Mr. GILLIS: Perhaps the minister did misunderstand what I said "under my breath." The hon. member for Davenport was delivering quite a eulogy of the minister: he said he was always fair, sane and sensible and did not at any time attack the employers. I think the minister is very touchy on that point, without any reason. I made the observation, "That is why he is Minister of Labour." I cannot see that there is anything wrong with the remark.

An hon. MEMBER: Get on with the bill.

Mr. GILLIS: When I am ready. I am in the hands of the Chair.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Don't look at me: I didn't say a word.

Mr. GILLIS: I was a member of the committee that considered this bill, and I agree to a large extent with the remarks of the hon. member for Camrose. When it came before the committee I regarded it as premature. Under an order in council the Department of Pensions and National Health had built up quite a service with respect to the rehabilitation of the men who are coming out of the army; and in view of the fact that two other committees are considering and going very broadly into the question of rehabilitation I thought it was too early to pass a statute at this time which definitely ties up this particular phase of rehabilitation with any particular ministry designated to take care of it. That was the bill in its original stage.

In addition to that, the original bill placed upon men returning from overseas the onus of coming back to Canada and proving their entitlement to a job. That has been corrected in this bill. But my fear about the bill is that it may interfere with arrangements which are working fairly satisfactorily. That fear may be groundless, nevertheless the risk is there. Many of the shortcomings of the blil as it went into committee have been corrected. I think the major disability was that the onus of proof rested on the man. An additional clause is provided which places the enforcement of the measure in the hands of the government. The minister who will be charged with the responsibility of administering this measure will have to lay charges against the employer who violates any particular section. I still regard this as premature. However, as a member of the committee, and one who was in a minority position, I accepted the majority opinion. In the light of present circumstances the bill, in my opinion, is as good as it can be. But we know very little about rehabilitation, or what developments will occur a year or two years from now.

As to the point raised by the leader of the opposition with respect to protection for employees of the government, I see under this bill the government in the position of employer. It is a matter of defining "employer". The situation is not confined to civil servants. You have to-day in this country many government-owned plants—one, which we had the privilege of going through a short time ago, having 16,000 employees. Many of these people will enlist or be called up. When they enter the services the government is their employer. When they come back from the war the jobs they vacated may not be there. Under this bill, as I see it, the government is morally responsible to find employment for them. That is another reason why I regard the bill as premature. The order in council is taking care of the situation as it exists at present. This bill does not go specifically, anyway, into that phase of the situation, and we may be in a better position a year from now to judge and legislate on it. However, the government still have the power to make regulations by order in council; they make them whether they have it or not.

[Mr. Gillis.]

As a member of the committee I am perfectly satisfied with the bill in the light of our present circumstances, in view of the fact that the majority of the committee saw fit to recommend its passage at this time.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want to make sure what I am voting on. If I remember, in the committee the title—I don't know which to call it, the big title or the little title—

The CHAIRMAN: We are on clause 1, the short title.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to know just what we are discussing. My recollection is, and I think the records will show, that in the title we originally struck out the words "or who perform essential war employment". In the new copy which has been given to me those words appear.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is out.

The CHAIRMAN: We are now on the short title. The short title remains as it is, but the title of the bill will be amended in due course when we come to it. Under the rules the title is taken up after the sections of the bill have been discussed.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then I take it that the employer will not be expected to reinstate a man who is working, for instance, in an essential garbage plant, since what we are trying to do is to look after the men and women who are serving overseas.

Mr. MITCHELL: A man working in an essential garbage plant will not come within the terms of the bill.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: When the bill first came down I opposed it because I did not think it effectively implemented what the preamble purported. I hope that when the amendments are brought in, some change will be made so that the bill will not be misleading. The bill does not provide for reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service, because it is impracticable to do so. I do not think it is right to pass bills under names that purport to do something which is not done. That is why I referred to the bill in its original form as "tripe". However, the committee has done what it can under the circumstances. I think it was admitted by the members of the committee that it was impracticable. You cannot compel private industry to take a man back if it does not wish to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL: This bill does that very thing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Only under certain conditions. I do not think the minister will maintain that when he looks at the loopholes in section 4 (c).

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not like it to go out to the country that this House of Commons is not doing the very best it can in the light of all the knowledge and circumstances that exist at the moment. It is statements of that kind that breed revolutions and moral decay. It is a reflection on the members of the committee and on the House of Commons.

Mr. GREEN: And undermines the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is not a fair thing to say.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But the implication is there. In this case all an employer has to do is to state that it is not reasonably practicable to reinstate the man.

The CHAIRMAN: I suggest that we should pass sections 1 and 2 and then take sections 3 and 4 together so that the matter will be dealt with properly. We are now discussing the substance of section 4 and we are on the short title. If we passed 1 and 2 and then took 3 and 4 together, hon. members would be within the rules in discussing the subject as the hon. gentleman is now doing.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think that in the light of the minister's statement I should have the right to reply to what he has said.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Section 5 states that where an employer has reinstated a former employee in accordance with section 3 he shall not, without reasonable cause, terminate the employment of that employee, and in any proceedings for violation of this section in any case where the employment was terminated within six months of the reinstatement the onus shall be on the employer to prove that he had reasonable cause to terminate the employment. That is the basis of my objection to the bill. In committee we divided almost fifty-fifty on the elimination of these loopholes because we wanted to make the bill more airtight. We agreed that the whole bill was a gesture and a worthy one. I do not want to create the impression that the committee did not do the best it could under the circumstances, but we recognize that the measure is very limited in its application. There is this improvement in the bill, that it will not be necessary for the former employee to engage counsel under the new section. It is now possible for the employee to obtain counsel through the government without cost.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wish to make this one observation arising out of the statement of the leader of the opposition that the only way to put men back to work is by encouraging private enterprise. I agree with him. I trust that he will give the matter a good deal of earnest thought and some time before the session closes tell us what his device is for encouraging private industry.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Defences available to employers.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the bill was under discussion I referred to the limitation of three months or four months in section 4. Section 4 reads:

> In any proceedings for the violation of section 3 of this act, it shall be a defence for the employer to prove,—
> (a) that the person formerly employed by him did not within three months after discharge in Canada from the service or from hospital treatment following discharge in Canada, or within four months after discharge overseas or from hospital treatment following discharge overseas, apply to the employer for reinstatement.

I remember very well what took place after the last war. I was associated with a very large plant and, contrary to the opinions I have heard expressed, I found employers of that day very anxious to take back men who had worked with them before enlistment. I found that very general; certainly it was true of the plant with which I was associated. We took men back who were not able to accept employment within three or four months after discharge, and we took back many men after a period much longer than that. My knowledge of employers convinces me that the three or four months limitation will not prevent them from taking men back later than that. I remember one engineer who came back and who did not feel like starting at his old job after his return. He had been through many fights, had been blown up two or three times, had the experience of men who face fire and shell and bayonet charges and who suffer very seriously in consequence. It was nine months before he applied and he was taken on again. Even if he had not been fit after nine months he would have been taken on. I know of another man, a shipper, who did not return to work for over six months after his discharge. He was unable to do so.

With quite a number of machinists it was between five and ten months before their nerves permitted them to go on their old jobs. There was a chauffeur who did not go on for fourteen months. So I hope it will not be considered that with regard to employers—at least those I have been in contact with, who were mostly men who themselves graduated from the ranks of labour to the position of employers—the three or four months' limitation will prevent them from taking men back later than that, but I wonder whether there might be the odd one who would try to escape under that limitation. What does the minister think of that limitation?

Mr. MITCHELL: When the national labour supply council was in existence—that was the council of employers and employees—we discussed this matter from the angle my hon. friend mentions and came to the conclusion that three or four months was the most satisfactory approach to the problem.

Mr. MacNICOL: Were many of the members of the committee former employees themselves?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. We had the chief of personnel of the Canadian Pacific Railway and on the labour side the representatives of the dominant organizations. There was no disagreement.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think we had discussion in the committee on that very point. At one stage the limitation read "one month." Much has been said about the impracticability of this bill; we had to have something agreed on. After considerable discussion we arrived at this three or four months as a compromise to make it workable from the point of view of both employers and employees. It was a step in the right direction.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Prosecution on behalf of employee.

Mr. MacNICOL: I understood from one hon. member who was on the committee that if an employee found it necessary to obtain legal advice, that legal advice was to be supplied by the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, by the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But only when the minister thinks a prosecution is warranted, they undertake the prosecution; free legal advice is not provided.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is what I meant, if legal advice is necessary the government will supply the legal advice at no cost to the employee?

Mr. MITCHELL: At no cost to the returned soldier.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That section is not clear. According to my impression in the committee legal advice was not to be provided where the minister considered a prosecution necessary, but it would be where the employer would not listen to any other argument; if the employer would not recognize the claim made in due course and in conformity with the measure.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think there has to be some provision for nuisance cases, that the decision should rest with the minister, as with other prosecutions under the crown. What I think would happen would be that the welfare officer or those charged with the enforcement of this bill would go to the employer and the employer would see the penalities laid down. In my view the number of cases that would go to the courts would be very small and of a kind that would require getting the approval of the minister before a prosecution.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is all very well, and apparently compliments are in order. I agree that the minister is one of the most outstanding ministers of labour who have been in the house since I have been here. There have been only two. But when a man is away out in the wilderness somewhere and an employer would not reengage him, provided he conformed to the provisions of the bill, my impression was that the minister would automatically take action. It is all very well to say that these things cannot happen; judging by some of the hon. members I have seen who might possibly be in the government, anything could happen. A soldier should have this right, just as he has now a right of appeal in a pension case and is entitled to the services of the soldiers' advocate. That is his right by statute, and I think it should be my right if my employer refuses me my position, that I can demand a lawyer paid by the crown to prosecute my case.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That was rather my understanding in the committee. At one time the onus was on the employee. There was considerable discussion. The matter of the soldiers' advocate was discussed, as mentioned by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. Now that the matter has been turned around, with the onus on the employer, the onus is taken off the employee to institute action. There has to be some discretion in the department. We have to have faith in the department seeing that the employee receives justice.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I wish to support the contention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. Previously the employee had to go and get counsel. Now he will have to put his case before the minister. My experience in trying to get things through these various government departments is that there is interminable delay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He will go to the welfare officer in the community first, and that officer will take it up.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: But he takes it up with the minister, and the minister decides whether the case warrants action. It will then come back to the advocate, and perhaps proceedings will be instituted. But if the minister does not wish to institute proceedings, the man will be out entirely. It is entirely in the hands of the minister whether or not the man shall have his case taken on by the government or whether he will have to employ a lawyer himself. The greatest improvement made in the bill in my opinion was instituting this protection for the employee. It seems to me it would be much more in line with what the committee wanted if it were made possible for the employee to have at his disposal the services of someone in the same position as the soldiers' advocate in the matter of pensions. It seems to me this complicates the matter more than ever.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No. We spent three months on a bill that apparently is not to mean anything, the plebiscite bill. Surely we can take a little time on something that is going to help the returned soldier. I for one am not going to be rushed, if I stay here for three months more.

An hon. MEMBER: You will stay alone.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: All right. Probably I would accomplish more if I did. As I see it, there are too many loopholes. It could happen. I know it would not happen with any of the parties represented in this house at present; but do not make any mistake, such things have happened in Canada before. This government might not be in power; it might be any government. There might be a very particular friend of the administration; I could name them, both on behalf of the official opposition, possibly some of the government side and even some on the part of our friends down to the far left. I am very doubtful about any prosecuting that would be done in connection with any of these firms, to put a man back to work. We all know these things happen. I for one would not want to be 3,000 or 4,000 miles away pleading my case with the minister in charge at the time, asking that he prosecute a certain firm which refused to put me back at work. I think it should be mandatory, with all due deference to the minister. I am speaking as a returned soldier. I do not want to be accused, as the hon. member for Yorkton was accused, of saying anything that would deprecate what we are trying to do for the returned men in this connection, but why not be fair and honest about it? I am also a member of the Canadian Legion, a charter member, but unless you put some teeth into this bill I do not think it will amount to what it is intended to amount to.

Mr. GILLIS: I do not share the apprehensions of the hon. member for Fraser Valley. This clause as it stands automatically gives the soldier the right to counsel in the event that he has to prosecute an employer.

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. GILLIS: And I agree with the minister that there has to be a stop block somewhere. I cannot view this clause in exactly the way that it is viewed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. In the event of a dispute with an employer under this bill a man is automatically given the benefit of counsel.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only if the minister agrees.

Mr. GILLIS: I cannot see him not agreeing. After a case goes through the unemployment insurance and welfare offices and finally reaches the minister, I should think it would be very apparent that something is wrong.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: And the employee would be starving.

Mr. GILLIS: That is a bad angle to it. Unfortunately you fellows are still making these regulations, and we will have to go through these slow processes of law until somebody else makes them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They will be awfully slow, too.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

The CHAIRMAN: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

On the title.

The CHAIRMAN: An amendment has been moved, that the title be changed to read:

An act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of His Majesty's forces or other designated classes of persons.

Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No, Mr. Chairman. That is not to be the title, as I understood it. It is six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MITCHELL: I suggest that we carry on until we finish. The house is under tremendous pressure, and so are the ministers. I think we should go on.

Mr. CRERAR: I would appeal to the hon. member. We are on the last section of the bill; let us try to finish it to-night and not call it six o'clock. We might carry on for a few minutes.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Very well; I withdraw my suggestion. But this is a most important bill, and I do not think it should be rushed. Not two members in this chamber can remember the title as it was read. Let us know what we are doing.

The CHAIRMAN: The amended title reads:

An act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of discharged members of His Majesty's forces or other designated classes of persons.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What is the meaning of "other designated classes of persons"?

Mr. MITCHELL: At the moment it means merchant seamen and civilian fire fighters who have been called up. I know what is bothering my hon. friend. He thinks it refers to industry, but he can take it from me that it has no connection whatever with industry.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: As I understand it, this bill has reference only to persons who were previously employed.

Mr. MITCHELL: Absolutely.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do you not think it would be well to include somewhere in the title words to this effect, "to reinstate individuals who were previously employed, and who enlisted for service"?

Mr. MITCHELL: The word "reinstatement" connotes previous employment.

Mr. GILLIS: Would these "other designated persons" include men who enlisted but who were taken from the army and placed in other employment, by virtue of their technical training? Under the bill as it now stands I do not think they have any protection.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. MITCHELL: If they are taken from the army they are given leave of absence, and are still technically in the army.

Mr. GILLIS: No, they have been discharged.

Mr. MITCHELL: I know of no such cases.

Mr. GILLIS: I have had two people write me who have been discharged from the army and employed in industry, but there is no protection for them.

SHIPPING LOSSES

PRIVILEGE, MR. ROY—SINKING OF SHIPS AS A RESULT OF ENEMY ACTION—REQUEST FOR SECRET SESSION

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Following the announcement I made to the house last Friday that three ships had been sunk the Sunday before in the St. Lawrence by enemy submarines, certain newspapers intimated that I should be censured.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member cannot refer to press reports commenting on proceedings in this house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Let him make his statement.

Mr. ROY: As I do not want the impression to go abroad that I may be one who disregards our interests in connection with the war, I should like to make a statement on the circumstances surrounding my announcement. I could have made this announcement at three o'clock the day before, but as I feared that the convoy might not have reached its destination at that time, as a convoy travels slowly, I waited until the next day. At that time I was sure it would be of no use to the enemy, who in all cases knows more than we do. In an editorial to-day the Montreal Gazette writes this:

Any effort to withhold information from the enemy when it is in the possession of a whole countryside, and beyond, looks more like a thin hope than a genuine possibility.

L'Action Catholique of Quebec also declared in its Saturday edition that half of the people of Quebec city knew all about it before my announcement. A reporter from La Presse of Montreal told me the same. My reason for making that announcement was to urge again that the government should—

Mr. SPEAKER: In rising to speak to a question of privilege the hon. member should deal merely with the matter about which he complains. He should not enter into an argument or enlarge upon a statement that has been made already; he should simply make his position clear as to what he intended when he made his statement in the house. I think the hon. member has now made it clear what his intentions were. He has told of the date when he received notice of these sinkings, and how he delayed in giving that information on the floor of the house. I think the hon. member has now gone as far as he should on a question of privilege.

Mr. ROY: I was just about to give the real reason why I made the announcement. It will take only a moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood from the hon. member that he was complaining about editorials in certain newspapers which referred to the statement he made on Friday last. He is entitled to state the meaning and intent of that statement, and I think he has done so.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): My colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) is not in the house at the moment, but perhaps I should not let this opportunity pass without pointing out to the hon. member who has just sat down what has been intimated to him already by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), namely, the great gravity of his or any one else communicating information of this kind prior to the time that the censors or the department or the intelligence branch of the department consider it advisable to do so. I am only pointing out to him that what he does in that respect is to oblige the submarine commander by reporting for that commander to his base that successful action has been taken. A submarine commander might not be in position to do that himself without being detected. My hon. friend, or anyone else who publishes a statement of this kind, does it—unwittingly of course—for the submarine commander. In that respect I submit he is doing something which is bound to assist the enemy, something which cannot be in the public interest. I do suggest that the course which was suggested to him on Friday, namely, that he communicate with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services and ascertain from him whether it was thought to be in the public interest to refer publicly to this matter, would have been a much wiser course.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with much of what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has said, I am in thorough agreement, but I think it would have been better if it had been stated a long time ago, after the first incident, just what was the proper course to pursue. That was not done. I may say to the minister that I heard of this incident myself on Tuesday. Reports were widespread in the province of Quebec, and I have had many letters about it. I communicated with the minister on my arrival from Fredericton at noon on Tuesday; he told me what the position was as they understood it and indicated just the reason the minister has now given—that a substantial time should elapse before the incident should be made public. I am in thorough agreement with that. If that course had been proposed to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) I have no doubt that as a good citizen he would have been guided by it. At Matane and Cap Chat the situation was such that everybody knew it. From a letter I received only this morning I could tell the minister just how widespread was the information about this incident. You cannot keep these things quiet. However, an announcement in the House of Commons is another matter.

There is one thing I should like the minister to bring to the attention of his colleague. What is the position with respect to convoys in the St. Lawrence? Are there any? Should we not know the position, at least in a general way? The minister shakes his head. Perhaps he is right; I am not going to judge. But so far we do not know just what is the position with respect to protection. I think it would have a reassuring effect if something were said on that point.

Mr. RALSTON: If Mr. Speaker will permit me, may I say with regard to the reasons for not disclosing matters of this kind except after a lapse of time, I do think the hon. leader of the opposition has forgotten that my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) made a very complete statement some time ago on that very matter, and gave the reasons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And I did not think they were good enough.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry, but I remember it myself, and the minister went to some pains to give reasons. It was in connection with a sinking which had taken place farther around in the gulf, and at that time he indicated that a reasonable time should elapse before an announcement was made. We must not, I submit, mix up the idea of people in the locality having knowledge of such an incident and the placing of it on record in Hansard or publishing it in a newspaper, whence it is immediately transmitted by friends of the German government to Germany and is announced over the German radio. No one suggests that you could possibly keep these matters secret from those in the locality, but it is a different matter to make them public so that they can be transmitted to Germany.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Might I suggest to the government that before this house adjourns there should be a secret session of the house at which the matters we have just been discussing can be laid before the members, together with the situation regarding the war? Our sister dominions are kept fully informed in that way, and a secret session of the house at Westminster is being called in the near future to discuss shipping. In view of the war situation which faces us to-day I think this house should be much more fully informed regarding all phases of the war than we are at the present time, and I suggest that a secret session of the house be held before we adjourn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was the last one so successful?

[Later:]

CONSIDERATIONS AFFECTING ANNOUNCEMENTS AS TO SINKINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. ANGUS L. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence for Naval Services): I should like to make a statement with reference to certain remarks made in this house on Friday last by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). I might recall to the house that on May 12, I believe it was, I gave a statement to the press, and on the 13th I made a statement in this house, respecting sinkings on the eastern Canadian coast. In those statements I endeavoured to lay down certain rules which should guide in further pronouncements of this nature. Subsequently to those dates, the chief censor for Canada, Colonel Biggar, in cooperation with the officers of the naval services, issued a circular which was directed to the newspapers of the country setting forth in greater detail the considerations which should be kept in mind in making statements of this sort. I am very glad to say that the newspapers of this country have observed with the greatest care the suggestions made to them by Colonel Biggar.

I should like to point out that in Great Britain announcements of sinkings of merchant ships are not now made. For a time in the earlier days of the war it was the custom, in due course, to announce that certain vessels had been sunk and that the next of kin of the casualties, if there were any, had been notified. But in more recent months you will not find any such reports of sinkings in the British press. There are excellent reasons for that. In the first place any immediate announcement of sinkings will prevent the next of kin of casualties from being informed before the announcement is made. The result is that every person who has a friend or relative on these ships sailing the seas is in anxiety until he gets a letter from that friend. Consequently it is only proper, in common decency and Christianity, to wait for some time, and to inform the next of kin of casualties, and when the announcement of the sinking is made, to say that that has been done. Then everyone who has not been notified knows that his relative or friend is not involved in the sinking.

There is another reason, the main reason of course, which is that announcements of this sort are likely to give useful information to the enemy. That is the chief reason why some secrecy has to be maintained. The ways in which announcements of this sort may be of use to the enemy are many and varied. If he does not get the information from us, he has to work it out for himself. He has to separate rumour from fact; he has to judge of the reliability of his information, and in a hundred ways he may remain uncertain. But when we in this country, and particularly in this house, give him the information on a platter, then the thing is settled and he does not need to inquire any further as to the accuracy of the information.

As I say, the hon. member for Gaspé last Friday did not ask a question but made a statement. He said that three ships out of a convoy of fourteen had been sunk. The hon. member having made that statement, and having made it, I must assume, with every sense of his responsibility as a member of this house, and the matter having therefore become public and having been announced in the press of the country and on the radio of the country, I may now state, I think I am almost required to state to the house, that three ships belonging to the united nations were torpedoed and sunk in the gulf of St. Lawrence about a week ago. I must add with regret that four members of the crews of those ships are known to have been killed, four are reported missing, and ninety-nine have been safely landed. I am glad to say one pleasant thing in what must be an unpleasant duty, and that is that the citizens of that region, the constituents of my hon. friend, and of other hon. members of this house too perhaps, have shown in this and in the other instance which occurred two months ago, the highest measure of charity and kindliness. They are not, I understand, wealthy people, they have little to give, but what they had to give they gave with a cheerful heart to those men who were perhaps worse off than themselves.

Information as to the sinking of these ships was in the possession of many people early last week. There is no doubt about that. Many people knew of it; it was known along the waterfronts of the country, it was known to the press by Monday or Tuesday of last week. The press refused to publish it; not one newspaper, so far as I know, endeavoured to make any use of this information until an official statement was made. It was in the possession of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, because he had heard the story on the train and spoke to me about it. I felt it quite proper to inform my hon. friend as to the facts, asking him—what perhaps I did not have to ask him, because I knew I could rely on his good sense in the matter—to say nothing about it, and of course my hon. friend said nothing about it. So the information was widely known to people in this country. But I point out now—and it is a mistake that is commonly made—that people say to me, "Well, the public know about this anyway; why don't you make an announcement about it?" But there is a tremendous difference between Canadians knowing about something and Germans knowing about it. The entire people of this country might know of a sinking or some other event of that kind, but so long as that information did not get to Germany, so long as it was not made public in our papers or broadcast over our radio, the chances of its getting to Germany would be small. Of course once it is broadcast it becomes the property of the world. It is known in the United States, it becomes known in neutral countries; speedily it finds its way to Germany and is used there for propaganda purposes.

These rules laid down two months ago and repeated by the chief censor are not made for the purpose of keeping information from the people of Canada—not at all. They are made for the sole purpose of keeping from the enemy information which may be of great value to him in directing the movement of his ships.

This brings up a much more serious question, one which concerns the rights and privileges of this house. There is very little use, there is very little purpose, in censoring the press and radio of the country if any hon. member of this house can stand in his place and, by asking a question, or by making a direct statement, as the hon. member for Gaspé did, undo the whole work of the censorship authorities and all the efforts of those who are endeavouring to ensure the safety of allied ships and allied seamen. We are constantly urging the average citizen to guard his tongue. You see notices in almost every elevator, in public buildings, in government buildings, urging people not to talk about the movements of ships or troops or the manufacture of munitions. "Guard your tongues", we are telling the people in French and English all the time. But how can we expect the average citizen of this country to guard his tongue if hon. members of this house do not guard theirs? I will say this to the hon. member for Gaspé; had I been in the house on Friday I think I should have felt constrained to rise and ask this house to expunge from the record the statement which he made. Thereby it would not have become a public statement. But he having made it, and it having been allowed to stand on Hansard, it of course became public; and the members of the press gallery had a right to use it. But if this sort of thing is to go on; if any hon. member can stand up and, by innuendo, by question, by statement, jeopardize the whole security system of this country, then I am afraid it will be necessary for someone to say that statements of that kind will either not be allowed to be made or, if made, will not become part of the record of this house.

My hon. friend talks of the protection of his constituents. I would say to my hon. friend that statements such as he made are not adding a single jot or tittle to the safety of his constituents; on the contrary they endanger the lives of his constituents. I would say further that there are other people in this country, other citizens of Canada, who are in greater danger, or are much nearer the battle line, much nearer the danger zone, than his constituents; and not once have I heard from that easternmost part of Canada any break of this kind. Not once have I heard an hon. member from the easternmost provinces of Canada rise in his place and ask questions of this kind. Not once in the newspapers of that part of the country, where information as to the movements of ships is fuller and more complete than anywhere else, have I heard of anyone endeavouring to say anything or to do anything which might endanger the life of a single seaman or the safety of a single ship. When my hon. friend talks about protecting his constituents, I should like to know what he has ever done to ensure the greater protection of this country, or to add in any way to its defences.

Mr. COLDWELL: If I may ask the minister a question, does he not think it would be perhaps wise to notify an hon. member of any untoward happening in his constituency, in order to prevent a recurrence of this sort of thing?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Placing the whole burden upon an hon. member of this house to ask about something that occurs in his constituency, and then castigating him, in my opinion is wrong. The minister must take some responsibility for this situation. As for the radio and the press, surely we have a voluntary censorship; and members of the house surely must ask questions somewhere about the welfare of their constituents or as to what happens in their constituencies.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): I realize that we should not get into a debate, Mr. Speaker, but my hon. friend could have asked his question privately if he had wished, as my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) did. Then he would have been given the information on his honour as a member of the house. But I do not understand how the asking of a question or the making of a statement in this house is going to add to the protection of my hon. friend's constituents. If he thinks for one moment that the whole Canadian navy is going to line up along his shores and defend those shores only, letting the convoy system we have and the protection we have for all the rest of Canada go to the dogs, he is making a tremendous mistake. I am not ready to change the disposition of one ship of the Canadian navy for him or all the questions he may ask from now until doomsday.

Mr. ROY: I have listened to the minister very carefully, and I am taking his remarks in the best spirit, because I know the motives which inspire him are of the best. He has asked me what I have ever done to protect my constituents and my constituency. I would recall that I have offered the government many suggestions which have been disregarded; and if they had listened to what I suggested, this last torpedoing might not have happened. I will not disclose anything now. My reason for making that announcement—which I will admit might not have been as good as I thought it was—was in support of my asking for a secret session for the benefit of the house. I have the strongest reasons for urging a secret session, in order to disclose to parliament matters I do not want to disclose publicly, because I am afraid they would help the enemy. That was the only reason for my announcement. If we are given a secret session to study these important matters I will prove to the house that I am just as good and loyal a Canadian, taking just as good care of my constituency and of the interests of the whole country, as anyone else.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): If I may add one word, if my hon. friend has in mind any means for adding to the protection of this country I should be very glad if he would come and tell me so. We do not need a secret session so far as naval defences are concerned. If the hon. member will come to me at any time with his suggestions I shall be glad to entertain them.

By entering into contract with the Anderson Organization, equipment and instructors were produced in a very short time.

4. Transport drivers are trained at some 30 advanced training centres throughout Canada.

5. Complete training for drivers is given at practically all advanced training centres throughout Canada. The specialized training given by the Mechanics Training Centre, London, is not duplicated elsewhere.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask my hon. friend to drop question No. 3, which reads "Which members have sons serving in the present war?" The departments have no record of that. My hon. friend might just as well ask which members have brothers or fathers serving in the present war.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to know that too.

Mr. RALSTON: It seems to me it is not relevant, and it is not a matter regarding which we should be asked to give information.

ACCIDENT TO ROYAL AIR FORCE FERRY COMMAND BOMBER NEAR MONTREAL

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What inquiry has been held into the deaths of Squadron Leader George Patterson Christie, D.F.C., and of Wing Commander Brian Carr-Harris, of Toronto, killed on July 5, in a crash of a Royal Air Force ferry command Hudson bomber, near suburban Pointe Claire, near Montreal?

2. Is any civilian inquest being held into the cause of this accident?

3. Has the government, and under what law, statute, usage or custom, cancelled the right of soldiers, who are also civilians, to a civilian inquest into such matters to show the cause of the accident, and whether due care was taken to safeguard life in military camps?

4. Has the government conferred with provincial attorneys general of the provinces on this subject of civilian inquests, and what was the reply in each case?

5. Have any civilian inquests been held into conditions in the various camps of His Majesty's forces in Canada, since the war started, or into housing or hospital conditions of those who died in the latter places?

Mr. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to make the same reply which I have already made to my hon. friend when he asked similar questions with respect to inquiries into the deaths of trainees in training. In this particular case I would say that the ferry command is under the Royal Air Force, and not under the Royal Canadian Air Force, and I have no control over it. I am convinced, however, that the Royal Air Force would not be willing to produce reports of these inquiries. With this reservation, the question can pass as an order for return.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend consider dropping this motion, as I have already suggested? Otherwise it means that I have to be here every day when my hon. friend makes his motion. If he would drop it, to be reviewed and another motion submitted, he could put one on the order paper at any time. I do submit, Mr. Speaker, that a motion like this which has been standing on the order paper for four weeks should be either proceeded with or dropped.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will notify the minister if I decide to move the motion.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I am not going to stand for a notice from my hon. friend for me to be here.

I am asking my hon. friend, and I think it is only fair to the house, to drop the motion, which, I am told, has been standing on this order paper for at least six weeks.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not familiar with any rule under which the minister can ask me to drop the motion.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not citing any rule. It is just ordinary businesslike procedure.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

An hon. MEMBER: Vote!

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Speaker, the rules permit me to leave the motion on the order paper, and I propose to do so.

Motion stands.

WARTIME PRICES AND TRADE BOARD—BAKING INDUSTRY

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of a report or reports by J. D. Woods of the wartime prices and trade board regarding the b king industry.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have been in communication with my hon. friend about this motion, and I think he is willing to have it dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister has agreed to give me an explanation of the matter, and I am prepared to drop the motion.

Motion dropped.

MILITARY SERVICE—APPLICATION OF S. L. LAMSON FOR POSTPONEMENT

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

For a copy of all reports, letters, evidence, recommendations, and other documents in the possession of the government, relative to the refusal by the national war services board of district M to grant the request for postponement made by Mr. Scott L. Lamson, L.534136.

Mr. THORSON: This order should be made subject to a number of reservations. The boards hear all proceedings in camera; therefore all material which comes to a board is privileged. In addition, there are certain interdepartmental communications which are also privileged. With these reservations of privilege I see no objection to the motion being passed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I cannot see why any of this need be secret; it cannot give any aid or comfort to the enemy. It seems to me that it is no more than the right of the ordinary citizen to have the information presented upon which a board bases its decision. It is possible that some reports which are presented are erroneous, and there is no means by which anyone can find out whether these reports are correct. On some occasions, I may say, the Saskatchewan board has acted differently from other boards. If the powers and privileges of these boards are not subject to some restriction, they can develop into a sort of star chamber and do real damage to the rights of citizens. I cannot see anything with regard to a return such as this, even respecting interdepartmental material, which should be considered secret.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SHORTAGE OF FARM HELP—CONTROL OF AGRICULTURAL WAGES—HARVEST LEAVE FOR MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): Can the Minister of Agriculture make a statement to the house so that the people of western Canada, and particularly the farmers, may know what steps are being taken to meet the very serious situation regarding farm and harvest labour? I am moved to make this inquiry because of the number of letters I am receiving which indicate that the farmers are seriously worried about the matter. What cooperation is being given by the various war services? What is being done?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The question should really be directed to the Minister of Labour, who handles all questions which have to do with labour, including even labour for farms. I may say that representations are made to me as Minister of Agriculture, as apparently they are made to various hon. members representing agricultural constituencies, and I make representations on behalf of those concerned to the Department of Labour. My understanding is—the Minister of Labour will correct me if I am wrong—that a vote of $100,000 has been set up by this house for the purpose of making it possible for the minister to assist the provincial governments, or whatever department of a provincial government deals with agricultural labour matters, in the organization and transportation of labour from one part of a province to another, or even, if necessary, from one province to another. For two or three years an amount of money has been included in the estimates for that purpose, and agreements are reached between the Minister of Labour, together with his department, and whatever department is responsible in the province, under which assistance will be given for the organization and transportation of whatever surplus labour is available to be moved to areas where there is a shortage.

Speaking as Minister of Agriculture, though, I think I should say—what is probably known to all hon. members—that surplus labour for different purposes is becoming less and less. Practically all of the labour in Canada is now employed, either in the armed services, in manufacturing, in transportation, or on farms, and I believe it to be very difficult to muster any additional amount of labour for farming purposes. It might be possible to reorganize it and to shift some of the surplus labour which is not on farms from place to place in order to have it better distributed, but I doubt if there is any considerable amount of additional labour which can be placed on the farms. The course I have mentioned has been urged on the Department of Labour and they are doing, I believe, everything possible to coordinate the efforts of the provinces and the federal authority in this direction. An attempt is being made to organize all the surplus urban labour, in villages and towns in the different provinces, in order that they can go to the farms in the surrounding community for so many hours a day or so many days a week. Organization is proposed similar to the organization which was carried on in the last two years of the last war.

So far as the defence services are concerned, I think the Minister of National Defence should speak on their behalf.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): In further reference to the question which the Minister of Agriculture has just been answering, may I direct a question in respect to farm labour to the Minister of Labour, who seems to be the proper authority? It is becoming increasingly difficult, as the Minister of Agriculture said, to get suitable farm labour; and we are faced with this situation, that although we are paying double the wages we paid a few years ago, certain people will try to outbid us and steal away our help. I have had a recent illustration of this on my own farm. I should like to ask the minister if the same regulations should not apply to farm labour as apply to labour in factories—that the permission of the employer must be obtained before a man leaves to take another job of a similar character.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I would say, in a kindly way, that we have heard a great deal about an all-out war effort, and it is rather good, from the labour man's point of view, to hear that there is a shortage of labour in Ontario.

As long ago as last February the Minister of Agriculture and myself discussed this matter, anticipating a distinct shortage of labour on the farms of this country. We came to an arrangement with the government of Ontario, who last year, through the instrumentality of an agreement with the federal government, and in cooperation with the employment service of Canada, made possible the organization of 23,000 additional people for the farms of that province. We made a similar agreement this year, with an additional amount beyond that of last year of $40,000 apiece, making $200,000 for the two governments. We sent a copy of that agreement to all the other provinces, as we thought they would like to avail themselves of similar provisions or similar facilities.

I think this may be fairly stated, that in connection with agriculture generally the best kind of government organization is that which is closest to the people. I do not say that in any way to get from under the responsibility of the federal government. There is no need to tell my hon. friend that in its very essence agriculture changes from province to province, so that the problem in Saskatchewan is different from the problem in Ontario. Both in industry and in agriculture, faced as we are with various problems, we think it will be necessary to take substitutes. It is hard for us to adjust ourselves to a condition that departs from the psychology of two or three years ago, when we could simply go to the shelf and take down what we wanted. We have reached the point where it will be necessary for farmers and industrialists in Canada to use, if I may say so, all their local powers, their energy and their imagination to meet the local situation.

With respect to the wages question raised by my hon. friend, I should like to go into that, but he knows as well as I do, that in all these matters agriculture is generally excepted. It is excepted from the provisions of the unemployment insurance act; it is excepted from the provisions of many other acts and regulations in force in Canada, and I should not like to give an answer offhand. The hon. member understands as well as I do the vast organization that would be necessary to enable us to exercise control over the wages of individual farm labourers throughout the country. With regard to industry, it is comparatively easy where there are big units, where the organization is complete and we know who the employers are. There are 150,000 employers in industry and commerce to-day each of whom employs more than fifteen people. I say that not to make a speech, but to point out to my hon. friend the difficulties with which the government would be confronted if it undertook to set in motion immediately a policy that would control agricultural wages. I think we should stand by the good old British principle, that it is wise not to pass regulations and orders in council unless there is a reasonable chance of enforcing them, because lack of enforcement would bring the government into ill repute and also render difficult the application and stabilization of the wage structure of commerce and industry in this country.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of National Defence if this matter of farm leave has been given consideration by his department. If so, has it been refused? I am prompted to ask this both by questions raised here to-day and by an announcement which I saw some days ago to that effect, the truth of which announcement was promptly denied. I do think that some provision might be made with regard to draftees, if it will not upset the balance of training. Even if there is some inconvenience in connection with training at the different centres, the taking care of the harvest is such a vital matter in certain provinces that every effort ought to be made to render assistance if the difficulties are not insurmountable. I can visualize difficulties, and I will not press the point home; but it seems to me that the Department of National Defence might give consideration to a few days' leave for trainees and others in connection with this matter of harvest.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I wish I were justified in giving to my hon. friend, the house and the country, an assurance that consideration which would really result favourably could be given. Let me say that the matter has been very seriously and carefully considered, and I would repeat here what I have had to say in a good many letters, namely, that this matter of asking the army to supply men for various services has occasioned us a good deal of concern. My hon. friend will remember that not long ago the request was made that the army supply men for the purpose of loading fertilizer. Another request had been made previously that the army should supply men for seeding in the west. That request came from the president of the Saskatchewan Cooperative Wheat Growers Association. They felt perhaps that we should have complied with the request. A request was received later from the sugar beet growers, and so on.

There has arisen in this country the idea that the army has a pool of man-power which can be detailed for this or that civilian service. I say that in the kindest way, but I must say, as kindly and as firmly, that it cannot be done, in view of the commitments and preoccupations which the army has. There is not only training to be considered, but mobilization in connection with the expanded programme which had to be undertaken as the result of war developments. It is not possible to give the house any hope that harvest leave will be entertained, in large numbers, of men who have been called up, or of those who have enlisted voluntarily. There may be cases where men are at depots —not at training centres—and perhaps in some particular unit, on some local duty which does not require the same assiduous attention as some others, where some leave can be granted. But all cases will have to be considered individually, and there will be no harvest leave in the broad sense of making a general order that such leave will be granted to men who are needed to work on farms. Some consideration may be given regarding personnel in some units of a special character such as I have indicated, but I am afraid I cannot give the house any further assurance than that.

Mr. PERLEY: I would have directed my question to one of the ministers of the armed services, but I thought that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) would make a statement similar to that which the Minister of National Defence has just given, and which is very valuable. It will enable farmers who have sons recently called up under the training scheme to know exactly what the conditions are and what they may expect. This morning I took up with one of the service departments an important letter I had received—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PERLEY: I am saying this to help the government. I was treated with great courtesy. I was told that there were special cases where it could be shown that it would not interfere with the man's course at all or with his general duties, wherein some consideration might be given. I thank the minister for the statement he has made. I wanted to get it on the record.

Mr. SPEAKER: Unless hon. members are seeking to continue what has become a debate, I must ask that similar questions be put on the order paper.

Mr. HOMUTH: May I ask the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), whether any consideration has been given to certain conscientious objectors who are now in camp doing work which in many cases is useless and who might be engaged on farms in connection with the harvest?

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question which the hon. member should place on the order paper.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

REFERENCE TO ALLEGED STATEMENT OF COLONEL DREW AS TO NON-ACCEPTANCE OF FEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): About a week ago I asked a question of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and I am not quite satisfied with the reply I received; for I am afraid it may create a wrong impression. The reply had to do with Colonel Drew's charge for services, and the reply was, "No account submitted". I understand that at the opening of the Hong Kong inquiry before Commissioner Duff, Colonel Drew stated that it was not his intention to accept any fee or expenses, that he had undertaken the work as a public duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member wishes some further explanation with regard to a question he has already asked. I think he is entitled to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Can the hon. member make a statement as to what happened at a secret session?

Mr. BRUCE: I do not refer to a secret session at all.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is entitled to ask for further information with regard to a question he has already asked, but he may not make a further statement.

Mr. BRUCE: That is exactly what I was coming to, Mr. Speaker. I want to know from the Minister of Justice if it is not true, and if it was not known to his department, that at the opening session Coloned Drew stated that it was not his intention to charge a fee or expenses, that he was doing this as a public duty. In the second place I would like to ask the minister if one might not say that his reply was lacking in frankness.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I resent the imputation made by the hon. member, and I ask that it be withdrawn. The hon. member knows, as does every other hon. member who has looked at Hansard, that neither the Minister of Justice nor anyone connected with the Department of Justice made any answer to that question. The answer that was given was submitted by the Minister of Finance. I did not know of the preparation of the answer. As to what took place before the royal commission inquiring into the dispatch of a Canadian expedition to Hong Kong, I was not there, but I was informed that at the opening of that inquiry the commissioner stated that the proceedings were to be held in camera. I know nothing of what happened there, beyond what is contained in the report that was submitted to this house.

Mr. BRUCE: In view of the minister's statement I withdraw the remark I made a moment ago. I will now direct my question to the Minister of Finance, under whose department the matter appears to have been considered. I would like to add this further question. Is it not a fact that in addition to the statement at the opening of the inquiry, a letter was sent by Colonel Drew in response to a request from the secretary of the commission, to the effect that he had no intention of charging a fee or expenses?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I had no knowledge of any such statement by Colonel Drew; in fact I had no knowledge at all of what went on at that secret hearing. I would like to ask my hon. friend how he knows.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Well, after that statement I am going to ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who probably was there: Is it not true that Colonel Drew announced that he was not taking any fees or expenses, at some stage at all events, whether it was the first or second day? I believe my hon. friend was there nearly all the time.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I want to say in the first place that I was present at the sessions of the Hong Kong inquiry on only three days during the five or six weeks the sittings were held; that if I had heard anything of this kind I would not make any statement as to it; that I considered everybody was bound by the statement made by the chief justice to the effect that the proceedings were being held in camera.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RALSTON: I just want to add that I heard no statement of the kind to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. BRUCE: Then I wish to direct another question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the serious charge made against one of Canada's most loyal and patriotic citizens—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —and its subsequent withdrawal, which in itself is an admission that the government had not a leg to stand on—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —but were obviously attempting to intimidate a public man, will the government consider making adequate compensation—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BRUCE: —and a suitable apology to Colonel Drew for the injustice and indignity which he has suffered?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, is it not a rule of this house that when you rise, any member who is on his feet should sit down? Should not any words which are sought to be said by an hon. member after you have risen be stricken from Hansard?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no doubt as to the rule that when the Speaker stands, all members must take their seats. As to striking matter from the record, that would have to be at the behest of the house before I could give any such instructions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us get on with the business.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): With all due respect to the leader of the opposition, I think we would get on with the business of this house much faster if hon. members would resume their seats when the Speaker rises.

MILITARY SERVICE

PROCEDURE IN ADVICE TO NATIONAL WAR SERVICES OF ENLISTMENTS IN CANADIAN ARMY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I should like to make an inquiry of the Minister of National War Services. When a man enlists either for service in Canada or overseas, are the regional directors in the several districts advised within a reasonable time? If so, about what time elapses before advice of the enlistment reaches them?

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): The Department of National Defence seeks to advise the Department of National War Services of enlistments as rapidly as possible, but from time to time there are omissions in those statements by reason of the fact that a person may have enlisted in one part of Canada, whereas he may have registered in another part, where his registration card would be.

Mr. LOCKHART: I appreciate that this matter may not be considered as very important, but I should like to refer to one incident. A man enlisted a year and a half ago, and he was in England for a year. He was killed four months ago, and a notice to appear for military service has just been received at his home. I can give the minister particulars of other cases. I think some check ought to be made.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill No. 64, to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training (title changed to "An Act respecting the Carrying on and Coordination of Vocational Training.")

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS

EXCISE ACT, 1934

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the schedule to the Excise Act, 1934, and to provide:—

1. That the duty of excise on spirits distilled in Canada be increased from seven dollars to nine dollars per proof gallon, provided that duty paid spirits owned by any distiller at the close of business on the twenty-third day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two shall be subject to the following additional duty of excise on every gallon of the strength of proof two dollars and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will be recalled that in my speech on the budget on June 30 last I adverted to the question of increased excise and import duties on alcoholic beverages. I do not intend to-day to repeat the observations I made then. I am fearful of the tremendous increase in the drink bill of this country at a time when Canada is at war, and I think something ought to be done about it. On one or two occasions when this matter has been referred to in the house the minister has taken the ground—I suppose it is open to him to take it—that in Canada the retail sale of liquor is entirely in the hands of the provincial governments. It is true that we have a system of government control of liquor in every province, save one, Prince Edward Island, where they go through the form of having a prohibitory law on their statute book. In my view this is not government control at all; it is government monopoly. We have had the spectacle, at all events in my province, and I am bound to say before the war, of the authorities actually doing certain things to promote the sale of liquor. I have always deprecated this, because I felt it was wrong.

I am not approaching this subject matter from the point of view of ethics. I am not advocating prohibition, I do not think prohibition can succeed in this country without the overwhelming support of the public. That is not apparent now, and it was not apparent for many years while prohibition was on the statute books of certain of the provinces. I am approaching the matter purely and simply from the point of view of a nation at war, a nation straining every effort it can to raise money for the prosecution of the war. I hope the minister will reconsider his position with respect to this matter. It is obvious that this is purely a revenue measure. If the minister is candid, and I am sure he will be, he will affirm that position. In so far as it is a revenue measure I am sure it will be supported, because if there is one thing upon which taxes should be imposed, both in war time and in peace time, it is on intoxicating liquors. For the moment I am differentiating between spirits as such, and beer and other lighter commodities.

We have the spectacle of the gross sales of liquor in Canada, under government monopoly, mounting to almost phenomenal proportions, and the thoughtful people and good citizens of this country are alarmed about that situation. In my own province, in the year 1935, the total profits from the sale of liquor at government liquor stores was between $500,000 and $600,000. In the fiscal year ended October 31, 1941, the profits were four times as much, and to-day, with the great decrease in the sale of gasoline and a large number of cars not being licensed, I suppose the liquor monopoly now in the hands of the provinces is the largest single source of revenue they have, or many of them at all events. As time goes on they come to look upon that as a legitimate source of revenue. It is legal, it is very easy money, and so it is quite natural for them to do so. I have never myself felt it to be a high type of citizenship to desire to be relieved of my obligations as a citizen to pay revenue to the province at the expense, perhaps of my weaker brother. But to-day I am not taking that high exalted stand. I am trying to deal with the matter in the light of present developments. Should we not do something to cut down this huge bill and divert to better purposes some of this free money that is now devoted to liquor? I use the word "better"; theoretically perhaps the war is not a better purpose, but at least it is much more of an absolute necessity. It is true that we need this money, and the nine million dollars that we will get from it will mean something to our exchequer, but I think we would get far more effort if some of it were diverted by other forms of taxation to the public treasury. I think that would be better than putting excise and import duties on alcoholic beverages.

I have no doubt the minister has it in mind that to restrict the sales and make it much harder for people to get liquor than it now is would revive the old and discreditable conditions with respect to bootlegging. But I might remind him that some of the incentives to bootlegging have been removed by changed circumstances. A great deal of liquor came into my province a few years ago because of its proximity to the two islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which were a source of supply. But then the United States had prohibition, and rum-running was rampant. I do not know that anybody got very much out of it, but some people are reputed to have made money out of it. The chief outlet was, of course, in the United States. As to central Canada, I have heard various stories about what happened along the border. But now that the United States definitely has liquor, the incentive to smuggling liquor into the United States is no longer there.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): This law would not affect that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It does not affect anything except the raising of additional revenue. I am trying to deal with a wider principle than that. I am trying to disabuse the minister's mind of any mistaken idea he may have with respect to the return of bootlegging.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I agree with the hon. member there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am trying to talk sense, and I should think my good friend the hon. member for Brantford City would agree with me when I talk sense, which is 100 per cent of the time, I hope. I do submit that we, as representative men of this nation, should give consideration to what after all everybody knows is an evil thing in our body politic—the expenditure in war time of some $250,000,000 for the purchase of alcoholic beverages. I realize that a very large portion of that sum goes into the public treasury. If hon. members were to ascertain the exact figure they would find that a very large portion of that sum goes in taxes to the federal and provincial governments, and that the consumer is paying a good deal for very little in actual commercial value.

We have not rationed liquor. We apply the principle of rationing on the theory of scarcity; that, I think, is the economic reason for rationing. I was very much amused when on the other side last year to be told that in a great hotel in Edinburgh they were rationed to four bottles of whisky a day, while down in London you could buy all you could pay for. I could not understand it, because Edinburgh was, I was going to say, the centre of the industry.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That four bottles was for the hotel, not for the individual.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, for the whole hotel to sell to its guests.

It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that some solution should be found whereby a part of this enormous drink bill would be diverted to a better purpose and used in the war effort. I wonder whether the minister has not given further consideration to that. I am sure that with his background the minister must be alarmed at the situation which has presented itself, say, in Nova Scotia. I have had multitudes of letters from people in Nova Scotia complaining of the huge amount of money which has been diverted from the armed forces, we will say, to the purchase and consumption of liquor. I do hope that some consideration will be given to mitigating, I am not going to say the evil, but the amount of the bill which this nation has to pay. And that can be done.

I have no suggestion to make other than that of pressure, or that some arrangement be made with the provincial governments to limit the sale of liquor; because I agree that a large part of the problem is on the doorstep of the provincial governments, and not particularly on the minister's. I noticed in the press the other day that the government in Newfoundland has had to deal with this problem. I did not think their efforts were very stringent, because I understand that a man there can still buy three bottles of whisky a week, and surely that ought to be enough for anybody. But I do submit that the minister should make some effort in conjunction with the provincial governments, as a war measure, to limit the sale of liquor in Canada in order that a large portion of this bill of $250,000,000 may be diverted into other and better channels. I suggest that the minister negotiate with the provincial governments. I think some of them have been seriously alarmed at the situation that has developed in certain of the provinces. I think in the province of Nova Scotia they have taken note of public opinion and they themselves have gone so far, perhaps not very far, in an effort to decrease the sale of liquor. I do not think very much has been done in my own province.

This resolution is purely a revenue measure. I do not disagree with that from the point of view of getting money for the war, but I believe that if we were to use other methods a much larger portion of this spirits bill could be diverted to war purposes without any detriment to the liberty of any subject, and with great benefit to the whole body politic.

Mr. PARENT: I completely agree with the remarks of the leader of the opposition. At a time when the very necessities of life are being restricted, I cannot understand why this country should tolerate the expenditure of $250,000,000 a year on liquor. I would especially call the attention of the authorities to the facilities which are reported to be available to soldiers to enable them to procure hard liquor. I do not see how you can train an army on liquor. I agree that the men should be allowed to get beer if they need it, but it is appalling the way money is spent, especially in my city, on strong liquor. It is of no use to those who consume it, or to their families, and it occasions scandal at a time when people are asked to make the sacrifices they are now called upon to make.

It is all very well to say that a large part of this expenditure is returned to the government in taxes. I recall seeing recently the financial statement of a company which shows that, while they are paying $11,000,000 to the federal treasury, they still have at their disposal $10,000,000 to pay to the shareholders.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the government would take a good deal of that.

Mr. PARENT: That is irrespective of the tremendous amount of money which is expended on advertisements and propaganda of various kinds.

I suggest that careful consideration be given to the remarks of the leader of the opposition, with a view to having this tax increased to the highest possible percentage. As I recall it, in the last war federal and provincial taxes combined amounted to $17 a gallon. At that time opposition was expressed to the impost because it was said that it encouraged bootlegging. But since those days, nearly thirty years ago, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have organized a most efficient system to discover bootlegging; there is no more of this menace in the country, and I think something could very well be done to put liquor on practically a prohibitory basis. It is not a necessity of life, although it may be needed in certain types of sickness or other extraordinary cases. In a general way hard liquor is one of the luxuries, and if a man wants to have a drink he should be required to pay for it. At a time when we are cutting expenses and asking people to make sacrifices, to take less sugar and tea, to buy fewer suits or shirts, even to the point of depriving their families of things they need, in order to win the war, why should they be confronted with a figure such as $250,000,000, advertising these scandalous conditions in the midst of the war? I wholly agree with the remarks of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I agree in large measure with what the leader of the opposition has said. No doubt far too much drinking of alcoholic liquors is going on at this time, and too great a part of our effort is diverted to the manufacture of them. How this can be avoided, however, it is difficult for me to understand. I do not believe any of us would want to go back to the days of prohibition. The hon. member for Quebec West and South, who immediately preceded me, suggested that we should again have prohibition or should put liquor practically on a prohibitory basis. It is my conviction that the Ontario Temperance Act, which was in effect in Ontario about a decade ago, did more to bring about intemperance and excessive drinking than any measure which was ever placed on the statute book of that province. Hon. members from Ontario will remember that although there was supposed to be prohibition, in almost every centre were numerous places where people could obtain liquor illicitly; also numbers of persons persisted in carrying around liquor in their pockets. Prior to that time, when I was a young man, I would never think of going to a dance with liquor on me; none of the young men of my day would have done so. But when the Ontario Temperance Act came into effect, I noticed that practically all the young men, and, I am sorry to say, many young women, carried liquor with them. We do not want that condition to arise again in Ontario or any part of Canada.

I believe we are all in accord with the curtailment of the sale of intoxicating liquors if it is possible to do so, but I would remind the Minister of Finance that it is not going to be an easy matter. He may increase the tax, he may cut down the sales, but if at the same time bootleggers flourish and the illicit sale of liquor continues or increases, his efforts will be of no avail. No doubt something should be done, but let us not act without giving the matter most careful consideration, to make sure that we do not have another era of illicit liquor-selling in this country.

Mr. McIVOR: I have not said much on this question, but I have thought a good deal. There is no use in trying to bring in legislation unless public support is behind it. I think it is well understood that the minister has the backing of the best men and women in Canada in support of his legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What legislation?

Mr. McIVOR: My only criticism is that the tax on hard liquor is not high enough. You cannot make men sober by legislation. I have had a good deal of experience in trying to sober up men when they had gone the limit. You have a better chance of sobering men with strong coffee than you have with legislation against the liquor business. A change of heart is needed. I have no patience with those who think that the dominion and provincial governments can legislate the liquor business out of existence; they cannot do it. I should like to know whether this legislation is in any way related to the discovery of an illicit still in the province of Quebec. It is evident the police are on the job and are going to back up the minister's policy.

Mr. BENCE: The reason which appeals to me as the ground for the increase in the sale of liquor in the country is the fact that the income of the Canadian people has increased so tremendously. It does appear to me that the mere putting on of 50 or 60 cents for an imperial quart of some kind of liquor will not in itself have the effect of prohibiting the sale of that liquor. I presume the reason the minister has put this tax on is that he sees in it another fairly easy way of increasing the revenues of the country, and also of cutting down generally the purchasing power that is available for other consumer goods. When the statement is made that there is too great a diversion of man-power and materials towards the production of liquor and away from the war effort, the minister might put figures on Hansard, if they are available, as to the total amount spent in Canada on liquor of all kinds, and the total amount of taxes obtained by the dominion government last year—he has given an indication as to what the increase in revenues will be—so that we can arrive at the net amount that is being paid to the producers of these commodities, and thus interpret the amount of labour that is being used and possibly obtain some understanding of the quantity of materials used, and so on.

Mr. BLAIR: I suggest that there should also be something in the way of a time limit. I am well aware of the anxiety of the minister to do his best, but I am aware also that the people of Ontario are heartily sick of this business. I do not agree with those who have said that drinking was worse during prohibition. I spend a good deal of my time among the rougher element, and I have seen more drunks recently than I did in prohibition days. One hon. gentleman suggested that something should be done, but ended up by saying that nothing should be done. We have reached the stage now where action should be taken. We have come to the pass where there should be some curtailment in time, and the matter should be talked over with the provincial governments. Surely we do not think that the ladies' beer parlours are something that we should be proud of. How would any hon. member like to see his daughter or sister coming out of a ladies' beer parlour, swinging along? Spend some of your time there some time, as I do occasionally. I often drop in on my way home from this house, and I see entertaining times there. I read character in faces, and while there are some Scotch among them, they are not all Scotch. Beer has a more degrading element in it than real whisky. If you want to know that, consider the different races that swing to beer and those that swing to whisky.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): "Swing" is a technical term now, isn't it?

Mr. BLAIR: What the aviator drinks after ten o'clock is so many headaches; what he drinks before that may be a little entertainment and amusement. Let him drink his beer as he likes until ten o'clock, but when men reach the headache stage they should quit, so that they can get up next morning with a clear head. When you come to the headache stage, then I think there should be a time limit. The Prime Minister is noted as a splendid man for timing; even in elections he does well, and he would know the time. I do not know whether his experience in liquor is as good as yours and mine, but I suggest that there should be a time limit when men should stop drinking at night if they do not want a headache next morning.

I am a coroner, and I have had to deal with a good many accidents on the road. Often when a man is killed in the county of Wellington and I am called in as coroner, I have had to do some desperate lying—my hon. friend does not have to do that because he is a lawyer. I have sent home word to many a father that a boy had died from heart failure when I knew it was booze. It was the next thing to a sworn declaration, and I made a notorious liar of myself. I am not giving a temperance lecture, but I do suggest that there should be consultation with the provincial governments, because they are charged with the responsibility of regulating the traffic. There should be some regulation, some curtailment in time, especially among the aviators, and I would be delighted to see the ladies' beer parlours closed. It would be a good thing to see them done away with.

Mr. NICHOLSON: When the war appropriation bill was before the house I spoke at length on this important national question. The large number of letters I have received would indicate that this is a subject that is causing a good deal of anxiety in the homes of the Canadian people.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. member give me the date of that speech?

Mr. NICHOLSON: June 1. The comments made by hon. members this afternoon also show that this is a subject that should receive more consideration from the government than it has received so far. After speaking on June 1, I received some criticism from certain quarters for suggesting that we should not send beer to the troops in Libya and other battle fronts. I never made such a suggestion. I would not for a moment suggest that those on the battle fronts should be denied the right to have refreshments at their bases. But I do think it is unfortunate that the policy of sending liquid refreshments should be decided by a man who is engaged in the brewing business, and that large quantities are sent when space is needed for more essential material.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. The hon. member is referring to Mr. E. P. Taylor.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, he had nothing to say about that, so far as I know. This beer for Africa was purchased by an agency of the British government and taken by the British government. The only thing the Canadian government could have done would have been to protest, and we did not think we were justified in doing that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I want to give the government clearance on that. I investigated the matter carefully, and I am prepared to give this government a certificate of non-complicity, if that is a good word.

Mr. ILSLEY: Thank you.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The information I had was that Mr. Taylor is vice-chairman of this allied shipping council, and he decides how the space shall be used, whether for Bren guns or tanks or beer. The decision was that it should be used for beer, and I was informed that large quantities did move to Libya.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be so; I do not know. I was simply speaking on behalf of the Canadian government. I do not know what agents of the United Kingdom government acted in the matter. Certainly Mr. Taylor did not take any steps as agent of the Canadian government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Mr. Taylor in Washington, as vice-chairman of the council, has the responsibility of deciding how the space will be used. He is there as our representative.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, he is there for the British government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: But he is one of our dollar-a-year men, isn't he?

Mr. ILSLEY: He is an employee of the British government, I believe.

Mr. NICHOLSON: His name was one of those tabled as dollar-a-year men, I remember.

Mr. ILSLEY: My understanding is that after the late Arthur Purvis died, the British government had to make other arrangements. I do not know the exact position Mr. Taylor occupies, but Mr. Morris Wilson and Mr. Taylor, I believe, or one of them, took on the work that Mr. Purvis had been doing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Wilson.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have always regarded Mr. Taylor since that time as a representative, or employee of the United Kingdom government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The statement placed on record was that:

> Mr. E. P. Taylor is one of our dollar-a-year men. . . . Here we have a picture of the British supply council; we see Sir Arthur Salter, Mr. Morris Wilson, Lord Beaverbrook, Mr. E. P. Taylor and Mr. Jean Monnet. The article states that in some respect the British supply council acts as a coordinating body for the allies as well as for the British empire. Listen to this:
> "Whether it is an apple or a flying fortress, the British supply organization endeavours to get these goods to the places most in need of assistance."

I think the government of Canada must take responsibility for the decisions made by this council, with Mr. Taylor as one of the members.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have nothing to do with it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Again I say it is unfortunate that the president of Canadian Breweries should be placed in the position where large quantities of beer manufactured by his company should be going to Libya at a time when it has been established that there was a considerable shortage of other materials of war that are much more effective than beer in meeting Rommel and the Germans. I support the leader of the opposition in urging that the government give more consideration than has been given to this question.

I hope the minister will answer the question asked by the hon. member for Saskatoon and give some information as to the quantity of materials used in connection with the liquor traffic, and the number of men and women engaged in it. When I spoke on June 1, I mentioned that it was a serious reflection on the people of Saskatchewan that they spent more on liquor last year than the Minister of Finance asked them to raise for the victory loan. It is hardly fair to expect the government of Saskatchewan, hard pressed as it is for funds, to take the lead in seeking to discourage the manufacture and consumption of alcoholic liquors, unless it is part of a national plan. You cannot expect any one province to go out and cut off its revenues unless all parts of the dominion are doing it. I think all hon. members—at least a great many—feel very strongly about this. I would take exception to a statement made by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg some time ago when he suggested that members of this house—

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That was in a previous debate.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, but he referred to hon. members of this house. He cast a reflection on this chamber, and the impression has gone out that there is a great deal of drinking by members of this chamber. Let me say that one of the pleasant surprises I have had was to find that a large number of members of this house are total abstainers, and that so little drinking is done by members of the house generally. The reports I heard before coming here were such that I expected there would be more drinking by hon. members, but whatever the shortcomings of this chamber may be, I think the amount of liquor consumed by hon. members is not one of them.

I hope the government will give consideration to the many representations made by temperance and church organizations across the country, and people who are not prohibitionists, to the effect that this be recognized as a national question.

Before this section passes would the minister give some statement regarding the rate of excise in New Zealand, Australia and Great Britain? We are increasing our duty from $7 to $9 a proof gallon; what are the rates in some of these other countries?

Mr. QUELCH: I wish to add my voice in support of those who advocate that we curtail the sale of liquor at this time. It has been suggested that this is largely a provincial matter, but we have full power to deal with it under the War Measures Act. We have not hesitated to curtail the sale of gasoline and tires and sugar, and there is no reason why we cannot do the same so far as liquor is concerned.

As regards loss of revenue, I do not think anyone would suggest that we should encourage the consumption of a commodity that is injurious to the public, just in order to get revenue from the sale. We might as well encourage the sale of narcotics in order to get revenue.

So far as the tax curtailing the sale of liquor is concerned, the minister has himself said that the purpose of taxation is to curtail spending; nevertheless I think he realizes that the only real way to stop the sale of any commodity is to ration it. We are finding that out in regard to tires and sugar. I do not believe this country can make a total war effort so long as we allow over-indulgence in the consumption of liquor to prevail as it does to-day.

The liquor industry is consuming a tremendous amount of gasoline and sugar, and is very heavy on tires. As to the stand taken by some hon. members that it is not desirable to go back to the days of prohibition, I am not satisfied at all that if the police really tried to enforce prohibition it could not be enforced. I am not a teetotaller, by any means, but I think we all know that in prohibition days speakeasies and bootlegging were winked at deliberately by the police in many parts of the country. I am satisfied that if any serious attempt were made to enforce prohibition, it could be enforced. But I am not advocating prohibition; I am merely advocating that we ration the sale of liquor. It is a deplorable state of affairs, in a country that is trying to make a total war effort, to see the number of men and women that one can see in a state of intoxication almost any night in any city of this country; and apparently the same thing is going on in England. This tax will not prevent that. It may provide additional revenue, and I am sure the minister would be the last to suggest that he would be willing to sacrifice the health and efficiency of the people in order to get the few dollars that this tax brings in. The only way to curtail the sale is by rationing, not by increasing the tax.

Mr. HOMUTH: Instead of the various speakers dealing with this question from the point of view of a tax, we have had several temperance lectures this afternoon. If we want to debate the question of temperance, it is the privilege of any hon. member to bring in a resolution on that question. But the budget is not brought down with the idea of curtailing or rationing liquor, or legislating as to the morals of the people. This budget is for the purpose of raising the necessary money to carry on the war and the business of the country. It would perhaps give the people an entirely different picture of this $250,000,000 that is supposed to be spent on alcoholic beverages if the minister would give us not only the correct figures as to the sale, but the tax that is collected by the dominion and the various provinces, the amount of labour, what goes into labour in the form of wages, what goes back to the farmer for his wheat and barley and other grains, and other factors that enter into the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages. It might give us a completely different idea of just what this so-called tremendous liquor bill is.

There is one thing about which the minister must be very careful. If we are going to curb this industry, if we are going to bring in special legislation to stop the sale or manufacture, that is an entirely different thing. I am quite in favour of this or any other tax the minister wants to levy, provided that in levying that tax he does not raise the price so high that once more we will see alcohol come in in large quantities from the United States, as happened in former years, when millions of gallons were rushed across. As a matter of fact it is only about two years ago that some very severe sentences were handed out in this connection, so that even under the present tax alcohol has been brought into Canada. That is one thing the minister must watch—that the tax does not make the price too high; for if it does, bootlegging and rum-running will commence immediately, and instead of going from Canada to the United States it will come from the United States to Canada. The matter of prohibition or temperance in itself is a question entirely apart from this matter of raising revenue with which to carry on the business of the country.

Mr. GREEN: I must say that I do not entirely agree with the hon. member who has just spoken. The matter has gone much deeper with the Canadian people than the question of taxation. I think there is a widespread feeling that it is the responsibility of the dominion government to do something about liquor, and not to wash its hands and say this is entirely a problem for the provincial governments. It does seem to me that the minister might give the committee the figures as to expenditures for liquor, both hard and soft, the number of men employed in the industry, and the materials used, so that we may have before us the facts on which to form an opinion. I was very much impressed by a full page advertisement which appeared in the Evening Citizen of June 30, published by the Canadian Temperance Federation. According to this advertisement the cost to ultimate consumers of liquor legally sold in Canada has been as follows:

1939	179,000,000
1940	191,000,000
1941	232,000,000

The estimate they give for 1942 is $290,000,000. In this advertisement three suggestions are offered, to which I think the minister should give his reaction. They are:

(1) As the manufacture of liquor is exclusively under dominion control you can ration materials that may be used for this purpose. They have done so in Britain and Australia. . . .

(2) You can restrict the amount of liquor released from bond for sale. That would eliminate large wasteful expenditures. . . .

(3) You could to-morrow commandeer distilleries for the manufacture of industrial alcohol so useful in making smokeless powder and as a basis for synthetic rubber. And you could order that a major part of liquor stocks now in existence be turned into industrial alcohol. Mr. Roosevelt has moved in this direction. . . .

The minister should give an answer to these three suggestions which have been advanced by the Canadian Temperance Federation. Another complaint we are hearing is that the brewers and distillers are having no difficulty in getting priority for the material required to expand their plants. I do not know whether or not that is the case, but I have had complaints to that effect from Vancouver, and the people resent it very strongly. Many people have the feeling that the distilling and brewing interests are being protected by the government, and it is most unwise that anything should be done which would give grounds for that belief. I think the whole situation can be fairly summed up by this expression, that Canadians cannot drink their way to victory. When sugar and gasoline are being rationed; when people cannot get fuel oil for their furnaces, and all this sort of thing, it does seem unreasonable that restrictions cannot be placed on the sale of liquor.

Mr. FAIR: For some weeks or months past I have been receiving letters in connection with this liquor question; therefore I do not feel that I should keep my chair warm this afternoon and let this opportunity go by without having at least a few words to say.

It may seem rather strange to some hon. members that I, who come from old Ireland, should say anything against liquor, but anything I have to say this afternoon will be against it. I lived in Ireland for almost twenty years, and during that time I saw a great deal of suffering and misery caused by this liquor traffic. The situation here is exactly as it was in the old country. I think if we went around this or any other city of Canada to-day or any other day we could see some of the effects of this curse, and if this government is going to fulfil its duty to the men overseas, and their parents and relatives here in Canada, it should do something in the matter. We find that the government has interfered with provincial rights in other matters perhaps not quite so vital as this, and personally I believe that if the government does its duty now it will accede to at least some of the requests of the temperance association and various church organizations all over this country. Not many days ago I received a letter from a man in Edmonton which reads in part as follows:

Any person who reads the financial papers or even the stock market reports of the daily press knows that according to the report of Mr. E. P. Taylor—we presumed the one-dollar-a-year man (see Saturday Night, February 21, 1942), that Canadian Breweries cancelled the arrears of $6.75 per share and substituted a dividend rate of $3.40 per annum instead of $3 per share. The result of this may be seen in the increase in the stock from $40 to $46.76 per share. Hiram Walker-Gooderham and Worts, and Hiram Walker and Sons Distilleries Incorporated, according to a notice which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Toronto, May 13, 1941, redeemed $207,000 principal of ten year four and one-quarter convertible debentures due December 1, 1945, on June 1, 1941, at 102½ per cent of their principal amount with accrued interest on principal amount to said redemption date.

The letter goes on to say:

Many of our sons are entering His Majesty's forces for $1.30 a day.

And a little further on he says:

Perhaps some of you members could pass on the information to Mr. Gibson and have him or his department ascertain if this $207,000 and $6.75 arrears per share was deducted from the excess profits tax of these companies who are exempt from the rationing system of some of the essentials, and if so see that the tax be refunded to the nation.

I believe in this country we have a number of habitual drinkers, and it is going to be pretty hard for them to break off that habit. Why should young men who are leaving home for the first time to enter his majesty's forces be encouraged by us to take up this habit? Why should we do these things for the advantage of certain companies who are said to occupy preferred positions with respect to rubber and other commodities? Why should our young men and women be faced with this traffic which in many instances will ruin their lives? I have two boys at home, and I expect that before long they will be going out among the rest of them. I certainly do not want to see them and the sons of other fathers and mothers tempted with this drug and traffic which could easily be done away with if proper precautions were taken.

Mr. GIBSON: I should like to say something about the remarks of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) and the correspondence he has received in connection with the taxation of liquor interests. A great many loose statements have been made outside this house with regard to this taxation. A question was asked some time ago by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) as to whether brewers and distillers have been permitted to pay arrears of dividends and redeem debentures out of their excess profits. This question was answered, but it did not seem to give satisfaction to some people outside the house. I have had one or two abusive letters in that connection and these were followed by an editorial in the United Church Observer, to which I replied but which has not received publicity. The matter has come up again and I think this is the reason for the letter received by the hon. member for Battle River. All brewers and distillers are required to pay their income and excess profits taxes before making any distribution out of earnings for any other purpose. Consequently any distribution that may be made is not made at the expense of any taxation that may be levied upon them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the law.

Mr. GIBSON: Furthermore, reference is continually being made to Hiram Walker's. The company actually referred to is Hiram Walker and Sons Inc., which did redeem some 4½ per cent debentures, I understand to an extent of $207,000. This particular company is a subsidiary of Hiram Walker-Gooderham and Worts; it is a United States corporation, does business in the United States, and does not file an income tax return in Canada. This is the company quoted as an example of a corporation in Canada escaping taxation. It is most misleading, and the public are entitled to know the facts.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Do they pay an income tax in this country for the business they do here?

Mr. GIBSON: I understand that this company does not do business in this country. It is a United States company doing business in the United States.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Or any of its subsidiaries?

Mr. GIBSON: It is a subsidiary of Hiram Walker-Gooderham and Worts, which is a Canadian company.

Mr. JACKMAN: I had not intended speaking on this resolution, but there are one or two facts I should like to point out to the committee and there is a suggestion I wish to make. The minister is always looking for suggestions in this connection, and I think this one will come within the province of his own department. The liquor bill for 1942 is estimated at $250,000,000. Investment income in 1937 amounted to $451,000,000, and in 1941, to $512,000,000. We shall be spending in this country for alcoholic beverages almost half the total investment income in 1941. I have never been a believer that prohibition would be effective in this country, but I have always deplored the moral and economic waste which goes along with the overconsumption of alcoholic beverages. The taste for alcohol is acquired, unfortunately quite easily by some, and the acquisition of that taste is stimulated on every hand by the advertising of the liquor companies. To some extent advertising comes within the province of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson).

In Ontario there is a law against the advertising of liquor. We believe that the advertising of liquor is just as effective as advertising in other fields. We feel that the delights, if you want to call them that, or the pleasures of drinking should not be put before the young people of our province at every turn. However, since the war, there has been an evasion of this regulation by the beverage companies in Ontario. Advertising is now done under the guise of its being a contribution to the war effort. We see "buy war savings certificates", or "$4 will make $5", and advertising of that kind by the beverage companies. As long as a certain small portion of the advertisement is devoted to patriotic purposes, these companies may advertise. It is called a patriotic advertisement rather than an advertisement of liquor.

I suppose that all these companies are in the excess profits tax bracket, so that this advertising is virtually being paid for by the people of Canada. I suggest to the Minister of Finance that the statute should provide that for the period of the war the liquor companies shall not be allowed to advertise their products in any province. In that way greater revenue will be provided for his department, and there will not be an incentive placed before the youth of this country to drink more and more and thus acquire a taste for alcohol.

There is another point which was not mentioned by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth). He said that we are dealing with fiscal returns and not with morals, that we should not concern ourselves with the consumption of liquor. But we must remember something which has been brought out by other hon. members, namely, that the liquor trade consumes many products and services which would otherwise be useful. I am strongly against any increase in this trade being brought about by means of advertising.

Mr. GIBSON: With respect to advertising, I may say that these companies are not allowed to increase their advertising costs. These costs are being rigidly controlled by the income tax department. This refers not only to liquor advertising but to all advertising. Strict limitations are being imposed on advertising expenses as compared with the pre-war average.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about this so-called patriotic advertising by distillers and brewers? Are they allowed for that?

Mr. GIBSON: We did allow an increase up to 10 per cent additional; that is, 10 per cent over the pre-war average advertising rate. This was done for one war loan campaign, but it has since been discontinued. Any advertising must in general be within the pre-war advertising expenditure average.

Mr. JACKMAN: It might seem like discrimination against the liquor industry if we were to prohibit them from advertising and not allow them to deduct this expense as an operating cost. However, I do not believe that this discrimination is unfair since in this resolution we are imposing an extra tax on the beverage trade because it is a beverage trade and not just a general industry. I see no reason why the minister should not give serious consideration to asking the beverage companies to eliminate advertising for the remainder of the war.

Mr. BENCE: I still believe we should endeavour to get a true picture of the whole thing and not allow distortions to go out from this house to the country in connection with this set-up. It seems to me that the quantity of labour and materials used is the important thing and not the total liquor bill. Can the minister give me the information I asked for a short time ago in connection with that aspect of the matter?

Mr. ILSLEY: I intended, when hon. members had finished speaking on the subject, to answer as far as I could certain questions that had been asked. I am informed that we have no figures of the total liquor bill of the Dominion of Canada. We have our own figures of the taxes, which I will put on the record, for the fiscal years 1940-41 and 1941-42, commencing with April 1 and ending with March 31. The figures for the fiscal year 1940-41, for spirits matured, were $16,587,986.19; 1941-42, $20,603,180.60, an increase of $4,015,194.41; spirits unmatured, 1940-41, $1,107,964.96; 1941-42, $1,391,126.11, an increase of $283,161.15. Those are the excise duty collections. Then validation fee, 1940-41, $664,778.37; 1941-42, $416,575.72, a decrease of $248,202.65; malt, 1940-41, $16,801,739.80; 1941-42, $25,241,291.31, an increase of $8,439,551.51; beer, 1940-41, $324,003.60; 1941-42, $414,018.60, an increase of $90,015. There is a small item of malt syrup which is probably not worth including in the computation. The figures I have given are the excise duties on spirits, malt and beer, including the validation fee, which perhaps should not be classified as an excise duty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is on domestic production—the whole thing?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. It does not include the customs duty on the liquor imported. I have not the figures of the total sales within Canada, and I do not know just how they could be obtained. It would be simple enough to get the figures of the sales of the liquor commissions, but then there are the hotels, beverage rooms, wine shops, and so forth. The total figures are not available, and as far as I know they are not procurable.

Mr. BENCE: Would not the total amount obtained by producers from sales in Canada be available?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. Several of these companies carry on a soft-drink business as well as an alcoholic beverage business, and an export business too.

There is one point which perhaps I should mention. One may be misled by the huge figures one sees connected with the names of certain distilleries, such as Seagram's, Distillers Corporation, and so forth. Some of these distilling companies do most of their business in the United States, and yet all their business appears in the financial statements published in the papers. Those figures could be separated easily enough.

Mr. STIRLING: Before the minister leaves that point, would the figures of the eight liquor commissions not give the total sales to the public?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, because they would leave out the beverage rooms, hotels and wine shops, which do not purchase from the commission, and which would make a very large total.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Even without that, do not the sales of the provincial liquor commissions amount to a shockingly large sum? I wish the minister would deal with the larger question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the sales are going up pretty fast and that people are quite justified in being concerned, but the point is what to do about it. I have received a great many letters, so much so that I have felt that I am being manipulated into the position of being defender of the status quo in dealing with a lot of people who have written me from all over Canada. But it is not much use just to talk about the increase in the consumption of liquor without putting forward some constructive policy to deal with the situation. I have listened this afternoon for suggestions, and there have been some.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The most obvious one would be rationing.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I was beginning with the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman), who suggested that we stop advertising. That might be of some small effect.

Mr. JACKMAN: They put a terrific value on it, judging by the amount of advertising they do.

Mr. ILSLEY: But there are two values in advertising. First, it may increase the consumption of the product, or second, it may increase the consumption of one's own product at the expense of that of some competitor. Without knowing anything in particular about the matter, my judgment would tell me that the chief reason why the brewers and distillers advertise is to bring their own brand to the attention of the consumer so that he will drink theirs instead of the other fellow's.

Mr. JACKMAN: That is not why we eliminated advertising in Ontario.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what the experience was in Ontario, but it may be that that would be the chief result of the elmination of advertising.

Take Nova Scotia, a great province, I need hardly say. I have been reading the report of the speech of the hon. member for Mackenzie, and according to the figures he gave the percentage increase in Nova Scotia was greater than that in any other province. It was 35 per cent, as compared with 27 per cent for New Brunswick, and so forth. There may have been a reason for that—the war activity, the naval activity, the merchant shipping activity, and so forth in Nova Scotia, but I would point out that in that province you have a government headed by a prohibitionist. Perhaps I am taking liberties in saying that about Mr. MacMillan, but certainly if there is in public life an enemy of the liquor traffic I have always thought it was the premier of Nova Scotia. As a result, I think, of that fact the government of Nova Scotia has sharply curtailed hours of sale. I do not know what the situation now is, but I do not think they sell liquor after six o'clock in the evenings, or on Saturdays at all. They have no beverage rooms, nor will they permit the beverage system to be introduced. In fact a great deal of unfavourable publicity was given to the government of that province not long ago over a club which they closed there.

So there you have a government which is going, undoubtedly, just as far as public sentiment will permit it to go, under the impetus of a sincere desire to curtail the sale of liquor, and you have a 35 per cent increase there, higher than that in any other province.

The delegation whose representatives I heard presented four requests. The first was that liquor stores be closed at ten o'clock at night; or perhaps it was eight o'clock; the next, that no advertising of liquor be permitted; the third was that the beverage rooms be closed, and the fourth was that when the beverage rooms were closed there should be no wet canteen.

Two of those conditions already exist in Nova Scotia with, as far as anyone can see, no effect whatever in curtailing the consumption of liquor. I have never been able to understand why anyone had any ground for thinking that if the dominion entered the provincial fields and sought to superimpose dominion regulations on provincial regulations, the dominion would get any better results. No one advocates dominion prohibition; no one in any of the provinces where liquor is sold advocates provincial prohibition; and the view we have taken is that the regulation of the sale of liquor is a provincial responsibility. It is true, I think, that the crown in the right of the dominion could, under the War Measures Act, step in and regulate the crown in the right of the province. It would be a most disagreeable and friction-creating departure, I think, for the crown in the right of the dominion to undertake it; nevertheless, I think it has the statutory power. But is there any reason to think that the crown in the right of the province or the government of a province is not doing its duty as it sees it within the bounds which are set by public sentiment in the various provinces?

Mr. GREEN: What about the suggestions of the Canadian Temperance Federation, contained in that advertisement?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I am not in a position to argue those. I would have to give some thought to them, and I should not be asked to argue about them here. If I do improvise arguments, it may be held that I am going to great lengths to repel suggestions by well-meaning, patriotic citizens. But it occurred to me as the hon. member was reading them that the first suggestion, namely, that materials be rationed, will not affect the production of some spirits for two years, and of other spirits for four or more years. The spirits which are being consumed are being taken out of storage. There is a large amount of spirits already in storage, and the effect of rationing barley and other grains would be felt only in the fairly distant future.

Mr. GREEN: What about beer?

Mr. ILSLEY: The situation will be different as regards beer; the effects will be felt in two or three months. The policy which is being asked for is to create in the country a scarcity of beer and spirits, not to ration a product of which there is a scarcity on account of inescapable reasons, but to create a scarcity; and while it might work out all right, I would certainly think there would be the most awful time here with bootlegging that was ever had in any country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just why, now?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because there is plenty of raw material left out of which to distil and to brew.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are talking about home brew?

Mr. ILSLEY: The excise department is not out of the woods so far as the moonshine problem is concerned: it is seizing stills right along, and illicit distilling is going on just the same as it ever did. Hon. members to-day have talked about this not being a measure of curtailment, but a revenue measure. Well, it probably is primarily a revenue measure, although I want to remind the committee that last year hon. members were urging a higher tax on spirits and on malt, not as a revenue producer but as a method of curtailment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not recall that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. The hon. member for Mackenzie and others were urging it on that ground.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The public urged it.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the public urged it. I have been attacked and the government has been attacked from a hundred quarters because of our alleged tenderness toward the liquor interests in regard to taxation.

Mr. FAIR: The government's love for the liquor interests.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not think it was suggested that the government's attitude ever became sentimental in that way, but it was suggested it was nearly everything else.

With regard to the matter of a higher tax, if it is being urged to-day—and I am not sure that it is—it should be remembered that in the United States the federal rate on spirits is $4 a gallon. I believe that theirs is a smaller gallon. Hon. members can make the computation; the ratio is either four to five or five to six, I never can remember which. There is a proposed tax of $6, but if we get our rate too much above the tax in the United States we are going to have smuggling—a lot of smuggling.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What is the rate in the United Kingdom?

