary of the purpose of this bill. That paragraph reads:

> Many objections can be raised to legislation of this kind, but the Legion believes that a statute will provide the most effective means of tying employers generally into the rehabilitation plans of the government, and placing a share of the responsibility of solving the problems of individual rehabilitation squarely before them now so that it shall remain a factor which cannot be ignored in determining their policies affecting personnel.

I think the bill is very sound; it is simply putting the present order in council into the form of a statute.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And improving it.

Mr. GREEN: Yes, making it a measure that should be of the greatest help to the men coming back from the present war. Members of the committee realized that there were points which perhaps were not fully covered by the terms of the bill, but they found it practically impossible to strengthen the bill any more than has been done. They did recommend that the government should undertake the prosecution of any employer who did not carry out the intent of this legislation, and hon. members will find that provision in section 10 of the bill.

Mr. NEILL: But, Mr. Chairman, there are poor prospects for the carrying out of the purposes of this bill if the minister in charge of it and the members of the committee who discussed it cannot agree even now as to what it means. I only want to know what we are doing. I am not trying to deprive any worker or soldier of his rights; far from it. But let us know where we are; for apparently we do not know. Years from now it will not be possible, if a case should come up in court, for a man to say, "Well, the members of the house said so and so", because that is not law. It is what is in the act that counts.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does not section 4 (c) cover that?

Mr. NEILL: No, it does not.

Mr. MITCHELL: It gives discretion if the matter should go before a magistrate, where it would go. It says:

> —by reason of a change of circumstances, other than the engagement of some other person to replace him, it was not reasonably practicable to reinstate him—

I think that gives discretion to the magistrate; and if the matter should go before the courts that would place out of bounds the suggestion advanced by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in connection with a machinist who might come back from the war and then attempt to bump—to use the language of the running trades—a clerk or a confidential secretary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister is quite wrong when he says that paragraph (c) gives the magistrate discretion. What paragraph (c) does is to give the employer a way out within certain limitations. This is one of the defence clauses available to the employer. With regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) I would say that this statute would not give the right to a man to come back and bump somebody, to use the term employed by the minister, out of a job of another category. I do not think it was ever contemplated that that should be done.

There is another point that should be dealt with. I do not know whether this has been touched upon in the earlier stages. The crown is the largest employer of labour in this country, yet this bill does not apply to the crown. What is the position of the crown qua employer with respect to the reemployment of returned soldiers? I do not think we could legislate with respect to the crown in the right of the province. Of course the Civil Service Act contains certain provisions with respect to preference for returned soldiers, but we have omitted from this bill a most vital factor. I wonder if that came before the committee.

Mr. GREEN: Preference is given in the civil service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But not by this bill. If that is so, then the committee has failed to perform a most vital function. Why should not this apply to the government of Canada? I have not been able to give a careful reading to the redraft, but I have not seen in the bill a single line which would compel the government of Canada to do what this parliament is compelling private employers to do.

Mr. GILLIS: Why not?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The interpretation of employer reads:

"Employer" in relation to any person accepted for service in His Majesty's forces, means a person carrying on any undertaking or service in which the person accepted for service had been employed for at least three months immediately prior to the date on which he was accepted for service.

And so on. But it does not include the crown in the right of the dominion. The minister should withdraw the bill and make it binding on the crown. I commend that to the committee. I should like to get some support for this position. This is a proper bill in the interests of the returned men. Many of these men may not be able to take a more onerous occupation because of physical unfitness. Why should we be legislating to compel the subject to perform a certain function and leave the government entirely free to do the reverse?

What is the situation with respect to men who have returned from this war? How many returned men from this war have been taken into the government service? I assume that the Civil Service Act still obtains with respect to competition, but there are many temporary positions; how many are filled by men who have been discharged from the forces because of physical unfitness? This situation ought to be dealt with in the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: A civil servant is granted leave, and I suppose he would not lose his seniority rights. I cannot imagine the crown being less generous than a private employer. I should not think it necessary to have such a provision in the bill.

