POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—REPORT ON DEVELOPMENTS FOLLOWING GROUNDING OF TANKER "ARROW"

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to report to the House on the latest developments in connection with the grounding of the tanker Arrow in Chedabucto Bay, Nova Scotia.

On Friday evening last I directed that the ship be removed or destroyed in accordance with the authority granted to me by section 495C of the Canada Shipping Act passed last year. The ship has broken her back on the rock on which she is impaled and it is thought possible to detach the stern section containing the engine and boiler rooms and an estimated one-third of the oil cargo so as to tow this portion out beyond the continental shelf to be sunk in deep water. On receipt of my direction, the two tugs present at the scene succeeded in separating the stern section from the rest of the ship which is awash on the rock. The stern section now rests some 50 feet away from the forward portion, and at this time workmen are ensuring that all openings in the forward part of the stern section are sealed and that portion reinforced so that it will not leak when moved off the ledge of rock on which it is now resting. It is hoped to move this portion at high water late tomorrow morning.

At the same time, materials and equipment have been flown to the scene to permit controlled burning or other disposal of the oil in the forward section. Fireproof booms have been built to surround this portion and it is hoped to let the oil out of the submerged hulk in controlled volumes for destruction within the boom.

A newly-developed technique for assisting burning, involving the use of pellets which act as wicks coupled with magnesium flares to ignite the oil, is being tried this morning on an oil slick in Chedabucto Bay. If this proves successful, it will be applied around the hulk after the stern section has been towed away.

While the cargo involved is only some 10 per cent of the amount spilled by the Torrey Canyon, the fuel is heavy residual furnace oil in which the volatile fractions have been refined out. It may be very difficult to burn and other methods may be required. An improved chemical for breaking down the fuel so that natural action can take place has been developed recently and this is understood to be relatively non-toxic to marine life. It is the intention to apply this material to the extent that the burning technique is found to be an incomplete solution.

I should emphasize that this whole matter of containing and destroying fuel oil in a siutation like this is only imperfectly understood. Much work has been done on it by various interests, but there are risks attached and some uncertainty of results applying to all the alternatives open to us. At worst, it is likely that release under controlled conditions and reasonable weather is a better alternative than a situation in which oil would seep from the wreck over a long period.

In all this, all resources of men, equipment and materials that are thought to be useful have been marshalled at the site. The department has had the full co-operation of other departments of government including Fisheries, National Defence and Energy, Mines and Resources, as well as representatives of Imperial Oil Limited and their salvors, and environmental control experts. All have personnel at the site, and Imperial Oil has retained the services of Professor Warner of Memorial University, a marine biologist, to advise generally and to assist in particular with the clean-up measures that will be required. The Canadian Coastguard has ships at the scene as well as helicopters together with those of the armed forces. Chartered aircraft have flown equipment and materials from various parts of the continent. No effort is being spared to contain the spill and to destroy the ship and its cargo with the least possible harm to the environment.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there can be no question from the report the minister has given that the situation is very serious as far as its effect on fishlife is concerned, and potentially very serious as far as the environment is concerned. I do not think there can be any question either that there has been a good deal of complacency, from which I hope this disaster will awaken all of us and incite us to make the arrangements necessary to avoid this kind of tragedy in the future to the extent that that is possible and, to the extent it is not possible, will incite us to make the necessary arrangements to be in a position to act effectively. We have not really taken any measures to prevent this sort of thing happening in our own territorial waters, and I would judge that we are not effectively organized to fight it when it does occur.

Again, I am a little confused by the minister's statement in connection with the forward section of the vessel being sealed off so it will not leak when moved off the ledge of rock on which it is now resting. I am confused why it is not possible also to tow this part, the forward section, out to sea if it can be removed from the rock.

Furthermore, I am concerned about why the decision was not taken earlier, first, as to the destruction of the vessel and, second, as to controlled burning. Oil has been escaping over a wide area of water for some time. If it is possible to apply controlled burning either tomorrow or the next day, then many people are going to wonder why it was not possible to apply controlled burning once the oil started to leak in any serious quantity.

It is clear that there is uncertainty as to methods. Here again I believe we have been complacent. There is obviously a need for a good deal of research in connection with this kind of disaster. In particular I believe we need controls for the future within our own territorial waters.

The minister gave the impression the other day that we were limited and restricted in this regard because of the lack of international regulations. With all respect, it would seem to me that we are free to apply controls within our own territorial waters. These we should certainly have without delay. The damage is serious and on the basis of what the minister has outlined and admitted the results are very uncertain. As a consequence of the delay this area may suffer a most serious disaster.

So the lesson is that we must be better prepared for this sort of thing when it happens than the government was on this occasion. We must implement regulations which will minimize the possibility of this kind of thing happening. We want some continuing assurance from the minister that every effort will be made—not simply the minister saying every effort is being made—even at this late date to minimize the danger. I think the minister, with respect, ought to remove what seems to me to be some confusion in his statement.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we are glad to have the statement from the Minister of Transport regarding the wrecking of the tanker Arrow off the coast of Cape Breton Island. I recognize that there are a great many technical problems involved in dealing with this matter, but I must say it seems to me it has taken an unconscionable length of time to deal with it and to see that the ship or at least part of the ship was towed out to sea and destroyed.

I believe that what has happened in this particularly unfortunate incident calls for a very thorough study and some action by the government to deal with what will undoubtedly be a recurring problem in this country. More and more oil tankers of larger and larger size are going to be used in the transport of oil. The Canadian people are properly exercised about the problem of pollution. It is bad enough that we have to deal with industries which discharge effluent into coastal waters, but if our shores are to be polluted by tankers which either discharge their cargo or are wrecked, then we are going to face a very serious problem, indeed, in terms of pollution of our coastline.

This is why there is so much concern about the proposed second trip of the Manhattan, because it is one of the largest tankers in the world. After its last trip it was reported that it had two large gaping holes in it. Had it been carrying a cargo of oil this would have created a real problem.

I suggest to the government that it seems to me there are three things that ought to be done. First, we need regulations that will apply to all ships using Canadian ports and Canadian territorial waters, particularly in respect of those which are carrying cargoes of oil or any other commodity that is likely to pollute our coastline. These regulations ought to be formulated as quickly as possible and enforced rigidly.

Second, we need to put back into the Canada Shipping Act the provision removed from the original draft that the cost of dealing with a situation like that which has been created by the Arrow should be assessed against the company to which the ship belongs or the company which owns the cargo.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Third, we need some legal provision to establish legal responsibility in order that those who are adversely affected by such pollution may have recourse to proper redress and the right to compensation. An incident of this magnitude brings the situation to the attention of Parliament, but in my own constituency smaller ships frequently discharge part of their surplus oil into the sea and the whole harbour is polluted. Those who are affected, those who own small ships which are contaminated and those who live along the coast whose property is contaminated, have no redress whatsoever. There is little use going to court to bring a case against the foreign owners of a small vessel which spent only a few days in the harbour. Since this is likely to be a recurring and increasingly serious problem in the years ahead, I hope the government will take vigorous steps to ensure that there is no repetition of this unfortunate incident.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING RESPONSIBILITY FOR EXPO EXPENDITURES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in connection with a news article, written by Mr. David Crane, which appeared today in the Globe and Mail. According to this report the Prime Minister made a certain statement in the course of answering questions. I notice that at the time he was smelling flowers and had beads about his neck. The degree to which this statement is removed from the truth would indicate either that what he was breathing was worse than the effects of pot or that the beads he was wearing were not truth beads.

To the question, why did the farmers not get the $200 million—the reference was to the money provided in connection with Expo—the Prime Minister answered:

> I don't think these people are poor, Mr. Trudeau said. In his visit to the west he had seen farmers riding $20,000 tractors and they probably owned land costing $100,000 to $200,000.

Mr. Trudeau: What is the question of privilege?

Mr. Diefenbaker: He went on to say:

> Why not give it to the small grocer in my riding who is being forced out of business by the supermarket?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then he went on to explain the $200 million granted in connection with Expo. He was asked why it was that when Montreal needed millions for Expo the money was available, but when the western farmer needs $200 million it is not. "Can you explain, the student asked Mr. Trudeau."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to invite the right hon. gentleman to indicate to the House as quickly as possible what his question of privilege is. I also have to remind him that all hon. members are required to give notice of questions of privilege. He is reading from an article which appeared in a newspaper this morning, which would indicate he had ample time to give the Chair the notice which all hon. members are required to give.

An hon. Member: Contempt of parliament.

Mr. Speaker: I would therefore suggest that if the right hon. gentleman has a question of privilege he should come to it quickly.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, this was brought to my attention a few minutes ago and it is a matter to which reference must be made because the honour of the government I had the honour to head is impugned by a statement which is false and frivolous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister replied that the federal government was fulfilling an obligation made in 1962 under a Conservative government. In 1962 a statute was passed by this Parliament under the terms of which the federal government would provide $20 million, the province of Quebec $10 million, and the city of Montreal $5 million. The expenditures which were made, and to which the Prime Minister alluded, were made as a result of an orgy of extravagance by the Pearson government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would not like to prevent the Prime Minister replying to the statement made by the right hon. gentleman, even though I doubt very much that there is a question of privilege. In any event there has been no notice as required. Even if no notice were required because of the circumstances alluded to by the right hon. gentleman, to wit, the fact that this matter was not brought to his attention until shortly before he entered the chamber, in any event there is no motion proposed by the right hon. gentleman and the matter should not be pursued. I think it might be unfair, however, not to allow the Prime Minister, if he wishes, to say a word by way of explanation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been debated a number of times. The right hon. gentleman might be well advised to wear some memory beads because it has been stated—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the Prime Minister talk about faulty memory!

Mr. Trudeau: —and repeated many times that the $20 million to which the hon. member refers was an initial payment and the agreement was that subsequent amounts, as and when the need developed, would also be covered by the federal government. It has been explained so many times that I cannot understand why the hon. member is not telling the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to ask the Prime Minister to withdraw. A week ago today he said "yes" and the next day he said he fooled the House and meant to say "no". So I will not ask for any withdrawal.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is always difficult for the Chair to determine when words are used which ought not to be used. The Prime Minister cannot suggest that another member is not telling the truth, but I take the liberty to interpret his words in a way which would make them acceptable from a procedural standpoint. I am sure the Prime Minister would want the Chair to interpret the words in this way.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

COMMUNICATIONS

REDUCTION OF RATES BY CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the Minister of Communications I am pleased to announce that negotiations between the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and responsible authorities in Great Britain, Ireland, several other European countries and the Trans-Canada Telephone System have resulted in substantial reductions in transatlantic communications rates. The Telephone, Telex and TWX services represent reductions ranging from 17 to 33 per cent.

As the minister responsible for this Crown Corporation I congratulate the COTC executive for their success in reducing rates at a period when the Canadian economy faces great inflationary pressures. The new rates come into effect in the case of Great Britain on March 1, 1970, and for Ireland and other European countries the new rates will be effective April 1, 1970.

May I, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of hon. members have the new COTC rates taken as read and inserted in Hansard at this point?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The statement on new rates referred to above follows:]

From Canada to Great Britain and Ireland rates for person-to-person calls on week days remain at $9 for the initial three minutes but each additional minute will be reduced from $3 to $2. For night and Sunday person-to-person calls the rates will remain at $6.75 for the first three minutes but each additional minute will cost $1.50 instead of $2.25. For station-to-station calls on week days the new rate will be $6 for the three initial minutes and $2 for each additional minute instead of $7.50 and $2.50. Station-to-station calls at night and on Sundays will cost $4.50 for the first three minutes and $1.50 for each additional minute; the old rates were $5.70 and $1.90.

Rates for person-to-person calls on week days between Canada and Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Finland, Germany, Greece, Italy, Liechtenstein, Luxembourg, Norway, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, Switzerland, Sweden and Vatican City will remain at $12 for the first three minutes. But each additional minute will cost only $2.45 instead of $3. Where applicable, night and Sunday rates for person-to-person calls will remain at $9 for the first three minutes, but each additional minute will cost $1.85 instead of $2.25. Rates for station-to-station calls on week days will be reduced from $9 to $7.35 for the initial three minutes; each additional minute will cost $2.45 instead of $3. Where applicable, night and Sunday rates for station-to-station calls will be $5.55 for the first three minutes and each additional minute will cost $1.85. Old rates were $6.75 and $2.25. Night and Sunday rates are not available with Austria, France, Liechtenstein, Greece and Switzerland.

Telex and TWX rates to Britain will be reduced to $2.25 per minute from $3—minimum one minute—and to most other European countries from $3 to $2.50 per minute. Some European countries will have a three-minute minimum charge, not having yet introduced the one-minute minimum rate.

Mr. Kierans: The COTC hopes to be able to negotiate similar reductions in telephone, Telex and TWX rates with other countries.

In conclusion, I would like to add that this excellent performance by COTC follows a situation in which this Crown Corporation in 1968-69 earned a net profit of $5.8 million and returned $6.2 million in taxes. This year the Crown Corporation waived a $5 million government loan allocated to it, and I am informed that COTC will not be requesting further funds from the government during the coming year.

I hope that this performance by COTC in reducing rates by amounts of up to 33 per cent will serve as an example to private enterprise and an example that private enterprise will strive to follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I might just say a word. Of course I am pleased to hear the minister's announcement, but I do not really think that the Canadian organization had very much alternative because there had already been an announcement in the United States that rates between the United States and Europe were going to be cut substantially. But at least it is pleasing to know that Canadian overseas rates are also going to come down.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome this statement. We were quite pleased to give consent to the inclusion in Hansard of the lower rates that are to come into effect for overseas service. We would also be quite happy to give unanimous consent for inclusion in Hansard of a list of lower rates in Canada. If this is possible on an overseas basis, why not in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXPENDITURES ON AIRCRAFT PURCHASES AND MAINTENANCE

Question No. 723—Mr. Forrestall:

1. In each year since 1960, what has been the total dollar content of government expenditures, including purchases, overhaul and repair and modification of fixed and rotary wing aircraft in (a) the Atlantic Provinces (b) Quebec (c) Ontario (d) the Prairies and (e) British Columbia?

2. In each of the last five years, how many separate firms in each of the above regions were awarded aerospace contracts in excess of $50,000,000. by the government?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as the Department of Supply and Services is concerned: 1. The records of the Department are not maintained in a manner which would enable us to readily provide this information. In order to assemble the information, it would be necessary to examine about 15,000 contract files.

2. During the past five years there were two contracts for $50,000,000 and over, which were awarded to Canadair Ltd. Montreal for production of the NF-5 and CF-5 aircraft. The NF-5 aircraft were purchased by Canada for re-sale to the Netherlands government.

ADMINISTRATIVE RESPONSIBILITY FOR SMALLER PORTS

Question No. 726—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is the Minister of Transport conducting a study to determine whether administrative responsibility of smaller ports could be shifted to the Department of Fisheries and Forestry?

2. Is such a study being carried out by both Departments?

3. When is it anticipated the study will be completed and a decision announced?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Transport and the Department of Fisheries and Forestry as follows: 1. The administration of smaller ports is under review with a number of departments and agencies.

2. No.

3. Not applicable.

DISTRIBUTION OF SPEECH BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Question No. 741—Mr. Saltsman:

1. What was the purpose of the distribution in the form of a departmental news release on December 2, 1969, of the text of a speech by the Minister of Finance, in the House of Commons, Friday, November 28, 1969?

2. How many copies of this speech were distributed and what was the total estimated cost in preparing and distributing the speech?

3. Would the Government of Canada be prepared to distribute the text of the speeches made on November 28, 1969 in the House of Commons by the lead-off speakers of the Conservative, New Democratic and Ralliement Creditiste Parties?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The text of the November 28 speech by the Minister of Finance was distributed to government offices, embassies and libraries, to persons in business and finance and to other groups and individuals who have asked to receive speeches by the Minister and announcements of the Department of Finance. This follows the normal practice of successive Ministers of Finance. The speech was also sent to news media and to Members of the House of Commons and Senate.

2. Estimated costs of preparation and distribution for 2,200 English and 300 French copies was $377.31, including mailing costs.

3. The government assumes that persons wishing to obtain speeches by Members and Leaders of Opposition parties have made arrangements to do so. Facilities are available to Opposition parties to respond to these requests.

AUTOMOTIVE ADUSTMENT ASSISTANCE BOARD LOANS

Question No. 753—Mr. Scott:

1. How many industries have received loans from the Automotive Adjustment Assistance Board since its inception?

2. What are the names of these companies and where are they located?

3. What was the amount of the loan to each company?

4. How many companies have failed to repay these loans?

5. How many companies are in arrears with their payments?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. To November 30, 1969, a total of 58 firms.

2. and 3. It is not the policy of the Adjustment Assistance Board to reveal the names of the borrowers or the amounts of individual loans.

4. None.

5. As of November 30, 1969, one.

MEDICAL, DENTAL AND ENGINEERING EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Question No. 778—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

Does the Department of Manpower and Immigration now get information from the provincial medical, dentistry and engineering associations about employment opportunities or does it instead depend on information of Canada manpower service?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The Department's Canada Manpower Centres frequently obtain information describing employment opportunities, their location and salary from employers and provincial associations by telephone and visits. This information is obtained to counsel clients seeking employment, to place clients (including immigrants) in employment, and to obtain information necessary in the filling of employment vacancies listed by employers. Canada Manpower Centres and the Department's regional offices also frequently obtain information from provincial associations as part of their job in understanding these labour markets. The head office in Ottawa periodically obtains information from national associations on opportunities for new university graduates.

DELIVERY OF MAIL, CHARLOTTETOWN

Question No. 789—Mr. MacLean:

Has the Post Office Department received any complaints of slow delivery of mail in the Charlottetown area and, if so, what action has been taken to investigate and correct the cause of such slow delivery?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Yes, a total of 16 complaints were received. Each was investigated and where the cause of delay could be determined, steps were taken to prevent recurrence.

MAIL DELIVERY TO APARTMENT BUILDINGS

Question No. 804—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. In what cities and towns of Canada are residents of apartment buildings unable to receive postal delivery by mailmen because of the current "austerity" program?

2. What is the estimate of the number of people in the situation referred to in Part 1?

3. What provisions are made for such people to obtain their mail?

4. How many protests have been received concerning this situation?

5. What is the estimated having from the non-provision of delivery service to apartment blocks?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. None. Extensions of Letter Carrier Service to available calls, including apartment buildings, are now provided in the normal manner. Temporary restrictions on extensions under the economy program were eliminated in October 1969.

2. None.
3. Not Applicable.
4. Not Applicable.
5. Not Applicable.

PERSONS RECEIVING MAIL ACCORDING TO FREQUENCY OF DELIVERY

Question No. 805—Mr. Macquarrie:

For each of the provinces and territories of Canada, what is the estimated number of Canadians now receiving mail delivery (a) six days a week (b) five days a week (c) three or fewer days per week?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): The numbers of calls served by letter carriers as of November 30, 1969, in the Provinces and Territories are as follows:

	Calls receiving direct delivery by letter carrier	Calls served by letter carrier through group boxes	Total calls served by letter carrier
Newfoundland	24,883	269	25,152
Nova Scotia	90,224	1,147	91,371

POST OFFICE CLOSURES

Question No. 816—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Since June 25, 1968, how many post offices have been closed in each of the provinces of Canada?

2. How many patrons were being served by these offices?

3. What alternative service was provided to these patrons?

4. What was the total increase in payment to rural route carriers resultant from such closings?

5. For each province, what is the estimated saving resultant from the closing of such offices?

6. What is the estimate of the number of letters of complaint received from groups and individuals concerning postal service since June 25, 1968?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. British Columbia, 33; Alberta, 82; Saskatchewan, 91; Manitoba, 51; Ontario, 243; Quebec, 192; New Brunswick, 73; Nova Scotia, 94; Prince Edward Island, 31; Newfoundland, 37; Northwest Territories, 2; Yukon, 2.

2. Departmental records are not maintained in such a way that would make it possible to compile these statistics.

3. Rural mail delivery or group mail boxes were provided and in some cases service is available through an adjacent post office.

4. Departmental records are not maintained in such a way as to provide that information.

5. Departmental records are not maintained in such a way as to permit compilation of savings broken down by province. However, since the inception of the Department's program in February 1967, to close small unproductive post offices, an approximate saving of $1,100,000 has been realized throughout the country.

6. Departmental records are not maintained on the number of letters of complaint received in connection with the closing of post offices.

Questions

HALIFAX—POSTAL DELIVERY TO NEW APARTMENT BUILDING

Question No. 828—Mr. McCleave:

1. Are new apartment buildings on Ardwell Avenue, Spryfield, City of Halifax, receiving postal delivery to inside mail boxes and, if not, is the Post Office using group site boxes located outside?

2. If the answer to Part 1 is in the affirmative, how many individual boxes are involved?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. There is one new apartment building on Ardwell Avenue. It contains six suites and delivery service is provided by letter carrier to inside mail boxes.

2. Six individual units in an apartment house mail receiver assembly.

PUBLIC DEBT, 1967, 1968, 1969

Question No. 857—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. What was the amount of the public debt at the end of fiscal years 1967, 1968 and 1969?

2. What was the amount of interest paid for each of these fiscal years?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. 1966-67, $19,940,206,029; 1967-68, $20,579,875,034; 1968-69, $22,100,957,706.

2. 1966-67, $901,537,725; 1967-68, $980,527,582; 1968-69, $1,136,103,916.

CLOSURE OF POST OFFICES

Question No. 886—Mr. Coates:

1. How many post offices have been closed in Cumberland-Colchester North since June 25, 1968?

2. How many additional offices does the Post Office Department intend to close?

3. What localities were the post offices located that have already been closed and what are the localities in which future closures will take place?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. Nine.

2. Sixteen.

3. (a) Upper Economy, Tidnish, Old Barns, Thomson Station, Head of Amherst, Malagash Mine, Londonderry Station, Athol, West Brook.

(b) Denmark, Earltown, East Advocate, Fox River, Glenholme, Little Bass River, Nappan, New Salem, Parrsboro Shore, River Philip, Spencer's Island, Wards Brook, Wentworth Centre, West Advocate, Apple River, Schinimecas Bridge.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK DEBENTURES—PURCHASE BY BANK OF CANADA

Question No. 894—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. During 1969, did the Bank of Canada purchase debentures issued by the Industrial Development Bank and, if so, what was the value of the debentures acquired by the Bank of Canada?

2. What is the average interest rate paid by the Industrial Development Bank on such debentures?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The Bank of Canada purchased all debentures issued by the Industrial Development Bank during 1969. The total issued in this period was $132,300,000, of which $86,700,000 was in replacement of maturing debentures.

2. The average interest rate paid by the Industrial Development Bank on debentures issued during 1969 was 8.20 per cent.

NOVA SCOTIA—MANPOWER MOBILITY PROGRAM

Question No. 902—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. Since January, 1968, have any persons received grants or loans under the Manpower Mobility Programme through the offices of the Canada Manpower Centre at (a) Sydney Mines, (b) North Sydney (c) Sydney, Nova Scotia and, if so, how many?

2. Have any persons been refused by each of these offices and, if so (a) how many (b) for what reasons?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Yes. Under the Canada Manpower Mobility Program grants only are authorized. A detailed breakdown of statistics for the period 1 January 1968-31 March 1968 is not available. The data given is for the full fiscal years 1967-68, 1968-69 and also the period 1 April-31 December 1969, by type of grants:

	Trainee Travel	Explor-atory	Relo-cation	Total
(a) Sydney Mines	11	8	13	32
(b) North Sydney	176	41	29	246
(c) Sydney	466	103	120	689

2. (a) Yes, Sydney Mines 79, North Sydney 26 and Sydney 14.

(b) Mobility assistance was not authorized because the persons failed to meet one or more of the following qualifying conditions prescribed by the Manpower Mobility Regulations: Not unemployed at the time of application; there was employment available in present locality; there were no employment prospects in new area; the area to which person wished to move was not the nearest area in which suitable employment was available; client failed medical examination required by employer or training institution.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—PHASING OUT SAVINGS

Question No. 907—Mr. McKinley:

1. What is the total saving in government spending that will result from the recent announcement of the phasing out of militia units and the closing out of armouries across Canada?

2. In particular, what savings in government expenditure will result from the closing of the armouries in Wingham and the phasing out of the 21st Field Artillery Regiment?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Approximately $15,000,000.

2. In arriving at an approximate cost of maintaining a militia unit certain factors must be considered. The operating and maintenance costs of the armoury, pay of unit members, are basic costs but there are other costs which are not as readily identified on a unit basis such as provision and maintenance of equipment, pay of regular force support staffs, travel, rations, clothing, etc. It is estimated that approximately $40,000 will be saved by phasing out the 21st Field Artillery Regiment and closing the Armoury in Wingham, Ontario.

USE OF PICLORAM TO MARK CANADA-U.S. BOUNDARY

Question No. 909—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is picloram being used to mark the land boundary between Canada and the United States?

2. What formula exists for the quantities being used and what safeguards exist as to such use?

3. How long has picloram been in existence, who invented it and what tests were carried out as to its effect on foilage and animal, human or bird life and on soil or water?

4. For what reasons was the decision made to mark out the boundary?

5. Was the picloram decision made at the initiative of the Canadian or American Government?

6. Who will supply the picloram?

7. Who will apply the picloram?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Picloram is an ingredient in the herbicide used to mark the boundary.

2 and 7. The commercial mixture, containing 0.54 pounds picloram per gallon, is applied at rates varying from 1.6 to 3 gallons per acre. The rates of application and methods are laid down by Canada Department of Agriculture. The program is carried out by experienced personnel under the direct supervision of the staff of the International Boundary Commission.

3. The product has been commercially available through Dow Chemical since 1963. The tests on the chemical were carried out by the Company and submitted to the Department of Agriculture prior to certification.

4. A boundary vista is called for under a treaty of 1925 between Canada and the United States, and the International Boundary Commission Act, 1960.

5. The Commission's program is an international operation developed through consultation and agreement between Canadian and United States members.

6. The commercial product is supplied by Dow Chemical.

MONTREAL POLICE STRIKE—FACILITIES GUARDED BY ARMED FORCES

Question No. 935—Mr. MacLean:

1. During the recent Montreal police strike, were certain facilities guarded by members of the Canadian Armed Forces and, if so, what were the facilities so guarded?

2. At whose request was this service performed?

3. What authority decided which types of utilities should be so guarded?

4. Is the cost to the federal government being charged to any other levels of government?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes, the transmission tower on Mount Royal; City Hall; Montreal Police Headquarters, and La Sureté Provinciale du Québec (SPQ) Headquarters in Montreal.

2. The Attorney General of the Province of Quebec.

3. The Director General of La Sureté du Québec.

4. Yes, to the Province of Quebec.

FAIREY AVIATION LAY-OFFS

Question No. 948—Mr. Forrestall:

In detail, what specific steps have been taken by the government to assure the minimum amount of hardship for employees of Fairey Aviation of Canada who are scheduled to be laid off during the next few weeks?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Department of Manpower and Immigration has assigned a task force of four manpower counsellors and a clerk to register and counsel all the employees of Fairey Canada Ltd. at its Dartmouth plant. In addition, three manpower counsellors have been assigned to the other three operations of the Company in the Maritimes, at Halifax International Airport, Greenwood, Nova Scotia, and Summerside, Prince Edward Island. The full services of the Canada Manpower Centres are being offered to the workers, including: employment counselling, job referral, mobility assistance and occupational training.

The registration process commenced on January 23, 1970. Fairey Canada is co-operating fully and has permitted these interviews to take place on Company premises. The workers are allowed time off at full pay to attend.

The Company has agreed to explore the possibility of forming a joint labour-management committee under the auspices of the Department's Manpower Consultative Service. The first phase of such a program would normally be the compiling of a manpower inventory such as is currently in progress. Following this, steps would be taken to arrange for such matters as separation pay and pension allowances. The possibility of arranged employment in other related work would be investigated. If it is necessary for workers to relocate in order to accept employment, mobility assistance would be provided under the Manpower Mobility Program.

PERPETUAL BONDS ISSUED

Question No. 960—Mr. Rodrigue:

What is the total amount of perpetual bonds issued by the Canadian government as of January 1, 1970?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): $55,000,000.

BANK OF CANADA—COST OF ISSUING NEW SERIES OF NOTES

Question No. 980—Mr. Goode:

1. What is the estimated cost of design and manufacutre of the engraving plates which will be required by the Bank of Canada to produce the new series of bank notes which will be issued beginning in 1970?

2. What is the cost of issuing a series of notes of the new design as opposed to retaining the current design?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. The cost of the design and manufacture of the engraving plates to produce a new series of bank notes, like the cost of issuing notes, is paid by the Bank of Canada.

It has not been the practice nor is it considered appropriate to answer questions regarding the internal administration of the Bank of Canada.

Return tabled.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary if he would ask the Department of Transport to answer question No. 303 asked in October.

Mr. Groos: I will look into it, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—INQUIRY INTO ECONOMIC DIFFICULTIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether, in view of certain representations made to him over the weekend, the government plans to order or conduct an inquiry into the economic difficulties in western Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, no representations were made to me over the weekend, as far as I am aware. Questions were asked along lines that were alluded to earlier by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and I believe they were dealt with sufficiently at that time.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the government intend to announce any additional measures to meet the deepening economic difficulties, particularly in the prairies?

Mr. Trudeau: This question was asked at least four times in my memory in the past two weeks and was answered by me and by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the question would not have to be asked so often if the government would do something about the problem.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: Is it a correct statement of government policy that the farmers in the west are not poor because they drive tractors and that therefore no additional measures by the government are appropriate?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to introduce legislation on the much talked about government program to buy up farms since many farmers are driving tractors worth less than $2,000?

LEGISLATION TO IMPLEMENT REDUCED WHEAT ACREAGE—FINANCIAL INCENTIVE TO FARMERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation to reduce the amount of acreage which farmers on the prairies can sow to wheat in the coming year, and does the government intend to provide some financial incentive for this purpose?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House seems to be very concerned with the legislation to come in due course; such will be announced in due course by the government. There is no attempt by the government to do everything today. We have spread our legislative program over the whole session and we expect co-operation from all parties in the execution of this program.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A further supplementary question. In view of the fact that the House is not to know until the legislation is introduced, has the Prime Minister conveyed this information to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board who has made statements to the effect that the government intends to curtail the amount of acreage which the farmers will sow to wheat?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking about communications between a minister and the Prime Minister. The question as asked is not in order.

[Translation]

Does the hon. member for Portneuf wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and to the Prime Minister.

Last year he granted some credits to the opposition members so that they could become better informed and, consequently, ask more relevant questions. Last week, we were glad to learn that hon. members on the government side would enjoy the same benefit. Could the Prime Minister tell us what means he intends to take, personally, to improve his own replies?

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that in the Prime Minister's answer he dealt with the economic plight of western Canada has he anything to announce—and this affects the economics of western Canada—in reference to the strike that is tying up all the ships in Vancouver?

Mr. Speaker: I would not think this is a supplementary question. This question might be asked a little later during the proceedings.

Mr. Woolliams: If that does not affect the economics of the country, nothing does.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Would he have his research staff read the report of the Barber Commission so that his knowledge of the prices of tractors might be more accurate?

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF DESERTERS FROM U.S. ARMED FORCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Solicitor General; I have given him notice of its general nature. In view of the allegations made on a television program last night that officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in British Columbia acted illegally in deporting three young Americans without any deportation order or other authority, has the minister instituted a further and fuller inquiry into this shocking incident and, if so, has he received a fuller report than the one he was good enough to communicate to me by letter on February 3?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I regret I did not see the television show on this subject that was put on last night.

Mr. Woolliams: They said you didn't tell the truth.

Mr. McIlraith: I am advised it was quite inaccurate in parts of it. As to the subject matter the hon. member is concerned with, I did institute an investigation of the matter when I had some correspondence from him, for which I thank him for giving me notice, and I gave him a reply on Friday. The TV show was on Sunday night and I instituted a further investigation this morning as to the allegations, some of which were also contained in some material which the hon. member supplied to me and which again is not accurate in part. That second inquiry is not yet completed. I do not have the final report on the part arising out of some things said on the television program last night.

Mr. Hees: Once again but more slowly, George.

Mr. Baldwin: Start from square one.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not blame the minister for not having seen the program last night. I only envy him for the reason he was unable to see it. I want to ask him this very serious question: in view of the conflicting allegations, and in view of the fact that the minister says reports were inaccurate merely on information he has received from his officers, who are not disinterested in this situation—

Mr. McIlraith: And my personal staff.

Mr. Lewis: —and in view of the fact that it is important that officers of the RCMP act legally and not as agents of foreign authorities, will the minister undertake to appoint a judge or other disinterested person to make a full and independent inquiry into the facts so that he may be in a position to report fully to the House and to take whatever action those facts require?

Mr. McIlraith: No, Mr. Speaker, but what I will undertake to do is to complete the investigation so that I can report fully to the hon. member and to the House. I am informed that these three youths were not deported and that there was no action that could be called into question. There is a sharp difference between the allegations and the part of the investigation I have completed now, and until it is fully completed I do not know that there is much use in pursuing the matter. Rather than appoint someone to conduct an inquiry now I want to complete the investigation, and I will give the hon. member and the House a report on it.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the minister whether he can assure the House that he can rely on the information he will receive from officers—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would not think the question the hon. member is asking now is in order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer, with your permission I should like to raise the question at the time of adjournment.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister makes his full report would he make sure he does not do it on a short day?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Inquiries of the Ministry

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

As it is recognized in high places that the producers of industrial milk are in no way responsible for inflation, could the minister tell us if he will reconsider his decision and recommend that the budget of the Canadian Dairy Commission, which was to be cut by $10 million, as announced by him, be left unchanged?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS

VANCOUVER—ACCEPTANCE OF COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT BY LONGSHOREMEN

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might put a question related to one asked earlier. In view of economic conditions on the prairies and the long drawn-out longshoremen's strike in British Columbia and the trouble it has caused, has the Prime Minister anything to report to the House on whether the strike is over and what position the government is taking?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do have a report which the Minister of Labour will be able to complete when he is back in the House; he is now in Vancouver. I am told that agreement was reached between the negotiating teams and that the union membership will vote again—I think for the fourth time, on this agreement. There is no change—

Mr. Woolliams: Could I ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister was interrupted by somebody. Could the Prime Minister advise us if the men are going to remain off work while that second or third vote is being taken?

Some hon. Members: Fourth.

Mr. Woolliams: Fourth.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In view of conflicting reports, will the minister advise the House whether or not grain is continuing to move through the west coast terminals and, if not, will he use his great influence in order to put those ports back into operation immediately?

Mr. McCleave: Explain.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Somebody has asked me to explain. I will do the very best I can on both counts, Mr. Speaker.

POLLUTION

CLOSING OF ARCTIC WATERS TO TANKERS PENDING MEASURES TO SAFEGUARD ECOLOGY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the very serious concern over the grounding and subsequent break-up of the Liberian tanker Arrow off the coast of Nova Scotia. Since the anti-pollution measures in Chedabucto Bay seem wholly inadequate, will the government consider closing the Canadian Arctic to tankers until adequate measures and safeguards for the delicate ecology of the Arctic can be developed?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Very soon, Mr. Speaker, there will be legislation tabled in the House which will deal with this general subject.

CHEDABUCTO BAY—PROCESSING OF CLAIMS FOR DAMAGES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): A supplementary question. How will the Canada Water Act or the new proposed legislation effectively cope with situations such as this?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the great concern in the area and having just come from there today, can the Prime Minister advise where the people in the area of Chedabucto Bay, including the town of Canso, should direct their claims for any damages resulting from this pollution?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEwan: What is the answer?

TRANSPORT

JANE STREET RAILWAY UNDERPASS, TORONTO —CTC REPLACEMENT GRANT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the bottleneck caused by the underpass in Toronto at Jane Street and St. Clair Avenue. In view of the fact that the replacement of the dangerous and inadequate railway overpass on Jane Street in downtown Toronto has been jeopardized by the refusal of the Canadian Transport Commission to give financial aid of $750,000, is it the intention of the government to request the commission to give the full extent of the aid requested by Metropolitan Toronto?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Transport is due in the House I will refer this question to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: He is sitting there.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's memory has just failed him.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that minister is not due in the House today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister apparently will allow the Minister of Transport to stand up and answer my question, I should appreciate hearing an answer to my question from the Minister of Transport.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member mind going back about ten minutes and starting all over again?

Mr. Alexander: Yes, Mr. Speaker. To make sure that there are no difficulties I shall repeat the question. In view of the fact that the replacement of the dangerous and inadequate railway overpass on Jane Street in downtown Toronto has been jeopardized by the refusal of the Canadian Transport Commission to give financial aid to the extent of $750,000, does the government intend to request the commission to give the full extent of the aid requested by Metropolitan Toronto, namely $750,000?

Mr. Speaker: Since we have already spent about five minutes on the question perhaps I ought to allow the minister to answer. I suggest to the hon. member that normally such questions are placed on the Order Paper or discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I should think that a question such as this about one of the worst traffic bottlenecks in Metropolitan Toronto which has been the cause of numerous traffic accidents ought to be answered.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That, of course, is not a point of order. At the same time I have recognized that since we have spent about five minutes on the question the minister might be given an opportunity to reply.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the reply to the question is very similar to the one I gave a few days ago. The whole question of assistance for the creation of overpasses is now being studied in the hope of finding a formula which will be far more adequate than the one at present existing. If the hon. member will look up Hansard of two or three days ago he will see that I gave the answer in more detail.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker I examined Hansard and the answer given on that day I believe it was Friday, does not seem to relate entirely to my present question. I am asking whether the minister is prepared to intervene in the matter and advise the Canadian Transport Commission to give full financial aid to Metropolitan Toronto?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): My question is to the Minister of Transport. When the minister is studying the legislation concerning grants for railway overpasses and underpasses, will he take into full consideration the many representations made by my colleague, the hon. member for High Park, and my other colleagues from the city of Toronto in this regard?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION MEETING WITH BUSINESSMEN—PRESENCE OF CONSUMER REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs about the meeting sponsored by the Prices and Incomes Commission being held today and tomorrow. Have the organized consumers of the country been invited to sit in on this conference? If no such invitation has been extended to them, why have they been overlooked?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the conference being held today and tomorrow is for the Prices and Incomes Commission to obtain from the businessmen attending the conference a commitment with regard to a program of price restraint for 1970. It is they who must give the commitment and not the consumers.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as our consumers have a very real interest in the outcome of the discussions, will the minister not consider permitting consumer representatives to sit in on the conference so that they express their point of view on the whole question of the rising cost of living?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, officials of my department are at the conference and statutorily they represent consumers.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, will the minister make a statement to the House on motions at the conclusion of the conference?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the plan is that the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission will make a statement late tomorrow.

[Later:]

TIME OF DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION AND ORGANIZED LABOUR

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Following the conclusion of the meetings now going on between the Prices and Incomes Commission and representatives of management, when is it the intention of the chairman of that commission to approach again the leaders of organized labour?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I have said in the House many times, this is an independent commission. After completing this series of meetings, the commission will be looking at other areas in the economy where a greater degree of restraint might obtain.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister attempting to convey the idea to the House that he and the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission do not discuss these matters in imately? Is he trying to pretend that he does not know what the chairman of the commission intends to do later?

Mr. Basford: That is not true, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Hees: Oh, nonsense!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That question is argumentative.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. A few moments ago when answering a question, because he did not have a communication from the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission the minister was not aware when the commission intended to reapproach organized labour. Would the minister speak to the chairman in the next 24 hours and report to this House the next time he is on duty?

Mr. Basford: I said, Mr. Speaker, that once this round of meetings is over and I am sure the hon. member will agree with me when I say I hope they will be successful, the commission will then be looking at other sectors of the economy where some form of restraint program could be worked out. Obviously, the area that the hon. member refers to is one of those areas.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. Will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to outline the program of the Prices and Incomes Commission on this very important matter?

PARTICIPATION OF MOVIE INDUSTRY IN MEETING WITH PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Gray): A supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the fact recent news items have indicated that the cost of admission tickets to movies has added to the increased cost of living in Canada, is the movie industry participating in this retail price meeting in Ottawa? Has the minister discussed with them the tremendous increase in movie prices up about 70 per cent in the last 15 years?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the movie industry was represented at today's meeting. I did not study the list of invitees that carefully. While I am sure hon. members are concerned about the prices of movies, and without degrading in any way the importance of obtaining reasonably priced entertainment, I think there are some other areas of the economy which have a priority position on the demands of the Prices and Incomes Commission.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, this item was in the recent report of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. They thought it was a contributor. Why does the minister not feel the same?

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question. Would the minister mind investigating the movie being shown in a certain theatre on Rideau Street in the city of Ottawa to see if the people of Ottawa are getting value for their money?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HARBOURS

COME-BY-CHANCE—PROVISION OF DOCKING FACILITIES FOR OIL REFINERY OPERATIONS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. On January 21 I asked the minister whether his department had received a request from the government of Newfoundland and a private industry for the provision of a docking facility at Come-By-Chance. I believe the minister replied that an application had been received but that certain information was not forthcoming from the private industry. Can the minister now say whether that information has been received and what the general situation is with regard to this matter?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I have had no further word.

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR PUBLISHING OF LIST SHOWING PHOSPHATE CONTENT IN DETERGENTS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the increasing demand by Canadians for information on the phosphate content of various detergent and soap products, will the minister publish a list of all detergents showing the percentage of phosphate which each detergent brand contains as a guide to those Canadians who want to start the fight against phosphate pollution now?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that question ought to be addressed to my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, who is co-ordinating the government's anti-pollution program. I understand that recently such a table was published by Pollution Probe of Toronto.

GRAIN

WHEAT—STATEMENT RESPECTING REDUCED PRODUCTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say when the minister who reports for the Wheat Board will be back in the House? Also, will he tell the House whether the minister was uttering government policy when he is reported to have said in London that farmers will likely be advised by the government to reduce wheat production in the next crop year and that the advice will be accompanied by an advance announcement of the wheat delivery quota for the new crop year?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to consult with the minister about both these matters. He was away in London and I have not been in communication with him.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT TO PROTECT DEBTORS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the representations made by the National Farmers Union in regard to the debt position of western farmers, is the government prepared to update the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in order to give the farmers some protection against excessive demands on the part of creditors?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has not been any concrete proposal made with respect to this matter. However, it was raised by a number of other hon. members in the House several weeks ago. The questions that were raised were reviewed thoroughly.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister should really advise the House that there is a specific proposal in the form of a private member's public bill in my name before the House.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister in the very near future be able to report to the House on what action the government contemplates taking in this regard?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had taken the time to read the exchange that took place not only between the hon. member for Peace River and myself but between the Minister of Justice and others several weeks ago, it would have been worth his while. Perhaps he should have taken the time to look the matter up in Hansard.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING LOWER TRACTOR PRICES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since the major purchases may normally be expected during the next three months, does the minister propose to make an early statement in the House concerning the results of his negotiations with domestic and foreign tractor companies with regard to lower domestic prices in Canada?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I hope so, but I cannot predict at this point in time what the results of these discussions will be because they have not yet been completed.