Mr. ILSLEY: The rate in the United Kingdom is terribly high.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is for domestic consumption, but not for export. There is no rate at all on liquor for export.

Mr. ILSLEY: If warehoused for three years or upwards, the rate in the United Kingdom, in British currency, is £4 17s. 6d. per gallon. But it would be inviting all kinds of trouble for us to impose rates on that scale.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Has the minister the rates for New Zealand or Australia?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not the rates for New Zealand or Australia. It must be remembered that a province has what is essentially a rate of taxation. It is a profit, but it is money taken by the provinces considerably in excess of the cost of carrying on the business. In effect it is a tax. Undoubtedly the provinces will charge a profit on the increase in the cost of liquor which has come about as a result of these higher taxes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It must be remembered that in England they have no taxes on the exported article, and that is a big part of their trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I understand it, there is no revenue from liquor manufactured in the United Kingdom and exported all over the world. That is what they have to sell. The situation in England to-day is that their whisky costs about a dollar a quart more than it does here.

I am rather disappointed that the minister does not feel that there is any responsibility on this government. We have a large increase in the national revenue. That is going out to all and sundry, much of it to the people who are spending it on beer and hard liquor. I have felt that a larger proportion of that national income which is now going to the liquor trade and the provincial governments ought to be switched to the war effort; and the only method adopted by the government here is to raise the excise and the import duty by $2 a gallon. I have no doubt that that will bring in the amount of the estimated increase of revenue which the minister suggests, but it will not deal with what is now a pressing problem.

The minister says we shall have to leave the matter to the provinces. Well, notwithstanding the certificate of character he has given Mr. MacMillan, I am afraid that gentleman is in the same position as most of the other provincial governments. They need the money and this is the easiest possible way in which to get it. If that is the position the minister takes, it is too bad. This government undoubtedly has a great deal of power to deal with this matter. You can ration the amount of Scotch and Irish whisky that will be imported from the old country. There is no question about our power to do that. You can ration the amount that the provincial liquor commissions will be able to sell, and you can limit the amount the distillers shall take out of bond. It is all held in bond until the excise duty is paid. This government has power to ration in a very large way, not to say that a man shall be able to buy only three bottles of liquor or one bottle of liquor a week, as they did in Newfoundland, which would be in effect putting a restriction on the liquor commissions and therefore on the provinces, because the commissions are simply agencies created by the provincial governments. This government, I repeat, has a great deal of power which it could use to cut down the consumption of liquor in Canada. The minister says that would immediately revive the bootlegger. I will tell him that in my province there is little illicit distilling going on. The day of the home brewer is pretty largely gone. They have been dealt with pretty severely in the past.

An hon. MEMBER: Maybe you don't get around among them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I confess I do not. I have not had anything much to do with anything of that sort for a long time. The only bootlegging I know of that ever went on in New Brunswick—and it did for a good many years—was the bootlegging on the part of people who bought commission liquor and sold it after hours. We do not have liquor stores open in the evening, no beer and wine stores, and I hope we never shall. But the bootlegging that goes on is winked at. I took occasion to call up the chief liquor commissioner himself and I told him about a particular case. What was the answer? He said, "You will have to produce the evidence to me." I replied, "I am going a long way when I call attention to this and I am certainly not going to be a detective for you. I give you the name of the party who is doing the bootlegging and you can go after him." I also called up the chief of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who was responsible for the enforcement of the liquor law in New Brunswick. The mounted police have taken over the whole service. Complaint had been made to me with respect to an individual in a certain village some distance from the city of Fredericton who was bootlegging commission liquor, not after hours, but at any time, because there is just one liquor store in the whole of the county of York. I saw to it, that as far as I was concerned no liquor stores would be opened in any other place in the community except Fredericton, and the present provincial government observed that.

Mr. MAYBANK: How many bootleggers are there, besides the store?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not many.

Mr. MAYBANK: How do you know?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know personally. The hon. member puts the question to me and cross-examines me, but I cannot give definite information. I can say, however, that the illicit bootlegging has been very limited. When I put the matter to the commissioner of mounted police, he said, "What evidence have you?" I answered, "It is not my place to get evidence; it is your business to get it when I tell you it is available. All you have to do is to send a plain-clothes man to a certain place and you will get the evidence." He did so and the fellow spent the next Christmas in gaol where he ought to have been. That is the kind of bootlegging there is in New Brunswick, the bootlegger who operates after hours, and it is very limited.

I believe the minister would get cooperation from New Brunswick. Public sentiment there is such as would compel the commission to make it harder to get liquor. I am alarmed about the evidence I see of sales to young soldiers. That is what is on my soul to-day. I went into Fredericton a week ago on Saturday afternoon. I got home at noon, or before noon, and on Saturday afternoon there was a continuous procession of young men in uniform going to and coming from the liquor commission store. It was mostly beer, I should judge, but they were carrying it by the dozen. That is where I think the huge increase has been, because in our part of the country we have no war industry and no large increase from the national revenue. The principal part is in connection with young soldiers. It is, I admit, a problem. At the training centre Colonel Brooks does not allow a wet canteen, but across the way a block distant there is a wet canteen. And there is complaint. In one place you can get beer and in the other place you cannot, so that anyone who does not feel responsible throws up his hands and says, "Let it go; it is not my funeral; it is not my obligation."

I try to deal with the matter from the larger point of view as a national problem. Here is vast consumption of liquor. I think something should be done, and this government can do something. First of all, I suggest negotiation with the provincial governments to see if something cannot be done to reduce the huge quantities that are sold. An hon. member says something about advertising. I have noticed a magazine called the New World, filled with gorgeous advertising of liquor put out by certain interests close to the brewing interests. If you want to be fair about Mr. Taylor, and the dollar-a-year men, he has not been a dollar-a-year man for some time. I ran that story down, and I was satisfied that the beer shipped to Libya was shipped as a result of a request from overseas. They could not ship it from Britain. The soldiers think they have to have their beer in Libya. The British Tommy says he must have it; he will not be deprived of it. Some people look on beer as food; here it is a beverage, not a food at all. Perhaps it is the soldier's luxury. I am not so much concerned about the consumption of beer as I am about the consumption of hard spirits. I think we could get along without that in this country. It could be drastically reduced with beneficial consequences. The minister himself has some responsibility. I am not going to make an issue of this matter, and probably I have said more than I intended to when I rose, but I do think something must be done. The situation must be grappled with, and this government has a responsibility. Certainly the provincial governments have their responsibilities, and perhaps the public discussion here will focus attention on the matter. The publicity from this debate will probably show to the provincial governments that, so far as there has been an expression of opinion in this house, we are nearly all in agreement here. The problem should be grappled with; the duty is partly on this government and partly on the provincial governments.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know if I have much to add to this discussion. I was in at the earlier part of the discussion, and I think I agree pretty much with what the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Mackenzie and others said. But while the discussion was good in itself there was not much in the way of constructive suggestions as to how the consumption of liquor might be reduced. I do not think it is strange that there should be a large increase in the consumption of liquor at this time, because where large aggregations of people meet and have little to do except try to amuse themselves, it is quite understandable that there would be a large increase in the consumption of liquor.

After thinking about this matter or being in a position where I could think about it for many years, and having been at one time a believer in prohibition, I am now almost convinced that people who want to curtail the consumption of liquor are attacking the problem from the wrong angle. They are attacking it from the moral point of view, but I do not think we shall ever get anywhere in that way. I believe that a great deal could be done to-day if the matter were attacked from the health point of view. The people of this country to-day are becoming generally health-conscious. I believe that the harmfulness of drinking liquor could be emphasized in that way, with a regular campaign of education carried on to show the young men and young women the harmful effects of liquor. As I go home along Bank street every evening I pass a certain hotel about a quarter past eleven o'clock when the people are coming out, and it is a common occurrence to see young men and young women coming out drunk and falling against the wall. Anything that could be done to put a stop to that should be done. I am satisfied, however, that it cannot be done by prohibition or by dealing with the matter from the moral point of view.

A few years ago I had the good fortune to be able to make a visit to Europe, and I was astonished to see how common it was to have liquor in every eating-place, even in the northern cities, the Scandinavian cities.

It seemed to me that there was less drunkenness than one sees in this country. I believe our system of beer parlours is one of the worst possible ways of dispensing of liquors. I think it would be a good thing if light wines were served in restaurants rather than that people should have to go to a beer parlour and sit down and swill beer without anything much else to attract their attention, except the rather second-rate conversation that goes on. I agree with the hon. member for Rosedale that advertising should be reduced. But along with that there should be a health compaign teaching people the harmful effects of liquor. This would do much more to curtail the consumption than anything else.

I noticed in the papers to-day that the director of national selective service says that non-essential industries may have to close down because he says some 250,000 workers will be needed within the next five months. Among the non-essential industries that could be restricted are those of brewing and distilling.

Mr. GREEN: Has the minister given any consideration to making a direct appeal to the Canadian people? There is no doubt that much of the money that is spent on liquor could be spent for bonds and war savings certificates. When there was a shortage of sugar an appeal was made to the people to restrict its use, and the same with gasoline. Of course both were eventually rationed. But it might be helpful if an appeal were made to cut down the consumption of liquor. I am sure thousands would listen to that appeal if it were put forward with the authority that a government appeal would carry.

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion is worthy of consideration. I do not know how far my duties go in regard to such appeals, but perhaps the government—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister should ask the people to spend the money on war savings certificates.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but I am pretty careful not to select particular commodities, unless on economic grounds; by that I mean with a view to saving and making available specific materials, such as steel, for example. The saving here would be very little. As the hon. member for Vancouver East said, the impetus behind the drive here is a moral impetus for the most part, it is persons who believe in prohibition, who have done so for years past, now coming forward—

Mr. GREEN: That is very important.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. They now come forward and say, "You should now have prohibition or curtailment, whatever may have been the case in time of peace." The suggestion of the hon. member can be considered; that is all I can say.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: This matter is, I think, indirectly concerned with the budget. I do not think any hon. member feels that it is specifically a matter for the Minister of Finance. It is a matter for the government. I think we all realize that the use of liquor cannot be done away with. You cannot, by taxation, stop people from drinking liquor, although you may be able to curtail the amount used. I think we must recognize that the sale of liquor cannot be legislated out of existence or regulated out of existence.

There are, however, some facts of which I believe the government—not particularly the Minister of Finance—should take cognizance. We have been shown this afternoon the comparatively great increase in the amount of money spent on liquor. As has been said, that is probably to be expected. Whether it is or not, many of the best people in this country are worried about it. They are not necessarily teetotallers or churchgoers, but the people who constitute the backbone of society in this country are worried about the situation in regard to the use of liquor during war time.

The second factor is that no one for a moment believes that the federal government cannot control liquor if it so desires. In view of the controls that have been exercised by the government in relation to human necessities, it is simply useless to tell the general public that the federal government has not power to control this industry if it so desires.

The third factor I think the government should take into consideration is an idea which I find very widespread in the community from which I come; that is, the idea that in some way the government is protecting the liquor interests. I have no reason to believe that is true; I have no proof, any more than anyone else has, but there is the opinion abroad to-day among the thinking people of this country that the government is supporting and protecting the liquor interests, and that is bad for the morale of the people.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made a suggestion which I thought was extremely important. Within the past six months I have noticed that in the city of Toronto, in nearly every street car, in our buses and on our billboards, the most captivating signs supporting the war effort bear underneath them the name of some brewery. I believe in Ontario we have a law that prohibits liquor advertising, but everywhere in the city of Toronto you will find the most captivating, interesting and artistic advertising put out in the interests of the war effort bearing the names and addresses of some breweries. I think that is uncalled for. It is annoying to a great mass of well-intentioned, patriotic citizens, and I believe that is something to which the government might well pay attention.

I do not know what can be done by way of control. I think if control or rationing is applied it will have to be done with reason, because I am convinced that this is a matter which must be studied. No one in this country, even the most ardent temperance advocates, would like a return to bootlegging on a large scale; and I think any control or rationing should be not so much from the moral point of view but rather, as has been suggested, as a war effort. The hon. member for Waterloo South spoke of the amount of money spent on liquor, of the amount that went for material, for labour, and so on. The point there, it seems to me, is that most of these materials, most of that labour, all the rubber and gasoline used in the distribution of these goods, are required to-day for more essential war purposes, and I think it is on this basis that we should appeal to our public. Certainly the suggestion is sound that any effort in this direction should be accompanied by an educational programme. I have yet to see any information emanating from the department of public information urging people to be patriotic and drink less beer, or anything along that line. I think it only reasonable to suppose that a great many of our people, if they could be shown that the consumption of beer during war time is unpatriotic, would bring about a voluntary reduction in that consumption without need for much government regulation. I believe a programme of that kind would contribute materially to our war effort, at least as much as a great deal of the information being sent out by that department.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is it the attitude of the government in connection with this tax on spirituous liquors and malt and beer that they are taxing a luxury, or do they look upon this as a source of revenue, or is the tax intended to curtail civilian expenditure on non-essential goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be a combination of all those factors.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the government consider, then, that malt and liquors are a luxury, and that beer is a luxury in exactly the same way? I see that the increases are approximately the same. The increase on spirits distilled in Canada is from $7 to $9 per proof gallon, while the excise on beer and malt liquor brewed in whole or in part from any substance other than malt is increased from 35 cents to 45 cents per gallon.

Mr. ILSLEY: The beer tax mentioned by the hon. member I feel sure must be very unimportant. The important tax is the duty on malt, which is increased from 12 cents to 16 cents per pound.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And how about the attitude of the government with regard to spirituous liquors?

Mr. ILSLEY: I find it hard to define an attitude in precise language.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well, would you call spirituous liquors a luxury?

Mr. ILSLEY: That would be a matter for the individual; he can decide what he wants to call it.

Resolution agreed to.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

2. That the duty of excise on Canadian brandy be increased from six dollars to seven dollars per proof gallon, provided that duty paid Canadian brandy owned by any distiller at the close of business on the twenty-third day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two shall be subject to the following additional duty of excise on every gallon of the strength of proof one dollar and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose this increase is in conformity with the increase in the excise duty on spirits? It seems to be a little more.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not as great.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it upon the value? What is the basis?

Mr. ILSLEY: Canadian brandy has been given a lower rate in the past than ordinary spirits in order that the rate should be the same as that applying to imported empire brandy. A further $1 preference as compared with ordinary spirits is being allowed this year in order to assist to some extent in taking care of a difficult grape supply situation in Ontario. Thus, under the proposed rates, where domestic spirits will have a $9 rate and imported commonwealth brandy an $8 rate, domestic brandy will pay only a $7 rate.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That the duty of excise on beer or malt liquor brewed in whole or in part from any substances other than malt be increased from thirty-five cents to forty-five cents per gallon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this an important item?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, very unimportant.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the duty of excise on malt manufactured or produced in Canada or imported be increased from twelve cents to sixteen cents per pound.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very important item, in both quantity and the amount of increase. I understand that the pre-war excise duty on this commodity was six cents a pound; in September, 1939, this was increased to ten cents; in April, 1941, it was increased to twelve cents, and now it is to be made sixteen cents. Has this increase all been passed on to the public, or will the brewers absorb part?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been no increase in the price on account of the increase from twelve to sixteen cents a pound.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is anticipated?

Mr. ILSLEY: The practice will probably vary as between the provinces; it will depend to some extent upon what the liquor commissions do. I expect that the brewers will pass on all, if they can.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the brewers not absorb some of the last increase from ten to twelve cents? I am thinking about the consumer. He is entitled to some consideration, even if it is beer.

Mr. ILSLEY: The brewers absorbed part of the increase from ten to twelve cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was the increase per dozen bottles of beer as a result of the last increase?

Mr. ILSLEY: If all of the increase from ten to twelve cents had been passed on, it would have resulted in an increase of about six cents a gallon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the brewers not increase their price by about ten cents per dozen bottles?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister not think that these increased taxes on liquor and malt will bring into effect the law of diminishing returns?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think they will cut consumption down a great deal. I would not mind if it could be cut down to some extent. However, there is so much money in the hands of the public that the law of diminishing returns does not operate very powerfully. There will be more results from the increased income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will have an effect, not the excise tax itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: Plus the excise tax itself. If anyone who has paid $5 for a bottle of whiskey finds that he must pay $6 or $6.50 and then has in mind his income tax, he may not buy so many bottles.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My feeling is that the fellow who could pay $5 for a bottle will pay $6.25. There will be no curtailment of beer drinking as a result of this increase. A total of $9,000,000 comes into the treasury in a full year, and I do not suppose the minister anticipates any curtailment in the drinking of beer.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be some.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the duty of excise on malt syrup manufactured or produced in Canada be increased from eighteen cents to twenty-four cents per pound and malt syrup imported into Canada and entered for consumption be increased from thirty cents to forty cents per pound.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is merely consequential upon the others.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That the duty of excise on Canadian raw leaf tobacco when sold for consumption be increased from ten cents to twenty cents per pound actual weight.

Mr. SENN: I am a little bit exercised over this increase in the excise duty on raw leaf tobacco. A lot of flue-cured tobacco is grown in Ontario, particularly in the southern counties, and a considerable industry has grown up. For some time we have been growing what is known as Burley tobacco in considerable quantities. This industry brings in a good deal of money to the farmers in three or four counties along the shores of lake Erie, and I am just wondering whether this increase in duty will not have some effect on prices paid to producers. At the present time prices paid for tobacco are determined every fall at a conference between a certain producers' association and the processors, and I am afraid that this increase will perhaps give a handle to the processors to beat down the price to the producers. There is not only an increase in the excise on raw leaf tobacco; there is also an increase of one cent per five cigarettes, 25 per cent on cigars and a cent per pound or part of a cent per pound on manufactured tobacco.

I should like to have an assurance from the minister that this increase is not going to interfere with the price the producer will realize.

Mr. ILSLEY: This item would not apply to the sales of which the hon. gentleman is speaking. Those sales are not to the consumer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are to the manufacturer, but the ultimate effect is that the cost of the raw materials to the manufacturer is increased, and he will try to take it out of the primary producer if he can. While I do not know whether the price ceiling applies to tobacco or not, there will be an attempt to try to keep the price-ceiling structure level all along the line, and I would be fearful that this increase would come out of the primary producer. That is what has happened in other lines of endeavour, and I am afraid that we shall see history repeating itself.

There is another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the committee. There is an increase of 100 per cent in the tax on raw leaf tobacco. That appears to be a very steep increase in comparison with the excise tax on cigars, cigarettes and manufactured tobaccos which are dealt with under resolutions 9, 10 and 19 of the Special War Revenue Act. This raises an interesting point. Heretofore cigarettes and manufactured tobacco have been taxable only under the Excise Act, and an excise duty has been levied rather than an excise tax. Now it is proposed that in addition to the excise duty on cigarettes and manufactured tobacco, levied under the Excise Act, there shall be levied an excise tax under the Special War Revenue Act. I should think that there would be confusion as a result of that action, and I think the minister is called upon to justify the confusion which will unquestionably result from the introduction of this new principle in the taxation of tobacco and cigarettes. I would have thought that simplicity, ease of collection, efficiency of audit and such considerations would dictate that the increases should be increased in duty under the Excise Act rather than the imposition of new taxes under the Special War Revenue Act. I wonder whether the minister's action in this regard, imposing a new tax rather than an increased duty, has anything to do with the maintenance of the price ceiling. I would assume that that is correct, but I doubt very much whether any such considerations outweigh the disadvantages which will, in my opinion, accrue from levying an excise duty and an excise tax upon the same commodities. It is axiomatic that an excise duty is a much simpler and easier means of taxing any commodity than an excise tax.

I believe that there are now two branches of the excise division of the Department of National Revenue, the excise duty branch and the excise tax branch. Will there not be duplication and overlapping in the administration of the new proposals? I would have thought it would be much more satisfactory if the means had been adopted of increasing the duty in preference to imposing the new tax. I think the minister ought to justify this change.

Mr. ILSLEY: The administration is by the same division of the Department of National Revenue. It is administered by the commissioner of excise. I do not think there will be any duplication. It was considered desirable to keep the new tax separate in every way from the excise duty. The excise duty is reckoned in the price of cigarettes for price-ceiling purposes. The new tax is a separate tax, announced to be on a different basis, and not to be reckoned in the price of the article for price-ceiling purposes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So as to preserve the sanctity of the price ceiling—just another dodge to preserve it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the word "dodge" is objectionable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right—another example of the trial and error method.

Mr. ILSLEY: We thought it was desirable to put a tax on the cigarettes in the box. It is a stamp tax applicable to the cigarettes in the box. While the tax is collected from the manufacturer, it is easily identifiable as being a separate tax imposed by this budget. It has been announced that it has nothing to do with the price-ceiling policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is imposed in this way so that the price of cigarettes will not be further raised beyond the actual amount of the tax. That is the real truth of the matter. But what care is the minister going to take to see that the primary producer gets as much after this tax of 10 cents is imposed as he got before?

Mr. ILSLEY: The tax of 10 cents on raw leaf tobacco does not apply at all to raw leaf sold to manufacturers. It applies to raw leaf which is sold to consumers, and which comes into competition with manufactured tobacco. The logical thing to have done would have been to increase the duty by the same number of cents per pound as the duty on manufactured tobacco was raised, but that would perhaps be a little too hard on the primary producer. The increase in the rate on the manufactured tobacco is 16 cents. That will be found in the Special War Revenue Act resolutions. I think that at first we proposed to make it the same, that is, an increase from 10 to 26 cents, but we thought that was a little heavy, and so we made it 10 cents. It certainly would have to be increased 10 cents to preserve the competitive situation between sellers of raw leaf to consumers and sellers of manufactured tobacco to consumers.

Mr. SENN: How much revenue does the minister expect to derive from resolution No. 6 of the Excise Act? How much raw leaf tobacco is sold for consumption?

Mr. ILSLEY: Last year we collected $345,000, and this year we shall collect twice that amount. The estimated increase is $350,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If it is coming out of the consumer I am satisfied, but if it is coming out of the producer I am against it. Will the minister give consideration to this request, that if he finds after one year's experience that any portion of this increase comes out of the primary producer he will reconsider the tax another year? It would be a great pity if it came out of the primary producer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The commissioner of excise is in front of the minister, and I hold them both to that bargain.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution 7 agreed to.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act and to provide:

1. That the tax on telegraph dispatches be increased from five cents to seven cents upon each dispatch transmitted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much is expected to be obtained from this tax, and what were the considerations that actuated the minister in dealing with these, what I would call, nuisance taxes? Is not a tax of 5 cents enough on a telegram? It seems to me that that is a reasonable tax and that it should have been left as it was.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is all a matter of judgment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the test, I suppose.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount expected for the full year as the revenue from this increase is about $250,000. The amount expected for the remainder of the year is $190,000. The revenue under the present tax for 1941-42 was $574,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is quite substantial, is it not? All right.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That the tax on long distance telephone calls be increased from 10 per cent of the charge made to 15 per cent; provided, however, that upon long distance telephone calls made from any public pay station there shall be paid in lieu of the tax hereinbefore provided for, the sum of 5 cents for each such call for which a charge of more than 15 cents and not more than 45 cents is made, and 5 cents for each additional charge of 35 cents or any fraction of 35 cents; and provided further that the tax imposed shall in no case be greater than 75 cents on any one call.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If this were not war time I would oppose it. It is a 50 per cent increase, and it discourages the use of this public utility, which is being taxed tremendously in every way. I suppose it is a big money-maker for the government, and it is easy of collection. It does not cost a cent for the government to collect; the telephone companies have to keep the accounts and collect and remit. On a telephone call a tax of 15 per cent up to a maximum of 75 cents on any one call must run into a huge sum of money. During the depression years it would have reduced the use of the telephone by a very substantial amount. The telephone companies are under control of the public utility boards; they cannot raise their rates to meet conditions. They have to wait until they are given authority. I regret to see this increase. I suppose it is necessary to get the money. After all, the public using the utility pay it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister say how much he got out of the 10 per cent charge last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimated revenue from the increased rate for a full year is $900,000; the estimated revenue from the increased rate for the remainder of the year is $670,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is that based on? Last year's experience?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The revenue for last year was $1,571,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does this provision apply to telephones operated by the provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under what authority does the minister do that? Is it by arrangement or under special provisions?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a special provision in the act.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of twenty-five cents per month on each telephone extension in any dwelling house, apartment or other domestic establishment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think this is absolutely the meanest tax of the lot, and I am going to ask the minister to take it off. The extension of a telephone in a house is usually for the purpose of saving the feet of the housewife or the maid. The telephone companies charge for this service, and they charge too much. The mechanical apparatus does not cost very much. They charge, I think, 50 cents a month. This makes the cost 75 cents a month. That is a substantial tax on each telephone user, for a telephone which is installed, perhaps, for the convenience of aged people. A telephone in the house has now become a necessity. I am opposed to this tax. I do not know what the minister is going to get out of it, but of all the mean taxes that ever were imposed by parliament, this is, I think, the meanest. It is not imposed on business. In my business office we have five or six extensions: one makes money out of these telephones; a man absorbs the cost as part of his business expense. But this is a tax on a telephone which is put in to save one's wife from running up and down stairs. I suggest to the minister that he withdraw it. It is the only one I will ask him to take off. How much shall we lose if we do not impose this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimated revenue for the full year is $125,000; for the remainder of the year, $90,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, the minister will lose that much, probably three times as much, through the resentment of the housewives of this country. The women will say, "I am not going to buy any more war savings certificates if I have to take out my extension.

Mr. ILSLEY: Surely not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, well, they will take it out, human nature being what it is. The minister is making a mistake in imposing that tax.

Mr. PARENT: You are right.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have never heard from the telephone companies that it was their desire to do away with these extensions. They are always asking people to put them in.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no, there is a shortage of instruments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is only a temporary condition.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a mean tax, and I am against it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): When the minister made the announcement of the tax in the house, he said, "I don't care whether they leave them in or whether they take them out."

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not say that.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It is a tax on a tax: that is what it is. If you are going to have a tax on these extensions in business we shall have to take them out, and some revenue will be lost. After all, however, look at the matter from this point of view. Things are being made more difficult for people all the time; everybody has to cut down on household expenditures and so on, and now a wife in a family who had two maids and now has only one, or who had one maid and now has none at all, needs the extension for use while she is upstairs doing her job. It is only a small tax as far as that is concerned—twenty-five cents a month—but I think it is a disgraceful one. If there is a need of telephone instruments to be installed some place else, tell the public that you have to have them, and then you can obtain them from houses where there are two or three, or other places where there are more telephones than are needed. I ask the minister to take out this tax, or he will lose more revenue than he will ever gain.

Mr. McIVOR: I agree with the leader of the opposition that this is a mean tax, but I would like to ask the minister what tax is not mean.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The tax on whisky!

Mr. McIVOR: There is one class of people whom this is not going to touch, and that is the class that cannot afford a telephone at all. There are quite a number of people who cannot afford a telephone.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Not many now.

Mr. McIVOR: The other thing that bothers me is this, if we cancel a number of these items where will the minister get his revenue? If I suggest that a tax should be taken off I should try to suggest some compensatory tax.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In answer to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, I have letters on my desk upstairs from three families who cannot afford telephones, but they have them in the house owing to the fact that there are in the house bedridden invalids who need telephones. They pay 55 cents a month for the extension, and with this extra tax of $3 a year it will mean that $9.60 has to be paid for extension service which is necessary as well as giving a little pleasure to the invalid. The downstairs telephone is, of course, required, and many a time during the past year it has been necessary to call the doctor. I suggest that the minister cancel this tax.

Mr. GILLIS: The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has partly expressed what I rose to say in the first place. This is really a tax on a luxury, and to invoke the name of the housewife, with all the sympathy there is for her, is certainly not an argument, because 95 per cent of them have no telephone in the house at all. There is no necessity for a telephone in every room, and therefore the tax is a proper one, with this exception. There are homes in Canada—not so many of them, but there are some where I think there should be an exemption; that is, where there is an extension for the use of someone who is bedridden. But there is no blanket argument on the ground that it is a benefit to the housewife or that it is a necessity, because it certainly is not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I support what the hon. member says in favour of an exemption for invalids.

Mr. McCANN: As I read this resolution, it applies only to dwelling houses, apartments and other domestic establishments and is not a tax on an extension in any business concern.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. McCANN: How about a professional man, for instance a doctor, who has his office and residence in the same building and has an extension for the convenience of himself and his patients at night? Does it apply in such a situation? The extension is paid for and well paid for, and it is a convenience not only to the professional man himself but to his clientele.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not consider that taxable. It is part of the professional establishment and not a part of the domestic establishment as such.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister consider the question in regard to invalids, to whom a telephone is a necessity? Surely it is as much a necessity to a bedridden person as it is to a doctor. We would appreciate a statement from the minister as to whether he will consider that question. In 95 per cent of cases it is a luxury and should be taxed, but for the bedridden person the telephone is a source of comfort not only personally but to those on whom that person depends.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not care to make an exception for such a small proportion of such a small tax. It would hardly be worth doing so. Moreover, it would be administratively difficult to draw the line between invalids and semi-invalids and those who are not invalids at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And there are rich invalids and poor invalids.

Mr. ILSLEY: We would get into all sorts of difficulty.

Mr. JACKMAN: I support my leader's contention with regard to the tax. It is not only a mean tax but also a nuisance tax. I do not think this house has sufficient sympathy with people who are now burdened with larger than six-roomed houses which they cannot get rid of because there is no market for them. Such people cannot adapt themselves very readily to the more restricted circumstances in keeping with their incomes after taxation, and they may have two telephones. With the present shortage of domestic help it means more work for the women in that class. The tax is a nuisance. True, the amount is only $3 a year, but that is added to the charge which the telephone company makes and which, in my opinion, is and always has been exorbitant. One year's rental is about equal to the cost of the instrument, but now the minister sees a loophole to enable him to impose another tax. It is unfair. Many business men have extra telephones in their living rooms in order that they may conduct business, receiving calls in the evening, and that involves a business charge which they cannot take into account in their business expenses. A great many people who formerly had a good middle-class income are now reduced to a very small income by reason of taxation, and it has been necessary for them to maintain a certain standard of living in order to earn that income. Now the minister comes along with this picayune tax which is nothing but a nuisance. I think he would be well advised to take it off. At a more appropriate time I may make a suggestion as to where he could impose a better tax.

Mr. BOUCHER: Why should there be a tax on a private telephone and not on a business telephone? One of the fundamental principles of taxation is ability to pay. A business is more capable of paying the tax than is a householder who has a telephone for the convenience of those in his home, and if it is purely a business proposition there are many reasons why the tax should be not on private telephones but on business telephones. The greatest percentage of extensions are for business reasons, but there are many other reasons than business for putting in an extension in a house. The difficulty of securing domestic help is one reason why the householder should have a telephone extension, and another reason is that there may be privacy in another room for business conversation. If the tax were intended to bring in revenue it would be better to put it on business rather than private telephones.

Mr. GILLIS: I wish to pursue further the question of exemption for invalids. I do not think the minister is right in regard to administrative difficulties in carrying out the exemption. The telephone company puts in the extension and knows the purpose for which it is required, and that is entered in the books of the company. The company makes the collection and will make the return, so that the whole matter is in its hands. If the minister could make a statement to the effect that consideration will be given to the question of exemption, on the basis of necessity, for those who are bedridden, I do not see why the exemption should not be granted.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have an extension telephone for the convenience of an invalid, but I do not think the solution is such as my hon. friends suggest. That would make it necessary for the minister to determine whether the extension was for the invalid or for other use. The solution I would suggest is to have a single telephone put in the invalid's room. I certainly agree with the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) that, if a person can afford two telephones, in view of the fact that we have to raise these moneys for war purposes this is a proper tax.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the minister considered the case of those who do not feel they can afford an extension but who have a plug-in, a hole in the wall where one can plug in an extension so that the telephone may be moved upstairs or downstairs. Is that taxable?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not considered that question. I do not understand that arrangement.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is where you can move your telephone around. That would not be an extension; it is simply shifting the site of the telephone.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That the tax on railway, vessel, bus and aircraft tickets or right of transportation be increased from 10 per cent of the charge made to 15 per cent; provided, however, that the said tax shall not apply on the charge for a ticket or right of transportation, if the regular charge is seventy-five cents or less.

Mr. REID: I protest to the minister that a great class of travellers is left out of this tax. A few minutes ago an hon. member said that all taxes are irritating. That is true, but there is no need to make them needlessly irritating. The fact that those having passes pay no tax makes this tax the more irritating to those who have to pay it. I know what I am saying may not be popular with members of parliament who travel on passes, but there are thousands in this country who travel on passes and that makes it the more irritating to the ordinary citizen who has to pay a tax on his railway ticket.

Mr. MacNICOL: Are soldiers exempt from this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, soldiers in uniform.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the minister's purpose in imposing this tax? As I have said before, there seems to be some confusion in his mind as to the primary purpose in regard to many of these imposts. Is the objective here to raise revenue or to withdraw purchasing power?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is certainly too much travel on the railways; that is, the trains are overcrowded. Something may have to be done about that, apart altogether from taxation. While I could not isolate a particular objective and say that is the only objective in this tax, I would say that it seemed proper to increase the tax on transportation for various reasons. We need the revenue, and there is too much travel on the railways. A great many persons travelling on the railways apparently can afford to pay a tax on their transportation, and if they do pay that to us, they will have that much less to spend on something else. So altogether it seemed to be a proper tax to impose. I am aware that there are objections to the tax. I am aware that there are some persons who simply must travel on the railways, and they will have to pay this tax even though travelling is a necessity for them.

Mr. QUELCH: Do soldiers' dependents have to pay this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. QUELCH: Is that fair, for instance, when a soldier's wife has to join her husband, who may be an airman and be transferred from one end of Canada to the other? It is true you are giving them a lower rate, but it is not their fault that their husbands are moved frequently, it may be every three months, say from Montreal to Winnipeg or Vancouver. Is she going to be taxed every time she moves? Surely soldiers' dependents should be exempt in the same way as a soldier is.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree with that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would direct the minister's attention to an apparent discrimination—or perhaps differentiation is the better word—in the tax levied on pullman or parlour-car seats as opposed to ordinary transportation. The tax on seats is increased from ten cents to fifteen cents, while the tax on transportation is increased from 10 per cent to 15 per cent. It occurs to me that there is a differentiation there that is hard to justify.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the person using the pullman or parlour-car seat ordinarily has to pay his transportation tax also, which is increased from 10 to 15 per cent. This simply increases the tax on pullman seats by the same proportion.

Mr. HANSELL: When was the 10 per cent tax imposed in the first place?

Mr. ILSLEY: A year ago.

Mr. HANSELL: Was there not a tax on railway tickets during the last war? There was. I was selling tickets during the last war and that was the time when the tax was first imposed. It was common knowledge that it was a war tax. When people came to buy their tickets they asked the price and we charged them a little more. "What is the idea?" they asked. "Well, this is a war tax." That tax has been on ever since the last war.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, that is not correct.

Mr. HANSELL: Then I will say that the war tax has since been increased to 15 per cent. Fifteen per cent on a railway ticket is a lot of money; it is not 15 cents as in the next resolution; it is 15 per cent on the fare, and that can amount to a good deal. I venture to say it will be a long time, perhaps a long time after this war is over, before this tax is removed.

Then the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) mentioned soldiers' dependents. This section is headed "Special War Revenue Act." A wife gives her husband to the services and then, if she wants to go somewhere to meet him, she has to pay a war revenue tax. I support the hon. member for Acadia in his claim that that is not just.

Mr. WRIGHT: What I have to say may not be popular, but I think it is entirely unfair that this tax should not be charged on those travelling on passes. We are charging this tax to soldiers' wives and we want to reduce travel; yet there are thousands of people travelling on passes who pay no tax at all. This tax should be extended to include those travelling on passes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is a similar tax charged to those travelling on the railways in Great Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think it would be interesting to know that in connection with this and other of these items. We would get some idea how taxes in this country compare with those in Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the United States the treasury proposals were to increase their transportation tax from 5 to 15 per cent. I believe the ways and means committee have recommended a 10 per cent rate instead. I am unable to say which rate will be finally accepted in the revenue bill.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would it not be possible for the minister to place a limit on the amount paid under this tax? The single fare to Vancouver, for example, is about $90, which means a tax of about $13.50, and if you buy a return ticket it comes very high. Some people have to travel, and have not this much extra money. It is a lot for them to pay, especially when members of parliament have passes for themselves, their wives and their families on which they do not pay the tax. I brought up this matter when I spoke on the budget, and I was severely called down by a number of hon. members for having done so. But I think hon. members should pay the tax on their passes, because it is those who are travelling on passes that are filling up our trains. There is no doubt about that. I have travelled to Montreal by both the lake shore and the other route, and about 40 per cent of those on the trains were travelling on passes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whenever we seriously considered taxing railway passes—and we have discussed this matter a great deal—it has always been represented to me that free transportation was regarded by a great many people in this country as one of the conditions of their employment, part of their remuneration, and that if we were to step in and tax those passes there would be a tremendous storm of protest. I am willing to consider the matter if there is a widespread demand here in the house, but I am afraid that if I were to say now that we would turn round and tax free transportation, for one member who has asked for it ten would protest against it. I am also afraid that in regard to the taxation of passes of members of parliament, for one member from a distant point, such as the hon. member for New Westminster, who would be agreeable, there would be ten members from distant points who would say it was most unfair to tax them so much more than the members who live near Ottawa. These are some of the objections that would be offered to any tax on free transportation. Those who work for the railways have always considered that free transportation was a condition attached to their employment. That is the point of view that has always come forward every time we have had this discussion, though I must say I have not had any representations from the men themselves. I am sure there would be a tremendous number of railway employees and members of parliament who would object to the taxation of free transportation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to point out one consideration with respect to the transportation of hon. members. A member of parliament does not travel on a pass which is issued as a favour by the railway. He travels free as a result of legislation of this parliament, which I think was placed upon the statute books to overcome the charge that he might be influenced by the railways in their handing out free transportation to him. Under this legislation he is under no obligation to them; in other words, he travels as a matter of right and not as a matter of favour. I think that is why the provision was placed in the Railway Act as long ago as 1917 or 1918. Those of us who have read the novel by Winston Churchill with regard to the abuses in the New Hampshire legislature in connection with free transportation will remember the revolution brought about by the publication of that novel. So much was that so that to-day there has been a great change in the handing out of free transportation in the United States. They are very much more restricted than we are; it is confined almost entirely to railway employees and their relatives.

With regard to railway employees I should say that from time immemorial the right of free transportation for the employees themselves, not only on their own line but, after a period of time, on other lines, rightly or wrongly is looked upon as part of the working conditions of the railway men. Perhaps the railways are very generous in this respect, but I think you would have a little revolution on your hands if you were to tax these passes. These are among our most patriotic people, and if transportation facilities are being taxed to their capacity the railways have the remedy in their own hands. At the Christmas holiday, and other times when railway communications were being taxed to the utmost by the movement of men on furlough, the railways just informed certain classes of relatives of their employees that they would not honour passes between certain dates, and there was not a murmur about it. I think we can leave that matter in the hands of the railways. In justice to members of parliament, however, I wanted to point out the distinction, that we do not travel on the railways as a result of any favour from the railways. That section was placed in the Railway Act to abrogate what I might call the humiliation of accepting a favour from a railway company, or of being under any obligation to a railway company in the matter of transportation, leaving members of parliament free to travel as a matter of right.

I would have no objection to paying a tax on my railway transportation, but I tell the committee that it would be a very substantial sum during the course of a year. Members of the cabinet would not be in as bad a position, because the country would pay their travelling expenses, and properly so, since they are, as a rule, travelling on official business. Not many of them, at all events during these days, travel for pleasure; and the members travel on public business also. If a member goes home on Friday evening and comes back on Monday morning, to say that he should pay a tax is, I think, not fair. Let us be fair to ourselves. Surely we get enough knocks from the public as it is. I feel like defending members of parliament against the picayune charges that are sometimes levelled against them, not very often but from time to time. Somebody will say with a sneer, "Oh, he travels on a free pass." He does not travel on a free pass at all; he travels as a matter of right, so that he may be free from any suggestion that he is receiving a favour at the hands of a railway company. I know the hon. member for New Westminster is very sincere about this matter; he has advocated it a good many times, and there have been times when I have thought that the relatives of the railway employees took pretty generous advantage of the free transportation provision. But they have grown to understand that this is their right, and I think it would take a long process of education to disabuse their minds in that regard. I am not going to urge that they be liable to payment of this tax; there are other ways of getting at them. They are a class of people who earn good money, and they will contribute to the war effort of this country.

Mr. DUPUIS: I should like to add a word in this connection. With regard to railway employees, I am of the opinion that the provision of free transportation forms part of their salary or wages, and I share the view of the leader of the opposition that it would be very unfair to tax them. But I should like to say a word on behalf of those who must pay large sums for railway fares, those who travel long distances. I think the hon. member for Peterborough West made a good suggestion in that connection, to which we should pay attention. I think there should be a ceiling on this tax in regard to long trips.

The return fare from here to Vancouver is about $200, and the tax would amount to around $30. A man is punished for living so far away from Ottawa or from his business. I should like to say a word for the relatives of soldiers or for the soldiers themselves. A boy who has enlisted may have his home far away from the point of embarkation. A mother who happens to live in Vancouver may want to see her boy in Halifax before he leaves, and I think a case like this should be exempted from the tax. I raise my humble voice to join with other hon. members and ask that something be done.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the tax on pullman or parlour car seats be increased from ten cents to fifteen cents.

Mr. McIVOR: The only thing wrong with this tax is that it is not high enough; it should be 25 per cent. The man who is able to afford a seat on a pullman and have other accommodation provided for him should have to pay extra.

Mr. SHAW: Why is the tax in this case so many cents, whereas in the other case it is a percentage? As I interpret this tax, if I were to go to Winnipeg and take a parlour-car I would pay exactly the same as the man going to Vancouver.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been ten cents for a great many years, and we just worked on the old section. My hon. friend would not take a parlour-car seat for a trip to Winnipeg or Vancouver; he would take a berth. In that case the tax of 15 per cent provided in the next resolution would apply. The average cost of a chair is sixty or seventy or eighty cents, and in that case a tax of 10 per cent would amount to only six, seven or eight cents. The transportation itself is subject to a percentage tax, and the berths are also subject to a percentage tax.

Resolution agreed to.

6. That the tax on berths in sleeping cars or on other sleeping accommodation on railway trains be increased from 10 per cent of the charge made to 15 per cent: provided, however, that in no case shall the tax imposed be less than thirty-five cents.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think the minister ought to place a limit upon these taxes on train travel or berths. For a man travelling from here to Vancouver it means a considerable amount.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I met the request of the hon. member for Peterborough West I would not suit the hon. member who spoke last, because we would then be making the charge to Winnipeg and Vancouver the same.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): This is a percentage charge.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has suggested a ceiling which would have the effect of equalizing the charges on long distances.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is the object here to raise money or to prevent people from using berths?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are several objects here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We should have it perfectly clear what we are doing. From what half a dozen members have said it would appear that they are not distinguishing between a tax, the object of which is to raise revenue, and a tax, the object of which is to withdraw purchasing power or prevent the use of materials. It is entirely imperative that we have this distinction clear when we are dealing with the items of the budget, unless we do not want to be reasonable and logical.

Resolution agreed to.

7. That the excise tax on cigarette paper be increased from five cents for each one hundred leaves or fraction thereof to six cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose this increase is designed to maintain the same differential between manufactured cigarettes and cigarettes rolled personally?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is designed to be a comparable increase, but whether it is I do not know. There is always a great deal of dispute between manufacturers of paper and tubes and those of cigarettes.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 8 and 9 agreed to.

10. That there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of one cent per ounce actual weight or fraction thereof on manufactured tobacco of all descriptions, except cigars or cigarettes, manufactured or imported into Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to know what we old smokers shall have to pay because of this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: The present rate is 35 cents a pound; the increase is 16 cents a pound, which makes it 51 cents a pound.

Mr. SENN: How much will that bring in?

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimated revenue from the increase in rate is $4,000,000 for a full year; for the remainder of the fiscal year it is $3,000,000. The revenue in 1941-42 was $9,861,000.

Mr. WHITMAN: Why are cigars exempt? Is there a special tax on cigars?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, somewhere else.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolutions 11 and 12 agreed to.

13. That paragraph (a) of subsection four of section eight-six of said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"4. (a) There shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of 25 per cent upon the current market value of all dressed and/or dyed furs,—

(i) imported into Canada, payable by the importer or transferee who takes the goods out of bond for consumption at the time when the goods are imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption; or

(ii) dressed and/or dyed in Canada, payable by the dresser or dyer at the time of delivery by him."

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the change here?

Mr. ILSLEY: This resolution provides for an excise tax of 25 per cent on furs at the point of dressing and dyeing. At the present time the sales tax applies to finished garments other than fur coats, that is, coats with fur collars and fur trimmings. That is the sales tax. Fur goods as such do not pay the sales tax, but the fur used in them has borne a sales tax of 12 per cent levied at the point of dressing and dyeing. Under the proposed changes the 25 per cent tax is a straight excise tax on furs, and persons now paying sales tax on garments with fur trimming will accordingly not be able to buy their raw materials tax free as in the past by quoting their sales tax licence. Fur goods as such will bear the full 25 per cent excise tax on furs used in their manufacture. The estimated revenue from the increase in the rate is $750,000 for a full year, and for the remainder of the present year it is $560,000. I cannot give an estimate of the revenue for last year because that was included in the sales tax.

Resolution agreed to.

14. That there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of 20 per cent payable by excise stamps on any charge for admission, cover charge, charge for meals, refreshment service or merchandise, or otherwise, which is payable by a person attending any dance hall, night club, cabaret or similar place of entertainment which provides a combination of any two of the following features:—

Dancing by patrons,
Sale of alcoholic beverages,
Entertainment by paid performers.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will churches and patriotic societies be exempt from this tax? There are many churches and patriotic societies across Canada which put on dances to raise funds for the church or for patriotic purposes, and I think they should be exempt from this tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be an exemption in the bill covering charitable organizations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They would hardly qualify as dance halls or cabarets or similar places of entertainment.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems to me that this resolution will require some little clarification in the bill. Does entertainment by paid performers include an orchestra? At the Chateau I see some of the younger members in the grill room, where there is an orchestra and a dance floor. There is a cover charge for dinner dances in the grill. I never dance myself, but if I should go there and have dinner, whether I get up and dance or not, would I be subject to this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is dancing and alcoholic beverages are sold there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Alcoholic beverages are not sold there. There has to be a combination of any two of these three features?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So if they sold beer and wine in the grill room where they have a dance floor and a paid orchestra and serve meals, that would come under this?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the only thing is not to go there.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would not any place where there was dancing by patrons and a paid orchestra be subject to this tax even if no alcoholic beverages were sold? You would not need to have entertainment by paid performers if you had the other two features.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not intended to include orchestras under "entertainment by paid performers."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The orchestra would not be considered paid performers. That is the point about which I was asking.

Resolution agreed to.

15. That in addition to any other duty or tax which may be payable under the said act, or any other statute, there shall be imposed, levied and collected from the consumer or user a retail purchase tax payable by excise stamps in respect of the goods mentioned in the schedule hereunder, purchased or imported by the consumer or user, at the rate set opposite each item in the said schedule, computed on the retail selling price, if the goods are purchased in Canada, and on a value which includes all other duties and taxes if the goods are imported by a consumer or user, provided that the said tax shall not apply to goods of which the total retail selling price or the total cost to the consumer or user is not in excess of one dollar, in the case of any item mentioned in subparagraphs 1, 2, 4, 7 and 8 of the said schedule, or not in excess of fifty cents in the case of any item mentioned in subparagraphs 3, 5 and 6 of the said schedule:—

1. Trunks; suitcases; bags and luggage of all kinds; purses; handbags; jewel cases; brief and catalogue cases; dressing and toilet cases; shopping bags, except paper bags; golf and other sports bags; all the foregoing whether fitted or not..... 25 per cent;

2. Clocks and watches adapted to household or personal use..... 20 per cent

3. Articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, including diamonds and other precious or semi-precious stones for personal use or for adornment of the person; goldsmiths' and silversmiths' products including all gold, silver, chromium or other plated ware and pewter ware..25 per cent;

4. Articles of all kinds made in whole or in part of ivory, jet, amber, coral, mother of pearl, natural shells; tortoise shell, jade, onyx, lapis lazuli, or other semi-precious stones 25 per cent;

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is here entering into the field of a retail purchase tax. Heretofore we have been clear of that type of tax. It resembles in its limited sphere a turn-over tax. I wonder how such a thing as this is going to be checked up. It will require a whole army of auditors to check up on this tax. Would it not be better to confine it, as we have to-day, to the manufacturer? I do not see how, in any event, the minister is going to check and collect this tax on stocks that are at present in hand. Under the other system he could collect on new goods that came in, but he is going to have a tremendous amount of difficulty in collecting this tax, and there is going to be a tremendous amount of leakage and losses. To do the thing properly you would require an audit of every retail establishment in Canada. Just to say that, indicates the difficulty of levying this tax on every item covered by this schedule. I think the minister ought to try to justify this tax on the basis of equity, and by that I mean the differentiation between small things. Why should cheap jewellery be exempted from the tax and candy be taxed? I say to the minister, if this is a proper tax, tax everything. I think I understand what his answer will be, that on small articles the cost of collection would be greater than the revenue that came in. Is not that the answer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would cost a good deal more than you would get out of it. That is the answer. This tax is in favour of Mr. Woolworth or Mr. Zeller, who deal in cheap kinds of merchandise. They will not be subject to this tax, but a reputable jewellery firm will have its business killed—people who are substantial business men in the community. I go along my own main street in Fredericton and see two old-established jewellers. One of them runs the finest store in town. I go up to the next block, and I see the cheap, tawdry jewellery that is found in the 5-and-10-cent store. The one who is taxed under this resolution is going to be put out of business, while the other fellow rakes in the shekels by the thousands and thousands on a multitude of small sales. I do not like this tax; I do not think it is fair. I do not see how in the world you are going to administer this tax on a proper basis. You cannot check it; you cannot control it. The only place to levy it is at the manufacturer's level, by adding the tax to the invoice. That is the way to do this thing: add it to the manufacturer's price. Then you will require returns only from a limited number of business people who will make correct returns. You will be saved the huge cost of auditing and of collection, and you will get an honest return from the manufacturer. He is not going to take any chance; the tax is added to his bill, and he collects it as part of his invoice. The consumer always pays. You can take it as axiomatic that the consumer has to pay these taxes. There is the odd case where the "squeeze", if I may use that term, is applied as between wholesaler and retailer; sometimes they are made to absorb part of the tax, but in nine cases out of ten the consumer pays these bills.

You are trying to do something which I think will be very difficult of accomplishment, especially under to-day's conditions. Where the goods are already in the hands of the retailer there will be endless trouble. If you collect from one you must collect from all, and if you do this properly the cost of collection is going to be colossal; you will need a whole army of tax auditors, and we have enough now. I suggest to the minister that the proper principle is the one he is applying to candy.

Mr. ILSLEY: This tax since it was announced has given me more trouble than any of the others.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I thought it would be a headache.

Mr. ILSLEY: For various reasons. I think that would be a fair description of it—a headache; and I am going to propose a change in the resolution. But I want to tell the committee in my own language the reason why I did not think we should impose the tax at the manufacturer's level. Once it was decided to impose a tax of this weight, which is heavy—25 per cent—at the retailer's level, it became apparent that to impose a tax of this weight at the manufacturer's level would mean that the tax on jewellery would probably be 66 per cent or something like that, because of the great mark-up there is on jewellery; and even if a tax of 50 per cent at the manufacturer's level were imposed, many of the consequences would be extremely serious.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To whom?

Mr. ILSLEY: To various persons interested. I will give the committee some of the consequences of doing that. In the first place, if there were any difference in the degree to which retailers had stocked up there would be a tremendous amount of injustice. For instance, let us say the leader of the opposition is a retailer and has a small stock, and I am a retailer—perhaps running a department store—in a big way, and have very carefully stocked up and have a heavy inventory, and a tax goes on at 50 per cent of the manufacturer's level. The leader of the opposition finds himself in an awkward position, finding himself carrying on business in competition with me, because he has to buy in at this high tax these goods which are very highly taxed, whereas my store is full of goods which are not taxed at all. The most serious discriminations would arise as between retailers, assuming there is a difference in the degree to which they have stocked inventories—and we are told that is the situation in the country at the present time. They are not evenly stocked in respect of inventories.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, they never are, are they?

Mr. ILSLEY: With a high manufacturer's tax that would create serious discrimination and injustice as between retailers.

Mr. TUSTIN: Would not that discrimination apply to almost everything that is taxed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, but in a very much smaller degree. If it were 10 or 15 or 25 per cent it would not make so much difference, but this 25 per cent at the retailer's level on this particular kind of merchandise is a very high tax on the manufacturer's level. In jewellery, I think it would be something like 66 per cent. That is one objection. Another objection to imposing the tax at the manufacturer's level is that all the inventories would escape the tax. We do not know how great the inventories in Canada in the hands of retailers are at the present time. The hon. member for Lethbridge took me severely to task the other day for not knowing. He said we certainly should know what the inventories were and where they were. I wish I did, but I do not. All we are told is that there are tremendous inventories, and a lot of these goods turn over very, very slowly. If we imposed a tax at the manufacturer's level I am sure that a lot of these inventories would be sold over the next year or two years without any tax being paid at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It depends on what they are.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Some of them are slow moving and some of them are faster moving. That is the reason why we have separated this tax into two classes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Could the minister explain the difference between increased inventories and consumer hoarding?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is another subject, and I think the answer to that query is not as obvious as it is in the mind of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister is talking about increased inventories, and I think what he says is true. I have heard of a certain big retail organization across the country with tremendous stocks in warehouses and so on. And we are asked to cut down on our buying!

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to get drawn off on that, but the answer is not as obvious as it appears in the hon. gentleman's mind. It is one thing for the consumer to hoard, and quite another thing for distributing agencies to see to it that consumers have goods available in fair proportions. I think that is the answer, though I have not given the question more than a few minutes thought. I have heard it asked as my hon. friend asked it and wondered if the answer was so obvious as people take it to be.

Another objection to putting on a very high tax on the manufacturer's level is that consumer purchasing is to a certain extent promoted.

After having said all that, I admit that the difficulties of imposing a tax at the retailer's level are so great that we should assume some difficulties, particularly in fairly quick-moving lines or the faster-moving lines, rather than plunge ourselves into the terrible administrative difficulties of trying to collect taxes at the retailer's level. For that reason I am going to propose that some be moved back to the manufacturer's level and some left at the retailer's level.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which are those?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been decided that in the case of items contained in resolutions 1, 7 and 8, the tax should be moved up to the manufacturer's level, and could be, without sacrificing too much revenue. At the same time the exemption in respect of items selling for a dollar or less will be dropped. This will reduce to some extent the administrative problems encountered in administering taxes at the retail level. The rate of tax which will apply on these three categories at the manufacturer's level will be 35 per cent instead of 25 per cent, which I may say will work out at something less than the equivalent of a 25 per cent tax at the retail level.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But a little less revenue per item?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I am willing that the effective rate of tax on the consumer should be lower than the equivalent of the 25 per cent tax at the retail level, because it has been represented that there is a large volume of buying by the armed forces in the goods and items included under resolution 1—trunks; suitcases; luggage, toilet cases, and so forth. In many instances these items have been purchased as presents for those going into the armed forces. On items which include jewellery, cut-glass articles, china, porcelain, and so on the tax is to remain at 25 per cent, payable by the retailer. I am proposing to simplify, as far as possible, the use of stamps in future. It is proposed that the stamp shall be placed on the daily recapitulation of sales of the taxed items, and this stamped recapitulation of sales shall be retained by the retailer at his premises for purposes of inspection by the revenue officials.

Mr. MacNICOL: A whole army to inspect it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be simpler than what we intended at first. In making these changes I have done my best to meet representations which have been made since these taxes were first announced—and there have been many of them—to the extent that I felt I could safely do, bearing in mind the purpose for which the taxes were imposed. It is difficult to estimate at all accurately the effect of the proposed changes, but the revenue from the eight categories of items should not be much different from that originally estimated, which was $7,750,000 for the full year and $5,800,000 for the remainder of the present fiscal year. I have here a motion that resolution 15 be rescinded and another substituted therefor.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move:

That resolution 15 be rescinded and the following substituted therefor:

(1) 15. That in addition to any other duty or tax which may be payable under the said act, or any other statute, there shall be imposed, levied and collected from the consumer or user a retail purchase tax payable by excise stamps in respect of the goods mentioned in the schedule hereunder, purchased or imported by the consumer or user, at the rate set opposite each item in the said schedule, computed on the retail selling price, if the goods are purchased in Canada, and on a value which includes all other duties and taxes if the goods are imported by a consumer or user, provided that the said tax shall not apply to goods of which the total retail selling price or the total cost to the consumer or user is not in excess of one dollar, in the case of any item mentioned in subparagraphs 1 and 3 of the said schedule, or in excess of fifty cents in the case of any item mentioned in subparagraphs 2, 4 and 5 of the said schedule:

1. Clocks and watches adapted to household or personal use..... 25 per cent;

2. Articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, including diamonds and other precious or semi-precious stones for personal use or for adornment of the person; goldsmiths' and silversmiths' products including all gold, silver, chromium or other plated ware and pewter ware..25 per cent;

3. Articles of all kinds made in whole or in part of ivory, jet, amber, coral, mother of pearl, natural shells, tortoise shell, jade, onyx, lapis lazuli, or other semi-precious stones 25 per cent;

4. Articles of cut glassware, crystal glassware, cut or not, etched glassware, metal decorated glassware or marble..... 25 per cent

5. Articles of china, porcelain, earthenware, stoneware or other pottery ware, except articles for use in the preparation or serving of food or drink..... 25 per cent;

(2) That in addition to any other duty or tax which may be payable under the said act, or any other statute, there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of 35 per cent on the sale price or the duty-paid value of the following items manufactured or imported into Canada;

1. Trunks; suitcases, bags and luggage of all kinds; purses; wallets; billfolds; key and card cases; handbags; jewel cases; dressing and toilet cases; shopping bags, except paper bags; golf and other sports bags; all the foregoing whether fitted or not;

2. Ash trays; tobacco pipes, cigar and cigarette holders; cigarette rolling devices and other smokers' accessories, not to include lighters, matches or tobacco;

3. Fountain pens; propelling pencils, desk sets and all other desk accessories.

Provided that in the case of items mentioned under subparagraph (1) the said tax shall not apply when they are manufactured expressly for a customer for his use in the operation of his business or profession.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think this is an improvement; I believe the minister got out of a good deal of difficulty with respect to operation and administration. I wish to ask him a question with respect to item 5—"articles of china, porcelain, earthenware, stoneware or other pottery ware, except articles for use in the preparation or serving of food or drink." Would that cover table china?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is exempted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is contemplated other than that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Porcelain ornaments, vases, et cetera.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Ornamental articles?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not articles of general utility.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: A few days ago a merchant advertised a sale of handbags at $1.79 each. A buyer went in and bought one of these and handed the merchant a five dollar bill, and when the change was given it was discovered that the merchant had charged more than $1.79. Asked why, he said the government had imposed a tax of 50 cents. In other words, he charged $1.79 plus 50 cents, but the purchaser received no slip with stamps on it. The purchaser did receive a slip with the total amount, but it bore no stamps. In what way will the government keep track of such sales? In most of the states to the south there is a turn-over tax, the equivalent of 3 per cent, from which they receive a large revenue. The state of Illinois receives about $50,000,000 a year. I am not advocating that, because I do not know enough about what a turn-over tax would mean here. Has the minister considered anything of that kind different from what I have quoted about the purchaser of this handbag, for which 50 cents extra was charged, and on the sales slip for which there where no stamps from which the government could receive anything?

Mr. ILSLEY: The tax should have been 45 cents, not 50 cents.

Mr. MacNICOL: I figured it at 44 cents, but the purchaser paid 50 cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: Ever since the budget came down there has been some confusion in the minds of retailers as to just what they should do. The instructions were that they should place a stamp on the bill, cancel that stamp, and present to the purchaser the bill with the stamp so cancelled.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was not done in this instance.

Mr. ILSLEY: In some instances it has not been done, and there has been some lack of uniformity in practice. Once this resolution passes, it will make clear what the practice is, and it is hoped that there will be uniformity in the future.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the department made any investigation as to stocks carried prior to the introduction of this resolution, by such companies as, for instance, Eatons and Simpsons, as compared with the stocks they carried at the time of the last budget a year ago?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. PERLEY: I am informed by some merchants that they cannot meet the prices owing to the fact that, as they believed, certain stocks were materially increased just prior to the coming into force of the budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as the tax at the retail level is concerned, it attaches to stocks sold to the public. That is the best reason in the world for fixing a retail tax. I would have stuck to it had it not been for the great administration difficulties and other reasons all along the line, but it is going to be more easily administered on jewellery than on some other lines which we have moved back to the manufacturer's level.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): With regard to the item as it appears in the resolution before us, "clock and watches"—I suppose that should be "clocks"—will alarm clocks be exempt? I ask that because they are a necessity to certain workers. The same applies to military watches presented to soldiers. Sometimes these watches have the names engraved on them. Are such watches exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Alarm clocks are certainly a necessity to munitions workers. Clock manufacturers are to-day regulated almost out of business because priorities have practically put a stop to their producing clocks and watches. They are almost out of business because they cannot get the necessary materials, and I think they should have some leeway.

Mr. ILSLEY: If that is the situation, that is the best reason that can be given, so that people will not buy them who do not need them. That is one purpose of the tax. Not all clocks and watches are by any means necessities.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is why I mentioned alarm clocks.

Mr. ILSLEY: At present the great majority of them are bought by persons who could get along without them. That is not so in every instance, but I do not think we can go round picking out those cases that should be exempt. I do not believe we can draw definitions or make rules that will be as accurate as that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What kind of help are you going to give the manufacturer if he is put out of business by this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: This will not put the manufacturer out of business. He will use what materials are available, make what he can with them and sell them all. The jewellers will sell everything they have; there is no doubt about that. This tax will slow up the sales to some extent I hope, put a little brake on the free purchasing of goods like this.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is the intention of the tax, to prevent the consumer from buying.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is one intention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish the minister would apply that all along the line. There are other things we can get along without better than some of these things; whisky is one, but I am not going to revert to that. I notice in the amendment there is a proviso at the end:

> Provided that in the case of items mentioned under subparagraph 1 . . .

That refers to trunks, I think?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury):

> Trunks; suitcases; baggage and luggage of all kinds . . . the said tax shall not apply when they are manufactured expressly for a customer for his use in the operation of his business or profession.

That was not in the previous resolution, was it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the reason for that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Repair bags for telephone men is an example. Some firms make lines which constitute quite a large percentage of their total output, which are required—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Commercial travellers' luggage, for instance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, if it is used for business purposes it is a business expense; it is not the idea to tax that kind of thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And doctor's bags and lawyers' brief-cases, they will be exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about the luggage of a member of parliament when he has to travel all the time? I wish the minister could see some of mine.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not know; I cannot give too many rulings.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to call attention to a principle in this resolution which I think is very unfair. I admit it is not new; it is found in many other statutes. I think it is important, particularly since this item is under the general heading "Special War Revenue Act." I think it is a fair principle to appeal to this committee on, that is to say, that war taxes should rest as equally as possible on every Canadian citizen. This tax is on the retailer's price. If it is an imported article, the 25 per cent ad valorem tax is added to the price including the duty and other taxes. It will be seen that persons who reside in the more remote sections of Canada are at a disadvantage as compared with those who live in the two central provinces where practically all these items are manufactured. In my province of Saskatchewan I do not believe there is a single item mentioned in the schedule of this resolution that does not have to be brought in from Ontario or Quebec or possibly British Columbia. The result is that the purchaser or consumer in Saskatchewan—I say Saskatchewan merely to give point to my submission—has to pay the 25 per cent on the price f.o.b. factory, plus freight, plus the mark-up, and that mark-up of course is made on the laid-down price in the merchant's store in Saskatchewan, with the result that the consumer pays considerably more because of the application of the percentage tax than do consumers in other parts of Canada more favourably situated. Or, if the article is imported, the same result follows; the consumer in Saskatchewan must pay the tax on the price including duty and taxes.

There are dozens of statutes in which that particular unfairness falls upon persons living in provinces other than Ontario and Quebec. It is often argued in this committee, I think without any attempt at contradiction, that the people of my province are peculiarly unable to bear that added tax. Yet this section imposes an added burden on those people simply because they live in a remote part of Canada where manufacturing industries are not located.

I would like the minister to consider estimating what the 25 per cent would amount to in cents or dollars and make the tax applicable in that manner rather than as a percentage. I would hope also that the minister would keep in mind the principle that the people who reside in the more remote parts of Canada are continually irritated by the application of the pyramiding system and having the tax imposed on the pyramided price. I think the minister should carefully consider this matter, in order that the people may feel that war taxes are being imposed on every citizen as equitably as possible.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to support the argument of the hon. member for Swift Current. There are many of these taxes that bear heavily on people resident in provinces like Saskatchewan. A year or two ago a tax was imposed on electric power. Our small local communities with their little power plants pay a terrific tax, while in this city, for example, where power is very cheap, the tax amounts to scarcely anything. Wherever the price is high, there you have the high tax. I think the hon. member's representation is valid. There was a time when we used to see goods advertised at so much more west of the great lakes, on account, we were told, of freight. It is true that the freight is a little higher, and other things are higher. As the hon. member says, our people are not feeling any benefit from war activity; we have no war industries in the province, and this form of taxation does bear very heavily upon regions such as he mentioned.

I can see the difficulty of adopting some other method, but I believe it could be worked out so as to be much more equitable. Our people on the prairies are feeling, and have felt for the past two or three years, that while there has been a certain measure of, shall I say, war prosperity in some parts of the dominion, the taxation increase to a very large degree bears more heavily upon them and they find it hard to bear.

Mr. PARENT: In support of the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current and the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar I should like to call to the attention of the Minister of Finance that we in the province of Quebec already have a 4 per cent sales tax which increases considerably the cost of these various articles. Besides that, we have the heavy taxation of our public utilities. I hold no brief for the power companies in the province of Quebec, but I believe something like $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 in taxes on these corporations is paid to the federal government, and that is shouldered by the consumer. So if the minister could see his way clear to heed the remarks of those hon. members, he might also have consideration for the situation of those in Quebec province.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to support what was said by the hon. member for Peterborough West with regard to clocks. As a matter of fact, when the hon. member spoke I was about to rise to deal with the same subject. Most of the people in my constituency are interested in alarm clocks, and I want to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that an alarm clock is not a thing of beauty; no one would ever purchase one for its appearance. It sounds even worse than it looks, particularly about half past four o'clock in the morning.

Mr. MacNICOL: Or even five o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes, or even five o'clock. I have no doubt the hon. member for Davenport has heard it on occasion, and it is not a nice sound, especially on a nasty morning. As I have said, no one would buy an alarm clock if he did not have to, and instead of having to pay a tax on it I think he should be given an alarm clock as a bonus, whenever he has need of one. For these reasons I think, as a special concession to those who have to do the sweating—I mean the physical sweating—in producing the sinews of war, if the minister cannot see his way clear to have alarm clocks given as bonuses, at least he should have them exempted from this tax.

Mr. SHAW: I am curious as to why a 25 per cent tax was arrived at in connection with each group of articles. As I examine groups 1, 2, 3 and so on, I find very little relationship between them. For instance, there is not much connection between the commodities contained in group 2 and those contained in group 3, while the articles listed in group 2 are probably more essential than those listed in group 6. I rather feel that unless there is some strong justification for setting what I regard as a flat 25 per cent rate, there should be some variation, taking into consideration the part played in the lives of the people of this country by the various commodities.

Mr. GRAHAM: I should like the minister to express an opinion, if he would be kind enough, as to why the tax could not be expressed in cents or dollars, striking a reasonable average as between retail prices throughout Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: If this were converted from an ad valorem to a specific tax, it would be impossible to say what number of cents or dollars a given article should pay. For instance, articles of jewellery range in price from a few cents to many thousands of dollars. One could not put a specific tax on jewellery of, say $1 per article.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, but you could make it a specific tax, so many cents on jewellery up to a certain value; so many dollars on jewellery up to a certain higher value, and so on, grading the tax. I know that is a cumbersome method, but I suggest that it would be better to have this taxation principle correct and equitable, in order to remove the dissatisfaction that exists as between the different provinces, even though it meant going to a little more trouble in interpreting the tax. I think it will be agreed that our taxation system has spread out so enormously that the department must be prepared to face a certain amount of trouble and difficulty in the interpretation and application of these taxes.

Mr. SHAW: I wonder if the minister would care to satisfy me, if that is possible, with respect to the setting of the 25 per cent tax in each case.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, we had a list of articles most of which people could do without, if they wanted to. We cut out a great many categories, after consideration, and these were left. The great bulk of these are articles the purchase of which, generally speaking, can be deferred. That is true of a great many of them, if not all. There is no scientific method of ascertaining the correct rate. Twenty-five per cent for each is just as likely to be correct as 25 per cent for some, 20 per cent for others and 15 per cent for others. It is just as appropriate as the 8 per cent sales tax over the whole range of goods, for example, and perhaps more so.

Mr. MacNICOL: If I understood the minister correctly a moment ago, he said that brief-cases of lawyers would be exempt from this tax.

Mr. MacINNIS: The clients will pay the tax.

Mr. MacNICOL: What did the minister say when the leader of the opposition asked whether brief-cases of lawyers were exempted?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an amendment which exempts articles included in the first item when used in business, or something of the kind; I do not know the exact words. It is a question of interpretation as to what that covers.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was what I had in mind. In that connection I wanted to ask if brief-cases or sample cases of commercial travellers, architects, engineers and a long list of people who have to use these articles in earning their living also will be exempt.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am told that brief-cases and catalogue cases were crossed out entirely.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, brief-cases and catalogue cases are crossed out.

Mr. MacNICOL: And engineers' cases?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know, I am sure. Do not involve me in too difficult questions of interpretation.

Mr. MacNICOL: Brief-cases of architects, and so on?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would need to have the item before me.

Mr. TRIPP: I support the principle that the tax should be collected at the point of sale, for many reasons which I do not think it necessary to point out. In group 6, however, I should like to point out that articles of china are included. There is very little china manufactured in Canada. The great percentage of the china sold in our stores is manufactured in Great Britain, and a very large part of it is reexported to the United States. We who live along the border between the United States and Canada do quite a business in selling china to citizens of the United States who come here for that express purpose, that is tourists who come to Canada quite often for that one purpose. They make a special trip for it, and we sell them china which is manufactured in Great Britain. That serves two purposes, and I think we should allow that china to go out of this country without paying this extra charge. In selling it we help the British people, who make it, and we obtain United States dollars. My suggestion to the minister is that for export purposes the tax on china should be dispensed with.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it would be pretty hard to determine whether or not a buyer was really a tourist. That is the trouble with making tourist exemptions. We gave some consideration to that, but we felt that it would be administratively difficult. It will be noted that china for use in the preparation or serving of food or drink is not covered by the item; it is only articles of china which are ornamental in character that are dealt with. I know tourists buy some of those, but I am afraid they will have to pay the tax like anybody else.

Mr. TUSTIN: The minister has announced that the tax on some of these articles is to be collected at the source, and in his remarks he said that there were large stocks of these articles in the hands of some of the large retailers. How is the tax going to be collected on the articles now in the retail stores? Will they be exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. TUSTIN: There has been a number of these articles sold and the 25 per cent tax has been collected. What is to happen about that?

Mr. ILSLEY: We shall have to validate that tax so that there will not be refunds.

Mr. ISNOR: Can the minister tell whether the delegation which recently waited upon him represented the larger or the smaller retail stores?

Mr. ILSLEY: A number of delegations have waited upon me, and I think all interests and all points of view have been represented. I think the smaller retailers have been adequately represented by the retail merchants' association of Canada. Mr. Hougham, whom I have known for some years, represents that association. Representations have been made by the small retailers, the large retailers, the wholesalers, the manufacturers and everybody but the consumers.

[Mr. Tripp.]

Mr. ISNOR: As a retailer I cannot follow the argument of the minister in regard to stocks on hand, nor can I see how it will be fair to the smaller retailer. The minister has said that there is no check up with regard to stocks on hand. If I am not greatly mistaken, he will find this information in the bureau of statistics. A merchant must fill out a form giving information to June 30, not only what he has at the end of June but his purchases separately for the months of January, February, March, April, May and June, and then his total sales as well. It should be possible to make a very close estimate of the stocks on hand as of June 30. I do not think the minister has looked into this matter as fully as he generally does.

Mr. ILSLEY: My advisers tell me that they could not obtain accurate information, but I am interested in what my hon. friend says.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think they must have slipped.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. It may be that moving some of these articles back to the manufacturer's level will not work very well for certain retailers, but it must be borne in mind that articles of a greater value are remaining at the retailer's level.

Mr. ISNOR: I do not know that I have a great deal of objection to your moving them back, but now that you have started it I think it would have been better to have left the seven or eight items as they were originally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The objection to that would be the cost of administration, and there would be all kinds of chiseling. There would be a great loss of revenue, great expense in administration and the taxes would be wiped out. My reaction to this resolution was that the simplest method would be to work on the manufacturer's cost. No doubt the minister and his advisers, subject to the one omission that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor) has indicated, have studied this question more than anyone else has found it possible to do. Perhaps the minister is justified in what he has said. However, having regard to the information I have and the growing scarcity of consumer goods, I think that if large purchases have been made by the larger retailers it must be known to the bureau of statistics. I make the prediction that within twelve months the shelves of the small retailers in this country will be bare; many of them are bare now. If you were in England you would be astonished at the lack of commodities in the small shops, but if you went to Harrod's or Selfridge's or any of the other large stores you would find that they were just full of merchandise. I predict that within twelve months Eatons, Simpsons and the other large stores will have huge stocks of consumer goods on hand, while the shelves of the small retailer will be bare.

Mr. REID: They say they are increasing their warehouses now.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That may be just gossip. I am going to ask the minister to get in touch with his colleague, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon), and ask him to reveal between now and three o'clock to-morrow afternoon the information available in his department with respect to the stocks of these commodities on hand. The senior hon. member for Halifax has indicated that this information should be available. The large stores are well stocked up, and there is going to be a tremendous discriminatory effect upon the small retailers of this country. They are going to be a war casualty; in fact, many of them are now. In addition, they have to pay higher income taxes.

Mr. REID: The big man has the inside track.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I said that, the minister would say that I was speaking politically, but perhaps the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) can say that to the minister. I do not like to throw out that kind of insinuation unless I have proof. If I had the proof I would say it; do not make any mistake about that. The large stores have an advantage because of their great buying power, and in addition to that they have better business acumen. They are able to look into the future with better results, and that is why they have grown.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any recent information as to whether the number of retail stores is increasing or decreasing? I have noticed lately when walking along the streets of Toronto that there are more stores vacant, which would indicate that many small merchants are going out of business. The smaller merchants upon whom I have called recently all tell me that they are going to be put out of business by the taxes being imposed upon them, and the number of vacant stores would indicate that something serious is happening. I do not know whether this budget will increase or decrease the amount of revenue when so many merchants are being forced out of business. It would depend on whether the number of retailers is increasing or decreasing. Has the minister any information on that point?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I have not, but I know that in 1941 the volume of goods sold by retail stores was 25 per cent greater than before the war, and the dollar value was about 50 per cent greater. There was a tremendous increase in business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because there was a great deal more buying power.

Mr. MacNICOL: My question was whether the number of retail stores was increasing or decreasing.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no information on that.

Mr. REID: I had no intention of criticizing the minister in my remarks about the big man having the inside track. What I meant to convey to the leader of the opposition and to the house was that men in the wartime prices and trade board who are connected with large concerns are in a position to know the exact situation about shortages and to advise their firms accordingly. I do not say that they are doing it, but they are in a position to do it, many of them being connected with large firms. But I had no intention of criticizing the minister for that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I misinterpreted the hon. gentleman. There is something in what he says. I have observed over a period of years the trend against the small retailer in our communities throughout Canada because of the chain store. It is a grave problem. The small retailer gives credit; the chain stores do not. The small retailer is a part of the community and takes part in the community life. But who ever heard of a chain store taking part in community life? I can remember that when I went to Fredericton forty years ago, we had five or six first-class grocery stores, big concerns which carried everything and did a huge business. The proprietors of these stores were among our leading citizens. They took part in every phase of our community life, and I have no doubt that the minister knows of a similar situation in his home town. To-day there is not one such big grocery store in Fredericton. They have all been driven out by the chain store. That is a factor in the life of our communities of which we must take note. I am just a bit fearful of this trend. I do not know just how you are going to curb it. I do know that by means of taxation and that sort of thing, attempts have been made on many occasions to curb this trend; but after all, before the war at all events, we were living in a land of free enterprise. The people do not have to support these chain stores, but they do, and I am just a little afraid that this taxation will accentuate the situation.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to return to the point I raised a few moments ago because I believe there is a very important principle of taxation involved. May I ask the minister if he recognizes the inequality that results from this type of tax imposition because of the pyramiding process in the application of a tax on a percentage basis?

Mr. ILSLEY: On some goods on which the cost of transportation is added to the manufacturer's price the consumer at a distance will undoubtedly pay more per article than a consumer in other parts of Canada who buys nearer to the point of production. But there are articles on which the price is equalized all over the country.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not so many.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps not many, but there are some, and to those that objection would not apply. I would point out that while that objection may apply to most of the articles in this list, our sales tax, which is by far the largest tax on the sale of goods, escapes very largely that objection because it is imposed at the manufacturer's level and does not include transportation. With respect to the electricity tax, which is small, and this tax, which is small—the total amount to be derived from this tax in a full year is only $7,750,000—it may be that a case, not a very large case, I think, can be made out, but I do not think it is a very large grievance. On grounds of strict fairness, however, as between consumers in different parts of Canada it may be said that a consumer at a place remote from the point of production will pay a little more per article. But that cannot be avoided if we are going to impose the tax at the retailer's level. On the bulk of these articles it must go on at the retailer's level. Otherwise the heavy inventories will escape and discriminations between persons with large inventories and persons with small inventories will arise. There would be an undesirable stimulation to consumer spending if we imposed a very high tax at the manufacturer's level, leaving the inventories in the retail stores untaxed.

Mr. GRAHAM: I raised the point, not because of the items covered by this resolution but because of the principles which, as the minister points out, are applicable to all measures of taxation. The application of my objection goes further even than the addition of the freight rate to the price at the point of manufacture, because there are certain trade practices such as mark-up. On jewellery, for instance, I assume that the trade mark-up by the retailer is likely 100 per cent. There is also a very high mark-up on furniture and many other articles which represents a very considerable percentage of the laid-down price in the store. This tax and other taxes of a like nature on the retail price are applied not only on the base price at point of manufacture but on that price plus freight and mark-up, and the application of the tax on that pyramided price is very unfair. I trust that the minister is quite aware of that inequity and that if he has a reasonable opportunity of removing it he will do so.

Mr. FAIR: What position will the western provinces be in as compared with the central provinces under this tax. It is well known that the central provinces are the manufacturers of almost all the things we buy in western Canada, and western Canada, the orphan of Canada at the present time, will be compelled to pay a higher price than the central provinces for the articles we are now discussing.

Mr. TRIPP: Am I right in understanding the minister to say that present stocks were exempt from this tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. The present stocks of most of these articles are taxable, and with respect to some I am proposing an amendment to move the tax back to the manufacturer's level, so that hereafter, after to-night, stocks of these articles in retail stores will be free from tax.

Mr. ISNOR: I think the hon. member for Assiniboia was anxious to have a clear understanding in regard to the large stocks of these articles now held by the larger retail stores. My understanding was the same as that of the hon. member, that what they now have on hand would not be taxed.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. ISNOR: I think the leader of the opposition has raised a very important point. I do not wish to take any strong stand against large stores, but it would appear to me that the smaller stores are labouring under a handicap in this respect.

Mr. MacNICOL: They certainly are.

Mr. ISNOR: It is a well-known and recognized fact that during the past two years, and particularly last year, the large stores have had buyers in the field buying wherever it was possible.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Trying to get whole outfits.

Mr. ISNOR: It will be shown, I believe, in the report which has been asked for that their stocks have increased to a marked extent. I might add, for the benefit of the minister, that if I remember rightly, the date on which this return is to be made is July 18. I do not see how it is possible to have the return compiled and sent in by that date. I wish to add my voice to that of the leader of the opposition in urging the minister to give this matter serious thought.

While the chairman may rule that what I am about to say has no direct bearing upon the resolution under discussion, I am going to point out something else. Smaller retailers throughout Canada, and particularly on the eastern coast, feel that discrimination is being shown in favour of the larger stores in the manner in which the parking and non-parking regulations are being put into effect. The large stores have the advantage of extensive parking spaces, while the smaller stores do not enjoy that benefit. It has been said—I do not say it—that this is due to the dollar-a-year men being in a position to affect directly traffic and other matters which work to the real benefit of the large stores. While this may have no direct bearing on the resolution under discussion, it may be one more little indication pointing to favouritism in so far as the large stores are concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far as I am concerned I want to facilitate the passage of the minister's resolution. But I would ask him, in view of the discussion which was raised here this evening, not to press this item but to go on to another one and, between now and to-morrow, when we meet again, have his officials get all the information available with respect to stocks in the big department stores—

Mr. MacNICOL: And the warehouses.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and in warehouses, at a certain stated period. I think this will be interesting and useful information.

I am not going to throw out any insinuations, but it is true that Mr. Burton's son is in charge of retail sales in the wartime prices and trade board. I think it would be better if he were not there. No doubt he is one of the best retail men in Canada, but do you not see where it gives an opportunity to question a man's integrity when he puts himself in that position. He is there as a dollar-a-year man; he knows what is going on; he is paid by his firm—one of the biggest retailers in the country. I am not making any attack on him at all, but there is the opportunity for a misunderstanding, and it seems to me that men ought not to allow themselves to be put in that position. No wonder there is criticism when an appointment like that is made, having regard to the ramifications of his own employment and the knowledge which he gets as a result of his dollar-a-year position. I just throw that out as a suggestion to the minister. I am not making any charge. No doubt he is one of the most conscientious men in the world. But these men leave themselves liable to charges by people who perhaps are not fair about it.

I ask the minister to get the information the committee asks for with respect to the stocks of the big retailers. If what the senior hon. member for Halifax says is correct, the minister can get it from the bureau of statistics.

While I am on my feet might I make this suggestion to the minister. Last year the sets of resolutions were not reported one by one as they were passed, but he reserved the time of the report until several sets were passed, and then introduced the bills. If he would have each set of resolutions reported to the Chair as they are passed and a bill introduced, we would have more time to study the bill. I think it would be fair to hon. members to do that. For instance, this afternoon we passed one set of resolutions dealing with the Excise Act. I would ask if, before we rise to-night, the minister would have these resolutions reported and then introduce the bill, so that we may get the bill and study it.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will get the bills in as fast as I can arrange it, but the legal work of preparation of these bills and the work of checking is tremendous, and I do not know that the bill on the Excise Act will be ready to-night.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I am thinking about is the introduction of the bill so that we may see it and study it. We are near the end of this session, and things will be done in a hurry. All the time you can give us to study the bill is important to us. The minister and his officials know what they are doing, but we do not know it until we see the printed bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will bear that in mind and get the bills in just as fast after the resolutions are passed as is possible.