Mr. MARSHALL: I feel that as a member of the special committee I should say something with respect to this bill. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) was not altogether correct when he said that there was unanimity of opinion among the members of the committee with respect to this bill. Bill No. 5 is predicated upon order in council P.C. 4758, which was passed on June 27, 1940. This bill is the outcome of a request by the leader of the opposition that the regulations contained in that order in council should be embodied in a bill. This matter was discussed fully in the committee, and as far as I understand the feeling of the members of the committee they were divided on the question whether this bill should be turned down and the order in council allowed to function for some further period of time. I jotted down some of the criticisms of the bill which were made by members of the committee. They are as follows:

Purpose for which act is framed is a worthy one but it is full of pitfalls.

If employers are worthy, and no one doubts their worthiness, there is no need for the bill.

The bill is not flexible enough.

It is overloaded with legal jargon.

Some sections could be worked only by bluff and not by prosecution.

Splendid opportunity to set up a bureaucracy of little value or importance.

This bill has been studied carefully, and I submit that it should not be allowed to pass but that the order in council should be administered for some time to come. We are told that it has been functioning well and that all complaints have been settled satisfactorily. The following recommendation was made by the special committee on pensions which sat the year previously:

It shall be the responsibility of the governor in council, in cooperation with industry and with all other classes of employment, to assume full responsibility for the reinstatement of all ex-service men in the posts from which they withdrew on enlistment, or in some other form of gainful occupation.

That provision should have been embodied in this bill. As the bill now stands, there is no provision for placing men in some other form of gainful occupation. For that reason I believe it would be better to allow the order in council to operate a little while longer until we gain more experience. We could then build a bill upon the experience we have gained.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am surprised that a member of the committee should get up after the final meeting of the committee and indicate the course which has been indicated here this afternoon. That is the easiest thing to do.

I do not think that we can do less than they have done in Australia, South Africa and Great Britain. I am glad to go to those men who have knowledge of and are interested in Canadian returned soldier affairs—the Canadian Legion, which speaks for a large body of soldiers in this country. The general principle of this bill has been approved by industry and labour and by a large body of public opinion. If I may say so, to the lawyers of the house, I cannot hope I shall ever live to see the day when a bill that is perfect will pass the house.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do you think that would put them out of business?

Mr. MITCHELL: It might. I think the suggestion that this bill will set up a bureaucracy is quite unwarranted and untrue. It will not be necessary to set up a bureaucracy to set this bill in motion. We must remember that the order in council will expire at the conclusion of the war, but if you have an act on the statute book it can always be amended. This bill, like the legislation of the other countries I have mentioned, is founded upon our experience of the last war and up to the present moment. It would be very fine, of course, to write a Christmas tree into this bill. My hon. friend suggests that the government should guarantee employment to everybody. That suggestion is in a class by itself and would need provisions of an entirely different character. The bill is simply to provide for the reinstatement of the soldiers who already had employment before going to the war. It embodies the policy of the government that employers shall take their men back to work. For 95 per cent of the employers of this country I believe it would not be necessary to have this legislation, because I believe the men will go back to their old jobs anyway if their jobs are there. This legislation is necessary because there may be some employers who will not do the right thing by the returned soldiers. It is a step in the right direction, and it can always be amended when amendments are deemed to be necessary in the practical working out of the act for the benefit of the men for whom it is designed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With what the minister has said I am largely in agreement. I am just wondering if there is some reasoning which applies to an order in council falling by the wayside after the war which might not apply to the provisions of this statute, but I do not think we ought to refuse to pass the bill on that ground. I have a very strong opinion that this is an interference with property and civil rights which it would not be competent for parliament to pass other than in time of war. But that time has arrived and we have to meet the situation as best we can.

Returning to the question of the crown not being a party to it, I find that this question was raised in the debate on March 9, when the minister made somewhat the same reply as he did to-day. I think upon reflection that is incorrect in part, but only in part. Permanent civil servants who have enlisted have been given leave of absence, but, as the minister very well knows, there is a large class of government employees, known as temporaries, who are not technically permanent but who have been on the payroll for years and years. I have always wondered why, if they were necessary they were not blanketed in. I suppose there is a reason; that each administration does not desire to recognize that a job which was created for temporary purposes should by a lapse of time, and by that alone, become permanent, although it would look as though they were permanent when you reviewed individual cases. A man employed in a temporary capacity does not get leave of absence. He has no superannuation rights; he has nothing. Some arrangement ought to be made whereby these men would be protected. The bill does not do that. It has a limited application; so far as its limited application goes, it is a pretty good bill, and I am supporting it. I think the committee did a very good job, probably as good a job as they could. I would not expect that there would be unanimity in the committee.