POLLUTION

REVISION OF REGULATIONS CONCERNING OIL TANKERS OPERATING IN TERRITORIAL WATERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Transport, in view of the difficulty with the Arrow, whether it is the intention of the Department of Transport to revise the regulations regarding oil tankers operating in territorial waters and, if so, when may we expect these revised regulations?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I advised the House some weeks ago, the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act which will extend unlimited liability within the waters under Canada's control will be introduced in the House as quickly as possible.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. My question was not directed to the matter of liability. I asked the minister whether it is proposed to introduce any new regulations restricting the operation of oil tankers within territorial waters?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, if it appears likely that such restrictions would in fact help to prevent this kind of situation, we will be very glad to introduce them. In fact, the regulation under which we were able to order the destruction of this vessel was only introduced about six months ago. We are up-dating the regulations all the time. I am not at all sure any regulation would have, in fact, changed the situation. If it turns out through an investigation that is so, we will be glad to do it.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary. Is it the intention of the minister to conduct or authorize an inquiry to determine immediately what regulations, if any, would be helpful?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, such an investigation is already under way as a matter of course. It always starts as soon as there is a wreck of this sort.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

ALLEGED ADVOCACY OF RACE PREJUDICE ON PROGRAM "ACTION SET"

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): My question is to the Secretary of State. Will the minister inquire from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation the reason for the CBC production last Saturday morning called "Action Set", directed at the young people of Canada, openly justifying and advocating race prejudice and race hatred? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the government's present legislation concerning hate literature.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to inquire into the matter raised by the hon. member.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PROTECTION OF WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE RECIPIENTS AGAINST DEDUCTION OF PUBLIC SERVICE PENSION INCREASE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. In view of the very welcome increases in the pensions of retired civil servants that are to come into effect in April, and in view of the fact that some of those who will get these increases are receiving the war veterans allowance, will the minister take the necessary steps to see that these increases are not deducted from the war veterans allowance in the same way as the minister has done with respect to the 2 per cent increase in the old age security pension?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to look into the matter with all possible sympathy.

[Later:]

DISCUSSIONS ON WOODS COMMITTEE REPORT —CONVENING OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister os Veterans Affairs. In a sense it is supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. In view of the in'erest of veterans across Canada in the report of the Woods Committee, can the minister report to the House the current status of discussions between his officials and those of the national veterans organizations? Also, when will the standing committee be in a position to reconvene?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, they have just about completed their discussions and they should report very soon to the committee. As soon as the committee has reported to the House we will be pleased to prepare legislation on this matter.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

WESTERN CANADA—REQUEST FOR REVIEW OF INCENTIVE PLAN

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Acting Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Having in mind the difficult conditions which exist in parts of western Canada, will the minister consider reviewing and re-examining all aspects of the regional incentive plan as it applies to these parts of western Canada so that some form of assistance may be provided?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will bring this question to the attention of the minister, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): May I direct my question to the Prime Minister. It concerns the $130,000 which it is reported the Prime Minister proposes to give to the government backbenchers for "research". Is this being done in lieu of their request for salary increases?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

DAIRYING—POLICY RESPECTING GRANTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the answer the minister has just given to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), to the effect that the decision to reduce by $10 million the Canadian Dairy Commission's budget is irrevocable, and also in view of the fact that the Committee on Agriculture will have to make recommendations to the government, does the answer given to the hon. member for Bellechasse mean that the committee need not trouble recommending to the government to review its position on the dairy policy?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Standing Committee on Agriculture is its own master and may decide what it wants to put in its report to this House.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PHASING OUT OF U.S. NAVAL OPERATION AT ARGENTIA, NFLD.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister aware of any plans on the part of the United States government to phase out its naval operation in Argentia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have held consultations with the United States government concerning reports that they were planning to phase out their operation in Argentia, and we expect an announcement will be made soon by the Americans.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CHARGING OF FEE FOR ASSISTING PASSPORT APPLICANTS

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It has to do with a recent news item in a weekly newspaper to the effect that for a fee of $5 a certain organization is willing to aid applicants for passports. Is the minister aware of this offer and, if so, what action does he intend to take? This concerns a fee for assisting people to obtain passports.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am sorry. Would the hon. member repeat the first part of his question?

Mr. Howe: I referred to a news item which appeared recently in my weekly newspaper. It indicated that a certain Ottawa organization is charging $5 to assist people to get their passport applications processed in approximately two days. Does the minister or the department approve of a commercial firm doing this?

Mr. Sharp: All I can say is that I would recommend that no one pay money for that purpose.

ACTION TO SPEED UP PROCESSING OF PASSPORT APPLICATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he has taken action to ensure that there will not be the same mix-up in the passport branch this year as there was last year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As I have told the House on several occasions recently, we are opening offices in some of the principal cities of Canada outside Ottawa in the hope that this will expedite the issuing of passports, but I can give no undertaking that if the demand for passports increases in the order of 20 or 30 per cent, as it did last year, there will not be some delays. I think it would be quite impossible to handle the peak volume of business and issue passports in the same interval of time as would be required to deal with applications made today.

Mr. Saltsman: Can the minister inform the House whether some of his concern as to the ability of the passport office to handle these applications arises out of the government freeze with respect to hiring new staff?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Sharp.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASE IN AUTOMOBILE INSURANCE RATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. A couple of weeks ago I asked the minister whether his department was looking into the fact that the companies handling automobile insurance were contemplating a general increase in premiums across the board. The minister said his department was looking into the matter. I want to ask him now whether this investigation has been completed and, if so, what action, if any, his department or the Prices and Incomes Commission propose to take with respect to this general across-the-board increase in car insurance rates?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The answer is the first of the alternatives mentioned by the hon. member; we have not yet completed our inquiries into this matter.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister how soon he expects to complete the inquiry and whether he will be making a statement in sufficient time for it to have some effect on car insurance rates this travelling season? Does the minister hope he can do this fairly soon?

Mr. Basford: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPROPRIATION

ACQUISITION AND ABANDONMENT OF LAND, APPOINTMENT OF HEARING OFFICERS, ETC.

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members will have noticed from the Order Paper today, there are a number of motions proposed for the consideration of the House at this time. In conformity with the authority vested in the Chair under Standing Orders, I have looked at these proposed motions and I should like to suggest to the House in what order they might be considered and in what order the House might be invited to vote on them if and when a vote is required.

Motion No. 1, I believe, could be considered separately and, if necessary, voted upon as a separate proposal.

Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6 should be grouped and disposed of as part of a single motion, and voted upon on the same basis.

Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6 should be grouped and discussed as a single motion but, if necessary, three votes should be taken.

Motion No. 7 should be considered and if necessary voted upon separately.

Motion No. 8 is to be considered and voted upon separately if required.

Motion No. 9 should be considered and, if required, voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 10 and 11 should be grouped and considered together but, if required, a vote should be taken on each separate motion.

If hon. members agree to these suggestions we shall proceed on this basis.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I make one brief comment? Speaking for my hon. friend from Greenwood, we certainly agree with your suggestions, and we might even go a bit further. Since they are consequential, some of these motions may not need to be put at all unless the prior motions are accepted. One hopes they will be. But we may save even more time than Your Honour expects.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no comments we shall carry on, procedurally, as I have suggested. We shall now consider Motion No. 1 which stands in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North. This will be debated and voted upon separately, if necessary.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved:

That Bill C-136, an Act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by adding the words "and/or any Superior Trial Court of the Provinces of Canada" after the words "Exchequer Court of Canada" in paragraph (a), sub-clause 1 of clause 2.

He said: Basically, Mr. Speaker, this motion is a very simple one. It merely asks that under the new Expropriation Act the superior courts of the various provinces be given concurrent jurisdiction with the Exchequer Court. I may say at the outset of this debate that in the committee several amendments which had been proposed to the bill were accepted. This one was rejected in committee and I now move it here at this stage.

As members of the House appreciate, the bill is concerned with matters which fall directly within federal jurisdiction, particularly when property is being expropriated by the federal authority for public works or other purposes. In support of this motion I would say at the outset that justice must be obtainable by all Canadians if there is to be any kind of just society. Economic disparity leads to judicial disparity. By this I mean that access to the courts often depends on the ability of a person to afford counsel to litigate in those courts. The law is the same for everyone in Canada. No one disagrees. But the implementation and application of the law are not the same. Those whose land has been expropriated by federal authority can only litigate, or continue to litigate, and hire the best counsel in the field, assisted by the best appraisers, if they have the economic worth which enables them to do so.

In the past we have tried to cure some of the problems, and giving the Exchequer Court sole jurisdiction in this field will put a lot of people behind the eight ball in that they will not be able to afford to litigate and will take settlements that they would not otherwise take. This is because litigation in many courts in Canada is now a luxury. Any changes in this regard are merely scratching the surface.

While on the subject of justice, I have talked about economic disparity leading to judicial disparity, and I have said that all Canadians are equal before the law. However, it is in the implementation of the law that we run into difficulty. Let me put this quotation on the record:

> Of all the valuable things on earth, man is most valuable because he is an end, not a means. The revolution today is for him, that his dignity might at long last be realized on earth, as well as in heaven. No matter what his race, his colour, his country, his culture, or his religion or the lack of it, he is a res sacra, a sacred thing, a person who deserves better of this world if his inner dignity is not to be lost in the outer indignity of so much that is utterly unhuman in modern life.

I am going to try to bring forward evidence to show that by forcing claimants who cannot come to a settlement to go to the Exchequer Court you are asking many of them to get into the kind of luxury litigation that they can ill afford. A lawsuit involving $100,000 in the Exchequer Court can cost up to approximately $25,000. I recall a case in 1967 in which the judgment was recently handed down. I am making no complaint about the judge in this regard. There was some thought of going on with the litigation—I will deal with that a little later—but I want to present the taxed bill in that case as evidence today.

I will refer to the minister's remarks in a few moments, but when he was speaking in the committee his main argument was that it was just as reasonable to litigate in the Exchequer Court as it is in the Superior or County courts of the provinces. Some of us have had experience in this regard and I say that, in light of my own experience, there is a big credibility gap between the minister and I.

In this case the judgment involved a little over $100,000. The case, tried in the Exchequer Court, was between Lake Louise Ski Lodge Limited, one Alfred Cooper and one Mary Boyle, and Her Majesty the Queen in the name of the former Department and Minister of Northern Affairs. The action concerned some land in Lake Louise which was expropriated, a case which went on for a considerable length of time. The taxable costs amounted to $3,412.44. They were the costs that were allowed by the court and were awarded to the successful claimant against the crown. The total costs, some of which were not allowed, between solicitor and client amounted to about $25,000. Some of those costs were disbursements with respect to engineers, and they were not allowed. For example, the appraiser's bill came to $7,000 odd and it was taxed at $4,746. That accounts in part for the difference between the $25,000 and the $13,000 allowed by the court.

The Exchequer Court has come a long way since I made my first speech about reforming that court's procedures and I know the minister has done a lot in this regard too. He has listened to the opposition, just as he listened to the opposition in the matter of the amendment respecting the Supreme Court of Canada. But in spite of these reforms that originated from the mouths of us on this side, I still say with great respect that the Exchequer Court is a very expensive court for the average man.

Mr. Blair: Might I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Certainly.

Mr. Blair: Does it not appear to him that his clients perhaps retained a very expensive lawyer?

Mr. Woolliams: I am glad the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) asked me that. The fact is that I am not talking about our costs. I realize the hon. member has had some experience with litigation, though perhaps not much. I am talking about costs which were taxed by the court. I am sure my good friend from Grenville-Carleton would not suggest for one moment that the registrar and his officers would tax any costs which were not justifiable. He knows enough of procedure to know that. So I hope I have answered his question. Sometimes the most expensive article is the best article. I do not always contend that you get the best article by buying the cheapest.

May I draw an analogy. I remember a case involving the expropriation of an acre of land on which was a flowing well and for which the applicant was asking $100,000. The litigation in that case was decided in the provincial county court, since it involved a provincial matter. This case is reported. True, it is an old case and one has to allow for these days of inflation, but the case is Town of Tisdale v. Tisdale Rural Municipality, reported in 1949, 1 Western Weekly Reports, page 963. In that case, the costs were taxed at around $1,500, and for the information of my good friend from Grenville-Carleton, who is interested in these matters, the solicitor and client costs were about $1,000.

So, my contention is that in litigation matters it certainly costs a lot less to go to the provincial courts than to the Exchequer Court. Although I appreciate you cannot have two identical cases, if some matter came before the Superior Court, the Supreme Court trial division of the province of Alberta, the Queen's Bench division in Saskatchewan, or indeed the Supreme Court of Ontario, the costs would not be taxed as high and the cost of the litigation would be less.

My good friend opposite shakes his head but I am just relating to him my experience. If he wants to stand up and put one of his reported cases on the record, then I would like to hear about it. I have looked pretty thoroughly through the reported cases but have not seen any case dealing with expropriation in which he, personally, has been engaged. If I am wrong in that, I stand to be corrected.

Mr. Blair: We settle them.

Mr. Woolliams: Hence, when the minister says that it costs less to litigate in the Exchequer Court, there is a large credibility gap between his experience and mine. I do not think there are any practical lawyers who would accept the position taken by the minister. I realize it is very difficult to get a lawyer to come forward and say he prefers one court over some other court, and we all know why this is. I am sure the minister will admit that one has to be pretty careful when criticizing the courts or even when suggesting changes in court procedures.

If I might digress for a moment, I should like to say that in no way am I criticizing the Exchequer Court. I am just saying that in cases where the land of individuals in Canada is expropriated by the federal authority they should have the option to choose where to fight the case. The individual should be able to decide which is the cheapest avenue of litigation, the one that will give him the most for his money. Surely, that is what we call democracy. In my opinion, it is cheaper to litigate in the provincial courts.

Secondly there is accessibility to provincial courts which does not exist in respect of the Exchequer Court. When I speak of accessibility, I have in mind the new rules of the Exchequer Court which came into being about the time of the case to which I made reference. If you look through these you will see that these new rules of the Exchequer Court—the document known as, "Exchequer Court, General Rules and Orders"—are printed in English and in French, one language on each side of the page, containing about 443 pages and about 301 rules.

I do not have time to compare these rules this afternoon, but if you compare the English rules of court with Alberta trial courts you will find a tremendous difference. I am not being critical in that regard because the British have a highly sophisticated kind of practice that is not carried on in many of our Supreme and District Courts in the provinces. The Exchequer Court has a much more sophisticated practice, like the British Practice.

There is a case from Calgary now proceeding on the same basis as the one for which I was counsel.

Mr. Turner: What are the dates of those?

Mr. Woolliams: These are the latest rules. They were brought up to date. I looked these up and, I do not wish to misrepresent, but I think it is 1968. These are the new ones and they were brought up to date in 1969 when a few changes were made. They were overhauled and I congratulate the President of the Court for this.

They were brought up to date but, as the minister knows, up to that time there were a lot of rules. They were difficult to ascertain, and I want to state that most lawyers who have a case which has to go to the Exchequer Court, and that is the court to which it will go if this bill passes in the form it is, generally hire an expert, probably from Ottawa or Toronto, where the lawyers are more accustomed to dealing with this court. There is not so much litigation flowing from the small centres to the Exchequer Court.

I do not want to name the lawyers as I do not think it would be fair to them, but there is a case now proceeding from Calgary on the same basis. It involves expropriation of land in a National Park on which is situated a motel. A very able counsel in our provincial courts is representing the parties. He finally came to the conclusion, as a result of meeting with several problems in the court—and I say this without disrespect for the court—that he would have to get somebody who was accustomed to practicing in a sophisticated manner under these rules. As a consequence, he hired a man from Ottawa who was more familiar with Exchequer Court practice than other learned counsel from Calgary who were experienced in the courts there. The fact is that the rules are more complicated.

For example, let me point out one very great difference. In the ordinary case in the province of Alberta or Saskatchewan you know, through your practice of law, that you start with a statement of claim and then there is a statement of defence. You do not have all the niceties of joining issues. They are automatically joined under the rules of court. You finally hold a simple discovery, get an appraiser and set the case down for a date without all this nonsense of application. You hold the trial, the judge makes a decision and you get a judgment. That is how simple it is.

When you get into the Exchequer Court you do so by petition. That is a little different. You then have a defence filed, followed by various applications. In fact there are several applications necessary before you can go to trial. You then set the issues. I always thought that was what the pleadings were for, to set out the issue. That is why you should have good pleadings. If a judge comes along, after you have had the discoveries, and orders the issue defined, then you are fenced in. Many lawyers know that sometimes following the trial of an action the pleadings do not fit the evidence. There are lots of decisions on that. However, as long as it does not prejudice one side or the other the pleadings can be amended right there without any extra proceedings, cost or time. This is not so in the Exchequer Court.

The Exchequer Court is a most sophisticated court because it has jurisdiction in respect of federal actions. I do not intend to get into that today. I say there is a whale of a difference between the Exchequer Court and a court sitting every week in Calgary holding trials or where applications can be made in chambers to perfect the proceedings for trial. This is where you obtain judges orders which are sometimes necessary as conditions precedent to having the matter heard in court. Much time is saved then or at a later date. The case is tried and you either get judgment or judgment is reserved.

Practicing lawyers are more familiar with their own courts, and they are more experienced there. Most lawyers in western Canada, Ontario and, indeed, in the Maritimes may be specialists in their own provincial courts, but not in respect of the rules which govern the Exchequer Court of Canada. These rules to which I have referred are entirely different. Most practicing lawyers may have one or two Exchequer Court cases in their lifetime, yet the rules and procedures are entirely different. Hence, as I said, such counsel have to hire outside lawyers in order to make sure their clients get justice. What average man can afford this luxury?

You must start an action in the Exchequer Court, as I said, by petition. In most courts you start the action by a statement of claim. This is a very simple process. Then, you have an examination for discovery. In many cases they are fishing trips to find out the strength of each side's case. You examine the opposite party to discover his knowledge of the case and determine the evidence.

In the case of an expropriation action, it is necessary to get an officer of the Crown appointed. If you cannot agree on the person you get a person named by a court order and the lawyer examines that person for discovery, and vice versa. When you use the provincial courts, the examination for discovery can be held at the local courthouse.

As I said in the beginning, there have been new arrangements, and you can now have examinations in Exchequer Court cases held in the local area, as in the Lake Louise case. I must say that the Crown was co-operative in that regard. The discoveries were held in Calgary, but this is the point I put to you. The discoveries were held in Calgary and the Crown sent out three counsel who lived in a nice hotel in that city. I agree they should stay in a nice hotel in my city. They were there for several days. Who paid this cost? The minister says this was done to save the taxpayer's money. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that there is no record of what it costs to send lawyers across the country to Calgary, Vancouver, Halifax or wherever it is, but it is expensive. The airfare return to Calgary is $212. These three individuals had to stay in the hotel there for a number of days. We do not know how many thousands of dollars it cost the Crown to hold these discoveries in Calgary.

If we had concurrent jurisdiction in our provincial courts we could save the taxpayers that money. If the Crown is going to spend that money, it would be better to give it to the claimant in the first place rather than waste the taxpayer's money. My friend laughs but these are arguments he cannot refute. They are correct. They are arguments based on experience with this kind of litigation.

There is another point I should like to mention regarding environmental knowledge. I am sure most hon. members will agree with me in this regard. A judge is not entitled to make a decision outside of the evidence he hears. He must base his decision on the evidence adduced of the value of the land which, in expropriation cases, is generally given by an appraiser. The judge may choose to accept the evidence given by the appraiser hired by the claimant or the evidence of the appraiser hired by the Crown. He may make a decision somewhere in between. The judge may also, as in one case, decide not to accept the evidence of either appraiser, but on the basis of his own opinion. In any event, the judge comes to a decision on the evidence.

The point I want to make is that the judge of a provincial court knows the environment, knows the site of the property, knows the economics of the province and knows the basic situation. I say that he could come to a decision that would be fair to the taxpayers of Canada and that would be fair in respect of the claimant much easier than someone who is more familiar with the situation here in Ottawa or elsewhere in Canada. So, I say that a judge from the environment in which the land and property is situated would have a greater built-in knowledge concerning the worth of a piece of land. In other words, a western judge would know more about western properties than would an eastern judge. And I believe that you would agree that an eastern judge would know more about land expropriated near Toronto for a federal project than would a western judge.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He would interpret the law on the evidence.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, but it is he who would decide the case. He would be entitled to use his environmental experience in interpreting that evidence and in coming to a decision. Why is there opposition to the suggestion? Why are the minister and other members of his party who seem to vote along party lines on this matter opposed to this suggestion?

I certainly cannot accept what the minister says so far as the cost is concerned. I will ask him this, and I should like to know his answer. Should not the average man be given the opportunity to litigate not in the Exchequer Court, which the minister says is great, but in a court which is more accessible to him and more familiar to him? Why should the great big state dictate to him where he is to get justice? Why is he refused? If by having a choice the litigation could be made cheaper for the average citizen and the lawyer who would advise him accordingly, why should the big state dictate the decision in that regard?

I should like to refer for a few moments to the second report of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs dated November 25, 1969. I am referring to page 15, where I am reported as saying:

> On a point of order, with reference to your argument as I can see the Minister and I do not agree, my experience and his before the Exchequer Court are absolutely opposite.

Then, the minister interrupted and said:

> Yours has not been as happy as mine has, it must have been the cases.

> I am quite satisfied with the judgments. I have had two or three and I think they were just; they were pretty good judgments. I think one should have gone to the Supreme Court of Canada—

Now, I should like to deal with that for a few moments and mention what it would cost to go to the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of this one case. We speak about the just society being just for the average Canadian. I say it is still a luxury to litigate. It is still the big corporations and the wealthy man who can afford to litigate. I admit I was dissatisfied with this particular decision. I wrote to the official court reporters of the Exchequer Court and I received a reply on July 4, 1967. My people had already had disbursements amounting to almost $20,000. That figure does not include any legal fees.

If these parties wished to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada what would it cost them? It would cost $4,894 to have the evidence printed. I am speaking from memory, but as my hon. friend knows something like 30 copies of the appeal book must be printed, including the factum. I find nothing wrong with this because one should expect this type of sophistication when dealing with a court as high as the Supreme Court of Canada. But when we are speaking of the cost of litigation we should consider the ability of the average man to appear before the average court in his home area where he can litigate at a reasonable price. I wish again to quote from the committee report:

> However, I want to come back to the Minister's argument which, I think, was completely contradicted by his last statement, with the greatest respect to him. If the Exchequer Court is all that he says it is, why did he for the first time to my knowledge say to me and to this Committee that he is going to bring in a reform bill to reform a court. If it is that good he would not need the reform.

That is what he said before the committee. He said, "I know we have problems". That is how he expressed it in his nice way—and he is nice. He said that judges will go across the land and hold hearings in chambers. They did that even before the present minister took office. This does not solve the problem of the cost. Then, as recorded in the committee report, I said:

> I think in most Supreme Courts—I have not practised in the East, but I have practised in two Western provinces—the disbursements to get into a piece of litigation or to get into court on a piece of litigation would cost anywhere from $100 to $200, including the discovery—

On top of the $200, one would have to add the cost of the appraiser, but the total cost of the appraiser I must admit would probably not be any more in respect of the Exchequer Court than it would in respect of the county court. I do not wish to leave the wrong impression in that regard. I said:

> I challenge the Minister and I am prepared to file a bill, a taxable bill, against the Crown which was taxed because we were successful—while I do not know the exact amount, I think he will find it cost around $15,000.

My bill was taxed at $13,412. Some disbursements were not allowed by the registrar who exercised his usual discretion. I continued:

> The rules in our Supreme Courts in western Canada have been streamlined to fit the new circumstances and the demand for expedition, but the rules of the Exchequer Court as I read them, which are in a white practice book put out by the English practice are pretty well the same kind of rules that have been operative in England for the last 100 years.

I do not wish to leave the wrong impression. In our Alberta and Saskatchewan courts, we have rules based on the rules of perhaps 100 years ago. But there has been a tendency in these courts to streamline the procedure.

In respect of divorces, for example, there is a backlog in most provinces because of the shortage of judges. I wish they would be appointed. In Alberta, if there is a lawyer on the other side, you can start the action on a Monday and be on for trial by Friday. However, in some of the provinces in the urban centres—and this is no criticism of the judges or lawyers—one sometimes has to wait as long as nine months. This is the reason I support the amendment. We must streamline our rules. Recently, I read an article by a well-known member of the Canadian Bar who said that if anything is backward it is the procedures of our courts and they must be streamlined because we have been living in the past. As I say, in my own province we are streamlining the courts and getting things done. I think we should be streamlining all our courts and getting on with the business of the nation.

We could pass as many bills as we like here, but the test comes when we get down to the application. I said in the committee:

I would like to see the rules of the Exchequer Court brought before this Committee as well as the rules with reference to the Supreme Court trial division of the provinces of Ontario and Alberta and I think he would find that the rules of Alberta and the rules of Ontario are almost identical. I think he also would find that the rules of the Exchequer Court are more in line with the English practice—

I am not being critical; I am just being practical and telling the House what the facts are. I went on to say:

—which in Britain may be applicable to a place the size of Great Britain, but certainly work hardships as far as the individuals are concerned who have very little money in which to go before the Exchequer Court when their land is expropriated.

That is my position, but if the minister assures this committee that they are going to reform this court so it will serve the average Canadian, then I think I will have succeeded in getting something across—

As the minister promised the committee there would be, there has been a tremendous improvement recently in court procedures. So, the battle has not been totally lost.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

I want to read to the House what the minister said in answer to my comment, and this is where the credibility gap occurs. I have brought my documentation to the House this afternoon. I did not take it to the committee.

Mr. Blair: You had it in the committee.

Mr. Woolliams: I did not bring it forward in the committee. I intended to have it filed, but I did not.

Mr. Blair: You read it for 30 minutes.

Mr. Woolliams: I can read what my good friend said a few minutes from now, but I will not digress to bother with him. If he is not interested in justice for the average man, if he is more interested in representing big corporations here in Ottawa and across the country, let him speak for the rich. I am here to speak for the average man.

Mr. Blair: Well, well, well. Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege simply because people reading Hansard would not realize the jocular manner in which my hon. friend spoke. I think that my hon. friend, knowing the profession and knowing the rules of this House, would not wish to cast personal reflection on anyone else.

Mr. Woolliams: I am not making any personal reflections, but if my hon. friend would just listen and, if he has an argument, would come forward with his argument, that would be better. If he is representing the poor, let him say so.

Mr. MacEwan: If the hat fits, wear it.

Mr. Woolliams: I would not say that, but I did notice a little sensitivity there.

Just as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) said last night on television, the poorest people are to be found in the ghettos in Canada, and all they get is of poor quality; those people even get the poorest lawyers. That may be true. That is what I am trying to say here. I know the minister feels that way himself. He does not have an easy job, and I know his problems. I am certainly by no means being critical of him.

The minister said in the committee:

I cannot let some of these allegations against the Exchequer Court stand. I would be willing to file the schedule of fees and costs before the Exchequer Court—

I have them here and I am willing to file the schedule of fees and costs before the Exchequer Court and before every provincial court. The minister went on to say:

> —and I can assure this committee, certainly on the basis of the experience I have had—and I will take a gamble on this—that the taxable fees and costs in the Exchequer Court compare favourably and are in most cases less than the comparable costs in the superior courts of this country.

I disagree with what the minister said. There is a big credibility gap between my experience in western Canada and the minister's experience. He did not file this information with the committee. I make nothing of that, but I may say that at least I presented factual evidence here today, as to what I know and what lawyers feel, so far as the difference in costs is concerned.

Apart from all that, I should like to repeat one argument. If the minister is right, then why does he not give litigants the right to make the choice? I trust that the people of Canada whose land is expropriated, regardless of whether they are wealthy, have middle class incomes or average incomes, will go to the court which will serve them best economically. I have enough faith in their ability and that of the lawyers serving them to believe that this is what they would do. I would like to hear an answer to that.

In conclusion, I ask the House to support this amendment, and I ask the minister to reconsider his position, because I believe him to be a just man. I believe that he wants to serve the average man better in this regard.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been in this House of Commons I have heard the argument of the hon. Member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) on the Exchequer Court. I want to say to him with frankness, yet discretion, that sometimes I cannot distinguish the argument from the autobiography of the various cases he has conducted with varied success before that court. It used to be that whenever the debate involved the estimates of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, estimates on national parks, or those of the Department of Justice, this question would come up.

I want to answer at the outset some of the arguments that the hon. member has attempted to submit to your Honour and to the House. In doing so, I wish to ask the House to recall that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs dealt with this question very thoroughly. The proceedings are available to the House. The arguments that were presented this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary North were presented then. The arguments which I will attempt to adduce in answer to him were given by me at that time before the committee.

He alleges, first of all, that the Exchequer Court is an expensive court, that it is more expensive to litigants than the supreme and superior provincial courts across Canada. I disagree very strongly. We introduced at the committee stage the taxable costs of the Supreme Court of Ontario as a representative provincial court as against the Exchequer Court of Canada, and item for item the Exchequer Court was cheaper and compared favourably with the Supreme Court of Ontario. The costs of the Supreme Court of Ontario are, in the main, comparable to the costs of other provincial or supreme courts across Canada.

When the hon. member speaks about taxable costs, I think he should be fair to the House and to the public in distinguishing those costs which are set forth in items as against particular proceedings in a court case beginning with a statement of claim, going through the motion stage and the interlocutory stage, the production of exhibits, and the rest of it. Those costs are fixed and itemized under the schedule of costs of each court in Canada. They are invariable and, as I said, on those invariable costs the Exchequer Court compares very favourably with the supreme and superior provincial courts of this country, and I adduced evidence to that effect.

As Your Honour knows, having practiced law yourself, other taxable costs that might be allocated as between the solicitor and the client are within the discretion of the taxing officer of the court or the discretion of the judge. Those costs depend very much on the difficulty of the case, the length of the case, its importance, the principle of law at stake, the preparation involved for counsel on both sides, and so on. They vary directly with the amount of effort put into the case by counsel and, at the discretion of the taxing officer or the judge, are awarded to counsel at the conclusion of the case.

It is all very well for the hon. member for Calgary North to bring in one of the cases in which he has appeared, but we do not know the subject matter of that case, how long it took him, how much money was at stake. We do not know the result of the case either, although I suspect it. We do not know any of those variable items. Really, what he is attempting to do is to induce the House to get into an apples and orange argument, that is to compare one case which he happened to have had in the Exchequer Court as against a comparable case in the Supreme Court of Alberta.

I want to say also that when we look at the expropriation bill itself, which is the bill currently before the House, we should recall some of its provisions. Clause 36 (2) puts the question of costs in proper perspective because if the amount awarded by the court, if the matter goes to litigation, exceeds the amount offered by the Crown, costs are payable by the Crown on a solicitor and client basis. In other words, as a matter of law, if negotiation is unsuccessful, and a Canadian citizen involved refuses to accept the offer by the goverment of Canada as the price of his property to be expropriated, and on going to court obtains an amount from the court in excess of the Crown's offer, then all costs are payable by the Crown.

Clause 27 makes it quite clear that all legal costs and appraisal costs are allowable costs, not only in successful litigation but prior to litigation, and are added to the price of the expropriated property payable by the Crown. If the award by the court is the same or less than the offer of the Crown, the costs are discretionary and may be awarded by the court depending on the validity of the expropriated owner's case. Costs prior to litigation are automatically, by law, payable by the Crown. Those costs incurred in legitimate negotiation are payable by the Crown and, as I say, litigation costs are awarded automatically by the court if the offer by the Crown is less than the award by the court.

I want to repeat the argument I made in committee, Mr. Speaker, that in terms of the itemized costs of the Exchequer Court of Canada as against those of the superior courts of this country there is virtually no difference and, if there is any comparison, the comparison is in favour of the Exchequer Court. That evidence is before the committee.

Mr. Woolliams: What page is that?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I think the hon. member will find it, if he looks, and certainly after I have finished this speech I will consult with him. Although the hon. member was diligent in his attendance at the committee maybe he was not present on the morning that I introduced that evidence. In any event, the variable taxable costs which he talked about in an autobiographical way would depend on the case he had, the amount of time and skill spent on preparation, and the amount of money at stake. I want to suggest to the House that that type of evidence which he offered is not too convincing.

The hon. member went on to say that the Exchequer Court of Canada was not as accessible to litigants as the superior courts of the provinces, and that its rules were more complicated than those of the superior courts. I would point out that its rules have just been revised and recently published in both official languages. As the hon. member knows, I have had my share of practice before the Exchequer Court. I have compared its new rules with those of the Supreme Court of Ontario, and the hon. member has admitted today that the rules in Alberta are very similar to the Ontario rules. I have also compared them with the rules of the Supreme Court of Quebec, and I say that they compare favourably in terms of speed and availability of the court to the average lawyer.

The rules may be slightly different in Alberta, and I want to congratulate the Chief Justice of the Alberta Supreme Court if its rules are as expeditious as the hon. member says, because elsewhere in Canada provincial courts do not enjoy that happy situation. The time of delay for a civil trial in Montreal runs from two to three years, and in Toronto it is about the same. In most of our major cities, there is a considerable delay between setting an action down for trial and the actual hearing of the case before a superior court.

Mr. Woolliams: That is an awful admission to make. Why don't you appoint more judges?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is not a question of appointing judges. This is something that I and my brother Attorneys General across the country will be discussing on a future occasion because, as the hon. member knows, the daily administration of the courts is within their jurisdiction and not mine directly.

To get back to the Exchequer Court of Canada, normally a case can be set down for trial within two or three months after issue is joined. The hon. member knows that. He admits that the Exchequer court now goes on circuit. It travels right across the country. A trial before it is available in all major centres. It is not necessary for lawyers and their clients to come to Ottawa to plead their cases before the Exchequer Court. Motions can be heard at any major city in Canada. Whenever an interlocutory proceeding is necessary, the court will send a judge to hear that matter.

Under the new bill, to which the hon. member has referred, it will be seen that we broaden the original jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court and continue the decentralization of that court. It will be made even more available to the people of Canada in its original field of jurisdiction concerning the application of federal laws as well as in its appellate jurisdiction. The hon. member will find that that court is as available to the practitioners of law and litigants as is any provincial court.

The hon. member also said that lawyers were not as familiar with the Procedures of the Exchequer Court of Canada as they might be with their divisional courts, their country courts or their provincial superior courts. That may be true. Because of the jurisdiction of that court covering expropriation matters, patent matters, actions against the Crown, admiralty matters and tax matters, a lawyer in general practice does not appear as often before it as he does before a county court or the superior court of his province. But every lawyer is in the same position, and the contra advantage is that the Exchequer Court has had many years experience in dealing with these complicated matters.

There is no way in which an expropriation case is going to be made less complicated by transferring jurisdiction to a provincial court, or allowing an option for a litigant to go before a provincial court. The difficulty in allowing such an option is that it is in the interests of the people of Canada that there be a consistent approach in the judgments rendered in expropriation cases. I do not think the people of Canada would consider it fair if in a similar factual situation an expropriated owner in Ontario were receiving a higher award than an expropriated owner was getting for similar property in some other part of Canada, regardless of the land values involved. I do not think litigants would think it fair if different interpretations of the bill were given by various courts across the country.

In order to achieve a uniform jurisprudence, and in order to treat the people of Canada equally in all parts of the country, it is the opinion of the government that a single court system should deal with expropriation cases. I can envisage a great amount of difficulty arising if concurrent jurisdiction were to be granted in this type of complicated litigation. I can envisage situations where people, on the advice of their lawyers, would be forced to go to a higher court in order to clarify the difference in judgments between one court in one part of the country and another court in another part of the country.

Suppose the Supreme Court of Alberta were to attach a certain principle to a factual situation, and suppose the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan were to arrive at a different principle on the same type of factual situation. In order to clarify that difference in interpretation counsel for an expropriated owner, or counsel for the Crown would be forced to go to the Courts of Appeal of those provinces, and probably to the Supreme Court of Canada in order to establish uniform case law. I suggested to the committee, and I suggest to this House now, that one of the principal reasons for a single court system is to avoid contradictory judgments in various jurisdictions across the country.

I could also imagine a situation where if one person who has an interest in a piece of property were to bring an action in the provincial court, and another person with an interest in the same piece of land were to bring an action in the Exchequer Court, each litigant exercising his option in the opposite way to the other, you would have two actions against the Crown, relating to the same piece of property, in concurrent jurisdictions. How would you reconcile that? How would you provide for the Attorney General of Canada joining all those persons involved in an expropriation case being heard in both jurisdictions? How would you define the monetary limits of jurisdiction in cases where there were several expropriated interests in one parcel. How would you define the monetary limits of the country court, or limit jurisdiction to the country court or the divisional court? How would you define the limit of jurisdiction, if it were to be given to Supreme Courts across the country. How would you provide for removal into the Exchequer Court where the monetary limit of those jurisdictions is exceeded?

Those remarks, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit show that in our view this type of litigation before a single court is in the best interests of people in Canada. It is in their best interests to have a single court determine this type of litigation which will give them a right against the Crown. This Bill provides that complicated evidence may be interpreted in a uniform way so that we may avoid different standards of justice in various parts of the country. I believe, as I said before, that the Exchequer Court has had many years of experience in dealing with this type of complicated matter. The court has shown a strong inclination to adapt its rules to meet the needs of particular cases. It has modernized its rules and decentralized its hearings, both at the interlocutory and final stages of legal proceedings. It has brought the court closer to the people.

I want to introduce into the chamber for the attention of hon. members of the House a summary of some of the evidence presented by Mr. Jack Weir, former president of the Canadian Bar Association, who practises in Toronto and who was the chairman of a special committee set up by the Canadian Bar Association to look at this bill. Mr. Weir presented the committee report of the Canadian Bar Association and recommended some amendments to the bill before the committee. Some of those amendments were accepted; others rejected. In the afternoon of Mr. Weir's presentation the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) asked him for his views about the problem of concurrent jurisdiction. Mr. Weir showed no enthusiasm whatsoever for that and he emphasized a number of points which may be seen if one peruses the evidence given before the committee. He said that the Exchequer Court rules have been and are being radically revised, and that there no longer appears to be a problem with regard to expert evidence. He said that the court has shown an increasing willingness to move around the country and to make itself available to the people of Canada and the legal profession of this country.

He said costs were not a real problem and he went through some of the arguments I have attempted to submit to Your Honour. He observed that the main objection to the Exchequer Court stemmed from the reluctance of some members of the bar to go before that court because some lawyers are not as familiar with it perhaps as they are with some other courts. In any event, these are the arguments that were presented by the government at the committee stage. The committee accepted these arguments and rejected the amendment brought forward at the committee stage by the hon. member for Calgary North. I urge the House to do the same.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I propose to speak only briefly on this question. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is important because it expresses not only his views but views which are held by members of the bar elsewhere in Canada and, I think, especially in western Canada. The problem which faces a person who is expropriated is very definitely one of expense and of cost.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right.

Mr. Blair: I am sure that there are other hon. members of the House besides myself who have dealt with people who have been expropriated. It strikes the average citizen as most severe and most unfair for the biggest organization in the country, his government, to come to him and say, "We want your land. If you want to challenge our valuation, you must sue us." This has been the law for many, many years, and the man who wanted to challenge the expropriation, who wanted to challenge the valuation, up till now had been put to the necessity of going to great expense, which generally he could ill afford, in order to mount a case. I therefore think that when we talk about the expense of litigation we should think of that in terms of the average citizen and what he must spend. We are not really learning too much if we divert our attention from this idea because it does not matter whether he spend that money in one court or another.

To me, the most significant and important reform in this legislation is that contained in clauses 27 and 36 to which the minister referred. They really provide for the underwriting of the legal expenses of a person who wishes to challenge the basis upon which he is expropriated.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is right.

Mr. Blair: This is a tremendous advantage and one which I think will bring credit to this Parliament. If the bill passes, great credit will accrue to parliament. The citizen, under the provisions of clause 27, will now be able to mount a position against the Crown which is comparable to the position the Crown could assume against him. He may now retain a lawyer and he may retain experts sufficient to establish his point of view in negotiations with the Crown. If he is dissatisfied with the outcome of these negotiations, then he is in a position to challenge the valuation in legal proceedings and, if he wins, he will not only recover part of his legal expenses and other costs but he will be entitled to claim them all. I make these comments because I have been struck by the exaggerated emphasis placed by my hon. friend for Calgary North on the cost of proceeding in the Exchequer Court. In my experience, the Exchequer Court is certainly a less expensive court in which to litigate than the Supreme Court of Ontario. Perhaps this view is personal to me and, as the minister said, we may get into difficulty when trying to generalize from our own personal experience.

The problem of legal expenses is a great one in Canada and we lawyers may be criticized, and I think justifiably, for not having paid sufficient attention to it. At any rate, we can deal with this bill with the knowledge that for the first time, so far as I am aware, a statute of the Parliament of Canada will place a citizen in a position where he may deal more or less as an equal with the Crown.

There is little that I can add to the comments made by the minister about some of the arguments raised by the hon. member for Calgary North. The costs of litigation are governed by two factors: by the value a lawyer may place upon his services and by the cost of producing exhibits and documents for presentation to a court. If a lawyer places a high value on his services and if he indulges in costly and elaborate case preparation, the risk is always run that in the event of success these costs may not be recoverable from the opposite party. This holds true whether the case is pleaded in the Exchequer Court or any other court in this country. According to my experience, and I think this is generally the experience of members of the bar of Canada, it costs no more to mount a case in the Exchequer Court and it is unfair to suggest that it does. The same type of preparation is entered into; the same types of basic steps are taken procedurally and otherwise and the formalities of litigation there are little different from those of other courts. I wish to again emphasize that the over-all cost of litigation depends upon how elaborate the cases are which are prepared and the costs of legal fees. These operate independently regardless of in what sort of court the cases are conducted.

One suggestion made by the hon. member I think bears comment. He pointed to the expense of appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada. His argument seemed to suggest that it would be more costly to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada against a decision of the Exchequer Court than to a Provincial Appeal Court. This manifestly is not the case. Regardless from what tribunal an appeal is taken to the Supreme Court, the costs of that court for preparation and other procedures are uniform.

I have made these rather extended comments about the Exchequer Court, Mr. Speaker, because I have had experience in that and other courts. I do not think any impression should be left on the record that it is a more expensive tribunal than other courts in this country. As I suggested earlier, the opposite is felt by many experienced members of the bar.

There are difficulties in taking technical cases to any court in Canada. One should recognize the fact that the law of expropriation has now become a very specialized branch of legal practice and legal knowledge. It is certainly not within the capacity of every lawyer to deal with the complicated issues involved in expropriation. I am fortified by the provisions made in this statute for the provision of legal aid in the belief that ordinary citizens will now seek the best counsel and best advice in these cases.

I wish to make two brief comments about issues which have been raised by my hon. friend. Although I jogged him a little bit by my interruptions, I think the points he made are serious and have been seriously considered by the committee. There is always the problem among members of our profession of approaching a strange tribunal. There is also the problem of adapting one's ideas to the rules of that tribunal with which we may not be familiar. I have felt that the Exchequer Court, perhaps because of its extraordinary name, has seemed to be somewhat remote, not only from the average citizen but the average lawyer of this country.