It is all right for this item to stand, but I must make it clear that the arrangements under the resolution will have to be as stated in the amendment. That is a peculiarity of our system; there must not be any vacuum; there must not be any interim period. The taxes on certain of these items go off to-night as of to-morrow morning; either they do or they do not, and there cannot be any doubt about it, because otherwise there will be speculation on what eventually will be done. So it must be taken, I think, that the amendment I proposed is settled as far as trading to-morrow is concerned.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that is notice to the public, anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is notice to the public. I want to make that clear. May I say that no one has a keener appreciation than I myself of the difficulties in this matter as indicated in the observations of the hon. senior member for Halifax. I never know in these things whether somebody has been benefited a little at the expense of somebody else, or not, but I heard all the representations, and when the retail association of Canada, with Mr. George Hougham representing them, a man who is always associated in my mind with the representation of the smaller rather than the larger retailers, although I think he represents all, was in favour of moving all these articles back to the manufacturer's level, while I decided not to do that on the bulk of them for the very reasons that the hon. senior member for Halifax advanced to-night, I did think I should do it on items yielding about two million dollars of revenue here, because of the difficulties of administration that have developed since I introduced the budget, the tales of woe that we have had—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The end is not yet.

Mr. ILSLEY: —about employing new staffs. I do not want to say anything about my friend the commissioner of excise, but he has a responsibility about these matters, and he does not like to assume the responsibility of enforcing a tax unless it is enforced.

Mr. HANSON (York Sunbury): Of course, his duties are administrative. They are not legislative.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but as an administrator he has every right to make representations to the Minister of Finance and say, "Now, if you give me that thing to enforce, I am afraid that I can't enforce it."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the minister ever heed that advice?

Mr. ILSLEY: Time after time. Sometimes I do not, but usually I do. I do if I can, because I know what his difficulties are. I was minister of that department for five years, and I have repeatedly said in this chamber that this house should take great care to see, when it enacts laws, that it enacts the kind of laws which the people will respect and which can be enforced reasonably well. In some respects, I am afraid, this is a little off the line, but we have kept it on to the extent that we felt we could, and the recommendations I have made to-night embody the result of my judgment and that of my officials, after a very considerable amount of discussion and a great many difficulties. I am content to let that rest until to-morrow. With regard to what was said about the administrators, I do not object at all to any remarks like that. I realize that when we go out and select executives of department stores and put them in the position of administrators of the retail trade or anything else, it will be said that they are using their positions to help themselves and the interests with which they have been connected.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say that. I said that they were open to the charge that they might. I did not suggest that they did. I was very guarded in what I said. But they are open to that charge by virtue of their taking those positions and still retaining their connections with their parent firms. By so doing they lay themselves open to the charge.

Mr. ILSLEY: What are we to do about it? Consider the position the government is in. If we do not take men who know the business, we must take someone who does not know the business and who will have no authority in administering it. That is the difficulty. We try to get round that by taking particularly able civil servants where we find them, and when we do that we are bitterly criticized for taking theorists—

Mr. MacNICOL: Impractical men.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and brain trusters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Men without practical experience.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Sometimes we get bankers. We have asked the banks to release some of their best men, and they do. We have put these men in responsible positions. Often they are very good; they are excellent. They have practical business experience and financial experience as well; their heads are level, and so on. But how often have I heard it said that they are favouring their old clients. How often have I heard that statement made? I have heard it in this house. Members in this house say that there should be occupational representation on the wartime prices and trade board. That statement has been made repeatedly, and I have risen and said, "no occupational representation on the board. A dozen civil servants; that is all we will have". Then it is objected that we are relying on men without practical experience. But if we once started putting on that board representatives of particular callings or occupations, making it a kind of parliament where each had a constituency to represent instead of representing the interests of the dominion as a whole, as civil servants are very likely to do—and in practically every case they do—I am sure we would be in a great deal more trouble than we are in at the present time. Whatever course we take is open to certain objections. Generally speaking, the course that has been followed with the wartime prices and trade board has been to look for ability which has been developed as a result of experience, together with character, and then to disregard the charges that these men are advancing their own interests. If anyone knows wherein they have done so, let him tell me or let him say it in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have heard it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly no one wants anything of that kind to go on.

Mr. LOCKHART: How many more employees will be required across the country, from coast to coast, to carry out the provisions of all these extra taxes? Several people have asked that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just under this resolution?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under all of them.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot say. The hon. gentleman is not referring to the income tax?

Mr. LOCKHART: No; the number of employees that will be involved as a result of the new budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be impossible to say. It will be a great many, but I have no means of estimating the number.

Resolution stands.

16. That immediately after the word "cameras" in section five of schedule I to the said act, be added the following words:

"photographic films and plates; projectors for slides, films or pictures; except those designed exclusively for industrial or professional photographers' use.....25 per cent."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What effect will this have on the motion-picture industry. Will they have to pay?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Is the hon. member referring to such concerns as the Associated Screen News, for example? Those would be films, projectors, and so on for industrial or professional photographers' use.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They come under the exception?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is ordinary photographic material?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): As one of thousands of amateur photographers in Canada I know I am correct when I say that the present retail prices of photographic films, plates and projectors are so high now that very few people can afford to buy them or to use them; but if you jump the price 25 per cent, why except those designed exclusively for industrial or professional photographers' use? Take the film designed for the amateur's use; it is, in most instances, identical with that designed for professional use. Therefore, if you are going to increase the price of films 25 per cent to the amateur, you should do so in the case of the industrial or professional user. By not including the industrial or professional user you overlook a great source of income, because much more film and many more projectors are used by them, and they make a profit on the purchase, resale and use of the film and projector, whereas the amateur makes nothing. Why not tax the profit?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not designed in order to impose an additional business tax. This is a consumer's tax. To put it on business would increase the cost of carrying on business at a time when price ceilings prevent increases in charges and when heavy income taxes and business and excess profits taxes take excess earnings. In short, this was not designed as a business tax or as an additional cost in doing business.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): In this legislation the minister is getting around the price ceiling. He is putting the price up 25 per cent when it is high enough now, and, as I say, the professional photographer uses films designed exactly as those used by the amateur. How will you tell them apart? What makes a man a professional? Suppose I make a film to-day and sell it; I go into the professional class. Shall I get my films the next day at 25 per cent less than I get them to-day when I am an amateur? It is not fair.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There are many schools throughout the country that have motion-picture projectors. The inspectors take pictures and show them throughout their districts. Would the films that they buy be taxable?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): That is going to hamper education to a great extent. These motion-picture cameras use kodachrome, and with the extra tax a film is going to cost practically $7 for fifty feet. Four hundred feet of film will show in about fifteen minutes; $7 for one-eighth of a roll will make the whole roll cost about $56 with the tax.

Mr. CLEAVER: There is a determining factor in this resolution, the person for whom the camera or film was designed. Reading the resolution strictly, who is going to determine what films are designed exclusively for industrial or professional photographers?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are of a distinguishable type, I am told. This applies not only to films but plates, projectors, et cetera. Any of those articles that are designed exclusively for the use of industrial or professional photographers are free of the tax; those that are not are taxable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose it is well understood in the trade.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

17. That section eight of said schedule I to the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"9. Beverages consisting of unfermented fruit juices (not including grape and other native fruit juices where at least ninety-five per cent of the products sold consist of pure juice of the fruit) and imitations thereof, carbonated beverages or aerated waters and all other compounded or mixed soft drinks, put up in bottles for sale..... 25 per cent and one cent per bottle."

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Is the one cent a bottle for a pint or a quart bottle?

Mr. ILSLEY: Any bottle.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Many speeches were made this afternoon about endeavouring to cut down the sale of alcoholic beverages. It is rather a pity that this extra tax should go on soft drinks. I think if it were kept to a reasonable level they would probably take the place of alcoholic beverages to some extent.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I mean what I say; I think it is a pity. I think cutting down the cost of soft drinks would have some effect in reducing the consumption of alcoholic beverages.

[Mr. G. K. Fraser.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have heard of people buying chocolates instead of alcohol, but I never heard of them buying coca-cola.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the clause before it was changed?

Mr. ILSLEY: The part in italics is new and the one cent per bottle is new.

An hon. MEMBER: What were the proceeds from the tax last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount last year was $6,247,000. The estimated revenue from the increase in rate for a full year is $5,000,000. The estimated revenue for the increase in rate for the remainder of the fiscal year is $3,750,000.

Item agreed to.

18. That the said schedule I to the said act is further amended by adding at the end thereof as section ten and eleven the following:

"10. Chocolate, candy and confectionery which may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy ..... 30 per cent."
"11. Chewing gum..... 30 per cent."

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to propose. This resolution imposes a new tax of 30 per cent on manufacturers of chocolate, candies, et cetera. The amendment I have to propose is in the form of a proviso, the effect of which is to substitute for the 30 per cent tax in the case of items packaged by the manufacturers to sell normally in the retail trade for five cents, ten cents and fifteen cents, a tax of one cent, two cents and three cents respectively. This proposal is made with a view to equalizing the tax as between manufacturers of these classes of fixed price items. I believe it will find favour with the trade generally.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move:

That resolution No. 18 be amended by adding the following proviso to section 10 of schedule 1 to the said act, as therein proposed:

"Provided, however, that in respect of the goods mentioned herein the tax shall be:

One cent on each article or unit selling regularly at a retail price of 5 cents;

Two cents on each article or unit selling regularly at a retail price of 10 cents;

Three cents on each article or unit selling regularly at a retail price of 15 cents;

and the Minister of National Revenue shall be the sole judge of the classification of the goods, the value, and the unit of the sale for purposes of this tax."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understood that the manufacturers had made to the minister representations which fell into two parts. There was the case of the penny goods manufacturers and the case of the bar manufacturers. The penny goods makers do a very substantial part of the trade. Certain factories in the province of Quebec I am told rely very largely on that trade. Is there any relief for the penny goods business? Obviously there is great difficulty on a 30 per cent tax. You could cut down the size of the goods, but then there would not be much left. And nobody can absorb all the tax. What is the plight of the penny goods manufacturer going to be? Hon. members from Quebec province who have in their constituencies candy manufacturers who are almost exclusively engaged in making penny goods had better look into this question, because those factories are going to be put out of business with this tax.

Then there is the much larger problem of the bar manufacturer. I am told that 50 per cent of the total production is in the form of bars selling at 5 or 10 or 15 cents. The difficulty there has been with respect to the maintenance of the price ceiling. The tax on a box of twenty-four 5-cent bars would not amount to 25 cents. It amounts, I am told, to something like 22 cents. I would think that if these bars are allowed to be sold at 6 cents, or 12 cents in the case of a 10-cent bar, while it will cut down the sale to some extent, it would not be a great detriment to the manufacturer. This is a big industry in Canada. It had a terrible time during the depression, and it is hard hit to-day as a result of the limitation of sugar. That is part of the national burden which it has to bear, because the sugar limitation applies to it as it does to me. These manufacturers have revamped their business to eliminate those lines which have the greatest sugar content; they have had to do that in order to meet the situation. I think they have done it in a very patriotic spirit and ungrudgingly, because they realize the scarcity of sugar.

With respect to the bar business, I do hope that the minister's amendment; which I have not had a chance to read, does something to ameliorate the condition of the bar manufacturers. If it does, I congratulate him, because this is the great bulk of their business to-day. The number of chocolate bars being sold is astonishing, and I am told that a great mass of them goes to the armed forces, that a tremendous trade has been developed in that direction, because they are all packages goods. Just how far has the minister gone to ameliorate the condition of the bar manufacturers?

With respect to the higher priced chocolate goods, undoubtedly there will be a diminution in the consumption. In a degree those goods are in the luxury class, though I am firmly of the opinion that chocolate as such is food. I indicated my views in this regard during my budget speech, and I am not going to repeat them now, at five minutes to eleven o'clock. How far has the minister been able to go to meet the very difficult situation that is confronting these manufacturers, and not only the manufacturers but their employees, because they employ a great many people and pay a large amount in wages? They are confronted with a difficult situation now by reason of the sugar shortage, and I would hope that the minister has gone just as far as he possibly can, having regard to his objective, which is to obtain taxation from a source which he considers ought to be taxed, and at the same time not put the industry out of business.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Apparently the amendment, which I have not seen, does give some help in connection with the sale of 5, 10 and 15 cent candy. But I should like to join with the leader of the opposition and say a word with respect to the sale of one cent candy, to which the hon. gentleman referred as penny candy. The sale of 1 cent candy will be impossible after this tax comes into effect. I might explain that by quoting just a few figures in order to show how it works out. To-day the retailer pays $1.10 per gross for candies which sell at 1 cent each. A gross, as hon. members know, is 144 pieces, so the retailer pays $1.10 for 144 pieces. A tax of 30 per cent would amount to 26¼ cents a gross, which would mean that 144 pieces would cost $1.36¼. Hon. members will realize that it would be impossible for retailers to handle candy on such a small margin of profit. Take the case of licorice. At the present time licorice sells at 85 cents for 112 pieces. The tax of 30 per cent would amount to 18 cents, which would mean that the retailer would pay $1.03 for 112 pieces of licorice, and again he could not sell the product at that price and make enough profit to enable him to continue in business. The leader of the opposition was speaking on behalf of the manufacturers. I think he would join with me in speaking also on behalf of the retailers who sell these goods.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And especially the small retailers.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I was just coming to that; especially the retailer in the small corner store. As has been pointed out to the committee already to-night by many hon. members, the small retailer is having a hard time to exist even now, and with taxes such as these it will become even more difficult. Then there is the child himself. As hon. members know, many children get only a cent, and they go to the store and buy a cent's worth of candy. You may say, why not give them 2 cents? Well, being Scotch and thrifty, while a cent is a small amount of money, nevertheless it is well to bring up our children on small amounts of money, and then they will appreciate the value of money more when they get older. Also it may be suggested that certain candies which sell three or four for a cent could be sold at two for a cent instead. Well, if the retailer does that, the wartime prices and trade board will come along and say he is increasing the price of his candy, and he will not be permitted to do so. So the small merchant is met with difficulty at every turn, making it harder than ever for him to carry on. I would have hoped that some consideration might be given with regard to candies selling for less than 5 cents.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I have had a number of protests in my constituency, most of which I have sent on to the minister. They have come from the retailer, the storekeeper, who has given me figures somewhat similar to those mentioned by the hon. member for Brantford City. The storekeepers who have written me have assured me that if this tax remains, one-cent candy will go off the market. It is pretty well agreed and pretty well established, I think, by both the manufacturers and the retailers that if this tax stands, that class of candy goes out of existence. During the evening someone criticized a tax as a mean tax; in fact, I think two taxes were referred to in that way. But I do not know a meaner tax than that which takes candy from the babies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not going to say that.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Someone ought to have said it. There are those who will say that the baby is better off without the candy, but I do not think that is a good argument. We are not the judges of that. I do think something should be done in this connection. We shall not hear from the children who are interfered with by this tax. The amount that will be raised is very small compared with the number of people who will be inconvenienced and who will feel aggrieved as a result of this legislation. I do think the minister should do something about what the leader of the opposition has described as the penny candy.

Progress reported.

Resolutions (Excise Act) reported, read the second time and concurred in.

RADIO BROADCASTING

RECOMMENDATION OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF HIGH-POWER SHORT-WAVE STATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has taken into consideration the interim report made by the committee on radio broadcasting on the 7th of July, in which the establishment at the earliest possible moment of a high-power short-wave station was recommended. If so, what decision, if any, has been reached?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The matter is under consideration at the present time, but a decision has not yet been reached.

SOVIET UNION

RECOGNITION BY CANADA—EXCHANGE OF CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC REPRESENTATIVES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the announcement he made on the 5th of February last that an exchange of consular representatives with the U.S.S.R. was planned. On June 12 the Prime Minister announced that an agreement for the establishment of direct diplomatic relations and the exchange of ministers had been concluded. I now desire to ask the Prime Minister whether he has any further information to communicate to the house in this regard, and particularly as to when an appointment may be expected. If he is not in a position to give any further information to-day will he make an announcement before the house adjourns?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope before the end of the session to be able to announce an appointment. I may not be successful, but I hope to be able to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY AND FRIDAY EVENING SITTINGS—SATURDAY AND MORNING SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I should like to say a word to hon. members with respect to the conference which I had this morning with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Hanson), the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group (Mr. Coldwell), and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Blackmore) with respect to the proceedings for the remainder of the session. We were discussing the possibility of so arranging matters as to have the house adjourn by the end of next week, and it was felt that, if hon. members would lend their cooperation towards that end, it should be possible, particularly if the house were to agree to morning sittings very soon.

I gave notice of a motion which appears on the Votes and Proceedings of yesterday to sit Wednesday evening of this week. I assume the house will be agreeable to that motion carrying. The leaders of the different parties are. It should also be understood that the house will sit as well on Friday night of this week. To ensure getting through by next week it was felt that we should begin morning sittings, if possible, on Saturday of this week, and that the house should sit Saturday morning and afternoon. Then next week we would if necessary sit morning, afternoon and night throughout the week. That is the proposal that has been agreed to by the different leaders in the house, and unless there is some very decided objection to it on the part of hon. members I will have notice of a motion placed on the Votes and Proceedings to-day to give effect to that procedure. In the meantime perhaps the house would be agreeable to passing the motion to sit on the evening of Wednesday the fifteenth, and I accordingly move:

That on Wednesday, the 15th of July, 1942, and all subsequent Wednesdays until the end of the session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules as provided for other days.

Motion agreed to.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

EVACUATION FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Many members of parliament, I presume, have been receiving, as I have, many protests and letters in connection with the Japanese situation in British Columbia. My question is based on an article appearing in the Vancouver Sun, which reached Ottawa this morning, in which it is stated that the British Columbia security commission have issued a statement that the Japanese will not be removed until the middle of September. A further statement was made that the Minister of Public Works for British Columbia had asked for 600 Japanese to work on various projects, and that only 200 could be supplied. Would the Minister of Labour care to make a statement on that?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would not like the impression to go out that the back is not broken of the movement of Japanese from British Columbia, because that problem is already under the bridge, in a big way. I have no knowledge of the announcement to which my hon. friend has just referred. The British Columbia security commission has been instructed to remove all the Japanese from those areas as speedily as possible, and they have acknowledged these instructions from the Department of Labour.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PRODUCTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA SHIPYARDS—APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSION UNDER INQUIRIES ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour a question arising out of a press report this morning to the effect that a royal commission has been appointed to investigate labour conditions in the British Columbia shipyards. Is that report correct; and what is the occasion for a royal commission when the department has such full powers now under the mobilization and other acts?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I was just going to make an announcement on that matter.

A commission has been appointed under the Inquiries Act to inquire into the means of securing maximum production in the British Columbia shipyards. The commission will report on methods of increasing the output of ships, and on a plan for the operation of the yards six days in the week which was submitted by a deputation representative of the shipyard employees. Specifically the terms of reference of the commission are:

1. To examine into the operation of the plan of continuous operation now in effect and to give due consideration to the substitute plan submitted by the deputation.

2. To inquire into any factors now impeding production in the shipyards of British Columbia and as to the most effective means of securing maximum production in such shipyards.

3. To report on the foregoing.

The chairman of the commission is the Hon. Stephen Ellswood Richards, of Winnipeg. There are two members representing employers and two representing employees. The employer members are Mr. Don Serviss, general manager of North Vancouver Shipyards, and Mr. Hugh Lewis, general manager of South Yard, Burrard Dry Dock, Vancouver. The employee representatives are Mr. Chris. Pritchard, of the United Association of Plumbers and Steamfitters and President of the Metal Trades Council, Vancouver; and Mr. A. A. McAuslane, Vice-President of the Canadian Congress of Labour, Vancouver.

In announcing the appointment of the commission I wish to state that the Minister of Munitions and Supply and myself are resolved that all steps necessary to secure the greatest possible output of ships from the yards in British Columbia shall be taken. No doubt changes in the existing procedures of management and labour will be necessary, but in the present dire need for vessels to carry the tools of war to the battle fronts, nothing can be permitted to stand in the way.

In March I visited the shipyards on the Pacific coast and conferred with representatives of the managements and of the employees. As a result of these conferences a plan was proposed for the continuous operation of the yards. Three shifts were to be established, and operations were to continue twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, but each employee was to have one day of rest in seven. After further conferences I left Vancouver feeling that all parties were agreed on the adoption of this programme. I am glad to be able to say that nine unions, representing about 95 per cent of the employees of the coast shipyards, accepted the plan and entered into supplementary agreements for its adoption. Two unions declined to enter into these agreements, despite a request from the unions that entered into the contract that they should do so. The failure of a small minority group to cooperate in this plan for greater production of ships and, I think I may add, one or two missteps on the part of certain of the managements, prevented the plan being brought into full application. This had a disquieting effect on the members of the unions which did sign the agreement. Members of the non-cooperating unions were not in their places on Sunday, while members of the cooperating unions reported for work with the feeling that they were being subjected to discrimination.

In these confused circumstances a joint conference of shipyards unions was organized. This body developed an alternative plan for six days operation a week, which, in their view, would prove as effective in promoting production as the plan of continuous operation. The joint conference of shipyards unions prepared a brief in support of their plan, and a deputation from the conference came to Ottawa to discuss it with me. I met the deputation on June 27 and 29. In these negotiations I was impressed by the sincere desire of the representatives of the shipyards workers to cooperate in any effort which would promote greater ship production. I pointed out, however, that the brief they had submitted had many implications which would take some time to explore. Obviously I would have to discuss their plan with my colleagues interested in the shipbuilding programme and especially with the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I requested the delegation to urge upon the shipyard employees in British Columbia that they should give the plan of continuous operation a thirty-day trial. I agreed that if this were done, their representations for an alternative scheme would be carefully considered, and my decision would be rendered as nearly as possible within thirty days.

It is very gratifying to me that the members of the deputation entered into this undertaking, and I can now report that all employees in the coast shipyards have accepted the recommendations of their representatives and that the yards are now building ships twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week.

The commission to which I refer will begin its investigations in Vancouver on July 20. I am confident that the members of the commission will concentrate on the one all-important question of how to build the utmost possible number of ships in the shortest possible time, and that they will submit a constructive report.

I should like to point out to the house that, despite various allegations on the irresponsibility of trade unions, in this case a group of trade unions in a very important industry under the guidance of responsible national leaders have met a crisis in one of the most serious phases of our war effort in an altogether creditable manner. I am confident these men will give Canada all they have to give in the production of ships.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am obliged to the minister for having made that statement. The only thought that occurs to me is this: if there has been a complete agreement and there is now full cooperation on the plan suggested by the minister, why a royal commission? What other intervening circumstances have made it necessary to issue a commission under the Inquiries Act? I do not think the minister made that clear.

Mr. MITCHELL: I thought I had made that quite clear. When the delegation came to see me I pointed out to them, and I think quite rightly, that it was not sound to say that a seven-day working week in the shipyards was not practicable until it had been tried out. I said to them that first of all, in fairness to the government, and in view of the urgent need of shipping, it should at least be tried out by all the unions engaged in the production of ships in the shipyards of Vancouver. I pointed out that a decision upon their brief, which was a lengthy document, could not be made within a day or two days; it would have to be analysed by some responsible authority. But I promised them that if they gave this plan a trial, as soon as possible, after thirty days I would make decision whether a six-day week, in my opinion or that of the government, was the most practical approach to the problem, or the seven-day week.

May I also point out that this has been called at the coast the Mitchell plan. It is quite true that I had negotiations there with both employers and employees, and I think it is fair to say that the arrangements made were made in pursuance of the negotiations, in that the employers and the employees in the British Columbia shipyards, seeing the urgency of the situation, agreed to this seven-day operation without any coercion from the federal government. It was unfortunate, I think, that, mistakes having been made by certain employers and certain trade unions, the plan was not given the trial which in my judgment was necessary in view of the desperate situation in which this nation and all the united nations are placed at the moment with respect to shipping to carry the products of this country, both food and war materials, to those who are really fighting the battle of democracy and of freedom.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION OF REPORT—LETTER FROM COLONEL DREW

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): In view of what the Prime Minister has said about trying to end the session as soon as possible, could he give the house any intimation as to just what day there will be an opportunity of discussing the Hong Kong investigation?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Prime Minister): As I have mentioned before, the understanding is that we should first conclude the discussion on the budget resolutions and dispose of Bill No. 80 as well. I think that immediately or very shortly after that the inquiry could be discussed.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I understand that Colonel Drew has submitted a long letter to the government regarding the Hong Kong investigation. Would the Prime Minister table that letter in order that we may have it before us when this debate takes place?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say that I received yesterday a letter from Colonel Drew—no doubt the letter to which my hon. friend refers, because Colonel Drew states in it that he has sent a copy of the letter to my hon. friend, and also to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and to the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore). If the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, on his responsibility as a member of the house, will ask me to table the letter, I shall do so, but I certainly will not table it unless some hon. member on his responsibility requests it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will take that responsibility, and ask that the letter be tabled.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It will be tabled to-morrow.

SUGAR

AVAILABILITY FOR PARCELS TO MEMBERS OF THE FORCES OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I have had several letters complaining about the fact that no sugar is available to put in overseas boxes. Could the Minister of Finance tell us whether or not some special provision could be made with regard to sugar so that it might be available for these boxes?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I will make inquiries and if I get information I will let my hon. friend know promptly.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

18. That the said schedule I to the said act is further amended by adding at the end thereof as section ten and eleven the following:

"10. Chocolate, candy and confectionery which may be classed as candy or a substitute for candy ..... 30 per cent."
"11. Chewing gum..... 30 per cent."

The CHAIRMAN: The following amendment has been moved:

That resolution No. 18 be amended by adding the following proviso to section 10 of schedule I to the said act, as therein proposed:

"Provided, however, that in respect of the goods mentioned herein the tax shall be:

One cent on each article or unit selling regularly at a retail price of 5 cents;
Two cents on each article or unit selling regularly at a retail price of 10 cents;
Three cents on each article or unit selling regularly at a retail price of 15 cents;

and the Minister of National Revenue shall be the sole judge of the classification of the goods, the value, and the unit of the sale for purposes of this tax."

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Last night when the committee rose the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) and myself, had made certain representations with regard to candy that was being retailed at one cent. Has the minister considered whether or not it is possible to reduce the tax on candy selling for one cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: A great deal of consideration was given this question last week, and it has received further consideration since the representations were made in committee last night. The situation is this. The 30 per cent tax as it stands applies to all candies at the manufacturers level, and my information is that about 8 per cent of the candy manufactured is sold for sale in one-cent units. No company that I know of sells candy in one-cent units alone. Some companies sell a larger proportion of their output in that form than do others, and representations have been made by those companies that have the largest proportion of their output in one-cent units. The inevitable effect of relieving part of the output of the candy industry of Canada from the 30 per cent tax would be to divert a larger proportion of the manufacture into that particular form of output. Indeed, it is altogether likely that the one cent part of the output would be advertised as free from taxation. Consideration has been given as to measures by which that diversion, which would be unfair, undesirable and expensive to the treasury, could be prevented, and we have not been able to satisfy ourselves that any measures that could be taken would be entirely effective. The objection that was made last night was that this would mean that units now selling for one cent would hereafter sell for more—perhaps two for three, or three for four, or four for five, or something of the kind.

This increase in the price would not be permitted by the wartime prices and trade board. In the budget it was clearly stated that increases that were necessitated by this tax would be permitted by the wartime prices and trade board. A limited range of articles was selected, and the policy was clearly laid down that these increases would be permitted. It is true that the 30 per cent increase in price as applied to the one cent article comes to a fractional figure, one cent and a fraction, and in that case it would be necessary for the retailer to sell for two cents unless he combined several units and sold two for three, or three for four, or four for five, and my information is that to do so would be regarded by the wartime prices and trade board as objectionable.

It may be said that the dampening effect of this tax on the sale of candy in one-cent units will bring about much distress to candy manufacturers who are heavily in the manufacture of one-cent units, and to retailers heavily interested in selling them. This might be true under normal conditions. I am informed that many years ago—I do not know how many—a candy tax such as this, or of some kind, was proposed, and abandoned because it would be unfair to the sellers of one-cent candies. But under present conditions I am not convinced that there would be much injury. There may be a little; that is a necessary result of many of our measures. But the reason why there will not be much injury is that sugar is severely rationed. Candy manufacturers are permitted to use only 70 per cent of their normal supply, and they can sell without any trouble all the candy they make. The manufacturer whose output is 50 per cent in one-cent units and 50 per cent in larger units will perhaps find that the one-cent part of his output will be reduced, but he will sell more of the other. It will render some little adjustment necessary, but it will not have the serious effect that there might be if there were a scramble for a market, or if it were difficult to sell the output, when the loss would not be compensated by the increased sale of another type of output.

On the whole, therefore, I am inclined to think that the tax should stand as it is. The argument that was used last night was as to the children. The hon. member for Trinity argued that it is not for us to judge; that the children want to buy one-cent sticks of candy and we ought to let them do so. It all depends on how important one considers these things. I do not think it would be a great hardship on the people of this country if the children had to pay three cents for two sticks of candy instead of one cent for one. I cannot get much worked up over that. We should be careful not to work any injustice on the manufacturers and retailers, but I do not think the adverse effect of this tax will be at all substantial. On the other hand if we make this exception for one part of the output of the candy factories we are going to have similar demands as regards chewing gum, and we would be called upon to exercise very fine discretion as to how far we could go in that regard. It certainly sets a precedent that I want to avoid if at all possible. If for instance the diversion, as a result of exempting part of the output of the candy factories from this 30 per cent tax, would be that 16 per cent of the total output instead of 8 per cent went into one-cent pieces—that is, if it were doubled, which would be quite possible unless we could take counter measures, the practicability of which is disputed by those who advise me—it would mean a loss of revenue of between $500,000 and $600,000.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have no brief for the candy manufacturers but, I have for the small corner store owner. Last night several hon. members mentioned the big firms. They can buy and sell at reduced prices, but the corner grocery store man is in a tight spot with the wartime prices and trade board regulations. In a check-up it was found that some of these corner stores near schools will lose about five per cent of their trade owing to this one-cent candy being cut out. That sounds like a lot, but these storekeepers claim that if the children do not come to their stores to buy the candy, then when it comes to buying other and more expensive articles the families will go to other stores and take the trade away from the small stores. Last week there was an article in the Ottawa Journal regarding one-cent candy, and it said that relief was to be given to the corner grocery store. Did the minister see that article?

Mr. ILSLEY: What kind of relief?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It did not say—just that relief was to be given to the corner grocery in regard to this one-cent candy. The small storekeeper is the one who is going to feel it, and he has a tough time now. When he has to buy a bag of sugar he has to gather 40 one-pound coupons, bundle them up and take them to his wholesaler. The wholesaler is in the same fix; when he wants to buy a car of sugar he has to have 40,000 of these one-pound coupons. I have a letter here from a firm which states that it means counting out 40,000 tickets to get a car of sugar; they may sell three cars a month, so that they have to have an extra clerk to look after the details of these transactions alone. The storekeeper is in the same position. He is selling less and less every day, and this one-cent candy would help him out.

As to the cards that are sent out by the wartime prices and trade board urging people to save sugar, in most cases they are thrown into the wastepaper basket. There has been more sugar sold since the rationing went into effect than when people were on the honour system.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I protest against this tax on the one-cent candy business. I realize that all the people of Canada should make some sacrifice to help win the war, and everyone is ready to do it, but why put it on the children's one-cent candy? The leader of the opposition pointed out yesterday that the province of Quebec is interested in this. We have many manufacturers of one-cent candy. Really the one-cent candy is an institution for our children in the province of Quebec. I do not see why we should impose a tax which would have the effect of ruining that industry. Some hon. members said yesterday that it is doubtful whether candy or sugar is good for children. It is like everything else; if they eat too much it is not good for them, but sugar is necessary in the diet of children. So far as the one-cent candy is concerned there should be no tax on it, to help the children and to help the manufacturers.

Mr. QUELCH: I look on this as a very undesirable way of raising revenue. I think that is the main purpose of this provision—to raise revenue, rather than to restrict the sale of chocolates. Whatever the motive or objective of the proposal, the result is an inflation of price. In the past the minister has pointed out that one way of reducing the purchasing power of the people is by inflation, but he has deplored that method. In past months and years, he has wept crocodile tears over the tremendous dangers of inflation; yet by this very legislation we are now bringing about inflation of prices in order to curtail the purchasing power of the people, in this case the purchasing power of the children. I do not think the minister is being consistent in his attitude. If it is necessary to curtail the purchasing power of the children, or of the people generally, so that they will buy less commodities, surely the only sound way of doing it is by a more direct form of taxation. If on the other hand the objective is to restrict the sale of chocolates, then I would say the logical way to do it would be by rationing. Nevertheless I point out again that whatever the objective may be, the result is nothing more or less than inflation, the very thing the minister has been warning the country against for years.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I desire to add a word or two to what I said last evening on this question. I have now had the opportunity of reading the proposed amendment which was moved last night with respect to small packaged goods, which I think refers not only to bars but to other items retailing ordinarily at 5, 10 and 15 cents. Originally the minister proposed to impose a tax of 30 per cent ad valorem on the manufacturers' prices. Now he has changed that to a specific tax of one cent, two cents and three cents, as the case may be, to be added to the retail price of the five-, ten- and fifteen-cent packages. I assume that this will meet the objections advanced by the manufacturers to the imposition of the 30 per cent tax. Under some arrangement the retailer will be allowed to add the tax to the retail price. The effect of that, of course, will be to reduce somewhat the volume of that business, but as I see it—and I hope the minister will correct me if I am wrong—this overcomes the difficulty which would have been experienced in maintaining the price ceiling and at the same time giving effect to the new taxation. I hope that deduction is correct; if it is, I should think half the objection to the proposals would be eliminated, because I am informed that the so-called bar and small package business amounts to 50 per cent of the whole production of the country. So much for that, if I have the correct understanding.

With respect to penny goods, so-called, I am told that these represent only about 8 per cent of the total production of the manufacturers of the country. I believe that is the representation that has been made to the minister. Perhaps that includes gum; I do not know.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not arguing the case for the gum people. They may be able to meet the situation in another way, by reducing the amount of the gum, for instance. In any case I am not arguing that matter, because I have not had any information on the subject. There may be great merit in any complaints they make, but I am not attempting to deal with that point to-day.

The penny goods may amount to much more than 8 per cent of the production of some manufacturers, and much less in the case of others. With regard to those in the latter class, of course if this proposal goes into effect and the price becomes two for three cents, undoubtedly there will be some reduction in the volume of trade which will affect the small corner grocery and candy shop much more than anyone else. I think the greatest detriment will be to the small candy stores in our cities and towns, near the schools, and so on. But the total volume is small, and it does seem to me the amount of revenue that would be received from this tax also would be relatively small. I think the minister could well forgo that revenue, because in the cost to the country the increase otherwise will be relatively very large. The minister says he is not concerned about the children. Well, in the end it is the parents who have to pay. People become accustomed to candy. Three cents may not be a very large sum of money, but I remember very well that when I was a boy one cent was all we were ever handed, and when I reached the stage when I was given a nickel or a dime I really thought I was a millionaire. I am afraid that condition does not obtain to-day; people hand out money to their children much more freely than in days gone by, and perhaps that is wrong. But I do suggest to the minister that in justice to the industry, and more particularly in justice to the small retailer, he could very well forgo the tax on the penny goods.

The chocolate bar situation has been taken care of, and I believe that amounts to about 50 per cent of the whole business. I am told that business is growing, I think largely due to the purchases made by the young men in the armed forces, who do not get enough sugar in their food and who buy these bars in quantities. If the minister would forgo this tax, which affects about 8 per cent of the total business, that would leave about 42 per cent of the trade, which is distributed over all the other varieties of candy. With respect to the higher class goods, which ordinarily sell in fancy boxes at a dollar a pound, I think in days gone by I had the figures with regard to the total production in Canada, though I do not recall them now; but during the depression period the volume of that high-class candy was very materially reduced. People did not buy it; they just did not have the money. I am not asking anything for the people who buy that class of goods; I think they can pay the tax, which I believe runs around 18 cents a pound on certain qualities. Perhaps that situation can be met in large measure by reducing the cost of the package. We see these beautiful ornate candy boxes in the windows, which occasionally young men buy for their girl friends. I hear now that cigarettes are the appropriate thing to give your girl friend, but it was not so when I was a boy. We bought candy for our girls when we were courting. The manufacturers can reduce this cost very largely by cutting down these unnecessary expenses, and they should be cut down. There will be a loss to the manufacturer, but he is not complaining about that. He is operating under pretty difficult circumstances, with the reduction in the quantity of sugar he may use, but as a rule he is a patriotic citizen and he will carry on. The sugar tax has hit him hard in the past, and he has not always been able to pass that on. During the depression he passed very little of it on, and none of these companies has made a dollar since 1930. I do not know one of them that has paid any dividends on its common stock since that year. I am afraid some of them have been close to the point where they will have to go through the wringer.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): None of the candy companies has paid dividends since 1930?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): None that I know of—I will limit it to that, and I am not familiar with them all—has paid any dividends to the common shareholders for a long time. This perhaps is not true of the companies which combine a large baking business with their candy business. I know of one company in eastern Canada which has a baking business as large as its candy business, and while it is not making any money out of its candy business, it is making some money out of its baking business. As I say, some companies do not have a baking business; they do not make bread and cakes and the like. I understand the Laura Secord company are still paying dividends.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They have no confectionery business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have no baking business. They have been very successful. This question having been settled without the companies themselves raising any great objection, I suggest that we should at least take the tax off the penny goods. The present proposal is really a species of inflation, since the price is going to be six cents instead of five cents.

Mr. DUROCHER: The minister has suggested that the penny candies should be sold two pieces for three cents instead of a cent apiece. With the new tax this candy will cost the manufacturers sixty-eight cents, and if they abide by the price ceiling regulations they will have to sell it for seventy-two cents. That gives a profit of a little better than 5 per cent, and they cannot do business in that way. If the retail merchant is allowed to increase his price it will mean an increase of 50 per cent. The increase is all going one way. I do not know who is going to absorb this tax, the manufacturer or the retailer. If the retailer is to be allowed to increase his price, the manufacturer should be entitled to do the same. As other hon. members have said, candy is a necessity for children, even though it is not so necessary for grown-ups. There should be some way of arranging it so that the youngsters can get their candy when they need it, even if it be necessary to cut out the manufacture of the higher grade candy.

Mr. HILL: I urge upon the minister and his officers that this tax on penny goods be reconsidered. I think we all admit that candy is really a children's food; most adults would be a great deal better off if they did not have it. The minister says that to eliminate the tax on penny goods would reduce his revenue. Bar candy represents about 50 per cent of the output of candy in Canada. A tax of one cent per unit is now being imposed, in place of the 30 per cent basis, this means an increase of 9 per cent. A 9 per cent increase on 50 per cent of the candy output would offset the revenue that would be lost if this tax on penny goods were not imposed. Chocolate bars will continue to be used, because they are handy to buy and fit the needs of pretty nearly everybody. I am not concerned about the retailers or the manufacturers or anyone else; I am concerned only about the children. After all, this is the children's food; with the rationing of sugar there will be fewer cakes made in the homes, and the only way the children will be able to make up this deficiency will be by buying penny goods. I believe if the minister and his officers carefully consider this matter they will realize that they could offset any loss of revenue by imposing a higher tax on the higher grade candies.

Mr. McCANN: Much has been said about children needing candy. All persons need a considerable amount of sugar in one form or another, because sugar is the great energizing food of the human race. It does not make any difference whether people take this food in the form of sugar or in the form of candy. The very fact that sugar has been rationed and there is only a limited quantity of it available in the household is one of the best arguments against a tax upon candy. What has brought about this increased consumption of candy? In the days of prohibition candy took the place of alcohol. In the normal process of digestion sugar is changed into alcohol, and when a man could not get that commodity his natural taste and inclination was toward an increased consumption of sugar. The fact that sugar is rationed will stop many people from making home-made candy, and the children will have to buy candy at the stores. Sugar is a necessary food and should be part of the daily diet of every person, either in that form or in the form of candy. To put a tax upon candy is like putting a tax upon bread. I ask the minister to reconsider the whole question of the tax on candy. While the measure proposed may be productive of some revenue, I think any good will be counteracted by the harm it will actually do to the people of this country.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister should reconsider this matter, because the present proposal if it is adopted will work a hardship, not only upon our children but upon the small storekeepers. Some people say that candy is injurious to children's teeth, but it is not the candy that does the harm; it is a lack of milk and calcium. This will be found among the poorer children. As the hon. member who has just taken his seat has said, children need candy; it is part of their food. You will find that welfare work among children will be much greater if they cannot get candy. They need this energy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the minister will give some heed to the argument of the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann). I hardly dared to go as far as he did in the statement I made, although I did go that far in my speech on the budget. This is the only item in all the budget resolutions which imposes a tax on food. I am supported in my contention that it is a food by the remarks of the hon. gentleman who is a member of the medical profession and who has studied this situation. I think the minister could very well abandon the whole tax, but if he will not do that, if he needs the revenue, surely he will abandon the tax on the penny goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have nothing to add to what I have already said. The tax on candy and chewing gum is estimated to yield $7,000,000, and I cannot agree to dropping it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much from the penny goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: I said something over $500,000. I arrived at that figure by taking 8 per cent of $7,000,000, which is hardly correct. I would really have to separate the chewing gum from candy and take 8 per cent of the amount applicable to candy alone. I do not know that any separate estimate has been made.

Mr. MacNICOL: Could the minister not distinguish between the penny goods and the higher priced goods, so that the children can get their sugar from candy while the adults pay a little more for their boxed chocolates?

Mr. ILSLEY: One would think to hear all the speeches that hereafter no child can buy any candy at all. That is so far from the real facts of the situation that it is fantastic. The penny goods will continue to be made and sold, and when sold I presume they will be sold two for three, three for four, four for five cents, or something like that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the price board agreed to that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not to any one of those particular figures, it must be distinctly understood; but they have agreed to permit the tax to be added, and in such a way that there will not be a fractional result arrived at but that a full one cent will be payable. I do not anticipate that there will be any reduction in the purchases made under present conditions, or that, if any, it will be more than a slight reduction, and surely that is not a tremendous thing. There is just going to be so much sugar in the country, and the people of the country are going to eat that sugar. We had a tax on sugar of two cents a pound. That has been reduced to one and a half cents a pound. I am sure that all the candy that is made will be sold. The hon. member for Renfrew South is afraid that the people will have less candy, but in my judgment that is not so. They are going to eat all the candy that can be made from the amount of sugar available for the making of candy. It may be that a smaller volume of penny goods will be made and a larger volume of five-cent goods, but I do not think there will be very much of an upset in the present proportions.

So far as the retailer is concerned he will continue to sell his candy, and it is just possible that he will make a little more profit on it than before. I think that should meet the worries of the hon. member for Peterborough West. I do not know how the hon. member knows how much of a loss the retailer is going to have in his business as a result of this tax. He says that the storekeeper is going to suffer a 5 per cent loss in business. That is on the assumption that none of these units of candy is going to be sold. That is not correct at all. If we free penny candy from the tax what is the result going to be? In the absence of strict policing and counter-measures forbidding practices of this kind, which I am informed could not be enforced without a tremendous amount of policing, a person with 10 or 15 cents to spend on candy would buy the untaxed candy, the penny candy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Can you not ration the whole volume through the manufacturers? Suppose the total volume of penny candy was 8 per cent before this tax. Could it not be arranged that only 8 per cent of the total volume shall in future be put into penny goods? I think that would be a help. I made inquiries a week ago Saturday in a substantial retail establishment in my own city, and this man told me that as a result of the tax imposed by this budget, which was in effect on that date, purchases of the higher class goods had been almost cut in two, that just about half the usual amount was being sold. That was the experience of one man.

Mr. ILSLEY: The result of budget taxation is that for a day or two the demand falls off. For instance I heard of one place in which soft drinks were sold where the day after the budget, instead of selling ten cases, they sold only six or seven bottles. The next day it was two cases, the next day five or six cases, and soon they were up to ten cases again. These immediate reactions are not lasting.

Mr. JACKMAN: Has the minister given consideration to the fact that many of the families and friends of the soldiers overseas are in the habit of sending them chocolate bars and solid chocolate? The tax may not amount to a large sum, but 30 per cent is quite an item. There is a differentiation between parcels addressed to soldiers overseas and parcels addressed to civilians. Chocolate is a commodity one does not see in the old country, and it is human nature that when you cannot get something that you are accustomed to having you want it very badly. I know from talking to our own soldiers overseas that they appreciate nothing more than the solid chocolate they have been receiving from Canada. I would ask the minister to take that into consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether some similar arrangement could be made with regard to chocolate for the soldiers overseas as exists with regard to cigarettes. The general principle is that exported goods are free of this tax, but goods that are bought by persons in this country and then sent overseas do not come within that classification. If they were exported by the manufacturer, that would be the case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is true. Goods in this category exported to Newfoundland are not taxed.

Mr. JACKMAN: Will the minister look into the matter and give favourable consideration to my suggestion, if it can be done without too much difficulty?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter between the manufacturer and the Department of National Revenue, I think. I can bring it to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National Revenue.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I was impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew South. I would ask the minister to let this item stand so that he may give it further consideration, and give us a break-down of the estimated revenue, showing what he expects to receive from chewing gum and what from penny candy. This tax on candy is wrong in principle. We have difficulty in some parts of Canada in providing for the children of underprivileged families, and this tax on candy will affect them more than anyone else. Surely we could make up, by a tax on something else, what the minister expects to receive from this tax on candy that is necessary particularly for the children of underprivileged families.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not consent to letting this item stand, because I am afraid there would be just as much reason for letting any other item stand.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Can the minister give us an estimate of the anticipated revenue?

Mr. ILSLEY: My recollection is that the candy manufacturers who came to see me gave an estimate of $500,000. That would mean that most of the $7,000,000 would be from candy, which I presume would be the case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Half of it being from chocolate bar business.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that. I mean $500,000 from the penny goods.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The minister has referred to my statement that the corner grocery store would suffer a loss of 5 per cent by this tax. His loss would really be much more than 5 per cent, because when a mother gives a child a cent to buy some candy at the corner grocery store, she is usually sending him there to get some household necessity at the same time, and the corner grocery depends upon that business. Otherwise the people would go to the big stores to make their purchases.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister examine this side of it? I will repeat the questions I asked last night. Is the purpose of this impost primarily to gain revenue, or is it to restrict the consumption of goods and services? Or is it primarily to restrict purchasing power? What does the minister say? Is it primarily to gain revenue, or is it to restrict purchasing power, or is it to restrict the use of sugar?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not care to balance those factors and arrive at a decision in favour of one against the others.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Suppose we assume that it is primarily for revenue purposes. Then the minister will have to acknowledge that the revenue could be obtained by the creation of money. In other words, all this hardship which is being inflicted on the children throughout the land is brought upon them in order to save the face of men who have contended that money could not be created; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us not go into that now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No! The minute we begin to discuss anything worth while the leader of the opposition starts to shy off it like a horse meeting a bear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which is the horse and which is the bear?

Mr. BLACKMORE: A solution has been found, but he does not want to hear it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not to-day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, of course not. But just the same we are going to be faced year after year with a more and more onerous, irksome, and burdensome tax structure, until the people can no longer sustain it; and apparently we are going to do that rather than be open-minded enough and progressive enough to acknowledge a new principle. I just want that point brought out, Mr. Chairman. It is time hon. members knew the price that is being paid for the stupidity which actuates the management of this country in respect to financial affairs. This is part of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Talk to the minister; don't talk to me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not care who receives this statement I make; it is stupidity beyond any question to neglect new financial techniques, and it is behaviour which even authorities in Canada who must be respected by the minister will condemn. While we are on the subject, I wish to read a statement which I have read in this chamber once or twice before. It appeared in the Financial Post, which certainly dignifies the statement I shall quote, and it is the statement of A. F. W. Plumptre, which certainly dignifies it, I think:

> It must be remembered, primarily and seemingly paradoxically, that the government's object is not to get money but merely to reduce the public's spending. The government can always "get money" because it may, as an alternative to borrowing or even to taxation, create the required funds.

When the leader of the opposition is prepared to laugh that off or to explain it away, we shall all be here listening to him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The basis of this taxation is to get money.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Exactly. This shows the way in which the minister can get money without such an absurd reflection on the intelligence of Canada as a candy tax. That is the important point. The leader of the opposition has been complaining for a long time this afternoon—I sympathize with him; he did a good job—but he has offered no alternative. I am offering an alternative, and immediately he is displeased.

Let us examine this item from another point of view. If the object of this impost is to restrict sugar consumption, it fails of its objective, according to the acknowledgment of the minister himself; for he has just said that the candy will be used anyway, or all that can be manufactured with the sugar which will be permitted to the manufacturers.

If the object of the impost is to withdraw purchasing power, then it is well that hon. members should know that a hardship is being visited on the children throughout the country for the pure purpose of withdrawing purchasing power. I do not believe the minister is prepared to say that that is what the object is.

Mr. SLAGHT: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken offered what he suggested was an alternative. I have an alternative to offer the minister which I think will get him his money and also satisfy the advocates of plenty of candy for the children. It is this: that he should bespeak the cooperation of the Minister of Justice and the justice department to enforce the law and to obtain assurances from the nine attorneys-general of the provinces that they will enforce the law against slot-machines and push-boards and pin-boards which occupy prominent positions in many of these candy shops and small stores throughout the country. More money, in my opinion, goes through these stupid gambling devices than the children spend on candy in a whole year, and if that law is properly enforced everybody will be happy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that. If there is anything that I can do to facilitate that end I shall be very glad to do it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think that if the minister is not careful this budget may go down through the country as the home-wrecker's budget. There are aspects of it which certainly are discriminatory against the family man, and at a stage like this I think it is going altogether too far to try to "take it out" on the kiddies of the underprivileged. Probably I cannot claim to be in more than a very small degree a real family man, but my sympathies are with the family people, and I am sure that you cannot have a virile and successful nation unless you encourage larger families. The minister will agree that the number of underprivileged families in this country has been a matter of great concern to many of us. To tax the underprivileged kiddies on their penny candy is going altogether too far. Surely we can give consideration to eliminating the tax in that respect and make up the loss in some other way, for instance, as has been suggested by the previous speaker.

Resolution 19 agreed to.

20. That section two of the said schedule II to the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"2. Sugar, etc.:—

(a) Materials enumerated in customs tariff items 134, 135, 135a, 135b.... one and one-half cents per pound;

(b) Materials enumerated in customs tariff items 139 (except glucose and grape sugar), 140 (except molasses).... two cents per pound;

(c) Glucose and grape sugar (except when for use exclusively in the manufacture of leather and artificial silk)..... one cent per pound."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister tell us what these are?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I think the minister ought to give us a statement, but first of all I wish to say this, that I have discovered that the sugar voucher cards which are sent around to the different stores are also being sent to wholesale tobacconists, who are just dumping them in the waste-paper basket. I know that is true because a sugar wholesaler told me that he picked up a number of them. I think there should be a check on them.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member will send me the card he has I will have a look at it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: The committee may recall that last February there was announced a reduction of a half-cent a pound in the sugar tax. This reduction was made on the recommendation of the wartime prices and trade board in view of the increased price of raw sugar to the Canadian refineries. The present resolution gives effect in law to the announcement made at that time, and, as will be noted, the amendment reducing the tax is to date back to February 16.

Resolution 21 agreed to.

22. (1) That the tax imposed upon mutual companies authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of insurance, other than life insurance, on the premium deposit plan, and the tax on every exchange so authorized shall be increased from 2 per centum to 4 per centum upon the net premiums received by it in Canada during the calendar year 1941 and each calendar year thereafter.

(2) That the tax imposed upon mutual companies, other than those mentioned in subparagraph (1) hereof, and upon associations of persons formed upon the plan known as Lloyd's, authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of insurance, other than life insurance, be increased from 1 per centum to 3 per centum upon the net premiums received by it in Canada, less net premiums paid for reinsurance to companies or associations to which the tax authorized by this subparagraph or subparagraph (3) hereof applies during the year 1941 and each calendar year thereafter.

(3) That the tax imposed upon every company, other than those mentioned in subparagraphs (1) and (2) hereof authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of insurance, other than life insurance, shall be increased from 1 per centum to 2 per centum upon the net premiums received by it in Canada, less net premiums paid for reinsurance to companies or associations to which the tax authorized by this subparagraph or subparagraph (2) hereof applies during the year 1941 and each calendar year thereafter.

(4) That there be imposed upon every company authorized under the laws of the Dominion of Canada or of any province thereof to transact the business of life insurance, a tax of 2 per centum upon the net premiums received by it in Canada, less net premiums paid for reinsurance to companies or associations to which the tax authorized by this subparagraph or subparagraphs (2) or (3) hereof applies during the year 1941 and each calendar year thereafter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is an increase of 100 per cent. In the end, this of course comes out of those who pay the premiums; it does not come out of the company. What is the justification for it?

Mr. ILSLEY: The resolution proposes certain changes in our existing tax on insurance premiums, and in addition imposes a premium tax on life insurance as a result of the provincial agreements. The committee may recall that when I announced the offer to the provincial governments I said that if it were accepted it might subsequently be necessary for the dominion government to levy certain taxes in order to prevent some groups from securing an undue advantage as a result of relief from provincial taxes. It was found in the case of insurance companies that certain additional taxes might properly be imposed. Generally speaking, the dominion government is levying a 2 per cent tax in place of the provincial taxes, which on the average were slightly above this figure. At the same time, we have used this occasion for making minor changes in our own taxes applying to ordinary stock, fire and casualty companies. By way of summary, I may say that the new rates of taxes will be 2 per cent on premiums on life insurance, 2 per cent on stock, fire and casualty companies, 3 per cent on mutual, fire and casualty companies, and on those insuring under Lloyd's, with a 4 per cent rate applying to reciprocals and companies operating on premium deposit plan. It is estimated that in the full year these increases in the existing rates of imposition of new premium taxes will yield about $6,500,000, while for the rest of the current fiscal year the yield will be about $13,000,000, in view of the fact that two years' revenue will accrue to the dominion government in the current year. This occurs because the provincial governments' premium taxes were suspended with respect to 1941 premiums, and the new dominion law is made retroactive to cover 1941.

Mr. WRIGHT: Why is the additional tax imposed upon the mutual companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Previously the mutual companies paid one per cent on their premiums. Those companies were free from income tax, and therefore there was no possibility of deducting the premium tax from their income tax. That was not true of the stock companies. The stock companies paid one per cent on their premiums, but there was a provision that they could deduct that from their income tax. If they are paying income tax—and every company that is not making a loss is paying income tax—they will continue paying what they were before; that is to say, they will be paying that much more income tax. Previously they paid one per cent in premium taxes, subtracting that from the income tax. Now that one per cent is taken out altogether and they just pay the income tax, which will be the same amount in taxation, provided they are making profits, which they are. But that is not true in the case of the mutual, fire and casualty companies, and in order to maintain the same relative position that existed before it is therefore necessary to levy the one per cent which was always on the mutual company premiums and add two per cent to that. In the case of fire insurance companies the one per cent is taken out of the act, for the purpose of simplicity more than anything else; so that the result is that you have two per cent on premiums of stock companies and three per cent on premiums of mutual companies. The preexisting relationship is perfectly preserved.

Mr. WRIGHT: That was the point that I wanted to have brought out. I wondered if the previously existing comparison between the two had been changed by the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not if they are making profits. If there were such a thing as a loss, this would make a difference, but I think that is improbable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is made retroactive for the reason the minister gave. Have any representations been made by these companies in this matter, or has it been worked out with them in any way? Did they object?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not since the budget. They did make extensive representations before, because they were curious to know what we would impose to take the place of the provincial taxes. They knew that something would be imposed, and they made representations. When I say that no representations have been made since the budget, I should say that there have been representations by Lloyd's. That is the only one.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Was it the theory that when the provincial governments gave up their impositions on individual income tax payers and on corporations, this jurisdiction would of necessity reimpose those taxes in some other form, while at the same time there would be huge increases in the income tax or in other forms of taxation? Was it felt that these imposts, some of which I think were very unfair, were just a chance to grab off for provincial government purposes a slice of money which all comes out of the premium payers in the end? Was it always the intention that all that money that the provincial governments gave up was to come back? I always thought it was to come back in the form of increased income tax, not new side impositions, so to speak.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been some dispute as to the appropriate interpretation of the words I used in the budget speech of April 29, 1941. I did not intend that this special class of companies was to get an advantage over the general run of Canadian companies as a result of the dominion-provincial agreements. The increases in income tax are common to all companies, but there were these special taxes on certain classes of companies; therefore in the budget speech of April 29, 1941, I stated that it might be necessary to impose special taxes on a special class of companies so that the result of the dominion-provincial agreements would not be the relief of this special class of companies. What I meant was the relief of them in relation to other corporations; I did not want to give them a favoured position in relation to the others. As a matter of fact this two per cent tax on life insurance premiums is slightly less than the average of the provincial taxes. I think the average in the provinces was 2·32 per cent. I am talking about life insurance companies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under subsection 4, that is on the net premiums. Of course the tax comes out of the participating policyholders. It does not come out of the non-participating business. With the mutual companies of course it comes out of all. That I think is the fact. The company does not pay it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, yes; it comes out of the income. In a stock company certain of the earnings are placed to shareholders' account, and the taxes come out of the gross income of the company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is all very well to say that, but in the last analysis this two per cent tax upon the net premiums received comes out of the participating policyholders. That is the only place it can come from. It cannot come out of the non-participating policyholders because there is a contract. I am not objecting to this, but I want to know if that is not the view of the insurance department.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is news to me that this whole two per cent is charged up to the participating policyholders.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I was going to ask the minister what difference this will make to the policyholders who participate in the profits of these companies. A new policyholder is penalized in any event, because he is not allowed to take his premium out of his compulsory savings.

Mr. ILSLEY: The policyholder is relieved somewhat by this provision. The total tax payable by a stock company before the dominion-provincial agreement included a provincial tax which on an average was 2·32 per cent. The dominion tax which takes its place is only two per cent, so there is a small measure of relief to the company and therefore indirectly to the participating policyholder. I do not think it is large enough to have any effect on dividends.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Even half of one per cent has an effect on dividends.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be.

Mr. WRIGHT: Under the law before the change was made and the dominion took over the corporation tax the mutual companies were not paying any corporation tax. They have no profits to distribute. Under this arrangement they will be paying the tax, because it is charged on premiums. It will make a direct difference to their relationship with the line companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: No. Previously, when the provinces were imposing a tax, the dominion was imposing a tax of one per cent on the premiums of mutuals, and the provinces were imposing taxes averaging two per cent. The provinces agreed to cease and did cease imposing those taxes, and the dominion has stepped into the field and is imposing a tax of two per cent on the premiums of mutuals, so that the total tax on mutuals is exactly what it was before, with the dominion imposing both taxes instead of the dominion one and the province one. The relationship between the mutuals and the stock companies that are making profits is also preserved, for the reason that I mentioned a while ago.

Resolution agreed to.

of one dollar in the case of any item mentioned in subparagraphs 1 and 3 of the said schedule, or in excess of fifty cents in the case of any item mentioned in subparagraphs 2, 4 and 5 of the said schedule:

1. Clocks and watches adapted to household or personal use..... 25 per cent;

2. Articles commonly or commercially known as jewellery, whether real or imitation, including diamonds and other precious or semi-precious stones for personal use or for adornment of the person; goldsmiths' and silversmiths' products including all gold, silver, chromium or other plated ware and pewter ware..25 per cent;

3. Articles of all kinds made in whole or in part of ivory, jet, amber, coral, mother of pearl, natural shells, tortoise shell, jade, onyx, lapis lazuli, or other semi-precious stones 25 per cent;

4. Articles of cut glassware, crystal glassware, cut or not, etched glassware, metal decorated glassware or marble..... 25 per cent;

5. Articles of china, porcelain, earthenware, stoneware or other pottery ware, except articles for use in the preparation of serving of food or drink..... 25 per cent;

(2) That in addition to any other duty or tax which may be payable under the said act, or any other statute, there shall be imposed, levied and collected an excise tax of 35 per cent on the sale price or the duty-paid value of the following items manufactured or imported into Canada;

1. Trunks; suitcases, bags and luggage of all kinds; purses; wallets; billfolds; key and card cases; handbags; jewel cases; dressing and toilet cases; shopping bags, except paper bags; golf and other sports bags; all the foregoing whether fitted or not;

2. Ash trays; tobacco pipes, cigars and cigarette holders; cigarette rolling devices and other smokers' accessories, not to include lighters, matches or tobacco;

3. Fountain pens; propelling pencils, desk sets and all other desk accessories.

Provided that in the case of items mentioned under subparagraph (1) the said tax shall not apply when they are manufactured expressly for a customer for his use in the operation of his business or profession.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister was going to give us some information.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. My colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce has handed me a memorandum addressed to him from one of his officials. It states:

The bureau of statistics have never made a practice of getting figures on inventories in the retail trade. Their returns deal only with sales. They have tabulated inventories of wholesale stocks but this would not be of any particular assistance in the points raised last evening. Certainly there is no information whatever as to stocks of individual commodities. Any figures which are received by the bureau in regard to retail sales are all in dollars and do not deal with commodities.

In the last few weeks at the instance of the wartime prices and trade board a survey has been made of the whole retail field, including departmental, chain and independent stores, requesting figures on inventories as at the first of the year and sales and purchases for monthly periods since that time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be in dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

This survey was only commenced a few weeks ago and there has been no opportunity of compiling the figures which so far have come in and which are very incomplete. These figures may be available within possibly six weeks or a little longer. This survey, however, will only give dollar volume and will not give any indication of the quantity of different commodities.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are some representations I should like to make, particularly concerning trunks, watches, tobacco pipes and fountain pens. These items are particularly necessary for the men in service. So far as the officer is concerned it is necessary for him to secure a trunk. As to these other items, they are not luxuries for the men in the armed forces; they are necessities. To-day the position of officers, particularly in Canada, who are on active service, is that their outfit allowance does not cover the extra expenditures which will have to be made should this tax go into effect. To-day they are not exempted from income tax in Canada. I personally believe the officers on active service in Canada, in whatever branch, should be exempt, but that is beside the point at the moment. These items, however, are necessities, and under this section the men in the services and their relatives and friends will have to contribute the major portion of the amount that will be realized from the imposition of this tax. Other people are not buying them, as the leader of the opposition points out. The items I have mentioned are absolute necessities for the men in service, and are purchased either by them or by their relatives. I am going to make the suggestion to the minister that these items be exempted from the tax. I realize that the minister will point out the difficulties in administration, but I think any difficulties of that kind could be obviated by having the man in the service who purchases any of these things for use in the service swear to a declaration to that effect, and if his relatives or friends wish to make him gifts of that kind, they in turn could swear to the necessary declarations pointing out that the recipient was to be a man in uniform.

The minister has consistently refused to accept suggestions for changes in the regulations, and we have come to take it for granted that regardless of what representations may be made, they will not be accepted. But I think this is one representation, very much along the line of representations made here earlier to-day, which could be accepted. It is absolutely necessary that an officer have a trunk. If it costs $25 or $30, you are adding another $10 to his cost. If a service man buys a watch it is subject to a 25 per cent tax; if he buys a fountain pen or a pipe, he has to pay a 35 per cent tax. It would be a nice gesture on the part of the minister, as well as a very considerable benefit to the men in service both here and abroad, if this exemption should be granted.

Mr. ILSLEY: That opens up the whole question of how far we should go in granting taxation exemptions to men in the service. I must say that I am very reluctant to shoot our whole taxation system full of holes on these grounds. If men in the service are not receiving sufficient remuneration, that is a matter that should be considered and is considered from time to time; but to give them special consideration through a series of tax remissions is in my judgment wrong in principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have done it, have we not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, yes. I should be very much surprised, however, to find that Great Britain does it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe they do not, nor does the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no exemption even in the case of income tax; everybody pays it in Great Britain, whether he is in the army or not. Last year when we were discussing the motion picture tax, for example, I believe one hon. member, I have forgotten who it was, suggested that men in the service going to the motion pictures should not have to pay that tax. The suggestion did not meet with any favour, but it would be the logical result of granting taxation exemptions to those in the armed forces. With regard to travel on the railways by members of the forces, we did make an exemption. There seemed to be a particularly good reason for it, because we were taking those men long distances from their homes, and if they wanted to go home they were obliged to use the railways, so that perhaps there was some reason for that. Personally I am averse to adding to the list of exemptions from taxes, and I should be surprised if there was very much demand for it. I do not think we should take our taxation system and wherever possible say, "This should not apply to members of the armed forces." The adjustment there should be in pay rather than exemptions from this, that and the other tax.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister's explanation is that it would be unfair to exempt any particular group, yet the amendment to section 15 provides for doing so. It says:

> Provided that in the case of items mentioned under subparagraph (1) the said tax shall not apply when they are manufactured expressly for a customer for his use in the operation of his business or profession.

What difference is there between exempting lawyers and doctors and exempting an officer or man in the services who as part of his equipment must have a trunk or a watch or a fountain pen or the other articles I have mentioned? I cannot see the difference in principle at all. As a matter of fact I cannot see any justification for the exemption of professional men from the operation of this section. I cannot see any purpose in it. How are you going to enforce it? You are going to set aside a small group of professional men in Canada, and they will be able to claim an exemption. They will be able to shoot holes in your taxation system just as the minister claims exempting the men in the service would. Personally I cannot see the argument advanced by the minister, particularly in view of the proviso he added to section 15 last evening.

Mr. ILSLEY: The proviso was to except a business investment; that is really what it amounted to, on the ground that this is a consumer's tax, not a business tax. A business tax is imposed in a hundred other ways, especially by the excess profits tax, the income tax, and so on. The hon. gentleman is arguing that trunks and luggage and so on are part of the professional or business equipment of officers.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Trunks, watches and fountain pens are part of their equipment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that, but I should hardly think so. I believe that in most cases it is just personal luggage.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Could not these items be standardized and supplied by the department?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I should think so.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Do I understand that brief and catalogue cases are removed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

> 23. (1) That any enactment founded on paragraph twenty of these resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force on the sixteenth day of February, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two.

(2) That any enactment founded on paragraph fourteen of these resolutions shall come into force on the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two.

(3) That any enactment founded on paragraphs one to thirteen inclusive, paragraphs fifteen to nineteen inclusive and paragraph twenty-one of these resolutions, except as hereinbefore provided, shall be deemed to have come into force on the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and forty-two and to have applied on all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that day and to have applied on all goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have an amendment to this resolution, changing the effective dates in connection with one or two of these items.

Mr. MULOCK: I move:

That resolution 23 be amended by substituting the word "sixteen" for the word "fifteen" in subsection (3) thereof, and by adding the following:

(4) (a) That any enactment founded on subsection (1) of resolution 15 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 24th day of June, 1942, and to have applied to all goods sold by any retailer on and after that day;

(b) That any enactment founded on subsection (2) of resolution 15 shall be deemed to have come into force on the 14th day of July, 1942, and to have applied to all goods manufactured, imported or taken out of warehouse on and after that day and to have applied on all goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that day;

(c) That for the period June 24 to July 13, 1942, inclusive, there shall be imposed, levied and collected from the consumer or user a retail purchase tax payable by excise stamps in respect of the goods mentioned in subsection (2) of resolution 15 at the rate of 25 per cent of the retail selling price, provided that the said tax shall not apply to goods of which the total retail selling price or the total cost to the consumer or user is not in excess of one dollar.

Mr. STIRLING: It is not very easy to follow this, without the printed amendment before one. My recollection of the amendment which the minister had moved to section 15 was that paragraphs 1, 3 and 7 were taken out of the 25 per cent class.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, paragraphs 1, 7 and 8.

Mr. STIRLING: I think some reference ought to be made to the time these will come into force.

Mr. ILSLEY: These came into effect to-day, July 14. The taxes on these three items are at the manufacturer's level, and take effect as from to-day. If the hon. member was present he will remember that I made that clear last night.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. STIRLING: The amendment which was proposed refers only to subsection 2 of resolution 15, and I would have thought that it ought to refer to 1, 7 and 8.

Mr. ILSLEY: Probably the numbering is different. My officers tell me that it is in order.

Resolution 23 as amended agreed to.

DOMINION SUCCESSION DUTY ACT

Mr. ILSLEY: I may say that resolution No. 5 is to be dropped.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Dominion Succession Duty Act and to provide—

1. That superannuation benefits granted by the dominion, the provinces or any superannuation or pension fund or plan shall be subject to succession duty.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is proposed to add a section to the succession duty act to make superannuation benefits granted by the dominion, the provinces or any superannuation or pension fund or plan subject to succession duty. This, I think, is a departure in principle from anything which has obtained heretofore. I do not believe it is in effect in any of the provinces. I should like to be informed on that point. If I understand the superannuation law correctly, the allowance paid to the widow of a deceased civil servant is equal to one-half of what the deceased would be entitled to receive. To each child under eighteen years of age an allowance is paid of 10 per cent of what the deceased was entitled to receive, but this is not to exceed $300 per annum. The allowances paid to all children shall not exceed the allowance to the widow, and the total allowance to the widow and the children shall not exceed 75 per cent of the allowance to which the civil servant would have been entitled. In other words, for the remainder of her life the widow will receive one-half the superannuation to which her husband would have been entitled, while each child under the specified age will receive 10 per cent. Is it proposed to capitalize these annuity payments to the widow and children? I use that term for lack of a better word. Is this done in any other jurisdiction? Where will they get the money to pay this levy? In the case of the dominion superannuation fund I suppose it could be taken out of the hides of the widow and the children. It could be deducted at the source.

I am wondering about the equity of this proposal. Part of these payments is contributed by the civil servant during his service and part is contributed by the government.

There is practically no management of the fund, because it exists only in the books of the nation. We have not a sound superannuation system because we do not have any investments bearing interest. It is just a bookkeeping entry, and I always thought it was deficient in that regard. However, that is the system, and I do not think this is the best time to change it. What is the equity of taxing these payments? Do civil servants get so rich during their lifetime that they come within the category of men whose estates must pay succession duty? I should like to know the justification for this new form of taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure whether the provinces tax this, but I believe they do. These superannuation payments to the widow and children I submit are within the spirit of the act which taxes annuities, insurance moneys and benefits of the kind which pass on the death of the deceased. There would be no question about the taxability of superannuation payments if the Civil Service Superannuation Act provided that the government "shall" pay the widow and the children so much per year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What does it provide?

Mr. ILSLEY: It provides that the government "may" pay the widow and children, and the point has been raised that that makes it a discretionary payment and does not entitle the widow as a right to receive anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the practice?

Mr. ILSLEY: The practice is always to pay. Using the word "may" instead of "shall" is a mere technicality. There may have been instances—I have no knowledge of any—where the government has refused to pay for some reason or another, but certainly every man in the service thinks that his wife and children are protected by his superannuation payments and regards the superannuation payments as just as safe as an annuity provided under a life insurance policy, which would be taxable. Therefore, it was thought that this should be put beyond any doubt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the theory that this is a capital asset?

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not need to say that it is a capital asset. It is property.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is property passing.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a succession.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is done only because the legislature declares it to be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it necessary to do it? I can imagine cases where a superannuated civil servant left an estate of X dollars to his wife and children which, under the exemptions in the succession duty act, without the evaluation of this annuity to his wife and children, would not be liable to any taxation at all. There are border-line cases where, by the evaluation of the annuity, which the minister in one case at least has designated as a contract with the civil servant and treating it as property passing, the value of the estate would be raised above the amount of the exemption, and the whole estate would thereupon become liable to pay succession duties. That is a pretty rough kind of legislation, and I would like to know the reason for it. Evaluating the annuity might just tip the scale by $50 and make the whole estate liable to pay a tremendous amount of duty. I do not think this is just. If the retiring allowance were large, and the widow were young and the children under eighteen, the evaluation of the annuity might be quite substantial. I am trying to visualize the border-line cases where the evaluation might just tip the scale and result in a very substantial sum being taken from the estate. I deprecate this, and I wonder why it is being done. It was not formerly done in provincial statutes. I do not know what the provincial law is now, because I have not looked at the statutes for two or three years. What is the occasion for this amendment? Why was it not done last year if it was the proper thing to do? What has drawn it to the attention of the department now? Have there been cases where it would be unjust not to tax? I think we ought to be told the story behind the story of this resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would be unfair and indefensible in my judgment to tax annuities which were purchased by the deceased and which might just tip the scale to taxability of the estate, and also to tax insurance moneys provided by the deceased, and not to tax the superannuation payments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We are accustomed to taxation upon insurance moneys.

Mr. ILSLEY: Suppose a critic of our legislation were to point out that whoever drafted this act had very carefully left out such a provision as this so that civil servants got away without paying any succession duties on their superannuation, while for the rank and file of people all over the country any annuity which is provided for the widow and children makes the estate taxable. What would the answer be? I do not think there could be any answer. I think it is only fair that these superannuation pensions, because that is what they are, annuities, should be treated the same as other annuities, the same as insurance payments, and I am sure that the public would be of that opinion. There would be no doubt at all about the matter if the word "shall" were used instead of "may" in the Civil Service Superannuation Act. Why "may" was used I do not know, but I presume it was used on the theory that "may" is the word that ought to be used when obligations are saddled upon the crown, or something of that kind. I think there is a recent case in which it was decided that these payments are not taxable because of the use of the word "may." I think that is the reason for the legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much does the minister expect to get out of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. GREEN: Is the change applicable to other pension funds such as those of the railways?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are taxed now.

Mr. GREEN: This change is to apply only to governmental annuities and superannuation?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: It seems to be broader than that because it says "any superannuation or pension fund or plan." Are these words meant to apply only to a governmental plan?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are being inserted because governmental plans were in mind. If the act does not cover these other funds, it will now. But I think it does already. It was thought by the draughtsmen and by myself that the act covered superannuation payments, and I was very much surprised to learn that it did not.

Mr. GREEN: That is under section 3 (I) (g) of the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: And (h). Section 3 (I) (g) of the act states:

> A "succession" shall be deemed to include the following dispositions of property and the beneficiary and the deceased shall be deemed to be the "successor" and "predecessor" respectively in relation to such property:—
> (g) any annuity or other interest purchased or provided by the deceased, either by himself alone or in concert or by arrangement with any other person, to the extent of the beneficial interest accruing or arising by survivorship or otherwise on the death of the deceased.

I certainly thought that included superannuation payments, and when I learned that it did not, by reason of some opinion or some court decision—I think there was a court decision—I said that the act would have to be amended at once to ensure that superannuation payments were included, because otherwise there would be a discrimination in favour of civil servants against the rank and file of the people of this country.

Mr. JACKMAN: If the widow of a civil servant remarries, do the superannuation payments cease?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry that I cannot give that information, but it will be found, I think, in the Civil Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. JACKMAN: It makes it difficult to calculate the capital value of the annuity when you have a hazardous condition like that, and sometimes you might be taking an unfair advantage.

Mr. ILSLEY: The same is true with respect to many wills under which payments to the widow cease upon remarriage.

Mr. JACKMAN: How do you calculate the capital value of an annuity to a widow which ceases if she remarries?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have had that problem.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed there would have to be a refund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have had that problem, and I have never been able to find a solution. Take the case of a widow with an annuity of $5,000 which is cut in half if she remarries. I never knew just how to deal with it, but I always advised the widow that if she did remarry she would lose one-half or three-quarters of her income, as the case might be, and that had a salutary effect. I think the minister has made a case for this amendment.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the act as it now stands, railway employees are not subject to succession duty, are they? The pertinent sections which were mentioned by the minister were (g) and (h), and I cannot see that either would apply at all to the situation of an employee, for instance, in the railway service who upon discontinuance of his services with the company would be in receipt of a pension and who subsequently dies. As at present constituted, the act does not cover that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does his widow get a pension then?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I think she gets a pension.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think she does.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am sure widows do, and this amendment goes a long way farther than is apparent on the face of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is it not an annuity provided by the deceased?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is not in the form of an annuity. It is really a pension scheme. What this amendment actually means is that the widows of all these men, employees, who heretofore have not been subject to succession duty, will now find themselves in the position of being subject thereto.

Mr. ILSLEY: But is not the pension payable yearly in the instance mentioned by the hon. gentleman? If it is payable yearly, it is an annuity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are payable monthly as a rule.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, periodically.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The matter can be cleared up simply by what occurred during the past year. There must have been instances where railway employees have been deceased. Has succession duty been charged on the amounts received by the widow?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the estate is large enough, yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That course has been followed?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The widow gets $20,000 exemption under our act.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I appreciate that, but has the amount received from the railway company been included in the computation of succession duties?

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner tells me that it is included. He does not remember particular individual cases, but they certainly would be treated as subject to the provisions of the act.

Mr. MacNICOL: A returned soldier 100 per cent disabled receives $100 a month, as I understand it. In the event of his death his widow then receives $60 a month. Will she have to pay succession duty on a capitalization of $60 a month?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): She will if he leaves over $20,000 or whatever it is.

Mr. ILSLEY: The succession is governed by the act, but I would point out that there is a partial exemption in the case of persons who die of wounds inflicted, accident occurring, or disease contracted while Canada is or was at war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What section is that in?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is section 7, subsection 3.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is special consideration there?

Mr. MacNICOL: For the returned soldier and the widow?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; not a complete exemption, necessarily, but the act is made very much more lenient with regard to the cases covered by that subsection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have any cases arisen out of that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not that I can find out.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In the case of these exemptions from succession duties I understand the amount for a widow is $20,000. How do you compute the value of a superannuation or a monthly allotment as of a certain value? Is it amortized?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an internationally used table which is applied. I cannot give the committee at the moment the name of the table—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it is a well-recognized standard table.

Mr. ILSLEY: —or the rate of interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are two or three tables, and they are all based on long experience. Do I understand that this pension is to be amortized on the lowest possible interest scale—3 per cent or less? Is that in the statute? Under what authority is that done?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only person I heard say that that was done was the hon. member for Rosedale.

Mr. JACKMAN: I did it on the analogy of succession duty applicable to a young man who was killed overseas. You took the present value of his estate, assuming that he would have lived to the normal expectancy, and then you used the base rate of 3 per cent, which I thought was a very unfair rate to have used, last year. If that is the policy of the department, I feel sure it would be at least as severe in this case, which is perhaps not as deserving a case as the other.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the rate used in practice? We have a year's experience.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get that information. I do not have it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to ask a question along the lines of the one I asked a few moments ago. If a returned soldier with 100 per cent disability dies, and his widow receives $60 a month or $720 a year, at a 3 per cent rate, if that were capitalized, it would amount to $24,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is only for the period of her life.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would she be taxed on the capitalization of her pension?

Mr. McCUAIG: The returned soldier question is dealt with in section 7, subsection 3 of the succession duty act passed last year. It states that the pension to the widow is not taxable if the man dies from wounds, accident occurring or disease contracted while Canada is or was at war and while on service with the Canadian or any other of his majesty's naval, military or air forces. As long as he died at the time he was on service the pension would not be taxable. If he was a returned soldier and was not on service when he died, the pension would be taxable the same as that of any other person.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the question which was asked by the hon. member for Davenport, I am not sure whether that is an annuity provided by the deceased within the meaning of section 3 (g), and the question has not arisen. I shall have to give that some little consideration before I give an answer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is right; it is not provided by him.

Mr. GREEN: Of course it would be if the resolution goes through.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the resolution refers to pension funds or plans.

Mr. GREEN: Is that not a plan?

Mr. ILSLEY: It depends on the wording of the act. It was not intended to cover any such—

Mr. MacNICOL: Certainly if the widow under such circumstances is to pay a succession duty, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred it would be most unfair to require her to do so, because, under present conditions, these people have a terrific struggle to get along on the pensions they are receiving.

[Mr. Jackman.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Could the point not stand for the moment? We could pass this resolution and, when the bill comes before the house, the amendment that is foreshadowed will be placed before the house and will be debated. I will read it then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It could be drafted having regard to this discussion.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We will bear in mind the representations that have been made. Several points have arisen. One is whether a pension payable under the pension act is an annuity provided by the deceased. That is the first point. The second point is: Is the pension act a pension plan within the meaning of the resolution and within the meaning of the legislation that will be based upon the resolution?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps it could be safeguarded in the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to let this stand until the bill itself is before the house, because these resolutions do not mean much in themselves. They are very short, giving an indication of what the bill will be.

Mr. GREEN: Is it clear that the minister does not intend by this resolution to extend the act to cover service pensions?

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not have any intention one way or the other about it. I never thought about it, and I do want to think about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under the other sections of the act service pensions may be taxed.

Resolution agreed to.

2. That one-half of the estate may be given to charitable organizations in Canada free of succession duty.

Mr. MacNICOL: Some time ago a gentleman told me that he intended leaving a considerable sum of money to some institution or board which looks after the blind. He wanted his money to go to some charitable institution of that kind. Suppose he left $20,000 for the use of the blind after his death; would one-half of that $20,000 come under the succession duty?

Mr. ILSLEY: In the instance suggested by the hon. member the whole bequest would be free of succession duty up to one-half of the estate. If the estate were $40,000, or more, a bequest of $20,000 to charity would be entirely free of succession duty.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I should have said $40,000, because I did not notice that up to $40,000 was exempt.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not right. I was merely trying to accommodate myself to my hon. friend's figures, but there is no $20,000 or $40,000 in the act.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would one-half of $20,000 be exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: As the act was passed last year, half of every charitable bequest is subject to succession duty and half is free. It will be found by reference to Hansard that I did not realize that was what was being done, and I do not think that the committee or the house did. The wording of this section is to a certain extent ambiguous, and I am introducing an amendment this year which will make that part of the act conform to my intentions of last year as expressed to the committee and to the whole house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will it be made retroactive? It should be if that is the basis of this amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be retroactive, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is very good; I am glad to hear that. The position is this. The act provides, by section 7 (1) (d):

> In determining the dutiable value of any property included in a succession, the following exemptions shall be allowed and no duty shall be leviable in respect thereof:
> (d) Where the successor is a charitable organization in Canada operated exclusively as such and not for the benefit, gain or profit of any person, member or shareholder thereof, provided that in the case of any property devised or bequeathed by the will of the deceased this exemption shall only apply to an amount not exceeding 50 per centum in the value of such property.

In other words, half the rate applied, and it might be up or down depending on the size of the estate and so forth. It would be graduated. The minister realized that that was not what he intended to do. I do not remember the circumstances last year; I have not looked up the debate. But half of the estate may be given to charity and pay no duty at all; but if the whole estate is given, or anything above half, then on the excess over 50 per cent the duty will be paid. I think that is good, and I am glad to hear the minister say that it will be made retroactive. We ought to approve this right off the bat.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: In view of what the minister has said with reference to resolution 2, will resolution 1 also be retroactive?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a different thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: There may not be the same enthusiasm for retroactivity there, but I think it will be, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is not going to make resolution 1 retroactive?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is intended to make it retroactive.