The question raised by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Marshall) is a very much wider one than is attempted to be covered by this bill. The objective he has in mind is a most desirable one that everybody should be given a job; but we are not yet a socialist state. We may be rapidly coming to it. If we do come to it, and these gentlemen have the opportunity to put into practice what they preach, they will find some difficulties in the way which are almost insuperable. You just cannot do these things on the spur of the moment, by act of parliament or in any other way. There is only one way, one big way, to provide employment in this country, and that is by the encouragement of private enterprise. I hope the day will never come when private enterprise will be wiped out. It is the one big factor that provides employment, and instead of tearing it down we ought to try to build it up after the war so that it will function once more.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen over there applaud that sentiment. I have waited for some sign from that side that they support the principle I have tried to preach, however inadequately, over a period of months. Let us not destroy that which has been the backbone of this country and the basis of the prosperity of the most prosperous nation in the world, the United States—private initiative and private enterprise.

Mr. GILLIS: With millions unemployed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There were great numbers of unemployed in Germany, and now they are all employed—doing what? Destroying the world. That is the way they became employed, and under national socialism too. If we are to have government regimentation and state socialism in this country after the war, I am announcing now that I am against it. I may not be here to fight it, but I am against it.

Mr. McLEAN (Simcoe East): I will be here to look after it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he is here, I hope my hon. friend will fight it. Somebody has to fight this battle.

I do not wish to delay the passage of this bill. If this is the best we can get, let us take it, and not rely on the order in council.

I have just one query to make of the minister before we deal with the sections. The title is to be changed on the recommendation of the special committee. There was a preamble which set out the purposes of the bill, and that has been eliminated. The short title was—

The CHAIRMAN: The short title remains the same. It is the title of the bill that is changed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The act may be cited as the Reinstatement in Civil Employment Act, 1942, and I notice on this draft which the chair has kindly handed to me, "an act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of His Majesty's forces or other designated classes of persons." Just what are those other designated classes of persons?

Mr. MITCHELL: The merchant service seamen and the fire fighters.

Mr. MacNICOL: I have a very brief comment to make. I was pleased to hear what the minister said a few moments ago, that in his opinion by far the greater number of the employers—I believe he said 95 per cent—would not need to be regulated by the provisions of this bill. As long as I have known the minister in this house I have always found him to be a sane labour man. When he was here years ago, sitting further down the line, he spoke on labour matters as a man who was sane in his advocacy. I never knew him at any time unnecessarily to attack employers. In that connection I notice what the minister said—

Mr. GILLIS: That is why he is Minister of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think that is a fair thing to say, even if it is said by the hon. member under his breath.

Mr. GILLIS: I will say it out loud.

Mr. MacNICOL: I am not going to enter into an argument with my hon. friends to the left. They have a right to their opinions, as I have a right to mine. I have been a labouring man myself, coming up from the moulding shop through the machine shop and office.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will say to the hon. member for Cape Breton South that when it comes to a question of who has contributed more to the working classes—himself or myself—in a practical way, I believe my record will stand out as well as his.

Mr. MacNICOL: The Minister of Labour needs no defence from me. I have known him a long time, and I say again I have always found him to be a sane labour man. But what I rose to say was this. With regard to his reference to companies, my observation is that by far the majority of the heads of the firms of this country graduated, as I did, from down in the plant, to the top, and men who have done that certainly know how to handle labour. The man who in his time was the greatest employer of labour in the United States, the late Andrew Carnegie, rose from the lowest rung of the ladder. I do not like to hear attacks on employers; they should be encouraged instead of being attacked.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Adverting to the remark of the hon. member for Cape Breton South, I think the Minister of Labour misunderstood what he said, and I think he ought to explain his position.