In recent years the Exchequer Court has gone to extraordinary lengths in an attempt to make itself physically accessible to the different parts of Canada. I hope the authorities of that court will take some cognizance of the comments which have been made by the hon. member for Calgary North as to differences in procedure which, although they may appear minute, do cause complications and difficulties for practising members of the legal profession. I might add for the benefit of the hon. member for Calgary North, as the minister said recently, there have been very drastic changes made in the procedure of the Exchequer Court. I have heard lawyers of long experience in that court express concern at the way in which the rules have been streamlined and the way in which procedures have been expedited.

It appears to me that the argument is unanswerable that it is in the national interest to have one court dealing with this complicated question of expropriation by the federal government; to have that one court establish a common jurisprudence and common principles which will apply across the country and to have that one court make its expertise and experience available to citizens in every part of Canada.

In addition there are procedural complications which will arise if the jurisdiction is divided because parties affected by the same expropriation could then conceivably enter proceedings in different courts with great expense to everyone concerned. I look forward to the day when the federal courts of this country will be present in every part of the country. I think it is important from many standpoints that we should expand the physical presence of the federal courts, having regard to the important matters with which they deal such as expropriation, patents and trade marks, taxation, suits against the Crown and many other items of great importance to the public.

I look forward to the introduction of legislation such as has been commented upon by the minister which will take our federal courts more to the people and make them more important in the life of Canadians. In view of these comments, Mr. Speaker, I submit to this House that it is desirable to reject the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred. Pursuant to agreement made earlier this day, I now propose to put motions 2 and 3. They will be debated together.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) (for Mr. Brewin) moved:

(2) That Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land be amended by striking out of clause 8(1) all the words after "public hearing" in line 37 of the bill and substituting the following:

"to ascertain, having regard to the objection or any other objection to the intended expropriation that has been served on him, whether the interest proposed to be expropriated is reasonably required for the achievement of the objectives of the Crown".

and

(3) That Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land be amended by the deletion in clause 8(2), lines 42 and 43, of the words:

"with respect to an objection or objections".

He said: Mr. Speaker, when one is about to go beyond his depth, it is a good idea to admit it at the start. It so happens that my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) had a prior engagement in the west today. He is, therefore, not able to be here to present this proposed amendment. My training in the law has all been obtained right in this place, Mr. Speaker, so I am getting into something with which I am not particularly familiar.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I believe I see the point of the amendment of which notice was given by my hon. friend from Greenwood and I do think it is one which should be made. I understand the amendment was moved in the standing committee and that it was supported there by a number of individuals across party lines.

To explain the proposals as clearly and succinctly as I can, perhaps I might be permitted to read clause 8 (1) as it stands and then to read it as it would appear if the amendment were adopted. Clause 8 (1) as it stands reads as follows:

Forthwith after the expiration of the period of thirty days referred to in section 7, the Minister shall, if he has been served with an objection under that section, order that a public hearing be conducted with respect to the objection and any other objection to the intended expropriation that has been or may be served on him.

The proposed amendment would alter the last few lines, so the subclause would read:

Forthwith after the expiration of the period of thirty days referred to in section 7, the Minister shall, if he has been served with an objection under that section, order a public hearing to ascertain, having regard to the objection or any other objection to the intended expropriation which has been served on him, whether the interest proposed to be expropriated is reasonably required for the achievement of the objectives of the Crown.

As I understand it, what we are seeking by this amendment is an arrangement under which the Crown would be called on to appear at such a hearing and, in effect, show cause for a proposed expropriation. The feeling of those who support the amendment is that though the clause as it stands provides for a public hearing, it does not place the two parties on an equal plane. A public hearing is held, all right, provided a notice has been filed with the minister in accordance with clause 7, but at this public hearing it is not really necessary under the wording as it now stands for the Crown to appear. In other words, the person whose land is being expropriated is able to make his case and give reasons why the expropriation order should not go through, but the Crown for its part is not required to appear and make it clear that a particular parcel of land is really required in the public interest, or in order that the government might achieve the objective it has set out. My hon. friend feels, and I agree with him, that if we are changing the law with regard to expropriation, the Crown should be required to appear at a public hearing of this sort.

It seems to me that what is proposed is eminently fair. If this amendment is not adopted, the person whose land is to be expropriated is not on the same footing as the authority which is trying to expropriate his land. The motion I am putting forward in the name of the hon. member for Greenwood would correct this situation.

I might point out that amendment No. 3, which Your Honour has already read, together with amendments Nos. 4, 5 and 6, is consequential. Once we have decided on amendment No. 2, the others fall into place. If we pass amendment No. 2, it is obvious we shall want to pass the other amendments because they are consequential. If the House does not see fit to accept the amendment before us, I see little point in even moving the other amendments. The proposal we are now considering would put the Crown in the position of having to give reasons before a public hearing in support of proceeding with an expropriation and I feel it ought to receive the support of the House. As I say, I understand there were members in all parties who supported this proposition in the committee. I do not know what the vote was, but I am told there was support from all sides. I hope that since then, consideration having been given to this matter by the government, a favourable decision has been reached.

We are all impressed by the fact that new law is being written in this field. We give credit to the government for the initiative it has shown. We suggest, however, that the government go all the way and that in these public hearings the Crown should be on the same footing as the person whose property is being expropriated. This is the purpose of the amendment presented by my hon. friend from Greenwood, as I understand it, and I wage that it be adopted.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa Carleton): First of all, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). He is not a member of the committee; he is filling in for his hon. friend from Greenwood who is a member, at very short notice, I am sure. He has admirably explained the purpose of the amendment to the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is the advantage of not having been a lawyer.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): He says that is the advantage of not being a lawyer. But I believe he has been in the House for so many years that some of the legal talent available in the chamber has rubbed off on him.

The purpose of the amendment and, indeed, of amendments Nos. 2 to 6, because, as the hon. member noted, they stand together, is that the Minister of Public Works should be represented at the hearings in support of proposed expropriations, and that the hearing officer should form an opinion on the merits.

With respect to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I suggest he is confused as to the purpose of the public hearing. The concept of a hearing in connection with expropriation legislation is new. The purpose is to allow those who have an interest in the expropriated property to make their objections heard in public. In addition to owners, planning boards, municipalities or regional governments might wish to object. The hearing officer would listen to those objections and make a report to the Minister of Public Works. The hearing is not a judicial inquiry; it is not an adversary procedure pitting the minister against the expropriated owners or others interested. The purpose of the hearing is to bring to the public's attention the objections and the reasons for those objections. The purpose is not to force the Minister of Public Works, on behalf of the people of Canada, to a trial of necessity. The Minister of Public Works will be responsible for the expropriation to his colleagues and to the Parliament of this country, and that is a responsibility he will have to accept. His responsibility will be a political one, not a judicial one, because the decision to expropriate is, in the first instance, an administrative decision for which he bears political responsibility here.

The purpose of the hearing is to allow citizens an opportunity to be heard so that the minister may, if he considers it reasonable and in the interests of the public, reconsider his decision to expropriate the property in question, or part of the property, or to expropriate the property under a different time frame. He can reject the objections. He can reject the report of the hearing officer. In doing so he would, of course, be responsible to defend his ultimate decision before Parliament, and thus before the people of Canada.

I submit to Your Honour that amendments Nos. 2 to 6 proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood attempt to convert the public hearing into a judicial proceeding, which it was not meant to be. It is meant to be an opportunity for interested people, whether or not they have an actual interest in the land in question, to make their objections heard.

I want to put on record a communication that I made to Mr. Jack Weir, who was the chairman of an ad hoc committee of the Canadian Bar Association which made a submission to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that tended to support the idea of converting the hearing into a judicial inquiry rather than an opportunity to present objections. This communication was sent to him in the form of a letter on December 17, 1969 and reads in part as follows:

> Whatever considerations may apply in the case of expropriation by statutory bodies, it is my firm view that in the case of the Crown in right of Canada the decisions as to whether any land is required for federal public purposes and as to what land is required for those purposes are political decisions and must be made by the responsible minister of the crown. The exercise of the minister's responsibility must not be fettered in any way by the publication of the opinion of any official as to the merits of the matter, or by the review of his decisions by any tribunal other than the House of Commons.
> For those reasons I cannot agree that the hearing officer should express any opinion upon the merits of the proposed expropriation, and I note that at page 1008 of the McRuer report it is said that: "Since the officer is not to have a decisional role in the procedure, it is with some reluctance that we recommend that he express an opinion on the merits".

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

I continue in my letter to Mr. Weir:

> I am not satisfied that the reasons given in the report for overcoming the reluctance to make that recommendation outweigh the reasons to the contrary which apply in the case of expropriation by the crown in right of Canada.

I might say that in his report Chief Justice McRuer dealt with expropriation procedure in right of the crown for the province of Ontario, and a good deal of his observations related to the power to expropriate now in the hands of regional, municipal and statutory bodies, other than the province itself.

After due consideration the committee rejected the amendments moved by the hon. member for Greenwood, and again I would urge the House to follow the decision of the committee and reject the amendments now before the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motions? All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my view the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75, a recorded division on the proposed motions stands deferred.

Consistent with the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I might suggest to the House that discussion on Motions 4, 5, and 6 be deferred until a decision has been taken on Motions 2 and 3.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to agree to that suggestion. We can wait and see the outcome of the vote on Motions 2 and 3. If the vote is favourable, I will then move motions 4, 5 and 6. If the vote is unfavourable on motions 2 and 3, then obviously there would be no point in moving motions 4, 5 and 6. I just want to protect the right to move motions 4, 5 and 6 if we are fortunate enough to get a favourable decision later this day.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that is understood. Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa Carleton) moved:

> That Bill C-136, an act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by striking out line 21 on page 13 and substituting the following:
> "interest, and a copy of the appraisal shall".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the first time that I have ever failed to accept a committee's decision at the report stage. With other bills for which I have been responsible, such as the Official Languages bill and the omnibus Criminal Code amendments, even where the decision went against me, I accepted the decision. However, in this case there were some rather peculiar circumstances, although I am making no reflection on anyone. There was a fast motion made and a fast vote taken. Before the minister or the committee had really realized what had happened the vote had been taken, and the committee refused to reopen the proceedings. Therefore, the only way I can have the matter properly tested is to bring it to the attention of the House as a whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Amendments are not faring very well today.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The earlier amendments were given full and weighty consideration by the committee. This amendment was voted upon in rather a shotgun fashion before I had the opportunity to address myself to it—indeed, before the committee as a whole had thoroughly discussed it.

This subclause was amended in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The purpose of the motion that I am making is to restore it to the form in which it appeared upon first reading of the bill. This subclause is an integral part of the legislative scheme incorporated in the bill.

Clause 14(1) imposes upon the minister an obligation to offer to pay each expropriated owner the full amount of the minister's estimate of the compensation payable to him without prejudice to the right of the owner to claim additional compensation. That offer is generally to be made within 90 days of the registration of the notice of confirmation. If it is not made within that period, the owner is entitled to additional interest under clause 33 (4).

If the offer made by the minister is less than the compensation adjudged to be payable, then the owner is entitled to interest at the basic rate on the difference, and in addition, if the offer is less than 90 per cent of the compensation adjudged to be payable, the owner gets interest at the rate of 5 per cent of the total compensation payable. That is provided by clause 33 (3).

On the other hand, if the minister's offer exceeds the compensation adjudged to be payable, the excess constitutes a debt due to the Crown by the owner. That is provided by clause 32. So it is clear that it is in the interest of owners that the offers made by the minister not exceed the compensation determined to be payable by the court, if the matter goes to court, because the excess would have to be paid back to the Crown and the Crown could sue for it. It is also in the interest of the Crown, and the people of Canada, that the offers be as close as possible to the compensation adjudged to be payable in order to avoid the payment of excessive interest by way of penalty.

In order for owners to decide whether to claim additional compensation in the Exchequer Court they should, of course, know the precise basis upon which the minister has calculated the offer, and clause 14(3), as it read before amendment in the committee, requires the minister to send, together with the offer, a copy of the written appraisal upon which the offer is based.

The committee saw fit to amend this provision by requiring the minister to send with the offer copies of all appraisals which he may then have. It is my view that the amendment will tend to frustrate the purposes of the bill. I think all members will appreciate that the appraisal of land is not an exact science, and appraisers frequently differ widely in their opinions as to the value of the same lot or parcel of land. It is obviously desirable, therefore, for the Crown to obtain more than one appraisal and to obtain them at as early a date as possible in order to facilitate advanced planning of public works and the making of prompt payment to expropriated owners.

It is in the interest of the Crown and the owner that the Crown obtain a variety of opinions. If only one appraisal were to be obtained it might be much too low, and an offer made on that basis could well deprive the expropriated owner of early payment of the full compensation to which he is entitled. In addition, it would subject the Crown to the payment of penalty interest. On the other hand, if there were only one appraisal it could conceivably be much too high, and an initial payment of compensation on that basis might result in the owner being subjected to legal proceeding by the crown to recover the difference between the compensation adjudged to be payable and the amount of the payment to him.

However, if more than one appraisal is obtained, the minister may well feel that one of them is substantially too high and he will not wish to make an offer on the basis of that appraisal. That would be not because he was not prepared to pay the owner the full value of his property, because it is in the Crown's interest that he come as close as possible to the true value in making his offer. The minister may genuinely believe that one of his appraisals prepared for him is erroneous, as they frequently are, and does not represent the true value of the property.

In such a case, obviously the minister would not want to disclose the erroneous appraisal to the expropriated owner, because while it may be in the minister's view erroneous, owners are not generally knowledgeable about such matters and they may feel they should be paid the amount of the highest appraisal. This would tend to make negotiations of a settlement next to impossible, and there would therefore be a reluctance on the part of the department to disclose any appraisal thought to be unreasonably high.

If the clause were not to be readjusted as it was, and if this amendment were not carried, it might well be that the Department of Public Works or other departments, because of the necessity to obtain as wide a range of opinion as possible and because of the difficulty of submitting only one report, would resort to subterfuge in obtaining oral appraisals. I do not believe this bill now before us should promote that sort of thing. The officials should be free to obtain proper appraisals and disclose only that appraisal which the minister regards as reflecting the true value of the premises, and upon which he is prepared to base his offer.

After all, the purpose of producing an appraisal is to allow the owner, the owner's appraisors and the owner's legal representatives to analyze the basis upon which the value is calculated, and for the minister to estimate the true value as calculated. If the clause stands as amended, the minister may obtain only one appraisal with all the attendant risks to both owners and the Crown resulting from offers based on erroneous appraisals. If the offer is too low, the Crown will have to pay a penalty. If the offer is too high, the owner will have to refund to the Crown that which is in excess of the offer made initially by the Crown. In any event, an offer too high or too low based on only one appraisal might well result in a failure of the negotiation procedure under the bill being as useful as it is intended to be.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

In short, as amended by the committee, the provisions will not really work in the interest of either the owners or the Crown, and may tend to promote the use of devious means by administration of the bill. For these reasons I proposed the amendment which will restore the clause to its original form. I hope that upon sober reflection those members of the committee who beat us to the punch will duly consider their position.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion (Mr. Turner, Ottawa-Carleton) agreed to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTERS OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment which are as follows: The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath)—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—complaints respecting harassment of Portuguese ships; the hon. member for Abitibi—construction of access road, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis)—Immigration—Deportation of deserters from U.S. Armed forces.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely Notices of Motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' NOTICES OF MOTIONS

UNITED NATIONS

SUGGESTED CANADIAN INITIATIVE TO AMEND CHARTER

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should take initiatives for United Nations Charter reform to make that institution a more effective instrument for the prevention of military aggression, for the settlement of international disputes, and to promote co-operation, peace and prosperity and in particular, to seek amendments to the Charter articles dealing with peacekeeping, the veto power, financing, membership and arms' control.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in this century the peoples of the world have suffered two horrible major wars. Since the end of the last World War there have been 48 major and minor wars. These wars have resulted in a horrible loss of life, great losses of property and the waste of large sums of money and resources. We have just finished a terrible civil war in Nigeria. After 30 months of fighting and killing, many people in the world might ask what has been accomplished? What do wars accomplish in settling disputes between peoples and nations?

Many people throughout the world, not just in Canada, ask what we can do about this, and what can individuals do about this. They ask if this waste and destruction is necessary in this age when we can travel to the moon, when we can transplant hearts and kidneys, when we can transmit information throughout the world by satellite and when we have computers than can calculate in a millionth of a second work that used to be done in hours. They ask why cannot man come up with a civilized way of preventing military aggression and doing away with wars as a means of settling international disputes.

In 1945 there was great hope for the world when the United Nations adopted the UN Charter. I think one of the greatest documents ever adopted by mankind is the preamble of that Charter which states:

We the peoples of the United Nations determined to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind—

It goes on to say that they have come together to unite their strength to maintain international peace and security. Unfortunately, despite the good intentions of 1945, the UN Charter and the United Nations have not been able to guarantee to the world the security and peace it desires. This is not to say that the United Nations has been a failure. I think it has been of much value. Many people criticize it for being inadequate and want to do away with it altogether. I think that would be a real mistake. Had we not had the present United Nations, I believe perhaps we would have had more major wars since 1945. The very fact that these nations can come together to talk out their problems is an indication of some success. At least they are talking and not shooting and killing. I think this in itself is of value. But despite this, the security we hoped for back in 1945 has not been provided. I should also like to point out that much of the good work being done by the United Nations today is work which was not fully contemplated in 1945. About 80 per cent of the good work done by the United Nations is in the economic field and is carried out by the specialized agencies.

Despite this I say to this House, this government, this country and this world, that we must devise some system whereby we can minimize war and if possible do away with it as a means of settling disputes. I believe the United Nations Charter should be reformed. When the present charter was adopted in 1945 there were only 51 members of the United Nations. Now there are 126. In Chapter XVIII of the Charter, there are provisions for amending the Charter, but the provisions have not been used as fully as many people would like. In my resolution I propose reform of the United Nations under certain headings.

First of all, I refer to peacekeeping. Because that is one of the most complex areas, I will leave it to the end along with the heading arms control. Let me go on to the second matter which is the veto power. Under Article 27(3) of the United Nations Charter the Security Council cannot act unless it has the unanimous support of all five permanent members. As the world knows, the power to veto action at the United Nations by one of the big five has often frustrated the United Nations and the world in their efforts to take the necessary action.

I suggest, to begin with, that we amend the Charter to provide that the Security Council be increased from 15 members to 17 members; that we have 7 permanent members instead of 5 and that the two new permanent members be Japan and Brazil. Of course, I believe it goes without question that the real government of China must replace the present government of China; that is, the Republic of China represented by the government in Peking must replace the present government which is represented at the United Nations if we are to have a truly representative Security Council. I suggest a Security Council with 17 members and 7 permanent members, including the real government of China, Japan and Brazil. I suggest also that the single veto power be taken away and replaced by a veto power of five permanent members. I feel that a veto power of five permanent members would give a much more representative value to the actions of the Security Council because if you do have five permanent members objecting to some action this would mean that you really have five of the most powerful and populous nations in the world objecting and that, therefore, you would not succeed in any event.

The next point I should like to refer to is in respect of the financing of the United Nations. Article 17 of the Charter provides for financing. At the present time the United Nations is financed through assessments against the member states plus other smaller sources such as the sale of United Nations stamps at New York and Geneva. This, however, is wholly inadequate. I think the amount of money that is spent on the United Nations is ridiculous in comparison with the amount spent on armaments. I suggest that in addition to increasing the amount of the assessments the United Nations, under its Charter, should have the power to collect licence fees for such things as exploitation of the seabed, the use of outer space by satellites, other missiles and so on. These international areas should be subject to the jurisdiction of the United Nations. The United Nations should have the right to collect revenue for the use of these areas in order to support its work. I would also think that if nations refuse to pay their contributions to the UN for the purpose of furthering its powers their voting right should be suspended. There has been much discussion concerning what should be done about those nations which do not pay their contributions.

Next, I should like to refer to membership. Membership comes under Chapter II, Article 3. I believe one of the main drawbacks in this article is that it does not provide for the very small or divided state. I think there should be provision in the Charter for the divided states. I believe there should be some type of associate membership so that Germany, Korea, Viet Nam and other states which have been divided could be included. They would not be given the rights and responsibilities of full membership, but I think it is important that they be given an opportunity to participate in the United Nations at least as associate members. There should also be provision for very small states, the micro-states. The Maldive Islands is a state with 30,000 people. There are other independent states in the Caribbean which I believe have populations of fewer than 30,000 people. There should be some way in which such states could participate without being full members and without having full responsibilities because they would not be in a position to bear these responsibilities.

Next, I wish to refer to the matter of peacekeeping and arms control. Chapter VII of the United Nations Charter provides for peace keeping. However, some of the most important aspects of our peace keeping activity have not been carried out under that chapter. They have taken place under the various "uniting for Peace" resolutions of the General Assembly which came into existence after the outbreak of the Korean war. It is generally agreed that our peacekeeping operations,—and this has been agreed especially after the 1967 war in the Middle East—should be strengthened and even brought beyond the strength which it originally had when UNEF was first set up. I suggest that amendments should be made to the United Nations Charter to establish a permanent core group for the UN peace forces. This core group would be under the direction of the Secretary General of the UN and a special peacekeeping section of the secretariat. It would be recruited from people throughout the world. It would be paid directly by and be responsible to the United Nations, in the way that all the other staff of the UN is recruited. After all, the UN secretariat has quite a large staff, both in New York and Geneva, which is recruited from peoples of the world. I suggest that the core group of the UN peacekeeping force should be recruited and paid in the same way.

In addition, this group would deal with the administration of the peace force, communications operations, logistics, police duty, and other services which must be at readiness in case of an emergency. The national forces which are committed to peacekeeping should be earmarked by the nations of the world in a much more firm way than they are now. I discovered at a meeting of the subcommittee of the Committee on External Affairs of this House that a unit of our national forces is earmarked for the United Nations but that this commitment is not as firm as our commitment to NATO, for example. I feel that it should definitely be as firm.

With regard to arms control, if we can develop a strong peacekeeping force, then the general disarmament which the United Nations has been trying to bring about would be much easier to achieve. I think that we will have a general and phased disarmament if we are able to increase the power of the peacekeeping force.

There are many areas in the United Nations Charter to which I could suggest amendments, but I pointed out only five. I would like to point out that 1970 is the year of the 25th anniversary of the UN Charter. It will be celebrated this year on October 24. I think that we can really mark this 25th birthday in a meaningful way by taking some measures to strengthen that organization and by doing something to secure peace in the world. I think that we should celebrate this birthday in a meaningful way, not just with a mere ceremony.

Some people say that we can do many of the things I suggested without reforming the UN Charter. It may be that some of my suggestions can be implemented without such charter reforms, but I think we need the emphasis and the certainty of the direction in which the United Nations should go by charter reform.

Others may say in objection to my suggestions that these things cannot be done right away, that there is too much disagreement at the United Nations. To that I would say that it is up to the Canadian government to state its objective clearly, even though they are long range objectives, with the understanding that we may not get everything at once. But let us at least work toward these long range objectives.

Finally, some people might say that it might be wrong to give the United Nations more power to amend its charter. They state that by giving up some of our sovereignty, by putting some of our trust in an international body which could be dominated by other nations, we might be losing control of the right to determine our own destiny. To that I would say that with the present system we have not been able to guarantee our security.

In this century we have had two major wars, and since 1948 we have had major and minor conflicts. Certainly, there will be a risk involved in handing over more power to the United Nations, but I think the risk is minor as compared to the risk of another major war occurring under the present system. It is certain that risks are involved and that we might be taking a chance, but I say, let us take those risks because if we do not, we are in for even greater trouble.

Some people might say that these suggestions are too idealistic, that to think of a United Nations as it was created in 1945 is too idealistic and does not take into account the realities of the world situation. I say that if we feel we can maintain peace with the type of world structure that we have and the United Nations has, then we are being idealistic and not realistic. If we think we can really do something about international conflicts with the system of sovereign states that we have now, and the type of United Nations we have now, then we are being unrealistic. The only realistic proposal is to make the United Nations strong enough to maintain peace and prevent aggression.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I am very glad that the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) has put this private members' notice of motion on the order paper because I can think of no subject of more importance to the survival, not only of the United Nations and its possible contribution to world peace, but of the world itself when we come face to face with the realities of the international situation.

I think quite frankly that one of the problems we face in trying to come to grips with the situation which exists in the international sphere is to really ascertain what the facts are. I think it would not be an overstatement of the present international situation to describe it as one of almost total anarchy. Certainly, that is true when it comes to the co-operation of nations with nations. Those who speak glibly about international law, when it comes to the movement of powers and great powers, are speaking about something that really does not exist. They are speaking about those occasional agreements that arise when they are in the best interests of those who are party to them.

When one considers the facts as indicated by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, the number of wars that not only have occurred since the end of world war II but are occurring even now, the degree to which nations seem incapable of solving some of the great human tragedies of our time, whether they be in Nigeria, Congo, Viet Nam, the Middle East or wherever, one realizes that we have little power at present at the United Nations to deal with these pressing human problems. Yet, one of the strange paradoxes of our times is that we can see a number of areas, internationally speaking, where there has been considerable agreement. We take it for granted when someone wishes to post a letter—provided it goes beyond the borders of this country, and that is where the question is, perhaps, these days—that it will normally arrive at its destination because we established some years ago now the International Postal Union which ensures the transport of mail to almost every corner of the world. We take it for granted as well, when airlines set up schedules that move planes all over this world, that there is agreement as to the nature of landing facilities and landing procedures which are ultimately important to bring planes safely round the world day after day. International agreements, through agencies of the United Nations, have established a sensible program of international airline co-operation.

The same facts could be repeated again and again in relation to a number of spheres. The sphere that may be of most importance for the future resolution of the problem enunciated in this notice of motion concerns the degree to which business has become internationalized. Business and the expansion of trade usually precede, in most cases, the political arrangements that men devise. In my opinion, if we are looking for some sign of hope toward the regularization of a form of law and order in the international community, it may come because of the very rapid development of the multinational or international corporation, and from the fact that those who trade and manufacture see little purpose to the confinement and restrictions that national boundaries have in past times created.

It is true that we are at the 25th anniversary of the United Nations, and I will not repeat the excellent elaboration that was given by the mover of the motion on the establishment of the Charter in 1945. Now, the desire seems to be that we should attempt to set right many of the weaknesses that have become more and more apparent during the 25 year operation of the United Nations. I think, quite frankly, that we will have to look squarely at the basic problems if we are to do that.

I am in total support of the proposals that the hon. member has advanced this afternoon, and I hope they will receive full consideration in the appropriate parliamentary committee. Perhaps the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Goyer) seconded the motion is an indication that this matter will be referred, at the conclusion of this afternoon's discussion, to the External Affairs Committee for much greater consideration than we are able to give it this afternoon. But my own fear, and it is an overriding fear, is that the motion does not go far enough.

My overriding fear is that even if it were possible for the motion to pass, and for the government to act on all points raised in the motion, and—this would be the most remarkable of all—if it were possible for all these matters to be taken up and acted upon by the 131 members of the United Nations, even then we would find that the basic problem had not yet been dealt with. I refer to the question of jurisdiction. Quite frankly, it is the question of national sovereignty.

There are certain questions that each age has as its sacred cow, and it has been my experience, particularly in the last year or so, that no sacred cow looms larger for people in this country, and in most western countries, than that of national sovereignty. It is the sacred cow which we have willingly worshipped for many years—

Mr. Bigg: For centuries.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): For centuries, as my colleague reminds me. Over the years, nations have imbued this question with an aura that has elevated it to the status of being a sacred cow. The sacred cow is now so inviolable that we willingly offer up human lives and human possessions in order to continue to pay service to it. If anyone needs the latest example of this kind of worship one has only to think of the ways in which nations willingly looked the other way when the people of Nigeria were caught up in a dreadful civil war that almost split their country asunder. These other nations, for some 30 months, could say self-righteously, "It is not our affair because we would never seek to question what goes on beyond the sovereign boundaries of another nation!" I wonder just how long we can carry on with that level of hypocrisy and human cynicism which says that our allegiance to a concept such as national sovereignty is more important than the lives of millions of people, men women and children. The young people of our society and our country no longer think that answer is good enough. They have demonstrated that by taking to the streets. I think, too, we will find that more and more people in the adult generation will say that answer is not good enough. They are asking for possible alternatives to be elaborated by our leaders and statesmen.

The alternative that has been painted until recently by a very small group of people is that we should consider some form of world federalism in which there would be a granting of powers by the nation states to a larger world body. On a theoretical basis this looks attractive and sensible, and for those of us who live within a national federal system it seems eminently workable. But I think people have not examined the alternative closely enough to realize where the danger still lies. For me, the danger lies in the fact that we will still have nation states, presumably of their own free will granting and contributing certain powers to this international body. Such a world body would obviously be better than the present United Nations, but it would still have the weakness of regarding the nations as somehow exercising an ultimate sovereignty of their own.

I think we can never get away from a concept of sovereignty. Sovereignty exists because it relates to power and it relates to people. That is where I think we should start looking for our answer, by putting the power back in the hands of the people. I think if we are going to get beyond the present impasse, and I think it is important that we do—it is fundamental for the survival of this civilization—we will have to begin to be more creative about devising another kind of political framework through which people can invest and direct their power into an international forum, not just through national governments but directly in their own right.

If you wish, I would use the example of the Canadian federation. We meet here as members of a federal Parliament exercising jurisdiction on a number of questions of importance to the nation, not because ten provinces and two territories have created this Parliament and sent us here as individuals but because 21 million or 22 million people who call themselves Canadians in regular elections send their representatives to this forum to transact business on their behalf.

This is perhaps a kind of federalism which on a world plane might indeed get us beyond the impasse which we presently face. It is an impasse in three basic areas. It is an impasse in terms of jurisdiction, and jurisdiction I think will continue to hound us as long as there is in fact no consensus on the degree to which this body may act independently. The body's functioning will be further limited by the fact that its financing depends on the capricious behavior and interests of the nation states. We have seen and learned only too well how limited and how hamstrung this organization can be when its financing depends on that kind of response. Thirdly, the responsibility of this body can be exercised only as freely as the individual nation states, and particularly the most powerful ones, are willing to allow it to act.

I suppose that if the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has been considered an idealist, my suggestions will be considered to be those of a wild-eyed idealist. But, Mr. Speaker, I think the time has come for us to realize that unless we are willing to attack the root of the problem, the difficulties of establishing some form of international law and order, we are merely turning up the control on a pressure cooker that, when it finally explodes, will hurt everyone. It is clear that the pressure has been great enough over the past 25 years to hurt millions of people. They are being hurt at this moment.

It seems to me that Canada, one of the few countries that has been able to work effectively and successfully with the federal form of government, could make an unparallelled contribution in this field. We have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who claims to believe that the federal form of government is the form of government that ought to work best for an international community. I commend the hon. member for introducing this proposal relating to the reform of the charter of the United Nations. I say that this is just a threshold, an opening of the door for major change. This proposal would enable us to establish a form of government that is responsible to people and that would ensure the kind of peace, good government and security that the peoples of this modern world so desperately need.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, may I at the outset commend the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) for introducing this private members' notice of motion asking the government to take the initiative in strengthening the charter of the United Nations so that it may become a more effective international organization than it is today.

I hope the House will refer this notice of motion to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that it may be dealt with in an appropriate fashion. I also hope the subject matter of the notice of motion will come before the House in the form of legislation in the near future.

Like the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), I cannot help stressing the importance of the issue before us. I often wish hon. members of the House would consider this matter as one of top priority and would begin to show much more concern about where the world is going as a community and what will happen to us all in the next 15 or 20 years. The hon. member for Egmont has said some of the things I wanted to say about our reasons for creating a world organization with real power and a great deal of sovereignty.

As automation and technology develop, we are transformed increasingly into a global village. Today national boundaries are not as important as they were five or ten years ago. When you consider economic transactions, modern communications, travel and the many things that people all over the world have in common, you realize that the world is becoming smaller. That is one reason for our establishing a world community which will have more power than the UN has at present, and some measure of sovereignty. We see many tragedies in the world: this is an additional reason for strengthening the United Nations charter and moving in the direction of giving the UN more power.

Today the world lives under the balance of terror. The other day President Nixon announced that additional billions of dollars are to be allocated for the development of Safeguard Anti-ballistic missiles. This, in turn, will encourage the U.S.S.R. and other countries to spend more money on the development of weapons. Thus, stockpiles of weapons keep escalating; the proliferation of nuclear weapons is encouraged, and ultimately, acts of aggression are encouraged. We have seen examples of international violence. War is going on in Viet Nam and in the Sudan. A war has just finished in Nigeria. War is raging in the Middle East. One year ago last fall we witnessed the tragic invasion of Czechoslovakia. Since all indications are that the foreign policies of the United States, the Soviet Union and other countries will continue as at present, there is a clear indication that troubles of this kind will become more frequent.

These are not the only reasons for strengthening the United Nations and moving toward a world organization that has more power than at present. In the world we see many problems. There are problems of pollution, which must be dealt with on an international basis—water, air and foods are polluted. As a matter of fact, about an hour ago I read a newspaper article saying that in the opinion of a zoologist human beings may not have more than 20 or 25 years to live on this planet unless they eliminate their pollution. We are polluting our atmosphere, our soil and our rivers. These are all matters which pay no attention to international boundaries. Clearly, in matters of pollution international boundaries are not important.

We must also begin thinking of a strengthened international organization for other reasons. We are witnessing the problem of the population explosion. One sees, especially in the developing countries, that overpopulation is a real threat; we have a problem in feeding people who are coming into our world. We also have poverty on a tremendous international scale. Two-thirds of the world's people are either starving or living in abject poverty. These people will become desperate, and when they do we shall have no guarantee of peace in the world. When a man is hungry he thinks of revolution, and when many people manifest similar sentiments in a nation you have no guarantee of peace or security anywhere in the world.

I have cited some reasons to support my contention that the world community should be strengthened. But, Mr. Speaker, we must also start looking at solutions of the many problems facing us in the world. As has been said in the House, our society has placed men on the moon and transplanted hearts; doctors are now talking about transplanting brains. I wish we could do as good a job in reforming our society and solving some of the economic problems facing us in Canada and the peoples of the world.

As I said, we must begin as soon as possible to build a world organization which will have some power and sovereignty. There must be a world federation of some kind. No one can stand here and spell out in detail what kind of world federation ought to be introduced in the future, but we must all begin by trying to give the world organization power—power to limit the arms race. The world organization must have more power for peace keeping and for peaceful intervention in the many wars now going on, we must show that the international community is truly concerned. The international community must have more power to tackle problems of poverty and pollution which transgress national boundaries.

Many might say, "But how is this to be done?" I would be the first to admit that we are not talking about a simple proposition. We are talking about a new order in the world community—and it must be introduced. Canada is a highly respected middle power and can do much to gather support for this idea. We must avoid in future repeating what we all did or did not do in the Nigeria-Biafra incident. The international community did not want to become involved in the conflict because of the sacred cow of sovereignty to which the hon. member for Egmont referred. The international community thought, "This has nothing to do with us" even though it witnessed a world tragedy on an enormous scale. That showed the weakness of the UN and why we must reform it as quickly as possible. I submit that Canada as a well-respected nation can lead the way toward a more viable and powerful world community.

If we are to achieve this objective, as a first step I suggest we abandon the arms race and opt out of regional military pacts such as NATO and NORAD. We should pursue an independent foreign policy so that Canada may wield more influence among the nations of the world, particularly among the third world, with a view to establishing a responsible world community. Also, I submit we ought to recognize mainland China as soon as possible and make sure that country is seated on the Security Council of the United Nations. How can one begin talking about a world community when the country containing a quarter of the world's population remains outside the world organization? It is foolish to think about a world organization which does not have mainland China among its membership as well as every other country which is not in the United Nations.

This will take time. As long as we keep hesitating and procrastinating, nothing will be done. If we keep hedging, the United Nations will gradually become weaker and weaker until, like the League of Nations, it will become completely ineffective and will disappear. This will not happen quickly. If we look at history we will see that it took a long time for the nation state to evolve and develop into what we have today. If we go back, we will see that at the beginning there were tribal units. These gradually formed city states and kingdoms. It took a long time before the nation state evolved out of kingdoms. Today we must move into a new era with an international organization or some type of world federation.

I wish to once again state why we should refer this motion to the committee. Hopefully, the committee will carry out some constructive work on this resolution, and as much of it as possible should be included in legislation. I wish the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, who put this motion on the Order Paper, had talked this way when a number of us were trying to get certain aspects of the Nigerian problem discussed at the United Nations. This was one problem we all faced. I was disappointed that some members, particularly the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, did not support our action in trying to get part of the Nigerian problem discussed at the United Nations. If my information is correct, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce is chairman of the Liberal Party caucus on external affairs and defence. I wish him well in trying to sell these ideas to some of his colleagues. If my experience in this House has taught me anything, he will need a bit of luck.

Canada is respected all over the world. I think most people agree, including the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) who spent some time at the United Nations, that we are respected more than any other country, certainly more than the United States, the Soviet Union or any of the major powers. Because of this we can lead the way in many matters. This is only one of the fields in which we must lead the way in the near future. I think it is vital to the very existence, not only of Canada and our society but of the world community.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join other members of the House in congratulating the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) for introducing this motion. It is to his credit that it is a private member's motion. I do not think it should be ignored on that account. It is a very important motion.

The United Nations was an experiment in world federalism. No matter what it is called, it is a re-birth of the League of Nations. Unfortunately, in 1945 we repeated the same error we made in the League of Nations. I say "we" because Canada was one of the originators of the idea of the United Nations. Having written nine-tenths of the charter in very acceptable form, we left out a very important power—the power to enforce peace.

Several members have pointed out that the human being is a very noble creature. He is willing to organize himself, sacrifice himself and he will listen to any amount of propaganda, some of which is acceptable depending from what source it is heard. He may herd millions of people to their death. It is very difficult to get a small percentage of people willing to enforce peace. Enforcing peace seems incompatible, but I do not think it is necessarily incompatible; it has the same source and interest.

We must have power. Power can be used for good as well as for evil. The human family has the very bad habit of organizing itself behind its weapons, getting excited and even noble about the wrong causes. A great many people feel it is impossible to edge forward in the opposite direction. I am not one of those people who believe it is impossible, but I do think it is difficult.

When I was a lad I was by a dock in Vancouver when I saw two diminutive Japanese sailors doing something that I thought was extremely foolish. They each had a pole in their hand and they were pushing the Empress of Japan, an 18,000-ton ship. I was a prairie boy and I did not know much about the sea. I still do not know too much about it. I was impressed by the fact that these two young men were wasting their time. They were pushing the Empress of Japan with two poles not more than three inches in diameter.

I did not have anything else to do in those days, so I sat and watched. After a few minutes the Empress of Japan moved out from the dock. It is true that it moved slowly, but with the persistent efforts of two diminutive Asiatics the Empress of Japan moved out from the dock. The other gentlemen on the deck threw down some rope objects shaped like large doughnuts, which were put between the ship and the dock. Damage to the Empress of Japan was prevented by two small men who persisted and performed what to me looked like an impossible task.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, backed by myself and other members who have spoken, can be referred to as diminutive westerners pushing the people of Canada, perhaps the whole world, a few inches closer to sanity. This may launch a new era in peaceful negotiations around the world. I certainly hope it does. Most of my life has been involved in practical things, so I want to make a practical suggestion. I am not cynical. I suggest this is a good place in which to launch a national campaign against vindictiveness. I do not know what we can do in the case of Red China or Russia, or what we can do to introduce the subject more forcefully to our rich and powerful neighbour to the south—but we can do something here.

If we can get Canadians really interested in the subject, I think something can be done. Canada has already made a considerable contribution to world affairs. Our former Prime Minister, Lester B. Pearson, was and still is highly respected in international circles. He is not always appreciated as much at home as he is abroad, but nevertheless he has made a considerable contribution to this subject. I am sure that he made efforts to give the United Nations teeth at the time that organization was formed.

Perhaps the crux of the matter is that it will cost money. We must be willing to spend a little more money on the affairs of this world. I am glad to know the hon. member who introduced this subject is a practical man. He knows the United Nations must be financed. We are a very rich nation. In the past we have sometimes been willing to pay a great deal more than our share, and we must continue to do so in the future. We not only have the resources but we know what the problem is, or certainly a few of us do. So it is our job to sell this idea to the Canadian people in every way possible.

I think time is running out. I am not a Jeremiah, but I believe that in this fast-moving age of ours we do not have 20 or 30 years in which to put this policy into operation. If this boat is to be pushed out, we had better get going in the two or three years we have. It must be done. As to China and Russia, we should not worry about that problem; I am sure there are millions of people in China and Russia who do not want war. This is true of the United States and it is certainly true of Canada. We must be realistic. While we are preparing our attitudes and speeches in the United Nations, we ought to be frank with these people and tell them their faults as we see them, as gently and as firmly as we can. We must remind Red China that if they expect co-operation from us—and sometimes the mouse can help the lion—they must be willing to join the rest of the human race; they cannot have their own way 100 per cent of the time.

It cannot be taken for granted that because Canada is small in terms of population we shall always be willing to go along with the policy adopted by other nations, whether the United States or the communistic states. On our part, because of our central location we are sometimes tempted to think we are as important or as powerful as other nations I have mentioned simply because we occupy such a big space on the map. Sometimes the communist countries forget that Canada, too, has an important part to play and that international communism is perhaps not the answer to all the world's ills.

I think some of the policies followed by the United States have not been given full credit. For instance, the Marshall Plan, stripped of its political aspects, and no doubt there were a few, was one of the most generous acts of mankind in the history of this planet. Unless sovereign states are willing to see another side of the question and accept this type of overture, it will be difficult to reach the final stage which Tennyson foresaw 120 years ago when he said he looked forward to the day when we furled the battle flags in the confederation of the world.

I am not a world federalist in any formal sense, but I do think every nation should be prepared to give up some of its sovereignty. I agree with my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island when he said this sacred cow must be stripped of its garland. Let us not kill the cow, because we need milk; but I am against the sacred cow. If by taking a lead through giving up a small portion of her sovereignty Canada could set an example to smaller nations on the one hand, and to larger nations on the other, it would show we were willing to give up a chest-thumping approach in the broader interests of mankind. I think the motion put forward today might well be a milestone in the progress of mankind.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, technically, I supported the motion because it derived from a much valid concept and because I wanted to give the House the opportunity of discussing it, through the initiative of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), although I have serious reservations about the feasibility of what this motion proposes.

Naturally, I would need more than two minutes, the time left before the dinner recess, to explain those reservations. However, I can say that Canada made it a point of honour, at the last session of the UN, to wage a public fight, which was started by the minister when he visited New York last September, in order to get the Organization to work more efficiently.

Canada took three steps during the last session. In the first place, it advocated improvement in research. It is a known fact that the UN is flooded with all kinds of reports, which curtails its effectiveness. In addition, as for conferences and meetings, the Secretariat organized in 1960 for the Assembly in New York and in Geneva; 2,070 meetings; in 1967, there were 5,400 meetings that is twice as many, and in 1969, 6,400. It is obvious that at the rate those people meet to discuss various problems, it is impossible for them to be efficient.