Resolution agreed to.

3. That the exemption in respect of gifts made prior to the twenty-ninth day of April, 1941, shall be allowed only in respect of gifts which are absolute and without any reservation of benefits to the donor;

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. ILSLEY: The law at present allows exemption from succession duty in respect of any gift made by the deceased prior to April 29, 1941. The proposed amendment is intended to make it clear that, in order to qualify under this section, gifts must have been completed prior to the specified date, and in connection with them there shall be no reservation of benefit to the donor. Otherwise the gifts will not qualify for exemption.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, there shall be no resulting trusts or benefit to the donor, and the gift must be completed. Is that not the general principle in nearly all succession duty acts? If the donor holds a string it is not a gift; if he gets anything back it is not a gift. It must be a genuine bona fide gift vested before a certain date.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is correct.

Mr. GREEN: I can understand why that provision should apply to gifts made after the act came into force or in fact after April 29, 1941, which was the date set by section 7, subsection 1, parargaph (g); but I do not understand why that provision should now be carried back to apply perhaps to a gift made, say in 1900 or in 1930. It seems to me that is very unwise legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: If a person made a gift in 1900 and reserved to himself control over the corpus of the gift until his death and he died in 1942, he did not make a gift at all. This section is not needed as far as pure gifts are concerned; it is needed because the language of the act is not clear as to what is a gift.

Mr. CASSELMAN: If the word "absolute" had been in the section last year before the word "gift", you would not need this section at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct, I think.

Mr. GREEN: Why should it not be covered by a change in paragraph (g)? If there has been a gift made say in 1935 and there is a right to change that gift but it is not changed up to the time of death, why should the act cover such a gift?

Mr. ILSLEY: Because the person dying had control of the property up to the day of his death.

Mr. GREEN: But suppose he did not make any change at all. The gift was given before this succession duty act came into effect. What right has the dominion to go back to something that happened before the act came into force? It seems to me that is similar to what has been done in Ontario, which has caused so many complaints.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it makes any difference for our purposes when the disposition of the property was made. If the person disposing of the property kept a string on it, then it should be taxable when he dies.

Mr. GREEN: Are you not going to get into this position; a father may die next year; there may be something that was given to a daughter ten years ago which she has considered as her own all that time, although there may have been some legal right retained by the father to take back that gift. Surely it is not the intention to tax that as a succession under this act which did not come into force until last year. If that is the intention, it is going very far.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree. I do not think we can go by what the daughter thought was hers in that case: it is a question of fact. The father kept control of the thing so that if the daughter did something which he disapproved he could take his property back; then it was his property for the purpose of taxation and in reality.

Mr. GREEN: But he did not take it.

Mr. ILSLEY: But he could have.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I support the hon. member for Vancouver South in this respect, that I think there is going to be a terrific amount of investigation and litigation arising out of this. If this were made retroactive to last year, it would simplify the matter. This is going to lead to no end of complications.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think it brings the law in conformity with the general principle, what it ought to be. I think this is all right.

Resolution agreed to.

4. That officials of foreign countries accredited to Canada owning real estate in Canada for residential purposes, shall in respect of such residential property be exempt from succession duty, if the country they represent grants similar relief.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this intended to be reciprocal?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, by its terms it is reciprocal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there anything in contemplation to arise out of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was requested by one dominion having representatives in this country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, let it go. It does not take effect until it is reciprocal.

Resolution agreed to.

5. That the proceeds of life insurance policies, including annuity contracts, shall be exempt from duty if the deceased was domiciled outside of Canada at the time the contract was entered into and at the time of his death and further that the beneficiary also was resident outside of Canada at the time of the death of the deceased;

Mr. MULOCK: I move that resolution 5 be deleted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You did not have any right to do this anyway, did you.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: You are simply going to rest on the present provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: The present provision does not include both life insurance policies and annuities, does it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it does not mention annuities.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister consider including annuities along with life insurance policies, because they are both in the same class.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will consider that. It may be we can put something like that in the bill if it is not there.

Amendment agreed to.

6. (a) That executors be protected against court action by successors having any interest in expectancy in the property of the deceased if the executor elects to pay the duty in respect thereof at the time of death and not at the time when the expectancy falls into possession.

(b) That in order to secure payment of the duty a statutory lien be provided for in respect of any real or immovable property in Canada owned by any person who dies domiciled outside of Canada.

Mr. MULOCK: I move that resolution 6 be renumbered 5.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very technical subject, to me at least. The question of interest and expectancy is governed by section 28, subsection 5, of the act, is it not? It is now proposed to give protection to executors against any action by successors who have any interest in expectancy in the property of the deceased if the executor elects to pay the duty at the time of death and not at the time when the expectancy falls into possession. In other words, the executor as against the successors has the right to say what he will do. What is the reason for the change? It is well enough to protect him if this is done in good faith, but there may be a question of policy, say about liquidating securities. According to this resolution, the successor has nothing to say about that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The object of the amendment seems to be that where there is an expectancy which may decline in value, the executor is taking a chance in paying succession duty shortly after the death. He may find himself liable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does this arise out of the Jost estate decision, the Eastern Trust company?

Mr. JACKMAN: When does the fixation of value take place?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it arose out of any particular case. Representations were made that executors were in a difficult position, that they would not dare to pay succession duty shortly after the death if there was a chance that property might decline in value; that estates in expectancy might decline in value and they would find that they had paid too much. This protects them if they pay promptly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, there must be a reason for legislating along that line. Surely the successor has an interest. He is a party in interest. The executor is merely an administrator. He has no interest at all. Is no consideration to be given to the successor? I believe in protecting executors who act in good faith. They should be protected.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But the person who ultimately is to come into possession has nothing to say about the matter if the executor chooses to exercise that discretion. It seems to me pretty arbitrary. Why not leave the thing alone and let them settle their differences between them, or wait? Under the statute they can wait, can they not? Section 28, subsection 1, has a statutory provision with regard to the payment of duty:

Where an annuity, term of years, life estate, or income is created by the will of a deceased person—

Does that deal with expectancy?

—or by any other disposition deemed to be included in a succession, the duty for which any person, who benefits by such annuity, term of years, life estate or income, is liable, shall, unless otherwise provided herein, be paid in four equal annual instalments at the end of one, two, three and four years, respectively, after the death of the deceased.

Then subsection 2:

Where the deceased had an interest in expectancy the duty levied on such interest in expectancy or on the successor or beneficiary in respect thereof may be paid as provided by section twenty-four of this act. . . .

Just what is the reason for the change? Apparently that was the settled law, and we ought not to make changes just for the sake of change. Why is this provision being inserted now?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is to make it safe for the executor to pay shortly after the death of the deceased, and not wait perhaps for many years for the expectancy to fall in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is a phase of it; it is protection for the executor. Has he asked for it? Has anybody asked for it on his behalf?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is your reason?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And he cannot be protected in any other way?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is going to be given this protection, although the successors may be damnified by his action?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. They may be benefited, too; the value of the property may increase.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course in that case they would get the advantage, and in the other case they would not.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It seems to me you are interfering, perhaps needlessly, with the rights of certain people; that you are barring their rights. I do not know that it is altogether just; I should like to think about it.

Mr. MacNICOL: If the property increased in value, the executor's fees would increase too.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but our succession duty would not.

Mr. WRIGHT: When is the valuation of the assets of the deceased made for succession duty purposes? Is it made immediately on death?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the value at the time of decease. Is the hon. gentleman's question as to when the value is ascertained?

Mr. WRIGHT: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: At the time the gift is made, if it is in cash, or at the time of death, at least in Ontario.

Mr. ILSLEY: Normally it is done shortly after the death of the deceased.

Mr. WRIGHT: Would the executor not be protected if the valuation were made at that time? If the assets depreciated later on, the fact that the valuation had been made already would, I should think, protect the executor.

Mr. ILSLEY: He is not protected, anyway, and that is the point.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is not protected in a given case, but my recollection of the Jost case is that Mr. Jost, owned, we will say, two or three million dollars worth of highly speculative securities. He died just when the market reached its peak, and the duty value attaching at that time was the top market price. Immediately afterwards came the slump and these shares were cut in value several times; in fact they were reduced to nothing. The trust company paid the duty; I suppose they were being pressed by the government of Nova Scotia, and there was a deficit. Not only was there nothing coming by way of residue, which was to have gone to the university with which I am connected and which thought it was going to get a substantial sum; there was $80,000 of a deficit in connection with the succession duties paid by the trust company, for which under certain conditions they might become liable. There is more to it than that, of course, but they had to go to the supreme court to get a declaration, and one decision went directly against them. They appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada, and I am not sure whether judgment has been given. But I do not know why an expectancy could not be valued as of the date of death, and the duty settled. The deferring of the payment is to prevent hasty liquidation which might be necessary in order to get the money out of that particular fund, but I suggest that the assessment of value could be made as of the date of death on the basis of values at that time, and capitalized according to the period of time that would lapse before it was vested.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what we want to have the right to do. Take section 28, subsection 4:

> The duty mentioned in subsection two and subsection three of this section—

That is, the duty on assets in expectancy.

> —if not paid within the time limited by section twenty-four of this act—

That is, within six months of the decease.

> —shall be due when such interest in expectancy falls into possession and shall be paid within three months thereafter on the basis of the fair market value at the date of falling into possession of the property in respect to which such interest in expectancy existed. . . .

I think that is all that is material in that section. Apparently under that the executor has his option. It seems to be the intention to give the executor or the beneficiary his choice as to whether he will pay within six months after the death or within three months after the expectancy falls into possession. If the executor makes a wrong choice; if he chooses to pay within six months after the death and it turns out that a great deal of money has been needlessly paid to the government as a result of his wrong choice, which apparently was the case in the instance mentioned by the hon. gentleman—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not think it is quite that.

Mr. ILSLEY: He does not want to be liable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He wants to be relieved from liability.

Mr. GREEN: What is the reason for paragraph (b) of this resolution, and just how far will that statutory lien go?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no other effective remedy against a non-resident. This applies to cases of persons who die while domiciled outside Canada and owning real property in Canada.

Mr. GREEN: For example, someone in the old country owning property in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There might not be any real remedy against the person. He might sell the property in Canada while he himself was abroad—I am assuming that the beneficiary, the person who succeeds, is abroad—and the government would have no recourse against anyone. There is no reason why there should not be a lien on the real property in Canada owned by a non-resident, or a person not domiciled here.

Mr. GREEN: How is the act working at the present time? I think in our province releases are obtained from the succession duty officer, which have to be presented at the registry office. Why cannot some plan of that sort be worked out rather than a statutory lien?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there not a lien now on property owned by a person domiciled in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, there is not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no lien in the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GRAYDON: I do not think there is any.

Mr. McCUAIG: In Ontario property does not vest unless you attach to the conveyance the consent of the treasurer of Ontario. If a solicitor takes an executor's deed into the registry office, the registrar will not accept it unless that consent is attached. But he will register it without the consent of the dominion succession duty officer. It seems to me that there should be some provision that property would not vest unless the dominion succession duty is paid. There may be some difficulty in that because we have no control over property.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Torrens system in Ontario goes a little further than that. They will not allow you to attach the dominion release to their documents because it might be a recognition that the dominion department had some rights over real property transfers. If we take into consideration the position of the dominion with respect to real property rights, it would appear that there is no real protection so far as the duty is concerned, that is, having regard to the normal transfer of real property.

Mr. GREEN: If this change is made, there will be a statutory lien created by a dominion statute, and this will place a cloud upon the title, particularly if the provincial land office will not accept a release from the dominion succession duty officials. How do you get rid of that cloud on title?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not a question of their not accepting it; we did not assert any lien until now. This will apply in only an insignificant number of cases where property is owned by non-residents who are domiciled abroad.

Mr. GRAYDON: You cannot get a lien on a title to land in Canada any more against a non-resident than you can against a resident.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I did not follow the hon. gentleman. Was he arguing that it was beyond our powers to do it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is what it amounts to.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be, but I think we had better try it.

Mr. GREEN: Why should the dominion step in and put on a statutory lien which must be disposed of before a purchaser can obtain a clear title? If the dominion government do not know whether they have the power to put on a lien of that type, I do not think they are doing right by just going ahead and putting it on.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said I thought we had better find out. I should think that we would have the power, that it was ancillary to our powers to tax. If we have not, perhaps we had better find out, but I certainly think it is better to try to get our taxes. The lack of interest in the crown's desire to get taxes always surprises me. Why should the crown not have its taxes from non-residents who have property in Canada? Otherwise they can sell the property right out from under our noses. Why should we not try to get our duty on real property? Why should there be all this terrific tenderness about somebody being inconvenienced?

Mr. GRAYDON: The only tenderness is in the minister's disposition. The minister is the only one who is being tender about this matter. We are only trying to point out the obvious pitfalls which may be met. As the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has said, if you create a cloud upon the title before a transfer of property is made, some action must be taken to find out whether the duty has been paid or to remove the cloud.

Mr. ILSLEY: We will know whether it has been paid.

Mr. GRAYDON: It will mean that you cannot transfer property within the six months period. Is this going to tie up estates in the manner indicated by the hon. member for Vancouver South? It is not a question of being tender over anybody; it is a question of getting this thing regularized so that the government will not put everybody in an awkward position.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is this not done in the provinces?

Mr. ABBOTT: A clearance from the collector of succession duties must be registered before a title can be conveyed. This cloud can be easily removed by paying the tax. There is no provision in this resolution to provide that a clearance should be registered against the property, but in Quebec a clearance from the collector of succession duties must be registered against movable property. I think this is a most reasonable precaution. As the minister said, non-residents can in effect thumb their noses at the tax collector. They can say, "I have sold my property; you can do what you like".

Mr. GREEN: We had the same trouble in British Columbia some years ago. I do not remember the wording of the legislation, but it caused all kinds of trouble and confusion in clearing up estates and eventually it was dropped. Surely the proper way to arrange this matter is by agreement with the provincial governments who control the land registry offices. I should think you could easily get them to call for a release in connection with the dominion succession duty. You are going much farther here; you are creating a statutory lien without any provision for the registration of that lien.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, there is. That will be provided for in the legislation.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that the situation should be examined more thoroughly before this step is taken. Nobody is trying to help people to evade taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think we would be justified in asking for a stated case to find out whether we have the power to do this.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the Bank Act?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have the power to tax, and we have the power to impose succession duties. We have approached this matter with a considerable feeling of responsibility. I thought hon. gentlemen would be suggesting that we should make sure that we were going to get our taxes from residents by providing for a lien and release before the property of a deceased could be vested. However, we are not going that far.

Mr. GRAYDON: That was the next point I had in mind. I think we should adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Vancouver South and have provincial legislation passed to provide that no property may be transferred unless there is attached to the conveyance, not only the consent of the treasurer of the province as to the provincial succession duties but also the consent of the dominion succession duty department. In that way you could get away from all your troubles.

Mr. ILSLEY: You might get away from all your troubles after you have had about ten years of trouble. If anyone thinks that we could get the consent of the nine provinces to pass legislation like that, he is certainly an optimist.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Here is what I marked down when I read this over. I noted that this is for the protection of the treasury, and I have not changed my mind. How it may be done might be the subject of consideration when we see the bill. You can impose a lien by statute, but the enforcement of that against real property is a different thing.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, referring to resolution 1 and the Civil Service Superannuation Act, I have ascertained that if the widow of a civil servant remarries she loses her pension. If a widow were to remarry shortly after the decease of her husband and succession duties had been paid upon the evaluated pension, would the department give a refund?

Mr. ILSLEY: So the commissioner informed me this afternoon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They would give a refund?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that is the policy of the department, I have nothing further to say on that point.

Mr. GREEN: With regard to this resolution, now renumbered 5, will the minister, before the bill is brought in, give consideration to the questions we raised this afternoon concerning the registration of a statutory lien and the general effect of such a lien?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

7. That executors be permitted to pay out, without the consent of the minister, sums not in excess of—

(1) $1,500 in the case of moneys payable:
  (a) under any contract of insurance;
  (b) by any friendly society; or
  (c) under any superannuation or pension fund or plan.

(2) $500 in the case of moneys payable:
  (a) out of any bank account; or
  (b) out of any trust or loan company's deposit account; or
  (c) in satisfaction of wages or salaries.

Mr. MULOCK: I move that resolution 7 be renumbered 6.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a new provision, is it not? There is no such provision in the act now?

Mr. ILSLEY: The present provision is that money cannot be paid.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But in practice I assume that the department found it necessary that some money should be made immediately available to be paid by the executor without the consent of the minister?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is rather a small sum of money in subsection 2: $500 "out of any bank account; or out of any trust or loan company's deposit account; or in satisfaction of wages or salaries". In the province from which I come that provision has been found very difficult in practice, because circumstances may arise when very much more than that sum is required immediately, but until the return is made it is difficult to get a release in the case of a substantial estate. In such cases the executors have been obliged to go to the bank and borrow the money on their own responsibility. That is a position which ought not to obtain.

The deceased may have been the owner and manager of a business, and money may be required immediately for, we will say, the payroll. What is going to happen if only $500 is available? Are the men to go without their wages, or must the executor borrow the money on his own responsibility? It seems to me that some further provision should be made for a situation like that. By subsection 2 (c) the executors are permitted to pay in satisfaction of wages or salaries a sum not in execess of $500. But suppose the banks will not give the money to the executor without a clearance. I know what has happened in two cases within a year, but not under this act. The executors were forced to borrow the money themselves. Does the minister think that $500 gives leeway enough? I suggest it is not enough. I am raising no question about the $1,500. It has been found in practice, has it not, that there must be some amount of leeway given? The minister says that under the statute there is no provision now for paying without the consent of the minister, and I have no doubt that that has been found in practice to work a hardship. I suggest that the sum of $2,000 ought to be made available. If it is a substantial estate the government will lose nothing. Otherwise the executor will have to borrow the money.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. I have not given very much consideration to these amounts. They were requested by the officers of the national revenue department, who thought they were necessary for the proper administration of the act. That is about all I know with regard to them, which I admit is not very much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are necessary for the proper carrying on of the business of the estate of the deceased. I tried to impress upon the provincial authorities in New Brunswick that $500 was too small an amount. If a man dies away from home, in Florida, for example, it would not cover funeral expenses. You could not bury him under $1,200 or $1,500. It is very expensive. That has happened, I know, because I have paid the bills.

Mr. ILSLEY: The minister can give his consent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but you have to come clear to Ottawa to get it.

Mr. ILSLEY: You do not have to travel here physically.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, but you have to go through all the forms. I have no doubt that if the minister knew the parties he would do it, but if he did not know them he would not do it. Why could this not be made $2,000, or at least raise the $500 to $1,500, the same as for life insurance? If the minister will raise it to $1,500 I shall be quite content.

Mr. ILSLEY: This provision is just to give a little leeway in the very early period after the death of the deceased. The minister may consent to the payment of such sums as it is necessary to pay out, but even before there is time to get the minister's consent it may be necessary to pay out something, and so these small sums are put in here to make sure that there is no undue inconvenience or hardship to the estate. I think they should be sufficient.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are just arbitrary amounts. The minister is so inflexible over a small matter that I hesitate to urge him further, but I do suggest that $500 is not enough in the case of a large estate, where there will be greater expenses than in the case of a smaller estate.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is not half enough.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not half enough. If the minister will make it $1,500 instead of $500 I shall be content, but $500 would go nowhere.

Mr. ILSLEY: Consideration can be given to the suggestion before the bill is brought down.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why not give in on that now?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know enough about it. I do not think a case has been made for it. I cannot see why anything but a very small sum is required here. The act was drawn without any permission in this regard at all, on the assumption that the minister would give his consent. A little delay is sometimes necessary, and to bridge that period of delay small sums are provided.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest that when the act was originally drawn this was an injustice, and the minister is only partly relieving the injustice. In every act I have ever looked at there is a sum available without the consent. I do not know of a single succession duty act which does not provide some sum. If this had come to my attention when we were putting through the bill last year, I would have suggested an increase, but with the weight of things one has on one's mind one cannot think of everything. It is true that it is an arbitrary sum. But let me give a concrete case, if my hon. friend the member for Northumberland, New Brunswick (Mr. O'Brien) will permit me. He is the owner of a business which he operates in his own name. He may die suddenly, and there may be liabilities accruing within a day or two after his death. Funds may be in the bank, but the bank cannot touch the funds and pay that liability. He may not have enough money to meet his payroll. In such a case some provision must be made to meet a business situation, especially where a business is going to be carried on. It is asking very little to increase this amount from $500 to $1,500. The crown is not going to lose anything in the case of an important estate or an estate with substantial assets. It would make it that much easier to get along.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I will look at the provincial acts and see what sums are in them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I believe in New Brunswick it is $500.

Mr. MacNICOL: This is a question which I believe I asked a year ago, and I have forgotten the answer. It has to do with the estate of a person deceased some years ago. Apparently, according to the Ontario succession duty act, the estate was not of sufficient size to compel the will to be probated, and it has not been probated. Is that estate affected in any way by this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: When did the death take place.

Mr. MacNICOL: Several years ago.

Mr. ILSLEY: Estates belonging to people who died before the passage of the act are not subject to the provisions of the act.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

8. That the foregoing resolutions shall apply from the commencement of the Dominion Succession Duty Act.

Mr. MULOCK: I move that resolution 8 be renumbered 7.

Amendment agreed to.

Resolution as amended agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT, 1940

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, and to provide—

1. That the rates of tax as set out in the second schedule to the said act be repealed and the following substituted therefor:

First part—

Ten per centum of the profits of corporations and joint stock companies and 15 per centum of the profits of all persons other than corporations, before deduction therefrom of any tax paid thereon under the Income War Tax Act.

Second part—

One hundred per centum of the excess profits.

Third part—

Twelve per centum of profits of corporations and joint stock companies before deduction therefrom of any tax paid thereon under the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is a very difficult, technical taxation measure. The whole question of excess profits is difficult enough, and I confess that from the minister's statement in the budget I was not able to understand all that he was driving at, in two particulars: first, the changes in the base of the E.P.T., as it is called, and second, the question of the refundable portion, to be found in resolution 5. Would the minister please state just what the present position is up to the point where he leaps from 75 per cent to 100 per cent of the excess profits, and then what the change is? There has been a change on the way up, I think.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Put it on the record anyway.

Mr. ILSLEY: The present rate structure of the Excess Profits Tax Act provides for either (a) a tax of 22 per cent on total profits, or (b) a tax of 75 per cent on excess profits, whichever is the greater. Under this rate structure it works out that the 75 per cent tax on excess profits is the greater of the two taxes when profits have increased by slightly more than 56 per cent of standard profits. All companies paid at least 40 per cent tax on total profits; that is, 18 per cent under the income tax, and 22 per cent under the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Under two parts? Is it not in two bites?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The 18 per cent was under the Income War Tax Act, and the 22 per cent was under the Excess Profits Tax Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The 10 per cent under the first part and the 12 per cent under the third?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I am talking about the old act.

If, however, profits were more than 156 per cent of the standard—the correct figure is 156·7—then the effective rate of tax on additional profits amounted to 79·5 per cent. Under the new rate structure the 22 per cent has been broken down into a tax of 12 per cent, which applies to total profits in all cases, while the remaining 10 per cent constitutes the tax which is the alternative to the tax on excess profits which was previously 75 per cent but which now becomes 100 per cent.

I have stated that the alternative taxes under the present set-up are equal when a company's profits have increased by just over 56 per cent. Under the proposed rates the alternative taxes are equal when profits have increased by only 16⅔ per cent. It is obvious then that the proposed changes in the rate structure bring into effect the high rate on excess profits at a much lower point than is done in the present law.

To sum up the proposal, I may say that all corporate profits will be taxed at least 40 per cent; and when profits are increased more than 16⅔ of standard profits, the whole of this excess is taken under the 100 per cent rate, with the 20 per cent refund provision provided for in resolution 4.

In the case of taxpayers other than corporations the 15 per cent flat rate tax remains unaltered as the alternative to the new rate of 100 per cent on excess profits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was going on to ask the minister if he would give a concrete illustration such as I received to-day from one of the officers of the department, we will say based on a tax on $17,000, which happens to be the figure given, and spread it on the record in tabulated form: first, under the old system; second, under the proposed system, which would show exactly how much tax there would be under the old system, and how the tax was made up in the new system and what it will be. It seems to me that that would be valuable to everyone.

Mr. JACKMAN: When the minister is putting such an example on the record—I am sure there are very few hon. members who understand exactly how this works out, and I have not had an opportunity to produce practical examples—would he give sufficient examples to illustrate the position of a company which has a fairly steady profit as related to its standard base, and also companies showing very large gains as a result of working on some war contracts?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This, of course, is corporations.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will explain in my own words the change that has been made. It is a very technical matter and, if I make a mistake in the course of the explanation, I shall have to correct it to-morrow. I do not think, however, that I shall make a mistake because I am fairly familiar with the legislation from the beginning.

First, let me tell the committee the rule that is applied in ascertaining the taxes payable under the Excess Profits Tax Act now before it is amended. There is an 18 per cent tax under the Income War Tax Act. That is the first thing to remember. Then there is the excess profits tax. Profits are taxed at 75 per cent, and there is a provision that the amount in any event shall not be less than 22 per cent of the total profits. That is to say, you must determine whether 75 per cent of the excess, after deduction of the 18 per cent income tax on the excess, is greater than 22 per cent on the total profits. If it is greater, then one takes the 75 per cent on the excess, which means 79½ per cent on the excess if the 18 per cent income tax is first taken into account. The result is that every company must pay at least 40 per cent on its total profits—18 per cent under the Income War Tax Act and 22 per cent under the Excess Profits Tax Act—and some companies will pay more than that. If their excess profits are so large that this 79½ per cent on the excess is greater than the 22 per cent on the total profits, then they will pay 79½ per cent on the excess. One could imagine a company where the two would be exactly equal, and as a matter of fact a company which earns in the taxation year 156·7 per cent of its standard profits would pay exactly the same under both rules.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the point at which they balance.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the point at which the two rules bring the same result; 79½ per cent of the excess is equal to 22 per cent of the total profits. So that in practice a very simple rule is applied. One just finds out what the percentage of the company's profits is of its standard profits. If its profits are anything up to 156·7 per cent of its standard profits, one just takes 40 per cent of the profits and that is the tax; that is the combined tax, income and excess profits tax. But if its profits are more than 156·7 per cent of the standard profits, one has to take 40 per cent of the 156·7 per cent and 79½ per cent on the remainder over that. That is a simple rule which is applied under the present system to the working out of the taxation on companies. That 156·7, in the minds of chartered accountants, lawyers, income tax officials, and finance department officials, is a well known point; it is the breaking point, the critical point. It is an important figure. Now we have come along and changed our act so that instead of there being an 18 per cent flat rate on all profits, there is now a 30 per cent rate on all profits, which is described in the budget speech as 18 per cent income tax and 12 per cent excess profits tax. But whatever it is called, it is a 30 per cent rate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the total in any event?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. TUSTIN: Does that apply to anything under $5,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; according to the resolutions it does. With regard to the option, instead of 22 per cent of the total, or 79½ per cent of the excess, whichever is greater, now it is 10 per cent of the total or 100 per cent of the excess, which ever is greater. So that now every company pays at least 40 per cent of its profits, but it may pay more. For the purposes of the record I will stop there. The rates are now such that the breaking point, instead of being 156·7 is 116·666, and, therefore the simple rule to apply to the computation of the new excess profits tax is to reckon 40 per cent if the company earns less than 116·6 per cent of its standard profits. The simple rule is to take 40 per cent of total profits; but if it earns more than that, one takes 40 per cent up to 116·6 and 100 per cent if it is over, and of the 100 per cent 20 per cent is returnable. That 20 per cent does not apply to excess over standard profits but excess over 116·6 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Twenty per cent of that and that alone.

Mr. ILSLEY: Twenty per cent of that and that alone. I have seen some recapitulations of this in business papers and, as usual, there is some misunderstanding. I am not surprised, but there is a misunderstanding. It seems to be thought that 20 per cent of the excess over 100 per cent is returnable. It is only 20 per cent of the excess over 116·66 per cent.

That is a brief explanation of the new measure, and the best I can give. It will be seen that since 40 per cent of any profits are taken and 100 per cent over 116·66 per cent, the most any company has left is 70 per cent of its standard profits, because 40 per cent of 116·6 is 46·6, which, subtracted from 116·6, leaves 70. So that the most any company can have left available for dividends under this measure is 70 per cent of its standard profits. It may have in addition a credit with the government of the 20 per cent excess. If it earns more than 116·6 per cent of its standard profits, it will have to its credit 20 per cent of the excess over 116·6.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister could put on the record something such as I have here from the department, it would be of great value. That is, certain examples of corporations and of individuals. It must be understood that the minister has been talking about corporations, and there has been an increase in the tax on small corporations; or rather the exemption that small corporations had heretofore has been wiped out to a degree if not altogether. Is that not true?

Mr. ILSLEY: The small corporation has been paying 18 per cent. Hereafter it is proposed that the small corporation shall pay 30 per cent. I might tell the committee the background in my mind of that change. The small corporation, that is the one having less than $5,000 income, before the dominion-provincial agreements, in British Columbia, for example, was paying 28 per cent; that is, 18 per cent to the dominion and 10 per cent to the province. In Ontario it was paying 23 per cent; that is, 18 per cent to the dominion and 5 per cent to the province; in Quebec, 23 per cent, being 18 per cent to the dominion and 5 per cent to the province. Then we entered into the agreements, and we wiped out the provincial corporation tax on the income of 1941 and did not put on any tax in its place. Therefore the small corporation last year had a favoured position as compared with the position it enjoyed in the past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): However, the amount of money involved would not be very large.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not know; I did not make a computation. But it becomes a matter of judgment as to what tax should be imposed on the small corporation. On the one hand it is in competition with the proprietorship which pays an excess profits tax of 15 per cent; that is the minimum for the proprietorship. On the other hand it is in competition with the corporation which earns a little more than $5,000, to which corporation the rates I have been talking about apply, a minimum of 40 per cent. It is anybody's judgment whether the rate on the small corporation should be 25 per cent or 30 per cent or any intermediate figure or any figure near there. I do not see why 30 per cent is not as near a just tax on the small corporation as anything else. They may think they are unjustly taxed as compared with the unincorporated company, but they enjoy certain advantages in being incorporated, and also they are advantageously treated as compared with the slightly larger company which pays a minimum of 40 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister means they have been advantageously treated?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they will be in the future, because a company having more than $5,000 profits is taxable at a minimum of 40 per cent now, and under the new legislation there has been no change in that 40 per cent minimum. But the company with $5,000 profit or less will pay a minimum of 30 per cent. There is nothing about 40 per cent in regard to that company.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest to the minister that he put these examples on record They would be valuable to hon. members.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not looked at them. I understand the commissioner of income tax let the hon. gentleman have a memorandum. I have not seen that memorandum myself. I should like to look at it before I put it on record, although I have no doubt it is correct.

Mr. JACKMAN: The minister stated in regard to the returnable portion of the excess profits tax, that it referred to only 20 per cent above a certain amount. Is it 20 per cent above the normal 18 per cent, or 20 per cent of what?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is 20 per cent of the amount of profits over and above 116·6 per cent of the standard profits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like the minister to clarify the position with regard to the second part of this proposal of resolution 4, which he evidently overlooked, that is to say the principle upon which the refundable part is to be repaid. If one looks at resolution 5, it will be observed that a very long delay is going to take place between the payment and the return. For instance, the refundable portion of the tax in respect of the profits of the present year is to be paid not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the government commencing after the cessation of hostilities. I suggest that might be two years after the cessation of hostilities, depending of course on when the proclamation is made. Suppose the proclamation came next March, it is possible this money might be with the government for nearly three years without any interest. I was going to suggest that perhaps that is too long, or to ask why the delay of two years.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be repaid before that, but it may be retained until that time. It may be that conditions during the first year and perhaps part of the second year after the termination of hostilities will be such that the expenditure of money in the country would in the opinion of the government be economically injurious—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government will not have the money to pay it. That is what the minister is saying?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, I did not have that in mind, but perhaps that is true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that would be the only reason why repayment would be withheld.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; after the last war the armistice was in November, 1918, and it was in 1919 and the spring of 1920 that the most inflationary period of all came. It might be foolish for the government to turn loose more money in a period like that. It would, I think, have been advantageous after the last war to retain any such money as this until late in 1920 or thereabouts, or 1921, instead of paying it back in 1918 or 1919.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the other hand, if industries are going to turn from war activity to peace-time activity and they have to change their machinery and undertake rehabilitation, they will want to begin as soon as war orders cease. With what funds are they going to do this? These refundable tax payments are not assignable to a bank as security. A company cannot borrow on the strength of them. However, I would assume that any responsible government, upon appropriate representation being made that the situation was one in which the money ought to be repaid, would not unduly withhold the return of this 20 per cent. It is going to be a very important feature in rehabilitation. As the minister has stated, this two-year period is the maximum period that the government can withhold this money. I am sorry we have not had a little more clarification of the whole position. I think I understand it, though I am not sure I do, but I am not going to delay the committee further. If other hon. members do not think they understand it, they can ask questions.

Mr. O'BRIEN: A few moments ago the leader of the opposition used me in a figure of speech as a horrible example, and it was rather an experience to find myself travelling heavenward. Now, however, since reincarnation has set in, I should like to bring to the attention of the minister my feeling that in this excess profits division there should be a difference in the treatment given two classes of industry to-day. For instance, there is the large business which has been developed purely as a result of the war; in most instances with government capital; certainly with all business coming from the government. In these instances the government furnishes the orders, the cash to pay for them, the inspectors, the capital required to set up the plant, in some instances perhaps the money required to process the material. In addition, the material is furnished. Of course these companies are doing excellent work in the war effort; but, after all, their position is relatively simple. I am thinking of the primary producer, what I might describe as the owner-manager type of business, such as lumbering, fishing and presumably farming, though farming is not usually called a business.

Mr. PERLEY: You need more brains in that than in anything else.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Quite so. People engaged in business of that kind are entirely on their own. Not only do they have to supply their own capital, but they have to face all the hazards of obtaining their raw material. Those hazards, of course, are provided by the elements. I can imagine a large company, let us say with a pre-war turn-over of perhaps $5,000,000, taking a 10 per cent profit. But that business has been so blown up as a result of the war—and of course it is now exclusively war business that is being done—that the $5,000,000 turn-over has possibly become a $100,000,000 turn-over, so that the 25 per cent they were allowed to retain under the budget of last year is in itself an enormous income, because of the way in which the volume of business has been increased. Every time an order passes through the office of that large corporation, 25 per cent of the profit is retained, and this adds up to an enormous total. On the other hand, in another business the volume may have increased only moderately, and next year that business may suffer a very severe loss. So I maintain that smaller business should be given a more liberal share of the profits as a protection against the unknown dangers ahead.

Some days ago, I think when delivering his budget speech, the minister said that Canada's war effort had now reached the point where it was not necessary to take capital from profits. That I can quite well understand in connection with the large corporations to which I have referred, but it does not apply to businesses of the other smaller class. In connection with these small companies it is possible that debts incurred during the depression are now being liquidated; yet a small business may want to improve its position, perhaps by putting in a new machine. The only possible source from which money can be secured to put in that machine is profits. These people cannot go to the public and ask for financing, nor are they in a position to come to the government and request capital assistance. So if business of this kind is to continue during the war, not to mention conditions post-war, it is essential that it be given more consideration than is given these large corporations, which, after all, are virtually a branch of government to-day. The small fellow is simply going along, fighting the hazards on his own responsibility, using his own capital and depending upon his own ingenuity. I believe a system such as I suggest is in operation in the United States, and I would strongly recommend to the minister that if small business is to be developed in this country for the benefit of the war effort, and to meet post-war conditions, this should be done.

Perhaps I might refer briefly to the $500 limit that may be left in any business, which of course comes under the succession duties division. It was in this connection that the leader of the opposition referred to my particular case. Of course when I die and daisies begin growing over me it really does not make very much difference to me what happens to my estate, or to anyone else except those men whom I am to-day employing. I am only a symbol in the social order to-day; because I have position, and all that sort of thing, I am able to pass on to others the advantages to which they are entitled. There is a theory abroad in this land that the world owes a man a living. It does not; but it distinctly owes him a chance to earn a living, and if capital is going to be taken away in this manner, the person from whom the money is taken is not injured, but those left behind, facing responsibilities with which they are not able to cope, are the ones who are going to suffer.

Mr. GERSHAW: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the situation with regard to one industry, that of ranching, which might well be described as a depressed industry. During the standard years conditions were very bad for those engaged in ranching, so that instead of having any profits at all, they suffered losses. During the last year or so conditions have been somewhat better, but the ranchers are all in debt, and now they will have 100 per cent of their profits taken away, since all their profits will be excess profits because, based on the standard years, they had no profits at all. Is there any likelihood of the board of referees considering such cases?

Mr. ILSLEY: The board of referees under the Excess Profits Tax Act is under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Revenue, who might have some knowledge of what action if any has been taken in reference to the ranchers of Alberta. I know that when I was in the west a year ago a delegation came to see me, making representations that the ranching industry should be classified as a depressed industry within the meaning of the Excess Profits Tax Act, but I do not know what happened afterwards. There is abundant machinery for dealing with cases of that kind. I assume that they have applied to the board of referees in the usual course and have received the fair and just treatment which business men tell me is the treatment they receive from that board.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wanted to ask something in that connection also. There is no doubt that the setting up of this board has served a useful purpose. I think it is the accepted opinion that it was a very high-class board, that they had skilful and competent auditors and advisers who prepared the docket for them in each case and that once they got into their stride they were able to handle a great many cases quickly. On the assumption that a company was in the depressed industry class, that it was a company that had no standard profits, then the board of referees would have the case referred to it by the minister. I understand that must be done under the law, that a case does not go to the board automatically but must be referred to it by the minister, and that the board deals with a man's case on the basis of the examination that has been made of his position. If he comes within the category of a depressed industry, then under the law he is allowed a return of so much per cent on the capital investment. Is that a correct statement to make?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On that basis, when he begins to earn sufficient to come under the Excess Profits Tax Act, he then pays the ordinary corporation income tax; he pays that in addition to the excess profits tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, if he has had excess profits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has a different base. One company which is not in the depressed industry class has a historical base, and the other has a base which is computed by the board. Whatever is earned is then subject to the ordinary operation of the law?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: What reason has the minister for not paying interest on the returnable portion? The government is making full use of this with intention that it shall go back to the industry, and I think it would be a reasonable thing to pay interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first intention of the government was to treat this returnable portion as being something less than the property of the company. I believe they did this for a while in Great Britain. However, after consideration we thought that we should regard it as the company's money to be refunded, but we did not take the final step of making interest payable on it. There is no particular rule which would indicate that we should. When I say that our first intention was to treat it as being something less than the company's money we had in mind providing that the company should put it to a certain use, otherwise they would not have it back.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The government held a string on it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) argued most forcibly that that is exactly what we ought to do, but there were many difficulties in the way. To begin with, a condition which the government might feel justified in attaching to the return of the money could be that it be used to furnish employment or be invested in capital investments. That would be impossible for a large number of companies. There are commercial enterprises, insurance companies, and other companies of that type which could not invest money in any employment-giving asset. We thought there would be serious discrimination arising between different types of companies.

To a certain extent we were guided by the experience of Great Britain. I have not a thorough knowledge of their law, but my impression is that the first year the British government levied a tax of 100 per cent on excess profits, they agreed to return 20 per cent. The agreement had certain elements of vagueness about it, and the result was that the companies did not consider the 20 per cent as an asset. The British government found that the incentive to economy and efficiency in management and operation was lacking because from the companies' point of view the whole 100 per cent excess was gone. Why be economical, why try if the whole thing is gone? The government then began to move toward the companies, so to speak. Either the second or the third year, I am not sure of my dates, but certainly this year the British government made it clear that the money was the companies' money. I assume they did so because they felt it was necessary to agree to that in order to provide some incentive for economy and the cutting down of expenses and the running of business as business ought to be run.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They created a credit.

Mr. ILSLEY: They created a credit. There was no mistake as to whose money it was. It was money refundable to the companies, and that provided some incentive to carry on in the usual prudent and economical way in which business enterprises conduct their affairs. For one reason or another we felt that if we were to preserve that incentive in this country we should do that. We decided to do it as a matter of policy rather than to rely entirely upon a desire to do the right thing or a willingness to do the right thing on the part of all companies. We felt that we would have to make it clear that this money was the company's money and that this credit would be returned within the period provided, but we did not feel any obligation to go farther and pay interest. The government had every right to take 100 per cent and keep it if they wished to, to take it as a tax, but we decided as a matter of policy, to take the course we have followed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Interest is paid on the compulsory saving portion of the personal income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are treating the individual better than the corporation, and there is an excellent reason for that. The money that we get from the individual is not excess profits. It must be remembered that the money we are taking from these companies is excess profits presumably made out of the war and, morally, the government has every right to take all of it and keep it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Not all of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Any excess.

Mr. JACKMAN: The difference between 18 and 40 per cent is not money made out of the war. That is how I characterized the so-called excess profits tax when it was imposed two years ago. It is an excess tax on profits in connection with a substantial part of it. Any company which is earning the same amount as it did prior to the war is taxed 40 per cent rather than 18 per cent because of the imposition of the excess profits tax. If it is earning less than it earned in the pre-war years, it is still taxed 40 per cent. This is the only type of activity in the country that is taxed in this manner; farming and other forms of activity are not taxed unless they are in a corporate form. I think we should be fair about the matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I went too far in saying that the government is morally entitled to the whole excess. Opinions differ as to what the government has a moral right to do, but I think it has a moral right to appropriate that part which is war profits. There could be no exception taken even by the most enthusiastic upholder of private initiative to that point of view. It was not on moral grounds that we provided for the return of the 20 per cent; it was on the ground of meeting an expediency and providing an incentive. We felt that we would get a much better result, but we did not feel there was an obligation to pay interest.

When we came to the individual we were not necessarily taking his money out of excess earnings. In most instances we were not. We are providing that if they have certain kinds of savings we will accept those in lieu of the payments made to us. They will get interest on these other savings, or something equivalent to interest, and therefore it is appropriate to allow the short term rate of interest.

Mr. McCANN: The returnable portion of the excess profits tax is a corporation or company asset, which, however, for the duration of the war and a period thereafter is frozen. In the event of a company having to go into bankruptcy or liquidation, is there any process by which that returnable portion can be returned to the company in order to help liquidate or wind up the estate? Emergencies may arise necessitating the quick winding up of an estate, and yet the company may have this asset which is in the hands of the government. Can these companies get anything to indicate that they have an asset of this kind, and is it transferable or negotiable, or is there any process by which under special circumstances it can be returned at an earlier date than indicated in the resolution?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was considered when the resolution and the legislation were being prepared, but we felt that the liquidator would just have to wait. It is not an unusual thing for liquidators to wait, sometimes for years, but we hope it will not be for many years. There is no provision for paying that money out to bankrupt companies any earlier than we pay it out to solvent companies. It cannot be paid out under this legislation until after the cessation of hostilities, and I do not think we would be justified in providing that if a company went into bankruptcy it could get the money any earlier.

Mr. McCANN: Suppose that death necessitates the winding up of a solvent company. Is there any process by which the returnable portion could be turned over to the estate?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on this subject, but I have been waiting until we reach resolution 5, which I think would be the appropriate one.

The CHAIRMAN: I would suggest to the committee that resolutions 1 to 5 be taken together because they are interlocking. If that be agreeable to the committee, we shall proceed accordingly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

2. That in computing the amount of excess profits subject to the tax of 100 per centum, corporations be allowed to deduct such portion of the income tax and the tax payable under the third part of the second schedule to the excess Profits Tax Act as the excess profits bear to the total profits.

3. That the exemption from excess profits tax of corporations with profits not in excess of $5,000 be limited to an exemption from the tax under the first part or the second part of the second schedule but that such corporations be subject to the tax under the third part of the second schedule, namely, a tax, of 12 per centum of profits.

4. That there shall be refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with paragraph five of these resolutions an amount equal to 20 per centum of the profits above the point at which the tax calculated under the first part of the second schedule is equal to the tax calculated under the second part of the second schedule, provided that the said profits have been paid by way of taxes under the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, to the Receiver General of Canada.

5. That the refundable portion of any tax exigible under any enactment founded on these resolutions shall be repaid to the taxpayer or to his legal representatives, after the cessation of hostilities between Canada and Germany, Italy and Japan, and in the following manner: The refundable portion of the tax in respect of the profits of 1942 and fiscal periods ending therein, shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than the end of the second fiscal period of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities; the refundable portion of the tax in respect of the profits of 1943 and fiscal periods ending therein shall be repaid at such times and in such instalments as the governor in council may determine but not later than the end of the third fiscal year of the government commencing after the said cessation of hostilities and so on in respect of the refundable portion of the tax on the profits of successive years or fiscal periods.

The date of the cessation of hostilities shall be deemed to be the date of a proclamation issued under the authority of the governor in council declaring that, for purposes of the said refund, the war no longer exists.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was very sorry to hear the minister say a few moments ago that the point which I had raised in the budget debate had been carefully considered but had been more or less discarded for the time being. As a matter of fact I have drafted an amendment to resolution 5 which I intend to put forward to test the feeling of the committee, and I hope yet that the minister will reconsider this question. After all, we are dealing, not with profits but with excess profits. These excess profits are being made largely out of the distress of the nation, and to my mind they ought never to be considered as an asset of a company, corporation or individual. They ought to be the property of the people of Canada out of whose distress these profits are being made. Therefore I think we should take 100 per cent of all excess profits over and above the base allowed, but the government has decided otherwise.

The minister said a few minutes ago that one of the considerations which had governed in the decision of the department was that it was very difficult to differentiate between what

I might term an industrial corporation operating an industry and a commercial one, such as an insurance company or something of that sort. If we are going to return any part of the excess profits—and the minister proposes under this to return 20 per cent—the only justification for returning any part would be that the profit was to be used for the rehabilitation of the industry in its transition from war-time to peace-time activity, or for the creation of employment during a consequent period of unemployment or during the demobilization period, or to bring some good of some sort to the people of Canada. I would suggest that a commercial organization like an insurance company is not required to rehabilitate itself in the post-war period in the same way as an industrial company, and therefore that consideration should not enter into the decision at all. If such companies make an excess profit, we should take 100 per cent of that excess profit.

I read an article in this morning's Montreal Gazette with which I thoroughly agree. It was by Professor Harold Laski, of London. Professor Laski pointed out that we are losing this war to-day because we insist on maintaining a system which makes it impossible for us to conduct this war in the same manner in which our opponents are conducting their war, and the result is that our compromises bring chaos and inefficiency.

I wanted to move something which I thought would be acceptable, and I am going to place it before the committee now so that when we come to resolution 5 it will receive more consideration than it has received up to the present time. My suggestion is this:

That section 5 be amended by the insertion of the words "under such conditions" after the word "times" in the sixth line of the section, and by insertion of the same words "under such conditions" after the word "times" in the tenth line of the section.

Further, that after the word "periods" at the end of the first paragraph, the following words be added:

"Provided, however, that all such refundable portions of the tax in respect of the profits aforementioned, shall not be used for the payment of dividends, bonuses, or otherwise disbursed except for the rehabilitation of the industry, the provision of employment or such other service to the Canadian people as the governor in council may determine."

I am going to pass that to the Chairman so that the amendment may be considered when we reach the appropriate clause. I think it is altogether wrong for us to leave any loophole whatsoever which will allow at the conclusion of the war any corporation or company to defeat the very objective of the excess profits tax and to use the accumulated refundable portion of the tax for dividends and bonuses to their shareholders. I say that no one has the right to make a profit out of the blood and agony of the people of this country in this war, and it is our duty to see to it that nothing of that sort is done now or in the future.

I want to be quite clear about what I have in mind. First of all I do not think any portion of the excess profits tax should be refunded, but since it has been decided to refund 20 per cent, then I would say that if it is to be refunded it should be refunded to be used as the governor in council may determine, for the creation of work or for the transition of industry from war-time to peace-time activity. In other words, we should not regard the refundable excess profits as the property of a company or corporation to do with as they wish, but as a common gift to all the people of Canada to help rehabilitate some of the industrial life of this nation after the war is over. I again urge the minister to give consideration to the point of view I have suggested.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wish to tell the committee a homely story which was given me the other day, and which I think has value and has a bearing on the point raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. Out at the western coast the owner of a fishing boat came into a marine depot at the height of a very good fishing season. The owner of the depot asked him if he wished to fill up his tank with oil, and the proprietor of the boat said, "No, I just came in to return an article which I borrowed the other day." "Well", the owner of the marine depot said, "I am very much surprised that that is the case, that you are not filling up. Surely you are not laying up your boat at the height of a good fishing season?" The owner of the boat said, "Yes, that is just what I am doing. I have had a very good season so far, an excellent season. If I take the boat out again I run a certain risk of losing it, and if I make any more money the government will take whatever I earn, and I have decided that my wisest course is to lay up the boat and go down to the prairies and make a visit to some friends which I intended making."

As I say, that is a homely story, but it has an important lesson for us who are attempting to improve methods of taxation and at the same time raise the moneys which necessarily must be raised for our war effort. I have always thought that, while nobody would care to argue against the proposition—it is the natural desire of every hon. member—that no person shall make any profit out of the suffering of the people as a result of the war effort, we must keep in mind that there must be the incentive to the whole of the people of Canada to produce annually just as much goods and services as is humanly possible. If we remove the natural incentive to produce other than the minimum, we destroy any hope of producing the maximum. I for one would suggest to the Minister of Finance that he see to it that the fact that 20 per cent is taken and kept as a saving for the individual is made well known to the people of Canada, and that a special campaign of advertising is used for that purpose. In the ordinary corporation with legal or accounting advice there will be no misinterpretation of this particular provision in regard to the 20 per cent; but the great majority of individuals is rather of the opinion that when the government takes money without giving in return a bond or some other formal acknowledgment, it intends never to give it back, and the promise contained in a statute which most people do not read leaves them in the unfortunate position of not recognizing that this section does supply the incentive I spoke about, and that by continuing to produce fish, or whatever it may be their task to produce, they add to the annual wealth from which we can take these taxes. I suggest it will be wise economy for the minister to attempt to bring home to the people of Canada that it is both patriotic and profitable to work as hard and produce as much as possible during this war period.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Would the minister explain to the committee how he has arrived at the conclusion that you must give a corporation or a company a certain amount of excess profits tax as an incentive to produce, but you can expect the hundreds of thousands of people, the workers, who actually do the production, to produce without any incentive as far as this particular budget is concerned? I fail to see in it any provision where any individual worker is given any incentive to produce. His wages are frozen; his income tax is increased; he apparently needs no incentive. Yet production, in the final analysis, depends upon the multitude of workers as much as it does upon the industrial corporation or company.

Mr. ILSLEY: The ordinary run of mankind does require an incentive, even in time of war, to produce. We have delegations repeatedly from farmers and others who say they cannot be expected to produce farm products unless the price is sufficient to give them some incentive, and we are blamed for not arranging matters so that the price does give them that incentive. We hear in this chamber hon. members who say that if we desire greater production it is a simple thing to get it by increasing the price. For instance, I have heard the hon. member for Lethbridge say that if we were to make the price of farm products high enough we need not worry about getting the farm products.

With regard to labour I am a little bit out of the field. The Minister of Labour would be much better to expound this matter than I am. But I do not think we would get men to work overtime unless we paid them the wages for working overtime. There are some men who work overtime on the ordinary day rate, but I think most workers require time and a half, or in some cases double time, in order to work overtime. That is what I mean by incentive; and they would not work without the incentive, or a great many of them certainly would not.

Then, I understand, there are reclassifications and promotions in industry. An apprentice goes in at a certain wage. If he qualifies himself for a better position, a higher classification, he gets that higher classification. But he does not do the work in the higher classification unless he gets a higher wage. The higher wage he is to get is the incentive which induces him to qualify himself for the higher range of duties, and he gets it. That is a profit, for under our laws that is not denied by any order in council or any law that I know of. Indeed, promotions and reclassifications of labour in industry are continually taking place. We are told that unless we want to disorganize the whole productive machinery of the country we must give labour some monetary incentive. The labourer is given it, and he responds to it.

I wish we did not have to do that. I wish that everybody would, in a time like this, work as a great many do, apparently, without any incentive at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Service to the state ought to be a good incentive.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know there are executives, boards of directors of companies, and others who, if I am any judge, do not require a monetary incentive to do everything they possibly can, because they believe everything is at stake. Then there are others who have not attained that high state of sacrifice, or perhaps comprehension, and they say, "Well, what is the use? Am I going to run the risk of a loss if, when I make a profit, it is all taken away from me?" That is the way some talk. I did not make people that way. If I were constructing them perhaps I would construct them in a different way, but that is the way they are. It is not confined to business. It is not confined to big corporations. You will find it, I fancy, among members of this house. You find it among all classes and all callings, high and low, rich and poor. It is what might properly be called human nature. I think that answers the hon. gentleman.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I would ask the minister to observe that we have been talking about excess profits, and I fail to see where workers in any classification are likely to get much in the way of excess profits as an incentive to produce. I am glad to hear the minister say that consideration has been given to the incentive motive as far as the worker, the actual producer, is concerned. You will find in the budget later that there are points in it which suggest that the worker would be just as well off if he did not work overtime. I have had a number of instances of that called to my attention which will come up in another connection. But as to the question of getting excess profits as an incentive to produce, I do not think the minister is consistent in his dealings with the companies as compared with his dealings with individuals as workers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me say something about these excess profits which it is assumed it will be possible for companies to earn. If a company makes any excess profits whatever; if it makes 100 per cent of its pre-war earnings—exactly 100 per cent—it will be permitted under this taxation to retain 60 per cent. If it makes 116·6 per cent, it will be permitted to retain 70 per cent. If it makes 150 per cent of its pre-war earnings, it will be permitted to retain 76·7 per cent. If it makes 200 per cent of its pre-war earnings, it will be permitted to retain 86·7 per cent. If it makes 250 per cent of its pre-war earnings, it will be permitted to retain 96·7 per cent. If it makes 300 per cent of its pre-war earnings, it will be permitted to retain 106·7 per cent—and when I say retain, I am including the 20 per cent refundable. No company can retain more than 70 per cent of its pre-war earnings leaving out that 20 per cent refundable, so that I have tried to make this taxation such that my hon. friend and his associates will not need to worry about the amount that will be left in the hands of the companies. The figures I have given are rather significant.

Mr. COLDWELL: It is a great improvement.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not think the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) with regard to agriculture should be allowed to pass unchallenged. He has said that agriculture has asked for a price that will give some incentive, and he referred to statements made by the hon. member for Lethbridge. The hon. member for Lethbridge has never asked that the farmer should be allowed prices which would return excess profits. All he has asked for is that the farmer shall receive a parity price which will return to him his cost of production; in other words, a price which is commensurate with the price that he has to pay for other commodities. Unless the farmer receives that price, he cannot pay his costs and he is bound to go into debt. To try to draw a comparison between that situation and the situation where the manufacturers want to have refunded to them excess profits is certainly not very fair. The farmers are not even asking for a price that will return a fair profit; as I say, they are simply asking for a parity price that will make it possible for them to pay cost of production. I do not think the minister made a sound argument when he tried to compare agriculture with other industries which made substantial profits before the war and which are now making handsome excess profits.

Mr. GILLIS: I am prompted to say a few words on this matter because of remarks made by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Graham). I know him to be a pretty solid person, and I was surprised at the homely story he told the committee in order to protect those who require excess profits. Evidently he believes in profitable patriotism; if you do not get well paid for fighting the war, you should not fight it. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has made our position clear with the amendment with respect to excess profits. The industrialists to-day are doing a job to save their own skins as well as those of the rest of the nation, and they are guaranteed pre-war profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: Oh no; how do you make that out?

Mr. GILLIS: Oh, yes. The normal profits of the last three years are taken as the base, and it is computed from that. If we had facilities at our disposal to probe thoroughly the excess profits question, it would startle some of us. I am not satisfied that the figures we have been getting are correct. The hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Jackman) may have reason to think they are, but we are not satisfied. The hon. member for Swift Current makes certain statements with regard to fishermen, and I am doubtful whether there are any fishermen in Canada who would take the attitude suggested by that hon. gentleman. I do not think there is any fisherman who would use 25 per cent of the fishing season to make sufficient money to care for his own needs and then, because of taxation, decline to produce any more, taking a vacation to visit his friends, and contributing nothing to the treasury. Any man who takes that attitude at a time like this should be interned, because he is definitely no asset to the nation. What would the hon. member for Swift Current think of the average industrial worker employed six days a week who took certain time off for similar reasons? He does not wish to work overtime, but in the majority of cases he is forced to do so by circumstances. It is not because he wants to do so. By working six days a week the great majority of them bring themselves within the range of the income tax. The great majority of them contribute the last two days they work by way of taxation. What would the hon. member think if each week they worked for four days and then stayed at home for two days, taking care of their recreational requirements, looking after their health, going on a fishing trip, and so on. What would he think of them if they took that attitude and argued that because they worked two additional days a week they would be contributing to the treasury by way of taxation. He would call them saboteurs, and rightly so. But the industrialist or manufacturer who takes advantage of the war situation to put a gun to the head of the Minister of Finance or anyone else in the country charged with the responsibility of directing that particular phase of our war effort is just as much a saboteur as those who would spend two days a week at home instead of producing because, by producing, they would come within the scope of the income tax. There is no difference. I would advise the hon. member to advise his friend who refused to fish because he might have to pay tax that if he is visiting in Saskatchewan now he should take that boat out and be a Canadian citizen and make his contribution. I rose to say that because the position is absolutely analogous. I have a document showing the contribution some industrial workers are making by way of taxation a large percentage of what they get. What is shown as paid directly is a very small proportion of their tax, direct and indirect, but they are not doing any squawking about it.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in his remarks and the amendment proposed has made the position clear; there should be no excess profits; no one should make any money out of this war. Our attitude should be that of New Zealand, that no one shall be any richer because he has not gone to the war, that no one who has gone to the war shall be any worse off when he comes back because he went to the war and made his contribution. If that 20 per cent of the excess profits tax is not used in rehabilitation after the war, then I say that those who are charged with the responsibility and have the authority of legislating are failing in their duty to those who have offered their all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the hon. member consider that excess profits and war profits are synonymous? I think there is a distinction. One may include part of the other, but they are not synonymous.

Mr. GILLIS: No, they are not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the hon. member must make a distinction between the two.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to endorse what the hon. member for Acadia said. I was surprised when the minister spoke of the farmer as wanting excess profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was the implication.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it was not. There was no such implication. The hon. gentleman was asking me why people needed incentives, and I was explaining that every normal person wants incentives. I was not blaming the farmer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Put it this way; the incentive the minister was talking about was the incentive of making a profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

An hon. MEMBER: Excess profits.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, the minister says no. I accept his word. The reason why there have been so many delegations of farmers waiting on the government during recent years was not that the farmers were asking for a profit, but that they were asking for a price which would be more nearly commensurate with the cost of production, which they were not getting at that time. Let us not get these things mixed up.

Mr. EVANS: They want a profit over the cost of production.

Mr. COLDWELL: They were not asking for a profit over the cost of production; the figures we have produced from time to time amply show that over a period of years they were not getting cost of production when they were getting 70 cents or even 90 cents a bushel for wheat at Fort William. As long as men and women are able to see life now and security in the future, that is what they ask as a rule. The bulk of our population never see that at all. We are not discussing that; we are discussing the question of excess profit, and, as I said earlier, if I had my way at this time—and this would be a compromise—I would take 100 per cent of all profit over, say a base profit of 4 per cent.

Mr. EVANS: Would the hon. member take that from the farmer too?

Mr. COLDWELL: The farmer does not get 4 per cent. If he got 4 per cent in addition to the cost of production year in and year out, he would be tickled to death. But let us not get into that. I would take 100 per cent. I say this again, that until we recognize that in this war there ought to be no profit, and get as near as we can to equality of sacrifice in that particular field—of course there can be no real equality of sacrifice when men are giving their lives—we shall not have the kind of war effort that we ought to have. As I said in quoting the article I read to-day by Harold Laski, we are to-day in the position we are in because we have refused to recognize that this is not a war in the sense we have talked about war in the past; it is in effect a world revolution; it is in effect the demand of the plain ordinary man for the right to live decently apart from monopolies and with no one making a profit out of his production and labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is what Hitler says.

Mr. COLDWELL: We should take all profits above a minimum amount.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am glad to hear this discussion on the general principle of the excess profits tax, because I would call into question the fundamentals of this legislation. It is arbitrary in its arrangement; it is based on no sound principle. The excess is what a manufacturer or business man makes over and above what he made in some standard period. What he made in the standard period may itself have been excess.

Mr. JACKMAN: Or less.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Or on the contrary it may have been below what is a normal profit. So the excess profits tax is geared up to allow perhaps more than normal profits to those who were in business and doing well during the standard period, and with almost diabolical ingenuity to exempt from extreme taxation those concerns which are well established as against those which were not doing business, or were making very small profits, or no profits, during the standard period. The great gold mining companies were doing very well during the standard period.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. JACKMAN: They saved the country during the great depression.

Mr. ROEBUCK: They did very well, they and their employees, in producing gold which helped our exchange position. I am not attacking them. We are now talking about what is fair as between various classes of producers. The gold mining companies were making big money during the standard period, and what they then made is the standard now of normal profits to that industry. It is only profits in excess of the great profits they made in those years that are now considered excess profits. The financial institutions, the thoroughly established ones, were doing well during that period. So were the manufacturers—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not all.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Not all, but the big standard ones were doing well. The fact that some were not doing well does not answer my criticism of the general principle of this taxation.

I submit there is something to be said in favour of the principle laid down by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation; that is, that all companies should be treated alike and that whatever your rate of normal tax may be, it should be applied to all, big and small, those who were making profits previously and those who were not. I do not say 4 per cent is sufficient; I do not know, but it would be fairer were we to allow profit at some standard rate upon the investment of the company and call all profits above that rate excess profits.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would you guarantee the profits of those companies that did not make any?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I do not think the question is asked seriously. Of course you will not guarantee profits; if you do you keep in existence unprofitable businesses, which would be a loss to the country. That has been a principle of the Conservative party throughout the ages, to bolster those concerns which did not make a natural, normal profit, to give them, by tariffs and other favours, profits which they could not otherwise make, and to charge the losses up to the paying business of the country. That is abnormal; that is not sound, and I do not believe in it. A business that cannot make profits should close its doors.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the Liberal party never did anything like that?

Mr. ROEBUCK: Why are you trying to bring party politics into this discussion? At all events, the Conservative party has no reason to complain about the tariff measures of the Liberal party, which have always been very much more moderate than when hon. gentlemen opposite have been in office.

An hon. MEMBER: Are you sure?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am perfectly satisfied as to that. But that sort of talk is a red herring across this trail.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who started it?

Mr. ROEBUCK: You started it. I was trying to discuss the principles underlying the excess profits tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And you levelled a charge against the Conservative party.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, if I have made any charges against the poor Conservative party I withdraw them. It is in a bad fix now, and I do not want to do it any more damage than has been done.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROEBUCK: There will be a chance for all of you to make speeches when I get through.

Mr. GRAYDON: I doubt it.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Well, you have made a good many more than I have so far. A good deal of the time of the house is consumed in chit-chat from across the way. Now let me get back to what I was saying, because I was trying to make a point clear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So important you cannot remember.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Will hon. gentlemen please not interrupt?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I object to all this moaning from across the way.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Moaning is right; moaning at the bar.

I endorse the general principles, though not the exact amount, stated by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. I think there is something sound in the principle he has enunciated, that all companies should pay the same; that all companies should be allowed the same rate of normal profits, and that everything in excess of that rate should be considered excess profit. During war time I have no objection to taking all truly excess profits and not paying back anything.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Which one is carried?

The CHAIRMAN: We were considering resolutions 1, 2, 3, 4 and 5.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before resolution 5 is carried I want to ask the minister a question with respect to the words "cessation of hostilities". Is the committee to understand that the cessation of hostilities referred to there is to be a special date for the purposes of the refund, or will it be the official date of the cessation of hostilities?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not intended that it shall be selected for the purpose of determining the date of the refund.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I am asking.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only reason for providing that it shall be fixed by the governor in council is that the date of the cessation of hostilities may be difficult to ascertain as a matter of fact. It is impossible to foresee what the condition of affairs will be. Some nations may be fighting on; there may be none fighting; the fighting may stop and then start again. One can hardly tell what sort of world we shall be living in; we are using a term in this measure which is not susceptible of exact determination by evidence, and therefore it must be fixed by the governor in council. I think wherever terms such as "the end of the war" or "the cessation of hostilities" are used in legislation there is always some means provided for making an exact determination of that date. I know under the War Measures Act a proclamation is provided for.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the proclamation which I assumed to be applicable in this case.

Mr. ILSLEY: That proclamation may not be accurate; the War Measures Act may run for a period after the termination of the war, as it did before.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did it run after the proclamation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, but the war ceased, I would say, on the date of the armistice in November, 1918. The War Measures Act, however, did not pass out until 1919 or 1920.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The armistice was only the cessation of actual fighting; there was a long period in between the armistice and the latter stages, so the war was not over officially until the peace treaty was signed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it was over then, but that is the very point. I would have said the armistice was the date, but my hon. friend thinks it was the date of the peace treaty. Maybe neither was the actual date of the cessation of hostilities; and because that is an ambiguous term provision is made for fixing the date by order in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But you do not intend to have any date fixed for the purposes of this question of refund? That is not going to be fixed having regard only to that feature; the general date of the cessation of hostilities or of the peace will be the date contemplated here?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN: The question is on the amendment.

Mr. SHAW: Mr. Chairman, the members of the group of which I am a member intend to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. We feel as he does with regard to the matter of excess profits. These excess profits—and I am sorry to say that I believe the minister confused them with ordinary profits—as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said are obtained as a consequence of the agony of the people of this country. We feel that the 20 per cent which is returnable should be returnable only with the clear-cut understanding that, as the amendment sets out, it is to be used during the transition period, when industries now producing materials of war will revert to the production of peace-time consumer goods. To the extent that this 20 per cent is used for that purpose we would have no objection to its refund, or to the extent that it might be used to assist in the estblishment of workers who of necessity will lose positions in war industries and must be given positions in the peace-time industrial life of this country. Many of the boys who are now overseas fighting will come back to this country maimed, and will find that they have to fight for all they are worth to secure a mere pittance as a pension. We do not feel that there is anything in the way of excess profits being paid to them after the war, and therefore we are of the opinion that the industries have no claim upon excess profits which may be used, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, to pay dividends to shareholders. We are in favour of the amendment and intend to support it.

Mr. PERLEY: I am going to support this amendment. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has put the case very well. This returnable portion of the tax should not be used by the companies to pay dividends; it should be used to provide employment. So far as farmers are concerned, I think the money should be used for rehabilitation purposes and improvements. I do not agree with the hon. member for Northumberland, New Brunswick (Mr. O'Brien) who said that farmers are not business men. I say it requires more brains to make a success of farming than it does to make a success of any other industry.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I meant that farming is generally carried on by the individual and does not provide the same form of employment as industry. Of course, the larger the farming operation, the more like a business it becomes.

Mr. PERLEY: I think it is agreed that the agricultural industry requires brains to make a success of it. It has been said that no one should be better off after this war. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gershaw) has said that the agricultural industry has been a depressed industry, not only since the war but for many years before. This industry provides more new wealth than any other industry in Canada. There are many farms in western Canada where new machinery and improvements are needed, and if any farmers are in a position where 20 per cent will be returned, I think it should be used for that purpose. I am going to support this amendment. As the member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) says, the farmers have not been unreasonable or have not asked for too much. All they have been asking for is parity so far as production costs are concerned. They have been producing at less than cost without complaining too much.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think it should be said at this time that the farm delegations which came here were not asking for profits. The average cost of producing a bushel of wheat in the west before the war was $1, and all the farmer is getting is 70 cents a bushel at the farm. The farmers are continuing to grow wheat—they must grow it to live—and yet they must sell it at 30 per cent below the cost of production. They continue to grow wheat because they know it is needed in the winning of this war. The present indications are that they will grow 400,000,000 bushels this year, but they are doing it at a loss. They feel badly when they hear about companies making excess profits. When they know that a discussion is going on as to how those excess profits will be dealt with and what will be done with the portion to be returned, they will be looking carefully to find out what the House of Commons thinks of this principle. There is a deep and important principle involved. Large profits are being made out of war industries, out of the making of implements of destruction. The armament makers of the world have created wars in the past for the sake of the profits they might make. What do the members of this House of Commons think should be done with the profits made out of war industry? A member who votes for this amendment is voting that such profits shall be used for the reestablishment of the nation, and a member who votes against the amendment is voting in favour of these companies being permitted to make their profits, being permitted to make what I call blood-money.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to say a word in support of this amendment. I was rather surprised at the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) with regard to agriculture. I know many farmers who would have sold out had they not felt that it was patriotic to keep going during the last year or two, even though they were short of help. As I have pointed out before in this house, I do not know how many farmers are going to be able to pay their way and take care of past obligations. Why should we have, on the one hand, a set-up for industry, and expect, on the other hand, the agriculturist to produce at below cost? If industry is to have this 20 per cent which is to be set aside until after the war—

Mr. JACKMAN: If they earn it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If they earn it, all right. If it is set aside, it certainly should be used for rehabilitation purposes. In my part of the country the farmers have been going behind for a number of years, and with the present budget resolutions I do not know how they will be able to take care of past obligations and pay their income taxes, even though they have good crops. They are in a hopeless position. I am going to support this amendment, and I hope the minister will see his way clear to do something for the agriculturists.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister stated whether the company to whom this 20 per cent is returnable may use it for any purpose they wish?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: It is left open to the companies to use it for any purpose they wish?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just as though they lent the money to the government without interest.

Mr. STIRLING: Surely the minister is riding two horses when he says that. I advanced the opinion a little while ago that since this was the companies' money and the government was making use of it, it should be returned with interest. The minister took the view that excess profits were something it was perfectly proper for the government to take. Then, out of bounty it proposes to return 20 per cent of those profits under certain conditions and at a certain time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say anything about bounty.

Mr. STIRLING: Perhaps I am not repeating the minister's words, but he did say the government had decided to return 20 per cent of the tax it is taking, a tax which he says it is perfectly legitimate for the government of Canada to take and retain, but it has now been decided to return 20 per cent of it. It seems to me that it would be reasonable if the government were to take the view that the main purpose for which that returning was done was for the purpose of rehabilitation, to restore industry to that position in which it can make beneficial use of its opportunities by the provision of work for the people. If the government takes the view that it will exercise no guidance whatever with regard to the use to which this money is put by the companies concerned, I must support the amendment.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Mr. Chairman, I spoke a few moments ago commending some of the general principles expressed by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. That is one thing, but it is quite another thing to support this amendment. I am going to vote against it, and I am going to tell you why.

I hope that by the time this war is over we shall be done with government interference with private business. An attempt on the part of the government, perhaps, years before this money will be repaid, to regulate its expenditures after it is repaid would be the very extreme of governmental interference. Surely, if this money is in the nature of a loan to the government or is not altogether taxes which are to be kept and never returned, the least that we can do is to allow people who receive the money to use it as their best judgment dictates. Their judgment exercised at the time must be better than ours, exercised long in advance and through a government department. I would hesitate to interfere with private business in the handling of its own funds after the war is over, perhaps years from now. We have too much government interference now.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am surprised at the argument made by the hon. member for Trinity. I would be pleased indeed to see excess profits wiped out altogether, and I would like to see my hon. friend introducing an amendment along the lines in which he suggested he was in agreement with me. But I realize that the government has adopted this principle, and therefore what we are trying to do to-night is to see to it that this amount which is to be returned shall not be used by the companies simply as deferred dividends, as post-war bonuses, as melons, if you like, to be cut in the future. In that respect we are trying to safeguard the Canadian people.

I do not agree with the hon. member, of course, when he says that what we should do is to refrain from telling business in the future what it should do. I want to tell him this, that in my opinion the day has gone for good when business can do what it likes. The world will never return to economic anarchy. I once heard an hon. gentleman who sits opposite say to me, "I am an anarchist philosophically and the nearest approach to anarchy that I can find at the present time is the Liberal party". That is fundamentally correct.

On the other hand, we are living in an ordered world, and in my opinion this house, in deciding at this time that we are going to return to industry after the war any portion of its excess profits—and that is the principle which the government has laid down—should also safeguard the nation by seeing that this money shall be used only for the rehabilitation of industry, for the provision of employment, for the good of the nation, and shall not be used simply to pay deferred dividends, bonuses, and so on. I think we should lay down that principle to-night and not wait until some future day when a vested interest will have been acquired in this particular fund.

I am surprised at the argument of the hon. member for Trinity. Someone has said that these industries were not doing any too well to-day. But on June 11 my hon. friend the member for Weyburn put on the record a list of war companies picked at random from the newspapers, and showed that their aggregate profit increase in 1941 over the 1936-39 average was no less than 62 per cent. Take Aluminum Limited, a very prosperous Canadian company in pre-war years. Its average profit in the base period, 1936-39, was $9,454,000, and that had increased in 1941 to $16,015,000; Consolidated Mining and Smelting increased from an average profit in the 1936-39 period of $9,294,000 to $12,199,000 in 1941; Ford of Canada increased from $949,000 in the 1936-39 period to $3,379,000 in 1941, and so on.

Mr. ABBOTT: How much taxes did they pay in those years?

Mr. COLDWELL: These were the profits after the taxes had been paid. It is not a matter of what taxes you pay; it is what you have left after you have paid your taxes that counts. I say that we have a perfect right to make to-night the stipulation the amendment suggests, and not leave it to some future date. I strongly urge the committee to support the amendment I have moved.

Amendment negatived: yeas, 16; nays, 60.

Resolutions 1 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Resolution 6 agreed to.

7. That the definition of "standard profits" be amended to exclude therefrom dividends deemed to have been received under the provisions of section 19 of the Income War Tax Act.

Mr. JACKMAN: Would the minister explain just what is meant by that? I have not the Income War Tax Act in front of me.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 19 of the Income War Tax Act relates to the winding up of companies and deems undistributed income to have been distributed as a dividend and taxable in that year in the hands of the recipient. It will be obvious that if a receiving company had received such a dividend in the standard period, it would constitute a very unusual and abnormal profit which should not be allowed to constitute part of the base from which excess profits are measured. The present resolution will exclude from standard profits those items of unusual, non-recurring income.

Mr. JACKMAN: If a company which has established its standard base does receive an appreciable increase in any one fiscal year, will that have to go into the one year's operating account? For instance, take Canadian Car and Foundry.

Mr. ILSLEY: They will be excluded in the taxation year.

Mr. JACKMAN: It will not all be taken away from them in one year?

Mr. ILSLEY: There may be some qualification as to that. I will give some consideration to it. There was an amendment last year, if I remember correctly, relating to the extent to which that type of profit could be taken into the taxation year. The two situations should be comparable.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Is there any way in which a taxpayer can find out what is considered a fair standard profit in a certain type of industry? For instance, assume that a certain company made $10,000 in the 1936-39 period, and that company considered it a fair profit, but a competitor made 12 per cent which he considered a fair profit. He might even ask to have his standard raised to say, 15 per cent, which the board might consider a fair profit. I wonder how that is governed.

Mr. ILSLEY: As the hon. gentleman knows, the board of referees cannot allow more than 10 per cent when capital is the determining factor. With new companies, my recollection is that the capital standard is not used, that the return is the return which is usual in the industry. It is not strictly accurate to say that the capital standard is not used; what I should have said is that the 10 per cent limit does not apply in the case of a new company. In the case of depressed companies they cannot get a standard from the board of referees which will be greater than 10 per cent on their capital; it may be considerably less. As a matter of fact, I do not know what their standard is. But the new companies are not limited to the 10 per cent, and there it is a matter for the board.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Are bank borrowings considered as capital?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the earned capital.

10. That the income of any company derived from the production of base metals or strategic minerals shall be exempt from taxation hereunder if the company first came into production during the period of three years commencing the first day of January, 1943, and such exemption shall extend to the income of the first three fiscal periods of twelve months each of any such company following commencement of such production.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain why the date set is January 1, 1943? It would seem that that would mean that if one of these base metal mines came into production during the present year, the company would not get the benefit of the amendment. Surely that is not the intention.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a continuation in a different form of the present provision. The legislation on this matter has been in existence since 1936.

Mr. GREEN: Not for base metal mines, has it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Metalliferous mines.

Mr. GREEN: What section of the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 89 of the Income War Tax Act. The present exemption applies to metalliferous mines, and that applies to mines which come into production prior to January 1, 1943. This legislation applies to mines which come into production after January 1, 1943. It widens the number of mines which are eligible, and it changes the exemption from an exemption from income tax to an exemption from excess profits tax, which would be more favourable to the companies. There is perhaps a point in that marginal number; that is, there might be some strategic minerals which will not get any assistance until after January 1, 1943. What I have said would appear to be correct from the section, but it is not correct for this reason, that there is a tuning-up period. That is to say, if a mine were discovered now, it would not be deemed to come into production until six months from now, and therefore it would come within the benefits of the proposed section.

Mr. GREEN: But there are many zinc and lead mines in British Columbia which have been operated off and on for many years, going back as far as fifty years, but have been lying dormant for perhaps the last ten years. They may be brought into production this year, and it seems to me that they should get the benefit of this provision. The resolution reads in this way, that if the company first comes into production before January 1, 1943, then the company will not get the benefit of this amendment, and I suggest to the minister that that is wrong. What we want to do is to encourage these mines to get into production as quickly as possible, and certainly from the way this resolution reads a company would be discouraged from coming into production until after the first of January, 1943. If it is intended to broaden the exemption, surely that should be dated back, say to the first of January, 1942.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is confused. There is no difference in principle between the two sections. That is, if the old mine cannot qualify now, it cannot qualify after the first of January, 1943, because it is still an old mine. What the hon. gentleman is really asking for is to extend this section from new mines to old mines which have been abandoned and are brought into production again.

Mr. GREEN: No, but the way this resolution reads is, "if the company first came into production during the period of three years"; it does not say, "if 'the mine' first came into production"; it is "the company". The chances are that a mine of this type would be taken over by a new company; it would not be a matter of the old company doing the development work. It is very important that every encouragement should be given to have these mines opened up this summer. If you wait until the late fall or the winter, they cannot start in until next spring, and a whole year will be lost.

Mr. ILSLEY: It may be that the resolution is wrongly worded. It is intended that the wording shall be the same and the principle shall be the same as section 89 of the Income War Tax Act. The two differences are, first, that it will extend to a wider range of mines, and second, that it will be an exemption from excess profits tax, not income tax. I should add a third, that precious metals are out.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister mean that it will apply only to the new mines?

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. GREEN: Well, I suggest that that is ridiculous, because the most likely place from which you will get the zinc and the lead will be from these old mines which have been partly developed. For one new mine where you would be able to get the metal there would be a hundred partly developed mines that could be developed further and from which you could get metal much faster than you could get it from a new mine. What we want here is not new mines developed so much as the ore; we want the zinc and the lead and the copper. It is not so much a matter of going out and finding new mines; it is a matter of getting the ore out where it can be found. Most of these old mines have at least some ore in them, and if encouragement is given to the owners we shall get the metal. I suggest to the minister that this is on a wrong basis entirely, trying to open new mines. Not only does it take time to find new mines, but there are not the men to go prospecting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And no machinery.

Mr. ILSLEY: The commissioner tells me that mines which have been abandoned for more than ten years and started again are ordinarily regarded as new mines. It is a matter of interpretation. The commissioner of income tax, who is administering this section, has kept in touch with the Department of Mines and Resources, but I suppose that interpretation could be changed.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is just an arbitrary rule?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The ten-year rule is arbitrary. It would not do, however, to give tax exemption for three years to a mine that had just discontinued operations for a short time. Some line would have to be drawn.

Mr. GREEN: The whole purpose of this change is to get minerals for Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: And to get them as quickly as possible. Perhaps if a mine has been shut down only a few months or a year, it should not get the benefit of the exemption, but to insist that it must have been closed for ten years is going too far under present conditions. This section is intended to get out the minerals, and many mines will not be helped if the restrictions are as broad as the minister has mentioned.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are giving assistance all the time to all sorts of enterprises under one act and another and by order in council, and probably these cases could be met without laying down any general rule in an act. The metals controller is certainly doing everything he possibly can to stimulate production of the kind of metals and minerals needed in war production, and he is constantly in touch with the Department of Finance and with the Department of National Revenue to solicit the type of assistance necessary to get the mines into operation. We have constant trouble trying to determine what degree of assistance we can defend and how far we can go. We lay down certain principles, and at times they are assailed by interested parties. One principle we laid down in the Department of Finance is that no arrangement would be made with any mining interests on the basis of which shares or bonds would be offered to the public, and we were certainly attacked for that by those interested. It was regarded as contrary to the best interests of the war effort, and so forth. The only point I am trying to make is that we are in touch with those who are closely connected with these matters, trying to get out of the earth the maximum of minerals and metals required for war production. This will be a general rule that can be applied by any statute applicable to new mines, and it carries on a principle which has been embodied in the statutes since 1936. There are just those modifications I have mentioned, such as leaving out precious metals, switching the exemption from income tax to excess profits tax, and the widening of the class from metalliferous mines to strategic minerals not metalliferous. That is as far as we should go by legislation.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government been in touch with the departments of mines in the different mining provinces? They have a far keener appreciation of mining requirements than the dominion Department of Mines and Resources. I suggest that the Department of Finance should get in touch with the departments of mines in the different provinces and find out from them what would help most to bring about the opening up of these mines.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are many good mining people in Ottawa. The metals controller, if I may say so, is a first-class official, and there are a great many good men in the Department of Mines and Resources here. We must rely on our own Department of Mines and Resources and on the metals controller and those associated with him. Both they and the national research council are doing remarkable work.

Mr. JACKMAN: While I shall support the resolution, I am wondering whether the minister has gone far enough in granting assistance to new mines. I do not know the particular aspects of the problem, but I should like to say a few words to our friends of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation in this regard. Here is a resolution at this late stage in the war, when we are nearly three years at war, and we have to resort to the private enterprise system and the profit motive in order to get very necessary basic materials for the war.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Because the government would not do it.