In connection with methods and procedures, we have noted, for example, that assignments are badly distributed; for example, the special committee on policy met 46 times during the last session, shile the committee on social policy met 93 times. The question of apartheid was raised in three committees. We suggested the establishment of a three-member committee to discuss work organization in the United Nations, the efficiency of the existing committees, the procedure and the making up of the agenda, etc.

Those three resolutions were passed by the General Assembly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

[English]

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

EXPROPRIATION

ACQUISITION AND ABANDONMENT OF LAND, APPOINTMENT OF HEARING OFFICERS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre (for Mr. Brewin) moved:

That Bill C-136, an act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by adding at the end of subsection (1) of section 23 thereof the following: "so that each owner shall receive full and fair compensation for the expropriation".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I made the remark this afternoon when we were debating motion No. 2 that there is such a thing as getting beyond one's depth. If I did not drown that time, hon. members can be hopeful that I might this time or next time.

In the absence of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), I am privileged to put forward this amendment which Your Honour has read to the House. I believe it was understood that motions Nos. 8 and 9 would be considered together. At any rate, as far as I am concerned No. 9 is consequential upon No. 8, and therefore on this occasion I shall make only the one speech.

As I understand it, the change sought by this amendment submitted by the hon. member for Greenwood was discussed at some length in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I gather that under the old system, the amount to be paid in cases of expropriation was determined by the court on its own initiative in light of its own judgment. On the other hand, the aim of the bill now before us is to change this practice and to provide statutory rules which will determine the amount of compensation.

I take it, having read the record of the committee proceedings, that there is general approval for this change. In fact, that is one of the main reasons for the introduction of this legislation. I think I am being fair to my colleague from Greenwood when I say that although he preferred not to make the change at all, he was prepared to accept statutory rules for the fixing of compensation, provided there was a bit of leeway afforded the court; that there was a provision that would make it possible for the court to exercise its own judgment in cases that did not seem to be covered in full by the rules set out in the statute.

The intent of my hon. friend's amendment is pretty well stated in the words that he would like added to subsection 1 of section 23, namely, "so that each owner shall receive full and fair compensation for the expropriation". In other words, the proposal that my hon. friend makes is along these lines: Let there be rules in the statute, and let the court follow those rules. But if there are cases where it is clear to the court that full and fair compensation has not been provided, then the court should have the authority and the jurisdiction to see that fair compensation is provided.

Perhaps I might take a moment to read a few words from the committee record. At pages 62 and 63 of issue No. 5 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, the hon. member for Greenwood said this:

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I am fearful that the infinite complexity of property owning and types of property and so on will mean that the endeavour under clause 24 to spell out in detail the exact rules to be applied in every case may mean that you have a rigidity that will prevent people from receiving a full and fair compensation. This would still leave these rules to be applied prima facie as to how the expropriation would be carried out. But if some case arose in which the rules clearly did not give full and fair compensation because of some type of property that did not fit into this same concept of market value or because of some reasons the market was not adequate or these other rules did not apply, in that case the court would be unable to do justice. In other words it would leave the thing at large rather than making this a rigid set of rules.

There is quite a bit more that I could read. In fact, I could read from both sides of the argument. However, I think those few sentences from the remarks of the hon. member for Greenwood contain the main argument for this amendment to clause 23, which motion I am happy to support.

If I may recapitulate, we accept the proposition that there should be written into the expropriation law statutory provisions and rules to be followed. It does seem that in modern times, with all their complexities, there are cases where there should be latitude for the court. My friend the hon. member for Greenwood says this latitude should be granted so that the court can ensure there will be full and fair compensation in every case.

I hope I have not done any injustice to the point the hon. member for Greenwood sought to make. It seems to me it has merit. It accepts what the government proposes in this bill but it provides a bit of latitude to ensure justice in every case. Therefore, on behalf of the hon. member for Greenwood I not only present but support this amendment.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has again been fair in presenting the amendment of his colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). One of the main purposes of this bill is to clarify the present vague rules of compensation paid to owners of expropriated property or those with an interest in the expropriated property, as contained in judicial decisions. Frankly, these decisions are sometimes hard to research and apply. It was our intent to convert these vague rules, as currently applied by the courts, into rules of statutory precision. These rules are set forth with that precision in clause 24 of the bill.

The new law will provide for a comprehensive code in determining the compensation that is payable to owners of expropriated property. In general, the minimum or base value of the amount paid to owners of property expropriated by the federal government will be the market value of the property at the time of its taking by the federal government. Provision is made in clause 24, which is related to clause 23, to compensate for any loss or cost incidental to the disturbance faced by the expropriated owner, including moving to other premises and any element of special economic advantage related to the operation of the property.

Special rules are also provided to compensate owners of specially designed buildings such as schools, hospitals or religious institutions for which there is no general market value because there is no general demand for the property. Also, the statutory rules set forth in clause 24 relate to the value that is to be paid to the holders of secured interest in mortgages, and so on, in the property.

The statutory rules in clause 24 set forth the new principles of compensation the principle of a home for a home, and the right under the new law of an expropriated person to claim as compensation the cost of relocating his residence in reasonably equivalent premises if the compensation otherwise payable to him, represented by the market value, is not sufficient to establish himself in premises equal to those which have been expropriated. In the case of a tenant, the length of the term remaining under his lease, his prospect of obtaining a renewal of the lease and the investment he may have in the leased premises, and so on, including the nature of the business carried on by him on the premises, all are taken into consideration in determining the compensation payable to him.

All this illustrates that clause 24, to which clause 23 relates, sets forth a statutory code of compensation. The main objection the government has to the amendment introduced both at the committee stage, and rejected there, and now by the hon. member for Greenwood through the courtesy of his colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, is that it attempts to provide an overriding provision to the effect that each owner shall receive full and fair compensation, so that the amount computed by the application of the rules will, in effect, be the minimum only.

It is the intention of the bill that the rules set forth in statutory form to provide full and fair compensation be of such a nature that the owners and the people of Canada, through the Crown, can evaluate with some measure of certainty what the ground rules are. I submit to Your Honour that the rules set forth in clause 24 provide for all appropriate compensable economic loss flowing from the taking of the property, and frankly we do not see the necessity for such an amendment.

My main objection to the proposal is that it would relegate, in effect, to a secondary position the statutory basis or ground rules for compensation set forth in clause 24, leaving the primary principle of compensation to judicial interpretation of whatever the words "full and fair compensation" mean. That would leave the door open, in my opinion, to vague interpretations of such things as "interest to the owner", and so on, which currently rely upon the uncertainty of judicial decisions.

For these reasons we feel that the clauses relating to compensation are fair and are meant to be statutory guidelines for the courts. Because in fact we feel that they do compensate in a full and fair way the owner of any interest expropriated by the federal government, we would recommend as we did at the committee, and as the committee accepted, the rejection of this judicial overriding of statutory provisions.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could make one point in an effort to expedite the matter. If you look at amendments 8, 9, 10 and 11 you will see they all relate to clause 24 dealing with rates of compensation. I was wondering whether they could all be packaged together. My amendment asks for the whole thing to be abolished. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) makes certain changes. I submit the whole argument could be dealt with in a package, and I make the suggestion to save time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, the hon. member for Greenwood used a rapier instead of a hammer, and he may prefer to have his particular motion dealt with separately.

Mr. Woolliams: They could be voted on separately, but they are one and the same thing. I do not mind if the minister wants to extend the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not sure where it would leave us, but there is a proposal put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that for the purposes of debate the subject matter of motions 8, 9, 10 and 11 be dealt with now. I am prepared to put that proposal to the House, if there is agreement. I see that the minister agrees. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rising on a point of order in this connection?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I certainly would be willing to have the debate range over all four amendments. In one sense I should like that, because I would rather not have to make a decision at this stage as to whether we should force a vote on this point. If we could have the discussion on all four, we could more easily reach a decision as to whether we want a recorded vote on each of them. In other words, we could suspend the debate on this amendment, take the next one and move on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In light of the discussion, I think we might allow the debate to cover the subject matter of motions Nos. 8, 9, 10 and 11. I shall put the four questions when debate has come to an end and I can see whether there is a desire to have a roll call vote on each one. Is that agreeable?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With one qualification, Mr. Speaker. If the debate is to range over all four amendments, I hope I can get the floor again on amendment No. 10.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: We will therefore discuss motion No. 9 in the name of Mr. Brewin, as follows:

That Bill C-136, An Act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by striking out the word "shall" in section 24(1), line 33, page 19 of the bill and substituting therefor the word "may" and adding thereto the words "without restricting the generality of the provisions of section 23(1) hereof".

Motion No. 10 in the name of Mr. Brewin, as follows:

That Bill C-136, An Act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by striking out of section 24, subsection 9(c), the following words at the end thereof: "or other public purpose for which the interest was expropriated".

Then motion No. 11 in the name of Mr. Woolliams, as follows:

That Bill C-136, An Act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by deleting subclause 9 of clause 24.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the ruling, to use the minister's words I can discuss in one big sweep amendments on which I would have had to make several speeches. All motions 8, 9 and 10 do is make certain changes in clause 24(9). Basically what we are determining in this debate is how we will arrive at the value of appropriated interests and how much compensation should be paid. Although I agree with the hon. member who moved motion No. 10, I would rather we had only part of it.

I should like to make a few remarks in respect of clause 24(9) which I have asked be deleted. The other motions would merely amend certain parts. I suggest the deletion of clause 24(9) of the bill. This does not leave a vacuum, because the decision here is whether the amount of compensation is to be that determined by the common law rules, or by the complex, rigid, regulatory, statutory formula which now is subject to many interpretations and judicial and legal disagreement.

Several witnesses discussed this particular matter, including an appraiser and Mr. Weir of the Canadian Bar. Mr. Weir said, in respect of some of these parts, that they are hard to swallow. His main point is, do we want in this new appropriation bill a rigid formula, or do we want a more flexible rule under the common law which is the case law of Canada? Mr. Weir did not want to jump on either side because he could see the minister had taken a hard position and that we also had taken a hard position. Therefore, he said that it depends on whether we accept a more flexible rule in respect of compensation, which is the common law, or whether we want a rigid formula. Several lawyers who read papers before the Canadian Bar Association and witnesses who appeared before the standing committee took different views on the interpretation of subclause 9(a), (b), (c) and (d) and what it meant.

As I say the rules governing the amount of compensation to be paid a claimant, a land owner or one with interest in land, have evolved over a long period of time. I may find myself a little on the opposite side of the argument I put foward this afternoon. The Exchequer Court of Canada and the Supreme Court of Canada, through much of the case law, have set out pretty definite rules that are well understood by the legal profession engaged in this kind of specialty.

Today law is very complex, just as is medicine and dentistry. It will not be very long before lawyers will no longer be known as barristers and solicitors but as men and women in a specialized field. There will be specialists in fields of law just as in the Department of Justice today there are lawyers who carry out only one phase of legal work. Lawyers will become specialists in tax law, in expropriation cases, in criminal law, in civil litigation or in estates. They will probably take the same general course and will then specialize in the same way doctors specialize. This is coming. It is probably overdue.

The object of any formula for expropriation, whether it is based on the common law rules—stare decisis—or on statutory regulation, should take into consideration two simple factors. One is the market value of the land, the value to the taker and not the owner. The second is the value of the present use plus any consequential loss arising from the disturbance of that use.

Having said that, let us see what clause 24(9) will do. First of all, it abolishes many of the common law rules. It would not compensate for any source of material used as part of the property expropriated. For example, if A owned a piece of land which was expropriated for the Trans-Canada Highway and was full of the resource gravel, and B owned land used for the highway in the adjacent area without the resource gravel, both would receive basically the same compensation because by clause 24(9)(a) any anticipated or actual use by the Crown of the land at any time after the expropriation shall not be considered in the valuation. So immediately you start to set up hard rules without flexibility, you get discrimination.

In the example I gave of A and B owning a piece of land taken for the Trans-Canada Highway, both would receive the same value under the hard and rigid formula of the minister even though the land of A contained gravel used on the highway. This is discrimination. I will please one gentleman who is not here at the moment by referring to a case about which he knows quite a bit. Our witness from the Canadian Bar Association said that this formula would be pretty difficult to swallow. When the minister quoted Mr. Weir, I had difficulty following him because he drew inferences from what Mr. Weir said in reference to the Exchequer Court and the civil courts, while the note I have is that Mr. Weir said it would be almost impossible to swallow. If the minister accepts Mr. Weir's evidence on one phase of the argument, I hope he accepts his evidence on the amendment so far as the formula for measuring compensation is concerned.

The common law is a flexible judicial system. All lawyers who have some appreciation of the common law of our country realize that one can do a good deal of research in case law but never find two cases which are identical. In preparing any point of law it is very difficult to say other than that the cases appear to be the same. The beauty of the common law is that it is flexible enough in respect of the decisions one would use. This would give the judges of the Exchequer Court, who the minister has now endorsed with great affection, more flexibility. Each case would stand on its own and we would get away from the discrimination I mentioned in respect of the example of highway property. I that case the specialists on behalf of the state, because they worked for the state for quite a while felt they would be able to control the Bench.

When you read the cases you see that the judges have been pretty flexible and fair to the citizens. I will deal with the Fraser case in a few moments. But what will the minister be doing if he takes to heart what has been recommended to him? He will say, "We do not trust these flexible judges any longer. I like the Exchequer Court, but I want to tell them what to do; therefore, I will give them a code and make it so hard and fast that there will be no flexibility". This is the new approach of the Liberal Party.

Mr. Ritchie: It is not very liberal.

Mr. Woolliams: That is right, but sometimes it has compensations. What does the common law actually say? The test has been laid down in many cases which I will mention in passing. I will deal with some of the things said in Irving Oil v. The King, Diggon-Hibben v. The King, and Woods Manufacturing Company v. The King. In dealing with the concept of the value to the owner as developed before the Supreme Court of Canada, the rules laid down were quite simple. I do not think they need to be codified. Lawyers have been dealing with these cases for a long time. The following is from a case before the Supreme Court:

> What would the claimant, as a prudent man, at the moment of expropriation (he then being deemed as without title but all else remaining the same) pay for the property rather than be ejected from it? Any readiness to pay anything above the value as waste land can only come from the fact that a causeway is to be built.

Added to these rules were refined decisions which have all been subject to further interpretation. We had the case of Vezina v. the Queen (1889, 17 SCR), which deals with the value of the land at the date of the expropriation—the value to the owner, not the taker. The Supreme Court of Canada had held that where land is taken by a railway company for the purpose of using the gravel thereon as ballast, the owner is only entitled to compensation for the land so taken as farmland, where there is no market for the gravel. This case was treated as overruled by the court in Fraser v. The Queen on the ground that the judgment was inconsistent with the subsequent judgment known as the Indian case, which was decided upon previously by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of Great Britain.

In the Fraser case, with Judson, J. dissenting, the court awarded over $360,000, which was $300,000 more than the Exchequer Court had awarded, for the 12.8 acres expropriated out of Porcupine Hill on the ground of its special adaptability as a source of rock for the causeway across Canso Strait, for which purpose the federal government expropriated the acreage. What really happened there? The court supplied flexibility. They may have gone a little far. They said that if you have two pieces of land, land A and land B, and the material necessary for the project was in land A and there was none in land B, the owner of land A was entitled to more compensation. Under the code as set out in clause 24 (9)—and this is really very technical—this has been done away with. They are all treated equally, no matter what is under the land or on it; all the land is treated as waste land.

So I say that the common law is far more flexible. To my mind it is more fair to the owner who lost his land, and it is also more fair to the taxpayer because a reasonable market value is paid at the time of taking. Of course, everybody agrees that the owner is not entitled to have the price enhanced because the taker wishes to buy the land for a certain project. But if that land is unique in that it has material necessary for a project, why should not the owner of that land be compensated for what he has either on the soil or underneath it? Surely that is a reasonable proposition.

Mr. Justice Ritchie of the Supreme Court of Canada, in dealing with the rules in Cedar Rapids v. Lacoste, namely, the imaginary market which would have ruled had the land been exposed for sale before any undertakers had secured the powers which made the undertaking as a whole a realized possibility, distinguished the Fraser case on the facts, stating that the federal government always had these powers and was not an undertaker who had to secure such powers. Let me shorten this to say that in other words we have to consider the imaginary market value of that land prior to the takeover, and we have to set up an imaginary purchaser at that time. Lands are valued in that fashion.

One of the most customary methods of appraising land is to go into a community where land has been taken or expropriated for a public purpose, or according to the federal statutes for use for a public purpose, and find out at the time of the taking what lands of a similar kind, under similar circumstances would have sold for. In taking a group of sales at that time, you come up with certain percentage per acre, and that is the value put on the land. That is the common law principle. To me this seems far better than setting down hard and fast rules, the interpretation of which every lawyer today disagrees with. None of the lawyers at the Canadian Bar Association meeting agreed with this meaning. I imagine that in the next five years lawyers will have a field day putting an interpretation on the meaning of the code.

That is why I would like to see the proposal abolished. It will not hurt the act. The act has many good parts in it, and the minister should be congratulated for bringing it in. He should reconsider his position on the formula for the expropriation proceedings, and the fact that the common law rules, in setting the quantum of compensation, were far better than a code which would be subject to appeals back and forth from decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, which decisions will be refined and distinguished in other cases for the next ten years. For almost 100 years now we have been codifying rules of common law because of the case law. Therefore, why should we set down a whole set of new codes and terms which as I have proven, will discriminate against some people under similar circumstances?

To return to Mr. Justice Ritchie, I quote him as follows:

> The value must be tested in relation to the market which would have ruled had the land been exposed for sale before the powers of expropriation had been exercised.

That is the general rule which is known by all lawyers, all appraisers, and by laymen as well. They ask: What would my land have sold for if the government had not come along and taken it from me?

Mr. Justice Ritchie states that this same view was expressed in Agnew The Minister of Highways, which is an Ontario case. The same common law rule was applied there, that where there is material under the soil, the owner is entitled to be paid for it. In other words, the value is the true value at the time of taking, plus any future potential value that the land might have.

However, this does not affect the authority of the judgment in the Indian case as to the duty of the arbitrator previously referred to, even where the only possible purchaser of the land's potentiality is the expropriating authority. The Indian case did throw a monkey-wrench into the common law principle because there was a tendency in the Canadian law not to apply the principle of future potential. Let me explain what I mean by that. If, for example, a group of men owned land near a city, their surveyors subdivided that land for a new suburban area, and the land was required for a freeway, the Canadian law did not go as far as the decision in the Indian case. But it finally did say that you were to pay for the true value of the land on its ordinary value plus its future potential, and because you had committed an overt act in planning a townsite you received the true value of the land plus something for the plans you had made because for a number of years you may have had that investment in mind knowing that eventually the city would spread to there. You paid fees for the engineers, but finally the project was lost to you because the government needed the land for another purpose. Proper, flexibles rules would take into consideration compensation for that kind of land potential.

The Indian case goes a little further. Lord Romer said that even if the piece of land was such that the only use it could have was the one the government was going to put it to, you were still entitled to be paid for it. That is the effect of the Fraser case. This area had rock, and the rock was needed to build the causeway. Even though they were the only purchasers who needed rock, they were obliged to pay for it. The Supreme Court of Canada upheld the judicial committee's decision in that case.

I am pointing out how flexible is the common law. Under the new formula the Fraser case would not have happened. They have abolished the Indian case. They have discriminated against many owners of land. I think there is something wrong when people go out and buy land for speculation, knowing that the government is interested in it. The federal government, working with provincial governments and municipalities, could have cut the price of housing had it stopped that kind of speculation investment, just as Saskatoon did a long time ago.

The situation is different where a person held land for a number of years and had bought it without any knowledge that the city would spread out. A former minister did that in the city of Calgary and it worked out fairly well. Surely such a person is entitled to be paid for that investment? That is what the common law rules accomplish. The statutory rules are almost impossible to understand, each one has to be interpreted separately and no one really knows the true situation. I am sure the minister would not claim to know what each of these subclauses means.

The simple rule is: What would a willing purchaser be prepared to pay the owner of the land at the time of expropriation, plus its future potential? That is the common law rule, and I repeat it: What would a willing purchaser be prepared to pay the owner of the land at the time of expropriation, plus its future potential? By this code the government is trying to plug all these loopholes, and some lawyers think it is opening the door and making things more difficult.

The case law has gone so far as to say that "willing purchaser" could be interpreted to mean the taker. This afternoon I dealt with the Lake Louise case. There is one more comment I would say about it. As a great lawyer in Toronto said to me, it is rather shocking that the government by its regulations can sterilize a development that the owners wanted to undertake and had planned to undertake, and can then come along and do exactly what the owners wanted to do.

In the Lake Louise case the owners planned a townsite. They had surveys done and maps made. Then the government said it was not going to allow them to build a townsite. But what is the government going to do? This is why common law is very important. It has now leased the site to Imperial Oil for multi-million dollar development. It seems to me that under this codified law, to develop the parks in western Canada you must now belong to big business like Imperial Oil, Canadian Power, and Sunshine. The little man who was promised that if he gave up some of his rights, some of his leases, he would get the first chance to run a store or a motel, has been forgotten. That promise has gone down the drain.

Give me the common law with a little flexibility. Give me the right to see that these questions are interpreted by the courts. Despite all his feeling for the Bench, the minister must have been frightened this afternoon. Apparently he does not trust the Bench to do its job, because he is setting down the rules on how it will do its job.

All this reminds me of the story of Abraham Lincoln who one morning was on one side of a case and won it. In the afternoon he was on the opposite side of a similar case, and the judge reminded him about his appearance in the morning. Lincoln replied, "This morning I thought I was right, but this afternoon I know I am right." That explains the argument of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). It will be interesting to hear what he has to say tonight, because he is going to be on the other side of the fence.

In order to be helpful, Mr. Speaker, I suggested that all the arguments on amendments Nos. 8, 9, 10 and 11 be made at the same time in one sweep, which would save my having to speak again. In conclusion, I trust the common law. I trust the independent judiciary of Canada. The law is very clear, simple and straightforward on measuring compensation for land. Why do we need a lengthy code when the common law has served its purpose and the judges, with their training and knowledge, are well equipped to interpret that law which has over a period of time served the average man well?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I thought we were going to have all the discussion on these four motions before the questions were put on each of them. I have nothing more to say on No. 8, but I have something to say on Nos. 9 and 10.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that we now proceed to discuss motion No. 9, and that the question be put later on the four motions, Nos. 8, 9, 10 and 11?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: We will now hear debate on motion No. 9.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the debate you will hear from this seat on motion No. 9 will be very brief because it is obvious that No. 9 is an amendment consequential to No. 8 and it would be necessary only if the House were intelligent enough to support motion No. 8. I should like to say that what we seek in motions Nos. 8 and 9 is not to set aside the proposition that there shall be rules in the legislation, as I think the minister intimated, but rather to provide that in special cases the court would still be in a position to exercise its judgment to make sure that there is full and fair compensation. That is why we have put forward motions No. 8 and 9. As I say, No. 9 is consequential to motion No. 8. I hope both of them will be supported.

Mr. Speaker: This completes discussion on motion No. 9. Motion No. 10 is now deemed to be before the House for consideration.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move motion No. 10 on behalf of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). It is one of several dealing with clause 9 of the bill and relates to a specific point. Here I think I can do two things, namely, keep my remarks brief and make the matter clear, by referring to what the hon. member for Greenwood said about this proposed motion when the matter was discussed in the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I am looking at pages 80 and 81 of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence No. 5 of that committee. The hon. member for Greenwood is reported as having said this:

> I would like to ask the minister, under paragraph (c), whether he does not think that is extraordinarily broad, that is, any knowledge or expectation, prior to the expropriation, of the public work—I can see that—or other public purpose for which the interest was expropriated. In a dynamic economy such as you have around a big city, some of the public purposes like expressways and things like that are known for 10 or 15 years before, and this knowledge is bound to have some impact upon all the market prices in that area.
> It seems to me that you have drawn up something here that is so wide as to be impractical of application and very unjust as far as the actual person expropriated is concerned.
> I can see where knowledge of the actual public work and where it is actually going should not be allowed to enhance the value of the thing, but expectation of the public purpose for which the interest is expropriated is a very vague phrase. The minister said that the purpose of these rules is to give certainty and to have a clear measuring stick. I suggest to you that the litigation and the argumentation about a phrase as vague, as broad and as extensive as that will be never ending and this is an example of the folly, in my judgment, of trying to pin down everything in this way.

I was interested in reading what followed. The minister took part in the discussion, as did the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth), and others. I do not intend to speak for them, but there seemed to be a fair amount of support for the position put forward by the hon. member for Greenwood, namely, that the language of clause 24(9)(c) is a little too broad. That is why the hon. member's amendment proposes that the last few words of this subparagraph be deleted. I notice, from reading the Minutes of Proceedings of the committee, that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) proposed that the whole of clause 9 be struck out; but that is another amendment, and I think it goes too far. So, on the basis of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Greenwood, who said that in a modern society this kind of language is too broad, I present this motion to the House in the hon. member's name.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I, to save the time of the House, reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about amendment No. 10 and, immediately after, reply to the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) about amendment No. 11.

This is a new proposal put forward by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). It was not a proposal that reached the committee in concrete form in the form of an amendment, although he referred to the point in committee. We thought about it a good deal, but I am afraid we cannot agree to it because clause 3 of the bill authorizes the expropriation of land for public works or other purposes. If the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Greenwood were accepted, clause 24(9)(c) would apply where the expropriation was for a public work but not where it was for a public purpose other than a public work. In other words, if the purpose of the expropriation were for a greenbelt or something like that, it would not be for a public work but would be for a public purpose.

Undoubtedly some will suggest, as did the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre tonight, that clause 24(9)(c) is too broad in its wording and in some cases it will deprive an owner of compensation because of the increase in value of his property by virtue of there being contemplation on the part of some people of the expropriation. I have no doubt, however, that the courts and indeed the Crown will apply this provision only in those circumstances where the problem it is intended to remedy actually exists. There may be difficulty in distinguishing a purpose that is a public work and a purpose that is not a public work, because the expropriation itself may be for recreational purposes, planning purposes or purposes that are not reflected merely in the erection of a building or other material construction. For that reason I submit that the House ought to reject motion No. 10.

Motion No. 11 which the hon. member for Calgary North moved or brought forward this evening suggests that clause 24(9) be deleted completely. If I may, I should like to recall to the House the wording of clause 24(9). It provides:

(9) In determining the value of an expropriated interest, no account shall be taken of (a) any anticipated or actual use by the Crown of the land at any time after the expropriation;

This paragraph is designed to overrule or override a case of the Supreme Court of Canada. If there is no demand for the property other than the demand or requirement of the Crown for those purposes for which the Crown proposes to use the land, those purposes would not be taken into consideration under this paragraph in determining the value of the property. Paragraph (b) reads:

any value established or claimed to be established by or by reference to any transaction or agreement involving the sale, lease or other disposition of the interest or any part thereof, where such transaction or agreement was entered into after the registration of the notice of intention to expropriate;

We introduced that paragraph because we wanted to avoid any change in value after the registration of the notice of intention to expropriate had set in process the expropriation procedure. We want to avoid speculation or artificial transactions based on the anticipation of an expropriation. Paragraph (c) reads in part:

any increase or decrease in the value of the interest resulting from the anticipation of expropriation by the Crown—

Here again, this paragraph is designed to meet the problem which arises when prior to an expropriation there is public knowledge that there will be an expropriation. We do not want to penalize the interest of an owner in land by any decreasing in value of the land which may result from such public knowledge; nor do we want to encourage speculation. Actually, paragraphs (b) and (c) are designed to prevent speculation in land in anticipation of an expropriation or after registration of the notice to expropriate has been filed. We do not want people to profit from the public use of land; we want them to receive fair value for it; we want them to recover any legitimate economic loss; but speculation in land is not something this bill is designed to encourage.

(d) any increase in the value of the interest resulting from its having been put to a use that was contrary to law.

Surely my hon. friend from Calgary North will not argue too strenuously that if a property is being used as gaming-house or a house of ill repute the Crown should consider any so-called additional value as attaching to that property, and that that additional value ought to be compensable.

Mr. Woolliams: Where is the authority for the minister's statement?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Let us consider the hon. member's argument, Mr. Speaker. What he is saying to the House is that here we have good, old, traditional common law rules set by the judges over the years and based on case law in Great Britain and Canada, and we do not want that case law substituted by these statutory rules, so he says.

I say to the hon. member for Calgary North that we are trying to substitute the uncertainty of the current judicial case law and the difficulty of researching that case law—the difficulty of putting forth in explicable language to the average citizen in Canada what that law is—by the certainty of codified rules for compensation. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary North that neither he nor I can predict how the courts will interpret these statutory rules. He can put his interpretation on them and I can do the same. Under our British parliamentary system the courts will be left to read the statute as they find it.

I suggest to the hon. member there will be more certainty in the uncertain determination of certain statutory rules than in the uncertain determination of uncertain judicial rules. If we are comparing certainties, I hope I have the better of the argument. The hon. member says the lawyers will have a field day under my system. I suggest they would have a bonanza under the system he recommends.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a question? As the minister is aware, his distinguished colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has a certain project before a committee at the present time which is known as the white paper on taxation. One of the provisions has to do with a five-year revaluation for the capital gains tax. Has the minister borne in mind the fact that when the minister has his wicked way and that provision becomes the law of the land, unless my friends in the committee are able to frustrate him, it will have the effect of removing from the normal market the ability of a great percentage of the people of Canada to place pressure on the capacity to purchase land? There will no longer be a fair market value for the land, and consequently all the rules which the minister is suggesting will be negated. Has the minister taken that into account?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his argument is somewhat extraneous in substance to the motion now before the House. The Chair will assume that the discussion on motion No. 10 is completed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I shall be very brief. It is not unfriendly nor contentious. The minister said something in response to my remarks which I think deserves comment, if I could have the floor for a minute.

The minister said that the intent of amendment No. 10, which we are now dealing with, was not moved in the committee. That is technically correct, Mr. Speaker. There was not an amendment which merely sought to strike out those few words. But may I point out, as recorded at page 81 of Minutes No. 5 of the committee, that the member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) zeroed in, if I may use that popular parliamentary phrase, on the phrase "expectation of the public purpose for which the interest is expropriated". He said it was a very vague phrase. Most of his speech was against that part of the clause. Later the hon. member for Greenwood moved that the whole of paragraph (c) be struck out. This came to a vote which is recorded at page 94 of Minutes No. 5. The vote was 9 yeas, 9 nays, and the chairman said he was on the side of justice.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Naturally.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That's what got us into this mess.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) will be the first to admit that that is not a question of privilege. The hon. member might have sought the floor the second time under the provisions of Standing Order 37, but I doubt very much—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. May it be recorded I sought the floor a second time to correct something I believed had been said in error?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have now completed consideration of motion No. 10 and we will move on to motion No. 11. If there is no discussion on motion No. 11, we will turn to motion No. 8. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion No. 8 (Mr. Brewin) negatived.

Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre (for Mr. Brewin) moved:

That Bill C-136, An Act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by striking out the word "shall" in section 24(1), line 33, page 19 of the bill and substituting therefor the word "may" and adding thereto the words "without restricting the generality of the provisions of section 23(1) hereof".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost, on division.

Motion No. 9 (Mr. Brewin) negatived.

Mr. Knowles, Winnipeg North Centre (for Mr. Brewin) moved:

That Bill C-136, An Act respecting the expropriation of land be amended by striking out of section 24, subsection 9(c), the following words at the end thereof:
"or other public purpose for which the interest was expropriated".

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost, on division.

Motion No. 10 (Mr. Brewin) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Division

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on motion No. 1. (Mr. Woolliams) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that it be read the third time now. We have had the debate. It seems to me that it would be pointless not to give it third reading now.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It can be read at the next sitting of the House just as well as tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that we call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—COMPLAINTS RESPECTING HARASSMENT OF PORTUGUESE SHIPS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my grievance arises from a question I directed to the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) on February 2 which will be found at page 3081 of Hansard. It refers to what I said at the time was the excessive harassment of a Portuguese ship at the port of St. John's by the RCMP. I am not quarrelling with the minister's reply; I am merely taking advantage of the opportunity which this adjournment debate gives me to elaborate on the question and to enlarge upon the premise of the question, which I could not do during the oral question period.

On Monday, January 26, the Portuguese ship David Melgueiro, with approximately 800,000 pounds of fish, put into the port of St. John's as a consequence of a mishap at sea. During heavy seas off the coast of Labrador the vessel ran into some ice and developed a leak. She arrived at the port of St. John's on Monday, January 26. It had taken her about two or three days to get to port, during which time the crew had to be on watch at all times, without sleep. I say this because it is important to what I am about to say.

When the vessel arrived at St. John's, the crew naturally prepared to make up for the two or three days in which they had to stand watch at sea. On the night of Tuesday, January 27, the vessel was raided by the RCMP and 15 to 20 officers were involved in the raid. During the conduct of that raid they confiscated a quantity of cigarettes, cigars, wine and the usual sort of thing—not an excessive amount; but the conduct of the RCMP is the basis of my grievance.

Mr. Speaker, the Portuguese fishing fleet has been using the port of St. John's for the last 400 years. I hope the parliamentary secretary will remain for a few minutes, because he might learn something. The Portuguese fleet has been using this port for the last 400 years, as a matter of fact so much so that the Portuguese crews are considered to be an integral part of the community life of St. John's. When an incident like this occurs, where there is evidence that excess was used in the conducting of a search—a legitimate search—by the RCM Police, it has the same effect as if the RCMP were to enter a private home in the city of St. John's and conduct themselves in the same way.

In his reply the minister indicated that an investigation was under way. We are anxious to know what the result of that investigation is, because if the Portuguese fleet is to be harassed in this way by the RCMP, obviously it is not going to use the port of St. John's because there are other port facilities available to it on the French islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. We are very anxious to retain in St. John's the business which accrues from the Portuguese fleet. It is a very important source of revenue to the port, and instead of this sort of conduct we should be treating them with the greatest of respect and doing everything we can to encourage them to use our port facilities which were put there at great expense by the government of Canada.

Because of the limited time at my disposal, Mr. Speaker, I am going to quote directly from a letter sent to the Attorney General of Newfoundland by the master of the Portuguese vessel David Melgueiro, in which he recognizes the fact that there was an infringement of the law. Some whisky had been sold by a member of the crew, contrary to the regulations of the Portuguese authorities, and the regulations of the vessel. But notwithstanding that fact, the master of the ship goes on to list eight points which I shall read into the record:

(1) Roughly manhandling the crew and damaging their belongings.

(2) Deliberately breaking padlocks and suitcases while members of the crew were endeavouring to open them.

(3) Deliberate and quite unnecessarily breaking a framed religious picture.

(4) Brutally dragging an injured seaman out of the infirmary bed and throwing the mattress and bedclothes on the floor, despite the screams of pain from this man.

(5) Entering the officers' rooms while they were asleep and ransacking the contents of the rooms, which included their own clothing and belongings, as well as ship's documents and papers.

(6) Breaking ship's doors and padlocks, again while we were in process of opening them with the proper keys.

(7) Confiscating articles that had been stamped and legalized by the Customs in St. John's.

(8) Seizing six weapons found on board, three of which were hunting guns, bought by me at a St. John's store and legalized by the Canadian authorities, and three other pistols which were ship's weapons, given to the ship by the Portuguese authorities, which until then, I had not had time or opportunity to legalize.

These are eight very important charges made by the master of this vessel against the RCMP for their conduct in the course of their search of this ship. Imagine, if you will, a ship that had run into difficulties in heavy seas off the coast of Labrador, made for what has been the traditional haven of the Portugese fleet, the port of St. John's, got into that traditional haven and the crew considered themselves lucky to be there. They were in the process of getting some well-earned rest when at midnight, to use the words of the master of the ship, in a Gestapo way of doing things 15 to 20 members of Canada's finest, the RCM Police entered this ship on legitimate business. They had ample evidence to indicate that smuggling had in fact taken place. The master concedes that in his letter when he says:

Unfortunately, without my knowledge and despite strict orders from the Portuguese authorities, one member of my crew had sold to two St. John's citizens four cases of whisky, in all a total of 48 bottles.

I recognize that this took place; but that does not for a moment excuse the way the RCMP conducted its search, disregarded the personal property of members of the crew, completely disregarded the ship's officers and showed a total disregard for a crew member who was sick in the infirmary. The captain was forced out of his bed at great discomfort and with much pain, and a search was made of his belongings.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. McGrath: The captain is prepared to document this evidence by affidavit.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member was: Has the Solicitor General received complaints of what appears to be excessive harassment by the RCMP of Portuguese ships in the Port of St. John's? That was a general question about the treatment of Portuguese ships in the harbour of St. John's. That was investigated and found to be without foundation. I shall have a word to say about that in a moment.

Tonight the hon. member added a new dimension and a new series of charges as to the conduct of officers making a search in a proper, authorized way in the course of their duty. The facts are that in the course of regular harbour duty a truck was discovered being loaded from that ship with certain cases and that resulted in a search being made. The search resulted in proceedings under the Customs Act, and fines. There is no difference on that point.

As to the general question asked, I think I should make it clear at once that I know and appreciate the hon. member's concern for the treatment of Portuguese ships in St. John's harbour, because I think it is common knowledge that the conduct of Portuguese sailors—and I think I can say this in all fairness to other sailors—is among the very best in the sailing world. The conduct in that fleet is very good. Of 382 Portuguese ships entering the port last year, only six were searched. I think there is no complaint on that score.

The new charges brought forward tonight affect another subject which is quite separate in my mind, that is, the conduct of officers of the Canadian police forces in affecting that search. I have had no opportunity to check that at all. I will be very glad to have the matter checked at once and quite thoroughly, because there is an adequate procedure for proper disciplinary action if the charges are well-founded. That I will undertake to do. As to the other matter of there being any reflection on the conduct of Portuguese ships in the harbour, I repeat that this fleet is famous for its good conduct in that harbour. Far from there being any feeling of antagonism toward it, there is an opposite feeling, I think, on the part of law enforcement officers, no matter whether they are in the courts, members of the local police force or of other forces in the area.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—ABITIBI—CONSTRUCTION OF ACCESS ROAD

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on February 4, I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) if he had received from the La Sarre Chamber of Commerce a letter requesting financial assistance for the completion of an access road to the Villebois resources, towards James Bay, in northwestern Quebec. The minister was not allowed to answer.

The following day, I received a phone call from a public servant, telling me the said letter had just been found and, having looked into it, the minister authorized a reply. I do not know whether that reply will be favourable or not but I should like to say tonight why the La Sarre Chamber of Commerce has appealed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

First, we know the minister heads a department which is supposed to assist in the development of underdeveloped areas. Now, in our area there is a lack of development and employment. Several families have to move to other areas and a great part of our labour force must earn a living in the neighbouring province.

Now, faced with our governments' inaction, businessmen in the area decided, after much consideration and reflection, to undertake the building of a road leading to the sea and to new natural resources, which are abundant in that vast area.

Under the direction of the local Chamber of Commerce, farmers, workers, woodcutters, miners and businessmen, and even unemployed people, contributed more than a quarter of a million dollars to clear the ground.

The Quebec government, while claiming to look favourably upon the building of such a road to James Bay, showed themselves sparing of their assistance. The Department of Forestry conceded a few woodcutting rights and granted a $60,000 subsidy to build a road 130 miles long. In my opinion, this is merely an agreement in principle.

The Chamber of Commerce is therefore asking for assistance from the federal government. The parliamentary secretary to the minister (Mr. O'Connell) may answer that he cannot disregard the guidelines of the provincial government about roads and that the Quebec province should seek the assistance of the federal government. If my information is correct, the Quebec province has recently made an application for a $200 million subsidy which was turned down by the federal government.

There is one thing, however, which is annoying the people of Quebec. Under the guise of the sacrosanct autonomy, we are ready to pay taxes for the other provinces while depriving ourselves of the same advantages.

It is well known that around 1966, the Canadian government passed a law allocating around $100 million for the building of roads in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon in the next ten years.

We have nothing against the government building roads in the Northwest Territories in order to reach the wealth lying there. However, there are also resources in the northern part of Quebec and Quebecers are paying taxes to build roads in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

But we, for the sake of provincial autonomy, are depriving ourselves of the same advantages. We forget—God knows why,—to ask the co-operation of the federal government.

For instance, in 1965-67, we spent $4,465,000 to build roads in the Yukon, and we spent $4,590,500 in the Northwest Territories during the same period.

On April 8, 1969, we were told that within a few weeks, the building of 77 miles of highways between Fort Providence and Fort Simpson would be under way, for a lump sum of $2,404,000.

Yet, it was announced, in March 1969, that Ottawa would invest $343 million in Prince Edward Island which has a population of roughly 115,000, while the vast area of northwestern Quebec has a population of 180,000.

In view of these facts, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion came personally to Rouyn-Noranda, a few weeks ago, to meet the representatives of the La Sarre Chamber of Commerce, who it seems advised him of their financial needs. The minister then expressed the view that he was in favour of the idea.

The minister will assuredly answer that he cannot do it directly. However, I know he quite often has the opportunity of meeting Quebec ministers and talking with them. I am sure that if he wants to, he can reach an agreement with them with a view to setting up a joint program.

The northwestern region is a designated area and its population is now leaving it. In order to enable the industries to develop the already existing resources, roads must be built. Therefore we ask the minister to get in touch with the Quebec authorities, in order to develop this region.

The department is willing to devote rather important sums to the development of processing industries, but we must have access to raw materials.

In my opinion it would be desirable to reach an agreement, to get in touch with the Quebec government with a view to getting its co-operation. Indeed, the government has funds it could devote to the clearing of northwestern Quebec and of the Northwest Territories as well—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. Martin O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I quite understand the interest of the hon. member for Abitibi in the development of northwestern Quebec and particularly in the building of the road from Villebois to James Bay which is undoubtedly a project of great interest for the people of the area.

Last week, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) received a letter from the La Sarre Chamber of Commerce asking for financial help for the construction of that road.

In view of the fact that this request is now under consideration, it is much too early to announce what decision will be made in this respect. However, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the building of roads comes mainly under provincial jurisdiction and that according to the departmental terms of reference, financial help can only be granted for that kind of project if it comes within the framework of the special area program. Furthermore, such projects have to be essential to the success of a development plan prepared for that area.

Therefore, the minister will have to take this important factor into consideration in the answer he will give to the La Sarre Chamber of Commerce in the near future.

IMMIGRATION—DEPORTATION OF DESERTERS FROM U.S. ARMED FORCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) earlier today whether he would order an independent inquiry by a judge or other person into incidents which occurred in Vancouver, or in British Columbia, on January 25. These incidents involved three United States army deserters who had entered Canada legally a couple of weeks earlier and who were on the evening of that day deported from Canada, in my submission without authority, without any deportation order, without the necessary warning and without any resemblance of lawful activity by officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

This matter is of the utmost importance. I would remind hon. members that some months ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) laid down the policy—I am summarizing it—that the military status of entrants to Canada from the United States was irrelevant and would not be taken into consideration. Therefore, the fact that these three young men were United States army deserters is irrelevant to our consideration.

My information is that they came into Canada legally some weeks ago; that on January 25 they were taken into custody, or apprehended or in some other way led from Bridal Falls to Huntingdon by two RCMP officers; that at Huntingdon they were interviewed by an immigration officer called Smith who found they had entered legally into Canada and that there was nothing wrong with the situation. I understand that one of these men telephoned the Reverend Hewett, a minister in Vancouver, from the Canadian immigration office in Huntingdon and said to him, "We are about to be deported. We do not want to be deported. Can you help us?"

These three young men then found themselves on the United States side under arrest. Who got them there? How did they get there? There is conflict between the information given me by Don Rosenbloom, a lawyer in Vancouver, by the RCMP officers in British Columbia and by the minister in a letter dated February 3.

The officers in British Columbia suggested that these three men wanted voluntarily to go to the United States, the kind of suggestion that only a fiction writer could have thought of. Here were three men who had deserted the U.S. army and had come to Canada. The suggestion now is that they said, "Please take us across so that we can go to jail". The minister's letter to me does not make any such suggestion. In his letter the minister's suggestion is that these three men wanted to regularize their entry into Canada. How they could be so dumb as to regularize something that they knew was already regular, I do not understand.

The point is that as far as I am concerned, and as far as the information that I have is concerned, the behaviour of the officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—and perhaps the behaviour of some immigration officer; I do not know—was sheer, illegal kidnapping; it involved putting these men across the border without any semblance of authority or action taken pursuant to the law.

According to Doug Collins on the television program last night, he spoke to the United States officer, Baty, who arrested these men on the U.S. side. Officer Baty informed Mr. Collins that he had been telephoned and informed that three deserters were going to be available on the U.S. side of the border. Then he came there and took them from the RCMP officers. These are some of the facts as related to me and as related to the people of Canada on television last night.

I am not blaming the minister in this case. It is not a question of my saying that the Solicitor General is in any way responsible. He could not know what the officers did. But I do say that it is a false sense of loyalty for him to be satisfied with an inquiry made "inside the show", for him to be satisfied with information given him by people who, even if they were the absolute apostles of truth, would nevertheless be influenced by the fact that they had to justify actions which, unless they could do so, were obviously outside the law. This is not the kind of inquiry that will give him or give this Parliament the truth.

The only way to get the facts is to have a judge or some other disinterested person inquire into the case. The minister should want this independent inquiry; it should not be necessary for me to pressure him to seek it. He should want it for the sake of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. He should want it for his sake and for the sake of his department. If he is not ready to order such independent inquiry, I suggest he is either being misguided or he is so anxious to hide facts that would show his officers to be in the wrong that he is prepared to jeopardize the reputation of the force.

I have heard on a number of occasions in the past about what appeared to be similar illegal action by officers who had taken people across the line from Canada to the United States and placed them in custody on the other side without the necessary deportation order. Before a deportation order can be issued legally, a special inquiry has to be held. People are entitled to be represented by counsel, and they are entitled to appeal from the deportation order if they wish to. None of this took place. Indeed, an inquiry made by Mr. Rosenbloom of the immigration department showed that there was no deportation order on record. There was no copy of such order at Huntingdon or anywhere else.

These three men who were in Canada legally suddenly found themselves under arrest on the other side. They did not cross the border voluntarily, because within an hour, I understand, of their arrest they kicked in the back of the truck or vehicle or paddy-wagon, or whatever it was they were held in, and escaped. Two of the men were recaptured. One of them, at least as of this afternoon, was still at large and seeking, I hope, to come back to this country. This kind of behaviour by officers of the Crown, acting in whatever capacity, cannot be tolerated in a democratic country and should not be condoned by the minister concerned. I am not suggesting that he is condoning it; I am suggesting that if he does not make the necessary independent inquiry he will be, in effect, objectively condoning it.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raised this question in the House of Commons this afternoon. I had anticipated he was going to raise it on Friday, but regrettably he was not here then. He had previously exchanged some correspondence with me, giving me certain information which I had investigated and replied to. He has given me certain additional information and participated in a television show last night which I did not see and, regrettably, I have not had the text of it delivered to me as yet. I told him this afternoon I would investigate this new material—I thought I made that very clear—before dealing with his point as to whether there is any need for a further inquiry of the nature he suggests.

The hon. member makes very many direct allegations. For instance, he says these men were deported from Canada. I do not know this, but I do not believe they were. I am going to pursue that matter. In the material he supplies he refers to certain RCMP persons by numbers. The RCMP has no numbering system of any kind and there is obviously some error in his material in that respect. In any event, we have been unable to trace to whom the supplier of the information was referring in this regard. This is the kind of difficulty we still have to clear up.

The hon. member persists in talking about these men being put under arrest. The truth of the matter is that these men came and solicited information from a uniformed member of the RCMP while he was having his meal in a restaurant. This is how they came in contact—

Mr. Lewis: So they say.

Mr. McIlraith: I think they expressed their pleasure with the mounted police for their entire conduct in this contact with the Agassiz detachment.

Mr. Lewis: So the mounted police say.

An hon. Member: Listen to him.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder whether the hon. member would be courteous and have the good manners to permit me to reply in so far as I can. I listened patiently to him, although it was difficult in respect of some of the conclusions he had jumped to without having sufficient evidence to support them. His conclusions are at least premature. I hope they will not be proven to be right, but even if they are, they are premature in view of the information he now has. Since I am limited to less than half the time he is given to make these allegations, I hope he will extend me the courtesy of allowing me to finish.

The point I am making is that we are dealing, in respect of the Bridal Falls episode—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now seemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned—

Mr. Lewis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I did interrupt the hon. minister and I think he should be given another minute to complete his sentence.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): That is not the practice at this late hour of the day. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow afternoon at two o'clock.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10:30 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

INFORMATION

STATEMENT ON POLICY—ESTABLISHMENT OF INFORMATION CANADA

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on November 4 I tabled the report of the task force on information which had been asked to examine federal information services and to recommend ways in which the federal government might improve its communications with the Canadian people. I now propose to outline briefly the government's plans.

The task force made 17 major recommendations. We accept those recommendations in principle, with two exceptions. Recommendation number five proposed the establishment of a citizens advisory bureau and neighbourhood councils. The government is sympathetic toward this proposal but feels it warrants further study. Recommendation number ten suggested that a government agency undertake a role as public advocate which we feel more properly belongs to Parliament.

The task force found that the information responsibilities of the federal government have not been discharged effectively despite considerable expenditure. It was our suspicion of this which moved us to ask for this task force study in the first place. As a step toward rectifying this situation we have accepted a recommendation to set up a small new unit called Information Canada which will be established at the beginning of April as part of the Department of Supply and Services. The unit will report direct to a minister. I am asking the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for York-Scarborough, who is already responsible for citizenship, to take responsibility for its initial planning and development in order that it might be as ready as possible for operational status at the beginning of the new fiscal year.

This organization is proposed mainly for three reasons. First, Information Canada will promote co-operation among federal information offices now operating in mutual isolation. The object will be to increase effectiveness as well as to save money by reducing duplication in the use of staff and equipment and by better joint use of the government's information resources.

A similar approach was recommended by the Glassco Royal Commission on Government Organization. We expect that co-ordination will result in more coherent information, clearer and more understandable to Canadians than it has been in the past.

The second reason for establishing information Canada is that there are many information offices in the federal government, but each now speaks for its own particular departmental concern. There is no machinery to deal with information on broad governmental concerns affecting more than one department.

The third reason is to be able to learn better the views of the Canadian people. The unit is therefore designed not merely as a vehicle for dissemination of information but to provide better systems for Canadians to make known their viewpoints to their government.

I pause at this juncture, Mr. Speaker, to emphasize that the government recognizes the fact that the primary responsibility for conveying to the government the views and attitudes of Canadians has always remained and always should remain with Members of Parliament. The capabilities of the elected representatives in these respects should be strengthened and employed; in no sense is it the government's intention to diminish the proper role of the private member in representing the views of his constituents.

To achieve these three objectives we plan an organization whose new staff, exclusive of three component units being transferred from other government agencies, will total less than 150. Of this total, which will include administrative and clerical workers, most will come from the existing public service.

Information Canada

Information Canada will have about 25 information officers whose role will be to deal with information which is outside the normal concern of any single department and to assist the departments, on request, when supplementary resources are needed for particular occasions. The rest of the staff will be engaged in such tasks as answering public enquiries, co-ordinating existing departmental information work, advising on the application of modern technology to government information organizations, providing reports on public concerns, and developing efficient reference services both for pictures and the printed word.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

The organization will be divided into four branches—one for planning and research; one to produce and distribute information; one to gather and publish information on the views of the public; and an administrative branch. The Exhibition Commission, the still photo library of the National Film Board, and the publishing and selling functions of the Queen's Printer will be transferred to Information Canada to be components of the production and distribution branch.

The net cost of the new organization, excluding amounts being subtracted from existing departmental information budgets, will be in the order of $1 million in 1970-71. When we add the current budgets of units being incorporated, the total budget will be about $7¼ million. Information Canada will be expected to achieve economies to offset part of its own costs after it has been established and operating for some time.

In summary, Information Canada is to be a small federal information unit along the lines of the task force's proposals. Every modern government maintains an information organization, many of them more centralized or larger than the one we contemplate for Canada. But their role is generally only to produce and distribute information. Information Canada will be equally concerned with what citizens wish to say to their government. Whatever they say through opinion surveys will be public information, subject, of course, to the protection of personal privacy, all reports on public viewpoints will be made public. I believe this material will be of substantial value to all members of this House in effectively representing the Canadian people.

We welcome the recommendation that information policy be referred to a committee of Parliament. I would go further than the task force and suggest that a parliamentary committee review not only the objectives, policies and operations of Information Canada but also the information objectives of all departments. This parliamentary scrutiny would, I think, be a healthy process, especially if the committee were to consider its role as not only a surveillance but also as the more positive task of proposing means to bring government even closer to the people.

That is the government's objective in making this announcement, and it will remain our objective as we pursue the difficult but essential task of expanding the dimensions of democratic dialogue in this nation.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the Prime Minister is one of great importance. The cover design of the report of the task force which recommended the establishment of Information Canada bears an exclamation mark and a question mark. Perhaps the exclamation mark was intended to emphasize the far-reaching nature of the overhaul recommended and the question mark was intended to indicate the doubts about the recommendation that was being made.

There are several aspects of government information, of course. One of these relates to policy. The position taken by the white paper in Great Britain published in June, 1969, among others, was that the main responsibility for explaining policy to Parliament and to the public must continue to rest with the ministers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This task force was not given any directions. In fact, I think it was told to keep away from the role of Parliament. Yet the task force nevertheless said, among other things, that the ministers must provide more informative answers in Parliament than has been the tradition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: If I may say so, Sir, we see extraordinary evasion from day to day on the part of ministers opposite. In fact, it is almost the general rule rather than the exception for ministers to answer, not questions as posed to them, but other questions they would prefer to have been asked. So, I suggest it is nonsense for this ministry to talk about setting up elaborate information services until the Prime Minister and his ministers are prepared to discharge their fundamental responsibility of answering questions in this chamber.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I know there are differing views among members as to the wisdom of bringing the electronic media into this House, but it might very well have the advantage of compelling the ministers to give straightforward answers to questions that are placed before them.

The second aspect of information, of course, is that the services available to the citizen should be made known. What services are available, where they are available and how one obtains them should be known. It would seem obviously important that the citizens of the country have this information and that it be made available to them.

The task force recommended that the government assist the information services. I would have recommended that the government go further and assist existing community services that are strapped financially. It is extraordinary to me that this is one of the two recommendations made by the task force that the government has chosen not to implement. This recommendation directly relates to the knowledge the citizen has as to what services are available to him, yet it is not implemented. In spite of the impression given by the commentary of the Prime Minister, the establishment of this agency does not represent the implementation of the recommendations of the Glassco commission, which suggested a committee of co-ordination. It is a new superstructure being built within the government with regard to information services. The task force recognized at least some of the dangers inherent in the establishment of such an organization. It recognized that this could quite easily become a sort of ministry of propaganda. I say it is surely obvious that Information Canada could very easily become "manipulation Canada".

Mr. Stanfield: We must all be aware of that. The task force was sufficiently concerned with this problem that it recommended the establishment of rigid controls, but I do not find these controls when I read the report of the task force. It recommended the establishment of a parliamentary committee, but it has not been demonstrated yet in this chamber that a parliamentary committee has sufficient independent authority to really constitute a safeguard.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The task force also recommended the appointment of a sort of public ombudsman relating to information. This is the second of the two recommendations the Prime Minister has chosen not to implement. So, speaking for myself and I think for members of the House generally in this respect, we want to see co-ordination of information services; we want to see the services administered efficiently. But we want to see this co-ordination without the establishment of another layer of bureaucracy with the distinct possibility of the manipulation of public opinion. It would be difficult to exaggerate this danger.

Information Canada is to gather information as well as disseminate or propagate it. I think it is significant psychologically that, while the task force spoke of this agency gathering information about the needs of the public, the Prime Minister in his statement spoke about it gathering information about the views of the public. I think this might have been a Freudian slip.

While the Prime Minister speaks about preserving the role of the Member of Parliament, it is difficult to envisage any way in which the role of the individual member of Parliament, as the person to be consulted about the views of the people is likely to be cut down more drastically than by this centralized information-gathering service which will feed information directly to the ministry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: This is carrying the regional desks of the government much further. My hon. friends opposite will become mere ciphers and members on this side of the House will not be the only "nobodies" after this.

There is the question of the cost. The Prime Minister speaks about this being a small unit. Well, I suppose that is all relative—

An hon. Member: What's a million?

Mr. Stanfield: —but let me emphasize that what the public really needs so far as information is concerned is not information that the government suggests be given it. What the public really needs basically is information which the government does not want to give it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: To obtain this information, the public must rely basically on the opposition and an informed and energetic press, using the term "press" in the broadest sense of the word.

This is a dangerous proposal. It should not be proceeded with now. The government should try the step of co-ordination at modest expense and indeed see what savings can be made in addition to having a better service. This step should not be taken now, particularly in view of the obvious concentration of authority in the government as opposed to this House and, if I may say so, in the Prime Minister as opposed to the members of his government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I say that the members of the government must answer questions and we must have solid assurance that the committees of this House really have sufficient independence to be a safeguard. There are no adequate safeguards. There is no way at the present time that the country or this Parliament could stop Information Canada from becoming "Manipulation Canada" any time the government might choose to use it.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I found the Prime Minister's statement a very disturbing one, both because of what it said and because of what it failed to say. It failed to tell us what information the Prime Minister is speaking about. Are we talking about providing information to the people of Canada and explaining to them the government policies, which is perfectly necessary and desirable, or are we talking about, as I suspect from the statement we have just heard, an agency to control and manage the news the Canadian people will obtain from the government? I cannot help feeling that the super organization, the establishment of which has just been announced, is mainly for the purpose of managing the news emanating from the government and, if I may put it this way, that the agency will operate as a perpetual election campaign for the party in power.

The Prime Minister said that he welcomes the establishment of a parliamentary committee to review the objectives, policies and operations of Information Canada and, not only that, but to review the policies in the various departments. I say to the Prime Minister that if this is a genuine desire, then a parliamentary committee should have been set up to discuss the objectives, policies and operations of Information Canada before that agency was formed. Before the Prime Minister made his announcement, the people who have studied this matter and have presented the plan to the government should have appeared before a committee of this House. We should have been given the opportunity to ask them questions to find out exactly what this agency is going to do. The failure of the government to bring it before a committee of the House, and the fact that it has presented us with a fait accompli, is precisely one of the things that makes me unhappy and suspicious of the purpose of this super organization.

No one denies that there is a need, as the Glassco report indicated, for co-ordinating the information services of the government. God alone knows that many of them are inefficient and much can be done to improve them. No one denies the need for getting rid of the duplication of staff and equipment that is now to be found in various departments of the government in connection with information services. But there is nothing in this statement that suggests there will be any reduction in the approximately $200 million now being spent on information services by the departments, only a suggestion that another $1 million will be added to what is now being spent on a super agency of the sort described.

The Prime Minister makes a great deal of the need to give the people of Canada information and to find out what they think. Permit me to say a word about each of those things. We have given him an opportunity to do that in this House. We took the government at its word that it really meant it when it said that it was in favour of full disclosure of government policies and government thinking. So, we have asked questions during the oral question period; we have placed questions on the Order Paper, and we have placed numerous motions for the production of various papers on the Order Paper of this House. When the government has asked for the production of a study made in order to assist the government to arrive at a policy, almost every time the government has refused to produce those study papers. I say to the Prime Minister that he has had the opportunity to prove to the members of the House and to the people of Canada that this government really means what it says when it talks about full disclosure of information to the people of this country and that he has failed to take advantage of that opportunity.

On the contrary, the government has refused to give the information to which members of this House are entitled and to which the people of Canada are entitled.

I cannot support the proposal of the Prime Minister until, in dealing with oral questions, written questions, and motions for the production of papers of various sorts, the government shows its good faith and its firm intention to inform the people of Canada. This it has not done until now.

What does the Prime Minister say when he speaks about expanding the dimensions of democratic dialogue in this nation? This is the last phrase in his statement, the peroration, and a fine-sounding mouthful. But what in fact is he proposing? He is proposing a super agency to carry on a Gallup poll in this country. Who will compose the questions that the people of Canada will be asked? And what bias will there be in the questions that are thus composed? How do you find out what the people of Canada want and think—by giving them pre-arranged and premanaged questions to answer? Sure, you will get the answers you want, and that I suggest is precisely what the government wants this super agency to do, to get the answers it wants from the Canadian people.

The way you should find out from the ordinary people what they want, what they need, what hurts them, what they are looking for and what their aspirations are is for Members of Parliament to meet with them in their constituencies, and to listen to them, rather than by asking them pre-arranged questions and getting predetermined answers.

So, Mr. Speaker, in my view and in the view of my colleagues the proposal for Information Canada is another regrettable sham in the alleged participatory democracy about which the Prime Minister, in particular, and other members of his party talk. It is utterly regrettable that we should have before us another super agency, costing more money, doing nothing that is not already being done, except acting as an agency for controlling and managing the news that is to come out of the government. The only purpose is to befuddle, deceive and mislead the people; it is not to inform them.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we have carefully listened to the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the effect that the task force made 17 important recommendations which the government accepts in principle, with two exceptions.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> The task force found that the information responsibilities of federal governments have not been discharged effectively despite considerable expenditure.

Mr. Speaker, if the government is short of information it has only itself to blame. I think that, as one can read in a paragraph of his statement, the federal members of Parliament, whatever their political affiliation, convey information to the government. However, as was mentioned earlier by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), we are getting from the Prime Minister and the other members of the Cabinet arrogant answers to our questions although they are of general interest. They do not have the courage to give reasonable replies.

That is the first finding the task force should have reached in its study. As a matter of fact, if the government refuses to give us sensible answers, what will be the use of information services? They will be used mainly to find jobs for friends of the government, party stalwarts, and for political scheming.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister also said:

> A similar approach was recommended by the Glassco Royal Commission on Government Organization. We expect that co-ordination will result in more coherent information, clearer and more understandable to Canadians than it has in the past.

The machinery does exist, even though the Prime Minister stated:

> There is no machinery to deal with information on broad governmental concerns affecting more than one department.

Mr. Speaker, we have an information agency that costs us a fortune, the CBC, which, instead of keeping the government aware of public opinion, or the public aware of government action, spends some $186 million yearly to support tourists who are traipsing in Viet Nam, Belgium, Biafra and Nigeria. The CBC forgets to tell us what is going on in Canada, yet so-called officials generously paid by the Canadian people travel around the world.

Mr. Speaker, the CBC radio network should devote one hour a week to report on the activities of Parliament so that the public will know what is happening in Ottawa. But no, sir! Every two or three months, we are allowed six minutes and fifty seconds on The Nation's Business in order to keep people informed, while three quarters of the news heard on The National deal with foreign subjects. This is how they forget to tell the Canadian people what is going on in their own country.

Mr. Speaker, we should use the media available to us. Each week, the CBC should put aside one hour's broadcasting time and divide it equally among the four federal political parties. We could then inform the people of what goes on in the House and we might even grant to the public an additional hour of broadcasting time to enlighten Parliament on public opinion. But the government is taking no steps in that direction. We are ill informed by the government's fault and Information Canada will not remedy the situation if we continue with the same methods.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said:

—the primary responsibility for conveying to the government the views and attitudes of Canadians has always remained and always should remain with members of Parliament.

If it remains with Parliament, let us start by respecting the members of Parliament who have representations and suggestions to offer the government.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that Information Canada will become a propaganda agency for the government, and this offers some danger. Organizations like the CBC should serve to inform the public and the government.

A few minutes ago, I suggested that one hour per week be put at the disposal of the political parties and not 6 minutes and 50 seconds every two months, whereas one hour is allotted to Robert Charlebois, who keeps cursing while he is on. Since all kinds of European socialists and communists are invited as guests on CBC programs, should not this federal agency serve the needs of the people who pay its operation costs?

Let us ask the CBC to respect not only the government but also the Canadian parliament, which actually represents the population. That organization could work as a link between the public, that is the people we represent, and the duties we have assumed towards them.

STATEMENT ON FURTHER REPORTS BY BARBER COMMISSION ON FARM MACHINERY

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to ensure that there may be no misunderstanding, I wish to clarify the timing of the presentation of the report of the Royal Commission on Farm Machinery to which I referred in my reply to the hon. member for Lisgar in Hansard of February 5, page 3236. The findings of the commissioner dealing with costs and arrangements in respect of services and repair parts will not be the subject of a separate report but will be dealt with in the commissioner's final report expected during the late summer.

In so far as combine prices are concerned, this matter was dealt with on pages 30 and 32 of the Special Report on Prices of Tractors and Combines in Canada and Other Countries, which was tabled on January 16.

There is a further study, which I inadvertently referred to as a report, being prepared for the commission on farmers' attitudes to farm machinery purchases, which will be released by the commission within the next few days. Hon. members will be aware that these studies prepared for the commission are listed on the daily check lists they receive from the Queen's Printer and can be secured from this source.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the minister today in his amiable and frank fashion is not quite as innocent as it may appear to be. It is, Mr. Speaker, a sad admission on the part of the government that after years of investigation and the expenditure of millions of dollars the government has not yet reached any conclusion or formed any policies with regard to what action to take on a problem that has caused a great deal of concern both to the farmers and machinery dealers of this nation.

Mr. Baldwin: What else is new?

Mr. Danforth: What this statement does, Mr. Speaker, is in effect to buy still more time for the government at a terrible cost to the farmers of this nation.

Mr. Baldwin: And to the taxpayers.

Mr. Danforth: The minister stated that the final report is not expected until the late summer. This simply means that one more season will have passed and the government will have done nothing. There is no excuse for this lack of action, Mr. Speaker, especially in view of the fact that over a year ago at an agricultural congress called by this same government enough of the facts were reported by the commissioner to indicate in no uncertain terms that the farmers of this country were indeed paying more for their machinery than farmers of other nations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danforth: In the concluding paragraph of his statement the minister indicates that a further study is being prepared by the commission on farmers' attitudes to farm machinery purchases and that it will not be available for a few days.

Mr. Baldwin: Why not wait for Information Canada?

Mr. Danforth: Knowing the attitude of the rugged individualists who have to face the problems of farming in this nation and being quite aware of the procrastinations of this government, I am sure that the reason for the delay is the editing out of four-letter words before this report is processed through the normal channels.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Back to funny money.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the minister wanted to put on record the program of the Barber commission. As the previous speaker said, it has been a fairly long drawn-out affair. But what we are really interested in knowing now is what action the government is prepared to take in an extremely difficult situation.

Any farmer knows that it is going to be difficult to bring these problems under control. The farmers' attitude toward machinery purchases is that they are costing too much and interest rates are too high. One company, as has already been stated in the House, is laying off workers in Canada while continuing its work program in the United States.

It is fine to speak of bringing machinery in from overseas, but who will deliver it? The activities of Canadian Co-operative Implements Limited in western Canada, which has a distribution system and has been importing machines from Europe for many years, have been ignored by the commission up to now. I see the minister does not agree. However, I saw no recommendation that it should be actively used. In the Western Producer of January 29 there is a headline, "Failed to Advise Farmer to Use Co-op Implements". That is the opinion expressed in that newspaper.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Gleave: If we are to import machines from overseas somebody has to deliver them, service them and repair them. This is basic, and I say this is the first order of business that must be dealt with by the government if it is going to meet the problem that now exists. I say to the government: If you want to correct this situation, go to CCIL, go to the farm organizations in Ontario and tell them that you are ready to help them to do the job that has to be done on behalf of the farmer. This is the order of business before the government now, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to thank the minister for the explanations he has given us in his very short statement on the report of the Royal Commission on Farm Machinery. My comments will be as brief as his statement.

As for the maintenance and cost of spare parts of farm machinery and the arrangements in respect of them, they will not be dealt with in a separate report but will be part of the final report of the Commission to be published by the end of the summer. This is an unfortunate situation, because the farmers will be victims for another production season.

I agree completely with the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) about the delay in the shipping of spare parts for machines that do not work and the necessity of renting other machines to perform farm operations on time.

I sincerely hope that the business of the committee will proceed more quickly and that steps will be taken to relieve the burden of farmers who must incur extraordinary expenditures to till their lands, in order to feed mankind.

Before concluding my remarks, I should like to point out that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) inadvertently spoke about reports when he meant studies. I hope he will not mind if I say that I hope it was inadvertently also that he answered in the negative the question I put to him yesterday. I asked him then whether he would be ready to recommend that the budget of the Canadian Dairy Commission be not reduced by $10 million for the dairy year 1970-71. I hope that next week, he will state that he answered inadvertently. We could then say: if the price of spare parts is not reduced and if the report is not published on time, at least this amount of $10 million will be some compensation.

POLLUTION

CONTROL OF TANKERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the seriousness of the pollution problem that has resulted from the foundering of the Liberian tanker Arrow, I ask unanimous consent of the House, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to make the following motion, which is seconded by the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley:

That the question of maritime oil pollution and control of tankers in Canadian waters be referred to Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Our party would be quite prepared for this motion to be passed without debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will know that this motion can be put to the House only if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement so the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Korchinski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mackenzie.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion because this appears to be the first opportunity that the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board, who has been away on an official trip, has had to present a report. He may require more time to prepare a report, but it is customary for a minister, after being away, to present a report.

Mr. Speaker: It is not customary to raise such points as a point of order.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—DEVELOPMENTS FOLLOWING GROUNDING OF TANKER "ARROW"

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he could indicate briefly what the position is with regard to the Arrow, particularly with regard to any progress made in disposing of the stern part of the vessel by hauling it away. I should also like to ask whether any progress has been made in freeing the forward part and whether any consideration is being given to disposing of it in the same way. If not, what progress is being made with regard to the burning of the oil?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be as brief as possible. With regard to the stern section of the vessel, which, as I explained yesterday, is still afloat, there is now an effort under way to get it more buoyant so it will be possible to tow. As is the case now, with so much oil—I am not sure if this is a contradiction in terms—in the forward part of the stern, it is not possible to tow it. If the current assessment of it is correct, it appears possible it can stay afloat sufficiently for the oil to be pumped out of it into another vessel, so there will not be a disposal problem in the other sense of the word with regard to the stern section.

In so far as the forward section is concerned, there is no chance whatever of salvage in the sense of moving it off the rock.

A controlled experiment was conducted yesterday with burning. This was with the use of glass pellets and benzine and also using magnesium flares and divers to get the whole business alight. This has proved successful and it is now our intention to proceed with this but letting the oil out in controlled quantities for burning so that the conflagration will not at any time be so great that the smoke problem might constitute a pollution hazard of another kind. I hope that satisfies the hon. member.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister telling the House that the leakage is now under control with regard to both sections of the vessel?

Mr. Jamieson: No, sir. I wish that were the case, but it is not the case. In the case of the stern, I think it can be said it is very close to being under control. In the case of the forward section there is still seepage. While the winds were off shore this slick was of course moving off. I believe the forecasts are for a low pressure system moving up the coast. If that comes in the normal fashion it will result in probable southwesterly and southeasterly winds. These could drive some of the slick on shore. I would not want to indicate that the matter is under control. It is not. There could be some coastal pollution as a result, but the burning will go ahead as rapidly as possible and as rapidly as weather conditions permit.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Who assesses the damage to Canadian interests and is an assessment already under way?

Mr. Jamieson: I suppose, Mr. Speaker, in so far as the assessment is concerned it is pretty damned obvious. In terms of the value of the assessment, this will have to come after the total damage is assessable. At the present time the main job is to get rid of as much of the oil as we possibly can.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In light of this tragedy and in light of possible tragedies involving other parts of the Canadian coastline, is the department re-examining its policy regarding navigational safeguards along our coast?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not believe it is necessary to re-examine the policy. It appears to have been adequate for the conditions which prevailed up until recent times. We may have now not only to put in additional navigational aids in view of the additional hazards; we may have to introduce more stringent regulations with regard to the passage of oil either into Canadian ports or through Canadian waters. This is being re-examined. The investigation of this particular incident hopefully will give us some indication as to how we might be able to prevent such incidents in future but, as my hon. friend knows, shipwrecks do occur and it is not possible to eliminate them entirely.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): A supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. When can we expect the new international regulations controlling situations such as this?

Mr. Jamieson: I answered that in the House a few days ago. We have taken initiatives in this regard, but so far there has not been an international agreement. I feel that internationally we are making more progress with regard to rights of way and the like to try to avoid collisions at sea, but on the matter of indemnity or financial responsibility I fear that some time must elapse before we get international agreement on that count.

CHEDABUCTO BAY—EFFECT OF OIL ON MARINE LIFE—COMPENSATION TO FISHERMEN

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. Is the Fisheries Research Board taking advantage of this opportunity to study the effects of this oil pollution on marine life in the Chedabucto Bay area?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I believe this is the case, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): A supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. If damage to the fisheries resources in that area is determined by the minister's officials, what action will be taken by his department to recompense the affected fishermen for the losses that will occur?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we have already taken action with regard to phosphates in Newfoundland and mercury on the Prairies, and I am sure we can take parallel action in this case if necessary.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister have patrol vessels of his department in the area to determine the course of the oil slick in the event it does go out to sea?

Mr. Davis: The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

OIL

FEASIBILITY STUDY OF PIPELINE FOR TRANSPORT FROM ARCTIC

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the pollution dangers in oil tanker transportation, is the government taking the initiative by commencing a feasibility study of the transportation of oil from the Arctic by pipeline?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, there are several studies going on with respect to the possibility of transportation by pipeline from the Arctic. Certainly this is one of the more attractive features of such a method of transportation. Apart from factors that are not known in regard to pipeline transportation, certainly it would appear that it would avoid the danger of offshore spillage such as occurred in the case of the Arrow.

Mr. Paproski: I do not believe the minister has answered my question. I just want to know if the government is doing any feasibility studies.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question. As the government is in partnership in the Panarctic syndicate, is the government prepared to go into a syndicate of a similar nature for the building of pipelines either from the Arctic or Montreal for the transportation of crude petroleum in Canada?

Mr. Greene: There is no decision in that regard at this time, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

WHEAT—POSSIBILITY OF INCREASED EXPORTS TO BRITAIN AND WESTERN EUROPE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of reports that the minister during his London meeting discussed volume of production and possible changes in the grading and marketing of western Canadian grains, is he in a position to advise the House as to the possibility of increased exports of grain to Britain and western Europe?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I did have very interesting discussions in Britain with some of our principal buyers. I was very pleased to receive their opinion and the opinion of the government that a place for Canadian grain in the United Kingdom is assured at high levels whether the United Kingdom remains in its present position or becomes a member of the EEC.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question. Will the minister be prepared at an early date to make a statement in the House on two matters which are currently being discussed in western Canada, (a) the possibility of an acreage payment and (b) possible changes in the grading system for wheat?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, a good number of questions are under consideration by the government and by my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture. Progress is being made on a number of fronts with regard to the grain situation in western Canada. I would not suggest that I will be making a statement at an early date on either of the subjects mentioned, although certainly other matters may well require statements in the near future.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the minister how he can make the statement that an important place for Canadian wheat will be assured in the British market whether or not Britain changes its status. How can the minister make such a statement when he has not got the slightest idea of the terms under which Britain might enter the Common Market?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question appears to be argumentative.

WHEAT—STATEMENT RESPECTING REDUCED PRODUCTION—FINANCIAL INCENTIVE TO FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Having regard to the statements reportedly made by the minister to the press in London, may I ask the hon. gentleman whether he is in a position to say that the attitude of the government toward the tremendous pile-up of wheat—over a billion bushels—means in the next few years a substantial reduction, up to ten million acres, in the amount of land now under wheat or other cereals? Did he say when he was over there that the government was giving consideration to paying farmers for getting out of production?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. What I did say there, and what I have said before in Canada, is that the very great supply of grain represents an extremely costly burden if it is in supply above what is economically desirable, and that this is a burden which it is not appropriate for the farmers to bear; accordingly, methods must be found to avoid having the farmers in the prairie region, particularly, carry this excessive burden especially in circumstances where, due to the world situation, they are not in a position to spend any money unnecessarily on meeting costs of this kind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the minister explain while he was over there, or can he explain to the House now, how it came about that in the last one and a half or two years Canada's share of the international export market has fallen from 28 per cent to 17 per cent while other nations have increased their sales?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. member's question is in the form of an argument. The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Will the minister in charge of the Wheat Board make a statement soon—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have been in the House for some time, and I should appreciate very much knowing what was wrong with that question respecting a matter which affects western Canada.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: While I am speaking on wheat problems I hope I am entitled at least to the respect of silence on the part of those on the government benches who know nothing about this subject.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I have expressed the opinion that the right hon. member's question was posed in an argumentative way. That is a matter of opinion. The right hon. member may not think the question was an argument. The Chair has to make a ruling on such matters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a fact.

Mr. Speaker: If the right hon. gentleman suggests he was stating fact I would put it to him that a statement of fact, if it is put to the minister in an argumentative way, is not acceptable as a question from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I rephrase my question, then? Is it a fact that Canada's share of the export market in the two and a half years during which this administration has been in office has fallen—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to sustain the ruling I made a few moments ago.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Before I ask my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the right hon. member for Prince Albert interrupted me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Too bad.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Will the minister make a statement soon on motions with regard to the proposed changes in the quota system?

Mr. Lang: As hon. members know, a committee is presently studying this question and there is an early deadline for the submission of its report. I would expect before too long to be in a position to give consideration to the results of these studies and the general direction in which government policy may be going with regard to the quota system for the next crop year.

EMERGENCY PAYMENTS IN LIEU OF FINAL WHEAT BOARD PAYMENTS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a supplementary or related question for the Minister without Portfolio. In light of his recent public statement that no final payments for grain will be forthcoming this spring from the Wheat Board pool accounts, can the minister tell us whether the government intends to make a substantial emergency payment in lieu of the lack of final Wheat Board payments in order to tide western farmers over their very serious economic plight?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): There is nothing further to report on that issue. The question of the cash position of western farmers is, of course, very much in our minds at all times.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lambton-Kent—a supplementary question?

Mr. McCutcheon: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. Mine is not a supplementary question; I do not want to ask about wheat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

WHEAT—REDUCTION OF ACREAGE BY OTHER COUNTRIES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): In view of the fact that sales to Britain have fallen from 80 million bushels to 50 million bushels, and since Canada's percentage of world trade has declined to the extent mentioned by my right hon. friend from Prince Albert, may I ask whether the minister consulted with other producing countries to ascertain whether they, too, will be reducing their acreage or whether, in addition to decreasing our acreage, we shall lose our share of the market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): We shall discuss this issue, as we have been discussing pricing issues, with other countries. There is no doubt at all that Canada's wheat sales did suffer from the fact that for about a year and a half we were doing everything we could to bring in the International Grains Arrangement which would have meant so much to western farmers. That, in brief, is the reason our sales to Britain were lower last year. This was certainly clear to the people in Britain with whom I spoke last week.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

USE OF UNITED STATES ICE-BREAKERS IN WATERS ADJACENT TO CANADIAN TERRITORY

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Prime Minister.

In view of the report we had to the effect that the U.S. government has increased its budget by 40 per cent under the item related to the construction of ice-breakers and that Admiral Trimble refers to "waters contiguous to the Canadian territory" rather than to "Canadian waters", I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to take up this problem with the U.S. government and to have our sovereignty over Canadian Arctic waters respected?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I can have much say in the U.S. government decision to allocate a certain amount for the construction of ice-breakers. As far as I am concerned, far from being disappointed, I am glad that Admiral Trimble refers to "waters in general" rather than to ours. It is quite clear that Canadian waters are ours, but if the Americans want to clear ice on the high seas they are, of course, free to do so.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. I would like to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that Admiral Trimble neither said "waters in general" nor "Canadian waters", but that he really said "waters contiguous to" the Canadian territory in the Arctic.

[English]

ASSERTION OF CONTROL OVER ARCTIC AREA

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council. Will the government give immediate priority to presenting to this House legislation which it has promised for this session and which, allegedly, will reaffirm and reassert our complete sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic area? I ask this question for the same reasons as prompted the hon. member for Abitibi—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has a right to ask a question but not to indicate why he is asking it.

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Legislation related to this subject will be coming forward in due course as indicated to the House.

Mr. Nesbitt: Perhaps the President of the Privy Council did not hear the question. Will he give immediate priority to this legislation in the light of what is going on in Congress? They are not building these icebreakers for the Caribbean.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Perhaps the hon. member did not hear the answer. Maybe someone would read it to him tomorrow.

INDUSTRY

URANIUM—DISCONTINUANCE OF STOCKPILING

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the recent massive sale of Canadian uranium to Japan, would the minister tell us whether Canadian stockpiling of uranium is to be discontinued?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Any announcements in respect of the stockpiling program will be made in this House in the normal course.

REQUEST BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION TO MANUFACTURERS RESPECTING COST AND PRICE INCREASES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question I should like to direct to the Prime Minister. Is the Prices and Incomes Commission asking those who sell products in Canada to absorb part of their increases in costs or simply not to increase their prices by more than their increases in costs?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): At this stage the government is not asking those companies for anything for Information Canada—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: You are thinking about it.

Mr. Trudeau: We will, we will.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: The Prices and Incomes Commission is meeting with these representatives now and I am waiting for a report on the meeting, as the hon. member may be.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. There was great confusion about the matter up until at least lunch time today, and this is the key to the whole conference. Does the government not think it had better make up its mind on this issue—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —so that the conference does not fall flat on its face?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

METHOD OF ESTABLISHING AGENCY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Ministers' remark, I am not sure whether I should direct my question to him or to Information Canada. On this question of Information Canada, may I ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to establish the agency by Order in Council, by legislation, or will there be an item in the estimates with regard to this agency? May I also ask when the Prime Minister will announce who will be the head of the agency?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first question, there will be a special item in the Appropriation Act. A special item will appear in the estimates which I believe will be tabled tomorrow.

With regard to the second question, I did discuss with the minister who has been appointed to plan for the agency what is the next step in the selection of the head of Information Canada.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I note there are perhaps 10 or 12 members who are seemingly anxious to ask supplementary questions. Perhaps we should have a special question period for this subject. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South.

Mr. Lewis: Who is the head of the section that has been doing the planning and presumably assisting the Prime Minister in his presentation of policy today? Who is the head of that section now?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there have been a group of officials, I believe Privy Council officials, who have been working for some time to bring the policy to a head.

STATUS OF QUEEN'S PRINTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that Information Canada is to be established under an item in the estimates, might I ask the Prime Minister whether the designation, description or appellation of Queen's Printer and the actual office of Queen's Printer will remain?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I hope it will remain for a while, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister says for a while. That kind of answer may sound a very happy one, but what does the Prime Minister mean by it? Does he mean that it will be removed surreptitiously in the same way the Queen's designation has been removed elsewhere?

METHOD OF DISSEMINATING NEWS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. To which minister of the cabinet should we address our questions concerning Information Canada, and will the dissemination of news be by the printed word or through the medium of television and radio?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in my statement I did say that the minister responsible would be the Minister without Portfolio from York-Scarborough.

FUNCTION OF NATIONAL FILM BOARD

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question in connection not with the Queen's Printer but with the other agency mentioned by the Prime Minister in his statement, the National Film Board. Were the National Film Board and its commissioner informed as to its function in Information Canada before the Prime Minister made his statement today?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for the Film Board is well aware of the decision that has been announced today.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, my question was very clear and it was this. Was the commissioner of the Film Board informed by the government of its function in Information Canada before the Prime Minister's statement today, and is this the beginning of the end of the National Film Board?

HOUSING

INTRODUCTION OF REVISED RENT-TO-INCOME SCALE

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of objections expressed by the Ontario government, is the minister considering abandoning his Canada-wide revised rent-to-income scale for public housing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I suppose this question stems from an article in the Globe and Mail this morning which was quite romantic but not necessarily based on fact.

Mrs. MacInnis: A supplementary question. May I inquire when we may expect a statement from the minister on the revised rent-to-income scale?

Mr. Andras: Soon, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—EFFECTS OF AUSTERITY PROGRAM

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

On several occasions while he was talking about inflation, the Prime Minister has stated that he will force British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario to slow down their present prosperity, and I would like to ask him if he can tell us why he intends to slow down progress instead of pushing forward those who are now vegetating in the other provinces?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that his question is argumentative and is therefore not acceptable.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of Justice in view of his statement last evening that there is a two and a half year backlog of cases in Toronto. Since there is a backlog at the present time in the province of Alberta, and since he has been sitting on the question of appointing further judges, if he has no Liberals to appoint will he appoint a few Tories?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRANSPORT

ABANDONING OF ARCTIC METEOROLOGICAL SERVICES BY UNITED STATES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any indication from United States authorities that they will be abandoning their meteorological services in the Arctic?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any definitive report on this. Rather than give a casual answer, may I take the question as notice and I will try to get a more definite answer for the hon. member tomorrow.

FISHERIES

ACTION RESPECTING DEPLETION OF RESOURCES BY FOREIGN FISHERMEN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of his statement in Montreal that the Soviet Union and Poland are depleting Canada's fishery resources, what steps has the government taken to bring this matter before an international panel of experts at the United Nations, and what steps will be taken to call immediately an international conference on this problem which is of vital economic importance to Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this matter is of great concern to all nations fishing the North Atlantic and has been repeatedly brought before the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries. The matter was reviewed again in the spring. A few days ago an announcement was made about a joint arrangement with respect to one specific area of the North Atlantic—Georges Bank.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. With respect to the news release issued yesterday and mentioned by the minister in regard to the elimination of 15 nations to protect haddock stocks, does the department plan to patrol this area to make sure that these nations are not fishing? If they are fishing for other species, does the department plan to check these vessels to guard against cheating?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, we are checking, but the waters we are talking about extend far out into the Atlantic and are in very large measure international waters that are covered by international law. All we can do is to reach agreements with a number of other nations.

Mr. Comeau: A further supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members the fact that we will shortly be running out of time. I therefore invite their co-operation in limiting the number of supplementaries.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Has the minister's department made representations in regard to this matter to Russia, Poland and East Germany and, if so, with what result?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, representations are made through the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fisheries.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government given consideration to having bilateral talks with the Soviet Union since it is experiencing the same problem with Japan in the Pacific?