Mr. JACKMAN: Because the government is not in a position to do it and has not the organization; nor do I know of any government that would be in a position to do it. They leave it to private enterprise to go ahead and get the metals out of the ground as quickly as possible and they afford some relief from taxation; but while these companies who may find the metals in the ground will be exempt from the excess profits tax, they will be subject to the 40 per cent ordinary corporation income tax and that is a very large tax in a hazardous industry. I am not giving any authoritative opinion on the matter because I have not had the facts before me, but it strikes me that 40 per cent on the profits in a hazardous industry is taking away from the industry, in the form of a tax, something that militates against the chances of that industry amounting to what it should. In the last war when there was necessity for greater production of lead and zinc, the British government negotiated with Consolidated Smelters, which was nothing but a claim at that time. The Sullivan mine had not been successfully worked and was sold for $500,000 by the American Smelting and Refining company, to Canadian interests, because they could not produce the metal commercially. There was a metallurgical problem that to date had not been solved, and the British government said to the owners, "Get out this metal and we will take it off your hands and give you a return". That was finally done, and they got great production which was a material aid in the winning of the last war. Now we have a different situation, because we have price ceilings and limits to what lead and zinc can be sold for, so that there is no incentive. Moreover, we have high taxes so that private enterprise is stifled. I can say to the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation that if they would leave things to private enterprise, which would get things done, we would make a much greater contribution toward the war than we do by trying to change the whole economic fabric of the nation at a time when its very life is at stake.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain what the tax will be, first of all, on a company which comes into production in 1942 and then on a company which comes into production in 1943? As I understand it, a company coming into production in 1942 will be exempt from income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: And one coming into production in 1943 will have to pay income tax but will be exempt from excess profits tax. Is that the position? Will the minister explain the difference?

Mr. ILSLEY: The one that comes into production in 1942 will pay a minimum of 22 per cent, because a company is liable under the Excess Profits Tax Act to 22 per cent of the total profits, or 75 per cent of the excess, whichever is the greater. The minimum which that company will pay is 22 per cent.

Mr. GREEN: That is even with the exemption?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. That is only an exemption from the income tax, which is 18 per cent. The company is still liable to the excess profits tax, and the minimum is 22 per cent. The company which comes into production in 1943 will be exempt from excess profits tax, therefore will pay only the income tax, which is 18 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So there is not much difference.

Mr. ESLING: If the government really wants base metals there will have to be more than an exemption from taxation of prospective operations. There are a dozen mines in the Kaslo-Slocan district that have yielded millions of dollars in lead, zinc and silver, but the majority of those properties have been abandoned so far as operations are concerned because it has been unprofitable to operate them, because prices have been so low. The one plant in British Columbia to-day which is treating lead and zinc ores is paying a price so low that the average miner could not possibly operate. Lead and zinc are being supplied to the British empire by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting company at a price lower than has been in force for an average of any ten years, in Canadian history. That lead and zinc is all going to the British government to-day. Before renewed operations can be undertaken, those mines must have the old timbers removed because they are rotten and it would not be safe to operate. There must be more than exemption from taxation. There must be a public mill or government mill which will take care of all the ores and concentrate them. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the United States wants Canadian lead and zinc ores, wants them so badly that I think it will be found that within the last month or so there has been a notice that the Metals Reserve Corporation proposes to erect a $100,000 mill to take care of some lead and zinc ores which are so close to the border that there is not a railway there, but apparently they are going to carry them by truck to the United States.

The government should give serious thought to the construction of a public concentration plant. It would be the greatest incentive for the various local mines to resume operations. You cannot get capital—that is all there is to it—to work lead and zinc ores to-day at the prices which now prevail in Canada. There is no capital to take hold of these industries. The incentive would be to secure the operation of a number of these smaller properties by miners who operate largely under lease and royalty, and the only way whereby they can be encouraged to do so is by the construction of a public mill and concentrator.

Mr. JACKMAN: May I revert to resolution 9, the wording of it, "That the revenue losses in any business of the immediately preceding year may be allowed as a deduction". The term "revenue losses" is not familiar to business practice, although it may be to the income tax department.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: That observation will be considered when the legislation is drafted. It is merely a matter of wording as I understand; the hon. member does not take any exception to the principle?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; he wants to know what is meant by "revenue losses".

Mr. JACKMAN: Operating losses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it is designed to exclude capital losses; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As opposed to operating losses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: I am not certain which year it refers to, having regard to section 11, which states:

Resolution No. 9 shall apply to the profits of 1943 and fiscal periods ending therein.

Does it mean the first loss you can take into your calculation is the loss which will occur in 1943, or would it be a loss in 1942 which would be taken into the 1943 calculation, which is the first deficit year?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was intended that 1942 losses would be the first loss to be carried forward.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, being chapter forty-four of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, as amended, is further amended by striking thereout subdivisions (a), (b), (c) and (d) of tariff item 90, tariff items 152b, 152d, 210, 276, 282b, 316a, 347, 410c, 422a, 435, 438d, 438i, 451b, subdivisions (a) and (b) of 534, 574, 584, 610, 610a, 657, 682a, the several enumerations of goods respectively and the several rates of duties of customs, if any, set opposite each of the said items, and by inserting the following items, enumerations and rates of duty in said schedule A:—

Customs tariff—90a. Vegetables, dried, desiccated or dehydrated, including vegetable flour, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent.

Customs tariff—90b. Vegetables, pickled or preserved in salt, brine, oil or in any other manner, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Customs tariff—90c. Vegetable juices, liquid mustards, soy and vegetable sauces of all kinds: British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Customs tariff—90d. Vegetable pastes and hash and all similar products composed of vegetables and meat or fish, or both, n.o.p.:

British preferential tariff, 15 per cent; intermediate tariff, 32½ per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee to take No. 90a, b, c and d together?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. STIRLING: All these four items appear to me to be identical in present rate and past rate. Why are they inserted?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only change is in item 90c. The words "extracts or" are being dropped. The wording under item 90c was:

Vegetable extracts or juices, liquid mustards, soy and vegetable sauces of all kinds.

The words "extracts or" are deleted. It would appear from the former wording that vegetable extracts might be synonymous with juices, although the rulings of the Department of National Revenue have not been made on this basis, nor is there any information before that department which would indicate that this was the intention. According to dictionary definitions the words "vegetable extracts" could apply to aqueous or alcoholic products extracted from herbs, roots and seeds, such as are used in the manufacture of ginger or herbal beverages. Such extracts, however, have always been rated under tariff item 711 or 220. Ever since the item became effective on May 2, 1930, the wording of item 90c has been more or less contradictory in the fact that the general heading of the item is "vegetables, prepared or preserved", while item 90c covers commodities which, with the exception of vegetable juices and possibly soy, do not appear to come within the category of vegetables.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The intention, then, is to clarify a position which heretofore has been rather ambiguous?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But there is no change?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Items agreed to.

Customs tariff—152b. Orange juice, grapefruit juice, and blended orange and grapefruit juice, the product of the British West Indies, when imported direct from the country of production: British preferential tariff, free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is this? Are you taking off the 15 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a new item, to replace tariff items 152b and 152d by a single item, which is enlarged to cover blended orange and grapefruit juice. Blended orange and grapefruit juice was formerly dutiable as "fruit juices, n.o.p.", at rates of 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 25 per cent. This item applies to imports under the British preferential tariff only.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And direct importations?

Mr. ILSLEY: Tariff item 152b provided for duty-free entry under the British preferential tariff of orange juice, the product of the British West Indies, when imported direct from the country of production. Item 152d provided for duty-free entry under the British preferential tariff of grapefruit juice, the product of the British West Indies, when imported direct from the country of production. The intermediate and general tariff rates of 25 per cent in item 152, the item covering "fruit juices, n.o.p.", applies to imports of orange juice and grapefruit juice from intermediate and general tariff countries. The United States trade agreement rate on fruit juices, n.o.p., not including lime, orange, lemon or passion fruit juice, of 15 per cent applied since January 1, 1939. Imports of orange juice are not separately recorded. Imports of grapefruit juice during the period from April 1 to December 1, 1939, amounted to 1,038,756 gallons, valued at $390,808. The United States supplied 931,000 gallons, valued at $350,005. Imports from Trinidad amounted to 106,725 gallons, valued at $40,452. In 1941, imports of grapefruit juice from all countries exceeded two and a half million gallons, valued at over $972,000. Over 80 per cent of these imports came from the United States, with about 418,000 gallons valued at $198,000 coming from Trinidad. In the past, imports of blended orange and grapefruit juice have been small, owing to the tariff situation. The object of the item is to provide that blended orange and grapefruit juice will get the same rate that orange juice got and that grapefruit juice got. By blending them they forfeited the privilege of the rate which would have applied to either one unblended.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the subsidy being paid on any of them now?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the subsidy on grapefruit juice was discontinued, and, if I remember correctly, that is the only juice on which it was paid.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What has this to do with the commodities we produce in British Columbia, such as tomato juice?

Mr. ILSLEY: So far as I know it has nothing whatever to do with tomato juice.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am sincere about this; I do not intend to be scoffed at by anyone. This country, and particularly British Columbia, produces a great deal of tomato juice, and I want to know why grapefruit juice should be brought in here when we have tomato juice available.

Mr. ILSLEY: The proposal is to give the same tariff treatment to blended orange and grapefruit juice as is given to orange juice and grapefruit juice coming in unblended. They were both free under the British preferential tariff. Blended orange and grapefruit juice is now to be free under the same tariff.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And formerly the blend was not free?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what will be the position with respect to all these items; that is, orange juice, grapefruit juice and blended orange and grapefruit juice, coming from the United States? This item is referable only to these commodities when they are the produce of the British West Indies, when imported direct from the country of origin. Of course now there is no such importation at all; there is no transportation from the countries of origin, because all the ships are gone, so this is meaningless at the moment. What is the position with respect to United States products?

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been, I understand, considerable leniency in the enforcement of the rule that they must come by direct shipment—that is a national revenue matter, not a finance matter—so they may continue to come via the United States and still obtain the benefit of this free preferential rate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because of present conditions?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The rate against United States products of this kind is 25 per cent.

Mr. STIRLING: Under another item?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, another item altogether.

Mr. JACKMAN: I suppose the government has to pay duty on the grapefruit juice and other products imported for use by the army, or is that not done?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the government itself import grapefruit juice which is supplied to the army, or does it buy it from contractors? I should not suppose the government would be in the business of importing grapefruit juice for anybody. I think the government would buy in the open market, just as I would.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know; I suppose they buy it in the open market. I do not know whether or not that grapefruit juice paid duty when it came in. If it came in under these British preferential items, it would not.

Mr. JACKMAN: Of course it might come from the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, in which event it must have paid the duty.

Mr. JACKMAN: I think the Minister of Munitions and Supply once told us that everything he imported from the United States paid the duty, where it was dutiable. I was wondering whether the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Finance had even an estimate of the total amount of duty paid by the crown for purchases of grapefruit juice and other fruit juices on behalf of the army, and perhaps for other services as well.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it is separately estimated at all.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understand we brought in 30,000 gallons of grapefruit juice for the Canadian army either last year or last month. Did we pay duty on that?

Mr. ILSLEY: If it was a product of the United States it must have paid duty when it came in; the duty must be included in the price. If it was a product of the British West Indies it probably did not.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—210. Peroxide of soda; silicate of soda, dry or in water solution; bichromate of soda; sulphite of sodium; nitrite of soda; arseniate, biarseniate, chlorate, bisulphite and stannate of soda, prussiate of soda and sulphite of soda: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 15 per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the change here?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only change made is that the words "silicate of soda in crystals or in solution" are amended to read, "silicate of soda, dry or in water solution".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any change in the rate?

Mr. STIRLING: The tariff is changed.

Mr. ILSLEY: There were two rates shown in the column "present rates". The solid material was ruled to be dutiable under item 711, which is the basket item. The amended wording is for the purpose of preventing this. The amended wording takes the old rates of free, 15 per cent and 20 per cent, and makes them apply to the solid material as well as to the material in solution. The Department of National Revenue ruled that the solid material was not covered by the section and therefore it went into the basket item and took the rates shown in the second line in the column, "present rates". There is really no change in rate, it is just a change in wording.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—276. Cotton seed oil for canning fish: British preferential, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are we to gather from the two different rates under the heading "present rates"? I presume that most of this oil comes from the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I think it does.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of this change?

Mr. ILSLEY: The present tariff item 276 provides for duty-free entry from all countries of refined cotton seed oils, edible, for canning fish. The wording of this item is being widened to cover unrefined cotton seed oil for canning fish.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This covers both refined and unrefined?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have we done any refining of cotton seed oil in Canada? Has it not always been refined abroad?

Mr. ILSLEY: Sometimes they bring it in unrefined and refine it for canning fish.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—282b. Saggars, hillers, bats, and plate setters, when used in the manufacture of ceramic products: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free: general tariff, free.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Is this item intended to help the porcelain and china plants in Toronto?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know. My recollection is that it allows some equipment to come in free of duty which otherwise would be dutiable. The products allowed to come in free under this item were previously dutiable under item 282a, 12½, 20 and 22½. It is really widening the item to provide for complete parts of saggars.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—316a. Incandescent lamp bulbs for use in the manufacture of incandescent lamps; glass tubing for use in the manufacture of incandescent lamps, vials and ampoules; mantle stocking for gas light: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the effect of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: The present item 316a covering "incandescent lamp bulbs and glass tubing for use in the manufacture of incandescent lamps, and mantle stocking for gas light", with rates of free, 7½ per cent and 10 per cent, is being reworded to include glass tubing for use in the manufacture of vials and ampoules. Glass tubing for the manufacture of vials and ampoules is dutiable at present under tariff item 326a at rates of 10 per cent, 20 per cent and 22½ per cent, with a United States Trade agreement rate of 17½ per cent. The effect of this amendment is to reduce the rate on glass tubing imported from the United States for the manufacture of vials and ampoules from 17½ per cent to 7½ per cent. The manufacture of vials and ampoules is a new industry in Canada, and it is estimated that imports of glass tubing for this use will range from 80,000 to 100,000 pounds annually. The average value of this tubing is about 25 cents a pound.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—349c. Magnesium scrap: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Provided, that nothing shall be deemed to be magnesium scrap except waste or refuse magnesium fit only to be remelted.

Mr. MacNICOL: What amount was imported last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: Very little, if any.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it anticipated that this will bring it in?

Mr. MacNICOL: We are making an effort to manufacture magnesium metal in Canada, and previously there was a substantial duty against scrap coming in.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rate shown under present rates are 15 per cent, 25 per cent and 25 per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: Those rates are reduced to free. I have no objection because this is needed for war purposes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Stand.

Mr. RALSTON: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask that the question be put.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I asked that it stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Objection has been taken according to citation 189, Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms:

When an order of the day has been read, it must thereupon be proceeded with, appointed for a future day or discharged.

Since objection has been taken, the sense of the house must be ascertained.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this motion debatable?

Mr. SPEAKER: No. I must therefore put the motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are the grounds of objection to the motion? They may be technical; I do not know.

Mr. RALSTON: The ground of objection is that it is not considered in the public interest to produce the proceedings of courts martial.

[Mr. Fair.]

The officer himself is entitled to a copy of the proceedings of the court martial and will get it under the usual terms. Otherwise, it would mean that parliament would be acting as a court of appeal in connection with courts martial which are held by military officers. The officers act in accordance with their military duties in dealing with courts martial, and this court martial having been dealt with by officers duly appointed, having been confirmed by the divisional commander, and having been confirmed by the corps commander, it is not considered in the public interest to produce the documents.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those in favour of the motion will say "Aye". I declare the motion lost.

PUBLIC SERVICE—DEPARTMENTAL COSTS—NUMBER OF EMPLOYEES, 1938-42

Mr. CHURCH:

2. The number of employees in each of the above departments, in the years 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942, and the total salaries paid.

3. The number of employees engaged by permanent commissions under the federal government, (a) civil—for the above years; (b) war—by years since established.

4. The total number of staff and employees of all departments and commissions in existence in 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941 and 1942.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have written a letter to my hon. friend about this, and I suggest that the matter stand until he has had an opportunity to consider the letter, if he has not already done so.

Mr. CHURCH: I shall confer with the minister; I shall be glad to do so. I think it is in the public interest, though, that the people should know what the costs of these outside commissions are, and they should know before this house closes.

Motion stands.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM COLONEL DREW

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday I promised my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell), that I would table a letter from Mr. Drew, with respect to which he said he would take the responsibility of asking that it be tabled. I wish to have a word with my hon. friend before proceeding further in complying with his request. There had not been an opportunity for that until we met in the house a moment ago, and in the circumstances I would ask if the question of compliance with that request might stand until eight o'clock this evening.

MILITARY CAMPS

FIRE AT BARRIEFIELD—REPORTS AS TO EFFICACY OF FIRE-FIGHTING APPARATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that a report is now abroad in the land that when the fire broke out in Barriefield military camp on Saturday morning the available fire-fighting apparatus proved useless, would the minister make a statement to the house, either discounting that report or indicating what steps are being taken to provide adequate fire-fighting equipment?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I will make inquiries and give the information.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Customs tariff—410c. (i) Machinery and apparatus and complete parts thereof for use exclusively in producing unrefined oil from shales, not to include motive power, of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(ii) Machinery and apparatus for operating oil-sands by mining operations and for extracting oil from the sands so mined; complete parts of the foregoing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Both parts of this item have to do with the importation of machinery for the development of the oil resources of Canada, but one has reference to machinery for producing unrefined oil from shale, while the other has to do with the production of oil from tar sands in western Canada. I notice in this item that the machinery for producing oil from shale is free of duty except for the motive power in the machines. With a war on, and with such dire necessity for oil in this country, I see no reason why there should be any tariff whatever on any machinery that can be used for developing the oil resources of Canada at this time. Even if it is an engine that goes into the machine, we are not going to interfere with anyone making engines in Canada to-day merely because we permit the free importation of an engine for an oil drilling machine of any type. Engines are so hard to obtain now that you must get priorities before you can obtain them. All this oil drilling machinery and all material used for the development of oil, such as pipe, drilling machines, bit stems, bits, refining machinery, and so on, should be allowed in duty free from any country in which we can get them, in order to develop our oil resources.

Much has been said by leaders throughout the democratic part of this world in the last few months about freeing the channels of trade throughout the world when the war is over, in order that all democratic countries may have access to raw materials and may trade with other countries in order that there may be a fuller life throughout this whole world. If we are ever to get at that at all, it is time we were getting at it now. If there is one thing for which I have to criticize the Minister of Finance in connection with this budget it is that in it he has made no move toward that end. If we cannot have some of these restrictive tariffs removed now, when there is no necessity in the world for them, when this war is over it will be even more difficult to do it. To-day we are more and more industrializing one certain part of Canada. By the time the war is over that part of Canada will be so highly industrialized that they will fight every move that is made to reduce tariffs, and the result will be that other parts of Canada will suffer even more than they have suffered in the past.

Mr. REID: They are suffering now.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It is therefore about time the government made some real reductions in tariffs in order to start this thing going. It is recognized that the sentiment of the people, in this country, in Great Britain, and in the United States of America, has changed greatly in regard to trade matters. A majority in all these countries is of the opinion that trade between the democratic nations of the world should be unfettered.

I repeat, I do not know how we are going to be able to do anything about it after the war if we are not ready to do it now. Therefore I am sorry that this budget has not provided for drastic reductions in the tariff.

I think something should be said by hon. members with a view to seeing that those changes are made when the next budget comes down. Is it not ridiculous that Canada, a highly industrialized country, which is giving to Great Britain the greater part of a billion dollars in war goods manufactured in this country, for the purpose of helping her and ourselves in this war, and deferring until after the war the repayment of a loan of some $700,000,000, should be sending these goods to Great Britain in that way because it is impossible for Great Britain to pay for them in goods?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not part of our contribution to the common effort, not a gift at all?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): No doubt part of it is.

Mr. MacNICOL: What has it to do with this item?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): It has this to do with it, that even if Great Britain wanted to pay with goods, we, the Canadian people, through our tariffs, are saying, "No; your goods cannot come into this country, even to help pay your debt to us." That is a ridiculous situation and should be corrected.

I have spoken here before for freer trade, and I intend to keep on doing it. I think this country and the world at large is at last beginning to see the light of that kind of reasoning, and I hope the Minister of Finance will be able to see some more of it before the next budget.

Mr. HANSELL: I am greatly surprised that the minister has seen fit to place such an enormous tax upon "machinery and apparatus for operating oil sands by mining operations and for extracting oil from the sands so mined, and complete parts of the foregoing." Thirty-five per cent is a tremendous tax on that machinery at a time when the people of this country are anxious to develop our oil resources.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not putting it on; I am taking it off.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, take it completely off—that is what I ask. Perhaps the minister might explain what this is. There seems to be some confusion.

Mr. MacNICOL: The confusion is at your end. It is free. You do not want anything better than that.

[Mr. J. G. Ross.]

Mr. HANSELL: I do not read anything free there.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have before me two columns, on page 16 of the ways and means resolutions. The first column contains the proposals; the second column—which is divided into three parts, as is the first—contains the present rates. The present rates for certain of these articles are, free, 27½ per cent, and 35 per cent; and for others, 10, 27½, and 35 per cent. All these duties are being removed and the articles placed on the free list under all classifications.

Mr. HANSELL: Then I shall have to make the same speech but instead of castigating the minister I shall have to compliment him. The fact of the matter is that we in Canada are anxiously trying to develop our oil resources. This item will apply particularly to the Fort McMurray tar sand development, in which we in this corner of the house are particularly interested. The development of these sands will aid tremendously the building of the Alaska highway, and that highway will aid greatly the defences of that northern territory. In my study of this matter I find that one of the obstacles encountered is that it is difficult to mine those sands and extract the oil in competition with oil obtained from drilled wells. This will help the tar sand producers to compete.

I was pleased to hear the Minister of Munitions and Supply say not long ago that they are sending men in there to review this whole situation and bring about further development of the Fort McMurray tar sands. I urge upon him that he do this speedily. Let the government develop them, or give every possible inducement to their development, without delay.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Will the tariff be removed on rotary drilling rigs such as those used in deep drilling in Turner Valley, for instance?

Mr. ILSLEY: Item 410d, which was inserted last year, provides that the following shall be duty free:

Well-drilling machinery and apparatus, and complete parts thereof, for use exclusively in drilling for water, natural gas or oil, or in prospecting for minerals, not to include motive power; machinery and apparatus of a class or kind not made in Canada for maintenance and testing purposes in connection with gas or oil wells; well-packers and complete parts thereof, for oil or gas wells; seamless iron or steel tubing of a class or kind not made in Canada, for use in casing water, natural gas or oil wells.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): That does not exempt the motive power used in drilling.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Is there any reason why it should not be exempted?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know of any. That is the question that was raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I have made inquiries to ascertain whether there have been any communications or complaints with regard to diesel engines and the like. I find there have not, and it is now a little late to suggest that in connection with this budget.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Then could it be considered for next year's budget?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it can be considered. There may be reasons against it which I do not know, but we have not considered it; that is all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that what is being done in this item is to restore a position which previously obtained, from 1936 to 1938, in connection with the United States trade agreement. In the new agreement of 1938 the arrangement was dropped and is now being revived. It is not a new proposal at all, except with reference to a portion coming under the intermediate and general tariffs. Everything is to be made free. This machinery and apparatus for use exclusively in producing unrefined oil from shale, for instance, is of a class or kind not made in Canada. It is intended, I think, to help in the development of the oil shales of New Brunswick and eastern Canada generally; that is part 1. Part 2 is to help in the development of the oil sands. Part 1 does not include the motive power, which I understand is of a class or kind made in Canada, and the protection heretofore given on that is being continued. I see no great objection to the passing of this item as it is, if we understand the position historically and what is now being sought. I have an idea that previously it was all one item and it is now being separated. In any event all this machinery and apparatus, which is of a class or kind not made in Canada, is being put on the free list. That is in accordance with government policy; I am not objecting to it, and I think we might carry the item.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister is to be commended for removing the duty on this apparatus, because this may tend to increase the production of oil in areas where oil is contained in the shale and tar sands. But I do not think the results for which we hope will come about simply through the removal of this duty. The government should go further. I realize that the Minister of Finance is not concerned in what I am about to say, but I think our endeavours to develop the present production of oil from all sources, including the tar sands and the shale, should be greatly increased. The government should go much further than merely removing the duty on this equipment, because the situation is becoming exceedingly critical.

I brought up this question in the house over a year ago, but up to the present time practically nothing has been done to develop the production of oil from our tar sands. I am sure the minister recognizes the seriousness of our oil situation just as much as anyone else, probably more so than a great many people in this country. We see now that the oil fields of Iraq and Iran are in a very dangerous position; in fact the entire Persian field is in a most critical situation, and according to information appearing in the public press the United States is becoming acutely aware of an oil shortage in that country. A great deal of our crude oil comes from the United States; and when we see them going to the extent of setting up plants for the production of synthetic oil from coal, it becomes apparent that the situation is serious. We in Canada are favourably situated in that regard; we have the largest potential oil field in the world, bar none. Right now, when the situation is so critical, when the possibility of having our supply of oil from the Persian field cut off is becoming more apparent day by day, the government and the Minister of Finance should insist that the development of these oil fields be hurried along as much as possible.

The minister will remember that when I brought up this question in the early part of 1941 I was ridiculed; I was called a defeatist and an alarmist when I dared to suggest that before this war was over our oil supply from Iraq and Iran might be cut off. I am not satisfied with the progress that has been made, and I want to commend the Minister of Finance on the removal of the duty from this equipment, which may hasten our progress in this direction. Certainly I am not satisfied with the progress that has been made in the development of the tar sands.

Mr. ILSLEY: Operations are going on at the moment, I am told.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Just in an experimental way, I think.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When I spoke on this matter previously the Minister of Munitions and Supply took me to task and said that the prospect of developing oil from the tar sands was too remote for this war, that perhaps we would have it for the next war. I am glad to note that once more the Minister of Munitions and Supply has been forced to change his opinion. Perhaps the Minister of Finance has had to sit on him a little; and if that has brought about the good results shown here I hope the minister sits on him good and hard, so that some real action may be taken.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sitting on him.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under this item is machinery to be admitted free for the removal from the oil sands of bitumen and other ingredients, or merely the oil?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): While my colleague is looking up the information I might just say, for the information of the hon. member for Bow River, that I have ascertained by inquiry that final investigations of the McMurray and Waterways district are in progress at the present time, looking toward the actual production of oil from those sands. I do not know how far the minister concerned may care to go in giving details of arrangements that have been made, but I can assure the hon. member that this work is definitely under way.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then may I ask the minister whether he will consider the advisability of setting up a committee of this house when parliament reassembles to make a thorough investigation of the progress being made in the development of oil from these tar sands, as well as developments in the manufacture of synthetic rubber in Canada. If the minister will give the committee that assurance I think it would be to the advantage of our war effort.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I am the minister to whom the hon. member refers, all I can say is that I will bring what he has said to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of Munitions and Supply.

Replying to the question of the hon. member for Davenport, this item provides for the free entry of "machinery and apparatus for operating oil-sands by mining operations and for extracting oil from the sands so mined." His question was whether machinery for extracting other substances—

Mr. MacNICOL: Such as bitumen and tar.

Mr. ILSLEY: —from the sands so mined will be admitted free. Such machinery is not covered by the item. I do not know enough about machinery to know whether the machinery provided with free entry by this item could be used for both purposes. If not, it is not covered.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was hoping this item would go through. May I ask the minister whether any machinery is to be imported for the development of the oil shales, and whether there have been any developments with respect to the oil shales in New Brunswick. Months ago I brought to the attention of the oil controller the position in New Brunswick, and I was met with the statement that it was not part of government policy to go into the production business itself. I can understand that. Then I urged that investigations should be made, and I was promised that some investigation would be made. What I am asking now is whether investigations have taken place, how far have they proceeded, and is there any prospect of the development of the oil shales of New Brunswick, which are known to be a substantial natural resource of that part of the country, where we need development if we can possibly get it.

I am not deprecating what the minister is doing by this item. This machinery is not made in Canada, and was admitted free some years ago. I think there is some differentiation, and I was hoping that the minister would give the history of the position, which I attempted to give somewhat inadequately a few moments ago. This item is not a new departure. It simply restores the item to the position which obtained up to 1938, at which time the item was dropped.

Mr. ILSLEY: From 1936 to 1938, yes.

Mr. HOWE: With reference to the point raised by the leader of the opposition, I think I announced to the house that the federal government, in partnership with the provincial government, was making a very thorough investigation of the oil shales of New Brunswick. The investigation is practically completed, but I have not seen the final report. An interim report which I saw indicated not too hopeful a situation. The shales did not have the oil content that it was hoped would be found.

As regards the Alberta tar sands, we are making a very thorough investigation. We are not only checking all available data, but are making a close examination of refinery results in that area. We are having refinery runs made of the product, as well as laboratory tests, and we are drilling to find the extent of the sands with a view to a large scale development. In both cases I think we are taking the steps which are necessary before large expenditures would be warranted.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the Minister of Munitions and Supply enlarge upon the statement he made on May 15 with respect to this development? The minister said, in connection with the investigation to which he has just referred, that they were studying the Gower system of processing. I wonder if he would enlarge upon that and tell us what the results of investigations into that system of processing have been.

Mr. HOWE: I would not like to discuss the system of processing. That is under study as well, but I am not enough of an oil technician to be able to discuss it, even if I knew the full results of the investigation, which I do not. The whole investigation has been placed in responsible hands, and we hope to have a report within a month or six weeks which will tell us what development is justified and what process is likely to obtain the best results. I am sorry that my information does not allow me to go any further.

Mr. MacNICOL: There were only two plants operating in the oil sand area. There was the bitumen plant, forty or fifty miles north of Fort McMurray, operated by Mr. Fitzsimmons, and they were doing a pretty good job in extracting bitumen. They were shipping thousands of barrels of bitumen and tar. When I was up there last summer I saw two hundred barrels going up the river. The other plant, which was manufacturing oil, was turning out a year ago somewhere between 200 and 250 barrels a day, but unfortunately the plant was burned down in the fall. It has been rebuilt, and the last information I had was that before now the rebuilt plant should be turning out about 600 barrels a day.

I am in accord with this item, which is to admit free the machinery required for the further development of these sands. All the machinery used in the oil plants came from the United States, and there is not a great deal of it even there. This machinery requires constant replacement; so that if this item, which will admit free machinery not made in Canada which is required for extracting the oil from the oil sands, will assist in the development of these sands, I think we should all be in favour of it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—422a. Concrete road-paving machines, self-propelling, end loading type, with a capacity of 21 cubic feet of wet concrete or more; concrete and asphalt road finishing machines; form graders; sub-graders; combination excavating and transporting scraper units; concrete mixers, transit type; dump wagons or trailers, having a capacity of 10 cubic yards or over, not self-propelled; backfilling machines and equipment, mounted on self-propelling wheels or crawling traction, semi- or full-revolving boom and scraper type; steam or air driven pile hammers or extractors; well-points; truck turntables; all the foregoing of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 10 per cent; general tariff, 12½ per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only change being made in this item is that the words "dump wagons or trailers on crawler tracks not self-propelled" are being amended to read "dump wagons or trailers, having a capacity of 10 cubic yards or over, not self-propelled". The new item will admit dump wagons or trailers equipped with rubber tires on the same basis as dump wagons or trailers equipped with caterpillar tread. These dump wagons or trailers cost from $8,000 to $10,000 each. The LeTourneau dump wagons are equipped with rubber tires, while the Athey are equipped with caterpillar tread. Both types are hauled by tractors, and are used in road construction work and in the construction of airports. There is no information available as to the value of the imports of these dump wagons or trailers, but it is estimated that from ten to twenty are imported each year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are not made in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are two plants in Canada making road making machinery, self-propelled. One is a fine plant in Plessisville, Quebec, and the other is located in Toronto. As this machinery is not made in Canada I do not suppose that either of these plants will be affected?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—428g. Fuel injection pumps and nozzles for diesel and semi-diesel engines: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is this item for purposes of clarification? Are these made in Canada? What is the reason for the change?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are not made in Canada. This is a new item to provide for duty-free entry under all tariffs of fuel injection pumps and nozzles for diesel and semi-diesel engines. Fuel injection pumps and nozzles are not made in Canada and are imported mainly for servicing diesel and semi-diesel engines. Imports of pumps and nozzles are entitled to duty-free entry if they are for internal combustion traction engines or for the construction or equipment of ships, but when imported as replacement parts of diesel or semi-diesel engines used for road building, agricultural, industrial or logging purposes they are dutiable as complete parts of diesel or semi-diesel engines under tariff item 428e at the United States trade agreement rate of 20 per cent. These pumps are also used for the servicing of diesel and semi-diesel engines used in lighting plants and motor patrol boats. There is no information available as to the value of the imports of these pumps and nozzles, but it is estimated that the value of these imports amounts to about $20,000 annually. Apparently some of these items were not free, being classified as parts, and this item makes them all free.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—435. Locomotives and motor cars for railways, of a class or kind not made in Canada, and complete parts thereof, for use exclusively in mining, metallurgical or sawmill operations; diesel switching locomotives of a class or kind not made in Canada: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 12½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The first part of this item is the same as it was heretofore?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Diesel switching locomotives of a class or kind not made in Canada are being included. I assume the railways want to use this type of locomotive. I suppose they cannot be obtained anywhere but in the United States?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438d. Front and rear axles; brakes; clutches; internal combustion engines; steering gears; magnetos; rims for pneumatic tires larger than thirty inches by five inches; transmission assemblies; drive shafts; universal joints; steel road wheels; and parts of the foregoing, when of a class or kind not made in Canada, and imported by manufacturers of the goods enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a for use only in the manufacture of motor trucks, motor buses and electric trackless trolley buses, or for the manufacture of chassis for the same: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

(1) Provided that if the above articles are imported for use as original equipment for motor trucks, motor buses and electric trackless trolley buses, or for chassis for the same, by a manufacturer of the goods enumerated in tariff items 424 and 438a, and provided also that during the year during which importation is sought, not less than 40 per centum of the factory cost of production of such motor vehicles and chassis therefor, not to include duties and taxes, is incurred in the British Empire, the rates of duty under this item shall be: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 7½ per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

(2) Provided that the governor in council may make such regulations, if any, as are deemed necessary for carrying out the provisions of this item.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister should explain this change.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only change being made in this item is that the words "complete parts of the foregoing" are being amended to read "parts of the foregoing." The administrative problem in regard to this item arose in connection with imports of axle housings. Front and rear axles are specified in tariff item 438d. It has been the practice to import rear axle housing tubes as complete parts of rear axles, since the tubing manufacturers in Canada are unable to manufacture this particular type of seamless steel tubing. These tubes are of a very heavy type, being formed by forcing a mandrel through a solid bar, giving a very heavy walled seamless tube, which is subsequently swaged at one end. These axle housing tubes require a large number of manufacturing operations after importation before they are adapted for use as complete parts of rear axles. They are not entitled, in condition as usually imported, to entry under tariff item 438d as "complete parts" at the proviso rate of 7½ per cent, but are dutiable under the general item covering parts of motor vehicles at the rate of 25 per cent. Imports under tariff item 438d during the calendar year 1939 amounted to over a million dollars in value. Almost all of these imports came from the United States. Imports under this item during the calendar year 1941 exceeded $6,000,000 in value, almost all of which came from the United States.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is any of this tubing made in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not the type for axle housings.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438i. Body bottom cross members and steel shapes for the manufacture thereof; bumpers, front and rear, and parts thereof, including spring steel bumper plates; casket tables or platforms for hearses; destination and route sign assemblies, illuminated or not, and parts thereof; direction signals, illuminated or not; door and step mechanism, hand, vacuum or air operated, and parts thereof; door locks and catches and parts thereof; electric switches, buzzers, bells, push buttons, fuse assemblies and parts thereof; forward drive control conversion assemblies and parts thereof; lamps of all kinds, illuminating and indicating, including sockets, flanges, terminals, glassware, lenses and gaskets therefor, assembled or not, but not to include lamp bulbs; metal stampings, oiled and primed or not, and assemblies thereof; rubber fenders; seat operating mechanisms; ventilators, including motor driven fan type, and grilles, and parts thereof; window operating mechanisms; all of the foregoing when imported to be used only in the manufacture of motor bus bodies, electric trackless trolley bus bodies, motor ambulances and hearses: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Are the electric switches, buzzers, bells and so on for automobiles, or is this the type of equipment used in houses?

Mr. ILSLEY: The concluding words of the item are, "all of the foregoing when imported to be used only in the manufacture of motor bus bodies, electric trackless trolley bus bodies, motor ambulances and hearses."

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): These items are not manufactured in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the significance of the 25 per cent under the intermediate tariff in the present rates?

Mr. ILSLEY: The only change being made in regard to this tariff item is that the words:

"all of the foregoing when imported by manufacturers of motor bus bodies, electric trackless trolley bus bodies, motor ambulances and hearses, to be used in the manufacture of such motor bus bodies, electric trackless trolley bus bodies, motor ambulances and hearses, in their own factories"—

—are being amended to read:

"all of the foregoing when imported to be used only in the manufacture of motor bus bodies, electric trackless trolley bus bodies, motor ambulances and hearses".

This change will permit the large automobile concerns manufacturing buses to import duty free from the United States material to be used by the manufacturers building bodies for these buses. Under the present wording of tariff item 438i it is necessary for the body builder to import the parts in his own name, pay the duty and taxes, as well as the vendor for the material. The body builder immediately invoiced the automobile concern with the bill of the material as well as the duty and taxes paid. Under the amended wording the automobile manufacturer can purchase and import the materials, pay the duty and taxes, and consign the goods to the manufacturer who is building the bus body on the chassis produced by the automobile concern.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a concession to the automobile manufacturers?

Mr. ILSLEY: A convenience more than anything else.

Mr. MacNICOL: I asked the minister the significance of the 25 per cent intermediate rate under the present rates. I should also like this information about the 40 per cent general rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rates which these items carried were 25 per cent under the intermediate and 40 per cent under the general tariff unless they were imported by the various classes of manufacturers that I mentioned, to be used in their own factories. If they were to be used in their own factories they were free, from the United States, but if not to be used in their own factories they were 25 per cent from the United States. The change provides that they may be imported free whether they are used in their own factories or not, so long as they are to be used in the manufacture of motor bus bodies and so forth. It is more of a convenience than anything else.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is it changed as a result of a request from the manufacturers of bodies or from the manufacturers of chassis? Did it come as a request from either one of these groups?

Mr. ILSLEY: It came from the manufacturers of the buses.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—438j. Semi-finished piston castings of any material: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 35 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This refers to the automobile industry too. This is a reduction in tariff. Are these made in Canada, or is it an administrative item, a distinction between fully finished and semi-finished?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a new item to provide for the same rates on semi-finished piston castings as on finished piston castings. That is the purpose of it.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—451b. Pins manufactured from wire of any metal:

(i) Specially designed for marking systems: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, 5 per cent; general tariff, 10 per cent.

(ii) N.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 17½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 27½ per cent; general tariff, 30 per cent; and, per pound: intermediate tariff, 10 cents; general tariff, 10 cents.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These are not the ordinary domestic pins. Are they of a class or kind made in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are specially for marking systems?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is right.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—534. (a) Wick, with or without core, processed or not, when imported by manufacturers of wax candles or tapers for use in their own factories in the manufacture of wax candles or tapers: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

(b) Braided wick, with or without core, processed or not, when imported for use exclusively in oil-burning sanctuary lamps, under such regulations as the minister may prescribe: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. LOCKHART: This material is not made in Canada, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. This is a rewording. In (a) the word "braided" is left out.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—574. Woven fabrics, non-elastic, not exceeding three inches in width, imported by manufacturers of suspenders, garters, hose supporters, abdominal supporters and spinal braces for use exclusively in the manufacture of such articles in their own factories: British preferential tariff, 10 per cent; intermediate tariff, 17½ per cent; general tariff, 20 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that the words "abdominal supporters and spinal braces" are now included in the term "woven fabrics, non-elastic". It is an extension of the principle, is it not, and nothing more?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the significance of dropping the 22½ per cent of the British preference, the 27½ per cent intermediate and the 35 per cent under the general tariff? Is it because of the war? Some of this material is made in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The wording of this item is being amended to cover non-elastic woven fabrics not exceeding three inches in width, when imported by manufacturers of abdominal supporters and spinal braces. These fabrics are at present dutiable under tariff item 542a at rates of 22½ per cent, 27½ per cent and 35 per cent. It just lengthens the list of non-elastic woven fabrics which may be imported at the rates of 10 per cent, 17½ per cent and 20 per cent. It adds a little to the list, that is all.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—584. Resin or rosin; bone pitch, crude only: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position with respect to this? It is not indicated what the change is.

Mr. ILSLEY: It drops the words "in packages of not less than 100 pounds".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that arise out of the shortage of jute?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they are using paper instead.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But they cannot put a 100 pound weight in a bag of paper?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the only reason?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the reason, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any change in the tariff?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, there is in the intermediate.

Mr. ILSLEY: The main item was free—that is, it was free when it was brought in in packages of not less than 100 pounds. Now it is free in packages of less than 100 pounds.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any production of resin in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—610. Belting, n.o.p.: British preferential tariff, 7½ per cent; intermediate tariff, 25 per cent; general tariff, 27½ per cent.

Mr. MacNICOL: What particular brand or line of belting has this item reference to? What is it to be used for?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a long story, and it is a very small matter. Item 610a, the item covering belting of camel's hair for machinery, with rates of 7½ per cent, 27½ per cent and 27½ per cent, is being deleted. The goods covered by this item will now fall under tariff item 610, the item covering belting, n.o.p. The present rates on item 610 are 15 per cent under the British preferential tariff, 25 per cent under the intermediate tariff, and 27½ per cent under the general tariff. The British preferential rate on this item is being reduced from 15 per cent to 7½ per cent. Belting of camel's hair for machinery when imported from countries entitled to intermediate tariff treatment will enjoy a reduction from 27½ per cent to 25 per cent. There is a world shortage of belting of camel's hair. Belting of alpaca hair is being substituted therefor. Imports of belting of alpaca hair from the United Kingdom are dutiable at 15 per cent, whereas belting of camel's hair for machinery is dutiable at 7½ per cent. Under the new tariff item both of these will be admitted at the rate of 7½ per cent.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff—657. Mouthpieces in the rough, screws, aluminum pipe fitments and pipe bowls moulded from briarwood dust, and bowls of wood, not further processed than frazed, when imported by manufacturers of tobacco pipes for use in the manufacture of such pipes, in their own factories: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, 25 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a change of wording here. It is a question of rough mouthpieces and pipe bowls. The minister might explain what the change is.

Mr. ILSLEY: The present item is being reworded to provide for mouthpieces in the rough of any material, for screws of brass, bone or any other material, and for pipe bowls of any kind of wood. Most of the mouthpieces in the rough now being imported are made of synthetic resin and are dutiable under 711 at rates of 15 per cent, 25 per cent, and 25 per cent, with the United States trade agreement rate of 20 per cent. Screws if made of bone are dutiable under tariff item 711 at rates of 15, 25 and 25 per cent, with the United States trade agreement rate of 20 per cent. If these screws are made of brass they are dutiable, under tariff item 352, at 20, 27½ and 30 per cent, with the United States trade agreement rate of 25 per cent. The present item, 657, provides for briarwood bowls. The item is being widened to cover bowls of any kind of wood, bowls of wood other than briarwood are at present dutiable under tariff item 506 as manufactures of wood at rates of 17½ per cent, 22½ per cent and 25 per cent, with a United States trade agreement rate of 20 per cent.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose briarwood comes from France and Africa and is not available, and this is an attempt to use substitutes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are we making any bowls for pipes in Canada out of any woods grown in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Cheap ones, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where?

Mr. ILSLEY: In Montreal.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): From wood produced where, and of what kind?

Mr. ILSLEY: From wood produced in British Columbia; I do not know what kind.

Item agreed to.

Customs tariff 682a. Net floats of aluminum, glass, convas, cork, rubber or cellulose acetate, for use exclusively in commercial fishing: British preferential tariff, free; intermediate tariff, free; general tariff, free.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Do we not make something in Quebec out of cellulose?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not these floats. Some nets are made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do not make floats but fishermen's nets. They are using cellulose acetate for floats and it must be imported?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

2. Resolved, that schedule A to the customs tariff, as amended, be further amended by deleting from the Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1939, as amended by chapter twenty-nine of the statutes of 1940 and chapter thirteen of the statutes of 1941, the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Whiskey, brandy, rum, gin and all other goods specified in customs tariff items 156, 156a, and 156b..... $3 per gallon of the strength of proof.

Ale, beer, porter and stout..... 9 cents per gallon.

Wines of all kinds except sparkling wines, containing not more than 40 per cent of proof spirit..... 32½ cents per gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines.... $1.25 per gallon.

and by substituting therefor the following enumerations of goods and rates of additional duties of customs:

Whiskey, brandy, rum, gin and all other goods specified in customs tariff items 156, 156a, and 156b..... $5 per gallon of the strength of proof.

Ale, beer, porter and stout..... 30 cents per gallon.

Wines of all kinds except sparkling wines, containing not more than 40 per cent of proof spirit..... 42½ cents per gallon.

Champagne and all other sparkling wines.... $1.75 per gallon.

Mrs. CASSELMAN: I was not in the house on Monday when the debate on the excise resolutions took place with regard to the taxing of alcoholic beverages. I was attending a committee meeting. Had I been here I should have liked to say a few words on this important question, and perhaps I may be allowed to say them now; this is a somewhat similar resolution.

I would urge that measures be taken to cut down the further use of such intoxicants, because it seems to me there are no factors that contribute more to the inefficiency, the degradation and the sorrows of individuals and of the nation, than the continued abuse of physical, moral and mental powers through the use of intoxicating liquor. It is a waste of human and material resources. I do not want to reopen the debate that took place on Monday, but I feel bound to say a few words on this subject. I have sometimes thought seriously of introducing a resolution which I might ask any of the hon. gentlemen who spoke on Monday, and who applauded temperance sentiments, to support. It may be that reform in this case is hard to obtain by legislation. The experience of the prohibition years shows the difficulty of attempting to keep men sober by law—or women either—but I think it should be our responsibility to educate our young people in the danger of the use of alcoholic beverages, danger to body, mind and soul. Boys and girls should be told of the misery they are storing up for themselves, how they undercut their God-given abilities and prodigally throw away their opportunities right and left when they give these and similar poisons a chance to do their work. They should know that drinking is the preliminary step along the primrose path that leads to disease, crime and destruction.

I am not going to make a speech; I am simply offering a couple of suggestions that might be valuable to the minister and to temperance societies. It seems to me that the temperance societies are not making much headway towards legislation for absolute prohibition. In Sweden before the war they had a different method of approaching the control of alcohol than by resorting to absolute prohibition. I will not go into that, but you will find it set out in Marquis Child's book, "Sweden—The Middle Way," chapter 8, on "Liquor Control That Works." Another suggestion I would make is that in addition to taxes and tariffs we might label every bottle containing alcohol with some such inscription as this; it was written by an eminent physician. May I read it:

Directions for Use

Use moderately and not on successive days. Eat well while drinking. If necessary, supplement food with vitamin tablets while drinking.

Warning

May be habit-forming. Not for use by children. If this beverage is indulged in immoderately it may cause intoxication (drunkenness), later neuralgia and paralysis (neuritis), and serious mental derangement, such as delirium tremens and other curable and incurable mental diseases, as well as kidney and liver damage.

[Mrs. Casselman.]

If this were used as an advertisement in newspapers or on street cars it might serve a more useful purpose than some of the advertisements we have seen, and it might counteract certain advertisements which were spoken of on Monday by some hon. members, put out by different firms that deal in such beverages. We should increase taxes and tariffs and warn all and sundry of the deadly dangers they run.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have the minister and the administration taken cognizance of the public reaction to the debate on Monday in this house, and has the government given consideration to steps which would have the effect of diminishing the huge sums of money now diverted to the liquor trade in this country? I think the minister would find, if he read the press across Canada, that for the most part the expression of opinion from either side of the house on Monday last has been well received. I will not repeat in any measure what I said on that occasion, and I am not inviting another debate on the question, but I should like to know whether the government has considered the reaction of public opinion in regard to this matter. Will the administration make some effort to negotiate with the provincial administrations with respect to the huge increase in the retail sales of liquor? Since we met the other day I have had occasion to review what Mr. MacMillan, the premier of Nova Scotia said, in the legislature, I believe, with reference to the huge increase in sales in that province. He affirmed the position that among the civilian population the increase has not been large, but that the increase, in his view at all events, was due to two factors, namely, the large increase in the sales in the city of Halifax arising from the fact that so many ships were entering and leaving that port, and also the position with respect to sales in the vicinity of the large army camp at Debert. I hope the government will not leave all the responsibility with the provincial governments. There is a responsibility on the federal government to do something in the matter. Various methods have been suggested. I am not going into them now, but I think we ought to cut down this bill with respect to spirits by at least one-third between now and the next budget.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not had time to read the editorials on the subject since last Monday. In fact the only one I saw was not in accord with what the hon. gentleman has said; it was the other way. But probably the others will come in, and I shall see them sooner or later. I think it would be a most serious step for this government to be responsible for instituting a system of dual responsibility for the control of the liquor traffic in Canada. The moment we start that we are in for plenty of trouble. Everything that goes wrong is then the fault of the other jurisdiction.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yesterday a return for which I had moved was brought down, in connection with statutes that have been amended, suspended or otherwise interfered with by order in council. Apparently so far as statutes are concerned the government has seen fit to amend them in a great many ways under the powers contained in the War Measures Act. I think that generally speaking all over Canada to-day there is a feeling that something should be done toward reducing the increasing consumption of intoxicating liquors. Apparently the government does not feel disposed to use the powers it has under the War Measures Act to reduce this consumption. If it will not use those powers, does it not think that a national appeal should be made by the government to people all over Canada, in the interests of an increasing war effort, to reduce their private consumption of intoxicating liquors? That I think the government could do. It could prevent the advertising of intoxicating liquors. During part of the period from 1929 to 1934 the government of Saskatchewan refused to permit liquor advertising in that province. It was criticized for interfering with private business. The result of the refusal to permit the advertising of liquor was not apparent until after that ban had been removed, when there was an immediate and very considerable increase in consumption, in no way attributable to increase in population, the process being rather in the other direction.

Having regard to the feeling of people all over this country, will the government give consideration, if not to the use of its powers, to a national appeal to the people of Canada urging upon them, in the interests of the war effort, that they reduce the private consumption of intoxicating liquors?

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to add a word to what has been said on this subject. I do not know what effect a national appeal would have, but the government has the power, and from all parts of this house expressions of opinion have come from hon. members representing all shades of opinion that the consumption of intoxicating liquor since the war began has increased to an alarming extent. When we are not only asking but conscripting young men to join the armed forces, we ought to see to it at least that the fears which naturally arise among the parents of those boys are allayed so far as we are able to allay them.

I know that we tried prohibition in the last war and the experiment did not work out as many of us who supported the prohibition campaign at that time believed it would, and perhaps we could not enforce a measure of prohibition at this time. But every possible effort should be made in that direction, not only by appealing to the population of the country to reduce the consumption of intoxicating liquor, but by the government restricting the hours of sale, perhaps rationing the amount supplied, and generally endeavouring to cut down the consumption of intoxicating liquor, or at least its widespread sale in places where it is easily accessible to young men who often in their periods of rest have little chance of recreation other than in some sort of beer parlour.

I strongly endorse the sentiments which have been expressed and the requests that have been made of the government. I have sufficient faith in the government to believe that it will consider the matter and take effective steps to remove what has become a real menace to many of our people.

Mr. REID: I have one suggestion to make to the minister. I realize his difficulty and how reluctant he would be to interfere with the trade by way of prohibition. But it is a well-known fact that the greater amount of drinking takes place in the later hours of the evening and on into the small hours of the morning. My suggestion would be that the wartime prices and trade board should restrict the hours of sale. Ten o'clock in the evening is late enough. Those of us who have been in Ottawa many months have witnessed the scenes mentioned by one hon. member the other evening as having occurred on Bank street and other streets in the city between eleven and twelve o'clock at night. A reduction of hours of sale might not stop these incidents, but I believe would curtail consumption to a considerable extent. The wartime prices and trade board are curtailing the liberty of the subject in every other way; why should they hesitate to do it in a matter affecting the moral welfare of the people?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I should like to have an answer from the minister as to the attitude of the government towards such a national campaign as I have suggested.

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can do is to bring to the attention of my colleagues the remarks of my hon. friend and of the hon. member for Vancouver South, who made a similar suggestion the other day. I would not have too much confidence in the result of such an appeal, but it is worthy of consideration.

With regard to the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster, I feel sure that the wartime prices and trade board would feel that such action is outside the scope of their activities. They are not looking for new fields to enter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have grabbed off almost everything.

Mr. ILSLEY: It must be remembered that if we were to take direct curtailment measures, the body being curtailed would be the crown in the right of the province, because the crown in the right of the province, in every province with the exception of Prince Edward Island, I think, controls as a monopoly the sale of liquor. What we are being asked to do in taking such measures is to step right into the field of another jurisdiction being actively exercised at the moment, and say to that jurisdiction: "You are not doing your duty; this is what you shall do hereafter."

I do not think this government is the guardian of the morals of the people to any greater extent than the governments of the provinces, and I have never been able to see why pressure converged upon this government. The people who are in the business, who have a monopoly of the sale, and who are sovereign, under the decisions, within their jurisdiction to the same extent that the federal government is—they have all the powers in the world in this particular matter. If they are exercising them wrongly, why do they not exercise them properly? It is part of the war effort of the provinces; it is something they should do; it is their responsibility; it is their duty, and they should discharge it. Speeches such as we have heard here are all to the good as a manifestation of a very considerable popular sentiment in the country; but do not try to push this government into a position which the provinces now occupy.

Mr. JACKMAN: The federal government put in prohibition during the last war.

Mr. COLDWELL: While it is true that the provincial governments are very largely interested in the liquor business—I think unfortunately, from many points of view—I believe that ultimately the only way to control the entire liquor traffic will be to take it out of private hands altogether and, under rigid government supervision, handle the whole business from the manufacture right down to the sale. The manufacturers and distillers of liquor are the people who are making huge fortunes out of it. I can think of one fortune in this country, for example, which began in a little junk yard in the city of Regina during the last war. Its foundations were laid through one of the most pernicious bootlegging businesses this country has ever seen, with hi-jacking and similar practices of every description. To-day the people who were associated with that little junk yard, who corrupted the morals of a vast number of Canadian citizens, are multi-millionaires, controlling Canadian Distillers, one of the richest groups of people in this country. The making of that fortune, originated in a Regina junk yard, brought about the demoralization of many people both in the province in which I live and across the line in the United States, where they ran liquor successfully for years in violation of every law and every decency. It makes me shudder when I sometimes see those people in honoured places in this country—even sitting at the table of the king and queen when they came to Canada some time ago.

The only way to handle this business is to take it out of the hands of these people. They corrupt everything they touch. I do not speak as a fanatical teetotaller; for I was brought up in a home where we were taught to use liquor moderately, and I have never abused it, perhaps because of my early training. But if a provincial government stands in the way, that provincial government should be exposed and denounced. I think I know one provincial government which will stand in the way, and I will name it: the government of Ontario, under the leadership of the present premier of this province, whose associations with the liquor business are pretty well known all across this country. The time has come when we ought to take a stand as a dominion parliament and say to these people: We are taking these young men into the armed forces; we are sending them here, there and everywhere, away from home, and as a dominion parliament and a dominion government we are going to see that these boys are properly protected against the traffic of people who have piled up huge fortunes out of this business.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I regret the minister has taken the attitude that because there is a dual jurisdiction, this government should not take any action and has no responsibility. I do not think that position will be satisfactory to the people of Canada. The responsibility of conducting this war is upon this government, not upon the provincial governments. Of course I agree that the provincial governments, in their jurisdiction and within their spheres of influence, have a responsibility too in connection with the conduct of the war, but it is a relatively small responsibility as compared with that of the federal government. If this be a great evil, as is suggested and as I personally believe it to be, I do not think it is good enough for this government to take the attitude which has been indicated by the Minister of Finance, that it can do nothing because the crown in the right of the province has a sovereign jurisdiction co-extensive. Actually, that jurisdiction is not quite co-extensive because it has nothing to do with the importation. I imagine the minister has not even had time to take up the matter with his colleagues since Monday last, but I suggest to him that public opinion will continue to press for some action by the dominion government. My suggestion was that a conference be called with these gentlemen with a view to arriving at an amicable arrangement whereby, through mutual action, an accommodation could be reached which would have the effect of reducing the retail sales. At the same time the federal government, within the sphere of its jurisdiction, could make some arrangement whereby importations also would be reduced, as well as the domestic manufacture, which are matters solely within the jurisdiction of the federal authority. This would release materials and labour for other and better purposes.

I am not advocating prohibition in war time. We had it once. I was very hopeful that it would succeed, and I must say that it was a great disappointment to me when it did not succeed. I place my support of prohibition not on ethical but on economic grounds. I saw how it operated in my own city for two years, and I must say that operation was effective. It can be done, but only if you have behind it two factors: first, a fearless enforcement of the law, which is sometimes difficult to obtain; and, second, a preponderance of public opinion in support of it.

Mr. McIVOR: To those who seek reformation along this line I say that before we can do away with one custom we have to replace it with something better, and I would like to ask hon. members what they have offered the minister as a substitute for the drinking that is taking place all over this country.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): More milk.

Mr. McIVOR: If a custom is bad, we should replace it with a better custom, and I think there is a better one. You must change the thinking of those who practice that bad custom. If a boy is bad, or if there is a group of boys meeting in a shack in the back lot, you can overcome the difficulty by keeping those boys busy doing something they will enjoy, something the motive behind which they may not understand. I am convinced that if we are to help in any reformation along these lines we must offer something better in its place, and I think that the senior Protestant chaplain, Bishop Wells, an old college friend of mine, has that. The only cure is for a man's thinking to be changed and for him to become a Christian through and through. That is the only cure for any evil habit.

Mr. GREEN: There is one part of the minister's statement of a few moments ago which should not be allowed to pass without remark, and that was his reference to the provincial governments. The actual fact is that if this matter is left to the provincial governments nothing will be done. That is how it will work out, and the minister, if he will think it over, will come to the same conclusion. You have nine different governments —one province I believe has prohibition— and the urge is different in the different provinces, with different suggestions being made to the different governments. They are not under the same pressure of public opinion as we are here in Ottawa. The public, I am sure, are looking to the government of the nation to take the lead in this matter, because it is a national question at this time. Money is being spent on liquor which should be diverted to the purchase of war savings certificates and war bonds. Men are being employed in the liquor industry who could be employed in war industry. Materials are being used in the liquor industry which could be used in manufacturing war equipment. Then, of course, there is the moral side of the question, and that is of the greatest importance, particularly in war time, when we have to get the right spirit instilled into the people of this country or Canada will not play her part in winning the war. There is a responsibility there which cannot be evaded by the dominion government or by this House of Commons. I do urge upon the minister again, as I did on Monday last, that he make a national appeal to the people, that he put the story before them with the authority of the Canadian government behind the appeal. I think the results would be surprisingly effective. I urge upon him that he take action right away along that line.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I wish to support the suggestion which was made by the leader of the opposition. If the government is unwilling to do anything more it should at least institute a programme of education across the country. Certainly more leadership would be given to the provinces if a convention or conference were called at which this question could be threshed out and a solution found that would be acceptable to the provinces and the dominion. This government owes it to the Canadian people to show at least that degree of leadership in this time of national crisis.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I would ask the minister a question arising out of a statement by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. The attitude taken by the minister is that this is a provincial matter, while, in point of fact, having regard to the size of the problem and its effect upon the war effort in general, it is a great national problem. The distribution of intoxicating liquors is a matter for the provinces; but have the provinces been approached by the dominion government with a view to securing their cooperation in a campaign to reduce the sale and consumption of liquor? If so, what has been the result?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have discussed the matter with representatives of more than one province, but in no formal way have we told the provinces what we thought their duty was.

Mr. JACKMAN: Did they tell you?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, and they do not often tell us what our duty is.

Mr. GRAYDON: Sometimes they do.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am temperamentally averse to telling people what their duty is or telling governments what their duty is. The likely answer would be that they are pretty well informed as to what their duty is, that they know the situation. I was thinking when members were speaking that there is nothing to prevent any member from holding meetings in his constituency and asking the people to drink less.

The suggestion is that the government of Canada should advise the people on their personal habits, thereby assisting the churches and other persons whose duty it is to do that. The reason why the dominion government is being urged to do this is that a change in these particular habits would assist in the war effort. There are a great many other habits of the Canadian people that could be changed to the advantage of the war effort. I suppose there is no reason why the dominion government should not point this out from time to time, but the idea of bringing together the provincial governments and telling them, "Here, do better than you are doing," is a suggestion that would not be welcomed by some governments, particularly by those who are doing their level best to curb this evil. I am speaking about the government of Nova Scotia. I know how they have struggled, and the curtailment there, so far as I can see, has not amounted to anything at all. The people have the money, they want the liquor, and they are buying it. Surely the provincial governments, faced with these very local situations that were mentioned this afternoon, are in a better position to deal with them than is the dominion government. I would far rather see people spend their money on war savings certificates or bonds than in buying liquor.

Mr. GREEN: Why not tell them so?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have told them that. I have told them for the last one or two years to curtail their expenditures.

An hon. MEMBER: And the people have been doing it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some have and some have not. I have probably met with some success, but not by any means with spectacular success, in view of purchases from the liquor stores being about 50 per cent higher than they were the year before the war, despite all our talk about sacrifice. I am just pointing out that it is all very well for hon. gentlemen to say, "Mr. Dominion Government, you are the one to make people drink less liquor"; but it is not as simple as that.

Mr. CHURCH: The onus is on the dominion government to solve this problem. The government of the day cannot treat this simply as a question of prohibition or temperance or a question of morals; it is a war question. The government are approaching it wholly from the point of view of revenue. They have practically abolished provincial and municipal institutions as they have existed under the British North America Act. I should like to have the attention of the hon. member for Moose Jaw and of other members of the committee, who should be interested in what is being said. The fathers of confederation saw fit to design and carve out provinces and municipalities, which were given certain legislative powers under the British North America Act. They were given certain powers with respect to taxation. The government cannot shelter itself behind the idea that this is a provincial and not a federal matter; it is entirely a war problem. Secondly, the municipalities were obliged under the constitution to provide police protection and other necessary services.

They had a reduction of licences campaign many times. The province took the revenues, and all the municipalities had to say about it was that the owner and the property should be satisfactory in order to get a licence.

I have never been in a new beer parlour since they have been allowed in the province I live in, although I am not by any means a temperance man or prohibitionist. I look for some sanity from the government on this question. During the last war soldiers were placed in camps which were located a long way from any form of transportation; they put up with untold hardships. Soldiers need stimulants in their canteens. This is known by most of the military men, and they feel that nothing should be done to legislate against soldiers in canteens. When I was head of the city and chairman of the police commission of Toronto riots broke out near the close of the last war about foreigners and licences. Foreign people who had only recently come to the country were holding most of the licences for restaurants and other places. While prohibition was on in Ontario, civilians were able to stock their cellars with wet goods of all kinds, and when the soldiers came home they found prohibition in effect and bootlegging going on. When the troops returned they could buy nothing. When we had prohibition in Ontario and other provinces; it was simply an incentive for the bootlegger to flourish like a green bay tree, which he did. The law was not a success.

I have received a good many resolutions regarding this question. If there is one thing that will drive a man to drink, it is the budget of the Minister of Finance. In my opinion, it is acting both as hangman and undertaker for the small retailer and wholesaler alike. Never mind what a whole battalion of hired press experts paid by the government say of the budget. It is confiscation to the small property owner and worker.

As to beer, according to bank statements and returns made by various departments many distillers and brewers were making a lot of money—the brewers especially—and were taxed little. We are compared with the United States. The brewers are violating the law on billboard advertising and pages in papers, and they will violate this new clause of the tariff also. At the present time they advertise on billboards throughout the country and attempt to capitalize on the man in the navy, the army and the air force. In my opinion wisdom and leadership in arriving at a solution of this question is lacking. Full control over this matter has been placed in the hands of the minister and his department by the War Measures Act. The government of Canada has the responsibility to take up this question because of the changed conditions brought about by the war and the fact that the enemy is at both our front and back doors. They have failed in this responsibility. The onus of solving this question is not on this committee, it is on the government of the day as long as they are the government. They should be able to arrive at a sane and reasonable settlement of this question, especially in war time. Because of this budget the price of milk in the canteens has been put up to six cents, and beer, cigarettes, ice cream, sandwiches, coffee, tea and other liquids have gone up a cent or two. The minister should make a national survey and study the policy and come to a decision. He should know what they are doing in Great Britain and by our allies and the other dominions; and also the civil side of it should be gone into.

The minister is always preaching against luxuries; here is a good chance to practice it. There was considerable criticism in a Toronto weekly paper about the amount of money the minister's own department spent in connection with the victory loan and the war savings campaign—cigars, hotel expenses, banquets and refreshments. There has been no statement from the department contradicting what was said about this extravagence or stating their policy. As I say, the onus is on the government to solve this question, to provide a fair, reasonable and just settlement for all classes of the community. The soldier should not be lost sight of and his privileges should not be taken away without his consent.

When in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the clergy came to ask him for prohibition and a vote, the chairman of the delegation, Rev. Mr. Huxtable, found Sir Wilfrid most democratic. In the days of Sir Oliver Mowat and Mr. Ross every licensed victualler had to be a Liberal and help to raise a campaign fund. When Sir James Whitney came into power he introduced wise temperance legislation and the three-fifths clause and aided temperance. It was a sensible law and provided proper control.

The onus is not only on the minister; it rests also upon the other members of the government. There are some from Ontario but we do not see much of them. Ontario is the forgotten province in connection with confederation. The four cabinet ministers from Ontario—Toronto has none—should give heed to the people of that province on this question and aid in a solution. There is no doubt at all that much money is being wasted. The minister is asking everybody to save, but we should be able to read the handwriting for war reform on the wall. As I say, I believe the onus is on the government and they should solve this question.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Who is responsible for the runners or agents of the breweries and distilleries? Every session since 1940 I have had men come to my room in the hotel and ask if Mr. So-and-So was in. When I replied, "no," they would say that they wanted to sell him a case of such and such a brand of beer and wondered if I did not want a case. The same thing with liquor. They would intimate they had an order from this fictitious man and then try to sell me a few bottles. That sort of practice is to encourage people to buy. I do not know who is responsible, but these men are going around the hotels. I have had this happen here as well as in Toronto and Hamilton, although I have not bought any yet.

Resolution 2 agreed to.

Resolution 3 agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 111, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. McCann in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:—

1. That the rates of tax applicable to persons other than corporations and joint stock companies shall be increased to the rates set forth in the following schedule:—

A. Rates of tax applicable to persons other than corporations and joint stock companies:—

I. Normal tax—

(1) In the case of

(a) a married person,

(b) a widow or widower with a son or daughter under eighteen years of age and wholly dependent upon such taxpayer for support, or a son or daughter eighteen years of age or over and dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity, or a son or daughter under twenty-one years of age who is dependent upon such parent for support on proof that such child is a student at secondary school, university, or other educational institution;

(c) an individual other than a married person, who maintains a self-contained domestic establishment and who actually supports therein a person wholly dependent upon him and connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption;

(d) a minister or clergyman, other than a married person, in charge of a diocese, parish or congregation, whose duties require him to maintain at his own and sole expense, a self-contained domestic establishment and who employs therein on full time a housekeeper or servant;

Provided, in the case of (a), the spouse, and in the case of (b), the said dependent, is resident in Canada or in any other part of the territory of the British commonwealth of nations, or in a country contiguous to Canada, or is a national or citizen of a country allied with Canada in the present war and is prevented from entry into Canada due to the exigencies of the war, or is legally debarred from entry into Canada;

Seven per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $1,200 per year;

And in the case of

(e) a husband and wife having each a separate income,

Seven per centum of the income of each, if the income of each exceeds $660 per year;

And in the case of

(f) a single person, or

(g) a married person whose spouse is not resident in Canada or in any other part of the territory of the British commonwealth of nations, or in a country contiguous to Canada or in a country allied with Canada in the present war, or whose spouse is not legally debarred from entry into Canada.

Seven per centum of the income if the income exceeds $660 but does not exceed $1,800 per year;

Eight per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $1,800 but does not exceed $3,000 per year; and Nine per centum of the income, if the income exceeds $3,000 per year.

And in the case of

(h) Estates having income taxable as provided by subsections 2 and 4 of section 11 of this act;

Nine per centum of the income.

(2) From the normal tax there shall be allowed a deduction of $28 for the year 1942 and for each year thereafter for each of the following persons who is resident in Canada or in any other part of the territory of the British commonwealth of nations or in a country contiguous to Canada or in a country allied with Canada in the present war or who is legally debarred from entry into Canada and wholly dependent upon the taxpayer for support, namely

(i) a child, grandchild, brother or sister of the taxpayer under eighteen years of age, or if eighteen years of age or over, is wholly dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity, or under twenty-one years of age on proof that such child is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution;

(ii) a parent or grandparent of a taxpayer, wholly dependent on account of mental or physical infirmity;

(iii) a child under eighteen years of age maintained by the taxpayer in Canada under a cooperative scheme sponsored by the governments of the United Kingdom and of Canada or any of the provinces of Canada, for children brought from the United Kingdom under a government plan, or under twenty-one years of age, and likewise maintained, upon proof that such child is a student at a secondary school, university or other educational institution; except one such dependent provided for in (b) and (c) of subparagraph (1) hereof.

(3) If the tax exigible under the normal tax should cause the income of a single person or a husband or a wife to be reduced below the amount of $660 or in the case of those persons referred to in (a), (b), (c) and (d) of subparagraph (1) hereof, below $1,200, then to the extent that it would so reduce the income of the taxpayer, such tax shall not be payable.

II. Graduated rates of tax—

In addition to the normal tax there shall be imposed in respect of the income above the exemption hereinafter provided, the following:

On the first $500 of income or any portion thereof, 30 per centum per annum, or $150 upon the income of $500; and 33 per centum upon the amounts by which the income exceeds $500 and does not exceed $1,000; or

$315 upon income of $1,000; and 37 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $1,000 and does not exceed $2,000; or

$6,225 upon income of $13,000; and 60 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $13,000 and does not exceed $20,000; or

$45,925 upon the income of $70,000; and 80 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $70,000 and does not exceed $100,000; or $69,925 upon income of $100,000; and 85 per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the budget was under consideration a short time ago, I took occasion to analyse the proposals of the minister in considerable detail. I do not propose to cover the same ground again in the committee stage, but I would recall to his mind that with respect to various matters I asked that careful consideration be given to the representations which I made. I hope that as we reach the appropriate resolution he will indicate his response to the suggestions I then made.

Coming now to the specific proposals in the resolution 1, I desire to make a few observations.

I think the minister should explain directly and first of all why he did not go the whole distance in consolidating the old national defence tax, which is to expire on August 31 of this year, and the graduated income tax, into a single assessment. No doubt the reason is that the old national defence tax and its successor, the new normal tax, differ in some degree, at least, in principle from the graduated income tax, in that they are assessable against the total income of any person whose income exceeds a specified amount. I think we do not have to go very far afield to seek the reason. Because of the non-consolidation of these two taxes, the minister is enabled to strike more heavily at the lower income tax groups. That, I think, is the objective, the very skilfully concealed objective of the major part of this budget. The minister is striking the heaviest blow at recipients of small incomes that this nation has ever witnessed, and in doing so he has, and I think by design, put a crippling tax on a class of our people who will find the very greatest difficulty in meeting the imposition. In that regard there has been gross discrimination, and especially is that true, as I shall point out at a later stage, and as I have already pointed out in the remarks I made on the budget some days ago, between married men in the smaller income tax groups and single men in the same groups.

I would have thought that to combine the two taxes would have led to much greater simplicity for the tax-collecting officials of the Department of National Revenue, and certainly for the individual taxpayer. That is a criticism which I make of the proposals of the minister. Does the minister think it would not have been possible to combine the two taxes, to refrain from bearing so heavily upon a low income tax group, and to achieve a more simplified and logical tax structure? That is the summation of what I have said heretofore, divided into three parts.

I believe that the two taxes should have been combined, that he should have refrained from bearing so heavily upon the lower income tax groups, and should have achieved a more simplified and logical tax structure.

The second point in connection with the normal tax to which I desire to refer is that the proposed rates indicate an apparent and, I believe, a very real discrimination between married and single persons. That is in connection now with the normal tax, because we must bear in mind that there are two taxes, the normal tax and the graduated income tax. I assert that there is not only an apparent but a real discrimination with respect to the normal tax as between married and single persons. The rate of tax on married persons is 7 per cent if the income exceeds $1,200 per annum. In the case of a single person it is 7 per cent if the income exceeds $660 but does not exceed $1,800. Between $1,800 and $3,000 the tax is 8 per cent, and over $3,000 it is 9 per cent. Consequently, hon. gentlemen will see that in the bracket between $1,200 and $1,800 the normal tax of a married person and the normal tax of a single person are identical.

Mr. ILSLEY: In what range is that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Between $1,200 and $1,800. At least that is my conclusion and, if I am incorrect, I shall be delighted to have the error pointed out. I do not think the minister will contend that this is fair and equitable. Surely a married person in the low income status should be given on the normal tax rate greater consideration than the single person. That is a principle for which I shall contend, and for which I shall invite the cooperation of members on all sides.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is referring only to the normal tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; I laid emphasis on that. The point I raise is in connection with the normal tax alone. I am coming to the other; it is bad enough.

Mr. ILSLEY: You have to take both to get the results.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You have to take them together to get the real tax bill for the two, but I am trying to analyse this and I hope I am doing so fairly and accurately. I will take the responsibility for doing so fairly; I hope I am accurate and I think I am. I suggest that the married person in the low income status should be given on this normal tax rate greater consideration than the single person, and I shall carry the judgment of the house and the country with me in that proposition. If there is any income status in which the married person should be given consideration, I suggest that it is certainly in this very low status—the married man getting between $1,200 and $1,800. In the larger communities, in the big cities, a salary of between $1,200 and $1,800 is not considered a large salary; but in the smaller communities, in the large towns and small cities, we have no big salaries at all. There is no one, with possibly one exception, in my town with a salary in excess of $15,000 a year. On the average the salaries are low. Take the salaries paid by the provincial government of New Brunswick. They are and always have been meagre; and if you leave out the salaries of judges, which are statutory and paid by this dominion, and look at the salaries of the rank and file of our citizens, occupying various positions, men of good standing in the community, you will find a large number of them who get only between $1,200 and $1,800. But they are the men in the community who support the churches. They are the men who support community effort. They are the men in the community, none of them with large salaries, who are called upon to do jobs through the Rotary club and the other service clubs. They are married men, with children whom they are endeavouring to bring up to be the backbone of the future citizenship of the country. They are the people who have to struggle, even in normal times, to give their children education and to provide life insurance, and who usually die leaving behind them very little but a good name—the most worthy class of citizens we have.

An hon. MEMBER: The salt of the earth.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are the salt of the earth. I could name many of them in my own community who will be terribly hard hit by this budget. These are men who are doing what they can to comply with the appeal of the minister to buy war savings certificates. They have authorized their employers to deduct regularly from their pay envelopes their contributions to the national effort. Then there is the group of men in my community—I mention this class because it illustrates a large proportion of the whole field throughout the country—comprising the artisans. The artisan in good times makes from $100 to $150 a month. He is in the same category as the salaried class, and in my part of the country he is a grand citizen. He is the man who takes an interest and has always been represented in the city council, who makes his contribution to the community, and he is in exactly the same position as the salaried man. These people are being terribly penalized by this budget. Then there is the bachelor, who has no family responsibility at all. I venture to suggest that if you analyse the position of the family man with a wife and two children, as compared with the position of the bachelor, you will find that the family man is given a total advantage of only $400 per annum as against the bachelor, the young unmarried man in the same income tax bracket. That is a gross discrimination. These bachelors are spenders. The married man spends his money, to be sure, but necessity requires him to do so. He spends it on necessities for the support of his family, in bringing up the future generation, whereas many of the other class fritter away their income on useless expenditures. I make a plea for better treatment of the married man in the income tax groups that I have indicated, as opposed to the other citizens. I hope that is one feature of the budget which the minister will reconsider.

Still dealing with the normal tax—I will confine what I have to say to this resolution 1—so far as deductions from the normal tax are concerned, I suggest to the minister that the allowance of $28 for each child or dependent is very small.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Too small.

An hon. MEMBER: Chicken feed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I appreciate the minister's position, it is based on the capitalized value of the previous exemption. I do not know how he figures it out. I recall many a debate in this house in days gone by, from 1921 on, in which pleas were made by members for greater consideration to heads of families in respect of exemptions for children and especially to those men who had large families. I remember a most eloquent plea made by an hon. gentleman who now graces the superior court bench of the province of Quebec, Mr. Justice Archambault. I remember having joined with him in his request to a former minister of finance in that regard, and our having convinced the minister of finance of that day of the justice of our plea for consideration for the family man, especially the man with the large family.

There was an old, trite saying that two people could live as cheaply as one, but I found the fallacy of that saying very shortly after I got married. I think we will all agree that it is a fallacy. You cannot do it, especially under modern conditions. I am making a plea on behalf of the family man, especially the family man with a small income. I know what the struggle is. I have gone through it myself, trying to live and keep up a position and be a useful member of the community on a small income. So I appeal to the minister to reconsider the schedules in so far as they affect the men of small income. I especially appeal now for more credit than $28 a year being given for each dependent child. I realize that that is $28 off the tax. But I suggest to the minister that it should be more. I will say this in justice to the minister—I want to be fair in my remarks—that the allowance of $28 per annum for each child or dependent is an increase over the allowance made under the national defence tax during the last two years, and for that I give the minister that much thanks.

The deduction to be allowed under paragraph (iii) of subsection 2 of resolution 1 perpetuates an anomaly and an inequality with respect to guest children against which we have protested for the past two years. Only to-day I had a long distance telephone call from a man in this province who felt the injustice of that. I submit that to limit that deduction to the case of children brought from the United Kingdom under a government-sponsored plan, and to deny it to those brought to Canada voluntarily or under an unsponsored plan, is a discrimination that should be done away with. I know it will be said at once that many of these children are the children of the rich. That, however, is not universally true. I could show you in my city three lovely English boys whose father occupies just a moderate position in an insurance company in the city of London. I had the pleasure of visiting him when over there in order that I might report to him as to the physical well-being of his three boys. Those boys were taken into a good home in Fredericton. The head of that family neither has received nor expects to receive any recompense—although he probably will, I think, receive it when conditions arise making it possible—not only for the cash outlay. Not one cent is being allowed him on his income tax for having taken those children in and perhaps having preserved their lives, because I understand their home on the Thames has been bombed out—fortunately the family had moved—while someone else who brought two or three children out under a government plan is given some consideration.

This is not a plea for the rich man whose children are taken in. Many of the children brought out here were brought just out of the good-will of those who wanted to see them survive. I regret that further use was not made of the plan or system. We should have brought out many more British children to Canadian homes. I think this should have been done by the government itself, but I am not going to find fault with the government because I do not know all the circumstances. The reason given was scarcity of transportation, and that may be an adequate reason; no doubt there are others. An hon. member suggests there was perhaps discrimination in England. I do not know enough about that to discuss it. I realize that it was not possible to take all the children. Many of the children of the poor did not want to come anyway, did not want to be separated from their families. I confine my criticism to the rigid attitude of the government in not giving more consideration to the question of exemption on account of these children. I would urge the minister to reconsider that position.

Subsection 3 of resolution 1 carries forward the principle of the national defence tax, that the tax shall not be permitted to reduce the income below $660 and $1,200 respectively. This brings to my attention one of the anomalies of our tax structure as it exists in this budget. A married man in receipt of $1,200 annually pays no tax. A married man in receipt of $1,250 pays $50 tax. A married man in receipt of $1,300 pays $100 tax. The result is that the tax reduces the income of a wage-earner or a salaried man receiving $1,300 to the same level as the man receiving $1,200. While it is true that one-half of the tax payable is the minimum savings requirement, eventually refundable to the taxpayer, it does seem to me an anomaly that a man drawing $1,300 actually receives no more than a man with an income of $1,200. I shall stop there. That is just the first instalment.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): I rise to urge the minister to grant further exemption to officers of the armed forces who are not now receiving exemption. Under the present law, as I understand it, warrant officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the active service forces—that is, other ranks—are exempt from income tax. That is as it ought to be; I have no quarrel with that. Commissioned officers while on active service beyond Canada are also exempt from the payment of income tax, and that is as it should be. On the other hand, commissioned officers who have volunteered for service, who have been found to be within the required medical category and have been accepted, must pay income tax so long as they are serving in Canada. Exemption should be granted to these men as well. They are holding themselves ready and willing for active service anywhere in the world, and they should not have to pay this tax. At the present time, if we take the tax into consideration, the pay of a warrant officer is higher than that of a lieutenant.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Higher than that of a major, is it not?

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): The pay of a warrant officer is higher than that of a captain and, as I figure it, equal to that of a major. I am not taking any objection to the pay of the warrant officer; he is not paid too much. Nor am I belittling his responsibilities, for they are considerable. But I think it must be admitted that the lieutenant, the captain and the major all have much more responsibility than the warrant officer has, yet under the present set-up their pay is less. The non-commissioned officers, warrant officers and other ranks do not have to pay a cent for clothing or equipment. Commissioned officers have to pay for nearly all their clothing and personal equipment. I submit that this is not right, and I hope the minister will see the injustice and unfairness of it and take the necessary steps to have it corrected.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Calgary East.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that military exemptions hardly come within the scope of this resolution. I have been reading the resolutions in an attempt to see where the subject being discussed could be brought up, but I do not see how it can be done.

Mr. GREEN: May I point out that the question has arisen and has become of importance because of the great increase in the rate of income tax. Of course that comes under the first paragraph of this resolution, and I submit that this is the only paragraph under which that subject can be discussed.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may interrupt for a moment, I intend to present to the committee a recommendation in regard to this matter, by way of an amendment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To what section?

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be an additional resolution, I think, and perhaps the matter can be discussed at that stage. It is not to the effect that the hon. member for Calgary East has recommended, but it will deal with the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could we have it now?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it is not ready. It is one of those things on which I am working.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any section under which a discussion of the topic raised by the hon. member for Calgary East would be relevant or pertinent, if it is not resolution 1? I think we ought to do this in as orderly a manner as possible, with a view to getting through quickly. If we jump from one thing to another we are not likely to get through so quickly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that there is any resolution here that would cover it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has to have a chance to make his statement somewhere.

Mr. ILSLEY: I quite agree; and if for any reason I should say the government does not propose to do anything about the matter, I will undertake that it can be discussed on some resolution before we finish, but I expect that a resolution will be added dealing with the matter.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has intimated that he proposes to bring in an amendment. It might be helpful to him in drawing up the amendment if we were permitted to make our statements at this stage instead of waiting until the amendment is brought down.

The CHAIRMAN: My difficulty is that I have allowed the hon. member for Calgary East to make a statement, and I should not like to preclude the hon. member for Vancouver South from the same opportunity, because I want to mete out the same treatment to all hon. members. So, if the hon. gentleman has a few remarks to offer on the subject, I will permit him to do so.