Mr. Davis: No, Mr. Speaker. We are working through this international body which I think can bring pressure to bear on the Soviet Union and other countries from many quarters.

OIL

U.S. TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS REGARDING IMPORTS—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Now that President Nixon's cabinet task force has submitted its recommendations to the President regarding crude oil imports, can the minister say whether his department has studied the effect these recommendations will have on Canadian crude oil exports and, if so, is it his intention to make the Canadian government's views known to the President of the United States?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, we made our position known to the Schultz committee during the period of their deliberations. The report of the Schultz committee is before the President now but it has not been made public to date. Certainly upon its publication we will continue to make our position known and to negotiate with the United States to achieve the best possible position for Canada in the United States oil markets.

Mr. Saltsman: Has the United States government made the Schultz committee report available to the minister so he can study it with a view to ascertaining its effect on Canadian exports?

Mr. Greene: No, Mr. Speaker. It is a report from a presidential committee to the President and it has not yet been made available to us or to the public.

TRADE

SALE OF REACTOR PLANT TO ROUMANIA

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Will he say whether the government has been successful in making a sale of a Canadian reactor plant to Roumania?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I understand this sale is under discussion, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

SALE AND UTILIZATION OF CEREAL GRAIN

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture.

Considering that the government is now carrying out some costly research projects in order to use poplar wood as feed, could the Minister of Agriculture tell the House whether he is considering the sale and the use of Canadian grain the quality of which is undisputed?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this is a very general question. However, the minister may wish to answer it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I am sorry but the latter part of the translation did not come through. Would the hon. member mind repeating that part of the question?

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Agriculture tell the House if he intends to consider further the use of Canadian grain whose quality is undisputed?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might reflect on the question for a moment and the Chair will recognize him later.

AIRPORTS

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—ESTABLISHMENT OF CO-ORDINATING COMMITTEE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Has the government taken any decision concerning the Quebec government's request to establish a federal-provincial committee, at the ministerial level, in order to co-ordinate the planning and the development of the new airport at Ste. Scholastique and the neighbouring areas? If so, would the minister inform the House of this decision?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there has been no formal committee established. As I indicated a few days ago, there have been a number of discussions both at the ministerial level and among officials. This may very well lead to the establishment of such a committee, but it has not been formalized to date.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Does the minister intend to set up a similar committee at the ministerial level with respect to the development of the Toronto international airport?

[English]

Mr. Jamieson: It is quite possible that we may use the same technique in the case of Toronto, Mr. Speaker, but in both cases, as I said, the matter has not reached that stage yet.

[Mr. Speaker.]

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—SAFETY OF DISPERSANT, COREXIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can assure the House that the dispersant being used in Chedabucto Bay, which I think is called Corexit, is in fact safer to the environment there than the oil itself would be?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Of course, Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak from personal knowledge on this matter. I have been assured, however, by people who presumably are experts on the matter that Corexit is, so far as is known, reasonably non-toxic in terms of marine life. As to its relative value or demerit in relation to the oil, I think it is probably the case that it is not as harmful certainly as the oil.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INTEGRATION OF DEPARTMENTAL MARINE SERVICES INTO ARMED FORCES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Since there apparently is a committee appointed by the government to study the possibility of integrating all departmental marine services under the Canadian Armed Forces, will the minister assure the House that before any recommendations are implemented they will be referred for study to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am aware that a few studies are going on but I am not aware of the existence of a committee to correlate these efforts as yet. I imagine whenever these different studies are completed they will be of major interest to the committee and I certainly would not prevent the committee from considering them. I would encourage the committee to look at them for the particular purpose of giving advice.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether a committee of three senior civil servants, under the chairmanship of Mr. Louis Audet, is studying this question of integrating the marine services of the government under one department? I direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

LAMPREY CONTROL PROGRAM, LAKE HURON AND GEORGIAN BAY

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether sufficient funds will be made available so the Great Lakes Fisheries Commission will be able to carry out a lamprey control program in Lake Huron and Georgian Bay during the 1970's?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I certainly hope so, Mr. Speaker. The funds we make available are tied to the value of United States funds made available and we do not know what that is as yet.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REPORTED STOPPING OF PAYMENT FOR HOSPITALIZATION OF INDIANS AND ESKIMOS SUFFERING FROM TUBERCULOSIS

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the federal government stop paying for hospital treatment of Indians and Eskimos suffering from tuberculosis this spring as reported in the Edmonton Journal on February 2?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, that does not come under the responsibility of my department, but I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare has duly said that such rumor was unfounded.

AGRICULTURE

AMENDMENTS TO CANADA GRAIN ACT ARISING FROM XCAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Will the government be introducing amendments to the Canada Grain Act if the new grain selling agency, XCAN, affects the selling of board grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Grain Act is within the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL—ACTION TO END DISPUTE—PROTECTION OF TRUCKS

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General. I will heed your admonition, and so that I will not have to ask a supplementary I will give him both barrels at once. What action is he taking to end the Montreal postal dispute which has already resulted in half of the city's mail deliveries being three or four days late with no weekend pick-up? In view of the violence that has already flared up in the Montreal dispute, what steps is he taking to protect postal trucks engaged in pick-up and delivery?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the employer, Lapalme Transport Incorporated, through its lawyer has sent a letter to the syndicate demanding that the employees furnish the men to man the trucks necessary to supply normal services to all Montrealers. I may say that we are quite disturbed and I intend to go down to Montreal tonight. We are concerned about the violence and also the threats by the union to disclose various public activities that have been engaged in in recent years. If there is a garbage can I hope they take the lid off. We do not intend to submit in any way to what I can only call blackmail practices on the part of the union.

Mr. McCutcheon: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked his supplementary.

OIL

INCREASED EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES IN VIEW OF MIDDLE EAST TENSIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the continued tensions in the Middle East, has the government had any talks with the United States to increase Canada's oil export quotas?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I think this question should be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I will make sure he answers tomorrow.

HOUSING

QUEBEC—ALLEGED REDUCTION OF FEDERAL GRANT FOR URBAN RENEWAL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Housing.

In view of the present conflict between the government of Quebec and the federal government concerning urban renewal grants, can the minister confirm whether the federal government had agreed to pay $94,500,000 to the government of Quebec and is now only prepared to pay $25,000,000?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there was no such commitment made in respect of the $94 million, but it is correct that in the announcement I made in December in respect of the $25 million, which is specifically identified with three projects in the province of Quebec, that offer was made. In respect of the first part of the question, I do not think that is correct.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I say that there have been discussions among representatives of the parties and I believe there might be a disposition to pass government order No. 58 in the name of the Minister without Portfolio answering for the Wheat Board if it were called as the first item of business for today.

AGRICULTURE

REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE RESPECTING NON-QUOTA FEED GRAIN PRICES

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio) moved:

That the Standing Committee on Agriculture be empowered to examine and inquire into the problem of distress or unreasonably low prices for non-quota feed grain being marketed in the designated area as defined by the Canadian Wheat Board Act and to report to the House observations and proposals thereon.

Motion agreed to.

[Mr. Pepin.]

EXPROPRIATION

ACQUISITION AND ABANDONMENT OF LAND, APPOINTMENT OF HEARING OFFICERS, ETC.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-136, respecting the expropriation of land, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House. I merely wish to speak for one or two moments on this particular bill. It brings the law on expropriation into the twentieth century for the first time. On balance, we think the bill is a very considerable improvement on the Canadian law to date. The bill has already been fully debated on second reading, before the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and at the report stage in this House. In our view the bill would have been a good deal better had the government accepted the amendments proposed by opposition members. I believe the minister tended to accept the advice of his own advisers rather than the opinions of some of his colleagues.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. gentleman concede that a good many recommendations and amendments from all quarters of the House and of the committee were accepted.

Mr. Brewin: Some amendments were accepted, and I commend the minister for that. I thought there were some excellent amendments which were not accepted. I really rose merely to say I regretted not being in the House yesterday when these matters were discussed. I understand that my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), showed all the legal erudition and clear understanding one would have expected from him. I do not propose to repeat the arguments he made yesterday during the debate.

On balance, we think this bill is a great improvement and are ready to have it pass on third reading without further debate or discussion.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, before we have the vote on third reading, I should like to say a few words. It is very difficult to be highly critical of Bill C-136 because it is a great step forward in respect of the expropriation laws of Canada. When we realize that the last time a major amendment was made to this act was in 1886, the necessity for amendments becomes evident and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) should be congratulated for bringing this bill forward. During the debate on the report stage, the minister brought forth a motion in respect of clause 14(3) of the bill. Unfortunately, because of illness and another appointment, I was unable to be here. In his remarks the minister mentioned this was the first time since he had been Minister of Justice that he had failed to accept at the report stage a decision of the committee. He also suggested there might have been some rather peculiar things happening in the committee, and that we almost used a shotgun to bring forward the amendment before the committee. He said he was not casting any reflection on any member but suggested that, on sober reflection, probably members would agree with him.

It was I who brought forward the amendment to this clause in the committee. I am sure the minister and you, Mr. Speaker, would like to hear the reason I brought forward the amendment, because it is a matter of great importance. I believe my experience in expropriation matters, and that of many other members, has been much the same. When it comes to expropriation, we find that the Crown or the expropriating authority is in the superior position at times and can play a cat and mouse game with the person whose property is being expropriated. The Crown has always held the strong position of having most of the competent appraisers in the country on its side in matters of expropriation. The Crown also often has the good fortune of having some of the best counsel plead its case. This places the expropriated owner in a very difficult position in respect of bargaining effectively with the expropriating authority.

I brought forward an amendment which said, in effect, that the expropriating authority would give the expropriated owner not only a copy of the appraisal on which the compensation was based, but also a copy of all appraisals because it seemed to me the whole philosophy behind expropriation is that the person should be entitled to full and fair compensation for the expropriated property. If given all the appraisals within the control of the expropriating authority the person concerned, along with his real estate agent, appraiser or lawyer could determine whether an offer was fair and reasonable and whether he was receiving full and fair compensation. I was quite surprised, after making my remarks on the amendment, that 75 per cent of the members of the committee voted for the amendment. This created quite a shock for the Minister of Justice and his officials. They immediately set about correcting the situation. As the minister said, this is the first time he has failed to accept an amendment brought forward at the committee stage by any member.

In his remarks yesterday the minister set forth some of the possible consequences of allowing the amendment to remain in the form in which it appeared at the committee stage. I was really amazed to hear him say the department might have to resort to subterfuge by obtaining only oral appraisals in respect of expropriation matters. I have heard it said that in matters of law, the Crown never wins and never loses. Surely, there is an onus on the Crown or on the expropriating authority not to allow itself to be placed in a position where it feels it is winning or losing. I believe its position at all times should be that the offer it presents to the owner whose property is being expropriated is a just and fair offer. The suggestion that the government would resort to subterfuge and obtain oral appraisals in order to outsmart the person whose property is being expropriated is not in keeping with the philosophy of government.

He also suggested a problem might be created by having only one appraisal. I think it should be brought to the attention of the House that in Ontario, when a matter goes to arbitration, ten days before the hearing the parties must exchange the appraisals that they have obtained, either on behalf of the expropriating authority or on behalf of the owner of the expropriated land. I should like to see the able Minister of Justice suggest that if the case does go to arbitration we at least keep in line with the Ontario law by making it a rule that all sides exchange the valuations they have obtained on the expropriated property. This would be in keeping with the spirit of fairness to the owner whose land is expropriated. Here, I am not referring to the person who has a large tract of land, who can bring in the best appraisers and legal counsel to speak on his behalf, but to the ordinary person whose land is expropriated for some public purpose and who does not have legal counsel or appraisers at hand.

I hope that the Minister of Justice, when this bill becomes law, will bring forth some rule that if a hearing is held there will be an exchange of appraisals obtained by the government and by the appraising authority. This seems to me to be more equitable and fair to all parties.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION, ACQUISITION, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-152, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, in the few moments during which I participated in the debate on this bill, I suggested that it had been on ice for a long time but I felt that as it thawed it would be revealed as a fishy proposition. As a matter of fact, all of us know that fishy products tend to be slightly odoriferous. I would like to underline what I said on the earlier occasion by saying that if you take a piece of rather stale fish and freeze it, it is still stale when it is thawed.

In any event, I think that my remarks are justified because those of us who have been involved in the situation surrounding the introduction of this bill realize full well there is much more here than meets the eye in the legislation. I think probably the most important amendment in principle to the National Parks Act for some time is to be found in clause 13 which reads as follows:

> There is hereby established a corporation for the purposes set forth in this Part, to be known as the National Parks Leaseholds Corporation.

Perhaps it is worthwhile reminding the House at this stage of the circumstances in which we were first made aware of this proposal. The Standing Committee on Northern Affairs had made a tour of the Banff and Jasper parks, had heard an extensive series of briefs from people interested in park matters, and also briefs outlining the problems of the residents of those two communities. We had returned to Ottawa and had held further meetings here. The committee was at the point of preparing its report for presentation to the House when the then minister of Indian affairs and northern development appeared before the committee on March 14, 1967 and made a statement to us in which cursory reference was made to the hearings and the evidence before the committee. I should like to quote from page 2 of the press release containing the statement by the minister. It reads:

> I would like to announce now, to recommend to parliament the enactment of legislation to establish a National Parks Leasehold Corporation for the purpose of administering these leases. This corporation will be independent, subject only to its statute, and any written directions of the minister.

A little further on, it reads:

> By this measure we intend that commercial leases will be administered on commercial principles and on these principles only—

Then, it continues:

> We would also of course expect that operating on sound commercial principles the corporation would, firstly, secure the necessary volume of investment for the visitor facilities needed and, secondly, ensure that the return to the taxpayers as a whole from these commercial concessions was adequate, which I do not think is the case today.

I recognize that the statement made by the then minister could be the subject of a great deal of debate. But from my point of view the introduction of part III of the National Parks Act can best be summed up by stating that it represents a form of creeping commercialism into the national parks administration of Canada. I think the discussions that took place before the committee earlier revealed quite clearly that that will be the result of the passage of this legislation. I contend that this is basically contrary to the spirit of the national parks trust, and it is not something which should be supported by this House.

The argument that this corporation will be independent of the minister may, on the face of it, have its attraction to some people. I suggest to you, however, that what it means is that once we set up a commercial corporation to be operated on commercial principles, one that is independent of the minister, we are paving the way for the inroads of commercialism into the national parks of Canada on a scale that we have not seen before. I submit that this is not something to which those who believe in the value of the parks as part of the national parks trust should lend their support. What we are in effect doing by this proposal is to set aside certain enclaves within the parks free from the control of the parks people.

In other words, we are saying to the people to whom we entrust the administration of the parks, "No longer will certain parts of the parks be under your administration. We are going to turn over certain parts of the national parks to people whose philosophy is commercialism." The result is that the parks people who are concerned with parks as parks, whether they be ecologists or naturalists, will no longer have any direct say in the activities that take place in certain parts of the parks. This is why I suggest we should oppose what I call creeping commercialism within the national parks system in Canada, and on that ground we should refuse to lend our support to this bill.

Secondly, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that by this bill we are creating an unnecessary and double bureaucracy. We already have a national parks administration. Now, we are proposing to set up new machinery which will function outside the parks branch. We are to have a new corporation with presidents, directors, staff and all the rest of it to do a job that I suggest can be done quite well by competent administrators in the department, whether employed in the local park areas, in the regional park areas, or in the national headquarters at Ottawa, and who would operate the parks within the spirit of the national parks trust. In effect, we will be saddling the administration of the national parks with an unnecessary bureaucracy and that, I submit, is a second ground for opposing passage of the bill.

There exists a myth in some people's minds that people who are employed directly in the public service for a salary are somehow incompetent individuals! I would not say that there have never been incompetent individuals employed in the public service, but by and large I submit that concept is a myth. I do not believe it is necessary to set up all of the political bureaucratic machinery of an independent corporation, separate from the normal operations of the department, in order to look after certain small parts of the national parks that have been leased to individuals. So, Mr. Speaker, I oppose this bill because I believe it will result in the creation of what I have referred to as a double bureaucracy.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other ancillary reasons why we should oppose this piece of legislation, and particularly oppose its passage at this time. I submit that anyone who participated in the hearings of the committee in 1967 cannot help but agree that, in effect, the introduction of this legislation is a cover-up for the refusal of the administration to face up to certain situations in a realistic manner. Mr. Speaker, I suggest you cannot cure a cancer with a poultice, and so far as I am concerned this legislation is simply an attempt to wrap a poultice around a situation in the national parks administration. This proposal is not one that warrants the support of this House at this time.

The members of the committee who visited Banff and Jasper—I refer to Banff and Jasper in particular because I think it is primarily out of the situation in Banff and Jasper, and to a lesser degree in Waterton, that this legislation has been developed—cannot help but agree that the citizens of those two communities came before that committee in good faith. They felt this was a real opportunity for them to be heard before the highest court in the land, and that they were entitled to a fair hearing.

It has been a matter of considerable grief to me ever since that time that the committee report, which was never debated, simply amounted to a complete whitewash of the strongest objections of the citizens of Banff and Jasper with respect to certain aspects of the administration of parks policy which related to their communities. I felt ashamed that the committee, in dealing with the matter of leases, took the attitude that, rather than have a committee of Parliament recommend that the viewpoint of these citizens be dealt with in equity by Parliament, any differences of opinion on leasing matters should be left to the courts to test the validity of the citizens' cases. The reference was particularly to the question of the perpetual leases that had been issued within the parks boundaries in earlier years.

When I made reference to this subject during the discussion of Parks estimates in the House on June 9, 1967, the first opportunity that there was to discuss the question in the House, I made it quite clear I felt a mistake had been made in the issuing of these perpetual leases. I felt that parliament should come to grips with the situation. If I may, I would just quote what I had to say as recorded at page 1360 of Hansard of that date:

> I want to state my view quite clearly. I do not believe that these perpetual leases should be allowed to continue forever. I am not learned in the law, but it appears to me that the way in which some of these leases were drafted comes pretty close to being the equivalent of title in fee simple as we ordinarily understand it in other parts of the country outside of park boundaries.

I went on to suggest that we should in effect, approach this matter in the spirit of what would normally be considered to be an expropriation proceeding. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, it is rather ironic that we should be discussing this matter when the House has just given third reading to a bill dealing with procedures of federal expropriation, which one of my colleagues referred to as having brought the matter of expropriation into the 20th century. It is ironic that we should now be dealing with a proposal relating to leases in the parks, and in particular the perpetual leases, which will leave those leases forever within the ambit of the concepts of the 19th century. This, so far as I am concerned, is a third ground for opposing the passage of the bill.

The fourth reason why I think we should oppose this bill, and in particular in the context of the current situation, is somewhat related to the third. It relates particularly to Banff and Jasper and the question of perpetual leases. The fourth reason is that if this bill is passed it will perpetuate, as long it remains on the statute books, the existing colonialism in the towns of Banff and Jasper. They will become to an even greater degree than they are now, company towns. At least now, the citizens in those communities have some form of appeal directly up through the political process which we pride ourselves is a democratic one in Canada. But, Mr. Speaker, once the property within the townsites of Banff and Jasper is put in the hands of this corporation, as I understand it this corporation will be the end-all and the be-all of law so far as property holding in Banff and Jasper is concerned, and that is a situation which I say is simply not good enough. I have made it clear before and I make it clear again that I do not believe private property should be held within the parks; that property, if it is going to be used by individuals, must be held under some form of lease.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in this Parliament long ago we should have come to grips with the question and should have dealt with it in the manner the people of Banff and Jasper asked us to deal with it, that is, in Parliament. Having done that, we would have paved the way to take the step that I suggested in this House on June 9, 1967. On that occasion, I suggested that we pass legislation granting to Banff and Jasper the status of towns under special federal charter so that they might have dealings in a normal way under agreement between the federal and provincial governments for the municipal services available to other communities in the province of Alberta. It is because these towns are within the parks that there would have to be special charters. I suggested then that there are anomalies within the parks, but there they are and we must recognize the fact. The people living in those communities are citizens of Canada and should have the same rights as other citizens for democratic self-employment in their own communities which they do not have now. Had Parliament taken the step at that time, there would now be some local authority with rights under the law to deal with an agency such as this, if it is to be set up as custodian of land within the boundaries of the communities.

As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the proposal before us would make the people of Banff and Jasper forever the prisoners of this corporation. Many of the people who have grown up in the province from which I come know what is meant by the term "company town". I suggest that in the 20th century the Parliament of Canada should not be moving to create company towns anywhere in this country, but rather in the reverse direction. The proposal to add this provision under the National Parks Act will, in my view, do exactly that as far as the communities of Banff and Jasper are concerned. That, Mr. Speaker, is the fourth reason why I feel that I cannot support the bill.

As far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, and as far as my party is concerned, we do not want to become involved in the kind of argument that has gone on in this chamber and in committee as to which administration was responsible for what in respect of leasing policies.

Mr. Woolliams: I know we were not.

Mr. Barnett: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if the present government were to agree to withdraw this bill, and to take a fair look at the point of view expressed to the standing committee of this House by the citizens of Banff and Jasper, and was prepared to recognize by the introduction of appropriate legislation that Parliament wished to undo some of the mistakes of the past in the matter of parks policy in such a way as to deal fairly and equitably with the individuals involved, we might then be well on the way toward a common point of view on the establishment of visitors' service centres within the parks.

I have talked to people whose primary concern is in the welfare, preservation and enhancement of enjoyment of present and future generations in the parks. I find myself in sympathy with their views and the approaches they advocate. We have some very fine and knowledgeable Canadians within the present parks administration, and it is not fair to saddle them with the proposal in this bill on the flimsy excuse that Parliament is too niggardly to supply the funds to establish facilities of proper standard for the enjoyment of visitors to the parks. It is not fair to hamper them with a noose around their necks, to hamper their approach to the free and full development of the national parks of Canada.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this particular bill, there is one difference between my position as a member of Parliament and my position in private life; it seems that one is asked on many occasions to repeat things said on other occasions. This is a matter which has not been debated during this session but has been discussed for a considerable length of time. I agree with the position of the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett). In brief, this bill would set up a Crown corporation to control and govern the national parks of Canada and would take them away from ministerial responsibility.

My first point is that we have Crown corporations where it is necessary to have independent corporations. We have the Bank of Canada. However, over the years we have seen some of the problems that arise. Every member of Parliament receives complaints about the efforts of Crown corporations, such as the CBC. I am not complaining about the CBC, but after all these Crown corporations are only creatures of the law and were set up by the law. When a Crown corporation is established and is set up apart from ministerial responsibility, then it becomes the responsibility of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: What we are doing today is necessary because there has been so much trouble with the park administration. Basically, the ministers have not been running the park; this has been done by the men behind the ministers. I am glad to see the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) here—

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, in his concern that there is no ministerial responsibility under the provisions of the statute setting up Crown corporations, I wonder if the hon. member would not agree that clause 18 of the bill puts the corporation under the control of the Governor in Council or the minister?

Mr. Woolliams: That is just a red herring. And I am going to answer the hon. member right now. If he reads the Canadian Broadcasting Act he will find similar clauses, not identical, and similar responsibility.

To continue with what I was saying, Park administration is being taken from ministerial responsibility because of problems in the park. As I was saying, I want to pay a compliment to the Minister of Public Works. I am glad that he is not the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), not because he is not an able minister but because I have to attack this bill. I will say for him that even on those occasions when we have disagreed in the House or in committee on the administration of parks, he was always in the House when the matter came up. He would answer the question and take his position and that, Mr. Speaker, is something that I would like to come to grips with now.

I am very disappointed today, as were other members when this matter came before the House earlier, that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has deliberately refused to come into this chamber to answer questions and pilot his own bill. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is here. There were many things in the omnibus bill about which we disagreed. We disagreed in committee. Even this morning we disagreed on some things, but the fact is that the Minister of Justice is the kind of minister who will take his responsibility and will be in the House when there is a contentious piece of legislation to be piloted through. The same can be said about the Minister of Public Works. There have been some changes for the good. I am glad to see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) in his seat, because I think he understands the western problem of petroleum far better than his predecessors.

As a Canadian from western Canada, I find it strange that for such a long period of time the men controlling northern affairs, national parks, the grain trade, the petroleum industry, in fact all the leading industries in western Canada, were from another part of Canada and did not have knowledge or experience in those fields. It is no wonder we are now the fifth ranking nation in grain rather than the first. No wonder we have so many troubles in our parks. No wonder there is anxiety about the administration in the petroleum industry of western Canada. Our present ministers are some improvement, but I want to deal with the minister who was too busy to come into the House the last time one of his bills was before us. There was very little publicity given to that fact.

Mr. Honey: I do not know if my friend is referring to Hansard or to a statement made outside the chamber. If my friend says the minister said that, I have to accept it. I think my friend knows me well enough to know that I am modest, but my understanding is that the minister said he had confidence in his parliamentary secretary and would give him the responsibility of piloting this bill. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, that is not a point of privilege. The parliamentary secretary is not rising on a point of privilege; that is plain hog-wash. I do not intend to assign my time to the parliamentary secretary, even though he is filled with sweetness. I say there is a responsibility. The Minister of Justice also has a very able parliamentary secretary, but the responsibility of the department does not rest on the shoulders of the parliamentary secretary. It rests on the shoulders of the minister, particularly a minister who goes across this nation making statements of this kind.

I wish to quote from an article which appeared in the January 16, 1970 edition of the Calgary Herald which, on many occasions, is not an unfriendly paper to the administration. It is rather a rotten thing to have to read on the front page of a paper. The headline reads, "Chretien Tells Banff 'Like it or Leave'." I quote from the article:

> If residents of the townsite of Banff don't like living under federal administration, they can leave, Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, said Thursday.
> Mr. Chrétien said in an interview nobody is obliged to live in the park and if they don't like the situation "they can drive east or west and they won't have to live in the park."
> Residents of Banff, who have to lease their land from the government, have complained that the cost of leases has risen and, in some cases, leases have not been renewed. They are also complaining about a tax increase.
> Mr. Chrétien said they had no right to complain because they haven't invested money in the land anyway since they haven't had to buy it.

What the minister is really saying to the people of Banff and Jasper is that he is going to put this policy through no matter what happens. This is what he is saying to Mr. Jimmie Simpson who lives at Boyle Lake near Lake Louise. The Minister of Public Works knows this man. He has been there since before the turn of the century, before we ever heard of this little shrimp, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chretien).

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Woolliams: I say shame on the minister who has the nerve to tell Canadians who have been pioneers in western Canada to get out, go east or west, do anything you like, but get out; take it or leave it. I think that is the most shocking thing the minister could say anywhere, particularly when this minister is from another part of Canada. This is what he said in that part of Canada which always extends great courtesy and understanding. It is shocking to the residents of Banff and Jasper.

The parliamentary secretary rises on a question of privilege and says, oh, he has great confidence in me. I say the parliamentary secretary is merely an instrument of the minister. I feel sorry for him, since he has to be in that position. He does not mind sitting there because it is an elevation from where he was. The fact is that he is merely an instrument of the minister. This is the most shocking thing that has ever been said in western Canada.

Senator Cameron said something very important in his letters to the department.

An hon. Member: Who is he?

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody asks, who he is. He was appointed to the other place by a very distinguished Liberal Prime Minister. The words of Senator Cameron are not those of a Conservative. These words are similar to those used by the New Democratic Party which also offers constructive ideas in opposition to what is going on in the House. As a Liberal senator he said, if there were an election held tomorrow west of the Great Lakes there would not be a single Liberal elected.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): What do senators know about elections?

Mr. Woolliams: My good friend the minister asks, what do senators know about elections? That is what Senator Cameron said.

The present member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) is a Liberal. This may be a bit of a fluke. I do not say that because he is not talented. He is friendly, able and intelligent. He became the member for Rocky Mountain as the result of a mix-up in my own party. This riding is one of those monstrosities which is almost 1,000 miles long. There was a Conservative candidate in the north end of the riding and a Conservative candidate at the opposite end. There were five candidates. If the records are checked, it will be seen that the present member received 30 per cent of the vote. He stood up to this minister, however and I compliment him. He said if the minister would use a little understanding, courtesy and consideration when dealing with the Indians, Eskimos and people of the parks, if he would listen, he would get respect and create respect for the officials of his department from the people of Banff, Jasper and the other national parks of Canada. When a Liberal member makes such a statement, he must be really frustrated. It takes a lot more nerve to make such a statement than the parliamentary secretary has. He would not do it. Thing must be pretty tough when a Liberal member of parliament has to stand in his place and say that to a minister. I suppose he said it so often in caucus that he finally felt it was time to say in the House what he had been saying privately to his own party.

When the minister will not come into the House, hon. members feel they are wasting their time and they might as well sit down. How are we to exercise our responsibility as members of Parliament when this minister will not come here to listen to suggestions or criticisms of his department or his bill?

Mr. Laing: Why don't you get with it?

Mr. Woolliams: One thing is certain, the Minister of Public Works didn't get with it. As I said, he is a very fine man, but he was just moved out. With respect to the minister, I now hear a rumour that they are going to move him further. I would be the first to endorse it, but not because I think he deserves it. He has served in public life longer than most people here.

Mr. Laing: I would move you up.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: My good friends never recommended me for an appointment. Someone says they got me out of the parks. I realized that a little hanky panky went on with a very independent man. An independent redistribution commission was established and Bow River was cut into five slices. So I ran in a new riding. I could have run in one of those. I realize this is how the Grits operate. But you would not think of doing that, and I do not suggest it, Mr. Speaker.

Now, I return to the question of leases. This corporation is to be in charge of park leases, a subject of contention in the parks for a long time, particularly since 1963. We hear a lot about our beautiful committee system. Well, a special committee went out to Banff. The people there were promised a great hearing. We went to Jasper and I think we spent a week or ten days there listening to briefs. We heard from Mr. Maberley, the president of the Liberal Association out there. He got so excited about what the goverment and the administration proposed to do that he fainted while presenting his brief to the committee in Banff. One would have thought this might have left an impression.

The fact is, the committee heard evidence. And nowhere in any of the briefs presented was there any suggestion that a bill should be introduced containing the terms and conditions we find before us today. There is not the slightest indication here that any regard has been paid to the evidence given before the committee. I am happy to see the former chairman of the committee present in the chamber; he was always courteous in his relations with this committee. There was nothing in the evidence or in the briefs to suggest we ought to set up a monstrosity such as is now proposed in order that the corporation might fulfil the minister's ambition, which is: Get out; go east or west, you western Canadians; we don't need you. That is exactly what we are being told. It makes one wonder. I wonder what would have happened had the shoe been on the other foot.

As I have said before—and I want to put this in chronological order—there was land in the national parks owned fee simple, there was land held on 99-year leases, land on 42-year leases with the right to renew, and land held on other kinds of leases. The people who own hotels and motels which serve a million and a half people or more each year, serve the tourists well. People come from all over Canada, from all over the United States and, in fact, from all over the world to see places like Banff, Lake Louise and Jasper.

The leaseholders have invested money in the parks so that they can serve the tourists.

Under our system they are entitled to make a profit; that is why people are in business; when they cease to make a profit they go out of business. What happens when they get old, or want to sell their businesses for other reasons? They cannot transfer their property as they could normally do under any provincial administration. The government has said they cannot do this unless they agree to change their leases. This is the element of duress, and this is what will continue under the great new corporation which is proposed, a corporation which will be headed by another Liberal as sure as my name is what it is and as surely as the constituency I represent is called what it is. It will be a bunch of Liberal hanky panky and a Crown corporation which can get away with a lot of patronage.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I hear hon. members opposite applauding. They are looking for the call already.

What kind of leases do these people get? Here is one which they said was against public policy—it would be awful, they inferred, if we showed the people this. It was made on the 4th day of March, 1968 between Her Majesty the Queen in the right of Canada and the Mountaineer Motel Company, a small corporation behind which were three business people who had got together to build a motel on land expropriated at Lake Louise. What does the lease say? Remember, they have got these people hooked, now, for a loan with the Industrial Development Bank; moreover, they have put in at least $200,000 of their own cash. Finally, these people get an interpretation of the lease they have signed. It does not matter what the parliamentary secretary may have to say about this; the minister should be here. Read the lease, beginning at clause 16, where it says the lease shall terminate if the lessee fails to perform, observe or keep any of the covenants and agreements herein contained, or violates any of the provisions of the National Parks Act or regulations issued pursuant thereto. There is no provision for compensation in such an event. Who interprets the lease? It is the corporation which will interpret the lease. Who says that the lessee has made a mistake? It is not a court of law. It is the corporation or the minister. It is one of these authorities which will say: You have violated these laws, so you are out.

The tenant may reply: I do not intend to get out; I shall go to law. But it takes a long time to go to law when the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is involved. While the tenant is going to law his place is shut down, the interest payments on his mortgage continue, and he continues to be liable for taxes. So, whether he wins his lawsuit or not, he has lost his investment. And he has lost it as a result of hanky panky, because the Liberals or the corporation run by Liberals, are going to do things that way.

As I have just mentioned, a tenant can be thrown out on the grounds that he has broken a park regulation. When I was engaged in some litigation on behalf of leaseholders I had an opportunity to look at these regulations. Mr. Speaker, there is a whole volume full of them and they are so complicated that the words spoken by Browning about one of his poems apply to them very well—"When I wrote it, God and I knew what it meant; now, God alone knows what it means." These regulations are so lengthy and so confusing that there is not a lawyer in Canada who understands them. If you pick one and say "This means so and so", some official will pick up the book and find another regulation which states the opposite. Yet, if a tenant breaks any one of these unknown laws, his lease can be cancelled and he receives no compensation. To do this will be within the power of this great new corporation the government proposes to set up under this bill.

Mr. Nesbitt: Shame.

Mr. Woolliams: It is a shame. It is a disgrace. And what makes me sad, today, is this: I know that as I stand here speaking I am wasting my time, because this measure will be piloted through the House; it will be considered in the all-powerful Liberal committee and in the end it will be dished up with very few changes. This is what a dictatorial government intends to accomplish, and once it is done it will be extremely difficult to undo.

I have drawn attention to the kind of leases which this corporation will be handing out. Recently, the department has been advertising land in the parks and no one will take it. Do hon. members know who is coming into the picture now? Imperial Oil! Imperial Oil is an international company controlled by Standard New Jersey and the other Standard companies in the United States.

Responsible for these things is a government which began by saying it would keep foreign capital out of Canada. Today, they are handing over our national parks to big international conglomerates. Why is this happening? It is because no Canadian in his right senses would ever enter into a deal as assinine as this bill contemplates in connection with the leases to which I have referred. That is the situation. Drive out the little man, he minister says. We don't care what happens to him. I am the all-powerful dictator working within the new presidential system of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). That is what he is saying. Get out of my way. No wonder one feels sad, speaking for a riding I had the honour to represent for ten years. It was heartbreaking to attend those meetings and see the frustration on the faces of people whose civil rights had been taken away from them. What the government could not do by politics they intend to do, now, by way of legislation. No wonder the minister is ashamed. The minister is not in the House because he is ashamed to face the members this afternoon. He is ashamed of himself, and he ought to be, as a Canadian and as a man in a position of responsibility.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: I heard somebody say "encore". I realize hon. members over there do not like to hear this. Whoever interrupted should listen to the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, listen to what he is saying in caucus and in this House about this kind of dictatorship. Hon. members opposite do not care about western parks. I know they have lost our wheat markets and our petroleum markets, but what about our parks? As Senator Cameron said, you people over there will never again have representation from western Canada; at least this government will not. The situation is a disgrace, the more so since this is a part of the country which has always looked to central Canada for direction and particularly for democracy.

This situation has arisen simply because men have failed to understand. This government has said in no uncertain terms that it will have its way, that it does not care what the opposition has to say. This is the reason that Information Canada has been set up; the government wants to do away with all of Parliament's powers. Look at this place now, Mr. Speaker. It is like a lit-up cemetery, and it has been for months. Why is it that no members of the opposition come into this place? I will tell the House why they do not come in. What is the use of carrying on a debate before a government such as this which has run slip-shod over Parliament? This is how they are able to get away with this kind of legislation. I say this legislation is wrong. The principle of the bill is wrong. This legislation will lead to Liberal patronage and certainly exhibits Liberal government irresponsibility.

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Calgary North, who has just finished speaking, whether he was saying in his remarks that he did agree or that he did not agree with the policy that economic rents should be charged in the parks, as stated by a minister in the government of 1962, the present hon. member for Brandon-Souris?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would be very happy to answer that question. I examined the minister and his departmental officials with respect to this matter. At no time did the Diefenbaker government ever introduce a program of this type so far as leases are concerned. Certainly, it did not do to our parks what is being done to them now. The present policy is purely a Liberal one. The government is trying to put over the same kind of Liberal smear campaign as the Prime Minister tried to put over on the right hon. member for Prince Albert the other day with regard to the Montreal fair. When hon. members opposite know they are wrong, they accuse opposition members of being to blame. Why does not the Liberal government resign office and let the Tories take over? Then, things will get done.

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to take part in this debate and to follow the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), who was the former federal representative for a portion of Rocky Mountain riding and had the privilege of representing Banff National Park in this House for many years. I have a number of reservations about this bill and the rapid passage of the bill through the House. It is a bill that is of greatest importance to my riding. Its impact on Banff, Jasper and Waterton will be greater than on any other community in the country.

It was disappointing for me to hear the previous speaker fail to seize upon the real and crucial problems that exist in our national parks, and particularly those in Rocky Mountain riding. In the speeches that I have heard up to this point there has been an attempt to suggest that the introduction and passage of this bill through the House is strictly a political maneouvre. I suggest this is simply an evasion of the real problem.

In the national parks of Canada, and particularly in Banff, Jasper and to a lesser extent Waterton, a very serious situation has been created among those communities that are permanent. People living in those communities do not have the same democratic privileges and rights possessed by Canadians living outside our national parks. They have no local government. In addition, since the property is federal property, the local member of the provincial legislature has very little authority or jurisdiction with regard to them. As a result, virtually the only elected representatives to represent the people of the townsites and communities in our national parks are the local members of Parliament, whoever they may be at any given time.

This situation has resulted in a complete lack of communication between those governed and those governing. It is different from the situation that obtains in other communities where there is dialogue and communication between the elected municipal officials and the electors, between the provincial legislature members and the electors, and between the federal members of Parliament and the electors.

I believe the key issue here is that of communication, and that of the community accepting responsibility for its own welfare. This lack of communication is not something that has arisen within the last year and a half or even within the last 6, 7 or 10 years. It has been a characteristic of the communities of Banff and Jasper almost since their inception.

A number of studies and reports have been made about Banff and Jasper in order to determine by what method these communities should be administered. I want to emphasize the word "community", because all too often those of us who live outside our national parks, particularly outside Banff and Jasper, think these communities are populated by businessmen. This is far from the fact.

For example, Jasper is populated largely by employees of the Canadian National Railways. The first railway went through Jasper in 1911 or 1912, and ever since that time this community has been a divisional point for one of our trans-continental railways. So, it is easy to see that the largest single group populating Jasper consists of employees of the Canadian National Railways, not businessmen. I am sure we would find that those with investments in businesses in Banff and Jasper account for less than 10 per cent of the population in those towns.

We have been very slow to recognize this and we think of these communities as comprising wealthy people from Calgary, Edmonton and other cities and towns who have summer cottages in our national parks. I quite agree that it is not proper to allow the existence of summer cottages in national parks. It is quite a different thing to have people who must reside there because of their employment or occupation in order to serve the millions of Canadians and others we encourage to visit these parks. These people must reside there in order to serve the tourists, the railways, the highways, the lines of communication and the pipelines which traverse these national parks. We must recognize that these are communities similar to communities outside the national parks. Unfortunately, our predecessors in Parliament for many years have failed to recognize this. The department which has been responsible for the administration of the townsites of Banff, Jasper and Waterton have failed to recognize this fact.

The people living in these towns have been administered from Ottawa with no say in their own affairs or in the administration of their own townsites. This gulf between the administrators and the administered continues to increase year after year. There is now a greater degree of antagonism. The administrators are antagonistic toward the residents of the park. They refer to them as businessmen and cover up the facts in this way. They are not businessmen. There is a natural human reaction on the part of these people who reside in these parks.

So that it is abundantly clear I am not singling out the present minister, the previous minister, or any minister for that matter, in respect of this breakdown in communication, let me refer to a report that is commonly called the Crawford report. It was prepared for the department of northern affairs and natural resources respecting certain aspects of these national parks and the townsites therein. It has reference to Banff, Jasper and Waterton Lakes National Parks. It was prepared by Grant Crawford of the Institute of Local Government at Queen's University, Kingston. It was published in 1960. These are some of the statements in the report. At page 9 of the report the following statement is made:

> There was a frequently expressed feeling that the inhabitants should have more say in the running of the townsites.

This was the feeling expressed in 1959 and 1960, but it certainly has become more common in the last year or two, particularly in the last few months. This report was made under a previous administration. I am not attempting to blame that administration. There has been a breakdown in communications because those of us responsible in Parliament for municipal affairs and local government in these townsites failed to take an adequate interest and failed in our attempt to understand the situation. It is further stated at page 10 of this report:

It is the lack of adequate communication that calls forth such comments as the following: "The immediate problems are first of all autonomy and secondly the relationship of the town to the park superintendent"; "the local people may believe facilities are desirable but the government will not allow them such things as the drive-in theatre. There should be more local autonomy"; "everything depends on the superintendent. Appeal is only to the minister and you never get answers to letters"—

Again this was in 1959 and 1960. The report goes on to state:

—"in Radium Hot Springs they are rebuilding sewer, water and other works but local people have no say in it and they cannot find out what is happening or even what is proposed"; "no effective means of communication between residents or concessionaires and the parks administration except through the superintendent"; "there was an appeal to the minister from the decisions of the superintendent. What was needed was someone on the spot with power to decide"; "some signs can be approved locally, others must be referred to Ottawa, and a reply may take up to three weeks"; "the machinery is cumbersome and sometimes it takes years to get a decision from Ottawa"; "the superintendent may be very sympathetic but he has not good access to higher authority. The recent visit by the minister and deputy minister was the first in four years. Policy makers have no contact with local problems. They do not spend enough time in the field"; "channels for complaints are inadequate."

This is the situation as described by Professor Crawford in 1959 and 1960. I am sure this situation existed prior to 1957. It is wrong for anyone in this House today to blame this government. Let me reiterate that I am not attempting to blame any government or administration. Those of us who have been in this House have not given enough serious and sincere consideration to the fact that there are people living in Banff and Jasper who are not businessmen. We cannot deal only with land and the question of leases; we must deal with these people as people.

—if the administration is prepared to go more than half way, the irritation can be greatly reduced.

It is significant that Professor Crawford indicated it would be necessary for the administration to go more than half way in order that the irritations may be reduced. Unfortunately, in the ten years since the preparation of this report the administration has not seen fit to go anywhere near the halfway position.

I am glad to see that the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is back in the House. In any event, the result has been a completely deplorable degeneration of communication, trust and goodwill. It is going to take an extreme degree of understanding on our part to resolve this situation so that in years to come we will not have these same problems we have today in relation to national parks before us in this Parliament.

Let me give you an example of this breakdown of goodwill. A few years ago two residents of the parks brought a representative action in the Exchequer Court of Canada seeking a declaration that the perpetual leases they held were in fact intra vires and not ultra vires as the administration had stated.

Mr. Woolliams: As Art stated.

Mr. Sulatycky: Again, that is not quite correct. The hon. member for Calgary North states "As Art stated". The fact is that the Order in Council declaring the perpetual leases ultra vires was made in 1958. The two new leases were not renewed until 1962 or 1963. Nevertheless, this case went to the Exchequer Court which rendered a decision favourable to Walker and Clark, the two individuals who were the plaintiffs. Then, the Crown appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. This case was heard in late October and we are still awaiting a decision.

The story being voiced by friends and former supporters of the hon. member for Calgary North is that it is a Liberal judge who is holding up the decision, and that the court is waiting for this legislation to be passed by this House. I am sure the hon. member, who is a very eminent counsel and well known throughout Canda, would be the first one to stand and say there is no political interference and never has been with the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member and I are good friends. Nowhere on the record did I ever say that the Supreme Court of Canada was holding up anything. I never mentioned this matter. The Supreme Court of Canada is well within its jurisdiction to reserve judgment and render it when it has time. These judges have much work to do. This is a tough matter. The judges should take the time they are taking. I do not know how the hon. member could get the idea that I said this delay had anything to do with politics. The Supreme Court of Canada is far above political interference and far removed from this institution.

Mr. Laing: You have said a lot of queer things.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Sulatycky: Mr. Speaker, I apologize if my good friend—and I admit we are good friends—from Calgary North took from my remarks that I was suggesting he was making these statements. The fact is that there are people who, for political purposes, make statements and suggestions of this type which are entirely unfounded.

Mr. Woolliams: That is better.

Mr. Sulatycky: I am glad the statement of the hon. member is on the record for all the people of Banff and Jasper to see. This is the type of situation which exists. People would believe anything bad of the government. At the same time, the administrators would believe anything bad about the people of Banff and Jasper. They would believe they are all businessmen and gougers. These are not the facts any more than it is a fact that there is any political interference with the Supreme Court of Canada. I mention this because of the breakdown in communication and the complete lack of good will on both sides.

I believe it is time the people of the townsites got together with the administration to work out a new solution so that the people in the communities would be provided with the same democratic rights enjoyed by others who live outside the area of the national parks. I do not believe such a result will be achieved by this bill unless there are some very significant changes to it. It is my feeling that the townsites of Banff and Jasper should be exempted for the time being from the jurisdiction of the corporation which is to be established. I believe the corporation probably is a very necessary instrument for some of the national parks of Canada. It is probably a very nice instrument for some unpopulated sections of the Banff and Jasper National Parks and for the Waterton National Park. In any event, the head office of such a corporation should be located in Calgary or elsewhere in the province of Alberta where there is the largest volume of problems in relation to national parks. There should be some assurance that persons who are conversant with the business of the national parks would, in fact, be members of the corporation.

I believe it would be wrong to apply the operation of this corporation in a blanket fashion to all national parks because this would be a denial of the existence of the communities and people in Banff and Jasper. Banff and Jasper would simply be treated as part of a large body of land. Account would not be taken of the fact that people and communities are in existence there.

I have other reservations about this bill and the powers the corporation would have. Its powers are too wide. The corporation would be in a position to compete with free enterprise in the national parks. Such competition should not be allowed when private enterprise is already in the field. The bill should include guarantees that the corporation would be prevented from coming into competition with private enterprise in this manner. Although there are other changes which I believe must be made, I think most of all there must be a degree of good will on the part of the people in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the people of Banff and Jasper, as well as other communities in the national parks, so that a solution may be found to enable these people to have their own administration completely outside the scope of this bill.

The bill, with the modifications I have mentioned, may be perfectly acceptable to places like Terra Nova National Park, Prince Albert National Park, Wood Buffalo National Park and many others which do not include townsites and which do not have a permanent population within them; but it is not acceptable to communities such as Banff and Jasper because it denies the existence of people there and will deny to the communities the ordinary relationship enjoyed by people outside the national parks. For this reason, I believe the bill requires extreme modification. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary or the minister should take the time to go to Banff and Jasper in order to discuss this bill thoroughly with the people there before it is passed. In its present form the bill, in my opinion, will not serve the purpose of or be of value to the people of Banff and Jasper.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to say it is a privilege to have a national park within the constituency I represent and to point out to you, sir, that it is five o'clock. I will discuss other aspects of the park at eight o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTERS OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment which are as follows: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson)—Post Office—policy respecting closure of low-income branches; the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson)—National Revenue—refund of sales tax on grain storage equipment; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Air Transport—CTC decision respecting prairie service.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely Public Bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT RESPECTING TIRE SAFETY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved that Bill C-23, to amend the Criminal Code (Tire Safety), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill was one of a number of bills dealing with traffic safety, the subject matter of which was referred some years ago to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. I feel that this bill, like the others, contributed something to the formulation of the legislation which received second reading in the House recently. I have reference to the bill in respect of safety standards for automobiles brought forward by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson). Consequently, I do not consider it is necessary to take up the time of the House at this stage by further debate. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would ask, with the consent of the House, that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The debate on Bill C-23 is adjourned.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT

AMENDMENT CONCERNING COLOUR TELEVISION SETS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved that Bill C-24, to amend the Hazardous Products Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I hope the applause is indicative of some approval of this bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It indicates approval of the hon. member.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the principle of this bill has already been accepted by the government. As recorded at page 2966 of Hansard for January 29, I directed a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). I asked whether the government had given consideration to having colour television sets defined under the Hazardous Products Act. The minister answered in the affirmative and went on to qualify his answer by saying that the danger from radiation emanating from colour television sets is being considered for inclusion in the Hazardous Products Act on the recommendation of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro). So, the government accepts the principle of the bill. Therefore, my bill will serve as a vehicle to get this subject before the appropriate standing committee where we will have an opportunity to examine all the aspects of coloured television, not only the radiation effects and the dangers there would be for our people, especially our children, but also a new element that has been brought to light, that is the explosive nature of certain brands of coloured television sets. I hope the House will agree to the second reading of my bill which, as I said, will serve as a useful vehicle to place this subject before the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I would like to make a few comments on Bill C-24. First, I would like to draw to the attention of the House that the Department of National Health and Welfare has done a lot of studies so far as radiation hazards from coloured television sets are concerned. The department has carried on detailed investigations on the problem of radiation from coloured television sets in the past two or three years, and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has issued public statements from time to time which gave a clear picture of the investigations as they unfolded. I believe it would be highly appropriate to review this work today before considering in more detail Bill C-24 which we have before us now.

In my opinion, it would be unfortunate if the House were to assume that the appropriate departments were not giving this problem careful attention. The record, as I propose to demonstrate, shows that the Department of National Health and Welfare, and perhaps other departments as well, have studied this problem closely. This is a highly technical matter in some respects, and in my remarks this afternoon I would like to follow through, step by step, the history of this problem as revealed in the public statements made by the ministers of national health and welfare and in related documents.

We must surely examine these facts very carefully before proceeding to evaluate the merits of the proposal contained in Bill C-24. I say this because the problem of control of radiation from colour television sets, when looked at in depth, is far from being as simple a matter as some members might think on first reading the text of the proposed bill.

The first reference document that I have before me is a news release by the Department of National Health and Welfare dated 10 January 1968, in which the then minister of the department, the hon. Allan J. MacEachen, referred to a study made by the radiation protection division of the department. Apparently, the study he referred to was stimulated by a report emanating from the United States which indicated that certain specific models of colour television receivers had been found to emit excessive amounts of ionizing radiation. The department's study confirmed that these excessive amounts did, in fact, occur in the models mentioned. The problem was limited to large screen models built with a certain chassis, and only those imported from the United States between September 1, 1966 and May 31, 1967 were affected. In these models, high radiation levels were observed adjacent to the shunt-regulator tube, one of the electronic tubes in the chassis, not the picture tube. The levels were significantly higher than the maximum of 0.5 milliroentgens per hour recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. Incidentally, I should point out that the standard of 0.5 milliroentgens per hour referred to in the statement is apparently the same as the standard suggested in Bill C-24.

In releasing that statement over two years ago, the then minister of national health and welfare emphasized certain significant facts. First of all, the statement makes clear that in carrying out its investigations the department had had the full co-operation of the manufacturer of the faulty television sets. This company was apparently doing everything in its power to track down the particular sets involved and to replace the defective tube with one of a safer design, thus bringing the radiation level within the accepted limit. I note that at the date of the news release, this company had modified, in the manner I indicated a moment ago, a total of 3,267 sets. Of all the sets recorded to have come into Canada, only 14 remained uncorrected. There was apparently some difficulty in tracking the last few down, but the report indicated that the department expected that this residual number would be dealt with shortly. Since all this took place over two years ago, I can only assume that this has long since been accomplished.

The second point which was emphasized by the minister of national health and welfare in the same news statement was that his department was checking into the possibility of similar radiation hazards in television sets of other manufacture. Reference was made to correspondence with 14 Canadian manufacturers regarding the nature of the shunt-regulator tube used in their models. At the time of the release, no evidence of any problem similar to the orginal one mentioned a moment ago had been identified, although it is clear in reading the statement that the investigation was continuing.

The general conclusion at this stage of the investigation by the department was that owners of colour television receivers need have little cause for concern about exposure to ionizing radiation. Further, the caution exercised by the television industry in relation to the risks involved seemed to the department to be reasonable and sufficient. There was, however, one note of concern in the statement. While it mentioned that the industry generally was aware of the problem, and most companies were carrying out some form of radiation testing, none appeared to be making detailed tests on shunt-regulator tubes at that time.

The second published statement I have is dated April 10, 1969 and was also a news release from the Department of National Health and Welfare. It quotes the present minister of that department. The minister made the statement in response to inquiries generated by newspaper reports concerning a U.S. survey which had been taken in New York state. This survey had indicated that potentially dangerous radiation had been emitted above the recommended level of 0.5 milliroentgens per hour.

Apparently this report came as a surprise to the department. The minister said that since 1967, when the incident to which I referred a moment ago occurred, the radiation protection division of the department had been checking radiation levels of new model television receivers as these new models were introduced. They had checked 61 different models of 17 different companies. The tests had ensured that the sets, as marketed, did not emit radiation in excess of the standard level. As I understand it, only one set of each model was actually tested, the purpose of the test being to assure that the design of the set and its components was such as to eliminate the radiation emission. It was assumed that all sets of this model would behave the same in this respect.

The statement I am still referring to, the news release of April 10, 1969, then goes on to hint at a possible explanation for the high radiation levels found in the U.S. survey report. It noted that it had been found that sometimes sets which had been modified, subsequent to sale to the customer, could be potentially dangerous. This was because modifications involving an increase in the voltage applied to certain components could give rise to an increased level of radiation. The department recommended that such increases in the high-voltage settings should not be made, and although it believed that the associated radiation fields would be hazardous only over long periods of exposure, it stated that it was extending its testing program to ensure that, while in the past the department had been concerned with the safety of sets going on to the market, it now realized that servicing modifications or repairs might be made to the sets after purchase, and that the effect of these operations had to be investigated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, at the end of this news release is a statement of particular significance in relation to the bill which is before us at the present time, and with your permission I will quote two or three sentences:

> It is recognized that there is an increasing use of products capable of emitting potentially hazardous radiation. These include, besides t.v. sets, X-ray equipment, microwave generators and lasers. The minister added that his department is therefore seeking suitable regulatory powers to establish minimum safety standards for such equipment sold in Canada.

I believe that the sequel to that stated intention is the Radiation Emitting Devices Bill which has recently received second reading in the Senate. It would appear that, even at that time, the department was prudently preparing to establish safety regulations for colour t.v. sets if it should become necessary—although at that stage of the investigation, at any rate, there was no clear indication that they would be necessary.

Two weeks later, on April 24, 1969, the Minister of National Health and Welfare announced plans for a national sampling survey of colour t.v. sets in people's homes. This announcement also was in the form of a news release. The minister referred again to reports from the United States which indicated that some sets in use in people's homes emitted above the standard level. Set owners in Canada were invited to participate in a survey to be carried out by the Radiation Protection Division of the department. They would be supplied with a radiographic film pack which they were to attach to the outside of their sets and return it to the division after 20 hours of viewing time. The survey would be conducted according to a statistical pattern to provide sampling of a wide range of makes and models. The survey would be carried out by mail—the necessary material and instructions to do the test exposure would be sent to the participant.

This survey was in fact carried out. I understand that over 2,000 citizens wrote to the department and offered to participate in the survey. Of these, 400 were chosen by the department to carry out the radiation testing. On August 6, 1969, the minister released a report on the results of the tests on the 400 sets. The results are given in the form of a table appended to the news release. The 400 sets were analysed in four categories, with about 100 sets in each category. The categories related to the year in which the set was purchased, 1969, 1968, 1967, and 1966 or earlier. About 20 per cent of sets purchased in 1966 or earlier emitted radiation which, in some degree, exceeded the standard of 0.5 milliroentgen per hour recommended by the International Commission on Radiological Protection. The proportion fell to 14 per cent in 1967 models, 8 per cent in 1968 and 4 per cent in 1969. In most of the cases where emission was above the standard, it was only slightly above the accepted standard. Examination of the table of results does reveal, however, that at least three of the 400 sets emitted at rates of more than ten times the standard.

In presenting these results, the minister emphasized that the study had been of an exploratory nature only and that these results had not been followed up in detail. The department was not able to state whether or not the higher levels occurred only in certain specific models. It could not say whether the excessive emissions were due to occasional failures in quality control during manufacture, to regional variations in line voltage, to alterations made by repairmen or to a combination of such factors.

In discussing the results, the report stated that the health hazard, even where radiation emission was above the standard, was considered by the department to be exceedingly small. The standard carried such a high safety margin that, unless it were exceeded by a substantial amount, any health risk would be quite insignificant. It pointed out that the radiation emission was observed only at the point of closest approach to the electronic tubes, at the side, back or bottom of the set, not in the normal viewing position. Thus, the exposure of the viewer could be considered negligible if a normal viewing distance, preferably four feet or more, were maintained. The report then goes on to give a warning that prolonged proximity to the side or back of a set should be avoided as much as possible.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I have before me a news release of the Department of National Health and Welfare dated September 4, 1969, and titled "Safety Rules for Colour TV Users." In this statement the minister gave further information relating to the studies made by his department on colour T.V. hazards. He referred to the survey that had been carried out and noted that about 10 per cent of the sets tested had been found to emit radiation somewhat in excess of the accepted manufacturing standard. Examples of such sets had been found among all popular makes, the largest number being among the models purchased before 1967. The causes were complex and attributed partly to component design and partly to servicing.

The minister repeated that, in the opinion of his department, these radiation-emitting sets were not a significant health hazard if given the usual degree of respect accorded many other household appliances. The radiation was observed only at the back, bottom or sides of the sets, not in the normal viewing position and this, coupled with the very large safety margin inherent in the accepted standard, made the health hazard extremely small.

The news release then proceeded to give simple rules which would ensure safety even in cases where radiation emission was somewhat in excess of the accepted manufacturing standard. One of these rules is to consult your authorized repairman rather than attempting to do your own servicing. Another is to ask the repairman, on his next servicing call, to check the voltage regulating circuits and radiation shielding as specified by the manufacturer. Another rule is to cultivate good viewing habits—to not regularly sit closer than four feet from the set or to allow children to lie with legs extended beneath the set while viewing. And lastly, to place all colour television sets against a wall and not to locate chairs immediately adjacent to the side or back.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary, but I am afraid his time has expired. The hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather).

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. parliamentary secretary would permit a question with the consent of the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If there is consent, with the agreement of the Parliamentary Secretary.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, since it is apparent that the government approves the principle of my bill, as the parliamentary secretary was speaking for the government, may I ask why the government is not prepared to refer this bill to the Standing Committee where the subject can be thoroughly discussed?

Mr. Haidasz: Mr. Speaker, I was given to understand by some of my colleagues on this side of the House that they would like to make some remarks this afternoon on Bill C-24.

Mr. Bell: With an answer like that, he should be in the cabinet.

Mr. Greene: He is coming; he is nearly ready.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Surrey.

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak very briefly on this proposed measure, Bill C-24. I should like to see it passed by the House and referred to the Standing Committee. I take this position because I am one of a number of members interested in possible colour television fires, and the number of fatalities arising from them. I first became interested in 1968 after reading statistics concerning explosions in colour Television sets in the United States. I took it upon myself to raise the matter in questions in the House, and in correspondence with the Department of National Health and Welfare, asking that a check be made into the situation. I also corresponded with people whom I considered to be very knowledgeable on the subject. Some months ago, the Department of National Health and Welfare decided to take a second look at the relationship between coloured television sets and fires, and fatalities caused by such fires.

While my interest in the subject is a little different from that of the mover of the bill, I think there is a common denominator. Here, we are dealing with colour television operation, fires and other hazards that may result from same, which is a new and unsolved problem. While the department is taking a second look at the fires caused by the small percentage of sets involved, I think the endorsation of Bill C-24 and its reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs would be a practical and complementary step to take.

Without further discussion on my part, Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will see fit to refer this bill to the committee.

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak to this bill which relates to a matter of considerable importance and one which has been of increasing concern to the general public. It has also occupied the attention of television manufacturers and the various health authorities over a considerable period of time. The fact that I have one of the large national and international manufacturers in my riding explains my particular interest.

Any matter which affects or could potentially affect the health of Canadian citizens is certainly worthy of discussion in this chamber. I should like to congratulate the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for introducing this bill.

Mr. McGrath: You could do a lot better by letting it go to the committee.

Mr. Hymmen: We have heard from the parliamentary secretary who has indicated the action taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare in the investigation of possible hazards from colour television sets. Perhaps I could go a little further into the question and try to evaluate the situation in the light of the information we have, and to relate it to the proposal put forward in the bill we are considering. To do this in a systematic way, I will address myself to three basic questions that come to mind and which must be answered before we can assess the merits of the bill.

The first and most fundamental question is: Is it true that colour television sets present a health hazard? The second question is: If so, what is the real nature of the hazard? And finally: If there is a health hazard, is the procedure suggested in the bill the most appropriate way of controlling the problem? I will deal with each of these matters separately, in turn.

Now, with respect to the first question, Mr. Speaker, are colour television sets dangerous? Everyone will be aware that there have been from time to time some very frightening accounts in the public press and in the news media. In some cases there may have been an element of deliberate sensationalism involved in these accounts, but in the main they were clearly attempts by responsible members of the news media to give a simplified account of what is, in fact, a highly technical problem—namely, the effects produced by radiation on the human body. The emphasis in these accounts was on the possibility of an increase in the incidence of leukemia and cancer and an increase in the number of births of deformed children. These are, of course, the known effects of excessive exposure to x-rays. I am sure that it was with these dire effects in mind that the bill we have before us was introduced by the hon. member for St. John's East.

There is no doubt that stories such as these have aroused a large measure of concern among all sectors of the public. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I was interested in reading in a popular publication the TV Guide, issue of 13-19 December, 1969, a feature article which purports to reveal "the facts behind the frightening headlines". Many members of this House may have read this article also. My copy came from the cash counter of a local supermarket and, being on display there, the publication undoubtedly has wide circulation. The article tries, in a sense, to debunk the idea that colour television is dangerous. The author, Mr. David Lachenbruch, has quoted statements made by many reputable scientists and public health officials in the United States. He has marshalled these statements in such a way as to support the proposition that there is almost no risk whatsoever.

For example, Mr. Speaker, the article reports that Dr. Lauriston-Taylor, president of the National Commission on Radiological Protection—that is the United States national commission—told a congressional committee that exposure as much as two million times the half-milliroentgen standard for television sets would not even produce skin irritation if applied to a small area of the body, and that in 30 years there had not been a single case of identifiable injury to an individual by low-level x-rays of the kind emitted by defective television sets.

It also reported that Professor Hanson Blatz, the radiation control director for New York city, told a congressman that viewing a set which radiated 24 times as much as the international standard for five hours a day at 2½ feet from the screen would expose the viewer to no more radiation than a resident of Denver normally gets with no television viewing at all. He concludes that the probability of detectable medical effects from x-rays emitted by faulty colour receivers is vanishingly small.

The article goes on to quote Dr. Victor P. Bond, associate director of Brookhaven National Laboratory, to the effect that even if the standard were exceeded 10 to 20 times, the doses and dose rates would still be very low, and that no medical effects have ever been demonstrated at such levels. It also refers to statements made by the greater New York chapter of the Health Physics Society. This society is said to have regarded the half-milliroentgen limit as having no relationship to the probability of injury to individuals; that there is no evidence to suggest that injury to individuals is likely even for chronic exposure at many times this intensity.

There are other categorical statements in the article, Mr. Speaker, that are not attributed to any named source. For example, there is the statement that a set emitting the maximum amount of radiation, that is, the half-milliroentgen or half-millirem limit, would expose the viewer to less than 5 per cent of the average amount of normal background radiation; and in a similar context, the statement that most luminous dial watches give off twice as much radiation as does a television set emitting at the maximum limit recommended by the National Commission on Radiological Protection.

These opinions, taken together, would seem to indicate that there is really no problem at all to be concerned with. I do not wish to suggest that the article gives a completely one-sided view of the question, but that is certainly the main theme that emerges. In fact, in summing up the discussion the author quotes the opinion of John C. Villforth, director of the Bureau of Radiological Health, Department of Health, Education and Welfare in the United States. His position on the subject was apparently given at an annual meeting of the American Public Health Association and would seem to be quite categorical. The quoted remark is: "There is no danger in colour T.V. I am confident. If you are at all apprehensive, seek the advice of your serviceman."

On the surface, this would appear to completely dispose of the concern that has been expressed elsewhere and which has led to the introduction of the bill we are considering. However, let us now compare this conclusion with the statements made by the Department of National Health and Welfare which were referred to earlier in this debate. The position of the department, as expressed by the minister in a news release, is that the health hazard of colour television sets is extremely small and that it can be considered negligible if viewing is conducted in normal viewing position. So far so good. However, the news release goes on to modify this assurance by adding that it is undesirable to remain in prolonged close proximity to the side or back of a set while it is operating. This then is where the real concern lies.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we were to go back to Mr. Lachenbruch's article in the TV Guide, and examine the statements somewhat more critically, we would find that there is really no discrepancy between the opinions of the eminent United States authorities it quotes and those of the Department of National Health and Welfare. It will be clear on careful reading of the statements of the United States authorities that they were referring to normal viewing conditions, a few feet in front of the set. Our Department of National Health and Welfare says that if such distances are maintained, the risk to health is extremely small, even if the set emits at a rate somewhat in excess of the standard. So there is agreement on this point.

However, our health department goes on to warn that prolonged proximity to the back or sides of a set is undesirable in view of the fact that emission rates in excess of the standard do occur for various reasons. This is likewise the opinion of some U.S. experts quoted in the article to which I referred. For example, Dr. Karl Z. Morgan, director of the Health Physics Division of the Oak Ridge National Laboratory is reported to endorse the watch-at-a-distance advice, noting particularly that "many children lie on the floor with their feet immediately under the colour television sets and with their faces almost glued to the screen for many hours of viewing". Furthermore, the U.S. Surgeon General has issued viewing rules for colour set owners that are essentially identical to the rules given by our Department of National Health and Welfare in one of its news releases, and these rules emphasize the desirability of maintaining a reasonable distance in front of the set when it is operating.

There is another point in the reassuring statements quoted by Mr. Lachenbruch that needs comment. Much is made of the fact that no identifiable injury has ever been reported and that no medical effects have been demonstrated. I am informed that these statements are literally true, but that the key words are "identifiable" and "demonstrated". Our Department of National Health and Welfare has repeatedly said that radiation effects are of a statistical nature, so that it is enormously difficult or impossible to demonstrate a direct connection between low-level radiation exposures and the occurrence of disease in a particular individual, even though connection has been demonstrated, somewhat indirectly if you like, and in two other ways: by research on animals, by extrapolation of the effects observed in human populations at high levels of exposure.

I think it is clear from what I have been saying, Mr. Speaker, that the hazard, although small, cannot be completely discounted. However, it is equally clear that the hazard exists only if there is prolonged proximity to the side or back of the set, not if it is simply viewed in the normal viewing position. One could argue that there is, thus, no hazard if the set is used in the manner intended, or reasonably anticipated, by the manufacturer; and one could well ask whether such a hazard should be subject to control by the government. Mr. Speaker, many things in the home are dangerous if not used with a certain degree of respect. A carving knife is a dangerous instrument, and there is some risk associated with almost all electrical appliances.

However, I think there is a distinct difference in the case we are considering. I will give two reasons for this: first, the fact that the hazard is from radiation makes it especially insidious. Radiation cannot be detected by any human sense and this is the reason we find it so frightening. It can be detected only by an expert armed with proper equipment. The second point I would call attention to is that television is becoming a focal point of family life. We and our children live in intimate association with our television sets for many hours each day. Therefore, even if the risk is exceedingly small, we must be sure that it has been reduced to the very lowest level that is technically feasible.

In fact, we may say that a television set that emits radiation is contributing to pollution of the environment—the home environment. Mr. Lachenbruch, in the article I referred to earlier, makes this point. He says that environmental scientists feel that non-useful radiation should be blocked and not permitted to add to the background level. We know that already there exists a substantial radiation background from such things as radioactive fall-out, cosmic rays, luminous dials, etc. Environmental scientists want to hold this background radiation to a minimum because of its collective potential to civilization as a whole.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I am reminded that it is the environmental scientists in the Department of National Health and Welfare who have had most to do with the studies mentioned earlier in this debate. There is an environmental health directorate in the department which deals with pollution of various kinds, including radiation pollution. Like scientists all over the world, they are concerned with increases in the radiation background, especially that produced by the increased use of technical devices in our modern technological society. People in this modern day absorb considerably more radiation from various sources than did their forefathers. This is a worrisome development. Each new technological advance, if it involves a radiation device, contributes to the increase in the radiation pollution of the environment. Inevitably, this will lead at some point to the necessity for governmental regulation and control.

It is on these very general grounds that I could perhaps support the idea of control regulations for colour television sets, if necessary and feasible. This leads me to the final question of the three that I asked at the beginning. If we grant that some form of government regulation is necessary, is the present bill the most appropriate way of dealing with the problem? Let us look at this carefully.

What is proposed in the bill is an amendment to the Hazardous Products Act which would prevent the sale of television sets which emit radiation above the standard. A regulation of this kind may be effective in achieving the desired objective, or it may not. It would seem, according to the Lachenbruch article and the health department's news release, that most of the sets found to emit over the standard did so as a result of changes introduced during servicing operations. In both the United States and Canada sample, sets tested before sale checked out all right. It was only in sets examined after a period of use, when they had presumably received servicing to replace worn-out tubes, that excessive emission was noted.

It is true there were new sets which emitted over the standard back in 1967, but this was due to defective tubes in certain models. Since then the manufacturers have made many improvements and are checking their products more closely. The result is that there is now no indication whatsoever that any of the new sets placed on the market emit over the standard. This is not to say they will not do so later if they are improperly serviced, but my point is that the proposal in the bill would not prevent that kind of mishap in any even.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, according to Mr. Lachenbruch's article, manufacturers are making even further improvements which are designed to make servicing foolproof during the entire life of a set. They are doing this by introducing fail-safe electronic systems which are being gradually phased into production. Many manufacturers are doing away with the tubes which can cause radiation, replacing them with new types of solid-state components which cannot radiate. Others have improved shielding around critical circuits. Even the glass in picture tubes is being reformulated to provide greater resistance to x-rays. The question arises as to whether it is desirable to introduce government regulation while such developments are in progress.

If the proposed regulation were made, how would it be enforced? New designs appear to check out all right on randomly-selected samples. The difficulty lies in the possibility of failure in quality control which would result in some sets going onto the market with emission rates higher than the general run. It is not clear how the proposed regulation would prevent this kind of mishap or even bring it to light. Much would depend on the way the regulation was implemented. Then again, the technical specifications which would constitute the standard need consideration. I understand that in the United States, where similar regulatory action has been proposed, the proposed regulation is lengthy, complicated and highly technical.

I think the whole question needs a close examination by technical experts. A regulation that is not technically sound and based on the latest knowledge of the situation might do more harm than good and would perhaps lead to unproductive effort on the part of both the manufacturers and the regulatory authorities while doing no service to the public. As I understand it, the Department of National Health and Welfare is in close contact with the problem in all its technical aspects and has been so from the beginning. The minister can be expected to take whatever action is most advisable in full knowledge of all the circumstances.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to congratulate the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath—

Mr. McGrath: I am touched, Mr. Speaker; deeply moved.

Mr. Francis: —for introducing a subject which is very appropriate for discussion in this House, especially during this hour. One of the purposes of private members' hour—

Mr. McGrath: —is certainly not to pass legislation!

Mr. Francis: —is to call the attention of the public to matters which in the opinion of hon. members are worthy of public debate and should be considered as a possible basis for legislative action. The hon. member has called attention to the hazards presented by colour television sets. I understand a bill has been introduced in the other place, Bill S-14, which is broader in scope and which would probably include the question under discussion. I regret that the mover of this motion did not take the opportunity to tell us more about the reasons which impelled him to put this measure before us.

As I say, we have an opportunity in the Parliament of Canada, particularly at this hour, to call for public debate. Public debate is the basis for the formation of public opinion, the basis upon which measures might ultimately become the policy of the government. In debates such as these, ideas are put forward and tested, and the logic which hon. members contribute in the course of their deliberations is put to rigorous examination.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather), the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) and the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Hymmen). The hon. member for Surrey, like the hon. member who moved this motion, intervened only briefly in the debate. It is clear that this is a matter which calls for careful consideration. There have been reports in the press of potential radiation hazards, as well as of a potential fire hazard, as the hon. member for Surrey pointed out. The hon. member for Kitchener made some useful comments, calling attention to the fact that investigation into this problem did not simply mean an examination of the technical features of radiation; it is broader than that.

Colour television has come to be an essential part of Canadian family life in large areas of this country. My family acquired a colour television set last year and I was astonished at the nature of the response of members of the family to it. As Professor Scanlon of Carleton University stated, colour television leaves a different impression qualitatively. Family reaction to advertising, for example, is significantly different in a sociological sense; the impression left on young minds is deeper and more lasting. We cannot ignore the fact that we are dealing with something which is very much entrenched our way of living.

As the hon. member for Kitchener stated, it is doubtful whether the correct way of dealing with this difficulty is to pay attention simply to the standard of the product as it leaves the factory. Effective supervision would seem to call not only for technical supervision of manufacturing operations but for inspection on delivery, installation and the work of service and repair, as well as periodic testing to make sure there is no deterioration of components likely to result in hazard while in use. Not least, there is need for a program of public education to train viewers in good television habits. The set should probably be placed against the wall. There should be a minimum distance between viewer and set. As has been pointed out, children are sometimes accustomed to lying around with their feet underneath the set in an area where, if there is a radiation hazard, the hazard would be at its maximum. Careful viewing habits, careful servicing habits and a major public education program: these are the measures that have to be considered in addition merely to limiting, as proposed by the hon. member.

I am confident that we have not heard the end of this kind of proposal, which is a very serious one indeed and well worthy of debate. I am confident, too, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) is as acutely aware of the problem as any member of this House. I have before me a series of press releases dealing with colour television, the latest in December of last year. They relate to reports on the hazards of colour television sets and to investigations that have been conducted, as described by the hon. member for Parkdale, with the co-operation of some 400 families, who assisted in making a survey of viewing habits and the performance of television sets in a number of Canadian homes.

It is clear that there has been a marked improvement in the quality of sets that are now being produced by the manufacturers. Year by year the number of defective sets in the sense of those that emit radiation has been reduced. It is quite clear that there is a substantial measure of voluntary compliance by the industry, as the hon. member for Kitchener pointed out. Much still remains to be done.

Again I wish to commend the hon. member for introducing this measure. I hope that when the matter comes before the House again he will give us the benefit, in a more extended way, of his views as well as a recital of the events that motivated him to bring the measure before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for introducing a bill. Personally, I was hearing him for the first time speak of a question that has nothing to do with fisheries.

I know that he is a good speaker and that his arguments are quite striking. I am surprised to see that he did not take advantage of the twenty minutes at his disposal to explain the benefits embodied in his bill with all the vigour and conviction that he usually demonstrates.

Evidently, houses in Canada as well as in other countries are very dangerous places. There we are surrounded with objects that sometimes present quite serious hazards. A great many electrical appliances are found in the home. Everybody knows that an iron or a kettle can inflict burns that can be fatal. Electric knives carelessly used can cause very serious injuries. In fact, nearly every item in our houses, especially electrical appliances, presents some hazard.

I congratulate the member for St. John's East for urging all Canadians to be careful at home. Many accidents could be avoided and people should be advised about prevention.

I am particularly concerned about accidents which can happen to the young and cripple them.

[English]

I should like to say a few words in English, Mr. Speaker, to demonstrate to my hon. friend from Newfoundland that even though I am not a master of Shakespeare's language, I can say a few words in his mother tongue.

Mr. McGrath: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, my mother tongue happens to be the Irish language.

Mr. Langlois: Then I will join him after six o'clock, if he does not mind, for a drink of Irish whiskey.

The Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is naturally concerned about such problems. Its concern is not only with the welfare of the consumer in the marketplace but with his physical safety. One of the important elements in the consumer program is the Hazardous Products Act. The bill was introduced—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but it is six o'clock. The sitting is suspended until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION, ACQUISITION, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-152, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I recognize the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This applause is a deeply moving expression of the sympathy that hon. members feel, on an Ottawa winter night, for the problems of our national parks, one of which is in the constituency of Fundy-Royal. It is time I made a constituency speech.

Mr. Woolliams: The Liberals are all huddled together.

Mr. Olson: They stick together. That is something you haven't learned yet.

Mr. Fairweather: Fundy National Park lies in the corner of Albert county in New Brunswick, 50 miles west of the city of Moncton. It skirts the Bay of Fundy for a distance of about eight miles and extends inland for more than nine miles, containing an area of about 80 square miles. In the concept of the great western national parks, this is small potatoes. In fact, I understand that Fundy National Park is the second smallest in area of any of our national parks.

The park itself is typical of the bold, irregular shore line along the Bay of Fundy which features steep, perpendicular, sandstone cliffs indented by many coves and inlets which have cut deep gulleys through the landscape. The park was visited last year by about 700,000 people, which is an infinitesimal decline from the high of 1968. The surrounding country is historic in the sense that it has provided a Prime Minister of Canada, a rebellious Tory known as Richard Bedford Bennett, and a renegade Tory known as

W. A. C. Bennett who is the Prime Minister, or Premier, of British Columbia. It is also the home of a great number of citizens who see in the park an opportunity to play host to visitors from the North American continent.

Within a thousand miles of Fundy Park are 35 million people, Canadians and Americans. It is my considered opinion that medical prescriptions in the years ahead will not be so much for drugs and other antidotes, or things of that type, but rather that medical men will prescribe a period of time to be spent in one of the national parks of this country. This is a heritage that we parliamentarians are trustees of and have an obligation to uphold at every opportunity.

I am a little troubled because of a difficulty in Fundy Park which I think has no ready solution. The park this year and last year has been subject to the most severe epidemic of the spruce budworm known in recent history, in any event, in our part of New Brunswick. Here is the interesting phenomenon of nobody being quite right, because we have a very good and loyal servant of Her Majesty in the parks service anxious to have the budworm manifestation stemmed by a spray; we have an equally thoughtful servant of the Crown anxious to preserve marine and other life; there is no ready solution to absolute positions here, and very serious choices have to be made. One of the officials in the parks service has advised that unless something is done to stem the budworm, the park will not be a national park; rather, it will be a national pasture.

I do not pretend to have the expertise to know how one reaches a solution to these widely divergent problems. I think that when and if the bill, with the amendments that have been suggested rather forcibly during the course of this debate, is passed, it will mean that the planned development of Fundy National Park can go ahead. When I visited it last summer the superintendent told me that on a good many nights during the season the camping facilities were overextended by about 25 per cent. This is an indication that there should be a great deal more development in this particular park.

I hope, also, that an examination will be made of the use of our parks, particularly in eastern, maritime or Atlantic Canada, for winter sports because it is almost impossible, or at least it is very difficult, to have any development in the private sector when the season is so pitifully short. When consideration is being given to an extension to Fundy National Park I hope the planners within the department will seriously consider extending the park boundaries westward toward the village of St. Martin's and include a much hoped for Fundy vacation trail. Such a trail, in its early stages, might be developed as a hiking trail and later, when inflation and other problems are licked, be developed into a scenic highway.

New Brunswick is fortunate in having the expectation of a second park. There is one park with a rather awkward but eloquent name. It is an Indian name, Kouchibouguac. This park is situated on the western side of Northumberland Strait, where advantage is taken of the much warmer salt water. There is also very interesting topography there in the eastern Acadian part of the province. When this development becomes a part of our parks system, I hope it will not mean that Fundy National Park will be in any way starved for development funds.

During the course of the debate I have been interested in some of the problems I have heard, particularly concerning the permanent residents of our parks system. If I might make sort of a buckshee suggestion, it would seem to me one of the main problems facing the residents of Banff and Jasper is a pretty fundamental one of the lack of au onomy over their own affairs. This is 1970, and the concept of autonomy in political participation by citizens who pay taxes has been rather well established through the century. I do not think it should be necessary for anyone to defend this principle in the House of Commons of Canada in the early months of 1970. So I would hope the department would resolve this problem quickly and give the residents who are affected the fullest autonomy over their affairs. In this way many of the difficulties, surely, would be ameliorated.

The major concept of the national parks system continues despite flak and despite difficulty in enunciating a sensible system of autonomy. This will come, and perhaps it will come as a result of amendments to this bill. If I might use a cliché, we must make no mistake about it; we need not curtail in any way the availability of the parks system to the citizens of this country. I hope an early announcement will be made about national parks for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories where there are priceless assets. One might almost describe these assets as being fundamental to our Canadian ethic. I hope these assets are preserved and kept for the nation, a nation whose population it has been predicted will increase greatly before the end of this century.

I plead for flexibility in our parks system. It is rather awkward to even suggest this, but I plead for a measure of autonomy for the permanent residents of our parks. I plead, also, for the preservation of a large part of our nation for the use of our citizens. It may be that we are rapidly reaching the point of no return in this regard. I hope we will move ahead in acquiring the necessary land. After all, we are the trustees of this land.

Goodness knows, there is ample evidence in the United States about the urgent need for a large playground. We are reaching a time when because of technological advances man will work fewer hours a week. Some people, believe it or not, will have no work at all to do. This is pretty difficult for the puritan ethic to digest, but it will be the case. Therefore, it becomes increasingly important that the government and the state provide an outlet for the energies, abilities and recreational needs of our citizens.

It is difficult to establish this point in a debate of this type, but I think the wild country, the natural country, is an important factor in maintaining a balanced and civilized humanity. I hope there will be amendments to this bill and that we will not turn our backs on what has been done in this field by a very great number of civilized Canadians in earlier times.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I would suggest that the principle enshrined in it makes it a very bad and undesirable piece of legislation. I believe the principle should be established that the minister and his department should be directly responsible to the public whom they serve.

This bill is simply a device to enable the government to avoid answering for its actions. It is a buffer between the real park proprietors and those members of the public affected by the policies they lay down. The new Crown corporation will not be a free agent; it will be a creature of the cabinet. Yet the minister concerned will always be able to wiggle out of answering legitimate questions in the House by claiming he cannot interfere in the affairs of an autonomous agency established by Parliament. It will be yet another page in the frustrating story so well illustrated by the CBC, the National Film Board and the like.

[Mr. Fairweather.]

The question of national parks in Canada is preponderantly one of concern to the people of western Canada because that is where all the park land to speak of is situated. As recently as two years ago, 86 per cent of all national parkland was in the west. Yet the control of that land lies in central Canada. Policy is established here in Ottawa and administered by officials, many of whom know a national park only as an area on the map. This is a flagrant example of absentee landlordism at its worst. It is comparable to what happened in Eire in the last century.

The federal government controls this land entirely, yet it does not want the bother of looking after maintenance and collecting rents. The government has done what the worst absentee landlords have always done throughout history—named an agent to do the dirty work and stand as a buffer between its comfortable existence and the irate tenants.

I have a letter from a resident of Lake Louise who charges that the director of parks has spent only a few days in the west, but he will have considerable say in the affairs of people who are directly dependent upon the good operation of the park areas for their living. This letter was sent by Mr. Jack McDowall of Lake Louise to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

With more than three-quarters of the national parkland in the west, and the dictatorial control of its destiny held firmly in Ottawa, is it any wonder that westerners are sceptical of the treatment they and their parkland will receive? Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that westerners are more and more coming to doubt the benefits to them and to their area of staying in a constitutional set-up where they are repeatedly ignored and their rights and interests continually slighted in deference to the interests of central and eastern Canada? This sort of legislation is just another open invitation to secession, another example of prejudice and discrimination.

The evils of this type of remote control are not too hard to find. Such administrative methods are bound to lead to mistakes and to inappropriate action. Areas have been mishandled and are still being mishandled due to this cumbersome and distant system of control. One good example is in my own province of Manitoba. Riding Mountain National Park should not be maintained in its present role of wilderness reserve. Instead, new areas to the north, and away from the march of development, should be taken for this purpose.

Riding Mountain National Park was made over to the federal authority in the late 1920s at a time when no one had a very clear idea of what a national park should be. Now most Canadian provinces have clear-cut parkland policies, sound programs of development and maintenance and a good understanding of the recreational needs of their populations. They have tremendous know-how and experience. I believe Riding Mountain National Park could well be turned back to the province of Manitoba and a fresh area taken up for wilderness preservation.

This park is situated slap in the middle of a well-built and developed area and astride an important provincial road link. It is 70 miles deep and 30 miles wide. This huge area inhibits development of a tremendous area of central Manitoba and makes the social and business life of the region unnecessarily difficult because of the wide detours that its wilderness state makes necessary. Highway No. 10 runs through the middle, but the park part of the road is in such poor shape that travellers are forced to skirt the park and make wide detours. If this were a provincial park it could accommodate recreational facilities, reasonably good roads and appropriate commercial enterprises. Now it is a dead area in the centre of a developed region of great potential.

The present national parks policy is not suited to Riding Mountain Park as it is situated. The area is not a mountain at all but is really an escarpment, a plateau that should form a natural part of the agricultural community surrounding it. From the days of the fur traders the park has been traversed by people, but now people are prevented from going back and forth easily through the park. The problem posed by this park is only one of the many faced by westerners who must look to a distant and disinterested administration in Ottawa for answers. The Crown corporation that this bill seeks to set up will simply add another layer to the protection afforded the government by the rigid and dictatorial bureaucracy that we have had so far.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I think the present parks policy of wilderness, so far as it concerns the Riding Mountain National Park, is very ill-suited to that area. Not all parks can be treated the same if we are to have any reasonable development of our parks at the national level. For these reasons I disagree entirely with the principle of this bill.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, earlier today we heard an important announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to the effect that the government was proposing to set up an information bureau that would be known as Information Canada. According to the Prime Minister's statement, one of the purposes of Information Canada is to hear the views of the people of Canada and their reaction to public policy.