Mr. GREEN: The question has been well covered by the hon. member for Calgary East, but there are one or two other aspects to which I should like to direct the attention of the minister and the committee. These officers are taxed not only on their pay but also on the allowances paid for their wives and children, and in addition, I believe, they are taxed on their rations, calculated at the rate of $1 a day. In other words, for taxation purposes the sum of $365 is added to their pay. With regard to the dependents' allowance, when this is taxed it means that the allowance is paid out with one hand and taken back with the other.

This taxation also hits officers who come back from overseas. Many officers have been brought back this year to train the troops in Canada, and I understand that the moment they arrive in Canada they become subject to income tax, whereas while overseas they were not. It affects the men who come up from the ranks. The policy of the government has been to bring up officers from the ranks. I think that is a sound policy. But if this taxation is to apply to those men who take commissions, looking at it from the monetary point of view a man might be foolish to accept a commission; he might be far wiser to remain in the ranks. After all, we have now only the one army. The men on the Pacific coast may be in action before the men in Great Britain, and it does seem unfair that there should be this distinction. These men are the leaders of the army. I believe they feel that this taxation is most unfair; the fact that it is imposed upon them is causing great uneasiness, and that is bound, in the long run, to affect the army. Looking at the question from the point of view of the defence of Canada and the need to have an efficient army here, I submit to the minister that this tax should be removed.

Then I would point out that at the present time the exemption does not cover merchant seamen, civilian firemen who have gone overseas, or men in the auxiliary services. Men in these groups should be included among those exempt from the payment of income tax. I do not think anyone in this house would suggest for a moment that the merchant seamen are not deserving of the utmost consideration, yet they do not get the benefit of this exemption. I would urge that the minister keep these facts in mind when he is drafting his amendments, so that all the officers in the army may be granted exemption as well as the men in the merchant service, the firemen serving overseas and the men in the auxiliary services.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): And the women.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I should like to support the remarks made by the two previous speakers. I think this is very unfair legislation, especially to those officers who have been overseas and have been brought back to this country for instructional purposes, and I hope that the minister in drafting the amendments will give this class due consideration.

I should like to endorse the remarks made by my leader. As I pointed out when speaking on another matter yesterday, while I have great sympathy for the minister in his gigantic undertaking, if he is not very careful he will find that this budget will be termed the home-wreckers' budget, and that applies most directly to the personal income tax provisions. One would think that a set of bachelors and bankers had drawn up this budget for the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Why bankers?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The moneyed interests are taken care of to a certain extent, and certainly this budget does discriminate against the family man. It is much easier for the bachelor to maintain himself and get along than it is for the man with a large family, and I would not give very much for the future of our nation if we had to depend entirely on the bachelors.

I consider the $80 deduction which the taxpayer can make from his tax as an exemption for a child, instead of being allowed the old $400 exemption, is another direct blow at the family man because it makes certain that he comes within the higher brackets. Many a family man with a fairly large family will find it almost impossible to raise his family properly and continue as a good citizen of the community. The budget is discriminative in that respect.

With reference to the compulsory savings feature, I do not know whether it is intended that an employee must give his employer a detailed statement of his personal financial affairs, stating what life insurance premiums he is paying, how much principal on a mortgage and matters of that kind, so that the proper deduction may be made. But if that is the intention, I consider it very improper. Employees should not be called upon to lay bare all their private affairs before their employers. It is not clear whether that is required by the legislation.

Further, if a man is buying his home under an agreement of sale, he should be allowed to make a deduction just as if he were buying his home under the mortgage plan. The resolution states nothing about that, although the man who is purchasing his home under an agreement of sale is to all intents and purposes under exactly the same financial set-up as a man with a mortgage on his home, and should be given the same consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Thank you. I trust that the minister will give serious thought to the position of the average family man and that he will make the necessary adjustments. The budget works a distinct hardship on the family man, the greatest asset that any nation can have. We shall not have much of a future if we do not encourage and look after the family man.

Mr. FULFORD: I wish to speak on behalf of the men who are taking the officers' training course in the two training centres in Canada, one at Brockville and the other at Gordon Head. I have been most reliably informed that since the introduction of this new schedule of taxes for officers the applications for taking the course have materially decreased in number. In other words, the men who now hold the rank of warrant officer do not wish to be promoted. I have heard it argued: "Surely these men must have some ambition and must want to be promoted from non-commissioned officer to commissioned officer." But I come back to the argument that was made by the minister himself last night, when he spoke of the necessity for some incentive. The incentive in this particular case must be that an officer should receive a little something more than he was getting as a non-commissioned officer, because when he assumes the rank of commissioned officer he immediately assumes greater responsibilities. I am afraid that if the officers who have been returned from England and are destined to remain in Canada are required to pay income taxation under the present schedules, we are going to have a dearth of officers in the Canadian army.

The leader of the opposition has referred to refugee children who were not brought out under a government-sponsored scheme. In Brockville there is a boys' school which, for $400 a year, has been looking after, educating and feeding refugee children, and in some instances actually clothing them. The headmaster of the school told me the other day that the sponsors of no less than three children at the school had notified him that they could no longer continue to keep the children at the school because they were unable to pay for their board and keep.

I have also in mind a school that was opened in Toronto for refugee children who were brought over, not under any government-sponsored scheme, but under a private scheme. The children are placed among various families, and no distinction is made between rich and poor so long as the child gets a good home. That school had at one time between thirty and forty children, but to-day it is closed because the children have all been placed. Those children cost those who have undertaken to look after them just as much as it would cost to look after a child brought out under a government-sponsored scheme, and I plead with the minister to provide the same exemption in both instances. The people who have taken those children into their homes have done so out of the bigness of their hearts, and should receive equal consideration with those who are looking after children brought out under government-sponsored schemes.

Mr. GRAYDON: I was very much interested in the remark made by the leader of the opposition with respect to exemptions for children. Being of an inquisitive mind I looked up the records to see how these exemptions would affect the members of the House of Commons, and I find that one member has thirteen children, two have eleven and two have nine. None of these hon. gentlemen has risen in his seat to protest against the exemptions for children as provided under this budget.

So far as exemptions for men in the armed forces are concerned, I trust that the minister will take cognizance of the powerful arguments that have been put forward this afternoon with respect to officers of units which are not overseas. No doubt some errors will be made in connection with this income tax, but I know they will not be by design. But if they are made, I think they should be made in favour of the man who is on active service rather than in favour of the civilian. It might be all very well as a technical argument to say that if a man is serving in the armed forces in Canada he is perhaps a brass hat at headquarters who would enjoy this exemption from income tax, but there is more to it than that. Over the week-end I took the opportunity to talk with a number of officers who are on active service in Canada, and I may tell the minister that their voices on this matter were pretty vigorous. One officer told me that it was the subject of acrimonious conversation in practically every mess in Canada. These increased income taxes have placed officers in Canadian units in a position in which they feel they are actually the object of discrimination. I said to one officer that no doubt the government had in mind the fact that some men would never see overseas service, that while they wore the king's uniform they were actually occupying semi-civilian positions. He said that that might be true in an odd instance, but he did not see why the government should discriminate against those who were not in that category. He said there might be only one out of a hundred to whom that could apply. He argued, and I agree with him, that men who have volunteered for active service anywhere should be granted similar exemptions to those granted to others in the service.

I think it will be found that this new tax structure will interfere to no small degree with the morale of our armed forces in Canada. It must be remembered that it is not an easy thing for some of these men to stay here and wait long months for the order to proceed overseas and for some action to occur. It is also not easy for them to see some of their neighbours and their friends in civilian life making greater earnings than they are. In many instances they have been stopped in their tracks, economically and financially speaking, and they are not feeling any too happy over the comparisons they can make. It seems to me that the government might grant these men the same exemption that is granted to others in the armed forces, for the purposes of morale if for no other reason. I am fortified in my argument by comments which have been made in the press from time to time, and I should like to refer particularly to an item which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of June 30. One sentence has particular reference to the subject under debate. It reads:

> Among the "new poor" emerging from the smoke and fumes of the recent budget blast at Ottawa, will be commissioned officers, men who have "gone active" but who have been kept on duty in Canada by order of the higher command.

Then at the end the article quotes some figures. I have not checked them, but I think they are fairly accurate. I quote:

> As against this a warrant officer (class A), with trade pay and a separation allowance for his wife of $40 a month would have a net income of $2,306.75. A promotion for him would be a financial set-back unless he jumped all the way to the rank of major.

This is not a fair way to treat men, whether they are overseas or in Canada. I make a last minute appeal to the minister to reconsider and review the whole position of officers in Canadian units.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to suggest an amendment as follows:

> That part I of resolution 1 and resolution 3 be amended by adding the following words to each:
> "Provided that in the case of a wife who is in receipt of earned income in excess of $660 per year, the wife may be treated as a single taxpayer and the husband may be treated as a married taxpayer for income tax purposes."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: By way of explanation I may say that we are informed that quite a substantial number of married women are proposing to leave employment because it will pay them to do so as a result of these income tax schedules. This amendment may prove a considerable cost to the treasury, but I am afraid we shall have to make it in order to prevent this exodus from employment. This will be the only amendment to part I.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF LETTER FROM COLONEL DREW—OPINION OF GOVERNMENT COUNSEL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house to return to motions, to permit me to make a brief statement.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in replying to the request of my hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) for a copy of a letter addressed to me by Colonel Drew, I said to my hon. friend that if he would take the responsibility of asking that the letter be tabled, it would be tabled. Subsequently I felt that, having regard to the contents of the letter and having regard to the inquiry to which it referred and the nature of the inquiry, I had better obtain legal opinion in the first instance as to whether it would be proper for me in any case to table the letter. I accordingly, through the Department of Justice, secured an opinion from Mr. George A. Campbell, K.C., who was counsel for the government in the Hong Kong inquiry, and I should like to read to my hon. friend and to the house the opinion which Mr. Campbell has given me.

The communication is as follows:

Ottawa, July 15, 1942.

Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King,
P.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Prime Minister,

re: Hong Kong inquiry

I have just had an opportunity of reading the communication dated July 11, 1942, addressed to you by Mr. George A. Drew, K.C., who acted as counsel nominated by the Hon. Mr. Hanson, K.C., during the recent Hong Kong inquiry and I have considered the question submitted as to whether or not it would be proper for you to table that communication before the House of Commons.

This document purports to disclose a very considerable number of facts and to refer to the contents of several documents said to have been put in evidence before the commissioner during the recent inquiry. For reasons hereinafter stated, I am not free to discuss the accuracy or inaccuracy of any such references.

At the outset of the inquiry an order in council, P.C. 1639, was passed on March 2, 1942, which had the effect of clothing the commissioner in this and any other investigation concerning the armed forces of Canada with all the powers and authority of a judge of any superior court in Canada while exercising his judicial functions, including specifically the power and authority of making and enforcing any order made by him concerning any inquiry held in camera in order to safeguard the secrecy of such inquiry.

In the exercise of that authority, Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, who sat as commissioner in the Hong Kong inquiry, ruled and directed that the inquiry before him should be held in camera and it was held in camera. In my opinion, all counsel who participated in the inquiry were bound by, and by their continued presence, acquiesced in that ruling. It flows from such ruling that all persons, including counsel were specifically enjoined as to their duty to preserve secrecy as to testimony given, documents produced and all other evidence placed before the commissioner, and that order directed all persons not knowingly to infringe upon such secrecy.

At the conclusion of the hearing for the taking of testimony in this matter, and some days before the date fixed for completion of the hearing of oral argument, all counsel concerned received notice from the commissioner requiring them on the day of the final hearing of oral argument to deliver up to the secretary of the commission any and all transcripts of evidence, exhibits and copies thereof, written arguments and copies thereof, notes of evidence and any and all other writings and documents relating in any way whatsoever to the matters in question.

It appears from page 32 of Mr. Drew's communication that it purports largely to be based upon his written argument to the commissioner, of which presumably therefore he retained a copy in his possession. In his letter he gives a number of verbatim quotations from the transcript of evidence and exhibits.

Mr. Drew's letter purports to give the effect of a number of confidential communications received by the government of Canada from the government of the United Kingdom, the disclosure of which was only consented to by the government of the United Kingdom subject to a specific condition that the disclosure was to be limited to the commissioner and counsel only, and solely for the purpose of the inquiry; and the commissioner was not permitted to reproduce these communications in his report. Any disclosure, therefore, even to the House of Commons, would in my opinion be a violation of the substance of that condition.

If, therefore, Mr. Drew's communication is tabled by you before the House of Commons I am of the opinion that you will be violating a condition under which the government of the United Kingdom consented to the disclosure to the commissioner and counsel of those telegrams.

I am, moreover, of the opinion that Mr. Drew's communication purports to contain a considerable number of extracts from evidence and reference to exhibits which do not appear in the published report of the commissioner and the appendix to it. If, therefore, you should table the document you are, in my opinion, to that extent participating in and thereby condoning a violation of the order of secrecy with which the proceedings in camera were to be and were in fact conducted.

Yours faithfully,

Geo. A. Campbell.

I should, I think, place on record with this communication the copy of the order in council which is referred to in the early portion of it.

At the Government House at Ottawa
Monday, the 2nd day of March, 1942.
His Excellency the Governor General in Council

Whereas the Prime Minister reports that, in his opinion, it is desirable that a commissioner conducting any inquiry under the Inquiries Act,

R.S.C., 1927, Ch. 99, involving investigation into any matter concerning the armed forces of Canada should have certain immunities and powers;

Now, therefore, His Excellency the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the Right Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the Prime Minister, and under and by virtue of the powers vested in the governor in council by the War Measures Act, Ch. 206 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is pleased to order and doth hereby order that, where under any order of the governor in council, heretofore or hereafter made, a commissioner is appointed under the Inquiries Act, Ch. 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, to enquire into any matter concerning the armed forces of Canada, such commissioner shall have all the immunities enjoyed by any judge of any superior court in Canada while exercising his judicial functions, and that any and all powers and authority of any such judge relating to any contempt of court, whether committed in the face of the court or elsewhere, shall be vested in such commissioner in respect of such inquiry; and in particular, but without limiting the generality of the foregoing, that such commissioner shall have all the powers, jurisdiction and authority of any such judge for the purpose of enforcing any order made by him concerning any inquiry held in camera in order to safeguard the secrecy thereof.

A. D. P. Heeney,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are the dates of the order in council my right hon. friend has just read, and of the order in council authorizing the inquiry?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The date of this order in council is Monday, March 2, 1942. I have not the date of the other.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, that was made subsequently to the original. That is the second order in council, and I never heard of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend will find that it was tabled with the other orders in council.

Then I should add the following communication, which relates to what I have just read; a communication from Mr. Campbell to the commissioner, the Chief Justice, written to-day:

Ottawa, July 15, 1942.

Right Honourable Sir Lyman P. Duff,
P.C., G.C.M.G.,
Chief Justice of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Sir Lyman:

Re—Hong Kong inquiry

May I, as counsel for the government of Canada, ask you who, as royal commissioner, conducted the Hong Kong inquiry that you permit the secretary of the commission to certify and hand to me for the use of the Prime Minister a copy of the order which you verbally gave directing that the proceedings be held in camera?

If you approve, the secretary might also indicate that immediately preceding the making of that order you read order in council P.C. 1639, dated March 2, 1942.

Yours faithfully,
Geo. A. Campbell.

Then the letter from the commissioner, the chief justice, to Mr. Campbell, in reply:

15th July, 1942.

Dear Mr. Campbell:

Re—Hong Kong Inquiry

I have your letter of to-day and as requested I have authorized Mr. W. Kenneth Campbell, the secretary of the commission, to hand you for the use of the Prime Minister, a copy of the order which I made regarding the holding of the inquiry in camera.

The secretary will also indicate that immediately preceding the making of my order I read the operative part of order in council, P.C. 1639, dated March 2, 1942.

Yours faithfully,
L. P. Duff.

Geo. A. Campbell, Esq., K.C.,
Chateau Laurier,
Ottawa.

The enclosure with that letter is as follows:

Ottawa, July 15, 1942.

Re Hong Kong inquiry

I certify that at the session of the inquiry held on March 4, 1942, the commissioner read the operative part of order in council P.C. 1639, dated March 2, 1942, and made the following order:

"I think it desirable, also, to state formally for the purpose of the record that this inquiry has from the beginning been held in camera and is and will henceforth be held in camera. That imports, it is perhaps unnecessary to say, the duty on the part of everybody present to preserve secrecy as to the testimony given, documents produced, and all other evidence placed before the commission, as well as the duty on the part of all persons not knowingly to infringe upon such secrecy."

W. Kenneth Campbell,
Secretary to the Commission.

I have placed on Hansard the legal opinion that has been given to me. In the circumstances I hope my hon. friend will not expect me to table the communication, because I should feel that it would not be proper for me to do so in my position as Prime Minister.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): With the indulgence of the house, and, I think, as a matter of right, I desire to make a few observations. First of all, the inquiry itself should never have been held in camera and the original order in council did not so provide. The order in council dated March 2, which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has now read, was never brought to my attention by anybody. The fact that such an order in council was passed by the government was kept a secret as well, and it should never have been passed, because this was intended to be a full public inquiry. That was the promise made in this house. It was not a full public inquiry.

After the inquiry was held and the report was brought down and tabled, I asked that the evidence be laid upon the table so that the members of the house and the public might be in a position to judge as to the accuracy or otherwise of the report.

Let me make it quite clear that the commissioner was not acting as the Chief Justice of Canada. He was a royal commissioner appointed under the Inquiries Act and, as such, his report is not immune from criticism or discussion. There is ample precedent for that; there is ample precedent right in this parliament. If hon. members want any confirmation of that statement, let me say that during the last war there was a shell inquiry presided over by Sir William Meredith, Chief Justice of Ontario, and Mr. Justice Duff, as commissioners, and the Liberal party of that day tried to tear that report to pieces—with what success I do not know; I was not here at the time. Again, during the last war Lord Cromer and his associates made a report in Great Britain, and after a four-hour debate in the British parliament, what was the result? The investigation was with respect to the Gallipoli campaign. An attack was made on the report of that royal commission by Mr. Asquith, who was then Prime Minister of Great Britain, and by no less a person than Mr. Winston Churchill, the present British Prime Minister, and in Mr. Asquith's memoirs will be found this statement. I am not quoting verbatim, but I believe my memory is correct. He said that after four hours' discussion of the Cromer report there was nothing left of it.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Now we come to this report. The report was brought down, and the evidence was refused on the ground that the hearing had been held in secret. That hearing must have been held in secret on the motion of the government, or the government would never have passed the order in council of March 2, the contents of which I never heard of until to-night—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and which I would have protested against. I did protest in one quarter against the proceedings being in secret. I admitted that there were certain portions of the hearing which probably ought to be in secret, and I referred to intergovernmental communications to which there were two parties, one party being this government, and the other the government of the United Kingdom. Those communications could not be made public without the consent of the British government. However, the inquiry went on in secret. The report was made. A question was raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) as to an opportunity being given to discuss that report in this House of Commons. I had not asked for that because I felt that to discuss that report without the evidence would be perfectly useless, that we could not have an honest, intelligent discussion of the report unless we had the evidence. We have a report which is the interpretation of a commissioner as to the evidence produced before him. On the point of this report being sacrosanct, it is in no other category than the judgment of a court of law from which I as counsel might appeal. I might appeal from the judge's interpretation of the law as applied to the evidence, and that is done in the courts of the country every day, every week, every month. My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), I myself, and every other lawyer practising at the bar have to do that. It does not mean an attack on the judge. It means an attack on the findings, on the interpretation of the judge, and that is open to any counsel; otherwise, there would never be an appeal. To say that this report cannot be criticized—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No one is saying that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let me develop my argument. To say that this report cannot be criticized is beside the mark. But how can one criticize the report if he has not the evidence upon which it is based? I submit that it is in the public interest, in the national interest, that this evidence should be laid on the table and that the Canadian public should have it. Without that evidence no discussion, no argument, based solely on the report itself, can be complete. It will be wholly unsatisfactory not only to those who make the attempt to discuss the report, but to the Canadian people, because the facts upon which the report is based are not disclosed to the country. It is not in the national interest that this thing should be kept secret. I protest against that decision.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar rose in his place one day this week. He had received from Colonel Drew, as I had, a copy of his letter to the Prime Minister. The hon. member made a perfectly natural request that the letter be tabled, in order that it might become a public document. Until it is tabled it is not a public document. It is a communication from one individual to another, although the latter may be the Prime Minister, but until it is tabled it is not a public document. That was the position.

Immediately the Prime Minister said he would table the letter, if—and he predicated his statement on this "if"—the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar would take the responsibility of asking for it. I queried in my own mind at the time why it was predicated on that condition. Was it an attempt to intimidate the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, to make him responsible for the contents of the letter? I do not know. But I took occasion to look into the matter later, and I say that in my opinion there was no responsibility resting on the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he asked that the letter, of which he had a copy, be tabled in order that it might become a public document.

Second thoughts have now occasioned a reversal of the position which the Prime Minister took. What has happened in the meantime? I gave out no copy of this letter to any newspaper, but I was informed within the last hour that a press agency in this country has carried a large portion, if not the whole, of this letter to the public press in Canada; that thousands of newspaper employees from one end of this country to the other know the contents of this letter; that it is now in fact, if not de jure, in the hands of the public. All that remains is to release the obligation imposed on the press agency which gave the letter to the newspapers that it should not be released until the document had been tabled.

The Prime Minister now refuses to table the document. I think he is within his rights in doing so; it was a letter from one individual to another. But let the public have this letter, let the chips fall where they may; I am not responsible for that. The press got the letter from some source, I do not know where and I do not care. They got it in good faith, in the public interest, in order that the public might know what the communication was. Is there any reason why the public should not know what hundreds of people in this country know, what I know, what the Prime Minister knows, what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) know about this matter? If Colonel Drew has transgressed, let Colonel Drew answer. I venture to say he will answer.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will he answer to the British government?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Certainly, he takes the responsibility; it is his and his alone. I think he will welcome it.

Mr. HOWE: He will welcome the publicity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, he is getting it, and the publicity has made him one of the biggest men in Canada, absolutely. What is the position?

Mr. HOWE: Next leader of the Conservative party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we might go farther and fare worse.

I say, let us get away from this farce of covering up. Let us have a free press in this country. We do not have it. I understand that until the last few minutes there was no censorship on this letter, but I have heard since I came into this chamber to-night that censorship has now been imposed on it. I protest against that in the name of the Canadian people, who want to know the facts and the truth about a great public occurrence. So I ask the Prime Minister to release the censorship, even if he will not table the letter, and let the Canadian people judge. They will judge fairly and truly and accurately, and appraise this incident at its true value. Therefore I ask that the censorship on this letter be released immediately.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): When I was asked yesterday if I would assume responsibility for the tabling of this letter I immediately said I would, because I had read the letter carefully and in my judgment there was nothing in it which would reveal anything of use to the enemy. It was for that reason that I asked for the tabling of the letter. That letter came to me in the ordinary way through the mail. It was not marked confidential or personal or private. It was a copy of a letter addressed to the Prime Minister criticizing in some detail, it is true, the report of the royal commission inquiring into the Hong Kong matter.

This afternoon the Prime Minister showed me the opinion which he has received from Mr. Campbell, the government counsel engaged in the inquiry, advising the Prime Minister that he should withhold the letter. I am not a lawyer, and therefore am not qualified to dispute a legal opinion, and the Prime Minister must take the responsibility for withholding that letter on the advice of counsel. I have no quarrel with the Prime Minister if he believes it is his duty to withhold the letter, although, as I said, in my opinion there is nothing in the letter which would be of use to the enemy. On the contrary, I believe that there are matters covered in it which are of interest to the people of Canada and of interest to this parliament. It deals with the dispatch of the expeditionary force to Hong Kong; it makes certain criticisms, criticisms which I believe ought to be known to this parliament in order that this parliament may be guided in the future with regard to the dispatch not of 2,000 men but of many more thousands of men overseas.

One thing that has occurred to me since I was talking to the Prime Minister this afternoon is this. I believe he would have been better advised had he sought an opinion from a counsel who was not interested in this inquiry. I think that obtaining it from a counsel whose integrity is unquestioned but who was engaged in the inquiry was probably a mistake.

As I said before, I am of the opinion that this matter should be gone into. I represent a western constituency, a Saskatchewan constituency. From our prairie constituencies young men went in one of these regiments. Their parents are disturbed by what has occurred; their friends are worried, and those who have sons in other regiments are worried lest repetition of this unfortunate affair should occur. I hold no brief for Colonel Drew or any other person; and since the Prime Minister has stated that it is not in the public interest to produce this letter at this time, not being a lawyer I cannot give a legal opinion upon it. But a great deal has been made of the fact that Sir Lyman P. Duff who made this report is the Chief Justice of Canada.

Sir Lyman P. Duff was not the Chief Justice of Canada when he sat as commissioner. I think the Prime Minister's own statement to-night clearly conveyed that to the house, when he said that the commissioner was vested with the powers of a judge. If he had been sitting as a judge, then manifestly there would have been no need to clothe him further with the powers of a judge. So I think we should keep that aspect entirely out of the discussion.

All I am interested in is endeavouring to bring before parliament in a proper and legitimate manner matters that ought to be discussed here. So I say that as far as I am concerned I asked for the production of the document; I was prepared to ask that it be tabled, as the Prime Minister put it, on my responsibility as a member of this house. Now the Prime Minister, on his responsibility as such, has stated to the house that he is not prepared to submit the document to us, and there, I suppose, unless the house decides otherwise, the matter must rest.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I have been greatly interested in the question of Hong Kong. I have said very little on the floor of this house concerning the matter, because it seemed hardly wise to say much until one knew more. But I will say that after I received a copy of the letter I went into the question far enough to make one or two discoveries which are of such a nature that I think they certainly should be aired fully somewhere. I am not saying that this should be done on the floor of the house; I am not saying that the information contained in that letter should go out to all the people of the country, with the risk that it might do us harm by getting into the hands of the enemy. I am saying, Mr. Speaker, that in that letter revelations are made of which every member of this house should be fully aware.

There is something wrong in this country, something wrong in the conduct of our military affairs. Whoever was responsible for the blunders that were committed in connection with the dispatch of troops to Hong Kong should be made known to members of this house and should be called upon to answer for those blunders. The cause should be made known, why he committed them; that man should be punished; and such reforms should be made in the set-up concerning the whole conduct of our war effort as would render unlikely a repetition of anything so regrettable as what occurred in connection with the dispatch of those troops.

I am not going to say more. I am not saying whether or not this letter should be tabled. I am saying that before this house adjourns it is the just right of every constituency in Canada that at least its member should know the whys and wherefores pertaining to this most tragic event in our history.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): May I say just a word, Mr. Speaker. I do think some of the remarks that have been made here to-night are, if I may say so, rather premature. There seems to be an assumption that there is to be no opportunity of discussing the Hong Kong expedition. It has been made abundantly clear that there will be ample opportunity for that purpose; and I want to say, as the minister in charge of the department which had to do with the sending of the Hong Kong expedition, that I am perfectly ready to have this house deal with it and consider it as fully as they care to.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Without the evidence.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend says, "without the evidence." I want to deal with that for just a moment. The situation was this. The right hon. chief justice was appointed a commissioner to examine into the sending of the expedition to Hong Kong. As was stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) at the time, the commissioner was given absolute power to conduct that inquiry as he saw fit, and no suggestion was made to him in any way by the government with regard to what method he should adopt. He, of his own volition, decided that the inquiry should be held in camera. That decision was not found fault with in the country, because it was realized that there were certain things in connection with the matter which should not be disclosed. Knowing something of the documents and something of the evidence, I can conceive that it would have been hopeless to consider holding a closed session in connection with this document, then an open session in connection with that particular bit of evidence, then going back to a closed session again when a question might be asked later about the first document; it would be absolutely impracticable to conduct the inquiry.

There were two different degrees with regard to secrecy. One was that the general inquiry was held in camera. As I say, the evidence was such that it would be absolutely impossible for a commissioner to deal with it succinctly and properly, and change from time to time from an open session to a closed session as evidence came out on the various points. The whole inquiry was in secret, but there was another point. That was in connection with certain documents which came from the British government. A number of those documents had an additional seal of secrecy on them, to the effect that they could not be even shown or read to those in the courtroom but could be shown only to the commissioner and to counsel. That is the first thing referred to in Mr. Campbell's opinion, which has been read by the Prime Minister. That is all this house is discussing; that is all that has come up so far. What is set out there is this, that the government having requested the British government—and I can assure this house that those requests were in the most unqualified and unreserved terms—to give them permission to produce to the commissioner the communications which passed between the two governments; and having received that permission with certain conditions attached in the case of some documents, namely, that they could be shown only to the commissioner and to counsel, the government now, by tabling a document which has been presented, would be violating that condition and in effect would be saying to the British government, "Although we tendered those documents to be used for that purpose, at the same time this letter has come to us which indicates the effect of those documents, and we are going to table the letter." What would be our situation with respect to the British government if that were done?

Then with regard to the general rule in regard to the inquiry being held in camera, it was understood, as was indicated there, that all the evidence would be given in camera and would be kept secret. What happens is that the document which is referred to contains, it is said, certain portions of the evidence which were not included in the report of the commissioner; and the government, by tendering and tabling that letter, would itself become a participant in a violation of the conditions which were laid down by the commissioner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the minister referring to the Drew letter?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But in the appendix to the report reference is made to the evidence.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly reference is made to the evidence; and reference is made to all the evidence, I am sure and satisfied, which the commissioner—I will call him the commissioner, but in any event he is the Chief Justice of Canada, with a reputation second to none among jurists on this continent, and with wide judicial knowledge—thought was relevant or necessary to the report. All that evidence is there, and my hon. friend and anybody else in this house have the fullest opportunity to deal with that evidence, to deal with the recital of facts which are given there, and to deal with the whole question as to whether this expedition was properly sent.

Some suggestion has been made that the Roberts commission in the United States did not publish any evidence. The Roberts report did contain reference to evidence from time to time. It did not contain all the evidence. Nobody in the United States ever asked for the rest of the Roberts evidence. They considered that the report was made by commissioners who knew their business, and the result was that that report was accepted.

I am, of course, interested in this matter, and I realize that my views on this question will be accepted with certain reservations, but I do deprecate the suggestion that somehow or another we should distinguish between a man who is a commissioner at one minute and the Chief Justice of Canada the next and consider that he is a different man and of a different calibre and integrity because of the fact that he happens to be in this case a commissioner. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to members of this house that when you have a gentleman of the standing of Sir Lyman Duff selected to hold this inquiry, a selection that was agreed to and approved by everybody who had anything to do with it as being an admirable selection, a man whose reputation is second to none, a man who has been weighing and considering evidence for years and knows how to appreciate evidence, and who was assisted by two eminent counsel from Toronto who had nothing to do with the government whatever, by Mr. Campbell of Montreal, and by Colonel Drew representing the leader of the opposition, it seems to me that the public of Canada and, I would suggest, even this house have a right to consider that this matter, which was gone into for five or six weeks, has been pretty fully investigated and that the findings can fairly be taken as the findings of disinterested men. However, that will come later. I could not help saying that, when I heard this distinction being made between the chief justice and the commissioner because, after all, it is one and the same individual who made these findings whose findings are now being questioned.

My hon. friend mentioned the order in council of March 2. He says he did not know anything about it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not at the time it was passed.

Mr. RALSTON: All I have to say is that the extract read from the record to-night indicates that the operative part of the order in council was read to counsel whom my hon. friend nominated on the 4th day of March.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would not dispute that. I never attended the meetings.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend seems to suggest that there was some covering up of this order in council. The order in council was read, and the extract is there indicating that.

I had not intended to take any part in this matter, but I did feel that it was due to me and due to the department I represent that the house should realize that this matter has been investigated and, I think, most thoroughly.

I want to say to my hon. friend the member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that he will have full opportunity to deal with the sweeping statements which he made in connection with this matter, and I trust that I shall also have an opportnuity of saying a word or two. I ask him not to get completely out of focus in connection with this matter simply because of the fact that the gentleman who happened to be counsel and who acted as prosecuting counsel and does not appear to be satisfied with the judgment which was rendered in this case, sees fit to write to the Prime Minister a letter, which letter is not being tabled. I am sure that that letter is in the hands of a great many hon. members, and I am sure that they can use the arguments put forward there to their hearts' content, and make them their own. But I do suggest that the government is taking the only course it can take in not tabling the communication, because to do so would be a direct breach of the conditions imposed by the British government, and a direct breach of the conditions imposed by the commissioner at the time he opened the inquiry.

I said a moment ago that it was indicated that the public generally were in favour of this inquiry and saw the necessity of the inquiry being conducted in secret. I happen to have in my hand an editorial from the Toronto Globe and Mail of February 26, which states:

> A royal commission to inquire into the circumstances surrounding the debacle at Hong Kong will shortly sit to hear the evidence. The inquiry will be held in camera, and several letters of complaint have been addressed to this newspaper from readers who believe that the proceedings should be open to the public. In view of the nature of the inquiry and the extent to which details of production, organization, transport and kindred matters are likely to be produced in evidence, it is obvious that the public cannot possibly be admitted. In order that the commissioner may write a just account of the episode, placing blame where it is due, exonerating those who have been unreasonably blamed, and attributing to material factors their proper share in producing the final result, it will be necessary for him to hear many things which the enemy would like to know. It is therefore not merely justifiable but imperative that evidence be heard in secret.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, my first word will be in answer to this laughter in which some hon. members are indulging. I represent a constituency which furnished a very large number of the young men who were sent with the Royal Rifle Regiment to Hong Kong, and therefore I think I have a right to say a few words on the subject without laughter from some hon. gentlemen. My constituency, up to date, has given to the country the largest number of volunteers of all the constituencies of Canada.

I shall be very brief in my remarks. The decision reached by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to-night will be a great disappointment to the families of my constituency who are expecting to hear some explanation of the circumstances of this expedition to Hong Kong. Apparently, however, they will have to accept the decision which has been taken by the government that neither the evidence taken at the inquiry nor Mr. Drew's letter will be made public. That action will surely leave an uneasy feeling throughout the country. I would suggest that there seems to be a very easy way in which to satisfy everybody, at least the people's representatives in this house. It would be to bring up these matters before parliament in a secret session together with the important question of enemy activities in the St. Lawrence river. That course seems to me the best way in which to settle this difficulty of informing the members without risk of anything going abroad.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) began his remarks by taking exception to an order in council from which I read as one which he said had not previously been presented either to the house or to himself. To be exact, P.C. 1369, the order in council which I read, was tabled in this house on April 21 and has been before the house ever since. But apart from that, as my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has just stated, the effective part of the order in council was read to counsel by the chief justice himself at the time the inquiry was held. Counsel for my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was fully aware of all that was contained in the order, and I should be greatly surprised if he did not communicate the contents of it to my hon. friend.

The leader of the opposition assumes—I think he went even farther—and alleged that the inquiry was held in secret at the instance of the government. My hon. friend knows that that is not the case, because early in this session he himself brought up the subject of secrecy, and I made it very clear at the time that the question of whether the inquiry was to be held in camera would rest entirely with the chief justice; that I had made it abundantly clear to the chief justice that the government wished to place no restriction of any kind upon him or to give him a direction of any kind, and that the reason why he was being selected as commissioner was that as Chief Justice of Canada we believed that there was no man in Canada in whose integrity and sound judgment the people of Canada had more complete faith and confidence.

On February 19, 1942, my hon. friend brought up the question of secrecy. He stated that he had not had any confirmation as to whether the inquiry was to be in secret, but he understood that it was. I quote from page 705 of Hansard:

> Mr. Hanson (York-Sunbury): I assume it is; I have not had confirmation from the chief justice.
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I assume it is, too. Neither of us apparently is aware of the facts. However, at the time I asked the chief justice if he would undertake the inquiry I gave him the assurance that the government would not wish to restrict him in any particular, and that it would be for him to decide how the proceedings should be conducted, what assistance he would require in connection with the conduct of the proceedings, and in fact all matters with respect to the commission. I assume if the chief justice has decided to hold the sittings of the commission in secret, as was the case with the United States inquiry into conditions at Pearl Harbour, he has evidently had the best of reasons for so doing. I do not know that I can say more than that.

I think that should dispose once and for all of the question as to whether the chief justice acted entirely on his own and in what he believed to be the best interests of the country and of all parties concerned, and as to his not having had any direction, either directly or indirectly, from the government with respect to any part of the proceedings.

In reference to the letter under discussion being tabled, may I say that as the leader of the house I have felt a special responsibility with respect to preventing any attacks or anything in the nature of an attack on or an insinuation about anyone in a judicial position coming directly or indirectly from any part of this house. When I read the letter that came from Mr. Drew I had in mind very much the rules of this house with respect to what was and what was not proper in the course of debate. I leave it to the three hon. gentlemen who have read this letter to say whether they agree or disagree with me when I say that in that letter are statements which could not be construed, as far as I can see, in any way other than as a most serious reflection upon the commissioner, who is the chief justice of this country. I should like to quote citation 305 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms as follows:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speakers of the British and Canadian houses have always treated them as breaches of order. Members have even been interrupted in committees of the whole by the Chairman when they have cast an imputation upon a judicial proceeding. The proper course for persons who feel called upon to attack the conduct of a judge is to proceed by way of a petition in which all the allegations are specifically stated so that the person accused may have full opportunity to answer the charges presented against him.

I may say to my hon. friend that the worst feature of the letter which I read was the imputation which it seemed to me it cast upon the judgment and, I would equally say, the integrity of the commissioner who is the chief justice of this country. May I add the fact that our chief justice, in the person of Sir Lyman Duff, is not only a member of the privy council of this country; he is a member of the judicial committee of the privy council of the United Kingdom, and no member of that body is held in greater respect in any part of the world. It seems to me that it would be impossible to have this communication tabled without one being a party to imputations upon the integrity and honour and good judgment of the chief justice of this country.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition spoke about censorship and said that he thought I should take steps immediately to relieve the censors of some ruling which they have given. I have not interfered with the censorship at any time, and I do not intend to do so at this time.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said that one exception he would take to my course in seeking legal opinion was that I had not consulted some counsel other than the particular counsel chosen. There were, among others, two reasons in particular for the choice of Mr. George Campbell. The first was that Mr. Campbell, as counsel for the government on the commission, was in a position to know the conditions under which the evidence was given, communications produced, and all circumstances surrounding the inquiry. If I had sought legal opinion outside of the counsel who had appeared before the commission, no one would have been able to state with definite knowledge what the limitations and the restrictions and the undertakings were. I think that of itself is a sufficient answer. I would say further, I believe this house will agree that few if any counsel in Canada have a higher reputation for integrity and ability than has Mr. Campbell, who was counsel for the government in this inquiry.

Just a word in conclusion as to the withholding of this letter. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of it as being withheld in the public interest. I have never given that as a reason for its not being tabled. I have said I did not wish that this house or anyone connected with it should be a party to violating the conditions under which some of the information in the report was given before the commission. The undertaking by the government to the British government which governed the conditions under which certain communications were placed before the commission and considered by the chief justice and the counsel who appeared before the commission was not an undertaking of one government to another as such; it was an undertaking by Canada to the United Kingdom, the government acting as the representative of this country. I mention that because I feel that this House of Commons, representing the people of Canada, would not wish to be a party or have any of its members a party to the violation of any undertaking or agreements which existed between the governments of the two countries.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question just to clear up one point, since I read the letter and take the responsibility for asking that it be tabled? The right hon. gentleman has given the impression, I think, that Colonel Drew quoted from documents passing between the government of Canada and the British government. I do not think that is so. My recollection is that he referred to certain matters but that there were no documents given and no quotations from them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is reference in a way which I have every reason to believe the commissioner himself would not regard as proper, or Mr. Campbell would not have given the opinion which he did.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the right hon. gentleman a question. Under the public inquiries act must not a commission—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: —conduct proceedings in public? That is the law, by statute and usage and custom.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I remember that an opinion was given to me years ago by, I believe, the Department of Justice. An inquiry under the Inquiries Act is a public proceeding. I should like to get an answer, Mr. Speaker. I moved for these papers last Wednesday.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: We were considering resolution 1, part I, normal tax.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have not heretofore addressed the house either in the budget debate or in the discussion of any of the resolutions arising from the budget, and therefore I desire for a moment to pay a high tribute to our Minister of Finance for the manner in which he has conducted the financial affairs of this country during the last fiscal year. He has in my view done a real job in that capacity, and a difficult capacity it has been. When I deal with two or three matters to which I shall confine myself, I desire it to be distinctly understood that there is no criticism of the minister, but merely criticism of some of the methods by which under this budget he proposes to raise revenue. I wish to conclude my tribute to him by pointing out this extraordinary fact, that in his budget of a year ago he estimated for this parliament the sources of revenue and the probable amount of revenue for the fiscal year ahead. Now that that year is ended and we have the reality, we find the actual figures of revenue received were $1,480,000,000, or in round figures almost one and a half billion dollars, or within four and a half million dollars of his estimates made a year in advance. I venture to say that never since confederation has a finance minister shown the vision and the control of finance which is evidenced by the reality as compared with his estimates the year before.

I want to deal with two or three matters. First, apropos of the items under discussion, I suggest to the minister—and I wish it understood that any suggestions I make are not destructive or critical, but are intended to be constructive and helpful, and that alone —that even though it be necessary to increase the burden of these items, or perhaps to adopt another method to which I shall refer later, in order to gain the additional revenue required, he increase his estimates of the amounts required to support the army for the coming year by an item of $4,500,000 in order that our soldiers may be placed upon a minimum payment of $50 a month, the amount that the United States private soldier is receiving.

The second item to which I refer has been touched upon by the leader of the opposition and other hon. members, but I have tried to run it to earth a little farther than they have done. It was suggested to me that this is what might be called a bachelor's budget. We have in this house twenty-two eminent bachelors, and I am sure they would be the first to join me in desiring to have the burden of taxation placed so that it would bear fairly upon the bachelors in Canada as well as upon the married men.

I will take only a moment to illustrate what I believe is a discrimination which operates unfairly against married men, particularly married men with children, and in favour of the bachelors. I remind you, Mr. Chairman, and I deal for illustration first with an income of $3,000 a year, that on that income the bachelor is taxed $1,064 and the married man is taxed $884. In other words, the difference allowed the married man on which to support his wife for a year is $180. I had thought that we desired to discourage bachelorhood and endeavour to bring about unions of marriage in this country in order to become a growing and virile nation. The very opposite result is the effect of the figures I shall give, because a bachelor who might say to himself, "I am tired of this single blessedness; I am going to marry", on looking over this budget will find that it is an expensive process for him to enter upon. The sum of $180 a year to keep a wife means exactly 49 cents a day for everything she requires, upon which to furnish her with food—

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot do it.

Mr. SLAGHT: An hon. member says that you cannot do it. I fancy he is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: As a married man you ought to know.

Mr. SLAGHT: There is something even more spectacularly discriminatory as against the married man with two children. The same income, $3,000, works out in this way for him. He is taxed $668 instead of $1,064. In other words, the state is allowing him $396 with which to maintain a wife, a boy of, let us say, ten, and a growing girl of twelve, or, in other words, $396, as against the bachelor's tax, to maintain those three persons. If we divide this amount by three, it allows him $132 a year on which to maintain each of the three. If we bring that down to a daily quota, he has the magnificent allowance of 36 cents a day on which to maintain the wife, 36 cents a day for the boy of ten, and 36 cents a day for a girl of twelve. If we divide that again, then aside altogether from food, he has practically nothing left to buy clothes, shoes and all these other things—

An hon. MEMBER: Penny candies.

Mr. SLAGHT: "Penny candies" an hon. member reminds me. I am serious in this. What has this married man? 36 cents a day on which to feed his wife. For breakfast he can allow her 6 cents; for luncheon, 10 cents; and opening his heart at dinner time, he can spend 20 cents with which to buy her dinner. That eats up the 36 cents, and he has nothing left for any of those necessities which a man with a wife and family must take care of. Why, in a year's time life would be nothing but a shadow on 36 cents a day. The children could not be furnished with overshoes or warm clothing in the winter and probably would have to stay in bed. I analyse that situation to endeavour to bring home to the minister in the most friendly way that, if his bachelor tax is fair, he ought to increase the living allowance in favour of, at least, the married man with two children. Somebody says that means loss of revenue under this budget, and of course it does; but if the minister does not see fit to put on the shoulders of bachelors the burden of the loss incurred by treating fairly the married man with children, I have another suggestion to make in that regard. Before I conclude I will show him another method by which he may treat fairly the married men with children and still have just as much money with which to meet the expenditures that are so necessary under this budget.

Let me say at this point that I have no word of criticism of the spending of $3,900,000,000 which the minister proposes to spend. I would go a little farther and increase those expenditures if needs be. But I am going to quarrel in a friendly way with the method by which the minister proposes to raise the money. Just before I pass on to that, may I add a word in support of what was well put this afternoon by a number of hon. members, that we must remove the unfair inequalities which we are permitting if we carry out the budget proposal to tax a lieutenant or captain or officer in the active service forces because he is in Canada and not in England. To my mind that is grievously unfair. Take a young man who gives up his business or whatnot and volunteers for active service anywhere in the world. He lives perhaps in Ottawa or some village outside, and at the moment is on the Pacific coast in the service. He has made a great contribution by entering the active service. As has been pointed out, he has no control over where he goes. Most of the young officers to whom I have spoken are itching to get to England or somewhere where there is active service to be encountered, and that is the experience of probably all hon. members. That being so, how can we tax such an officer on his allowance from the state for his service? Do not misunderstand me. There may be young officers who are serving either in England or in Canada—if they are serving overseas they are exempt, and so they should be—who may have private incomes of their own, quite apart from the amount of money the state pays them. There is no suggestion from anyone, much less from me, that they should be exempt as regards their own private income; but when we come to the amount they are paid for entering into an unusual situation in defence of the country and of the empire, I want to add the strongest protest I can against this country placing an income tax on the amount they receive.

I have been informed, though I have not checked it up, and military men will correct me if I am wrong, that the slogan used by the Department of National Defence, is, "Join the best paid army in the world." That statement is no longer true, if it was before the United States came into the war, because we are paying our privates $39 a month and they are paying theirs $50.

Mr. GIBSON: What about allowances?

Mr. SLAGHT: All right. Compare the allowances in the United States with those in this country, and you will find that the United States soldier is still better paid than the Canadian.

Mr. GIBSON: Have you the figures?

Mr. SLAGHT: I have not. My hon. friend has, and I challenge him to show that I am wrong.

Let me touch on one or two more factors connected with this matter before I proceed. There is a danger that if we cut these young officers down to the very lowest that they can stand, young men with a clean record may be suddenly brought before a court martial by reason of financial difficulties arising from a low scale of pay. Anyone familiar with the British situation knows that, regrettably, that is happening over there. May I point out that officers in the United States forces not only get better pay but do not pay taxes.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have been informed—

Mr. ILSLEY: We have a dispatch on that.

Mr. SLAGHT: If the minister has a dispatch on that, I eliminate it from my statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have the position in the United States and the position in Britain made clear. I have heard that they both tax them.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In our discussion we ought to know what the position is in these two places. The minister says that my statement is correct. Then our point of view may or may not be altered by that fact.

Mr. ILSLEY: Application for deferment may be made in the United States, but in the United Kingdom, so far as I know, there is nothing even of that kind. They are taxed in both countries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Deferment of payment?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. If a man cannot pay and he is in the forces, he has the privilege of applying for deferment.

Mr. SLAGHT: I regret if I have made a statement which my hon. friend has had to correct, and has been good enough to correct. At any rate, we in Canada have to make up our minds in this parliament how we are going to treat our own Canadian officers. Is there anybody who can really justify this parliament taxing the income of a young man, who has no control over where he is sent, because he is in Vancouver island, which was recently bombed, and not in England? I cannot see it at all, and I may say that on information I have—and I know I am right in this—young officers in our Canadian army in this country are greatly upset at the suggestion of their proposed treatment under this budget. Surely it is worth-while to maintain morale, and on that ground alone I suggest that this committee should recognize that these men are making a sacrifice. When we talk about equality of sacrifice, none of us, no civilians, however earnest they may be and however hard they may work in civilian enterprises, can be compared at all, from the point of view of sacrifice, with the officer in the army.

I promised that with regard to the two suggested losses of revenue I would, I hoped, be able to show the minister how to replace them without having to increase taxes by way of the sales tax, or by heavier imposts on the bachelor, or by imposing any direct taxation. I suggest to him that he consider doing it in this way, that he should issue at once a very substantial amount of national currency. I am not a follower of the Social Credit party, but I welcome any view they may hold which supports mine. Let me give, quite independently of anything I have heard from those worthy gentlemen, the reason why I make this suggestion. We are in committee of ways and means, and I make the suggestion as a way and means to get a substantial revenue for this country and not increase the already very heavy burden which falls upon the taxpayers, especially those in the lower brackets. I shall give a few figures which I think will make my suggestion very clear.

In the appendix to the budget, at page 56, it is shown that we borrowed in the two years and five months of war, $3,933,508,690, of which more than $10,000,000 was non-interest bearing certificates. Therefore the net borrowing on which we took on a new interest burden amounted to, roughly, $3,922,000,000, and we used $1,503,000,000 of that to redeem maturing bonds so that we created new interest-bearing debt for spending purposes—and we certainly spent it—amounting to, roughly, $2,418,000,000. It is interesting to note that of those amounts we borrowed from the chartered banks $600,660,000 and they have the bonds with the interest coupons; we borrowed from the Bank of Canada $664,340,000, or a total from those two sources of $1,265,000,000.

Let me give the story for the last fiscal year. We borrowed $2,457,000,000, of which $4,000,000 was by means of non-interest bearing certificates. Therefore we borrowed at interest $2,452,000,000, and of that we used last year $964,000,000 to redeem maturing bonds, so we created new interest-bearing debt and spending money amounting to $1,488,000,000. Our projected budget this year is $3,900,000,000. About half of that, or $2,049,000,000, it is proposed to raise by taxes, and the minister in his summation of the item we are now discussing and other items says that this leaves a budgetary deficit of $1,850,000,000 which will have to be covered by borrowing.

I have examined our maturing obligations for the coming fiscal year for which we are budgeting. They amount to only $595,000,000. I propose to the minister that any additional sum that he has to get to cover the loss under the two or three items I have discussed under item 1 he should get in this way: he should issue at least $1,200,000,000 of national currency.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How would the hon. member make that jibe with the policy of the administration against inflation?

Mr. SLAGHT: I will answer that. I expected that some hon. member would rise in a hurry and say that that would create inflation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not asking the question in that sense at all. I am asking for information. Before I returned to the house after the election of 1940, I suggested to the deputy minister of finance that we should try that method.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, the hon. leader of the opposition saw the light; he saw the folly of what we have been doing for several years sooner than I did. I compliment him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Unfortunately, I did not get the slightest encouragement, and I dropped the matter, on the theory that I was wrong. I apologize for interrupting.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend may change his mind back again. I will try to change it for him. My hon. friend says, "Oh, that will create inflation". There are others who will probably put it much more severely than my hon. friend is putting it. If by inflation we mean you are going to cheapen our present supply of money because you issue more national currency, let me suggest that that dog won't bark; that is not true at all, and I will tell the committee why. I am saying, let us issue bonds for the $595,000,000 of maturities, because those will be brought to the minister by the insurance companies, trust companies and banks, who represent a large number of clients, and they will expect, not to get cash for them, but to get new bonds, as they have been getting for the last twenty years, which bonds will bear interest; that is the way in which the government will maintain its obligations. So I would not disturb in this year of war time the reissue of $595,000,000.

I shall try to illustrate to my hon. friend by an actual visible illustration that it will not create any inflation at all, the reason being that we now control all expenditure in this country. We control prices against rising. We have a food controller, an oil controller. In fact we control every commodity there is except the air we breathe. We control prices of all commodities, and we control wages. That is something which the minister said in effect in 1939—I can give the page—that if you can control the ceiling of prices so that if you issue more national currency there will not be an immediate spiraling up of prices, then there is not danger of inflation by the issue of further national currency in the same way as there would be otherwise.

Mr. ILSLEY: When did I say that?

Mr. SLAGHT: As reported at page 139 of Hansard for 1939, the second session, the first column, the minister put it in this way. He was dealing with this question with which I am dealing, and he said with regard to inflation:

> If it is replied that we should control prices rigidly, then, assuming that all prices under such conditions could be effectively controlled—a very optimistic assumption—we would have to prevent the public from spending its money by some other means such as a drastic system of rationing all commodities.

We are now in the very midst of the most drastic system of rationing all commodities that this country has ever known. It is working. The minister then displayed a lack of optimism, and I think he was perhaps right at the time. That system of rationing has, however, become a reality in this country. Everyone knows that we are rationing certain commodities and preparing to ration more, and the housewives and citizens of Canada are taking it with chins up and obeying the rationing laws, because we are finding no necessity for prosecutions to make people observe them.

Let me now return to the question of inflation. By inflation is meant that you are putting too much cash in the hands of the people of this country, particularly the working people and the farmers, and the 85 per cent that are termed the very modest earners; you are giving them too much money, and they will go and spend it. Will any of my hon. friends tell me, because I have a $100 bill in my hand—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SLAGHT: I had to borrow it, Mr. Chairman, and the public interest would not permit me to table it. The security back of this Bank of Canada currency is the credit and the assets of Canada. Then I have a $100 bond here, with the pretty little coupons attached covering a period of years, with interest at three per cent payable half-yearly. The security behind this bond is the credit and the assets of the Dominion of Canada. There is no difference at all in what is behind either of these securities; and there is not a pennyworth of gold anywhere in the custody of the government to-day, or in the custody of the Bank of Canada, behind either of these securities. Two years ago we gave up the requirement which had obtained up until then of 25 per cent gold before national currency could properly be issued against it. That day has gone, both with Britain and with us. But we have the credit of this country behind both these securities.

If, instead of issuing bonds, taking them to the bank, pushing them through the wicket and getting $100 bills for them, which the Minister of Finance would do if he issued bonds, he issued $100 bills, what does he do with the money? He pays the obligations of Canada. He pays the John Inglis company for Bren guns, and they in turn pay out the money to their workmen. Similarly, if we issue a $100 bill and take it to the bank and deposit it—because we would not want to keep it in a strong box—we hand it to the banker. Then he has the $100 bill and we have the credit. Then we cheque against the same account, to the John Inglis company and everybody else, and we meet the obligations of Canada in exactly the same way. How do the working people in Canada get any more money under the system of issuing bills than they get under the system of issuing bonds? They have to earn every dollar they get from the John Inglis company or from anyone else. But someone gets a good deal more out of this system that we are going to follow. What does the private banker do, and by that I mean the chartered banks? If my hon. friend issues this bond and takes it to a bank; if that bank has only $5 in its till in money of the Bank of Canada, paper money, the bank then has power, because we have delegated that power to it, to thank him for the bond, take it in, put it away and make a bookkeeping entry in a ledger with pen and ink showing that my hon. friend has a credit of $100 in the bank against which he can cheque the next day, if he wishes, and draw it all out or leave it in. But the bank gets that bond for nothing, except for this. It does just one thing to get that bond; in the first place it has to get a $5 bill of the Bank of Canada, and perhaps it has to keep it there, but it does not even give up that bill. It simply makes a written entry in a book, because we have delegated the power to issue money to the private bank instead of retaining that power in the parliament of Canada, where the British North America Act placed it. I have the sections of that act here, but it will not be gainsaid that the power to create and regulate money is given under section 91 to the parliament of Canada. But we do not use that power. We delegated it years ago to the chartered banks, under our financial system.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In 1934 we took it back at so much a year, and it will soon disappear.

Mr. SLAGHT: Oh, no; I will tell my hon. friend what happened in 1934, and he can look it up. All we did was to say to the chartered banks, who had enjoyed much greater freedom in issuing their own bank bills, that each year thereafter they had to decrease the issue of their own bills by 10 per cent. We did nothing else. We never stopped their writing entries in books and creating paper money by credits of that kind. We never stopped their taking these bonds, keeping these interest coupons for ten or twenty years, as the case might be, and fattening on this procedure. My hon. friend may say something about the great debts that are being created. With dominion government bonds outstanding now amounting to $5,866,000,000, according to the budget; with provincial interest-bearing securities amounting to a large figure, and municipal securities, the public debt of Canada to-day amounts to $10,016,000,000. That is a terrible load; and the interest we are paying to-day on bonds of just this kind, which are largely held by banks, trust companies, trust estates and the wealthy people of this country, is shown in the budget as $170,000,000. If we issue the additional $1,850,000,000 of bonds which the minister says we shall have to raise by borrowing this year, we shall add to that amount of interest another $55,000,000, so that next year we shall be paying $225,000,000 in interest on debt created in the way I have indicated. In ten years that yearly interest payment will amount to $2,250,000,000, which we shall have paid on debt-bearing securities of the dominion government alone.

Can we stand that sort of thing, or should we stand it any longer if there is another way of doing it? Surely I have shown that there is no more inflation, and that you have not given the working people of this country any more money to spend, because you give the bank this bond and let it have the interest for nothing, than when you issue this bill. It is nonsense to let anyone tell you otherwise. If that be so, what would be the harm in doing as I have suggested? Where is the evil in it? I should be glad to be shown. I think it is time we called a halt. I have just about concluded if my hon. friend is protesting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, go ahead; this is most interesting.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am sorry; I thought my hon. friend was protesting. Lest anyone here should have any doubt about my interpretation of the law—though I am sometimes wrong in that—I should like to give an authority that probably will not be questioned; I refer to Mr. Graham Towers. Before the standing committee on banking and commerce in 1939, at page 76 of volume 1 of the proceedings, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was examining Mr. Graham Towers, and I might read half a dozen questions and answers in order to set any doubt at rest:

Mr. McGeer: Am I right in saying that a bank deposit can be created in this way? A banker can purchase a dominion government bond by accepting from the government, we will say, a bond for $1,000 and giving to the government a deposit in the bank of $1,000?

Mr. Towers: Yes.

Mr. McGeer: When a bank takes a bond from the government, what the government receives is a credit entry in the banker's book showing the banker as a debtor to the government to the value of $1,000?

Mr. Towers: Yes.

Mr. McGeer: And in law all that the bank has to hold in the way of cash to issue that deposit liability is 5 per cent?

Mr. Towers: Yes.

Mr. McGeer: You are aware that our banks now hold one billion four hundred odd million dollars of municipal, provincial and dominion securities?

Mr. Towers: Yes.

Does my hon. friend still suggest that that has been altered since 1939? I have made vigilant search, and it has not. I think he was thinking of the issue of notes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I admit that.

Mr. SLAGHT: I have gone on much longer than I intended, Mr. Chairman. But let me show you what we have been doing under this frenzied system since 1910. This picture is a vivid one because I am speaking only of dominion debt, and leaving out provincial and municipal debts. In 1910 our dominion debt amounted to $341,000,000; in 1920, $1,935,000,000; in 1930, $2,261,000,000; in 1940, $4,062,000,000; and in 1942, as set out in the appendix, $5,866,000,000. Where do we go from here?

Someone may suggest, "Oh, if you issue national currency you are going to give the workingman of this country pockets full of money." Does anyone suggest that when the workingman gets through paying his taxes under this budget he is going to have too much money to spend; that he is going to become reckless in his expenditures after paying these taxes? This budget is going to be a financial strain. It is going to be the toughest budget the Canadian workingman or anybody else ever tried to bear up under, and yet they are going to take it, and take it with a cutting down of their expenditures on luxuries and all that sort of thing, which the Minister of Finance is very properly advising us all to cut down on.

I want to say this, that rather than deprive the soldier of the $50 and the married man of a decent allowance to support his wife and children, I would raise the income tax a little higher on incomes in the upper brackets —raise the taxes on the men who have as against the men who have not. I am prepared to support that proposition if needs be. The minister seems to be amused by my language, but I tell him I am sincere in making this suggestion. My hon. friend the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group has said more than once that it is not what you tax a man that counts but what he has left after he has paid his taxes, and surely that is good gospel in war time. I would impress upon the minister in the most sincere way, if he feels that to meet the increases I have spoken of, because of the losses that will follow them, he must raise more money by borrowing, not to do so, but to issue national currency instead. We have outstanding now in national currency $515,000,000, and that is all. That works out at $43 per head for every man, woman and child of our eleven and a half million people. That $515,000,000 is made up of $470,000,000 of paper currency and $45,000,000 of silver and copper coins, because we have no gold coins now, and that $515,000,000 is all the national currency we have outstanding. The United States with their tremendous wealth and greater population have outstanding in national currency an amount which works out at $88 per head of their 130,000,000 people. That is the situation in the United States, so there is no parallel whatsoever.

Somebody says, "What is the harm in issuing a lot more debt for Canada to pay out?" I give credit to the Minister of Finance for doing this, that he has got the debt owed by this country into the hands of Canadian people instead of into the hands of people in New York and London. That was a wonderful thing to do; the debt is nearly all now in the hands of Canadian people.

Somebody says, "If the Canadian government collects from the Canadian people $1,850,000,000 by way of bonds, with a yoke of interest to pay for twenty years, then the Canadian people own $1,850,000,000, and all is well. Everything is all right; you have done no harm to anybody." But that dog won't bark, and for this reason. I have some figures dealing with the distribution. I am sorry I do not have them here, but I got them from the authorities. The Minister of Finance recognizes the problem of where the interest-bearing debt obligation is owned and held.

An hon. MEMBER: By the chartered banks.

Mr. SLAGHT: In large part, yes. Out of $3,922,000,000 of bonds issued, the chartered banks bought $1,254,000,000. But there is another way in which they do business. Anybody who wants to buy a bond can go to a bank and pay in $10, and the bank will advance the rest to buy a $100 bond for him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will go 100 per cent sometimes.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is a very laudable thing to do. But just get the figures of Canadian bonds which the chartered banks are holding to-day. In the last victory loan the Minister of Finance, with the aid of all those men who rushed in to help him, got a wonderful distribution of the loan. I did not mention, in connection with the $55,000,000 of increased interest, that it will cost us at least eight or ten millions more to get it, because that is the expense of raising victory loan money. Somebody objected last year to $8,000,000 as being too much. I do not think it is. But that is a part of the burden you have to carry if you go on the debt-issuing principle instead of on the currency-issuing principle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the hon. member put any limitation on this method? What would he do with foreign obligations if our money became depreciated?

Mr. SLAGHT: If it became depreciated? If the country were blasted to pieces with a volcano, what would any of us do? Let my friend show me how this money will become depreciated. I am suggesting a national currency, which does not mean debt, instead of debt-bearing obligations. Suppose a foreign country is looking at Canada's financial position and Canada's bookkeeping. Do you think that Great Britain or the United States will think less of Canada if she increases her national currency by $1,200,000,000 in one year, instead of increasing her national debt by $1,200,000,000 of bonds, plus $55,000,000 of interest-bearing coupons every year? If you were a country merchant and you were looking at a customer who had an obligation of a straight $100 to pay at some time when his creditor pushed him, would his credit be any worse than if he had an obligation of $100 at 3 per cent interest for twenty years, which would make his total debt $100, plus three times twenty, or a total of $160? There has been a lot of bogeyism about this matter and a lot of well-meant nonsense.

There have been many false premises; there have been many unsupportable statements; but I challenge anyone to show me where there would be inflation by the same issue of national currency, if carefully each year you take care of your maturing bond obligations that mature in that fiscal year. We started off under a foolish policy, and we cannot ruin the insurance companies and the banks by shutting them off and giving them just cash when we require to renew our obligations as we do year after year; I want to protect them. When you have done what I suggest, and if I am right in saying that we have maintained control over prices, that we have maintained rationing of goods, then every proper reason that has ever been advanced before in Canada in support of this debt-increasing burden falls to the ground.

Mr. ILSLEY: I very much regret the speech that has just been made, because I think it will do a great deal of damage. It is made at a time and in an atmosphere when seeds of that kind will, I am afraid, fall on fertile ground. I ask the hon. members of this house to give me a chance to answer this, because I feel a deep responsibility at this moment, and I am going to do the best I can to answer what my hon. friend has said. At a time when we are passing through great disasters we are asking the people of the Dominion of Canada to bear great burdens. We have laid down a basis for our fiscal policy. We did that before the war, and we reasoned these matters out with great care in speech after speech that I and my colleagues made. We examined carefully the proposals that my hon. friend has made—he has not made them, so far as I know, until now, but others have been making them from before the war in practically the same form—we have had committees on them, and we have looked at them from every point of view. We came to the conclusion—in this we were agreed with by the experts of the dominion government, the United Kingdom government, the government of the United States, the governments of the other dominions and, so far as I know, the governments of every democratic country—that by all means the fairest way of financing the war was by taxation and by borrowing. We have given our reasons why that is so.

If a country devotes its assets, devotes its resources, human and material, to the carrying on of a war to the greatest extent to which it is capable, the real costs of that war are not monetary; they are costs in men and property which the country has devoted to the carrying on of the war. The more of their output that they put into war, the less there will be for the people who stay at home. That may become less and less, and the standard of living of the people may go down and down. How will that go down? In what way will that burden be apportioned? There is no escape whatever from the burden. When the country produces as much as it can, if it devotes 40 per cent, then 50 per cent, then 60 per cent of that output to the war, the proportion left for the people at home goes down, and an ever-increasing burden is placed upon the backs of the men, women and children of the country. That is inescapable. We are talking about realities. This is not a question of money at all; it is a question of things and people. It is elemental. We are just confusing it if we think it is a question of money.

Mr. QUELCH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. ILSLEY: Will my hon. friend please keep his peace? I asked for that courtesy when I rose. I want to make a good job of this, because I feel that it would be a calamity if my hon. friend's views gained any foothold in this country. It is all very well for the group in the corner to be talking. There are not a great many people who take them seriously; but if a powerful speaker such as my hon. friend is going to disseminate this kind of doctrine throughout Canada and it is taken seriously, then of course it upsets the very fundamentals of our whole scheme of financing this war. It destroys it.

Mr. SLAGHT: It does not give you the right.

Mr. ILSLEY: If my hon. friend believes that, then he has no confidence in the financial policies of the administration. He should not be a supporter of the financial policies of the administration, because his attack is upon fundamentals.

Let me come back to what I was saying. The question is how to distribute this burden, because a burden there will be. There are three ways in which to do it. The first is by taxation; the second is by borrowing, and the third is by inflation. We can adopt that policy, and it will be easy for a while. My hon. friend is not the first to suggest it. This is not the first century in which clever men have risen in their places in parliaments and advocated this kind of thing. Let the hon. gentleman read the debates of the constituent assembly at the time of the French revolution. The finest economists of France were advocating this thing. They were advocating the issue of a few million more of money, then a few million more and then a few million more until their currency was entirely destroyed. It has been done time after time.

My hon. friend says to-night that we should finance this war by the issue of a billion dollars of what he calls national currency. I gathered from the latter part of his remarks that by national currency he meant Bank of Canada notes, because he told the committee of the hundreds of millions of dollars of Bank of Canada notes that are outstanding. Let me lead the committee through the three kinds of borrowing that there might be. The most simple way of putting into the currency of this country a billion dollars of Bank of Canada notes would be to borrow a billion dollars from the Bank of Canada. We would be borrowing from our own institution, and the effect would be precisely the same as if we had issued this amount. We cannot issue it because we have not the power, but it would be our bank that would be issuing it for us.

If they issued and lent the money to us, that is an issue of a billion dollars of national currency. That is the most natural thing.

There are three kinds of borrowing. First, we can borrow from the public; second, we can borrow from the chartered banks and, third, we can borrow from the Bank of Canada. That is by far the most inflationary method of the three. If the government borrows $100,000 from my hon. friend, his bank account shrinks by $100,000 and the Minister of Finance's bank account increases by $100,000. There is no difference in the total of the deposits after the transaction from what there was before. I think that is clear. That is the first method of borrowing.

The second method that I mentioned is to borrow from the chartered banks. I go to some bank and ask them to let the government have $100,000. If I followed what the hon. gentleman said, the government would be doing just exactly what the hon. gentleman says they would do. They simply credit the government with $100,000, and the total of the bank deposits of the country have increased by $100,000. In other words, that transaction results in there being in existence $100,000 more new money than there was if I had borrowed from my hon. friend. To that extent it is $100,000 more inflationary in its effect than the other method. That is the reason why we shy off from borrowing from the chartered banks, why we strictly limit our borrowings from the chartered banks, keep them down to the irreducible minimum. That is why we keep on with these campaigns throughout the country and pay millions in advertising. That is why we have 22,000 workers for the national war finance committee all over Canada trying to get the people to lend their money to the country so that the government will not have to borrow it from the chartered banks. That is the second method.

The third method is the method suggested by my hon. friend to-night, borrowing from the Bank of Canada or issuing of more currency. That is several times more inflationary than borrowing from the chartered banks.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What do you mean by inflation?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is more inflationary than if we borrowed from the chartered banks, for this reason. We are borrowing real cash then; we are borrowing something which, when it goes into the chartered banks, serves as cash reserve. Everyone familiar with the working of the banking system knows that, the moment the banks get their hands on additional cash—I mean by that Bank of Canada notes, or deposits by the Bank of Canada which are convertible into Bank of Canada notes—when the banks get those reserves in their hands, powerful forces are set in motion to get the banks to buy securities themselves, to make loans themselves, so that the deposits of the chartered banks will be seven, eight, nine or ten times as great as their cash reserves. That lies at the base of their whole profit-making activities; the way they make money is by lending more money than they have. What they have is their cash reserves; and unless a bank has out several times—six, seven, eight, nine or ten times—its cash reserves, it is not being profitably or, from a banking point of view, properly conducted. Therefore, if we create, as the hon. gentleman has suggested, a billion dollars of new money, government money, Bank of Canada notes or deposits, and put those into circulation, we have set loose inflationary tendencies of terrific power. That is the reason why we keep away from borrowing from the Bank of Canada. We would borrow from the chartered banks before we would borrow from the Bank of Canada even though we had to pay a little interest to the chartered banks but not to the Bank of Canada, or if we did pay interest to the Bank of Canada we would be paying interest to ourselves. That is the reason for our borrowing from the people of Canada and, if we have to, even from the chartered banks, but not at all from the Bank of Canada if we can avoid it. My hon. friend says that is all right under normal conditions.

Mr. McGEER: I did not say that that was all right at any time.

Mr. ILSLEY: He is advocating the issue of a billion dollars of Bank of Canada notes; that is what he is advocating. He says that, whatever may be the situation normally, you have now a wartime prices and trade board, which will hold prices down, and you can put your money into circulation without forcing prices up because you have the price ceiling on. Well, my hon. friend has the most sublime faith in the price ceiling. I wish I had as much faith in the price ceiling without that billion dollars as he has with that billion dollars.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would just blow up.

Mr. ILSLEY: I want to tell him that if we put into circulation a billion dollars of new money, it would blow the price ceiling to kingdom come before you could say "Jack Robinson". I say this too, that if by some miracle we were able to keep that price ceiling on we would have to keep it on for many, many years, because we would never dare take it off.

You can do only so much by bureaucratic methods. You can do only so much by repression, by policing. Our prosecutions are starting now; I see them in the papers: a prosecution, I think, in Winnipeg, another somewhere else. There was a prosecution in Montreal of a restaurant which charged too much for a meal. Black markets will undoubtedly develop. People will be violating our regulations, and there will be no way in the world to prevent that from happening. The only way we can preserve that price ceiling is to take away from the people by borrowing and taxation just as much as we possibly can, so as to relieve that upward pressure on the price ceiling and on prices. I want to say that anyone who thinks an issue of a billion dollars of new money, national currency, Bank of Canada notes, can be effected without the slightest inflation is simply deluding himself.

An hon. MEMBER: Tommyrot!

Mr. ILSLEY: The Social Credit party, of course, do not agree with that, and I do not expect them to agree with it. But I think it would be a terrible thing if any substantial proportion of the membership of this house espoused those views or were convinced by that argument.

I do not know that I have very much more to say this evening. I do not believe there were many more points made in regard to this method of financing. Let me say that it is as old as the hills; it is as old as the ancient empires. It was done in France; it was done in Germany. But Germany at the present time is not relying on this method of financing. Germany has a tremendously heavy taxation load on its people, and is borrowing from them to relieve the upward pressure on its price ceiling, which is a much better price ceiling, I have no doubt, than ours. But to think that we in this democratic country, with the great freedom there is of expression and the great interest in individual liberty, could, by sheer brute force of pressure on people, maintain a price ceiling if we set loose another billion dollars of national currency at this time, is just not to have a conception of the gravity of the situation, of the might of the inflationary forces which would be set loose.

My hon. friend opened his speech with some remarks on the item, and I want to thank him for his tribute to myself. He says that I have done a good job, but it seems to me that he cannot think so, because I have been wrong all along if he is right. I have been fundamentally wrong if he is right, and I do not think that I have. Why,

Mr. Chairman, rather than do what my hon. friend has suggested I would walk out in a minute.

An hon. MEMBER: It might be a good thing.

Mr. ILSLEY: It might be a good thing, yes, but I would not try. I would not make an attempt to finance or try to conduct the finances of this country if I ran away from the hard way, which is the only way and the only fair way, the way of imposing obligations in accordance with ability to pay, and took this easy, downward, fatal course to the abyss—which it would be.

I want now to come back to the item and say a few words with regard to soldiers and officers. As I told the committee this afternoon, I am going to have some proposal to make about that before these resolutions are through the house. I know there is discrimination there; I know there are several discriminations; and I think I shall have some proposals which may have the effect of ironing out the discriminations, but not, I think, the proposals which have been made in this chamber this afternoon and to-night.

With regard to single and married men, I wish to put a finger on the fallacy in my hon. friend's argument. He seems to think that the difference between the tax which the single man pays and the married man pays is the amount which the married man's wife and children are supposed to live on. No such theory was ever before promulgated. It was the principal amount upon which this is the tax that lies at the basis. My hon. friend has worked out some differences here. For instance, he takes the taxpayer who is in receipt of $3,000. He says that the new tax plus the refundable proportion of money savings required is, for a single person without dependents, $1,064; for a married person without children, $884; and for a married person with two children, $668. The comparison should have been, I submit, between taxes, not between amounts which include refundable taxes or compulsory savings, and there the difference is considerably greater. But even so, the difference in taxes is not sufficient to enable a man to support his wife or his wife and children, and was never intended to be.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that on the whole we are indebted to the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) for having stirred up interest in a very important subject matter in this house and for having at least given us some intellectual entertainment, when we have listened to, shall I say, the brilliant reply of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). I may have flirted with the idea of fiat money in the early stages of the war, but I should not like anyone to say that I am a believer in the issue of national currency as a method of financing this war. All history, as the Minister of Finance has said, cries out against it. There is no easy way of financing war, as the minister has also stated.

The speech of the member for Parry Sound to-night was reminiscent of the evidence which the member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) gave to the Macmillan commission on banking as long ago as 1933, and was also reminiscent of a speech which the same hon. gentleman made before the banking and commerce committee of this House of Commons in 1934, and it is by no means a new suggestion. If we were to adopt the methods advocated by the hon. gentleman, and so ably controverted by the Minister of Finance to-night, this country, sooner or later, notwithstanding all the controls that human ingenuity could devise, would finally blow the lid off, as has happened in every other country in which resort has been had to these methods—that is, so long as you maintain the capitalist system. If you have a system of socialism and are a self-contained nation; if you do not owe foreign debts and do not have to pay for goods you import from outside, then I suppose one might consider that theory. I know this will not please my hon. friends in the corner to my left, but I suggest that their theories can operate only if you are in an air-tight compartment of a nation and do not have to deal with other people, who will not accept money against which there is not a sense of security.

An hon. MEMBER: Give some evidence of what you are saying.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My common sense is evidence enough. I do not want to get into a discussion of social credit principles.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been listening to these theories since 1923 before any of the present hon. gentlemen ever graced a seat in this house. I remember when Major Douglas first appeared on the scene, and I remember the second time he came. He would not leave until we paid him a fee, to which I was opposed, by the way. I believe there was never a greater monetary faker in the history of this country than that same Major Douglas. I am satisfied on that point.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is just your opinion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had some near-hand dealing with that gentleman. He offered to come to Ottawa in 1934 for his expenses, but before we could get rid of him and get him off the expense account he had to have a fee, and against my protest the banking and commerce committee agreed to pay him. But that is by the way. If we were to pursue the course advocated by the member for Parry Sound, on the basis of the monetary theories of the member for Vancouver-Burrard, this country within a short time, at the rate we are spending money in the war, would simply blow the whole lid off. We never could carry on, and the people of the country would hide their wealth and not make it available to the government. I may be old-fashioned—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is probably true I am, but my opinions are based on the established theories and practice of decades and decades of public finance, and until it can be demonstrated that Canada can finance the war on the basis of fiat money, then I am going to adhere to the old-fashioned principle which the Minister of Finance advocated here to-night.

The only criticism I have of the minister's war finance method is that in this budget, I fear, he is attempting to tax too highly, when one has regard to the fact that this war may continue for a long time. He may dry up some of the sources. Notwithstanding that, the Canadian people are willing to make the sacrifice, but they would be very distrustful of a government which has proceeded for three years on one basis of war finance if it suddenly switched to another basis. That is a factor which must be given consideration. So that much as one may be attracted by this theory of financing the war by means of national institutions, let us think this matter clear through before we adopt any such theories.

I hope that any remarks I have made are not of such a provocative nature as to cause this debate to go on for a long time, because we are anxious to get back to the resolutions. But I think I should support the minister, believing what I do with respect to orthodox finance, and I do support him.

Mr. ESLING: My sympathy is with the Minister of Finance. He has had an unhappy and difficult task in the preparation of this budget, and has done it well, and it is because of the confidence which the people have in our present Minister of Finance that they accept this budget with less complaint than ordinarily. The proposals in this income tax resolution come home more directly to everybody in Canada than do some of the other resolutions. But I would not slight the taxation measures in the other resolutions, because if any tax which financial ingenuity could suggest has been overlooked in this budget we may be assured that it was not intentional on the part of the minister. I think also that he will welcome any suggestion or reminder of any other tax which he might impose. Therefore, if I may be permitted, I will offer such a suggestion.

Of course there is concern about taxation at this time. But the minister has brought the people of this country to a realization of the fact that we must find ways and means for the conduct of the war. There are some features of the budget requiring correction. One was mentioned by the leader of the opposition, namely, the omission of exemption from the refundable tax on agreements of sale.

Under the national housing plan we have some 23,000 units constructed in Canada and a guarantee on the part of the federal government of some $73,000,000. At least there is $73,000,000 that has gone into this plan. Then many industries are contributing to or assisting in the building of houses for their employees. In my district one company has lent its employees some $2,000,000 for the construction of houses. It makes a substantial community.

Also there is concern about the churches. Naturally we must all retrench and economize, and the first inclination of some people is to cut down their church contributions. It is an easy thing to do, but it is regrettable, because the churches must be maintained, particularly in such critical times as those through which we are now passing.

I should like to refer to the provision in this resolution as to the amount upon which there is total exemption from any tax, namely, $660. That amount I think applies primarily to grade 1 civil servants. For grade 1 civil servants whose homes and parents are in Ottawa the situation is perhaps not so serious, but for grade 1 clerks who come from afar the situation is very serious. My suggestion before I sit down will be that the basic rate of pay for a grade 1 clerk be $70 a month instead of $60, and I propose to show then that the government is not going too far.

What is the situation? The government has some 3,200 stenographers and typists at $60 a month, plus a cost of living bonus of $6.60. They have perhaps three or four thousand more doing clerical work. These girls are war workers just as much as the man or woman in a munitions plant. Without their assistance the Department of Munitions and Supply could not carry on, nor could the Department of National Defence or the Department of Finance or any other department of the government. The government wants them; it advertises for them; it invites them to come to Ottawa and tells them that if they come, having passed a civil service examination by examiners appointed by the government, they will be paid $60 a month and a cost of living bonus of $6.60. They arrive, from the west, and from the east; they arrive at an expenditure from Vancouver of $69; from Calgary, $49; from Winnipeg, $31; and from Halifax, about $21. This means that they sit up two or three or four nights in the train without a blanket over them and without a dollar for a meal. I would ask any hon. member of the government or any member of this house if he would like his daughters cast adrift in this high-priced, overcrowded city trying to live on—not $66.60 a month, but $55.02 a month, because that is what remains after the normal tax, the graduated tax, unemployment insurance and the retiring allowance are deducted. The retiring allowance of course they will get back some day, but it will not pay their carfares. They are in debt from the time they start.

This one item emphasizes, I think more than anything else, the suggestions which have been repeatedly made by hon. members as to hostels for these girls. The girls are expected to look presentable; they pride themselves on doing so and, if they do not keep presentable, they do not last very long in their positions. The government now proposes to give them an increase of $5 or $10 or $15 a month in addition to the basic rate and the cost-of-living bonus. This is not altogether generosity on the part of the government. I do not know what ministers compose the treasury board, but the treasury board has not a very good reputation for generosity when it comes to paying civil servants, or paying these grade 1 clerks. What does this mean? The government is proposing to give them $5, $10, $15 more, simply because it cannot get a sufficient number of stenographers at $60 plus cost-of-living bonus. The government needs to-day 300 more stenographers, and they are not coming at the rate now paid for grade 1. Let us assume that instead of giving them $60 as a basic rate of pay, they are given $65 as the government proposes. Instead of $55.02 a month after deductions, they will receive $57.97. Give them a basic rate of $70 a month, plus cost-of-living bonus, or, $76.60; after deductions they will receive $60.92. Give them $75 a month plus cost of living bonus, or $81.60, and after deductions they have left $63.87.

[Mr. Esling.]

Anyone concerned with the care of girls will say that a girl cannot possibly get along on less than $60 a month, and if she has any dental or medical expenses she is sunk for the rest of the time she is in Ottawa. The irony of the situation is that war workers, in every industry in Ontario, receive in their envelopes little blue slips from the Department of Pensions and National Health—I hope the minister is here, though I cannot see him—saying, "Help the war effort along. Eat a hearty breakfast before you come to work. Drink plenty of milk daily; it is a great pick-up. Drink plenty of fruit juice", and so on, and all this on $55.02 a month. It cannot be done. I am going to suggest that a fairer way would be to make the basic rate for these grade 1 clerks $70 a month plus the cost-of-living allowance, and even then they would be getting only something like $60.92 a month. The minister can figure it all out, though I am not speaking at random, for I have checked these figures with his own officers.

I should now like to offer a suggestion which may bring in more revenue, and which perhaps will be more graciously received. I may be wrong in my understanding; if so, the minister will correct me, and I will stop and admit my error. Let me go back to 1936, and this has to do with the equality of contribution by everyone, corporations and individuals. In 1936 we had a non-resident tax, often called a remittance tax, of 5 per cent, which applied to all money sent out of Canada for rentals, royalties, dividends, interest and so on. Strange to say, the only item singled out for special consideration from all the remittances sent out of Canada was the item of money paid in connection with moving-picture films. The reason for that was never explained, or at least no one in this house ever understood it. The minister of finance of that day simply said, "We will let everyone else pay the tax of 5 per cent, even if the amount sent out is only $100; but where moving-picture films are concerned, though they send $5,000,000 out of the country, we will cut down the tax to 2 per cent." I presented a brief to the government in this regard. I knew something about this business, or thought I did, and the result was that in 1939 the government put this tax back to 5 per cent. In doing so, and thereby recovering a few hundred thousand dollars, they made an admission that they were wrong in reducing that tax from 5 per cent to 2 per cent in the first place. Again, in the budget of 1941 the same item was singled out from all others and cut down. The minister said, "Well, in this matter of films I think the best I can do is charge them 10 per cent, instead of making them pay 15 per cent." What does this mean? It means that it will cost the taxpayers of Canada just about $450,000 this year in loss of revenue, and I am giving these figures from government records.

This is just one reason why that tax should be imposed in full, just as it is imposed on smaller remittances. Remember, this money goes to the big picture producers in Hollywood and other parts of the United States. They have made the government believe that they are losing a great deal of money on the plea that these films wear out and are useless and have to be thrown into the ash barrel. That is not exactly the situation. A standard film is 7,000 feet in length. It comes into the country as a negative, and for customs purposes it is valued at 5 cents a foot. Then the duty is 27½ per cent plus 10 per cent, or a total of 37½ per cent. That negative goes to a processing plant in Montreal, and that is as far as the government follows it. The government receives this 37½ per cent, plus 3 per cent excise, on a valuation of $350 for a 7,000 foot film, and the federal government is no longer interested until the film leaves the processing plant. Then copies of that film go to the agents of every picture producer in Canada, for only 3¼ cents a foot. It makes no difference whether the picture is good or bad; the cost to the agent for distribution is 3¼ cents a foot plus the 8 per cent sales tax. So, when you see a film shown on a screen it represents a cost to the agent of only $227. They just make a print for each province in Canada, and if they need more than one print for a province they get it for the same price. Perhaps there is a good reason for this, but if the minister knows it he has never told us, and so he must not take us to task for commenting upon this situation. My purpose here is to show that there is an unequal contribution, and that the same laws should apply to the large producers as to the smaller companies. This year these people will take in $12,600,000; according to the department they will wipe off about 24 per cent for expenses, and then, instead of paying 15 per cent on the remainder, they are required to pay only 10 per cent. That is where the $450,000 comes in, and that would go a long way in the purchase of war savings certificates.

I am going to conclude with just one more illustration. I do not want to tire the committee, but this is another instance of big business getting away with it while the little fellow has to pay. I am directing my remarks now to the Secretary of State, in the hope that next session he will bring in some amendment to the Copyright Act. It is too late for that this session, but it is not too late to direct attention to the fact that there is discrimination as between the individual and this huge monopoly called the Performing Right Society, which exacts tribute from everyone who plays a piece of music in public for profit. I say they should have every dollar that is coming to them; I believe every musician, every author and every composer should receive every dollar that is coming to him, but to me it seems reasonable that first of all we should at least make them show that they have title to that for which they collect royalty. That is just what the government does not do. It simply says to this big concern, "You may go to the copyright office and tell them this is your piece of music." But if an individual wants to assign a piece of music to someone and that second person wants to register it and prove his ownership, he must pay a fee of $1. This large concern just holds a club over the people of Canada. I made it clear a few years ago that there was nothing to prevent half a dozen such societies coming to Canada and collecting tribute from everyone producing music for profit whether it be an individual, an orchestra, a hotel or anyone. They do not collect from the individual; they collect from the premises, because they are afraid the individual would not be there when they came round for the money. So I say let them get every dollar that is coming to them but make them prove title.

I have remarked that there is nothing to prevent half a dozen such companies from collecting a similar tribute. This particular concern is a subsidiary of the American Society of Authors and Composers, which is composed of the moving-picture owners and picture producers. It simply comes in here, collects this money and takes it out of Canada.

The author of a piece of music should be required to register his title, because he has no action except by way of injunction against anybody who infringes upon his composition. This Performing Right Society claims to have control of two and a half million pieces of music, but it has very few registered titles in those two and a half million pieces.

Then there are half a dozen people in the United States who make a business of acquiring titles, and they have acquired repertoires of 300,000 pieces of music. Anybody in Canada can incorporate a company for $200 and buy any one of these repertoires, and then collect the same toll which the Performing Right Society collects. We have to-day not only the Canadian Performing Right Society, which is a subsidiary of the parent concern in the United States, but also Broadcast Music Incorporated. It is a very small concern at present, but it will grow, and as others see its success more companies will be formed.

So I say to the minister that I hope he will see that the Copyright Act is amended at the next session and that the Performing Right Society be required to register and to pay for every piece of music for which it exacts tribute from the Canadian people.

Mr. McGEER: Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to enter into this discussion, because I believe, and I think the great majority of the members of this house will agree with me, that these are times when even though you disagree with the government the best thing to do, if you are in the minority, is to let the majority which the government represents go forward without interference, because of the enormous responsibility which every government of the united nations is carrying at this time.

However, the leader of the opposition was kind enough to refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound as expressing the monetary system of the member for Vancouver-Burrard, and was also kind enough to declare that they recalled memories to him of the time when he sat as chairman of the banking and commerce committee of this parliament in 1934, upon whose recommendations the banking legislation was changed to the five per cent tax reserve basis and the Bank of Canada was established with a 25 per cent reserve gold basis, removable in its entirety by order in council.

I happen to have some pleasure in recalling the representations that I had the honour of making before that banking and commerce committee. They were not welcomed by the chairman, and I did not get much assistance from him in placing my views before the committee. But I was able to place them all before the committee despite him and his prime minister of that day. What was the difference between myself and the Bennett-dominated committee of 1934?

I advocated at the time certain things. One was that the Bank of Canada should be a wholly publicly-owned institution. That idea was scorned and sneered at; and even when we were returned in the election of 1935 pledged, as I believe, to bring about that reform, we had another battle on the floor of this house. That battle was won in two rounds. The first was when we got the Bank of Canada 51 per cent publicly owned, and the next was when it came to be an institution owned and controlled as the greatest public utility service in our nation by the people of Canada. That is a reform which will never be taken away. Yes, I had the privilege of advocating that in 1934, but it was repudiated by my hon. friend's committee and by his government and by the parliament that was dominated by his party.

Another suggestion that we made was that gold had outlived its usefulness as a security for the value of currency, and we advocated that the Bank of Canada should be free to issue currency in terms of public need and national necessity, unrestricted by the amount of gold which the government could buy or secure.

What has happened to gold? Does any member of this house advocate the restoration of the limitation of our money in use by going back to the gold basis? Let me give the committee one illustration of what has happened.

I have the greatest sympathy for the Minister of Finance in the position of responsibility that he holds at the moment; but it is well not to be too dogmatic in one's conclusions because it might be that in this day and generation we might be able to manage currency a little better than they did two hundred years ago in France, or a little better than when they were managing currency to win the continental revolution, or a little better than when they were managing the greenback currency of the United States which Lincoln issued to save the nation from disunion and disaster. We to-day can thank the memory of Lincoln that he did not fear to use the national currency because, if democracy is going to survive this war, it is because the most powerful republic that was ever saved by the issue of national currency, the United States, has joined with the British empire in this war to preserve a world that Lincoln thought ought to be preserved for people to live in of the kind that he established in the United States.

Easy, of course, it is to sneer at the power of a nation to issue currency. There have been terrible tragedies in the abuses of monopoly and privilege by the private owners of money scattered down throughout the pages of history, but there is something more to be said for national currency and its power as a medium of exchange of a nation than merely to try to dismiss it as something that was tried a few centuries ago and did not happen to get a fair chance.

Let me give another illustration of the absurdity of gold as a basis. The sound money men, these experts, told us that we could not have any money to put the unemployed to work for the decade before the disaster. I remember some of the terrible warnings that we got from other ministers of finance that if we dared to put the unemployed of this nation to work by using national currency we would wreck the credit of the nation. Do not make any mistake about that. What did we do? We decided on this continent to gather gold. We gave away our scrap iron; we gave away our scrap steel at prices disastrously low; we threw away our copper, our nickel, our lead and our zinc; all these useful metals we gave away because we were led to believe that there was some virtue in the accumulation of gold. So we tucked twenty thousand million dollars worth of gold in the hills of Kentucky while the Japanese were building out of our scrap iron a fleet to wipe us out of the Pacific.

Mr. MacNICOL: They will never do it.

Mr. McGEER: They have made a fairly good start, and we certainly have great difficulty in finding any virtue in the gold that we have to stop them. That is quite beside the question. The hon. member knows that I have no doubt about our ultimate capacity to defeat Japan, but what I am pointing out to this committee is that we gave away our useful metals and gathered a useless metal. We found that we could not build any battleships or planes or guns or fighting equipment out of this useless metal called gold. True, by a common arrangement, the United States is still paying us a good deal more than it costs us to take it out of the ground, but just how long they are going to keep on adding to their useless hoard at that price I do not know, and I do not think any reasonable man would care to hazard a guess. I do know, however, that our currency to-day unsecured by gold is just as valuable as it was at any time when it was supposed to have been secured by gold. There were two things proposed which in a short period of a decade have moved from the ridiculous to the sublime.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friends may laugh, but we said other things. We knew that in a managed currency system, unless you took control of the movement of currency and credit and investments internationally you could not stop the flight from your dollar and you could not stop an international manipulation on the international currency markets of the value of any individual currency. We said you could stop the flight from the Canadian dollar, and we advocated a control of international currency movement. We were told that that could not be done, but we pointed out that other nations were actually doing it. Japan was doing it back in the twenties, and so was Germany and so was nearly every other country in the world including Britain. Since we appeared before the banking and commerce committee in 1934, the foreign exchange control board has come to be one of the most valuable of the economic institutions in the Dominion of Canada. Make no mistake about it; that board will never disappear. It has proven its value, and it has vindicated what we advocated in 1934. It has proven that a democratic nation can to its own advantage control the movement of its international currency and avoid the disastrous exploitation of the value of its currency by international currency exploiters.

We advocated something else, if my hon. friend will recall, and we spent a day in placing it before the committee under his chairmanship. We advocated the need for the regulation and management of international trade. We said that one of the great difficulties facing the world was the rapidity of communication, the rapidity of transportation and the capacity to produce and preserve foodstuffs; that these made it important that we recognize that international trade must be maintained on a basis of selling no more than you are able to buy from your neighbours and buying no more than you are able to sell. That could not be done without a proper system of regulating international trade by direct control. We were told that that could not be done. Other nations were doing it, and we are doing it successfully to-day. That is another institution that no Tory reaction will ever drive out of the life of the Dominion of Canada.

Of course those were heresies. I thought the chairman of the committee of that day, now the leader of the opposition, would have apoplexy on one or two occasions. As a matter of fact, we tried to modify our remarks because I thought some of his associate chartered bank managers would suffer the same fate. They were all there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The only difficulty I ever had with the hon. member was to stop him. Once he is started, you never can get him stopped.

Mr. McGEER: That is exactly what the hon. member was there to do. That was his job, and he made a very good attempt to do it. However, the hon. members supporting him would not support him in his refusal to hear me.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

WAR EXPENDITURES COMMITTEE

Third and fourth reports of special committee on war expenditures—Mr. Fournier (Hull).

SHIPPING LOSSES

REQUEST FOR SECRET SESSION—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspe): Mr. Speaker, under standing order 31 I wish to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance following further developments of a very grave nature. What I want is an immediate secret session of the house to discuss certain grave events which have occurred within the past few days in the St. Lawrence, about which this house should be fully informed. I cannot give details in open session because it would give information to the enemy, but my information leads me to believe that there is reason to fear that persons responsible for the protection of our coastal waters have been negligent in their duty.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is a degree of urgency in the motion made by the hon. member, and I should prefer that the hon. member have the leave of the house to make the motion. Standing order 31 reads:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motions or orders of the day are entered upon.

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker, who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance, reads it out and asks whether the member has the leave of the house. If objection is taken, the Speaker requests those members who support the motion to rise in their places and if more than twenty members rise accordingly, the Speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave.

Is there any objection on the part of the house?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The government of course is responsible for holding a secret session or for withholding it. The responsibility rests on the government. Therefore the government should in the first instance have the information at its disposal in order that it may be able to decide whether it is in the interests either of the House of Commons or of the country that a secret session should be held at this time. I would ask the hon. member if he has spoken to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), or to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who is acting for him at the moment in his absence, in regard to those matters which he wishes to have discussed in secret session. If he has not, I suggest that it would be preferable for him to make known the nature of the subjects which he wishes to have discussed so that the government may decide, wisely and in the light of the circumstances themselves, whether or not a secret session should be held.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to support the request of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy). I have heretofore I think observed all the caution that would be expected of one in my position with respect to matters of this kind. But since this matter was adverted to in the house I have received numerous communications of a startling nature from a part of the province of Quebec with relation to what has taken place in that province and in the coastal waters thereof. I have been assured that there is a large measure of authenticity in the statements that have come to me—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but in the first place the motion is not debatable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not wish to debate the motion, Mr. Speaker; I was just answering an observation made by the Prime Minister, if I may be permitted.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. leader of the opposition, but in the first place the hon. member for Gaspé is asking leave of the house to discuss the motion for adjournment. Leave to move the adjournment to discuss a matter of urgent public importance must first be obtained from the house, and any remarks subsequent to that would be in order. In the meantime the question before the chair is whether the hon. member has the leave of the house to introduce his motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With respect, may I just make this statement in answer to an observation made by the Prime Minister. The government should have before it the information which the hon. member has. I was about to say that I had attempted to give the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services on Tuesday last an epitome of the information which had reached me. I wrote him a note asking for an interview, but—through no fault of his, I have no doubt—he did not make that arrangement for me. His secretary telephoned to say that the minister had to go away and would not be back until Friday. Consequently I have not been able to see him, otherwise I would have gone to him personally with a request like this. I make that explanation to indicate to the Prime Minister that there is information which I personally, not through cooperation with the hon. member for Gaspé but on my own account, desired to give to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. Therefore I am going to support the request of the hon. member so far as I am able to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER: If objection is taken, as it has been in this case, the Speaker requests those hon. members supporting the motion to rise in their places, and if more than twenty members rise the speaker calls upon the member who has asked for leave. Those supporting the motion will please rise.

And more than twenty members having risen:

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the hon. member speaks, may I make perfectly clear the position I took in addressing His Honour the Speaker. I did not oppose the motion which the hon. member was making, nor did I oppose the idea of a secret session. What I said was that the government would have to assume responsibility either for holding or withholding a secret session, and in order to have the information on which to reach a correct decision I asked the hon. member if he had spoken to the minister concerned and given him the facts which would enable the government to reach a decision. That is as far as I went in what I said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): His Honour the Speaker interpreted that as an objection.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was not intended as an objection.

Mr. J. S. ROY (Gaspé): I offer my sincere thanks to the house for its support in these circumstances of my request for a secret session in order to discuss these very important events which have occurred and still are occurring in the lower St. Lawrence. I have asked several times for a secret session, mostly since the torpedoing of three ships that occurred a week ago last Sunday. In each instance the Prime Minister, as he has done to-day, and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, asked me to give him the information I have. I understand from the Prime Minister that he needs the information in order to make his decision on my request.

First I should like to recall that I have in the past communicated information to the government in regard to this matter, and many times in the house I have asked for some protection, some defence works at Gaspé and on the coast. Since the first torpedoings on May 11 and 12, at the instance of the Prime Minister, I have written letters to the Minister of National Defence, and copies of those letters were sent to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services and the Minister of National Defence for Air. In those letters I was saying this—I shall quote only a few parts. This letter was dated Ottawa, May 15, 1942:

> Most of the gasoline and oil stocks are imported down there by boats in ordinary 50-gallon drums. Therefore some measures should be taken to prevent the landing of the submarines for purpose of getting gasoline and supplies. There is no guard whatsoever between Gaspé and Rimouski, a distance of about 250 miles. As it is, it remains a wide open gate for the enemy to perpetrate its depredations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt to point out to my hon. friend that the house is not in secret session at the present time. If I understand him aright, he is disclosing alleged information which, if true, it might be quite proper to give in a secret session but which I should think it was wholly improper to make public in the manner in which he is doing at the present time. I would not interrupt my hon. friend except to say to him that I think he should give the government what information he has or has received, not in a public way, as at present, but in order that we may decide whether or not a secret session should be held. If we refuse the secret session, that would be the time my hon. friend might make his protest.

Mr. ROY: Mr. Speaker, as to the first remark of the Prime Minister, I think this communication could not be of any value to our enemies, but if the Prime Minister thinks it might, I am very willing that it shall not be recorded on Hansard. Before sending the Prime Minister the information he desires to have I will say briefly that I have on several occasions given the government information on the situation down there; nevertheless the situation remains as it was. I do not think this is disclosing anything that can be of any help to our enemies: I was saying in this letter that the most urgent need for the time being was to send some bombers to Mont Joli and to Gaspé. I am informed that bombers were sent to those two places only after the last torpedoing. I said at the time that the Germans could make a landing to get gasoline and supplies—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I call the hon. member's attention to what has already been said in regard to statements he is now making on matters which might be the subject of discussion in a secret session but certainly should not be discussed now.

Mr. COLDWELL: On a point of order, I imagine it is very difficult for the hon. member for Gaspé to explain the reasons why he wants a secret session without divulging some of the information he has.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Give it to the minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: Hon. members say "Give it to the minister". I imagine that the object the hon. member has in view is to get the house to understand this information, not the minister. He has already communicated these matters to the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: I was calling the hon. member's attention to the fact that, as has already been pointed out, the statements he is making as to why he is asking for a secret session are such as should not be stated now but rather in a secret session if there is one.

The debate will proceed in the usual way; the hon. member has the floor and is entitled to make his speech without interruption.

Mr. ROY: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The reason I was trying to give this explanation to the house is that this is a matter of national urgency. I think it is of great importance that the house be well informed as to the necessity for a secret session. Following the announcement I made last Friday I had to listen to a speech by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, which was a rebuke to me. That did not hurt me, but it went out to the house and the country, and might make people believe that I was a sort of traitor. To-day, therefore, I wish to give the reasons why I made that announcement at that time. I was firmly convinced within my soul and conscience that I was performing my duty as a citizen of the country and as a member of this parliament. In his speech, at page 4126 of Hansard, the minister said:

> When my hon. friend talks about protecting his constituents, I should like to know what he has ever done to ensure the greater protection of this country, or to add in any way to its defences.

That was why I was trying to place before the house all that I had done in the past. I do not think his statement was fair; it was an insult to me. The minister is not in his seat at the moment, so that I need not say anything more on that point, but I should like to add this. In the course of the same speech, at the same page of Hansard, the minister also said:

> I will say this to the hon. member for Gaspe; had I been in the house on Friday I think I should have felt constrained to rise and ask this house to expunge from the record the statement which he made. Thereby it would not have become a public statement. But he having made it and it having been allowed to stand on Hansard, it of course became public. . . .

At the time I made my remarks the Prime Minister was in his seat, but he did not deem it necessary to take that action. I am disposed to believe that the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services is as careful in his statements as the Prime Minister, but he did not give any evidence of that when he said, a little further along on the same page:

> I am not ready to change the disposition of one ship of the Canadian navy for him or all the questions he may ask from now until doomsday.

I do not believe that was a particularly wise statement to make, in view of what is occurring in the lower St. Lawrence.

I am asking for a secret session, Mr. Speaker, in order that the house may be informed as to the seriousness of the situation. Many times, as for example in connection with the Hong Kong affair, the government has given as a reason for refusing a secret session, or refusing to give hon. members information as to the mistakes or circumstances in connection with those matters, that information would be given to the enemy. A secret session does not cost anything, and it is a very easy way to give information to hon. members of this house. If the principle for which we stand in this war to-day is good, and is to be supported, this house should not lose sight of the fact that it represents the people, that parliament is responsible to the people, and that the government is responsible to parliament. This parliament should have the right to know what is going on, even though the government or some political party may suffer through the disclosing of information which would not be of advantage to it. I do not think the government should refuse the contribution that can be made by the representatives of the people in this house toward the winning of this struggle. The matters with which I want to deal in a secret session have a direct bearing, I believe, on the issue of the battles now going on, and even on the final result of this war. I believe these matters are of such importance that the government should grant a secret session, and the information there disclosed will not be made public.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to support the request of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) that some opportunity, at all events, should be afforded to the membership of this house, either in a secret or in a public session, to discuss the position in reference to the St. Lawrence area. I am not asking that it be discussed in public, because I have no idea that the government would assent to any such proposal, having regard to the attitude of the minister and, I assume, of the administration generally in respect to matters of this kind. There are, however, good grounds for asking for a public discussion, and I do not believe a public discussion of this kind would be refused in Britain, having regard to the debates that have taken place in the British parliament with respect to the situation in Libya and elsewhere during the course of this war. Surely this parliament should not divest itself of its privileges and functions, as well as its obligations, any more than the parliament at Westminster does. Since the hon. member for Gaspé has not asked for a public session I shall not stress that point, though I ask the Prime Minister to give consideration to this suggestion when the question is being finally decided.

I now desire to support the hon. member for Gaspé in his request that the government provide an opportunity, by way of secret session, to discuss the situation in the lower St. Lawrence; what has happened there, what may happen there, and the precautions that are being taken to meet the situation. That opportunity should be granted at the earliest possible day. I am not going to reveal to the house and the country at this time the nature of the communications which I have received. I do not think it would be the appropriate thing to do, especially since I have not had the opportunity to discuss the matter with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services as I had hoped. Naturally I have not been able to verify them personally; one would have to travel down to that part of the country in order to do so. I can say, however, that they come to me well authenticated; the information is vouchsafed by two very loyal and patriotic citizens of the province of Quebec, and that information is of such a character and covers such a field as to make me believe that all is not well. That is putting it mildly, both in relation to what has happened and what will happen, and more particularly with respect to what provision is being made against the recurrence of what we know has already happened and of other things which also have happened and which have not yet been divulged. I think the Prime Minister and members of the government will know to what I am alluding.

Therefore I urge on the government, and I assert as a matter of right, that some opportunity should be given to this house to meet and discuss, and cross-examine the minister on, the disposition of certain armed forces in that area which are under the jurisdiction of his department; furthermore, as to certain irregularities which it is alleged have occurred in connection with the operation of at least one arm of the forces in that area—with which I intend to acquaint the minister. These things are of some national importance, and they are very important to that community. I think it would serve a useful purpose to the population of that community if they could know what the exact situation is, and what steps, if any, have been taken to meet it. If adequate steps have not been taken to meet the situation, then we should be in a position to urge that more adequate measures be taken. Of necessity, without divulging anything I cannot go very much further than that. But the situation has impressed itself upon me as being such that I feel it is my duty as leader of the opposition in this house to ask the government for this facility. It is a duty, I believe, that we owe to the people of that community and to the country at large. I could go along and theorize in a general way with respect to this matter, but perhaps I have said enough to indicate what is my own point of view and what I think is the duty of the government in the premises.

Of necessity I cannot vouch for any of the information which is in my possession, because these things come to one second-hand. It is difficult to verify them. The government has the facilities to verify the stories that have reached me; I have not. It is enough, I think, that in the performance of my duty, on the proper occasion and at the right time and place, I call the attention of the government to the statements which have reached me and ask that they should be investigated—not with the intent of doing any harm to this government; I want to impress upon the Prime Minister that nothing is further from my thoughts. The purpose is twofold: first, that we should know the truth with regard to our defence facilities in that area, and if they are inadequate, something should be done to improve them; second, that there should be instilled into the hearts and minds of the people of the area, who to-day cannot help but be alarmed at what has happened, some sense of security.

I urge upon the Prime Minister that he accede to this request. I shall be glad to lay before the Minister of National Defence such information as I have received, so that he may know what is being circulated in that area of Canada, and so that he may be able to tell us what has happened, not on two occasions but on three.

I am conscious of the fact, and I want to say here and now that I believe, that the first duty of our naval authorities is to protect the international convoys. I am borne out in that view by the thought that so far during the war none of our nationals on the shores have suffered. But after that first duty there is the secondary duty, the defence of Canada. We had a secret session here once before and we were told something of the nature of defences erected on certain parts of the eastern shores and on the western coast as well. With respect to the area in question we know very little. I do not know what is the nature of the defences or what steps have been taken since a week ago Sunday to repair any deficiencies which there may be. At all events the situation is of sufficient importance to warrant my asking the government to give early and affirmative consideration to the request of the hon. member for Gaspé.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I would like to support the suggestion. I have no authentic information as to what has occurred in this region, but I did listen carefully to the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy), and one thing which struck me as I heard him was this: that there were grave fears, I think he said, that in some particulars there was neglect on the part of somebody. If that be true, it is a matter which deeply concerns us, and the hon. member for Gaspé has probably taken the right method in coming to this house and asking for a secret session instead of relying purely on the judgment of the minister. May I say this to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King): the fact that we have all tried to cooperate very closely with the government in communicating to them any information of this description we receive, may, in the light of recent events, lead us into the position where the people of Canada will have some reason for believing that matters of public importance do not receive sufficient airing in this parliament.

I urge upon the government that they grant the request of the hon. member for Gaspé. He has risen in this chamber on a number of occasions in an attempt to put his case before the house. He has been handicapped, perhaps, in the use of the English language—which, if I may say so, he is picking up very rapidly—but that makes it all the more necessary for us to give this matter consideration. I believe from what he says, and from his earnestness in the matter, that he has something he wishes to lay before this house which we ought to hear, and even on a motion for adjournment such as this we should not run the risk in open session of giving information to the enemy.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): This group also favours the suggestion made by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Hanson) and by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). While however, the motion is for a secret session to discuss a matter brought up in respect of the St. Lawrence incident, the St. Lawrence territory is not the only territory in Canada which is in extreme danger and which should be discussed in this house. I have in mind the Pacific coast, and particularly the progress which has been made by the Japanese on the northern tip of this continent. I am not so sure that work on the Alaska highway is progressing as it should. These are things that we should know and I join with the other members in urging that the government give careful and complete consideration to the holding of a secret session.

Time and time again people have come to members of parliament with certain information that was complete news to us and which was found afterward to be true. If there are any persons in Canada who should have full knowledge and be informed first of these things, it is the people's representatives who sit here in parliament. I am not maintaining that this secret session should be thrown open for the discussion of every detail in respect to our war effort, because that would mean that we would be here forever. But there are some matters that should be dealt with. I have in mind the report of the Hong Kong commission. The letter from Colonel Drew was not tabled, and I am not going to criticize the Prime Minister for that. Perhaps he took the right course, but I think it can be said that this letter from Colonel Drew is quite public. The press has been most courteous in not publishing it, but copies have been sent around. If the report is discussed in this house in open session, many of the things in that letter are bound to be brought out.

There is quite a pressure being exerted for the opening up of a second front. It is all very well to say that that is Mr. Churchill's responsibility, but to use the Prime Minister's own words, we are in this war side by side with Great Britain and we must take the responsibility for any victories and also the responsibility for any defeats. The government are not the only ones responsible to the people in this respect. If the worst should come to the worst, the people will ask private members as well as the members of the government what we knew about it and what we did about it. I suggest that the secret session be open for the orderly discussion of certain important matters in respect to our part in the present war. If it is in order, I would move an amendment to the motion, that it should include not only the subject mentioned, the St. Lawrence incidents, but these other subjects. I move:

> And that any matter in respect to our part in the present war be also subject of the discussion at the said secret session.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Such an amendment obviously would be out of order. It is an amendment to a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. Citation 240 of Beauchesne's parliamentary rules states that a motion of this type must be restricted to a specific matter of recent occurrence. The amendment moved does not have anything to do with a matter of recent occurrence. It is simply an attempt to alter the scope of the secret session.

Mr. FAIR: The amendment is not yet before the house.

Mr. SPEAKER: A motion to adjourn the house is not amendable; therefore I must rule the amendment to the motion out of order.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to make a few remarks on the question raised by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) and his motion that this house should adjourn under standing order No. 31 for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance and that a secret sitting be held to inquire into the sinkings in the St. Lawrence. In my opinion there is no necessity for a secret sitting. The house should be told the facts in public. This house was warned by the Prime Minister of Great Britain and by Mr. Menzies, the able former prime minister of Australia a year ago of the grave danger to the dominions, and especially to Canada, because of the failure of the Washington conference. That conference not only got rid of our defences on land, sea and in the air; it got rid of our friends as well. Urged by Canada Britain threw away her fleet and Canada refused to go into an empire shipbuilding plan in 1937.

What are the facts about this situation? The danger in the Atlantic, which culminated in the sinkings that are taking place was pointed out to our representatives at the imperial conference in 1937, and since the war began. They were told of the grave danger to the dominions in case war should come. War always comes like a thief in the night. The stand taken in 1937 by Canada was absolutely inconsistent. What are we to hold a secret session about? There is nothing that should be held from the people or the press. The people of Canada have been given less information about this war up to this hour than the people of any other dominion. Mr. Curtin and Mr. Menzies and Sir Keith Murdock pointed out the grave danger to Canada, New Zealand and South Africa because of the lack of a fleet. You threw away your fleet and you cannot collect another in less than twenty-five years. Canada was one of the dominions that talked pacifism and the league, refused to arm, urged Britain to reduce the number of her capital ships from seventy-five to fifty and to change the definition of capital ships, and to provide for a smaller navy and a reduction of naval estimates to nothing. The result has been that Great Britain is unable to look after the Atlantic or the Pacific as she did on the seven seas.

On March 21, 1939, I urged the government to give the people the facts as to the great peril we were in, and urged rearmament. There is no secrecy about these St. Lawrence sinkings. They are known in Washington. Washington has announced them publicly; the Prime Minister of Great Britain used to announce them, and the admiralty used to announce the sinkings in the Atlantic from time to time. I pointed out to the house on the date I mentioned that Germany and Italy and also Japan had submarines that could cross the Pacific or the Atlantic without refueling. These submarines could sail up the St. Lawrence and possibly blow up the citadel and cause untold damage because of the lack of defences in this country and our lack of a fleet. The people have been kept in the dark, and this is no time for a secret session. If a secret session is held, I do not intend to attend it. It will amount to nothing, like the last one.

Information as to our grave peril should be given to the people of Quebec and all Canada before it is too late. The people of that province have not been given the facts. I raised this question two months ago. I asked the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, who should be in his seat to-day because that is the place for him to be in the dying days of the session, to give us some information on our naval defences, if any. The courage and heroism of the men who work and sail on all seas and in the St. Lawrence river and in the gulf is most magnificent. The Canadian navy is upholding the best traditions of the great British navy which has done so much for us and the civilized world. The information which the government has had since 1937 on our need of naval aid has been refused to this house while we have been in session. We are asked to hold a secret session. I asked the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services three months ago about conditions on the St. Lawrence and Atlantic coasts where our brave friend General de Gaulle and his fleet were guarding our shores and the islands off Newfoundland. A leading paper published in New York, the Nation, one of the ablest newspapers in the United States, gave all the particulars right after last December, and the minister and the government must have known. The French admiral was here in Ottawa conferring with him and others, and told all he knew about it.

He warned them as others did, and as I did, of the grave danger in the St. Lawrence and on the Atlantic from the present state of the navy and the submarine menace, the merchant marine and the British fleet. Our life lines to Britain are in the Atlantic. They may yet be broken, and they are likely to be broken in the St. Lawrence and all around the maritime provinces. They got the British admiral out of Halifax, and under the empire-wrecking statute of Westminster agreed to look after our shores and three miles out from the shore. We have always been dependent upon the British fleet to protect our shores ever since we have been a country, and that is the case to-day. After Dunkirk, had it not been for Britain, we would have had the enemy all along the Atlantic seaboard and up the St. Lawrence river long ago. But the British fleet stood in the way, to which we contributed before the war practically nothing. Had it not been for the British fleet we would long ago have had to settle with the axis powers.

So far as this motion is concerned, the people want the truth. They are sick and tired of getting their information second-hand about the war from Great Britain and the British Broadcasting Corporation and United States channels, while in Canada the government refuse to tell us anything and if it were not for the activity of the press we would know nothing. There is no censorship in Britain. The newspapers there publish what they like. We have seen the results of censorship in this country within the last few days.

We as a country are to blame for not having taken steps before the war to protect the St. Lawrence and our own country. Our nation borders on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and we should take steps to protect ourselves. We knew the condition of our navy before the war. Warning was given in 1938 about the danger to the St. Lawrence and the maritimes. But what did Canada do? Canada would not adopt the Jellicoe report or start building ships, depending on Washington, and pacifism and the Monroe doctrine. I admit that the late minister of national defence did bring up the navy question in 1937, 1938 and 1939. At that time Canada's navy, according to a return which the minister brought down, consisted of a total of less than 10,000 tons, about the size of one tramp steamer. It was not his fault.

What a secret session can do, I do not know. It will amount to nothing. What did the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services tell us the other day? He did not tell us a thing that could not have been obtained from the newspapers. He talked about secrets to the enemies when they know it all long ago. If we in the House of Commons are to be treated as an absentee house, let us know it. I warned this house on March 21, 1939, of the grave danger to the St. Lawrence if war came. I urged that the people should be given the facts and the truth. As Mr. Chamberlain said, where the people are not given the facts and the truth, but only as much as their rulers permit them to know, that nation is in grave danger, and will have to take the consequences for its lack of preparedness.

I see no advantage to be gained by passing this motion. It will accomplish no good. We have had too much secrecy altogether since the war began.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, as a private member of this house and as a member who has the honour to represent a constituency in eastern Canada lying alongside the great St. Lawrence river, I feel that I am bound to-day to congratulatae the hon. member for Gaspe (Mr. Roy) upon the stand that he is again taking for the defence of that part of the country which he represents along with myself.

Some time ago, after the observations made by some of our hon. colleagues from British Columbia, the government agreed that the house should sit in special secret session to discuss war matters. We were all at one in supporting this request made by our colleagues from British Columbia, and now that another part of this country is threatened I hope that members from British Columbia and the other provinces will give to members representing eastern Canada the same opportunity as was given to them some time ago.

A secret sitting is essential, for the very reason that it is impossible to get any information on naval or military matters because the war ministers are always using the pretext that if such information was given it would be of some use to the enemy and therefore, they say, it cannot be disclosed. In a secret sitting the same objection would not exist.

I hope that if we sit in camera there will be no long speeches and no repetitions of what has been said by other members, but that each member will be bound to disclose the information he has in his possession, and it will also be his duty to question the war ministers about the military, naval and air protection that we have in this country.

I am pleased to congratulate all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken before me on this question. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has said that the first duty of the navy is to protect international convoys. I admit that that is one of the duties of the navy, meaning by that the British as well as the Canadian navy. But for me, sir, the first duty of all three branches of the armed forces, not only the navy but the air force and the army as well, is to make the waters and shores of the St. Lawrence river safe for navigation. That great river is the artery that carries all the traffic that flows east from western-central Canada and from the American middle-west, and we cannot allow it any longer to be infested with U-boats, which was admitted to be the case by the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) himself just the other day. We have to protect our maritime trade. We have to protect the fishermen in the St. Lawrence river and in the gulf of the St. Lawrence as well as those on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

I hold in my hand a news item which was published not later than yesterday in the largest French daily in America, La Presse, of Montreal. It reads:

(Translation)

TRANSATLANTIC SHIPPING IN THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

The recent torpedoings of seagoing vessels in the Gulf of St. Lawrence have sown panic among ship-owners who are wondering if this route is sufficiently protected to ensure in future the security of vessels bound for Great Britain.

It refers to ocean steamers, meaning by that not only vessels that navigate along the river, but vessels that cross the ocean.

Some time ago, the question even arose of rerouting traffic to other eastern ports and of shipping goods by rail. This would entail, it is claimed, additional expenditure and a loss of time. The interests concerned were hesitant about taking such a step.

In shipping circles, it is claimed that if the Gulf of St. Lawrence were more closely watched, our ships could easily evade enemy submarines.

The permanent interruption of transatlantic shipping on the river, it is felt, would prejudice the war effort and completely paralyse this important ocean trade route.

Moreover such a decision would deny employment to thousands of longshoremen.

At all events, it is up to the British Admiralty to study the situation and take whatever measures are deemed necessary.

I understand that most of the transatlantic vessels are registered in London, as were the Canadian Pacific transatlantic ships. On the other hand one must not forget that the St. Lawrence river is an inland waterway and therefore it is exclusively under the control of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, so far as naval matters are concerned. The conclusion of the article that I have read could be translated thus: "In any case it belongs to the British Admiralty to study the situation and to take measures considered necessary".

I do not see how the British Admiralty could interfere with the business of this government and assume control of the defence of the St. Lawrence, an inland waterway. I cannot believe that this government has yet given all our rights to any other country with respect to the sort of defence that is to be organized to protect the St. Lawrence waterway. Of course, in war time there are mutual obligations between allied countries. If this government said, "We are cooperating with the British Admiralty regarding the defence of the St. Lawrence river and its shores", I would agree with them. It is natural that allied countries should help one another and cooperate in protecting and defending themselves. But I find it simply incredible that a decision made by the Admiralty with regard to the defence of the St. Lawrence seaway could possibly for a moment be accepted with closed eyes by this government. I cannot believe it, because that would mean that this government was simply an agent of the government of another country.

We have heard so much about the defence of other countries that it is time for us to think of the defence of our own. At an earlier stage of this session I had the honour to move that the defence of this country should have priority over commitments to any other country, and that is pure common sense. The trouble lies in the fact that the more sensible a thing is the more difficult it is to have it adopted, and there is a reason for that. The reason is that, at the controls in the various branches of the war departments, there are men to whom Canada counts for nothing. That is why we have to take advantage of the rules of parliament to wake up the government, to try to make the members of the government understand that they are not members of any government other than that of Canada. There are some occasions, on St. George's day, on St. Andrew's day, on St. Patrick's day, on St. Jean Baptiste day when we hear speeches about the grandeur of Canada, and what a fine country this is. And we hear a lot about the statute of Westminster, that marvellous instrument through which this country obtained its autonomy. But now we realize that we have gone back to the darkest colonial days and we have to speak louder and louder to awake the government and make them realize that Canada is in danger.

It has been said on the platform many times that Canada was threatened, that the Germans had their eyes on us. What was done for the defence of this country? I am one of those members who have lost no opportunity to try to impress upon the government the importance of defending this country and making it safe for our good citizens, men, women and children who live in it, and now I hope that the day of awakening and reckoning has come, and that the government will realize that it is not yet too late to open their eyes and face the situation as it should be faced. I remember reading once an article written by an eminent member of the press gallery, one of the deans of the gallery, whom I will not name. I do not wish to offend his proverbial modesty, but he said of a politician, who is no longer in the political scene, that the mistake he made was in considering that this war was exactly the same as the last one. It is not the same. Conditions have changed, and with the new methods of warfare and the new facilities of transportation the war is nearer to us now than it has ever been.

But there is a psychological consideration that should not be forgotten. Earlier in this session I said that the veterans of the last war had the right to say that they were in favour of conscription for service overseas. They have that right because they have already been preaching by example. They were recalling their exploits, remembering their accomplishments when they were capturing the enemy, when they were destroying or taking possession of his forts. That is natural. Perhaps they are thinking to-day the same way as they were thinking then. I assume so; it is their memory of their past accomplishments that guides them now. It makes them forget that actually the enemy is very near us. They are not so sure to destroy the enemy far from here, because the enemy has already reached our shores. I betray no secret in saying that; I refer only to the statement of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services in which he admitted that the facts laid before the house by the hon. member for Gaspé were true. His only complaint was that the statement was untimely.

Well, sir, why should he hide the truth? If there are sinkings in the St. Lawrence it is front page news in United States papers, but the only way for a Canadian citizen to get the information is to buy a United States paper. The censorship of our country is so silly that they prevent our papers from informing the Canadian people of facts that have already been communicated to the people of the United States. If the United States of America were not our allies in this war it might be expected that news of that kind could not be published in this country, on account of our being in a state of war, but could be published in the United States, if the United States were still a neutral country. But since that great country is in a state of war, just as we are here, why do the Canadian people not get the same information about Canada as is given to other countries? There is a very good reason why they should. If the veil of secrecy were lifted from facts that should be commonly known, there would be more respect for official news, and when the government denied any news statement that was untrue, the people would be more inclined to believe what they say.

However, I shall not go further into that. I only wish to tell hon. members that I have appreciated the way in which this matter has been approached by all those who have spoken about it and all those who have listened to speeches about it. The times are grave; we realize that. But it is not for the government to decide whether we shall have a secret session or not. It is for parliament to decide, it is for the House of Commons to decide. I would remind the Prime Minister that unless we are to revert officially to the régime of Mussolini, Stalin and Hitler, it is not the government that is supreme; it is the House of Commons, of which the government is only a permanent committee. This is why Mr. Churchill, who boasts of being a child of the House of Commons, has so much respect for his colleagues the private members of the parliament of Westminster, and keeps them informed as to what is going on. At the present time there is a debate of capital importance taking place at Westminster about the merchant marine. Nothing is hidden from the members. It would not even be hidden from the British people if there were not a danger that the facts disclosed there might help the enemy.

I would also be very ready to support the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that a public discussion of those facts should be had, to satisfy the minds of his constituents as well as of mine and of all good Canadian people. Before the war there were many German and Japanese merchant vessels in the St. Lawrence river. Even men-of-war of those enemy countries came to Canada, and very credulous would be the one who would contend that the enemy is not already fully informed about the geography of this country.

Another thing which I shall mention briefly is the necessity of a cipher code, not only for the Department of National Defence for Naval Services, if they have one, but also for the merchant marine. No departure of any vessel from any point on the St. Lawrence river or from any point on any inland waterway should be disclosed other than by cipher code to those concerned.

I leave the matter with the house. I make a special appeal to the Prime Minister and to his colleagues, and I do tell them that we are ready to cooperate with them provided they show good will regarding the defence of this country, and that they show results. There is no excuse for a repetition of what has happened recently in the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I have already supported on a similar occasion the demand made by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) for a secret session, because the information contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member is closely bound up with the defence of Canada. The hon. member has my heartiest support. The representatives of the people who sit in this house are entitled to all possible information in connection with the protection of our shores. Consequently I believe a secret session would be in the public interest, and the government cannot refuse it without assuming an exceedingly serious responsibility. We have taken long hours to discuss the question of one-cent candy. We would be more justified in taking a few minutes to discuss the most important question of the defence of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member for Gaspé wish to withdraw his motion?

Mr. ROY: I will withdraw it, Mr. Speaker, but if there are no more hon. members who wish to speak—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the Prime Minister say anything?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I was about to say something, but was interrupted at the time. I might remind the house of the exact question before it. As I understood, the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Roy) was granted leave to move the adjournment of the house in order to discuss a matter of urgent public importance, which matter was the advisability of having a secret session. I am afraid the discussion that has taken place has far exceeded the purpose for which the adjournment was asked.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Not by me.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition says it was not by him, but may I remind him that he was the one who started the discussion, and I think he gave to it a scope that was not intended even by the mover. My hon. friend really presented an entirely different request to the government. If I understood him aright the leader of the opposition requested that there should be a public discussion, while the object of the hon. member for Gaspé is that there should be a private discussion. I am afraid that is only too characteristic of what has taken place at times during this session. Many of the hon. members who to-day are asking us to hold a secret session to discuss a national matter yesterday were condemning us very strongly for having permitted public matters to be investigated secretly in another place. It seems that no matter what the government does, it is wrong. If we have a secret session we are told that it ought to have been public; if we hold a public session we are condemned for not having held it in secret.

Mr. HOMUTH: Those are not parallel cases at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is not a parallel I am afraid I do not know what a parallel is.

Mr. HOMUTH: I believe that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend does. However, I just wish to point out that sometimes it is a little embarrassing to know just what it is hon. members really mean when they make certain requests and certain professions. I did say to the hon. member for Gaspé that I thought he ought to give the government such information as he has which causes him to believe that a secret session should be held. I would say to him now that if he has any more information than he has already set out in the letters he has sent to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services or any other minister, I wish he would let me know, and also I wish he would take care to see to it that this further information is imparted to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services as soon as opportunity permits. I might say the same to the leader of the opposition, who has mentioned that he has certain information. I would ask him if he would give that information to the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services. My colleague is not here at the moment, but if my hon. friend is anxious to furnish the information at once he might give it to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will try to see the minister to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: In regard to the absence from the house at the moment of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, my colleague is to-day visiting shipyards at Collingwood and Midland in connection with some of the work of his department, official business of first importance in relation to problems which are confronting the nation at the present time. That is the reason for his absence to-day, but I am informed that he will be back to-morrow, and perhaps at that time my hon. friend will see him and give him such information as he possesses. I do submit that it is necessary for the government to have that information before we can say whether or not a secret session should be held.

May I point our further that I am not aware of any requests having been made until this afternoon by hon. gentlemen opposite for a public discussion of this particular matter, or any other matter relating to defence, beyond such discussion as we have had already. After listening to what has been said this afternoon it might be thought by someone visiting the house or reading its proceedings, that the government had been seeking to prevent a discussion of the situation in the St. Lawrence, or the situation on the Pacific coast, or the situation in relation to the Alaska highway, or in connection with some other defence matters; but no request for anything of the kind has been made until this afternoon. As hon. members know very well, there are opportunities time and again in connection with the business of the house when these particular matters can be discussed.

Further in regard to the question of holding a secret session may I say that this secret session is requested because certain ships have been torpedoed in the St. Lawrence. May I remind the house that a very large number of ships have been torpedoed off the coast of Nova Scotia. May I also remind the house that this country has been attacked on the Pacific coast. And may I say further that it will be a very great surprise if further occurrences of the kind do not take place at any time, on either coast, and I think our country must expect those possibilities. Indeed, the government has had them in mind all along and has been doing everything it is possible for the administration to do in anticipating situations of the kind and in seeking to meet them. But the question we must ask ourselves is whether each time a ship is torpedoed off one or other coast, or some other act of war takes place, it is to be the duty of the government to hold a secret session of this house in order to discuss that particular situation. It is for this reason that I say the responsibility is upon the government to decide whether the circumstances warrant a secret session, or whether it is better that these events, as they take place from time to time, should be discussed in open session as far as it may be advisable and possible so to discuss them. After all, the government has to ask itself with respect even to secret sessions whether some things can be said or should be said in a secret session that cannot be said or should not be said in an open session. There are certain matters that of course can be discussed better in a secret session than in an open session; but there are many matters in connection with which any information, if it can be given at all, certainly should be given in an open rather than a secret session.

I have nothing further to say than that the government, when it gets this additional information, will carefully consider it and will advise the house as to what it thinks advisable in the matter. I should not like to conclude, however, without taking very strong exception to a reference made by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to some of the heads of the war departments of Canada as he described them, who, if I got his words aright, he said were not at all concerned with Canada.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would be ashamed to say, "hear, hear" if I were my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: Opinions are free.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Opinions may be free, but I am afraid that the opinion the public will have of my hon. friend for condemning public servants who are doing their utmost to defend this country and defend freedom, will not be such as will meet with his own approval. I say this because, while I do not claim it is necessarily a part of my duty, though I believe it is, certainly it is the part of chivalry that someone should defend public servants who are not here to defend themselves, but whose whole lives and time are being spent in helping to defend those of us who are in this House of Commons, our country and the freedom which we enjoy.

Mr. POULIOT: Why do you not speak in that way to the slackers in uniform who infest militia headquarters?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just a word. The Prime Minister attributed my request as based on the theory of one incident. I tried to put it on a much wider basis than that. The whole position down there, I think, ought to be discussed.

Mr. ROY: I should like to say a few words, if I may, in reply to what the Prime Minister has said.

Mr. SPEAKER: Only with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is withdrawn.

Mr. ROY: No, I have not withdrawn. I understood wrongly at the time. The Prime Minister has said, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is not entitled to reply, and he cannot speak a second time. Is the motion withdrawn?

Mr. ROY: I ask that it stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman understand? He is not entitled to reply, nor can he speak a second time. I understood that the hon. gentleman was asking leave of the house to withdraw his motion.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

An hon. MEMBER: He said yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. member who has made the motion does not understand. He is not entitled to reply; therefore he cannot speak a second time.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): May I suggest that an amendment has been moved?

Mr. SPEAKER: It was ruled out of order. The hon. gentleman is not entitled to reply, or to speak a second time. I am asking him now if he is withdrawing his motion.

Mr. ROY: I say no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Roy moves, seconded by Mr. Lacombe, the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. Those in favour of the motion will please say "aye".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Aye.

Mr. SPEAKER: Those opposed will please say "nay".

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nay.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the nays have it. On division.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

An hon. MEMBER: A registered vote.

Mr. SPEAKER: Before putting the motion I think I should say that is a very unusual vote. I am informed that in the history of this house a vote on a motion such as this has very rarely been taken. The motion is for the adjournment of the house and if it should carry the house would adjourn until to-morrow at three o'clock. It is unusual for the Chair to make such a statement, but I think under the circumstances I may be forgiven for having done so.

The house divided on the motion (Mr. Roy) which was negatived on the following division:

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

*MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—CONTRACTS IN MARITIME PROVINCES

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Of the total number of contracts awarded and commitments made by the Department of Munitions and Supply on Canadian and United Kingdom account, from July 14, 1939, to June 30, 1942, how many were made with persons and companies in, (a) the province of New Brunswick; (b) the province of Nova Scotia; and (c) the province of Prince Edward Island?

2. What are the names and addresses of the persons and companies with whom such contracts were made and commitments entered into in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; what is the nature of the goods and services contracted for in each case; what was the amount involved in each contract or commitment; and how much has each person or company been paid to June 30, 1942?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this question asks for a breakdown between provinces of contracts placed by the Department of Munitions and Supply. I have on two or three occasions explained to the house that it is impossible to do that accurately, due to the fact that orders are often placed in provinces other than where the work is done. I have also stated that it was not the policy of the department to divide the work between provinces, and therefore the question cannot be answered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We can understand that it is not the policy to do what the question suggests, namely, to divide contracts between provinces on a geographical basis. But the object of this question is to find out how much or how little of war contracts have been placed in the maritime provinces, and we want to know that.

Mr. HOWE: My interest is to get the war materials.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We understand that, but we have a duty to our constituents.

Mr. HOWE: Well, you carry on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall.

*MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—ARMOURED VEHICLES

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Are the three types of armoured fighting vehicles, viz: the scout car, the armoured car and the reconnaissance car, in production, and, if not, why not?

2. Have there been any defects in design or performance?

3. Are any or all of them of pre-war design?

4. Is the average thickness of armour the same as found on corresponding German armoured fighting vehicles?

5. If not, what is the comparable thickness?

6. Are the specifications as to, (a) fire power, (b) armament, (c) durability, (d) repairability, equal to the corresponding German A.F.V.'s?

7. Is it the intention of the government to continue the production of these three types of vehicles?

8. Will they be replaced by a more modern type, at least equal to the corresponding German A.F.V.'s?

9. Is the factory producing the "Valentine" at present shut down for changes in the design of this vehicle?

10. If so, when is it expected to be in production again?

11. Is the medium tank (Ram) in full production?

12. If not, why not?

13. Is the armour on these vehicles sufficiently heavy to withstand guns?

14. What is the heaviest gun used in the Valentine and Ram tanks, (a) what size shell does it fire; (b) what size shell does German 75-millimeter fire?

15. What gun is used by our anti-tank artillery?

16. What is our heaviest field gun and what size shell does it fire and at what velocity?

17. What is the size of the comparable German gun—what size of shell does it fire and at what velocity?

18. Are there any guns being currently manufactured in Canada equal to Germany's 88-millimeter gun?

19. If so, what are they?

20. Are these guns issued to the field armies or to tanks?

21. Is the minister responsible for all tank production as well as design?

22. Whose duty is it to determine the policy respecting the types of equipment adopted by the Canadian corps?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this question deals with a number of inquiries that could not be answered without violation of all censorship regulations. It asks for the thickness of armour-plate on tanks, the fire power of guns, and so forth. It makes certain insinuations which are wholly incorrect and with which I should like to deal, but it is quite impossible for me to deal with any of them without violating the censorship regulations.

BRITISH CHILDREN IN CANADA

Mr. GRAYDON:

1. How many British children have immigrated to Canada from Great Britain since war was declared in each of the years 1939, 1940, 1941, and up to July 1, 1942, (a) under governmental evacuation arrangements; (b) under private arrangements?

Mr. CRERAR:

1.	Sept. 1, 1939, to Dec. 31, 1939	1940	1941	Jan. 1, 1942, to July 1, 1942	Totals
(a) British children under government assisted scheme who entered Canada as non-immigrants	nil	1,532	nil	nil	1,532
(b) British children under private arrangement who entered Canada as non-immigrants	89	5,054	344	143	5,630
(c) British children under private arrangement who entered Canada for permanent residence	164	434	114	46	758

*HONG KONG COMMISSION—COUNSEL

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Was the Hong Kong inquiry held in secret by order in council at the request of the government?

2. If so, when was said order in council passed?

3. Were each of the counsel engaged in the recent Hong Kong inquiry asked to submit an account for their services and, if so, by whom?

4. Did each of the counsel submit an account and were said accounts submitted to the commissioner either directly by counsel or for approval, by the Department of Justice?

5. Was an account submitted by Colonel Drew? If not, were reasons given by the commissioner or by anyone else why an account was not submitted and, if so, state the reasons?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to questions 1 and 2, I answered both these questions in the statement I made last night. The Hong Kong inquiry was not held in secret by order in council at the request of the government. There was no order passed by the government requesting that it should be held in secret.

As to the rest of the question, it would involve, I imagine, a conference with the commissioner and obtaining such information as the commissioner may wish to give. That part of the question had better be made an order for a return.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order for return, subject to the reservations made by the Prime Minister.

*MASTER-GENERAL OF THE ORDNANCE—TANK PRODUCTION

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Was the recent resignation of Colonel Victor Sifton, M.G.O., from the post of Master-General of the Ordnance, due to any difference of opinion between him and the Minister of Munitions and Supply?

2. If so, did it have anything to do with the designs or production of tanks?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, this is not really a question but rather a statement of fact. In every newspaper of the country it is stated this morning that the Minister of Munitions and Supply quarrelled with the Master-General of the Ordnance, as a result of which the Master-General of the Ordnance resigned. But the fact of the matter is that the Master-General of the Ordnance and myself have worked together in the greatest harmony since he came to Ottawa. We have visited frequently back and forth. We had a common problem of providing weapons and supplies for the troops. So far as I know there was never anything antagonistic between us, although we had many difficult problems to work out.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Early this week Mr. Sifton called on me in my office to say how much he had enjoyed working with me, and I was able to say the same thing to him. Just why and for what purpose a statement of that kind should be blazoned from one end of Canada to the other is something with which I should like to deal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOWE: I also suggest to you, sir, with all due deference, that it is not the kind of question that should be allowed on the order paper of this house, because it attempts to state a fact rather than ask a question.

Mr. BRUCE: I think, Mr. Speaker, that this is a matter of considerable public importance, because this man was serving his country as a dollar-a-year man.

Mr. RALSTON: You have got your answer.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

GRAHAM SPRY

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the speeches being delivered throughout Canada by Mr. Graham Spry in relation to India, and defence and foreign affairs?

2. On this trip, is he representing the government of Great Britain, and has he the authority to represent them regarding India?

3. With what members of the government has he conferred, and whom does he represent, and by what authority?

4. Was he engaged by the minister in charge of the National Resources Mobilization Act, and was he authorized to visit sections of Canada to make speeches on this and other subjects? If so, on what conditions, and what allowances, travelling and other expenses have been allowed, and who authorized them?

FIRST AND SECOND VICTORY LOANS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. In the (a) first victory loan; (b) second victory loan, what were the office expenses in each of the following cities: Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Montreal, Quebec, Peterborough, Winnipeg, Vancouver?

2. What were the travelling expenses in each city?

3. What was the amount paid to canvassers in each city?

4. What was the amount paid to bond salesmen working in each of the different cities?

5. Who were the organizers in each of these cities?

6. What was the amount paid to the organizers in each of these cities, as, (a) salary and expenses, (b) travelling expenses?

HONG KONG COMMISSION—COUNSEL

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Were each of the counsel engaged in the recent Hong Kong inquiry asked to submit an account for their services and, if so, by whom?

2. Did each of the counsel submit an account and were said accounts submitted to the commissioner either directly by counsel, or for approval, by the Department of Justice?

3. Was an account submitted by Colonel Drew? If not, were reasons given by the commissioner or by anyone else why an account was not submitted and, if so, state the reasons?

HONG KONG

INQUIRY FOR FURTHER INFORMATION WITH RESPECT TO CASUALTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask a question either of the Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs, or of the Minister of National Defence. Has the government received any further or recent information with respect to casualties at Hong Kong, and in particular, has the government received any information with regard to those killed, wounded or taken prisoner of war, and those who have died subsequent to the surrender? A report has come to my attention that some such information was received about ten days ago. I should like to have either confirmation or denial of that report.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I can say to my hon. friend that no such report has come to my attention, and I am sure that it would have been brought to my attention immediately had it come in. As the house and the country know, Colonel Frank Clarke, who himself had a son with the Royal Rifles, is in charge of matters connected with Hong Kong, and I am sure that any such report would have been brought to his attention.

SUGAR

AVAILABILITY FOR PARCELS TO MEMBERS OF THE FORCES OVERSEAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): Has the Minister of Finance inquired as yet into the availability of sugar to put in boxes for overseas?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Yes, I did. I was informed that the sugar ration in England is the same as the sugar ration in Canada, and that there is something extra provided. Therefore it was not considered necessary to provide for any increase in the sugar ration in Canada. I had a memorandum about the matter which is not under my hand at the moment, but that is the substance of it.

CARRIER PIGEONS

INQUIRY AS TO USE AS MESSAGE CARRIERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, on April 20, 1942, I asked the following question:

1. Has the government purchased any carrier pigeons for use as message carriers?

2. What action, if any, has the government taken to encourage the raising of carrier pigeons?

The question was answered by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) as follows:

It is not considered to be in the public interest to provide answers to these questions.'

On July 14 an article appeared in the press headed "To take pigeons on sea patrols—can be released to bring aid if plane forced down—Found effective". That was the announcement from the air force headquarters. Is the Secretary of State now in a position to answer the questions I put to him on the orders of the day on April 20?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Of course the Secretary of State gives such answers as are supplied to him, and I understood at the time the answer was given, if I recollect aright, that the Department of National Defence for Air objected to giving the information. However, I shall be glad to make inquiries, and if there has been any change in the decision I shall advise the hon. member.

WHEAT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF AGREEMENT SIGNED AT WASHINGTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. E. PERLEY (Qu'Appelle): I desire to direct to the Minister of Trade and Commerce a question based upon two reports, one appearing in the press and the other a report in the Parliamentary Debates of the British House of Commons on July 2, indicating that the wheat agreement signed at Washington had been discussed there. I quote from the Parliamentary Debates at page 513:

Wheat Discussions, Washington (Agreement)
Mr. Watkins (by Private Notice) asked the President of the Board of Trade whether he is in a position to give any information about the recent discussions at Washington with a view to the conclusion of a wheat agreement?

The President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Dalton): I am glad to be able to say that the wheat discussions in Washington have been satisfactorily concluded and the text of the agreed documents is available in a White Paper which was presented yesterday.

His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom have agreed with His Majesty's Governments in Canada and Australia, the government of the United States and the government of Argentina, on the outline of a wheat convention which will later be submitted to a larger conference of the countries interested.

He went on to describe the agreement in detail. My question is this: Will the minister to-morrow table this agreement recently made at Washington, to which Canada was a party, and at the same time make a statement similar to that made by the President of the Board of Trade in Great Britain describing the agreement? The report in the press to-day is to the effect that three western provincial pools have called a meeting in Calgary to discuss the agreement, and I think this parliament should have the agreement before it.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I believe the agreement will be available for tabling in the house to-morrow.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the minister make a statement similar to the statement made in the British house?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): I shall take that into consideration.

PROVINCIAL DEBT ADJUSTMENT

CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PRAIRIE PROVINCES WITH DOMINION GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Justice. During the past few days representatives of the governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have, I believe, been in Ottawa in connection with securing the assistance of the dominion government to have enacted legislation to take the place of the provincial debt adjustment legislation in the western provinces. To-day there are many thousands of debtor farmers and other residents of western Canada who are in the position of being subjected to threatened action such as they have not been subjected to in recent years. The situation is a very serious one. Can the minister say whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation at this session to take the place of the provincial debt adjustment legislation which has been declared ultra vires by some of the courts.

[Mr. Perley.]

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Representatives of the western provinces were informed yesterday that it was not considered possible to have legislation passed before the adjournment of this session, but that any representations they might have to make as to some other method of dealing with the problem, which they submitted as being an acute and urgent one, would be given very careful consideration.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Under the War Measures Act?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: It was suggested that they might consider whether or not they could propose some method that would be satisfactory to them to deal with the situation temporarily under the War Measures Act—

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It is a very serious situation.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: —and my understanding is that the premiers and attorneys general of the provinces retired to discuss the possibility of complying with that suggestion.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Vien in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Resolution 1, part I, normal tax.

Mr. McGEER: When the house rose last night I had pointed out that in 1934, before the banking and commerce committee, certain representations had been made, all of which were opposed by the government majority of the committee of that day. May I recapitulate them. They were:

1. A publicly-owned national central bank.

2. Removal of the gold reserve limitation on the issue of full legal tender national paper currency.

3. The control and regulation of the international movement of currency and credit and investment.

4. The control and regulation of international trade.

5. The control and regulation of production and prices of goods and services.

6. The use of taxation to withdraw from circulation any excess of buying power medium of exchange which, not withdrawn, would cause an inflationary rise in prices of goods and services.

In that day every one of these reforms was looked upon as a dangerous innovation. To-day every one of them has been put into operation and is operating as an essential part of the economy of the nation. I know what it is to pioneer reforms of this kind, but that was not all of the programme we offered. We suggested at that time that with a publicly-owned national central bank, the use of national currency, the greater control of the use of bank credit, deposit money, not only would offer a means of financing greater progress, but could be employed to alleviate the burden of interest-bearing debt. I know all about the dangers of inflation of currency, but the issue of national currency and the control and regulation of the issue of bank deposit money does not of itself involve any disastrous inflationary results. So long as prices are controlled; so long as the flight from the dollar is prevented by the control and regulation of the movement of currency and credit and investment internationally, the actual volume of money in circulation will not of itself do any harm.

I want to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that there is more than one form of inflation that can bring a nation to disaster. One of these forms, I believe the most dangerous and insidious of all, is not the inflation of currency but the inflation of interest-bearing debt. Too much money may be a disaster to some nations; it may be a disaster to some individuals; but I know of no individual ever born who was smart enough to weather the storm of too much interest-bearing debt. Do not make any mistake about the result to a nation being the same as the result to an individual, because after all a nation is nothing but the sum total of the individuals of the nation, and what applies to the individual with regard to debt applies in equal disaster to the nation as a whole. There is one chapter in Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations" that we have not studied as closely as we might. I refer to his chapter on public debt. He pointed out that in the middle of the 18th century every nation in Europe would come to disaster through its programme of national debt and its policy of funding and refunding debt. He also pointed out that no nation, not even England, could follow the pattern of that economy without coming to the same disaster. Of course I know when men talk of the danger of currency inflation they assume that by taxing and borrowing, which is only deferred taxation, they prevent disruption of the economy through a rise in the level of prices.

When I made these recommendations before the banking and commerce committee in 1934 I did not believe that I originated anything. Every proposal I offered was taken from the Macmillan committee's report, which was filed with the British government in 1931. Dealing with the problem of controlling prices, that report to the British government said this at page 94, section 210:

> . . . it should be our object to increase the power to exercise deliberate control over the price level; that there is nothing inherently impracticable in this; that with the gradual growth of knowledge and experience, and particularly with the further development of suitable machinery for regular international cooperation, the possibility of such deliberate control should steadily increase; and that we should forward these ends to the best of our powers by being ready to attempt the task and to gain experience by practice.

That is exactly what this government is doing, and I say to my hon. friends of the Social Credit group and to the monetary reformers who are anxious to proceed more rapidly than this government is doing, that since 1934 under the Liberal administration of the Mackenzie King government this nation has gone further with regard to monetary reform and has established a greater advance in bringing money into the service of the nation than any other nation in the empire.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) says that these proposals to use national currency are not new. Of course they are not new, but let us keep in mind some of the problems that this parliament and this nation cannot escape. Just look at the figures of the issues that have taken place since 1938. I take, first, from the Bank of Canada report the issue of deposits by the chartered banks. In 1938 they amounted to $2,892,000,000. By 1942 this had risen to $3,820,000,000, or an increase of $928,000,000 in that period of time.

Let us now take the issue of national currency. In 1938 we had $105,000,000 of active Bank of Canada circulation. In 1942 this had risen to $403,000,000. During that period we have increased our national currency by $297,000,000.

There is, however, another issue. While bank deposits have risen $928,000,000 and Bank of Canada cash has risen $297,000,000, our unmatured bonded indebtedness has risen from $3,315,000,000 to $5,866,000,000, or an increase of $2,551,000,000.

We are told that at the close of the war we are going to refund or repay war savings certificates. Also we are told that we are going to repay the refundable taxes, also that we are going to repay a portion of the excise taxes. These are promises to pay. What are we going to repay with, if we do not come to the use of something other than the issue of debt in addition to the already appalling burden of interest-bearing debt that this nation is carrying?

There is another interesting figure with which every hon. member should be acquainted, namely, the total amount of money we have in our savings bank accounts to-day. In 1938 we had $1,630,000,000. In January, 1942, we had $1,720,000,000, or $90,000,000 more than we had the year before the war. Every dollar of that savings money is available to buy goods with. There is no question about that. But we are told on the advice of experts that when the government borrows by issuing interest-bearing bonds it takes money from the control of the people and transfers it to the account of the government, thus reducing the volume of money available for private expenditure. I can hardly agree with that, even when the transfer is from a savings bank account to the government, because the government gives in exchange for that savings bank account a bond of the government carrying interest, and who in this house will say that any man possessed of a dominion government bond has not a liquid asset which has spending value. To accept such a statement as a fact would be to conclude that dominion government bonds are not liquid securities. There is no such situation in existence to-day. Next to an actual savings account, or a current account in a bank, the most liquid of all assets are dominion government promises to pay. In addition, however, the government not only issues a liquid security to the value of the savings taken over, but adds to it the value of the interest which the bond carries.

We are told also that we cannot issue national currency, because national currency, under our Bank Act, is a reserve upon which the chartered banks can issue bank deposits, as loans and as the means of purchasing securities. Well, has the government no control over the use of Bank of Canada cash as reserves? The government has control over everything else. I am satisfied that the merchant banks of the Dominion of Canada would be more than glad to cooperate with the government in finding some less costly and more efficient way of financing the appalling costs of this war than we are adopting at the present time. The Minister of Finance says that if we dared to issue Bank of Canada cash, our merchant banks, coming into the possession of that money, would be desirous of expanding their bank deposits, increasing their loans and setting in motion the spiral of inflation. I do not believe the banks would take any such attitude, because when I look at the bank cash on hand I find that for a great many years they have had a very substantial surplus of cash. We said, "You can use 5 per cent, as a matter of law." They went us one better and said, "Why, we will hold 10 per cent or more." If anyone wants evidence of good faith on the part of our chartered banks, I think it is in their record; but should any such condition arise that they were unwilling to cooperate, this parliament and this government, under the War Measures Act, have no less power to control the chartered banks of this dominion than they have to control every other individual, every other corporation and every other business and industry.

I do not want to raise unnecessarily the question of the advice of experts, but I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance the fact that when members of the official opposition start cheering anything done by a Liberal government, it ought to become suspect. You know, Mr. Speaker, these reforms that we have brought into effect were never concurred in by that group.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why, we established the Bank of Canada.

Mr. McGEER: If you listen to them very long I think they will convince you that you ought to start financing this war with 5½ per cent tax free bonds, because that was the method they thought was most efficacious during the last war. We will have none of that kind of nonsense to-day.

Mr. GRAYDON: One of your own ministers was in that government.

Mr. McGEER: Of course; there were many misguided people in that government, and we had to have a good taste of it before we knew what it really meant. But the people of Canada have had their lesson, and they will never again go back to that kind of government.

Mr. GRAYDON: You still have that minister, though.

Mr. McGEER: We have not had any 5½ per cent bonds out since 1937.

Mr. JACKMAN: If I may be permitted a question, it seems to me that when the hon. member makes an imputation such as that, someone should rise to refute it. Interest rates throughout the whole world were on a very much higher basis during the last war than they are during this war. I ask the hon. member if that is not so.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend says that in the world at that time interest rates were high all over. Of course they were. That was what brought the whole world to disaster, and that is the lesson that should guide us to continue with our programme of reducing the cost of public finance wherever we can. The experts in the finance department are not always right. I should like to draw the attention of this committee to one historic occasion when a great chancellor of the British exchequer confessed to the fact that he had been sadly misled by the greatest experts in the world. Speaking in the British House of Commons on April 21, 1932, Mr. Churchill said:

When I was moved by many arguments and forces in 1925 to return to the gold standard I was assured by the highest experts . . . that we were anchoring ourselves to reality and stability; and I accepted their advice. I take for myself and my colleagues of other days whatever degree of blame and burden there may be for having accepted their advice. But what has happened? We have had no reality, no stability.

Continuing, he said:

Is the progress of the human race in this age of almost terrifying expansion to be arbitrarily barred and regulated by fortuitous discoveries of gold mines here and there or by the extent to which we can persuade the existing cornerers and hoarders of gold to put their hoards again into the common stock? Are we to be told that human civilization and society would have been impossible if gold had not happened to be an element in the composition of the globe? These are absurdities, but they are becoming dangerous and deadly absurdities. They have only to be asserted long enough, they have only to be left ungrappled with long enough, to endanger that capitalist and credit system upon which the liberties and enjoyments and prosperity, in my belief, of the vast masses depend. I therefore point to this evil and to the search for the methods of remedying it, as the first, the second and the third of all the problems which should command and rivet our thoughts.

After relegating the gold standard to the place where it properly belongs, and wholly justifying the complete repudiation of the ideas of classical economy and orthodox finance which he formerly championed, Mr. Churchill said that all those rules by which the chancellors of every party, except in war time, were rigidly bound, had now been swept away. How former chancellors would stare! He blandly referred to himself as the last orthodox chancellor of the Victorian epoch, and amidst cheers and laughter appealed to the committee to recognize him as "the last of the Mohicans." Of course we are going to have changes in our economic set-up, and this government will be well advised to pursue the course of reform that it has carried on with remarkable success since 1935. Let not the Minister of Finance or the experts of the treasury board come to the conclusion that the door of human progress in that regard has been closed. We cannot look into the future; but let us go back to the days during the last ten years when some of us were pleading in this house to put the unemployed to work, and when we were told that we had reached the limit of our credit; that to build highways, schools and defence requirements was beyond our ability, that our economy could not stand it. I went across this country pleading that in the state of the world at that time we should be spending not $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 a year on defence, but that if we were to spend proportionately to what Australia and New Zealand and Great Britain were spending we should be spending $400,000,000 a year. Any man to-day knows that the false economy which denied us the right to go to work during the last ten years has brought a deficit which we shall pay for with human lives and human blood. Do not make any mistake about that.

I want to repeat to this government that I believe democracy can and will survive. I am confident that we shall go through this terrible trial with success, because I do not believe that 65,000,000 Germans and 70,000,000 Japanese can bring to defeat 80,000,000 Anglo-Celts in the British empire, 130,000,000 of the people of the United States of America who are united with us as they were never united before, and 170,000,000 Russians who have proved that they can and will fight to the finish. But there can be no continuation of the imposition upon us of the hobbles and fetters which deny to us the use of all the means and all the powers that are at our disposal. I plead with the Minister of Finance and his expert advisers not to close their minds to the value of national currency in this crisis. I believe that Lincoln was right when, in 1839, he declared:

No duty is more imperative on the government than the duty it owes the people of furnishing them with a sound and uniform currency.

Issuing debts is, in my humble opinion, a more dangerous course toward the inflationary conditions which bring disaster than is the issue of a national currency for national service under proper regulation and control.

Twenty-five years after making that statement on the duty of national government to provide the people with a sound and uniform currency, Lincoln wrote a letter on what he thought about national currency in that nation. It reads as follows:

My dear Colonel Dick:

I have long determined to make public the origin of the greenback and tell the world that it is one of Dick Taylor's creations. You have always been friendly to me and when troublous times fell upon us and my shoulders, though broad and willing, were weak, and myself surrounded by such circumstances and such people that I knew not whom to trust; then I said in my extremity, "I will send for Colonel Taylor, he will know what to do." I think it was in January, 1862, on or about the 16th, that I did so. You came and I said to you "What can we do?" Said you: "Why, issue treasury notes, bearing no interest, printed on the best banking paper. Issue enough to pay off the army expenses and declare it legal tender." Chase thought—

Chase was the secretary of the treasury at that time.

Chase thought it a hazardous thing, but we finally accomplished it and gave it to the people of this republic, the greatest blessing they ever had—their own paper to pay their own debts.

I do not want to stress an issue of this kind in the dying days of the session, but I have not pressed my ideas upon the house during the last three years. What I do say is, and I think every hon. member will agree with me, that we have seen some terrific changes in the twentieth century. We are going to see some more, and I venture to offer this suggestion. While I am not being laughed at and sneered at as I was when I advocated the reforms which have come into being in this nation and others, there are still men who doubt the capacity of democratic government in the twentieth century to control the issue of its national currency to the preservation of the nation, to the service of the nation, and for the progress of the people of the nation. Just stop and think to-day. This budget provides for an enormous programme. Does it do anything for the old age pensioner?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No.

Mr. McGEER: Does it do anything for the dependent?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McGEER: Does it do anything for the removal of discriminatory taxation?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. McGEER: These are some of the things that the nation must carry on if it is going to justify its right to be looked upon as one of the great democratic, progressive nations of this age. I know it probably would be dangerous to issue billions of dollars of national currency, but could we not issue enough to alleviate the tax on one-cent candies? Are we down to the point that we cannot use our power to create and issue money for the purpose of alleviating some of the needs that go alongside of the needs of war? Yes, Mr. Chairman, I believe that we can do these things, and I believe that if we will put our minds to some of these great problems we can not only finance our full and greater share of the war's responsibilities but strengthen ourselves in the progress of the war and come to the victory stronger and more capable of mastering the problems in a manner which will make the peace worth while.

Do not discard too freely some of the great powers which we possess. Let us not be afraid to venture against the danger of the accumulation of too much interest-bearing debt. Let us keep carefully in mind that the issue of debts has brought Europe to disaster. Funding and refunding, piling up and pyramiding, brought some of our provincial governments, some of our cities in Canada, to the doorstep of bankruptcy. There must be some way of keeping, within the limits of all the obligations we must assume, a national, provincial and municipal solvency in our nation.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. LECLERC: It is not very often that I rise to speak in the House of Commons, especially to speak in English. The reason is probably that we French Canadians would be speaking in a language with which we are not familiar. I often think that our English friends speak their language too freely because they make the sessions last much longer than they should. I listened attentively to what was said yesterday, and I agree with those who have said that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has placed as heavy a burden upon the shoulders of the Canadian taxpayer as it is possible to carry. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) gave us a good picture of the punishment the people are receiving at the hands of the Minister of Finance. The hon. member demonstrated that the married man, especially the married man with two children, is under a heavy burden. The hon. member did not, however, give us all the picture. I do not consider a family of two children as being a family. If he had multiplied that number by two or three, and made the family four or six, he would have made out a better case.

The Minister of Finance has left children over eighteen years of age out of the picture, but I would remind him that many parents, if they want to give their children a decent education, must support children over that age. More consideration should be given to the man receiving a medium-sized salary who has a family to support. Our war effort is reflected by the taxation imposed upon us. If this taxation makes this clear to the Canadian people in general, especially those who claim that Canada is not making a real war effort, it will have accomplished something. In order to make up for the other speakers, I shall not take up any more of the time of the committee. I urge the minister to give serious consideration to the married man with a medium-sized salary.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I do not intend to take part in the discussion on monetary reform, or monetary chaos, depending upon one's point of view, but I should like to revert to the subject we were discussing when we got into the debate on monetary reform. We were talking about the payment of income tax by officers in our armed forces. At the present time officers in Canada pay an income tax, while officers abroad are relieved of that burden. Other ranks, both at home and abroad, do not pay an income tax. During this last week I have received numerous letters from wives of officers who are overseas. These women are alarmed at reports which are current to the effect that their husbands' incomes are to be taxed. I trust there is no foundation for the rumour. I do not think the people of this country would receive kindly any amendment to the act which would tax the incomes of officers who are now overseas. There is a feeling that the day is drawing close when these officers will be engaged in an offensive action against the enemy, the thing for which they have been preparing all these years, and it would be a deplorable thing to tax them when they are about to enter upon that offensive. I hope the minister will be able to reassure the country and the wives of these men that the salaries of officers who are now abroad will not be subject to income tax.

I should like to refer to the taxation which is imposed at the present time upon the salaries of officers within Canada. Most of these men are anxious to go overseas, and I understand that every commissioned officer has volunteered for overseas service. It is not their wish that they should remain at home; if they had their way they would be outside Canada at the present time. They are now paying the full tax, and I do not think they should be called upon to do this. They are not in as favourable a position as the man in civilian life. The man in civilian life is carrying on his business as usual and, when the war is over, he will continue in the same way he is going now. But what about the officer in the army or in any of the armed forces? He has broken entirely his connection with his business at home. What has he to look forward to when the war is over? He must start anew, for he will have no business to which to return. Is it fair that this officer should have to pay the same income tax as the man in civilian life?

The man in civilian life enjoys the comforts and conveniences of his home. The officers must face many transportation problems. Most of them are practically keeping up two homes. That is, they must pay the expenses of running the homes which they left, and they must pay the dues in the messes to which they belong. Most men in civilian life have had increases in income since the war started. They have enjoyed either a straight increase in income because of increased business, or they have had an increased salary or are in receipt of a cost of living bonus. Practically every man not in the armed forces is making more money to-day than he was when the war broke out. When I say he is making more money I do not mean that his net income after paying taxes is more, but his gross income has increased.

What about the officers in our armed forces? Has there been any increase in their pay since war broke out? There has not. Yet they are being called upon to pay full taxation. I know an officer who before he joined up was getting a large income from professional fees. Of his own free will he left his profession to go into the army where he now holds the rank of captain. Before going into the army he incurred certain obligations in connection with building a home, and he hoped to pay those obligations from his income. With the pay he now receives from the army he is just able to keep up his home, that is, make the payments called for by the agreement with the building company, supply his wife and family with the necessities of life and pay the present income tax. Under the new schedule he will not, after keeping up his home, have sufficient left to pay his income tax.

I would also remind the minister that at the present time an officer pays income tax not only on the amount of his pay but on subsistence as well. Suppose he makes $3 a day. Is his income tax on $3 a day? No; it is said that he gets a living allowance, and therefore the sum of seventy cents is added to his pay—

Mr. GREEN: One dollar in some instances.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): My hon. friend says "$1 in some instances." The principle is the same, but I am taking the case of the officer to whose pay is added seventy cents a day for living allowance. He pays income tax, not on $3 a day, but on $3 a day plus seventy cents, or on $3.70. I think that is going a little too far.

Mr. GREEN: And on dependents' allowance too.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): My hon. friend says "on dependents' allowance too"; that that is added to the amount on which the officer pays income tax.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it not all income, theoretically?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The dependents' allowance is actually paid. Somebody gets the allowence in dollars and cents, but subsistence is not paid. Someone—I do not know whether it is the income tax department or the Department of National Defence —has entertained that an officer's food and other things he gets are worth at least seventy cents a day, and although he does not get that seventy cents, he is taxed on that seventy cents. I think he should, in any event, be relieved of that taxation.

It is not only the officers for whom I would make a special plea. I would also bring to the attention of the minister the men who are acting as instructors in elementary flying schools. As members of the committee know, elementary flying schools are now operated by private companies, the instructors being lent by the Royal Canadian Air Force to the elementary flying school. When they are lent by the Royal Canadian Air Force they lose their rank for the time being. Most of them are sergeant pilots and, as members of the committee know, a sergeant pilot does not pay income tax. As a matter of fact, no sergeant in any branch of the service pays income tax. I was going on to say that officers who fly in Canada and are on the general list are also exempt from income tax in the Royal Canadian Air Force, whereas all men who serve on the ground pay income tax. But let me come back to the point I was making. These sergeants who are lent are freed from paying income tax when they are in the Royal Canadian Air Force, but once they join the civilian school as instructors they pay income tax. The increase in the tax will weigh very heavily upon them. If any relief is to be given to officers, I trust that some consideration will also be given to these instructors at the elementary flying schools.

I want to press with all the force I can the suggestion that officers at home should receive some consideration in respect of the payment of income tax. I do not consider that they should pay the same income tax as a man who is not in the service, a man who has not volunteered to save his country but is carrying on his business to-day, true under difficulties, but nevertheless carrying it on, and who, when the war is over, will be allowed to continue to carry on his business, whereas the men in the armed forces will come back to what? They will come back to starting life all over again. I cannot press too strongly upon the minister the fact that these men are serving their country; they are sacrificing greatly, and therefore they are entitled to some consideration.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. W. R. Macdonald.]

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KINLEY: First of all let me express my personal pleasure at having again this afternoon been able to see in this house my esteemed friend the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). He has returned to us after a long and critical illness, and I am sure that we are all glad to know that apparently he is in such good health and that he has not lost any of his power of self-expression so ably displayed in his speech this afternoon.

Last night he referred to those who are exponents of sound money. It seems to me that that is almost a geographical term in Canada. I believe it applies especially to the maritime provinces. Why that is, it may be difficult to say. It may be because, being poor, we learned the value of money in our youth. Again, it may be that in what is known as the golden age of Nova Scotia we were great traders. We had a great foreign trade; our ships sailed to all parts of the world and brought back the treasures of many lands. Perhaps that had something to do with our opinion on money matters. However, to be referred to as one of those who believe in sound money is not too bad a compliment for anyone to receive, and I hope that we in the maritime provinces are sound on money matters in their application to progress with respect to the needs of the Canadian people.

In our economy in the days of wooden ships, Nova Scotia had many banks; nearly every town of importance had a bank to serve its people. When the days of wooden ships became a passing show the first places to feel the effect were the banking institutions of that province. Some failed and others survived and had an influence on the banking institutions of Canada. While I have no brief for the banks, I believe that our banking system is an object of admiration not only in this country but abroad. When greater countries had chaos in the days of the depression, so far as their banking and commerce were concerned, the banks of Canada nobly survived that depression and performed the services which we knew they would do because of their stability and strength.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was because the then Prime Minister put the whole resources of Canada behind all our financial institutions.

Mr. KINLEY: That is to his credit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course it is, but he never got much credit.

Mr. KINLEY: General Sherman, a great United States soldier, said that "war is hell". This country is at war, and perhaps that is the best reason we can give for this extraordinary budget so ably presented to the house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who comes from Nova Scotia. The virtues of Nova Scotia in financial matters have long been recognized in the dominion. In my memory there have been five ministers of finance in Canada who came from that province. We had Fielding, Maclean, Rhodes, Ralston, and now we have our present Minister of Finance. Without detracting from the virtues of those who have gone before, may I say this of the present Minister of Finance. His speech last night, together with the work he has done since he became Minister of Finance, has convinced us, and I am sure it has convinced the country, that there are still giants in Israel. He is one of the great ministers of finance.

There was some opposition to this budget, but it was not serious. It is the function of the opposition to criticize, and I say this advisedly. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) who, I believe, was to-day confirmed in his office—I am glad of the fact, because he is a fellow maritimer—has not only the duty but the privilege of criticizing and finding out the vulnerable points in the government of the country. While hon. gentlemen did criticize, they gave abundant praise to the Minister of Finance. They appreciate the work he has done, and they believe he is the right man for the job at this particular time.

Some of the criticism, I thought, was pretty small, especially that part of it which referred to the candy being taken from the babies. I was taught when I was young that too much sweet stuff in the form of candy was not good for a child, that it caused decay of the teeth and made the child a subject for the dentist.

Mr. HOMUTH: What did you give yours? Porridge?

Mr. KINLEY: Perhaps a little sauerkraut. This whole discussion centred on what hon. gentlemen called the penny piece of candy, and they said that children in the future would not be able to have a piece of candy that would sell for one cent. When I was a boy, if you gave a child a cent to do an errand he thought he was lucky; but who is there here who would offer a boy a cent to-day to do an errand? You would have to give him at least a nickel. The point is that the manufacturers will easily get over the one-cent problem with the 30 per cent tax. They will increase the volume of the bar and sell it for two cents, and that, I think, will be as good for the child as the candy he used to get for a cent.

Hon. members also spoke of the English guest children who have come to Canada, and the leader of the opposition thought there was discrimination because, in the first place, enough was not allowed for dependents, and in the second place, only those who came here under schemes sponsored by the governmnet could come under the deduction. Well, people made their own bargain themselves before there was any law, and if the government afterwards wanted to increase it and amplify it, and made a bargain to that effect, they will stick to their commitments. I want to inform the committee that the English authorities within the last few months authorized the payment of £3 a month for each English child in Canada if the parents were willing to send the money over. The parents of English children should send it over if they can afford to, and in many instances they are doing so. Therefore the position of the guest child is not so bad as we might be led to believe.

We were told that this is a home-wrecker's budget. War is a home-wrecker. This is a war-time budget. It has wrecked no homes in Canada yet, but it seems to me that the need is the thing that justifies and should decide what it is necessary to do in order to pay the bill for the conflict in which we are engaged.

While the opposition's criticism was justified because they are the opposition and that is their duty in the house, there was a criticism which came from our side of the house, a criticism that is more dangerous. Eminent members of this house told us that there is an easy way to finance this war. Well, if there is, why all the worry; why all the anxiety and all the collection of money from the people of this country? But I do not believe there is an easy way. I do not believe it is the best way, I do not believe you can get something for nothing without somebody else paying or without suffering greatly in the future.

This promised easy way is inflation. Inflation means dilution, and I never knew dilution to increase the strength of anything. I do not approach this subject with any degree of assurance, because it is a subject that has been talked of for many years. I recall that Mr. Montagu Norman in the days of the British financial crisis said that international finance approached sometimes the point of mystery where you did not understand it at all. Under such conditions it would be hard for me, a plain business man and a humble member of this house, to say that I understood all the complex theories and problems of finance to-day. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard was not so sure this afternoon; he was willing to admit that there are two sides to the question, but last night the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) was rather sure that he had an easy way to finance this war.

Since this matter is one of more or less mystery, let us reduce it if we can to the simple things of life, so that he who runs may read. While at present I am addressing members of this house, we must remember that we are here for the purpose of informing the country, and that all the people in the country are not as well informed or as alert as members of the house. In the last few days we have been discussing here ways and means, and we have now Bill No. 110 which gives us a lesson on values for duty. In this bill I read this:

> Spirits: On every gallon of the strength of proof distilled in Canada, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, nine dollars, and so in proportion for any greater or less strength than the strength of proof and for any less quantity than a gallon.

The value for duty is based on the alcoholic content of the strength of proof. Would anybody suggest that by adding to a gallon of these spirits a gallon of water you would have any more spirits? It is true it might make it more palatable, but you have no more of the intoxicating ingredients than when it was of its original strength. Inflating the money is watering the money. Or, take for instance, a farmer. There is little rain and the pastures are getting dry. Suppose this farmer who has milk customers in Ottawa said, "I have not enough milk from the cows to supply my customers; I will put the can under the pump, pump the can full of water and take it to the city." He has no more milk, but he has more quantity and can supply his customers. If, however, he did that he would be committing a criminal offence and would be brought before the courts. He is doing nothing more than diluting the substance which he is selling to the people.

The hon. member for Parry Sound talked inflation. There are different methods of inflation. Take corporations. A corporation that has a stock structure and waters that stock structure for the purpose of making greater profits, without having other assets, is watering the stock. Watering the stock and watering the money are similar things; one is a creation of good times and the other a creation of bad times, but they both want something for nothing, something for which other people must pay.

The hon. member for Parry Sound in what was apparently intended to be an intellectual argument on money reform rather descended I thought to the level of a stump speech, because he said in effect that the government was afraid to put extra money into the hands of the people. This is what he said yesterday, as reported at page 4266 of Hansard:

> Let me now return to the question of inflation. By inflation is meant that you are putting too much cash in the hands of the people of this country, particularly the working people and the farmers, and the 85 per cent that are termed the very modest earners; you are giving them too much money, and they will go and spend it. Will any of my hon. friends tell me, . . .

Then he exhibited a $100 bill. Well, we will do nothing of the kind. The workingman will have to work for every dollar he gets notwithstanding that it is inflation. Hon. members of the Social Credit group are more frank about the matter. It will be remembered that they were going to give this money away to the people, $20 a month as a bonus—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Twenty-five dollars.

Mr. KINLEY: Twenty-five dollars a month as a bonus. They never gave it, which is to their credit; but when the hon. member for Parry Sound tries to make a point that the government is afraid that there will be too much money in the hands of the people he is not only doing them an injustice but doing an injustice to himself as a lawyer of great ability. We know that wages are frozen in this country, and he would add to that the indignity of giving the labourers of this country diluted money.

We have heard a great deal about these money schemes that come before us from time to time. Yesterday the hon. member for Parry Sound exhibited a $100 bill, and told us it was a promise to pay. That is true. But if you put that $100 bill in the bank, at the end of the year you can collect a year's interest. Our friends of the Social Credit group issued money too, and I have here—I have had it in my pocket for years—what they call a prosperity certificate, $1. These are the terms upon which this certificate was issued by these money reformers, who would give everyone plenty so that there would be abundance in the country:

> The provincial treasurer will pay to the bearer the sum of one dollar on the expiration of two years from date of issue hereof upon presentation hereof, provided there are then attached to the back hereof one hundred and four one-cent certificate stamps.

In other words, I would have to place 104 one-cent certificate stamps on this certificate in order to redeem it. This certificate was issued August 5, 1936. If I want to spend it to-day I cannot; it will cost me 4 cents in order to give it away. We talk about theories, but this is something that was actually done. Then they come and tell us this is the way to finance this country.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are certainly doing a swell job for the war. Get on with the war.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said that we went through days of depression.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You are a good example of the whole party.

Mr. KINLEY: I hope my hon. friend is not angry. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said that there was great distress in Canada during the depression days. That is true. He also said that municipal and provincial governments had fallen down, that they had gone into default and were unable to carry on. That disease did not strike the maritimes. We are referred to as the sound money men of this country, but it seems to me that the disease referred to by the hon. member was not so prevalent in eastern Canada. Yet now we are getting advice from those who have the theory, but not the successful practice, of how to run a country without depending on the government.

This question of exchange is an important matter; and, as I said in the beginning, we in Nova Scotia have had an education in foreign trade. I want to remind hon. members that in our reciprocity agreement with the United States this was considered a matter of great concern and was embodied in article XIII of the agreement, which reads:

> If a wide variation should occur in the rate of exchange between the currencies of Canada and the United States of America, and if the government of either country should consider the variation so substantial as to prejudice the industries or commerce of that country, it shall be free to propose negotiations for the modification of this agreement: and if agreement with respect thereto is not reached within thirty days following receipt of such proposal, the government making such proposal shall be free to terminate this agreement in its entirety on thirty days' written notice.

Our financial relations with the United States are most important. We are their best customer. They are our best customer to-day, except for our shipments overseas of war supplies, and it is important that we travel along with the United States and shape our financial policies to conform as far as possible to what they do, so that we may have harmony, so that we may do business together without disrupting our agreements. Last night the hon. member for Parry Sound rather surprised me when he spoke of inflation. Let us see whom it would help. Let us suppose a man had an income of $50,000, and I assume there are people in this country with such incomes. His tax would be about $30,000. It might be better for the temporary preservation of that income if the minister would raise the money he needs through the printing press rather than by taxing it from the people, for naturally and properly the tax falls heaviest upon those who have the largest incomes.

The hon. member's argument was also subtle with regard to single and married men, especially that portion of it having to do with the refundable portion of the tax. If a man is married, has two children and an income of $3,000, his computed tax is $668, of which $334 is refundable or deductible, making a balance of $334 which he must pay. Thus he is left $2,332 to maintain his family, exclusive of his allowance for insurance premiums, superannuation or mortgage payments. On the assumption that he has insurance to pay or similar obligations to meet which will equal the deductible portion of the tax, his tax is increased by $119 over last year. Under the last budget his tax amounted to $215. A bachelor with an income of $3,000 is assessed $1,064, of which $240 is deductible, which means that, under the same conditions, his actual cost would be $824. Under the last budget the bachelor would pay $622, so that his tax is increased by $202. In private life a man does not get a larger salary when he marries. He is supposed to save while he is single, in order to be able to support a wife when he gets married; and the obligations of marriage hardly depend upon the income tax budget. This is severe and drastic taxation, but it is part of the terrible burden of this war. We must not forget that a bachelor, if he is between the ages of twenty and forty, is called to military service, which is not required of the man with a family.

I regard this compulsory saving as a splendid feature of the budget. If, in former days, a man has been doing the good thing by his family, by taking out insurance and buying a home, he is protected to an extent in these obligations, which he may deduct from his income tax. I believe this compulsory saving will do four things. In the first place it will provide funds for the carrying on of this war. In the second place the people will make fewer demands on consumer goods in this country, thereby freeing men and materials for the war effort. In the third place it is saving for a rainy day, which is always a cardinal principle of those who want to succeed. In the fourth place, the money will be invested in the safest possible place. I recall that in the province of Quebec there is an old saying, that in the course of his lifetime each man must eat a certain amount of black bread, and that he had better eat it while he has his teeth. Therefore those who save in their youth are more likely to have plenty in their old age.

We are not so much concerned with our immediate financial conditon. As yet no one has gone hungry or cold; in fact, the mass of the people are better off than they were during the depression, even with these very heavy taxes. The majority of the people of Canada have more money left for themselves than they had five years ago, except in certain exceptional cases, which in themselves prove the rule. Canada is yet able to pay her bills. The United States is the only country that will to-day redeem its obligations in gold. Canada is a gold-producing country; and while it is true that gold has been discontinued as a basis of finance in most countries, if we are going to have an international basis after the war it must be something of value and something which everybody will accept.

It seems to me that Canada, as a producer of gold, might lean a little toward the gold standard. The United States is the one country in the world that will redeem its obligations to-day. It is the one country in the world which will be a citadel of strength to pay the expenses of the war, and around that citadel Canada will be in the most prominent place. Inflation comes from fear and dire necessity, and it is quite possible that a time might come when dire necessity would drive us to the place where we could tide over the situation for a time and prevent immediate disaster, but we would certainly pay the price in the future. This, as indicated by the Minister of Finance last night, is not even thought of.

Let us get back to fundamentals. Let us think of the parable of the talents, a lesson to everybody which should not be easily forgotten. Let us remember that through the tumult of the ages all these questions were discussed and all these theories brought forward, and that it was only countries in despair and not the strong countries of the world which adopted inflation or other methods of merely temporary advantage. Canada is still a strong country. Let us hope that she will long continue to be strong, to carry on this conflict to the end, and that the people will travel that hard road which is the proper road to success. Then, when the time comes that victory crowns our banners, we shall be sound not only in a monetary sense, but in our body politic, in our ideas, in our constitution, that we shall have preserved them all and go forward to the future with courage and in a spirit of progress, in the way that the people shall direct. Then, I am convinced, this country will be greater in the future than it ever was in the past.

Mr. QUELCH: I am sure that the hon. member who has just resumed his seat will excuse me if I do not follow the line he has taken. I did not hear very much of what he said, and what I did hear did not make sense. It seems to me that he is one of those museum pieces that have been worshipping at the shrine of the golden bull, and as we know to-day, it is mostly "bull". I believe I would do better if I followed the line taken by some other members of his party, such as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) and the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght).

Before passing on, I might make reference to the "prosperity certificates" to which he refers. I could take the hon. member into Alberta and show him many, many miles of good roads which were built with those certificates, and the people who built those roads received a dollar's worth of value for a dollar's worth of work.

I had not intended to speak at this time, but in view of the fact that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) made a few references to this group I should like to present some comments on what he said.

In Hansard, July 15, at page 4270, the minister is reported as having said:

> It is all very well for the group in the corner to be talking. There are not a great many people who take them seriously. . . .

I shall not take serious exception to that remark, although I would say to the minister that I find to-day a greater number of people taking interest in monetary reform than ever before. Throughout the country people are asking themselves whether a financial system can be sound which compels people to remain unemployed in times of peace and yet can find billions of dollars in times of war. I do not think our men when they return from the war, or those who are discharged from factories, will be willing to remain in the ranks of the unemployed or on relief just because the Minister of Finance says there is no money available to put them to work.

As I have said, I do not take serious exception to his remark because I realize that the press of this country to a very large extent is owned and controlled by large financial syndicates or by individuals of large financial means, and ever since this group came to this house the press have tried on every possible occasion to discredit us and to misrepresent what we have said. In view of the fact that the people throughout the country depend very largely on the press for their knowledge of financial matters, it is only natural that these people should not be seriously impressed by what the press has said that we have said.

In so far as the members of the Liberal party are concerned, of course they are not faced with that difficulty; other ways and means are found of dealing with them. Members of the Liberal party are dissuaded from criticizing the financial policy of the government in this house. We have had plenty of examples of Liberal members in the past criticizing the financial policy of the government for one year, or two years, and then suddenly becoming silent, so that it was not necessary for the press to criticize those members. No doubt, however, from a high sense of patriotism, the hon. member for Parry Sound and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard felt obliged to protest a continuation of the government's present financial policy, because they know very well that in its operation since the beginning of the war it has seriously retarded our war effort in many respects. Therefore, no matter what the consequences might be so far as they are concerned, they felt it necessary to rise in their places and criticize the continuation of that sort of policy.

I recall speeches made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard in this chamber during 1936, 1937 and 1938. I believe that in 1938 he made one short speech, which was the last he made on this question until to-day. A statement of his on that last occasion is well worth remembering. He closed by remarking that members of this house should do all they could to guide the Department of Finance out of that swamp of financial ignorance in which it seemed to be lost. Can we blame the hon. member for having made that statement when we recall that from 1935 to 1939 we allowed industry in this country to remain in a state of stagnation; that we allowed half a million men to remain unemployed, roving across this country looking for work; that our shipyards remained idle, and that the defences of this country were not built up in spite of the fact that we knew that Germany, Italy and Japan were steadily arming? Is it any wonder that people lose confidence in a policy which allows a condition of that kind to remain in existence?

From 1934 to 1939 we maintained in this country a favourable balance of payments averaging $218,000,000 a year. Yet at the same time Germany, Japan and Italy were steadily building up their armaments. In order to maintain that favourable balance of payments we shipped large quantities of war materials to those countries.

The Minister of Finance and his predecessor continually criticized the proposals of this group. I should like to remind the minister that step by step he is having to adopt many of the proposals which we made in the past and which he himself ridiculed. When he becomes so dogmatic in this house he should recall that fact. For instance, I have in mind the matter of price control. I referred to this once before, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has referred to it. When we were urging the greatest development possible of our natural resources and stressing the fact that it would be necessary to have price control in order to prevent inflation, the Minister of Finance ridiculed the idea. He said it would not be practicable to try to put price control into operation; that it could be done only if we had a spy in every grocery store; that we would require a gestapo. To-day we have price control in this country. Therefore I say again that he should not be so dogmatic when he is criticizing our proposals, because it is likely that he will some day be doing the very things he is criticizing to-day.

We have often urged upon the minister the desirability of subsidizing industry so that it might sell below the cost of production. In the years from 1935 to 1939 we found it very hard to maintain an effective demand against our production, and we urged the government to put the unemployed to work and give industry a subsidy so that it could sell below the cost of production in order to balance consumption with production. The minister criticized such a policy as being crude inflation; yet only the other day in this house he stated that the policy of subsidizing industry to sell below the cost of production was an insurance against inflation. Step by step the minister is having to retract his statements and adopt the proposals that we have urged in the past.

This budget imposes a tremendous burden of taxation upon the people of this country. This group has admitted consistently in this house that it is necessary to maintain heavy taxation during war time in order to make more production available for war purposes. On the other hand it is well to realize that taxation should not be so heavy that the standard of living of the people is reduced to such a point that their efficiency is thereby reduced. I believe that in some regards taxation to-day has approached that point. When we read that certain married women are resigning their jobs because they cannot afford to work under this heavy taxation, it looks as though we have increased taxation to the point where we are decreasing the efficiency of the people.

We have always opposed heavy taxation in peace time, because we realized then, as apparently the government only realizes now, that taxation does curtail consumption, does curtail the demand against goods. In peace time our main problem is to maintain an effective demand against production; our main problem is to find a market for goods so that, naturally, it is not a sound policy to maintain heavy taxation, thereby reducing the demand against goods. But an entirely different situation faces us to-day. When the minister attacks us on the ground that we are opposed to taxation he forgets that there is a war on to-day and that we advocate heavy taxation in times of war.

The minister has stressed the fact that the main purpose of taxation and the sale of bonds is to curtail the spending power of the people, and he has stated that this taxation should be based upon the ability to pay, always keeping in mind the ideal of equality of service and sacrifice. I am of the opinion that this budget definitely defeats that principle. The minister has continually warned this house against the danger of inflation, and yet by this budget he is bringing about inflation in the price of many commodities. The minister has attacked the method of withdrawing purchasing power from circulation by increasing prices, on the ground that that method is not fair, but he is doing that very thing with the war revenue taxes. Not only has he withdrawn purchasing power from the people, but he has imposed a tax of 30 per cent on candies in order to withdraw the purchasing power of our children. I think that must be regarded as a most detestable form of tax.

At the outbreak of this war we stressed the need for equality of service and sacrifice. In September, 1939, we stated that if people could go through this war and maintain their pre-war savings intact, continue to have a decent standard of living and be able to set aside a little for a rainy day, they should consider themselves most fortunate. Mr. Nash, the former minister of finance of New Zealand, expressed similar sentiments when he said that the man who goes overseas should not be any worse off for having gone overseas, and the man who stays home should not be any better off as a result of staying at home. As a result of the minister's financial policy; as a result of this budget, we find that many people who stayed at home are accumulating large holdings of bonds. It is not equality of sacrifice and service when, on the one hand, you have men going overseas and giving up their lives and, on the other hand, men staying at home and accumulating large holdings of bonds which will be a claim against future production. The hoardings we see across the country are positively nauseating. We see placards saying: "We are all in the front line now; buy more war savings certificates." Is it not insulting our front-line men to suggest that the man who stays at home and buys war savings certificates is in the front line?

If the minister is really sincere in his desire to reduce the purchasing power of the people by taxation and the sale of bonds, I would ask him why it is that the chartered banks should be allowed, to create hundreds of millions of dollars in order to lend money to people in order to buy bonds? If the purpose of the sale of bonds is to withdraw purchasing power from circulation, why do we allow the chartered banks to create money to permit people to buy those bonds, thereby defeating the very thing the issue of bonds is supposed to accomplish? In the past two years the chartered banks have lent more than $350,000,000 to the people for that very purpose; and since the declaration of war they have lent directly and indirectly, to the government in the neighbourhood of one billion dollars; around $660,000,000 directly, and $350,000,000 through the people.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has not a lot of that latter amount, the $350,000,000, been paid off?

Mr. QUELCH: Some may have been, but on the other hand the banks are buying bonds from the people which will largely counteract that. I am satisfied that as this taxation increases, and the burden imposed upon the people becomes heavier, more and more people will be taking their bonds to the banks and cashing them, and at the end of the war, the banks will, I am sure, have very large holdings of these bonds. That happened in the last war, and it will happen in this war, because when you impose taxation to a point where it becomes almost impossible for a person to live, then, naturally, if he has in his possession any bonds, he will have to sell them.

The minister talks about the danger of inflation when we utilize the Bank of Canada. Ever since the declaration of war we have consistently taken the stand, that to the extent that the proceeds from taxation and the sale of war savings certificates fail to provide the money which the government requires to meet its expenditures, the Bank of Canada should be utilized. The minister attacks this proposal on the ground that to utilize the Bank of Canada is more inflationary than to use the chartered banks. He gave that reply to the hon. member for Parry Sound last night, and I was very much surprised that the Minister of Finance should again trot out that hoary old reason which his predecessor, Mr. Dunning, used to give when we made this proposal. All that the Minister of Finance is doing when he makes that declaration is this: He is frankly admitting that we have no effective control of the chartered banks to-day because, if we had, they would not be able to expand their loans on the basis of the money issued by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member knows the answer to that.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not, and I shall be very glad if the minister will give me the answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is suggesting that we insist on a 100 per cent reserve so that the cash reserve cannot be multiplied into a greater volume of bank deposits. That is the suggestion, is it not?

Mr. QUELCH: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, if the chartered banks could only lend as much as their cash reserve, it would mean that they would be conducting business at a loss, because the money would go back into the chartered banks and interest would be payable by the chartered banks to the depositors. The banks would have to discontinue paying interest, and therefore what my hon. friend is suggesting is a tax either upon depositors or upon shareholders, or upon both. If we are going to impose a tax upon depositors or upon shareholders, or upon both, we might just as well impose that tax directly. That would be a much fairer and more straightforward way of doing it than the way he suggests. He is merely suggesting, for that is what it amounts to, further taxation of an indirect kind when he suggests that we insist on a 100 per cent reserve.

Mr. QUELCH: In the old days when you deposited your money with a bank, you paid the bank for looking after that money, and the people who get this service are the people who should pay for the service. It would not be taxation but a legitimate service charge.

Mr. ILSLEY: Call it anything you like.

Mr. QUELCH: But the people who do not have any money in the bank would not have to pay any part of that charge.

I might quote to the minister what Irving Fisher says in that regard but no doubt the minister would reply to me as Mr. Dunning did, "Oh, Irving Fisher!" Mr. Dunning was very much interested in Babson's reports and was continually quoting from them. Let me quote what Babson's have to say. In their March 20, 1939, issue, Babson's devote a whole page to advocating the 100 per cent system, and they have this to say:

> Lest anyone may think that the 100 per cent reserve system would be injurious to the banks, it should be emphasized that the banks would gain, quite as truly as the government and the people in general. Government control of the money supply would save the banks from themselves—from the uncoordinated action of some 15,000 independent banks, manufacturing and destroying our checkbook money, in a haphazard way.

I realize that that does not apply to the same extent in Canada because we have not quite the same banking situation, but otherwise the statement would apply quite well here.

Perhaps I should quote what Irving Fisher has to say, because, mind you, his proposal was endorsed by a large number of prominent bankers of the United States. This is what he has to say:

> So far as this change to the 100 per cent system would deprive the bank of earning assets and require it to substitute an increased amount of non-earning cash, the bank would be reimbursed through the service charge made to its depositors.

Apparently the banks themselves do not take any great exception to such a proposal. As I said to the minister on the last occasion on which I spoke on this question, personally I am not overenthusiastic about the 100 per cent system, but I refer to it because the majority of monetary reformers in the country are in favour of the 100 per cent system. While I agree that it can adequately control inflation, I do not believe that it can adequately control deflation. I am of the opinion that the only fair and sound way to deal with the whole question of effective control is to nationalize the chartered banks of Canada.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then what would happen?

Mr. QUELCH: The chartered banks would be under the effective control of the Bank of Canada and would be controlling the finances of the country for the benefit of the people as a whole. In so far as the charge that the government would be in the lending business is concerned, the chartered banks would be under the control of the Bank of Canada, and the minister has himself stated that the government does not interfere with the internal administration of the Bank of Canada. Therefore we would not be interfering with the administration of the chartered banks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How would that bring paradise?

Mr. QUELCH: The chartered banks have found it profitable to bring about inflation and then deflation, and they have made more money out of that process than out of service charges. It pays them to manipulate prices, and they can make money both ways. When they bring about deflation they can buy stocks at deflated prices, and by bringing about inflation they can sell stocks at inflated prices.

I should just like to quote what Mr. Nash had to say in regard to this question. I asked Mr. Nash, formerly minister of finance of New Zealand, when he appeared before the reconstruction committee, this question:

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if Mr. Nash would tell us what method of financing is used when taxation and public borrowings fail to meet government expenditures?

Mr. Nash replied:

Hon. Mr. Nash: Well, the answer is inside a simple statement I made once in introducing the budget. If in connection with the production of the commodities that are necessary for ordinary human welfare the monetary means are not available to link unused resources with unused labour we, as a government, will find the money. We can do that because we are in control of the reserve bank; we can create our own money.

I should like to commend that statement especially to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), because I remember that some time ago when I was stressing the fact that the Bank of Canada should create money, he took exception and said that in New Zealand they created credit. I pointed out at the time that so far as the Bank of Canada or the Federal Reserve Bank of New Zealand were concerned, it makes no difference whether you use the term "credit" or "money" because they are both legal tender. Mr. Nash in his reply said that in New Zealand they can create their own money; he did not use the term "credit".

Mr. COLDWELL: Money against consumer goods.

Mr. QUELCH: There would be no sense in issuing money unless you had the goods to back it up. In peace time we had half a million men unemployed. We had industry running only at a small percentage of capacity, and we advocated—it was all that we ever advocated—that the Bank of Canada should issue money to put these men to work, so that the money paid out in these public works would create a demand against the goods which our industries could produce but were not producing. In addition to that, we had a favourable balance of payments of $219,000,000, and the only reason why goods were not being imported into the country to balance exports was that the importers knew that if they did bring them in they could not sell them. I asked this question of Mr. Towers when he was before the banking committee: In view of the fact that we had a favourable balance of payments to the extent of $200,000,000, is there any reason why we could not issue $200,000,000 and put people to work so that that money paid out would create a demand for imports that had been paid for but not brought in? He said that was a matter of government policy. There was nothing to prevent it, but apparently it was not considered an ideal policy by government.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard said last night that there had been considerable hoarding of gold. That was not altogether the reason, because we had repatriated a great deal of the debt at that time. About twenty years ago a large percentage of the debt was owned externally, and to-day only a small percentage of the national debt is so owned. That is a worthy course to follow, but no country is justified in trying to repay external debt at such a rate that it causes extreme poverty within the country itself. Under such a policy, if we were to utilize the Bank of Canada at all times when it becomes necessary to have a creation of credit—I am advocating it only to the extent that taxation and the sale of interest-free savings certificates might fail to meet government expenditures—the money so created should be created by the Bank of Canada and not by the chartered banks. Not only would the result of that policy be a reduction in debt, but it would mean that our war effort would no longer be restricted. The minister stated the other day that no other nation has adopted such a policy. I have already quoted the statement by Mr. Nash to the effect that when taxation, and the borrowings of the savings of the people fail to meet government expenditures they do create money. Therefore apparently New Zealand is doing the very thing we are advocating at this time. The Minister of Finance made a specific reference to Germany. To make sure that I quote him fairly I will give his exact words, which will be found at page 4271 of Hansard:

But Germany at the present time is not relying on this method of financing. Germany has a tremendous heavy taxation load on its people and is borrowing from them to relieve the upward pressure on its price ceiling.

Some time ago I quoted a statement by Dr. Schacht, president of the Reichsbank, that Germany had had a very happy creation of state money for the purpose of developing the resources of the country. That was up to 1939, and I have often wondered exactly what the situation in Germany is to-day, because, no matter how we may dislike the type of government in that country, we must admit that as a fighting nation they are hard to beat. It is interesting to note what type of financial policy has been evolved in order to develop that fighting machine. Let me quote from the London Times. No one will say that is radical. The London Times is an orthodox paper. In the April 2, 1942, issue of the Western Producer there is a quotation from the London Times with reference to Germany, as follows:

"The achievement has been so surprising that for a long time outside critics were inclined to regard it as an optical illusion." So far, it says, Germany "seems to have had no serious difficulty in financing the war. Nothing is ever heard of the necessity for increasing taxation, compulsory saving, or the issue of enormous war loans. Quite the contrary. Recently one important tax was abolished.

"Public savings banks deposits touched new monthly records again and again. Money is so plentiful that the interest on state loans could recently be reduced. . . . Hitler seems to have discovered the secret of making something out of nothing and to have evolved a system based on perpetual motion." These changes, says the Times, "may well call for drastic readjustments in our established conventions."

"In military matters," the Times goes on, "the French general staff enjoyed a prestige similar to that of our own authorities in finance and business. A hidebound persistence—

I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to take particular notice of that expression.

"A hidebound persistence," continues the voice of doom, "in methods and doctrines which were sound fifty years ago may easily prove as costly in the financial and economic field as in the field of actual war. It might not lose the war; it would almost certainly lose the peace."

"We should study the nazis' achievement," concludes the Times, "prepared to adopt whatever may be useful in it and to take warning from its mistakes."

The leader of the opposition stated that to adopt such proposals as were mentioned by the member for Parry Sound would blow the lid off. I should like to remind the leader of the opposition that, according to the London Times, Germany is using that type of financing and is blowing us off the map foot by foot, step by step, and that unless we change our ways and change them quickly the Germans are likely to blow the top off us.

The budget faces a deficit of $1,850,000,000. I am especially interested in knowing how that deficit is going to be met. There is no doubt in my mind that a very large proportion of it will be met by the creation of money, and I am hoping that when that money is created it will be created by the Bank of Canada instead of by the chartered banks. Let me refer to a rumour that is going around. I know that perhaps the minister will say, "You should not take notice of rumours". Nevertheless, I saw this one in one of the Ottawa papers, and I hope the minister will immediately take steps to refute it. The rumour is that the next issue of bonds will be on the basis of 2 per cent, tax free. Is there any justification for that rumour at all?

Mr. ILSLEY: I never heard the rumour. It is entirely unauthorized.

Mr. QUELCH: I am glad to hear the minister deny that there is any such intention because, if that were done, it would mean that wealthy individuals, in order to evade a very high rate of taxation, could invest their money in 2 per cent, tax-free bonds and escape taxation altogether. It would be a most unjust proposal.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman need not tell me that.

Mr. QUELCH: I am glad to hear the minister deny it because very often these rumours we hear have a strange way of materializing. At any rate it was in one of the Ottawa papers three nights ago, the Ottawa Citizen, I believe. The statement was that it came on good authority, but it was not an editorial. It was a letter written to the Citizen by a certain individual in Toronto who claimed it was based on good authority.

The Minister of Finance does not seem greatly perturbed over the tremendous increase in debt that is taking place at the present time. It is easy to understand why the minister should adopt this attitude, because the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Graham Towers, has taken the stand that national debt is a national asset. I want to be fair, and therefore I will quote his exact statement. This question was asked Mr. Towers by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer):

Q. Is it possible for you to imagine any way by which we are ever going to pay the debt we have got?

Mr. Towers' reply was:

As the debts of the government are an asset of the Canadian people I do not see much point in the thing, except that, to the extent that the government thinks that the distribution of those assets of the Canadian people—which are its debt—is unsatisfactory, it may take steps to remedy that distribution in any way that lies within the legislative power; in fact, in any way, I suppose—by income tax or succession duties or any other action it cares to take.

Generally speaking, I would agree with that statement. So long as we have made up our minds to continue under the debt-creating system, then national debt can be looked upon as a national asset so long as you have an equitable distribution of that debt. If everyone had the same amount, so that he would have an asset to balance the liability, everyone would be taxed to pay a similar amount to that which he received. Exactly the same thing could be accomplished by wiping the whole thing out.

Unfortunately that is not the situation in Canada. A comparatively small number of people own that national debt which is said to be a national asset. Therefore those few people receive the interest on that debt, while the whole of the people of Canada have to be taxed to pay it. In other words, it is a levy on the whole of the people of Canada in order to pay a comparatively few. This budget makes no attempt whatsoever to rectify that condition.

Let me give a few examples of what might be done. People in the low income brackets should, in my opinion, have the total amount of their tax refunded; single people up to, say $1,000; married people up to, say $1,500 should have the total amount of the tax refunded, thereby giving them a share of this national debt. Where wages are frozen at low levels the wages could be increased in the form of deferred savings, thereby giving those people a share of the national debt. When prices of primary products were frozen at a level below cost of production, the difference between the prices received and the parity price could be made up by war savings certificates, thereby giving the farmers of this country a share of the national debt. If we are going to look upon the national debt as a national asset, surely it is high time we did everything in our power to bring about a fairer distribution of that debt which some people refer to as an asset.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Ross, Calgary East): The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to say something on behalf of the main income tax paying city in the Dominion of Canada, a city which in the years before the war paid between 28 and 29 per cent of the total income tax payments of this country. I have a great deal of respect for the hon. gentlemen to my left. They are a very sincere body of men; they have a right to express their views as they have done on many occasions, and they present their case with some ability.

Let us look at the facts of this budget. Since this income tax resolution has been reached, there has been nothing but a hymn of praise and a hallelujah chorus for the budget. I am one who believes that criticism of the budget is a wise and sensible course to pursue. I do not believe the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is going to make any cuckoo-land out of this country by his budget. Far from it. I come from a city where I saw the sufferings during the last war and this and the long depression among industrial workers. Toronto sent nearly 56,000 men to the great war, and then along came depression and another war. I represent an industrial riding of an industrial city and a city which stands at the top in the dominion as far as payment of taxation goes.

Let us look at some of the principles on which this budget is founded, particularly the income tax part. The minister made a very strong appeal last night in connection with inflation. I say to him that before the people of Canada get through with this budget and with all the boards of control the government have appointed over parliament's head they will have inflation. What is inflation? The high cost of living in war which affects the working class of the country is popularly called inflation by some, although technically it is not. There are many phases and types of it. Speaking as a citizen I wish to say something about the way in which orthodox principles have been upset, not only in finance but in taxation and everything else, by the present Minister of Finance and by the government since this war started. There is nothing orthodox left in our land or any land in the world to-day, either in military affairs on land, sea, in the air or in anything else. The people of Germany believed might is right, but I believe that is wrong. Might plus right is right in my opinion. If we do not win this war, all our talk on inflation and budgets is unimportant. The war is Canada's only business until it is won.

What is the present policy of the government? Canada is no doubt the highest taxed country in the world. We have overgovernment and overtaxation by different bodies, dominion, provincial and municipal, carved out by the fathers of confederation for political, not economic purposes, with the result that this country has been suffering an untold burden of taxation without any system of control ever since confederation.

The minister, in his budget, forgets all about it. He forgets that in England the income tax clauses were not raised because they were prohibitive. They have no sales tax there. Sir Kingsley Wood was forced by public opinion unwillingly to admit that other sources and ways of taxation would have to be developed during this war. Therefore he has upset all orthodox doctrines in his budget as a result of all orthodox doctrines being thrown into the waste-paper basket by those who believe that might is right. The United States has no sales tax either. A comparison was made by an evening paper the other night of the income tax levies of Canada, Britain and the United States, and they forgot that. They cannot fool the working class of this country.

The two old parties are on trial at the present time with regard to this budget. I am not going to sit silent here. I am a member of the opposition, but I do not represent the opposition; I express my own views. I believe it is the duty of the opposition to tell the Minister of Finance that he is on the wrong ground, first, last and always, in regard to this system of taxation which, in my opinion, is, for the small man, the retailer, and the wholesale man, nothing but confiscation of property.

The minister has embarked upon a wide campaign and excursion into state socialism and regimentation. Look at the control boards he has appointed here in Ottawa. At a Rotary club luncheon a certain gentleman, Mr. Elliott Little, last Monday announced over the head of this parliament while we are in session a system of control calling up 250,000 men, which has practically abolished parliamentary institutions. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) should be interested in that, because he comes from an industrial area himself. The system enunciated by Mr. Little will mean the regimentation of labour all over Canada, with 250,000 men to be found within the next few months. Where will they come from? They will be taken out of industry and trade and made subject to regimentation, with no definition of what is a war industry, with no provision for anyone to replace them, or whether they will help in war work or do a thing to beat Hitler. Then they are going to register the women as well, and we are to have a women's army. Many persons so taken will walk the streets, and with absenteeism in industry will do little. With all these registrations it is no wonder we have a budget like this presented. Since the war began, we have six or eight or nine different registrations and regimentation for everyone from the time he is born until the time he dies. That is inflation of another kind, which is causing untold suffering in this country, and mostly not for war at all.

I believe too much money is being taken from the taxpayer, and the taxpayer wants to know whether or not all this money is being spent for war purposes. I could name thirty instances of large sums of money, ranging from $1,500,000 to $6,000,000, not spent for the winning of the war. We spent $6,000,000 for the League of Nations. We spent $1,500,000 for the taking of a useless plebiscite, pure political manoeuvring, which has occupied the time of this house off and on since last January.

All these control agencies started off in a minor way. When I asked the minister before Easter about this price ceiling he did not know what it would cost. Then during the Easter recess Mr. Gordon went to Winnipeg and announced that the cost of the ceiling would be $2,000,000. Later on, the minister announced for next year the estimated figure of $50,000,000, or $14,000,000 more than the Tupper government spent in 1896, the year it went out of office. The Minister of Finance is spending a mint of money like water, with no adequate control and no attempt at economy. I can find no economy anywhere in the budget. You have to see the cause and effect of it all. The victory loans and war savings certificates campaigns cost from a point to a point and a half too much, and I do not wonder at some of the complaints that have been made by my hon. friends to the left. The cost of those loans was too great; the commissions to brokers were too high—entertainments, dinners, hotel and travelling expenses, and all that sort of thing. Too much money is being taken from the taxpayer. In the budget too much money is being charged to income and not enough to capital. The minister and his advisers forget that this generation is suffering in flesh and blood, as the last generation had to suffer in the last war, and I believe that posterity should be given a chance to pay part of the cost of this huge war effort, because they will reap the benefit of it.

This is purely a Washington budget, Mr. Chairman. Let me give you the seven points in the budget of Mr. Morgenthau and Mr. Roosevelt: first, that corporation earnings must be taxed heavily; second, that ceilings on prices must be maintained; third, that remuneration for work done must be stabilized; fourth, that prices received by farmers must be stabilized; fifth, that all citizens should buy war bonds and that there shall be compulsory saving—that is where our idea came from, but when these taxes are paid there will be nothing for the people to save—sixth, that scarce commodities must be rationed, and seventh, that buying on credit must be discouraged and repayment of debts and mortgages encouraged. Those are the seven points of the United States budget. They give the objective there for the coming twelve months, in war and in peace, and for civilian workers as well. In our budget, however, I can find no objectives for the coming year. The minister is just spending money right and left, taking too much from those who pay income tax, bringing the low salaried man under it, and creating conditions in industry, trade and commerce, and among retailers and small wholesalers which will bring about wide unemployment in Canada, complete regimentation and the absolute ruin of private retail and wholesale business. Those seem to be the objectives, and that policy also has been announced by the controllers, the sub-controllers, the dreamers and the controllers with schemes, who have been foisted upon the government of this country while parliament was in session, over our heads, and over whom we have no control at all, and who spend what they like.

Who are paying this income tax? It is being paid largely by the industrial workers of the two central provinces. They are the people who are going to be hit again, as they have been hit every time since the war started. First of all you talk about your orthodox methods in the budget, but look at the way in which the government has robbed the municipalities and the provinces of their revenues, by coercion, by seizing the income tax which until 1917 was the exclusive field of the municipalities, and then letting them have part of it back. This government is upsetting the whole basis of confederation. The provinces have had their revenues taken away, and therefore we might as well abolish the basis of confederation itself, and abolish municipal and provincial institutions. There is no such thing as an orthodox method at the present time. A great deal was said yesterday and to-day on the question of money. You would think the battle against Hitler was going to be won in this house by an academic discussion—it is nothing more—about the functions of money and the basis of credit. Such a discussion is regrettable, because I do not believe any drastic economic changes can be made while the war lasts. I am not one of those who believe in a new utopia to come after the war, but I do say that the present banking and economic system of this country has not functioned as it should during the war, which is one reason why it is being criticized so heavily to-day.

I have nothing against the present Minister of Finance. He is a very hard worker and painstaking. I have a great deal of regard and respect for him, though I do not know him very well except as I see him across the floor of the chamber. From what I have seen he has been a very hard working member of the government, though I do not always agree with everything he says. It has seemed to me, however, that a lawyer is not the proper person for a Minister of Finance, and there is no disparagement in that because I made the same statement ten years ago. The whole training of a lawyer is against him when he becomes Minister of Finance, because he studies briefs, and he has to rely on his assistants and advisers almost entirely. A lawyer is not trained for the vexed problems of the functions of money or systems of credit. There was one great Minister of Finance, Mr. Robb, who was a working-class man; who, as he said in one budget speech, went to work in a mill when he was eight years of age. He was a very able and painstaking Minister of Finance; he sympathized with those who paid the taxes and labour and the farmer and industry, and did all he could to remedy conditions in the country with regard to both capital and labour. Lawyers are all right in their way, but I think they are out of their proper sphere when they dabble in finance. That has been made evident by some of the lawyers we have seen in this house. Look at England. During the seven years' war, the great Napoleonic wars and the hundred years' war, the two Pitts were not lawyers. Burke and Fox were not lawyers, and they handled financial matters. George Canning, one of the greatest chancellors of the exchequer, who kept Britain out of Europe's wars for fifty years, was not a lawyer, nor Palmerston. John Bright was not a lawyer, Disraeli was not a lawyer. Gladstone, a chancellor, was not a lawyer. Mr. Neville Chamberlain was not a lawyer but a plain business man, nor Mr. Churchill, nor Baldwin, nor Bonar Law—all chancellors.

The country cannot stand these high taxes much longer. Look at the great upward increases that have been made in the income tax schedules. The government seems to have forgotten all about those who are dependent upon others for a living, those who are physically unfit, the halt, lame and blind, the aged people and soldiers' dependents who cannot go on relief. The municipality will not give them relief; the province will not give them relief, and it is and always was a federal burden. The dominion should shoulder the whole cost in war time of these people driven to the wall. It should look after the sick and aid the suffering, and not leave that to relatives who have enough to do to pay their own taxes, and who haxe worked hard all their lives.

I am surprised that the present Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gibson), who represents an Ontario seat, in the Toronto district, does not know these things, and does not protect the toilers and workers of industrial cities like Toronto, Hamilton, London, and Windsor, from this confiscatory budget. I happen to know that when others occupied the office he holds they asserted their rights; they did not allow themselves to be used by a lot of people in another department, that of finance, who are nothing but theorists. That is the trouble with a lawyer in a department like that; he relies too much on his assistants. Here is the budget, and what have we? I doubt if there is one man trained in actual finance in the whole department. There are many men of great ability, like one of the two gentlemen who sit in front of the Mininster of Finance to-night, Mr. Fraser Elliott, a man whom you could not replace for a great deal of money. These men are among the best officials we have, and I doubt whether there is a higher class of civil servants in any other country. If their more moderate economic views were more generally accepted by the minister of the day, who is there to-day and away to-morrow, we would get a better budget altogether and not an income tax beyond all bounds.

When the tumult and the shouting dies; when the captains and the kings of this financial budget depart; when this new-born financial scheme, this budget, has reached its maturity, what will the harvest be? It will mean that the small retailer will have to quit, that the owner of a little property—a small mill, a few cows, a little store—the dealer and the artisan, the men who have borne the heat of the day and worked all their lives, will, through the inequalities of this budget, be put out of business altogether. I have received many letters in the past few days from Toronto. Here is one from a poor working man, who would lose his job if his name were known:

> I am going to lose my home through the new income tax. My boy loses his schooling. Can't you persuade the government to give a larger exemption and to not put the increases in effect till August 1st, instead of making them retroactive to January? I write to you because you are said to be the small fellow's friend.

This is typical of the case of many hard-working men in Toronto who have spent their lives in trying to make a living. During the depression many of them were driven to the wall. Some served in the great war.

I have urged that we should have a fixed date for a budget, as large institutions do; also there should be a committee of ways and means such as they have in Washington. If we had such a committee to consider all these inequalities in the income tax sections of the budget—two pages of them—they would make a better budget, by eliminating inequalities and all that kind of thing, than the budget as presented by the minister. Remember that this war may last seven years. There may be seven war budgets. What are we going to do about it? Is everybody going to work for the government? Is everybody going to have a job at so much a week in the public service by state socialism and complete regimentation? Are all those qualities of thrift, of saving, of initiative which made Canada, those qualities which made this empire great, which raised Britain to the position of the market of the world, which made the United States what it is, which developed Canada in those earlier days when everybody owned some property, the days of Macdonald, Cartier and Laurier, now to be taken away by budgets and controls and sub-controls and all that kind of thing?

There are a great many inequalities, inconsistencies, injustices and cruel wrongs in the income tax and these sky-high resolutions. First, there is the raising of the rates. If you make comparisons with Great Britain and the United States, allowing for overgovernment and its effects on taxation, it will be found that the rates imposed in Canada are the highest that any country has ever paid in the history of mankind. We have a huge sales tax; the other two countries have none. No country can stand it; the taxpayer is going to be driven to the wall and put out of business. I know there has been a great chorus of approval from the press, the paid workers, the victory loan people and others of that ilk, including two or three regiments of paid artillery, cavalry and infantry of control talkers and speakers at luncheons, who are backing up the controls of the present minister and being well paid for it. But in the hearts of the people at home in the constituencies you will find much more knowledge than some of us have who sit here, as to how this budget affects them and will affect their children and their children's children, and the values of property, and property rights which have been rights since the creation of the world. Let me say to the authors of this budget that the right to possess private property is not derived from man; it is derived from nature, and the state has no right to abolish it, but only to regulate its use.

Look over this budget and where will you find evidence of economy? One-half of the money is supposed to be used for war purposes, but under this budget things are being done in the name of the war which do not amount to war at all, which do not amount to an iota toward the defeat of Hitler. One has to consider cause and effect in relation to the income tax, and the reasons for it are the unpreparedness of Canada and the misjudgment, by some who are the authors of this budget, of the whole world war situation.

What is there in the budget for the relief workers, for the aged, the infirm, the physically unfit? Those who have borne the heat and burden of the day are disregarded; and the soldier is the forgotten man of the whole thing. The minister, as I have read his address and special pleading here, has never had sympathy for the soldier. Since I came to this house I never heard him say one good word about equality of treatment for soldiers as compared with civilians. Is it the theory of the budget that a man who enlists loses his civilian rights, his right to adequate pay, while this country is spending four million dollars a day, and is going to spend ten million dollars a day in the coming year—far more in one week than was spent in the whole year 1896? Soldiers' families have to live, and they cannot live properly without a cost-of-living bonus and removal of the inequalities in the pay of the forces.

The minister has forgotten many things in connection with this budget—the housing question, a national fuel supply, a national moratorium, interest reduction, and many other things which would create work so that the toilers could earn a living.

The minister talks about shooting holes through the budget. I can tell you one agency which is doing a lot of shooting holes in the budget—the very people whom the minister represents in this house. He as a minister of the crown is responsible for all these controls and sub-controls and commissions which have been appointed, and these are the people who are shooting holes in the budget and crippling the ability of the taxpayer to provide money for all the schemes which have been proposed in this connection, and are not doing a snap of the fingers to help win the war.

The application of these exemptions omits all consideration for the sick, for those who are physically incapacitated, and there is no use in their going on relief. The minister has not even considered the ability of the people to pay. Mr. Churchill, not a lawyer, who was himself once chancellor of the exchequer, said on April 13, 1939:

> I know very well the patriotism and sincere desire to act in a manner of perfect rectitude which animates ministers of the crown,—

He was speaking about the preparation of the budget.

> —but I wonder whether there is not some hand which intervenes and filters down or withholds intelligence from ministers.

The people want to know whether all the extra money that is to be raised by these income taxes and the budget is to be spent for war. The people want the money that is raised for the war to go for the war, and not to be diverted to civilian purposes and frittered away so lavishly on price ceilings. They want the war vigorously and effectively carried on, and there would be no objection from a single taxpayer, rich or poor, high or low, if he could be assured that there was going to be an honest dollar expenditure for the prosecution of the war from every honest dollar of taxation raised by this budget.

Talk about the conscription of wealth! This budget will mean that from one-third to one-half of the people who in the last war and in this war have contributed to victory loans and war savings certificates will no longer be able to buy bonds and war savings certificates. The income tax features of the budget will cause widespread unemployment and the utter collapse of many businesses, large and small. It is leading to regimentation and state socialism.

The income tax schedules are unjust and unfair. The whole budget is just a gesture toward state socialism. Talk of the conscription of wealth! I do not know anybody who has any wealth, because the rich man has all his income taken away by this budget, and I do not know where the poor man is going to be after the government has taxed his income as this budget proposes to do. There will be wholesale conscription of the property and income of the small retail merchant. The small retailers and some wholesalers also were told to get out of business by Mr. Little and by Mr. Gordon, when Mr. Gordon was speaking in Montreal and Mr. Little in Ottawa and Toronto. Mr. Gordon warned them that they would have to close up because they could not get the materials, and all that kind of thing. If all this regimentation and control were going to do anything to help beat Hitler, there would not be one word of complaint. But they are not.

Great Britain has passed an act which is contrary to this whole budget. They tried unsuccessfully to control business over there, but what are they doing now? The House of Lords has passed a bill called the Pre-War Trade Practices Act to put the small retailer and the small wholesaler back to where they were before and give them a chance to live. The legislation was initiated in the British House of Commons and is now law.

I am a Conservative and have never been anything else, but I tell you this, Mr. Chairman, that the financial system of this country has never been tested as it is being tested now. I am a believer in sound money, but there is no such thing as sound money when Hitler is at the gate. Right is might, is the old saying, but might plus right is right. This budget in itself will do quite a bit to shoot holes through the attempt to check inflation, and inflation is a danger; but by using wrong methods we are defeating its uses and objectives.

National currency has been mentioned. I do not believe that the Bank of Canada is doing what it should do in this war. It could handle lots of this control business without any cost to the taxpayer, instead of the prices and other boards opening up offices all over Canada, with a useless duplication of services by a lot of figureheads, because that is what many of them are. I see some of their work in the riding in which I live. You cannot get a prescription refilled at a drug store. I have had throat trouble for three weeks, and I could not get a prescription refilled at a drug store, without a new prescription, simply because of this control policy in connection with the retail trade. I tried to get information in the Toronto district about this from one of the department store chiefs who are serving two spheres and two masters in helping to administer this control system, but he referred me to the chairman who would not even reply. You cannot get goods delivered now by a store unless you buy a dollar's worth, but often you have to spend $2 to $2.25 on goods you do not want, in order to get deliveries, and a large number of children who used to deliver parcels from drug stores have been put out of work. That is the kind of control and inflation that goes on unchecked, and then you talk about control.

If a committee of ways and means went into this budget they would find, on checking it over, that half or a third of the money that is to be raised by it will not amount to a snap of the finger in beating Hitler.

We could not qualify as a country under the lease-lend bill, under which help is being given to Greece, Australia, part of France and many other countries. Is there any reason why we should not qualify? After Dunkirk, for two years the British fleet protected the shores of America, and we could have qualified under the lease-lend bill for a large part of the capital expenditure that is being made. If we were to count up what we are spending to protect America's shores, if she is attacked, the defence board's work was very largely wasted.

Then we have useless embassies, and publicity departments in the United States that are not worth a 5-cent piece. Britain put on a publicity campaign for nearly two hundred years to win over the United States, yet before Pearl Harbour she was the worst hated nation in the world by a section of the people in that country. Had it not been for Pearl Harbour, they would be isolationist yet, and they had the protection of the British fleet for two years, or they, as well as Canada would have had to settle with the axis powers long before this. I have a great admiration for the people of the United States, but I do object to one dollar being spent over there on publicity. It is not necessary. I object to any waste of money on useless publicity and information bureaux in Canada and the United States. No reasonable economy is being practised by the government. On the contrary big-stick methods and scarecrow armaments are being used on the people of this country daily by controllers of all kinds, many of whom talk nonsense with useless duplication and waste.

We in the opposition—I speak for myself—might be better employed if we were offering some constructive criticism of this budget. This budget aims at a socialist state. We over here should show a better understanding of our needs and should tell the country that this is not a budget to win the war but to destroy the present basis of our society. The people of Canada would not object, no matter how heavily they were taxed, if the money was going to the war and to beat Hitler. Our hearts may be sound, but our heads must be weak if we do not criticize this budget. In the long run the whole of Canada will suffer severely from this budget—trade and commerce, the farmer, the retailer, the artisan and everybody else—for years to come.

The income tax schedules are not what they should be, and there are many inequalities. The rich man will be reduced to nothing, and the retailer and the wholesaler will be put out of business. As for the ordinary men like the rest of us we shall have to pay the charges. People will have to get rid of their homes because they will not be able to pay the local taxation, heavy interest charges, insurance premiums and all the rest of it, and the result of it will be ruin in the end unless the taxes are levied on a man's net income. Is it any wonder that people want to give up their property? This system of socialistic control is all wrong, and it should be carefully reconsidered by the ways and means committee that should be set up to revise our annual budget. As I said the other night, it would be all right if this control system were going to win the war, but it is not. It is not the doubled rate I am objecting to; it is the fact that we have these controllers and regimentation and the nationalization of labour.

Mr. Elliott Little has been appointed director of national selective service. Who is he, and what training has he for such a task? He has predicted the closing down of non-essential industries so as to release workers for the armed services and war plants. The House of Commons was not consulted about this. He made the announcement before the Rotary club here in Ottawa. Is the Rotary club the House of Commons before which he can go and give an opinion, and give directions to 250,000 workers? No definition is given by him of a non-essential industry. Who is going to decide whether these non-essential industries can be dispensed with? How is it going to be done? We are just heading for national bankruptcy, confusion, muddle, delay, duplication and waste, and are only going to bring the war closer to our shores, by such a control policy that no one will be sent overseas.

Is it the war policy of the government to control and administer every walk of life and almost every article or commodity of trade and commerce? If so, it will lead this country to disaster and national bankruptcy and will not help the war effort. It is a funny thing that no one on the government front benches knows how many of these bureaucratic boards there are, what amounts they are spending, the number on their payroll from week to week or month to month, what functions they perform and how it is all working out. If it is necessary to win the war, no one will object, but it is not. I say: beware of this evil, this bureaucracy within our gates, with headquarters at Ottawa. What we are to-day urged to accept as a war necessity, we shall be told tomorrow we must accept it as a necessity of peace days. Therefore the mighty host of bureaucrats at Ottawa, their sisters and cousins and aunts, some in military uniform, if you please, to fight Hitler at home, will be always with us. All I can say of most of their controls is, never were there so many who knew so little about so much. The small independent business man is being faced with ruin and our people are being faced with the loss of their freedom and independence for which the democracies are now fighting. In one year Canada has been converted into a totalitarian socialist state without the knowledge of the people or without any authority from parliament. Restraints are being placed upon thrift and upon business being carried on in the traditional policy of free enterprise and individual responsibility. Unless this is checked, it will lead us to trade and commercial ruin, stagnation and, in the end, insolvency amid all these complex controllers and totalitarian maelstroms, with which business is being hamstrung by their overnight social changes and arbitrary conditions which are altogether impossible and foreign to the temperament of the Canadian people and not at all adapted to their circumstances.

Mr. MAYBANK: I rise chiefly for the purpose of asking one or two questions with relation to matters in the budget, but before doing that I desire to advert to some of the remarks made yesterday evening by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght). Anything I might say anent the hon. gentleman's remarks will be critical and not laudatory, and for that reason I am glad that he has just come into the chamber.

It seems to be the fashion for members of the opposition when speaking on the budget to say a few words of faint praise for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). If you are a member of the same party as the minister, apparently you should go to great lengths to discuss him and possibly make some laudatory remarks about his forbears or any other thing that might be favourable to him. I shall not follow that procedure, because I feel that perhaps enough has been said already. If the minister really believes it—I fancy he pays no attention to it—he must be endeavouring to decide whether to wear his halo with a slant to the right or a slant to the left.

I would, however, say this about the minister. I never witnessed anything which gave me more pleasure than the manner in which he quickly and without hesitation rose in his place and traded punches with the doughty member for Parry Sound. So far as I am concerned—of course, others may differ—were I the referee, the decision would be given unhesitatingly to the Minister of Finance, in respect of style and matter and everything else in connection with that particular little bout. I have never witnessed any person demolished more naturally, more completely, more effectively than the hon. member was demolished by the minister yesterday evening. It partook of the nature of one of those affairs when Joe Louis dealt with one of the white hopes whom he saw in front of him for only about thirty-nine or forty seconds; thereafter he had to look down to see him. I take pleasure in saying this, but I do not say it with any feeling of animosity toward the hon. member for Parry Sound. I have great friendship for him, but he was so far wrong last night and what he was saying was so dangerous that the only possible course open to the minister was to do what he did.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): What parts are you referring to?

Mr. MAYBANK: If the hon. member does not understand me fully, I shall have to explain it by drawing a blueprint for him after the session. In the case of most people it will not be necessary for me to draw a blueprint in order to make myself understood.

I consider that what happened yesterday evening was absolutely necessary. A doctrine of that kind should not be introduced at a time like this, at a time which may prove the most harmful in the history of this country. There is nothing more dangerous than to meddle with our money system at this particular time.

Mr. FAIR: The foundation is not very solid, is it?

Mr. MAYBANK: That may be your opinion about that. Surely if a person knows that we are in one war with somebody on the outside, he should realize that it is no time to get another one started on the inside. There are always those who are spoiling for a fight, so much so that they will turn round and hit anybody just to have more rows going. As I say, I felt it was necessary for the Minister of Finance to act as he did, and that is the only reason why I am so pleased that he did so.

Probably I shall not go into the merits of the proposals of the hon. member for Parry Sound, but I do wish to draw this to the attention of the committee. Yesterday evening he followed the accepted canons of oratory. He made two or three remarks in order to attract the attention and sympathy of his audience, he carried them along with him while he discussed the sad position of the officer in the army, the married man as opposed to the single man, and so on. He did that in order to bring the crowd under his spell, and then he enunciated his main doctrine.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the creation of atmosphere.

Mr. MAYBANK: The creation of atmosphere is, I believe, the name of that particular method. At any rate, it was well done, except that if one thought, as one listened to the hon. member, it became apparent that it was not being so well done. Sometimes one can so lull one's audience that they will not think, and clearly that was the design of last night's performance. This was what struck me, for instance. The hon. gentleman dealt with the cases respectively of a bachelor and a married man, in the $3,000 bracket. He pointed out that the bachelor was taxed $1,064 and the married man $884, and that the difference for the purpose of supporting a wife was $180. He brought it out that what the government evidently intended was that a man should support his wife on $180, the difference between the tax imposed upon the married man and the tax imposed upon the bachelor. That amounts to 49 cents a day, as the hon. member feelingly pointed out, to keep a wife and supply her with everything she requires. I felt that there was something wrong with these figures. After reading the budget, after hearing the minister make his main speech on it, I knew that I was going to have a more difficult time in my life supporting a wife and two or three kids than I had had before. But, good Lord, I never thought it was quite as tough as that, that I had only 49 cents a day for her, and I could not help thinking in consequence, when the hon. member for Parry Sound spoke, that the moment any member of his audience started to think, that hon. member and his argument were lost. He was all right as long as he had a completely thoughtless audience.

In the first place, the bachelor is not taxed $1,064, and in the second place the married man is not taxed $884. Those, of course, are the figures of gross taxation. The married man with two children, he went on to say, is taxed $668, which means that all he is allowed is $396 a year to support his wife and these two children, which is $132 for each of them, and he went on to tell us just what could be purchased with the $132. As I recall, he got it down to the point where it was very doubtful if they could be brought up in the manner in which the Scotch are said to have brought up their children, on porridge and the shorter catechism. Even that was not possible. He did not put it this way, but I felt when he was speaking that he was telling us that we should have to stop giving them even the porridge, and that they would have to get along on the shorter catechism. The shorter catechism is excellent for the intellect, but it does not help the stomach.

The facts of the matter are these. The single man may pay $1,064, but he may pay only $824. If he has life insurance it is easily possible that the man with a salary of $3,000 a year would be paying $240 in life insurance, whereupon he would not be paying the sum of money which the hon. member for Parry Sound mentioned. Again, in the case of the married man, he would not pay the sum of money mentioned, $884, but $584. The hon. member made no remark about that at all. Obviously, as it seemed to me once I began to think, he was relying on the thoughtlessness of those to whom he was speaking, or possibly relying—I hope this is not true—on the thoughtlessness of people outside this house to whom the doctrine would be retailed.

Take the case of the married man with or without two children. It is altogether probable that a man on a $3,000 salary is putting away by mortgage payments on his home, or by premiums on insurance policies, the sum of $25 a month, and he is therefore not paying the amount of taxation which has been mentioned, namely, $884, but he is probably paying a tax of $584. The same remarks apply to the married man with two children, with the exception that the figures are a little different. In his case the actual tax would be $668 gross; $334 is taxation, and $334 of it is savings, and if he has that amount of insurance premium or mortgage payments he will not have that taken from him by the government. This means that the man does not have to keep his wife on $180; it means that he keeps his wife and himself on $2,116. If he is already saving $240 he keeps himself and his wife on $2,176. He does not keep his wife on $180, as the hon. member suggested, and I do not know whether he had in mind any particular wife or particular man who would do that. He might, of course, have had his reasoning warped regarding some particular individual, but I can assure him that the generality of men who have $2,176 and a wife, use the $2,176 to support themselves with their wives—their wives with themselves—and they do not allow $180 for the wife and gobble up all the rest of the money, roughly $2,000 for themselves. I am sure the hon. member himself, if he were to find any man attempting to treat his wife in that fashion, would be the first to rush forward to support that wife in an application to the courts that she be given decent alimony. I am sure that if he were to support her in her claim for alimony she would get it in any court, and no court would say that the Minister of Finance had laid it down on behalf of the Canadian government that $180 was enough for a wife.

My only purpose in drawing particular attention to this sort of thing is this. I felt that when the member for Parry Sound goes as far astray as that himself, and endeavours to lead all the rest of us equally astray on a matter of this sort, it indicates clearly, if he believes what he was saying, that he has what I might term an economic short-sightedness which completely disqualifies him for giving any evidence at all upon any economic question. Any man who, after reading the income tax resolutions that are before us and hearing the speeches, will come to the conclusion and pronounce the doctrine that they spell $180 to keep the wife of a man who has $3,000 a year, is obviously, in an economic sense, myopic. There can be no doubt about it. That of itself seems sufficient to wash out any argument that came after what the hon. member for Parry Sound said in that regard. I think the minister made it quite clear last night that the proposals which the hon. member made are inflationary. You have the hon. member saying that they are not. You can look at the other judgments of the hon. member and estimate him as an economic expert in the light of the sort of discussion that I have detailed to-night, and take your choice between him and the Minister of Finance as to whether the scheme that he proposes is inflationary. I am convinced that it is.

The hon. member was relying a very great deal upon our control system. I confess that I had some doubts as to whether we could control prices in this country, even before I heard the testimony, given later, of the Minister of Finance. I have always had difficulty in believing that we can, over a long time, hold down prices by any form of control. I fancy we shall be able to do it for about as long as this war lasts. Of course I do not know how long the war will last, but I do not believe you could hold down prices by a control system for a ten-year period. We may succeed in holding them down fairly well during the war only because there is a war, for if it were not for the war we would not submit to these controls; no democratic people would. But I call attention to Italy with all its control. They have a great deal more control in these totalitarian countries than we have. They do not have all the bother of parliament and that sort of thing. They do not have any expressions of opinion, which are always bothersome to any government. We have not got them blockaded as well as we would like. I have some figures before me—I can give authority to anyone who wants it—showing some of the difficulty Italy is experiencing. The price index of some goods purchased by the farmer is in my hand. It would appear that the farmer in Italy has to purchase a great deal of fertilizer and insecticides. The prices for 1929 apparently are taken as the base. Last year the index figure for those articles was 137·4. This year it is 194·7, or a difference of nearly 60 points. I am not very good at mental arithmetic, but that represents a very high percentage of increase. Seed, which is of course highly important to the farmer, cost last year 163·1, but this year has risen to 192·4. Fodder is an article on which the agriculturist of Italy is best off apparently; the price has risen only about five points, from 135·4 last year to 140·2 this year. On agricultural machinery, something about which we of the west have heard quite a bit in this house, last year the price was 246·4 and this year it has become 287·2. Various industrial goods have risen from 222 to 279.

With all the controls they have in that totalitarian country their experience is that prices have gone up in the manner I have indicated with regard to certain basic goods. That in turn is bound—you cannot stop it—to bring about higher prices for other goods, even with all their controls. We can do a great deal with controls, but I am convinced that we cannot permanently or for any long time keep down prices even under the best of circumstances. Italy is a country in which every circumstance is favourable to keeping down prices, yet I imagine those increases will total up to an average of 30 per cent on certain basic articles, which increases will, in turn, affect a great many other articles within a very short time.

I gather that Germany is having somewhat similar difficulties in spite of all her controls. There they are apparently fearing inflation. They are struggling their utmost to keep it down. I hope they fail; we all hope for that. My point at the moment is that they are having trouble. It takes this form. When they hold down prices, people just will not put the primary products on the market, and even with their controls they cannot force people to do so. Last year some 14,000 tons of cherry harvest came on the market as against 60,000 tons the year before. Only 46 per cent of the strawberry crop reaches the market. They have had a new decree recently trying to force these things on the market and have now named minimum quotas in respect of apples.

These totalitarian countries are having all that kind of trouble. Surely, then, we must realize that we cannot rely entirely on controls in this country to keep down inflation. This is no time to try any kind of a "perhaps" scheme in this country. We can keep down inflation only if all things are favourable. We would be mad deliberately to put into operation in this country any kind of scheme as to the inflationary effect of which there is any doubt. It is all very well for a minority to believe it is not inflationary; they may be right although I am convinced they are wrong, but that does not settle the question.

I wish now to turn to something quite different, chiefly for the purpose of asking a question. I want to ascertain just what the situation is with respect to these compulsory savings. As I recollect, money paid upon a mortgage obviates the need of taking the money from the taxpayer to be refunded to him after the war; that is, payments on capital, not interest. I am concerned to make sure that the instrument which is much in use in western Canada, which operates substantially as a mortgage, namely the agreement of sale, is included in that provision. I know it is not in the wording, but I would draw attention to the desirability of that being done.

I would also call attention to the desirability of not fixing a rigid date for the mortgage, agreement of sale or similar instrument in regard to registration. I think the way in which the minister put this particular doctrine was something like this, that instruments which were registered as of a certain date would be considered. I suggest to him that there might be some revision in that connection, and I will explain the circumstances of certain cases which lead me to make this suggestion. We very often have mortgages arranged for the purpose of building houses. We have not been doing quite so much during the last few months under the housing act, though for a while building in Winnipeg was comparatively brisk under the provisions of that legislation. However, we always do have a certain amount of mortgage building. I know of several instances of people who have proceeded to arrange for the construction of houses, who have made arrangements for their mortgages and who are relying on progress payments from the mortgage company. Those people have everything arranged, but the mortgages may not yet be registered. Of course they will be registered before the mortgage company will give them any progress payments, but they have gone ahead with their building plans, having made all their mortgage arrangements. People like those are probably in the position now of having to pay something like $40 or $50 a month on their mortgages; yet if you insist on a certain date for the registration of those mortgages, those people simply will not be able to pay the mortgage and the income tax, and I do not know which they would let go. Therefore I think it would be well to take that situation into consideration. I am not suggesting that the date should be changed. I am suggesting that the government should accept evidence to prove the existence of a condition such as I have described as of that particular date. Accept some evidence that the condition existed, in addition to the evidence that you are already willing to take, namely the registration of the mortgage itself.

Mr. BENCE: Would the execution date not be the correct date?

Mr. MAYBANK: The execution date of any document which established the existence of that condition; that is, the fact that the man committed himself, or any evidence which would definitely show that a man had entered into an arrangement such as I have described.

There is only one other point I should like to mention, and that is a minor matter with regard to insurance premiums. Take the case of a man whose insurance falls due in March. A great many men do not pay promptly, nor do they arrange any loans to take care of the premium. They just let it run for two or three months. Almost always their policies contain extended insurance clauses, or whatever they may be called, under which the policies carry on automatically. Then let us say that in June the individual makes the payment that was due in March. His receipt will not show that he paid the premium; it will show that he repaid a loan. If a man repays a loan on his policy, I do not know whether it is intended that this shall be treated as though it were a refundable payment. If it is, all right; but if it is not, I wish to draw to the minister's attention the fact that many people pay their premiums a little late. They do not make any arrangement for loans when the premiums fall due; they just let it ride, knowing the policies to be all right by reason of the deferred payment provisions. But when they pay the premium they do not get a receipt showing payment of the premium itself; the receipt shows repayment of a loan, because automatically, in the bookkeeping of the company, when the premium was not paid on the due date it became a loan, though no special action was taken by the policyholder to obtain that loan. I submit that in such instances these payments should be treated as payments of premiums, which would relieve the individual of the payment of tax on that portion of the refundable deposit.

I think these are the only questions I had in mind. I thought it well to place these various matters on record at the one time rather than speak three or four times during this discussion.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Mr. Chairman, when I was called out of bed by a newspaper man at one o'clock on the morning following the introduction of the budget, I unwittingly made the remark that this budget came as close to being a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation budget as anything we could expect from a Liberal government. I think I must have been still asleep when I made that statement, for nothing I have said since coming to Ottawa has brought me so much grief. However, since then I have had an opportunity over two week-ends of discussing the budget with a considerable number of people, with a wide range of incomes, and I am still satisfied that there are several very commendable features in this budget. I am amazed at the spirit of cooperation and stoicism with which the people to whom I have spoken accept this budget. I have heard complaints from very few. Those with whom I have discussed the budget have taken the attitude that we are in this war, that we must win it at any cost, and that we are fortunate if these are the greatest demands that are to be made of us in order to win the war.

I want to commend the minister for the compulsory saving feature, which I think has met with general approbation throughout the country, particularly in view of the deductions which are made possible. There are one or two matters on which, if possible, I would like the minister to give the committee some information. In connection with the deduction that is allowed in regard to repayments of principal under mortgages, it has been called to my attention that a great many people had entered into agreements prior to the date fixed in the regulations, but that these mortgages were not officially registered. I have been asked whether payments made on such mortgages may be deducted. In connection with the returnable portion, or the compulsory saving feature, I have been asked when the deductions that are to be made with regard to insurance, superannuation and so forth, are to be collected. The general impression seems to be that one-third of those amounts will be collected at the source. I have had letters from people complaining that if this portion of their savings is deducted at the source, they are going to be placed in financial difficulties, so that they will be unable to meet their payments. I think there has been a great deal of public confusion over this point, and a public statement should be made at once.

I want to compliment the minister upon fixing a maximum for the returnable compulsory savings part of the tax. I think that maximum might very well have been fixed at $500 instead of $1,000. According to my calculation, a man will need to be in the position of having an income of $10,000 a year before he will make that maximum contribution of $1,000. I think the maximum might well have been made $500 instead of $1,000.

I have received some complaint from married men with families. This budget has already been called a bachelor's budget. I have thought of it as being uneugenic. Some nights ago the Minister of Finance spoke of the incentive that is required by industrialists to maintain production. I fail to see any incentive in this budget to encourage the production and raising of children. When you consider that according to the Labour Gazette the index of wage rates since 1939 has moved up from 105·3 to 118·9, or 13·6 points, which figures out at 12·9 per cent, and that the cost of living according to the same records has risen 15·2 per cent; and when you consider further that wages have been frozen at a level which gives wages a lower increase than the increase in the cost of living—

Mr. ILSLEY: Those are wage rates, not total wages.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: According to the information in the Labour Gazette for May, 1942, at page 633, these wage rates include the cost of living bonus.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right, but they are still wage rates. That does not take into account the larger number of hours which they have the opportunity to work.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The wage rates including the cost of living bonus had risen 12·9 per cent since 1939 as against an increase of 15·2 per cent in the cost of living. When you consider that wages have been frozen at that level and take into account certain other features of this budget, you will see what I mean by the lack of any incentive to raise families.

There are two features of this budget to which I would call the minister's attention and which, I presume, he may have studied already. One is—this may have been intentional on the part of the minister, and it may be good from the point of view of eugenics and from his point of view; I do not know—that there is much more incentive given to the man in the higher-salaried brackets to raise children than there is to the man in the lower-salaried brackets. If you take the difference between what is left to the married man with two children and what is left to the single man, both with the same income, you will find that the married man with two children has, on an income of $1,250, a margin over the single man of $235; on $1,500, a margin of $308; on $1,750, a margin of $366; on $2,000, $386; on $4,000, $446; on $7,500, $516; on $20,000, $766; and if by any chance a man has an income of $1,000,000, a married man with two children has a margin of $10,000 over the single man. In other words, the lower the married man's income, the smaller the difference between what is left to him after his tax has been paid and what is left to the single man.

There is one other feature which I think is worthy of consideration. We have often heard it said that the thing that matters in taxation is the amount that the man has left after the tax has been taken, but I think it is important that we consider the effect of this taxation upon the income left as compared with the income left after the tax had been levied in the previous year. In other words, it is interesting to note just how much of an adjustment an individual will have to make in his standard of living as compared with last year by reason of this budget. A man receiving $1,500 a year or $30 a week, taking into account the returnable portion of the taxes, will have to step down his scale of living by one per cent from his scale of living of last year. A married man with two children receiving an income of $1,750 will have to adjust his standard of living by 3·3; with an income of $2,000, he will have to scale down his standard of living by 8 per cent, and with an income of $2,500 he will have to scale it down by 13·4 per cent. That appears to me to make a considerable demand for adjustment in one's standard of living.

Those are features to which I think the minister might give consideration. I hope that he will let us know whether he has already considered the effect of the budget in that regard and the income taxation increases on the married man with two children or more.

Mr. SLAGHT: I had not intended to take part in the debate to-day, but in view of what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), I feel I should say a few words. The bulk of his time before the committee was occupied in a personal tirade, in personal abuse of myself, in delicately veiled sarcasm. I know that at this stage of the session the committee is not interested in any individual's mode of attack, particularly when I suggest that in nothing I said did I use any personalities. Apparently the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre had to base his case against me on the grounds, as he said, that there are those who are always so spoiling for a fight that they will turn round and hit anybody at any time. Another choice morsel was, "he had the crowd under his spell". Then followed an expletive, "good Lord", with which he attempted to drive home his argument. I do not know what the practice is in the Winnipeg police court, but I do not think this is the time to introduce into this court, when you have a bad case, the practice of abusing counsel on the other side.

Mr. MacNICOL: We do not want police court stuff here at all.

Mr. SLAGHT: I hope the hon. member who just interrupted me will bear me out when I say that I did not conduct my share of this debate on any such grounds at all. I think it is a pity that hon. members cannot deal with the problem before us more fairly. My hon. friend undertook to make some reference to a man having insurance and so and so, but he did not answer at all what the hon. member who has just taken his seat emphasized, and he probably missed the point of my remarks, as far as a married man with children was concerned. Let me tell him that any case that I attempted to make out for an alteration was based on the fact that there was discrimination against a married man with two children, having regard to the allowance that was made to him and the allowance made to the bachelor. Surely by this time that has been made pretty clear to everybody else, except the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre. That is all there is in that criticism; there is nothing more.

We welcome the young Lochinvar from the west, but he should not occupy the time of the committee in abusing another hon. member, in slurring him in that manner. I do not propose to waste the time of the committee in answering such statements. I want to make reference to just one of his bons mots or arguments. I do not know where he got his information, but he took us over to Germany. From what he said I gathered that Germany is having some trouble in holding down prices, and, therefore, because German character, which we have surely found out by this time is filled with selfish trickery and evasion, is not such that they are willing to keep the laws of their country, he is indicating with all that defeatist attitude that the Canadian people are not prepared to keep the laws of Canada with regard to rationing and price control.

Mr. GOLDING: Some have been fined already.

Mr. SLAGHT: Of course they have. In any new law which is as drastic as this there will be some people who will be fined. But if there is another member with a defeatist attitude, as it would appear that there is, let me tell him that I have great faith in the courage, in the honour and in the desire of the people of this country in the main to submit to every law that has been imposed upon them. I do not propose to succumb to any such argument as that which has been advanced, although there seem to be two members of this house who want to advance it. I do not believe we can assume that in the main the people of Canada are not cooperating and will not continue to cooperate in the effort to win this war in accordance with the restrictions that have been placed upon them. I think it is a silly attitude to take to suggest that in the main the people will not cooperate. My hon. friend interrupts to say that somebody has been prosecuted.

Mr. GOLDING: The minister told us that last night.

Mr. SLAGHT: I heard him, and I heard the hon. member speak now. Are you prepared to stand up and condemn the people in your riding? Has anybody in your riding been prosecuted? Nobody in my district has been prosecuted. I am not prepared to argue the wisdom or the lack of wisdom in the method by which we raise our money on the basis that we must assume that a black market will prevail, that the people of Canada are crooks and will be ready to disobey the laws of Canada in war time.

Mr. GOLDING: That is about as sensible as your illustration was.

Mr. SLAGHT: My hon. friend is quite glib with his condemnation of the sensibleness of my illustration, but I have not heard him venture any remarkable expositions as to why a bank with $5 in its strong box should be allowed to write up $100 in credit and take in a bond which will bear 3 per cent interest for twenty years.

Mr. GOLDING: I have not been converted as you have.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is another glib remark. I really cannot get very far in discussing the real facts surrounding this matter if I have to reply to the smart-Aleck interjections that are thrown in in that way. A man will make a greater contribution if I am wrong by rising in his place and discussing the facts and showing wherein I am wrong. I had not intended to say anything until the new Moses appeared on the horizon to lead us out of the wilderness.

Mr. GOLDING: You made a wonderful contribution; you are getting better all the time.

Mr. SLAGHT: That sort of minstrel show end-man business is played out in this House of Commons; it does not get us anywhere; it is not an earnest attempt to contribute to the discussion of a very serious problem.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You cannot have a contribution unless you have something to contribute.

Mr. SLAGHT: I leave myself in the judgment of the committee whether the attacks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre and the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), whether that kind of interjection and endeavour to destroy the presentation of a problem, is worth-while at this hour of our country's plight. I suggest that it is not. I leave myself, in the light of the personal abuse I have received to-night, in the judgment of the members of this committee, regardless of whether they agree or disagree with the problem that I have seriously endeavoured to present. The minister, whose problem it was to deal with this matter, showed me all the courtesy of debate, and I would have hoped that the side-liners who either got up or were put up to-night to attempt to destroy me would have found it desirable to keep themselves on a similar plane of decency in public discussion.

Mr. MAYBANK: I rise to make only one remark. The hon. member does not do himself justice in being quite so sorry for himself.

Mr. GRAYDON: If the civil war has drawn to a close, perhaps I can make a remark or so. I want to get back to the subject which was under discussion, on the question as to wage-earners whose category is under $2,000. These men and women, of course, have to pay unemployment insurance contributions week by week.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just for accuracy, the limit is not $2,000 now; it is higher than that.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is $2,500, is it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think you can set it at any particular figure. There is an order in council, however, raising it. It does not make any difference to the hon. gentleman's argument.

Mr. GRAYDON: It has no material bearing on my argument, in any event. The point I want to raise is this, and it seems to me important. The government proposes to collect from this wage-earning class that comes within the lower brackets of income, first of all an unemployment insurance contribution, and now, in addition, they have the minimum savings requirement. Does the government intend to combine the procedure by which the contributions and these minimum savings requirements are to be paid? I know there has been some confusion and considerable complaint raised because there are so many different sources and different channels through which tax collections have to be made. Perhaps we are only in the infancy of a developing scale of taxation with respect to many of these classes; but if we are to proceed on this basis we must make it a little less complicated for the man on the street, the average working man, if you like, because he is faced with the necessity of becoming almost a bookkeeper as well as a worker. He has a book for his unemployment insurance; he will now have to have another book, I assume, in connection with these minimum savings requirements; and with the numerous other deductions which the working man has to have taken off his salary and kept in certain specified positions, it seems that the government might very well take into consideration some simplification of the collection of these minimum savings, along with the contributions for unemployment insurance.

There is another angle to this matter. I wonder if we are dealing fairly and without discrimination with the class which comes within the unemployment insurance category. These men, of course, pay into the unemployment insurance fund, and, subject to certain regulations and conditions appearing in the act and the regulations thereunder, no interest is payable on that amount of money, while under the minimum savings requirement plan 2 per cent is actually allowed by the government. I know the question has been raised in one or two quarters as to the propriety of that, as constituting some discrimination so far as that class of worker is concerned.

While I am on my feet, on the question of the refundable part of the income tax, would the minister care to say whether that is to be assignable or transferable, or can it be lent upon or dealt with by the person who leaves it with the government? That point has been raised on two or three occasions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The answer to the last question is no. With regard to the other two, I will take the hon. member's suggestions into account and when we reach resolution 25 they can be discussed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I had hoped that the lengthy discussion, which has now lasted for over six hours, arising out of the speech of the hon. member for Parry Sound, would have ended some hours ago and that we might have made some progress with this resolution. It is now nearly eleven o'clock, and I would ask the committee on both sides of the chamber if we cannot get away from this speculative exhibition of monetary theories and get down to business to-morrow so that we may make some real progress in regard to this resolution.

Might I just ask the minister, in view of the flow of eloquence and the multiplicity of words to which we have been listening, not to forget that in the course of my budget speech, in the remarks I made on this resolution, No. 1, I asked certain specific questions which I think are of very great importance and which we would like to have elucidated. I hope he will not forget them to-morrow.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wholly agree. I was a little diffident about asking the committee to curtail general discussion, because the budget debate was very short, and leaders of all opposition parties made reservations of the right of members of their parties to discuss matters rather generally on the resolutions; but I am wholly in accord with the appeal of the leader of the opposition to members of the committee that to-morrow, when we start, we take the resolutions up resolution by resolution and apply the rules strictly to the resolutions, and I shall be prepared as best I can to deal with the matters raised by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say just a word? I think possibly I would have liked to have joined in this general discussion on monetary affairs. We hold very definite views; we believe, of course, that not until you have placed the principal means of production, the economic monopolies, and the financial system under the direct control of the community can you balance purchasing power with production. But we wished to facilitate the business of the committee and refrained from taking part in the discussion. I am sure that to-morrow we shall be very glad to cooperate with the minister, the leader of the opposition and the house generally in trying to get these resolutions through as quickly as proper consideration will permit. We shall have some other opportunity to place our economic and financial policies again before the house.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