The other afternoon when this bill was brought before the House, the members of the opposition took a firm stand, to the point of moving the adjournment of the debate because of the absence of the minister from the House. The Prime Minister was careful to point out that the new information bureau the government is proposing would serve the purpose not only of distributing information to the people of Canada and hearing their views, but of listening to the views of hon. members of this House, the elected representatives of the people.

It is quite obvious that the minister, who is conspicuous by his absence tonight, is not going to pay the slightest heed to anything that is said in this chamber. By the same token, it seems obvious that the statement of the Prime Minister this afternoon about Information Canada is so much hypocrisy, because it is fundamental to the democratic process and to the parliamentary process that a minister's first responsibility is to listen to the tenor, the tone and the content of debate in this House and that government decisions be influenced accordingly. There is not much we can do about it now, I suppose. It will be taken care of by the electorate of Canada in due course. However, I think it is the duty of members who will take part in this debate to protest as strongly as they can this ministerial arrogance, which I submit is tantamount to the old adage, "Don't confuse me with the facts: my mind is already made up."

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Kaplan: Is the hon. member aware that our debates are recorded?

Mr. Dinsdale: That is a typical remark by a Liberal—

Mr. Woolliams: A fellow that was booed in Toronto.

Mr. Dinsdale: —backbencher who would like to reduce—

Mr. Woolliams: The great white paper boy!

Mr. Dinsdale: —the parliamentary process to an exchange of notes, to the written word rather than to the spoken word. He does not even understand that the basic meaning of the word "Parliament" stems from the French "to talk."

Mr. Ricard: They have even to give notice of their intention to speak in caucus.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, I understand that the freedom of speech on the part of the backbenchers of the government party has been restricted to the extent that they have to give notice in order to be heard in their caucus. It is an unhappy and tragic day for the health and welfare of this high court of public opinion. This is where the action should be. This is where the voice of the people should be heard—through the elected representatives, and not read in the newspapers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: It is not only with respect to the parks problem that the actions of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) are causing concern. He is in difficulty with our first Canadians, the Indian citizens, because he will not listen to what they want to say with respect to decisions concerning their own destiny. He will not accept the basic principle of democracy, namely, the right of self-determination. The same situation prevails with respect to Eskimos in northern Quebec who have let it be known that they are being denied their traditional rights and protection of the department and are forced to cross to the Northwest Territories, particularly to Cape Dorset.

The minister is in difficulty over the question of sovereignty in northern Canada, and with respect to greater autonomy in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories because he will not listen to the vox populi and to the people who are most concerned with policy matters in his department.

This evening I want to deal with one or two matters that have been raised already in the course of the debate which were deliberate attempts to distort the record with respect to the past policy on national parks. This process of distortion was begun by the minister when he tabled a letter a few weeks ago in the House which he claimed indicated that the arrogant, autocratic and bureaucratic policy set down in the bill that is now before the House—and which is represented by the attitude of the minister—was begun at the time I had responsibility for the administration of the parks of Canada. At that time I raised the issue as a question of privilege and claimed the right to table documents that would complete the record and clear up the minister's insinuation.

I was not permitted by members on the government side of the House to table these documents. Tonight I will take the opportunity to read into the record a statement from the people most concerned, with respect to their attitude toward the arbitrary action of this government. This letter is dated January 21 and comes from the Banff Advisory Council. It is addressed to myself and reads as follows:

> Press reports indicate Mr. Chrétien has brought you and your administration into the fray. We are most happy that he has.
> Attached is a copy of your letter dated January 5, 1962, which clearly indicated you were prepared to use the provincial assessment.

This is with respect to the current controversy in the western parks which results from the reassessment of leasehold rentals in the western parks up to the level, in some instances, of 4,000 per cent. Talk about inflationary tendencies and trends!

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the hon. member a question? He is reading into the record a letter and has referred to an increase of 4,000 per cent. Can he substantiate the allegation about the 4,000 per cent?

Mr. Dinsdale: I shall not be deterred from the purpose I have in mind, which is to read the contents of this letter into the record in order to straighten out the distortions that were deliberately placed on the record by the minister responsible.

Mr. Bell: Where is the minister now?

Mr. Basford: Who wrote the letter?

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister will not come into the House.

Mr. Dinsdale: To quote the words of the minister the other day, the parliamentary secretary is obviously responsible and capable. Perhaps, as somebody said, he is more capable than the minister himself, and I am sure he can verify himself the fact I brought out. The letter continues as follows:

We still find the "standards and principles of the province of Alberta" acceptable.

Mr. Basford: Who wrote the letter?

Mr. Dinsdale: That was the formula we had laid down for any reassessment of leasehold rentals. I hear the minister of corporations and high prices asking me who wrote the letter. The letter was written by the president of the Banff Advisory Council, which represents the voice of the people in the Banff National Park. I want to point out the problem that is created by this bill.

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I believe I have the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Honey: I may have misunderstood the hon. member, but I gathered from the last exchange we had—

Mr. Ricard: Is this a question of privilege?

Mr. Honey: I will state it, if hon. members will not get so excited.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, surely you will not allow the hon. member to interrupt.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. We already have a question of privilege.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that, but—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): May we have order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but why should we disrupt the order of speeches?

Mr. Honey: My question of privilege is with respect to a statement made by the hon. member regarding an increase in rental of 4,000 per cent. I asked him whether he would give the House details of the allegation. I understood the hon. member would do so when he had finished reading the letter. I am asking him now whether he is prepared to do so.

Mr. Woolliams: Stop buzzing like a bee.

Mr. Dinsdale: Talk about Information Canada! I think the name of the new agency should be Misinformation Canada. The red herrings that the hon. parliamentary secretary is drawing at this time are indicative of that.

Mr. Honey: Answer the question.

Mr. Nesbitt: Where is the minister?

Mr. Dinsdale: This problem affects particularly the national parks of western Canada and is further discrimination on the part of the government against a region of Canada which is already in a very serious state of alienation because of the arbitrary action of the present Liberal administration. One of the reasons for this feeling of alienation and isolation is that the government refuses to listen to the responsible representations of the people who live in the western provinces. Whenever the responsible voice of the westerner is heard with regard to the national parks, the minister and other spokesmen for the goverment immediately apply the red herring tactic by suggesting that it is only the avaricious, commercial interests who wish to preserve the traditional rights of the western national parks.

Let me point out, so there will be no mistake in this matter, that western Canada has the real need for the preservation, conservation and wise management of our natural resources has been recognized. There are no national parks in the province of Quebec. There are only minor national parks in the province of Ontario. Why? Because those provinces are not willing to make available the land that would be required for national parks purposes. There has been a tentative suggestion that the government of Quebec would make land available in the Gaspé, but on the basis of special privileges such as a 99-year lease rather than surrendering it to the Federal Crown in perpetuity.

Let there be no mistake about this matter. Western Canada is accused of being avaricious and predatory with respect to its natural resources. I would give the lie to that statement by indicating that it is only in western Canada that huge areas of land have been made available in the interests of the preservation of these resources for the present and future generations of Canadians, as the National Parks Act specifies.

There are also parks in the maritime provinces, but there is no leasehold problem there.

In the early days when parks were first established in the west, population was comparatively small but distances were great. Townsites were already established, particularly in Banff and Jasper, which made it necessary for the government, in coming to terms with the provincial authorities on the development of national parks, to provide for leaseholds in perpetuity.

I want to deal with the question of perpetual leaseholds because it is the essence of the complaint that has been bothering the residents, particularly of the mountain parks, during the past few years. When the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky)—who should know better because he is the spokesman for the residents of these parks, their only voice in this House, even though the minister will not come in and listen to him—attempts to imply that the policy of cancellation of leaseholds in perpetuity in western national parks was as a result of the prior administration, he is serving as an apologist for the government.

Mr. Woolliams: Right.

Mr. Dinsdale: Is he serving the interests of the people he represents and doing his duty as their spokesman in this House of Commons? I have here an official statement from the National Parks Branch which reviews the whole leasehold situation from the latter 1950s when a moratorium was declared on further leaseholds, further alienation of land for national parks, until a total review of all western parks could be made and a master plan developed which would ensure that those parks would meet the high standards required under the National Parks Act. In 1963 the principle of perpetuity was cancelled by the then Liberal government, and this is the point where the controversy began. I have here, in the statement from the parks branch, clause 7 which states: "Under the present minister", referring to the minister who came into office in 1963—

Mr. Woolliams: You mean the new Senator.

Mr. Dinsdale: Clause 7 states as follows:

(a) On assignments leases are changed to 42-year non-renewable leases instead of leaving the leases basically unchanged until they come up for a normal renewal date.

(b) Normal renewals of perpetual renewal leases are for a term of 42 years only instead of the 42-plus 21-leases initiated by the previous administration.

(c) For non-commercial residential properties, new leases for previously unalienated land, leases issued on assignments and leases issued as normal renewals contain a clause providing for payment to lessees of compensation for improvements at fair market value.

That is a statement from the parks branch. I would be very happy to supply the hon. member for Rocky Mountain with a copy of it for his edification. I hope he did not intend to deliberately distort the record, because if so he is doing a serious disservice to the people of the west.

Mr. Sulatycky: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Certainly.

Mr. Sulatycky: Is it not a fact that between 1958 and 1963, 252 perpetual leases were not, in fact, renewed?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, if that was the case, it was contrary to government policy and was done outside the minister's knowledge. As a matter of fact, when complaints concerning problems of this kind came to my attention I made an extensive tour of the national parks to meet with the Advisory Councils of Banff, Jasper and the other parks to ensure that there would be no injustice in this regard. I did not tell the people that if they did not like it they could get out of the national parks. We listened to their representations and, as the letter indicates, the people were quite happy.

Mr. Sulatycky: But the hon. member does not deny that 252 leases were not renewed between 1958 and 1963?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am shocked that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky), who I thought was an able representative—

Mr. Orange: He is.

Mr. Dinsdale: He has joined the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) in that when it is a case of the government versus the people—

Mr. Orange: Answer the question, Walter.

Mr. Dinsdale: —they come down on the side of the government—

Mr. Orange: Answer the question. There were 252 leases under your signature.

Mr. Dinsdale: I shall send a copy of this official departmental statement to the member for Northwest Territories who, confidentially in conversation with me, tells me that he disagrees with the arbitrary, bureaucratic approach of the National Parks Branch in this regard.

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I am sure the conversations I have had with the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) have not resulted in discussions regarding the effectiveness or otherwise of members of the public service or the policy of this government. We may have talked about the policies of the government, confidentially, which he agreed with in those days.

Mr. Dinsdale: So much for Information Canada. God help the people of Canada with this sort of nonsense going on amongst their elected representatives.

Mr. Speaker, there is certainly need for the implementation of a comprehensive plan for our national parks which meets the problems well known by everyone concerned with these matters; that is, the increase in leisure time, population explosion, mobility created by roads and cars, and the impact of tourism.

In 1963 the former administration announced a policy which was designed to adapt the parks to the changing circumstances and needs of the people. At the same time it was necessary to operate on the basis of the proposals that came out of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference, that is, wise management and multiple use. Essential to the plan was the setting up within the department of a planning division which, as I have already intimated, was to review development in each of the western parks—this is essentially a western problem—and to come up with a master plan that would see the adequate development of the parks to the end of the century.

Basic to the plan was a zoning policy which would consist of three zones. The townsite or service centre would deal with the problems of Banff and Jasper, permanent townsites, and also with some of the other western parts where there are substantial service centres that operate during the summer months. There would be a buffer zone which would provide camping facilities for the people who wished to get into the recreative environment of the national parks. Finally, there would be a wilderness zone which would remain in a completely undeveloped, wilderness state. This would ensure the preservation of these unique land areas, flora and fauna, for all future generations.

A vital part of the plan was that it would be in touch with regional needs because Canada is a big country with different regional requirements. There is provision for the decentralization of administration. An office was established in Calgary for the purpose of coming to a closer realization of the particular needs of the western national parks. So that there might be autonomy in the townsites, town managers were appointed in order to relieve the superintendents of the park areas from the responsibility of administering the problems of the townsites.

There were also plans afoot for new national parks, because the number of national parks, in the face of the growing demand, must be doubled immediately if we are to meet the needs of our people for recreational facilities. Terra Nova, Newfoundland, and a new national park in Nova Scotia were established. Negotiations were under way for parks in the Northwest Territories, Yukon, and for the preservation of that unique land in southwestern Saskatchewan, the cypress hills prairie lands, the home of the prairie dog, as extolled in the old song, where the deer and the antelope play.

There has been no real progress along these lines in the last seven years except for repeated announcement that new national parks will be developed. A federal-provincial parks conference was established so there would be continuous communication between the federal and provincial authorities. It is primarily a provincial problem, involving alienation of provincial land. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec are reluctant to permit the alienation of their land to the Crown. Little wonder, for we have a minister who refuses to accept his responsibility for listening to the advice and helpful information that hon. members concerned with these problems can offer.

More important still, again arising out of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1961, a private group was established concerned with our national and provincial parks. We now have a Provincial and Federal Parks Association which has been making an excellent contribution to the on-going discussion concerning the preservation of our park resources.

To indicate that there was some public approval of the plan, an editorial in the Albertan of January 25, 1963, following the announcement of the program that I have outlined briefly tonight was headed, "Bravo, Mr. Dinsdale!". The editorial wholly endorsed the plan which was laid down at that time. There was a similar editorial in the Calgary Herald. Both these editorials arose from the fact that the announcement was made in the province of Alberta which perhaps has the largest land area devoted to national parks.

The situation has deteriorated sadly since that time. The government has arbitrarily cancelled perpetual leases. A parliamentary committee went to the mountain parks three or four years ago and for three days listened to the voice of the people there. I thought they made a convincing case, but the government decided otherwise and came up with this leasehold Crown corporation as a solution to a problem that was becoming embarrassing to the government. Incidentally, this is not a new act. It was first proposed in 1967, as I recall, before the last election. Because it was politically embarrassing, the government decided not to proceed with it. As a result of the administrative decree which had arbitrarily removed fundamental rights of the people—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. He will be allowed to continue only with unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. Sulatycky: Could I ask the hon. member another question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Sulatycky: Is the hon. member for Brandon-Souris aware of the recommendation of the Glassco Commission, that the commissioners of the national parks be part of an autonomous commission? This proposal stemmed from that. This was in 1962, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am aware of the voice of the people of the Rocky Mountain constituency which is opposed to what the government is now suggesting. Surely, the voice of the people of Canada should take priority over the task forces, the commissions, royal commissions, Information Canada and all the other administrative bodies which have no authority or responsibility to the people of Canada. Surely, the voice of the people is much more important than these faceless bodies.

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

Because of the arbitrary administrative decree which removed a fundamental right of the people of the parks which had been granted by the Crown, the people took the matter to the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court upheld the rights of the people. Now the minister, great democrat that he is, has taken this question to the Supreme Court of Canada to try to have the opinion reversed. The latest controversy revolves around the exhorbitant increase in leasehold rentals to which I have already made reference. My friend the parliamentary secretary disputes the figures. Unfortunately, I do not have time to go into a detailed analysis; but as was pointed out in the letter which I read, the residents of the park are quite happy with the provincial assessment rates as the basis. They are the ones affected by the exhorbitant figures to which I have already referred.

The protests of the people of the national parks is a western protest. Surely, the government is not so insensitive to the problem of national unity in this country that it refuses to regard this as a special regional problem in the west. An article in the January 16, 1970, edition of the Calgary Herald is headed, "Chrétien tells Banff 'Like it or Leave'." There is real, responsible democracy for you!

My time is rapidly coming to an end. I want to indicate that there is a need for change and reform with respect to the administration of the western national parks. I think the other provinces should come into the national parks system. We need a rapid increase in the number of national parks available. We need recreational parks. There was a program all set to roll which would have provided financial assistance to the provinces to expand their recreational parks network.

In addition, in the light of the unhappy experience in our western national parks, we need to reinforce the zoning principles laid down in 1963 so that there could be a special category of parks which might well be called national wilderness parks. The zoning principle was designed to prevent any further deterioration of the wilderness in the western parks. Westerners, above all others, realize the importance of preserving this aspect of our national resources. The boundaries of wilderness parks and the zoning in national parks have to be established by legislation because, obviously, the government cannot be trusted to adhere to policies which it has itself enunciated in the past.

The townsites require special administration, which again ought to be dealt with by special legislation. Banff and Jasper were towns before they were included in national parks. Surely, it is the essence of bureaucracy gone mad to try to ignore the fact that Canadians live within the national parks in townsites, on a permanent basis. They, too, are entitled to the same rights as all Canadians. They are not avaricious. They are not seeking personal aggrandizement. Indeed, they are in the forefront of those who insist that the national parks be preserved and developed in accordance with the highest possible standards.

In addition to the zoning, which has been accepted by the residents in the national parks, I think we should become seriously concerned about the establishment of national seashore sanctuaries. This demand is given even greater urgency by what is happening off the coast of Nova Scotia today. We should also be preserving the primitive wilderness along the course of some of our great national rivers. These are the things we should be concerned about, instead of becoming bureaucratically involved in further removing the fundamental rights of Canadians who live in the national parks of Canada, people who have developed those parks and made a unique contribution to the quality of Canadian life everywhere in so doing. Some of them have made this their life's work. Now, because of this arbitrary legislation, they are likely to see it swept away, not even by elected parliamentary representatives but by faceless figures operating under the protection of a Crown corporation.

I know this attempt to get a response from the government is like shouting into the wind, because when it comes to western members the government has demonstrated time and time again that it has not the slightest intention of listening to the elected representatives of the people. I plead with the government, in the interest of peace, order and good government in this country, to listen. It is not good enough for the minister responsible for developing this important aspect of public policy to absent himself from the House because he does not want to listen to the elected representatives.

I began by pointing out that Information Canada amounts to so much nonsense and possesses all the ominous overtones of an effort by a government arrogant long before its time to develop a propaganda machine which will confuse the issue to such an extent that the people will scarcely know what their rights and privileges are.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Dinsdale: I was interrupted on several occasions, Mr. Speaker, and the clock indicates—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give the hon. member unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: I can complete my remarks in a few sentences. I was about to conclude by pleading with the government to listen to the voice of western Canada. It is a responsible voice. Western Canada has made huge areas of its territory available for the preservation of regions of special beauty, as the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) has indicated. The parks are among the few areas near the prairies which offer an opportunity for recreational benefit and refreshment to the people. The people of Canada who work in the parks, and who are directly interested in them, are just as concerned about their development in accordance with the highest standards as are the officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Let us not stir up trouble and division in this country by passing arbitrary administrative legislation, which is the only description I can give to Bill C-152.

Mr. Honey: Would the hon. member permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member's time has expired. Furthermore, if the parliamentary secretary speaks at this time, he will close the debate.

Mr. Honey: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to ask the hon. member a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Honey: I gather the hon. member is opposed to the policy of charging economic rents in the national parks. If so, is his party also opposed to that policy?

Mr. Dinsdale: I think I gave the parliamentary secretary too much credit. His minister said he was an excellent man, that he was capable—

Mr. Honey: Perhaps the hon. member would answer my question.

Mr. Dinsdale: The hon. member asks if I am opposed to equitable assessment.

Mr. Honey: No; to economic rents.

Mr. Dinsdale: Let us make them equitable, too.

Mr. Honey: The word used was "economic". The question was whether the hon. member wants economic rents to be charged. If he wishes to answer another question, that is fine, but the question I put to him was whether he opposes the policy of charging an economic rent in the national parks, and if so, does his party also oppose that policy?

Mr. Dinsdale: This question was answered seven or eight years ago when we held detailed consultations with the people most concerned in the national parks. As the letter I read from the president of the Banff Advisory Council indicates, they are quite happy with the economic rental formula which was laid down by the former administration. I quote again, because obviously the hon. member did not hear the sentence: "We still find the standards and principles of the province of Alberta acceptable." I would regard that as referring to an economic rent.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be short. Many people in my constituency are concerned about the form of the developments taking place in our national parks, particularly in the national park at Waskesiu in Prince Albert National Park. They are concerned, as I suppose all Canadians are, about overcrowding, the influx of cars and the increased use of facilities that is going to be the fate of our national parks, particularly the one that we have in northern Saskatchewan.

Changes are already under way. The park has been developed over the years and the people there lived in very modest residences such as shacks, summer cottages, and so on. Recent policy seeks to change this situation. The change will be either gradual or rapid, but nevertheless it will be a change. This particular park, at least up to the present time, has been what I would call a community park in the sense that people in northern Saskatchewan, and even further south, have used it as a community. There has not been in the past a great influx of tourists from other areas.

What I and the people of Saskatchewan are concerned about is that a corporation is to be given the job of running the park. We would like to know whether the park is still going to serve the community as a community park. What is going to be the cost of accommodation for those who live in the accommodation centres that are to be set up? Will the ordinary people of Saskatchewan be able to afford to use the park as they have until now? Will those who visit the park for a short stay, either with or without camping equipment, be able to obtain the kind of accommodation they need, at reasonable rates? Indeed, will they have access to the park at all? Will the local people, or the expected influx of tourists benefit from the facilities offered by the park?

We are also concerned about the importance of preserving our natural heritage and the beauty of the wilderness there. Not too long ago some young people in Saskatchewan who had recently visited the park wrote me to ask why the cabin of that great naturalist, Grey Owl, which they had assumed was an historic monument, had fallen into decay. I wrote to the department involved and asked what was to be the future of this very important historic monument and I was informed that there were certain plans under way to preserve it.

This is the sort of thing that gives people in northern Saskatchewan cause for concern. They want a place of beauty, a place of natural wilderness, accessible by ordinary means of transportation and which can be enjoyed by ordinary people. I hope that before this debate is over the minister will be able to convince the House that a corporation such as that envisaged will be able to maintain this kind of environment for the people of Saskatchewan. I hope there will be clear guidelines to ensure that the interests and needs of the people of Saskatchewan are looked after. I hope the House will be given the assurance that those who now have accommodation in the park will continue to have that kind of accommodation.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I want at this time to make a few remarks on the general subject of the importance of parks in our national life. For a long time, of course, during the early period of our development as a nation—this can be said equally of the United States—people looked upon themselves as striving against an overwhelming wilderness which seemingly they might never overcome. However, people of foresight such as President Roosevelt—I refer to Teddy Roosevelt—recognized that wherever man went, he left the land in ruin; that there was a great necessity for setting land apart as a legacy for future generations. In this way they would be in a position to enjoy nature at its best.

In addition, areas of wilderness should be preserved in their virgin state for historic purposes, using the wider sense of the word, so that Canadians both of this and future generations realize what our early settlers and forefathers had to struggle against in opening up this great North American continent. The foresight exhibited by outstanding men such as Teddy Roosevelt has been an invaluable asset to the United States. He was instrumental in setting aside vast stretches of virgin country as the legacy of future generations. The same thing was done in Canada to a considerable extent and we owe a great deal to those men and governments who had the foresight to take this step.

However, this bill, which is an important one, contains provisions with which I disagree. The bill exhibits a trend that is evident in many federal government activities—removing government further and further from the governed. The government is setting up corporations and other faceless organizations to act as a buffer between government, which is elected to be the people's servant, and the people it is supposed to serve. It is my contention that the more directly the government is responsible to the people, the better it functions, because it is then held directly responsible to the people for its activities.

I note that this bill—and I will not go into this matter at great length now because it can be examined more carefully in committee—changes the description of a number of our national parks. From a quick perusal of the appendices to the bill it would seem that at least four of our parks are to be reduced in size. This reduction may not be significant. The four parks to which I refer are Waterton Lakes, Kootenay, Prince Albert and Prince Edward Island. These may be very minor changes in the boundaries, but this is something we have to find out. In any event, in my judgment this trend is in the wrong direction. I notice that the Terra Nova National Park in Newfoundland is to be extended in area under the terms of this bill.

There are many reasons for national parks. The most obvious one, which is perhaps readily recognized by urban people, is for vacation purposes. National parks are places for recreation; that is one of their benefits. Facilities should be provided in suitable terrain set aside for various types of recreation. There are other questions involved. National parks, in my judgment, should be established to preserve in each part of our country typical areas in as near a natural, virgin state as possible in order that people will know what the land was like as God made it.

Some areas of our country have special attractions. In the park that is partly in my own constituency, the Prince Edward Island National Park, there exists one of the finest beaches in Canada. There are excellent beaches in the maritime provinces; in Prince Edward Island, parts of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. More of these beaches should be set aside in the form of parks for public use. In this way everyone, rich or poor, would have access to them and would be able to enjoy their benefits.

Even in Prince Edward Island our beaches are not our only asset. I recommend that a second park be provided in Prince Edward Island. This matter has been under discussion for a long time between the two levels of government. We should set aside additional fine beach areas on the island for national park use. There is also a necessity for setting aside, before it is too late, areas in Prince Edward Island that are as near their virgin state as any to be found, for the preservation of the wildlife which still exists. This would allow the remaining species of wildlife in Prince Edward Island to continue. Perhaps they would not become extinct, as has been the case in respect of too many small animals and birds.

It is too late now to preserve a habitat for many of the small animals that were native to our province. It is not too late to preserve an area which would be a suitable habitat for migratory birds. In Prince Edward Island we have a vast number of migratory birds for which a habitat should be provided in order to preserve their existence. In this way people could enjoy the very relaxing recreation referred to by most people as birdwatching but which I prefer to call communion with nature.

One of the most beneficial experiences that society can have, and which is becoming more and more urbanized, more and more polluted with pollutants and noise, is that of isolation or to be able to go where one can obtain peace, quiet and solitude. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that solitude not only heals the body but heals the mind. It is essential that people experience it periodically if they are to have recreation in the true sense of the word.

Therefore, I recommend strongly that the government consider carefully the provision of not less but more area for national parks, even if these areas cannot be developed at the present time. Land costs will increase and the longer this program is delayed, the harder it will be to accomplish. There will be developments of various kinds, and the environment will be destroyed. It will then be too late to take advantage of these areas. I would urge the minister, if he were here, to consider the necessity of taking action now to protect the future of Canadians yet unborn.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on Bill C-152, titled "an Act to amend the National Parks Act". I read the bill with interest and taken as a whole, I find it deserves our close attention since it deals with an important subject, that is the expansion and operation of resort areas, the preservation of our wildlife and the development of our natural resources.

I would like to consider the problem mostly from the point of view of Quebec. The previous speaker noted that Quebec may not be a province like the others, that it does not benefit from national parks and that, in comparison with other provinces, its natural resources remain undeveloped.

In that regard, I wish to recall the problem about the famous Forillon Park in the Gaspé Peninsula.

The federal government has been taking steps recently to set up a national park in that area. On the other hand, the Quebec government is also taking steps, having studies made with a view to having a park in the same area which, however, is not intended to be "national". Although it is quite willing to accept the funds required from the federal government.

That is what could be called a constitutional quarrel between the Quebec government and the federal government. In the meantime, Quebec has yet to have a national park.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time we put an end to our constitutional quarrels, specially when dealing with the development of part of our country, with the development of its natural resources, as in the case of a national park in the Gaspé peninsula which is an underdeveloped area where tourism alone guarantees a certain income, admittedly quite modest, to its people.

On the one hand, the Quebec government tells the people that the government in Ottawa is to blame, that it refuses to negotiate; neither does Ottawa want to negotiate with a view to reaching a reasonable compromise. On the other hand, the federal minister says: We cannot accede fully to the request of the provincial government, because of such and such a section in the constitution, because it could lead to this or that inconvenience, because of such and such a precedent.

Obviously, as a result Quebec has no federal parks. Now, over $335 million were spent in other provinces for national parks, while not a single penny has been spent in Quebec.

It seems to me that if the provincial government is not reasonable in this particular matter, the federal government for his part, lies low and does not react in any way to the problems and injustices thereby created.

It is high time to wake up and to say, once and for all, that in Quebec as well as in the other provinces, our natural resources must be developed and made profitable, so as to give reasonable impetus to our tourist industry.

It is high time that we should stop playing politics, and passing the buck. Indeed, we have wealth, such as forests, animal life and lakes, but all those things are wasted because no one is concerned about developing them.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. members who spoke before me on the subject were partly right but I do not agree with them when they put the blame for it mainly on the provincial government for his attitude. It is all too easy for the federal government to say that the provincial government is the only one at fault. However, if one gives a close look at the matter, one realizes, that the problem lies on both sides of the fence.

Whenever an interesting bill like Bill C-152 comes up for consideration before the House, there are of course points on which we do not all agree but I dare say that no Canadian will oppose the idea of developing our resources.

I would like to put forward a suggestion and ask the representatives of the federal government responsible for the setting up of the first federal park in Quebec to make some concessions while paying due respect to the wishes of the Quebec government, which they failed to do when the creation of the Forillon park was discussed.

The federal government, allegedly because it is the central government, would like the provinces always to bow down to its wishes. This is a bad attitude and Canadians are still suffering from it.

Last year, I put a question on the order paper. The answer which I received was obviously ridiculous. I asked: Can the minister tell us if discussions have been held between the federal government and the provincial government of Quebec, or if it is intended to hold any? In short, the question read as follows:

Does the government intend to establish other federal parks in the province of Quebec?

The answer was as follows, and I quote:

No.

My first question was as follows:

Does the government intend to establish other federal parks in the province of Quebec a) if not, for what reason? b) if so, where?

Answer:

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development):

1. a) The federal government would welcome—

—it is again a good pious wish—

—any request from the province of Quebec for the establishment of other national parks in the province;

b) Any area in the province considered of national significance and worthy of preservation for future generations.

That is precisely the crux of the problem. It is obvious that the province of Quebec has vast territories that are worthy of being preserved and developed for future generations, which would represent untold wealth.

The federal government replies: we are waiting for a request from the provincial government. Whenever we ask the same question, to the Quebec government, we get this reply: We do not dare ask Ottawa for anything because they will answer no. If we make a request to Ottawa, they will say it has to be a national park and will refuse to respect provincial rights in this regard. And so there is no national park in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw your attention to the other question, as I am sure you will be interested. I quote:

2. Since the adoption of the act respecting federal parks, how much money has been spent on federal parks and of that amount, how much has gone to the province of Quebec?

The answer was the following:

2. Since the establishment of the first national park (Banff) in 1885, $355,289,424 was spent on national parks in Canada. (This comprises operation and maintenance, capital investments and money spent on trunk highways.) Since there were no national parks in Quebec, no money was spent in that province for national parks.

So that was the result. An amount of $335,-289,424 was spent in other provinces because the federal government thought it was worthwhile to develop those parks. Since the federal government is playing politics at the expense of the Quebecers and since the Quebec government does the same, the result is that there is no national park in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, $355 million were spent in other provinces and Quebec got nothing for the simple reason that both levels of government are taking pleasure in passing the buck and playing politics at the expense of Quebecers.

As there is a Liberal government in Ottawa and a Conservative one in Quebec, words give rise to conflicts. One day, the people in Gaspé are told that, thanks to the federal government, they will have a national park. The next day, the provincial minister states that the province cannot participate fully in the federal government's project because this section of the Constitution or that right are not respected or again because this or that wish of the province is not taken into account

Then new discussions are begun, following which the ministers answer members' questions arrogantly, stating: We are now considering the possibility of creating a national park.

That is what led me to ask the third question, and I quote:

Is the government negotiating with the government of the province of Quebec with a view to establishing other federal parks in that province?

And what was the answer?

3. No.

That is where things stand as of now. Neither the federal government nor the provincial government are serious enough to take any steps likely to help the development of the tourist industry in Quebec.

The weakness of Bill C-152 is that it does not provide for an alternative that would force the powers that be to get down to work seriously and to find, once and for all, ways and means of developing the country's natural wealth, and in particular Quebec's riches. Clause 1 of the bill provides for the setting up of a Corporation, but is followed by meaningless generalities giving no assurance that the act will actually benefit all Canadians, and not only some of them.

This act will not affect Quebec at all, while continuing availability to other provinces of the corresponding funds. Therefore, when the minister submits the same bill next year, to change at best a few words, if he is asked whether negotiations are underway, tending to make the same advantages available to Quebec as to the other provinces, he will reply that if anything is wrong it is Quebec's fault.

It is time we faced our responsibilities and recognized that Quebec has vast unexplored resources, shamelessly wasted because of the apathy of our governments whose only concern is gaining votes.

The people of Quebec should at last open their eyes and withdraw their confidence from politicians, those of Quebec as well as those of Ottawa, who have been elected to wage a war of words rather than develop natural resources for the use of Canadians.

I hope that some day, in Ottawa as well as in Quebec City, we shall have as heads of government men who will be responsible, worthy of the name statesmen, and who will undertake to develop our natural resources for the use of the population.

Only then will we be able to say that proposed legislation such as Bill C-152 will really serve Canadians and promote the development of natural resources. Otherwise, we are merely talking and wasting time. It is unfortunate that nobody, it seems to me, is interested in solving the problem. It is preferred to bury one's head in the sand, raise it up again, make three statements and launch a red carpet war, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) so ably said. I hope that what he said will eventually be understood: Enough of that nonsense. I hope he understands it himself and tells his ministers to negotiate, not so much as Liberals but as Canadians, to develop our country's wealth.

This is my wish. I am asking the minister to try and improve the contents of the bill and to give some guarantee to Parliament that natural resources will be developed from coast to coast and not only in one region of the country.

[Mr. Fortin.]

[English]

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-152 states that it is an act to amend the National Parks Act. This in itself, I would assume, provides a wide subject for those who wish to speak on it. However, on reading the bill I noticed that there are really only two main points: one is to set up a Crown corporation to administer the national parks, and the other is to designate the boundaries of the national parks which are already established in Canada.

I say at the outset that I take strong exception to the government's plan to set up a Crown corporation to administer our national parks. I think, as do many speakers who preceded me, that this plan will be merely another way of passing the goverment's responsibility to a group of people in a Crown corporation. It will be a way in which the government will endeavour to absolve itself of all responsibility for the operation of national parks.

On looking closely at Bill C-152 we find that should the minister, in his wisdom, feel the Crown corporation is not administering the parks to his liking, he can step in and veto any decision which it makes. I am not sure whether this is an admission by the government that a Crown corporation can do a better job of administering our parks. This may be quite true. However, I think it goes much deeper than that, because I believe the government ought not to have the best of two worlds.

I said that I was not in favour of the government setting up a Crown corporation to administer national parks. But in one or two respects this may not be a bad idea, because on looking over the policies of some of our Crown corporations I find that they provide a few benefits over and above those which the government is prepared to provide for the people using our national parks.

I mention in particular the Clear Lake National Park in Manitoba, where a very important and widely publicized golf tournament is held every year. It is called the Grey Owl golf tournament and it opens the season for the national park. This tournament brings great economic benefit to the park at that time of the year. It is held each year during the first week end of June, or thereabouts, and 300 or more entries are received, plus countless hundreds of people who come to enjoy the tournament and to take in the weekend at the park when it is in progress.

On occasion, the sponsors of this golf tournament have approached me to see whether the minister would take into consideration the great contribution that it is making at the opening of the season at Clear Lake National Park, and whether certain regulations in relation to the fees normally charged could be altered so that either a subsidy could be granted or at least a special fee set. I understand that this is done in some parts of Canada, but on several occasions when I have approached the minister he has told me this would be impossible.

To get back to what I said previously, in some respects it may be better for a Crown corporation to take over the administration of the parks, although I would not agree to a full takeover. I would point out that Air Canada, which is a Crown corporation, and Canadian National Railways offer beneficial rates to large parties; they have group fares. But this government will give no consideration to a tournament the size of the Grey Owl golf tournament held in Clear Lake National Park. Green fees last year were raised to $4 and the tournament officials were told, "If you have 300 golfers, you will pay $1,200 for them to play one round apiece." This means $2,400 for the two rounds which they play. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, perhaps a Crown corporation would do a better job than the government is doing. However, I reiterate that I am not in favour of the government turning over all its responsibilities to a Crown corporation.

We all know the many concerns of the people residing in the national parks and of those operating businesses in the parks. In December, 1966, as a result of many protests from residents of the western parks arising from cancellation of long-standing, historic leasing rights by order in council, the Standing Committee on Northern Affairs and National Resources visited Banff and Jasper on a fact-finding mission. During hearings lasting three days the committee found that the citizens affected agreed with the necessity for a change in leasing policy to meet the growing recreational needs of today, while at the same time conforming to the conservation principles of wise management and multiple use of our renewable resources which emerged from the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1961.

The protests arose because the changes were made by administrative decree rather than by act of Parliament, and also because cancellation of perpetual leases provided no compensation in respect of commercial properties. The main protest at that time was supported by a comprehensive brief presented by Mr. G. H. Steer, Q.C., of Edmonton, which argued the illegality of government action by order in council rather than by act of Parliament. But, Mr. Speaker, the committee report tabled in the House completely ignored those representations.

It is no wonder that the leaseholders in many of our parks are at their wits end to know what compensation they can get and what hearing they will receive from a government that arbitrarily passes laws of this nature by order in council. It makes one wonder just what the position of these leaseholders would be if the administration of parks were turned over to a Crown corporation. We all know what has happened in recent times with respect to individuals dealing with Crown corporations. I cite the example of the city of Winnipeg and the people of Manitoba generally and the great difficulty they had when Air Canada decided to move its facilities from Winnipeg to Montreal. The people concerned in Winnipeg are still looking for answers, mainly because they feel they could not pin the government down since it was a decision by a Crown corporation. The findings of the committee at that time were another example of the growing tendency of the government to implement policies by administrative decree rather than by parliamentary action.

Mr. Speaker, my time is drawing to a close. We in Manitoba have repeatedly requested through the provincial government that the federal government establish a second national park in our province. If one asks representatives of the provincial government, they say that they cannot get an answer from Ottawa. I have approached representatives of the federal government, and they say that Manitoba must make the first move. This creates a very difficult situation for people in all parts of Manitoba.

We in the northern part of the province hoped that the second national park in Manitoba would be situated in an area north of or closely adjacent to the 55th parallel. However, we have been told that studies were made of that area which showed it was not suitable for a national park, and that other areas were being examined. The people living in the other areas that are being examined are anxiously waiting for a decision from the federal government, to be made in conjunction with a decision by the provincial government. I know, from talking to these people, that they would be very disturbed to learn that within the next year or two they will get a new national park but it will be under the jurisdiction of a Crown corporation, with the result that if they have any complaints and take them to the government they will receive the stock answer, "We as a government can do nothing about these complaints because the administration of parks is being handled by a Crown corporation."

We want a second national park. The people of Manitoba and of other provinces are very interested in national parks. From talking to people in my area, and particularly to those who are living in or have business relationships in Clear Lake National Park, I know that since this bill has been introduced they have become very concerned about what the government is trying to do in setting up a Crown corporation to administer the national parks.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker, as my remarks will take a few minutes, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, could we be told by someone the change in business for tomorrow?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, the government House leader has asked me to announce that he intends to call the order for second reading of the investment companies bill as the first item of business tomorrow.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—POLICY RESPECTING CLOSURE OF LOW-INCOME BRANCHES

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my grievance tonight involves the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans). I am indeed sorry that the minister has not seen fit to be in the House because I believe he should hear what I have to say. I am disturbed at developments in the Post Office Department because I find that little, if any, consideration is being given to any appeal that may come from members of this House, or to representations that come from the people of Canada whom the minister is supposed to serve.

The only product that the Post Office Department has to sell is service, and if it is not intent on rendering that service to the people of Canada it is grossly failing in its responsibilities and obligations to the people of Canada. I believe that practically every member of the House knows and has evidence, in the form of protests, in his files that the Post Office Department is not functioning as well as it used to function. I have been a member of this House for eight years, and I believe that last year I received more complaints about the inefficiency and ineffectiveness of the Post Office than I did in all the previous seven years.

I am not going to deal with the situation in general tonight, although I was a bit disturbed the other day to receive an urgent letter containing an appeal about the situation in Nigeria which took nine days to come to Ottawa from the city of Toronto. My concern, Mr. Speaker, is with the blanket policy of the Minister of Communications to close all low-income post offices in the country. On May 22, 1969, the Minister of Communications wrote to me stating:

> —changing conditions throughout the country, revenue post offices in many of our smaller communities are no longer required. As a consequence, early in 1967 we initiated a program to close these post offices.

In relation to a complaint that I made on June 20, 1969, the Minister of Communications stated in a letter:

> In light of our current program to close all small revenue post offices we could not arbitrarily make an exception in this case.

That is the case I was appealing, Mr. Speaker. In other words, the government, through the Minister of Communications, has initiated a policy intended to close all low-income post offices whether or not they are essential to the communities they serve.

The argument the minister uses repeatedly in letters to me when I tried to have him clarify the situation can best be illustrated by saying that he is trying to fit the visitor to the bed. If his legs are too long, he cuts them off; if they are too short, he attempts to stretch them to fit the bed. To be specific, I shall mention a few instances to illustrate that the policy the Minister of Communications has initiated is in many cases completely unjust.

I am not referring to all low-income post offices. I can name at least seven low-income post offices in my constituency that have no justification for continuing. They have very few boxholders and serve very few people, so it is logical that rural route service would be better. But this is not the case in every instance. I want to mention four specific examples. One is the Dickson post office, where there are approximately 30 boxholders in the village and 17 boxholders in the rural area. The cost of this post office is $1,800 a year. The Minister of Communications said it was $2,000 a year, but that is wrong; it is $1,800 a year. The revenue is small, but I maintain that because of the traditional service going back more than 60 years that this post office has rendered, there is no justification for closing it now.

A petition has been signed by every citizen served by this post office, protesting the closing. I am concerned that when I consulted the Minister of Communications, and later investigated the situation on the spot, I learned that in November an official of the post office in Calgary visited the community; he assured the postmaster at Dickson that he had no intention of closing it but was merely investigating the rural route service in the area. However, four weeks later, on December 17, an order was issued to close the post office.

Many of the arguments stated by the Minister of Communications in letters to me are just not logical nor do they actually state the facts. While this is a very small post office, and there is another only a couple of miles away, it will cost far more than $1,800 to provide the service that the people in the village and the area south of the village must have if the post office was closed and rural route delivery substituted. There is no economic gain or saving by closing that post office, and 100 per cent of the people involved want it kept open because it meets their particular needs.

Why is an approach not made to the people to determine whether they want the post office to close or stay open? Why does the government not deal with the matter in a forthright manner and consider the costs of offering a substitute service through the extension of rural route No. 1 from Innisfail? As far as I can determine, this will be much more than the cost of maintaining the post office. No consideration has been given to public opinion, to the economic effects or to the local problems of this post office.

I refer another post office to the attention of the Minister of Communications, the country post office of Bergen. It is true that this post office involves an expenditure of only $1,000 by the Post Office Department, but it serves 50 householders. The Postmaster General says it serves 44. I beg to differ with him, because it serves 50 householders, not 44. A petition has been forwarded to him asking that this post office be retained. Of the 50 householders, 40 agreed this is the type of service they want. To provide rural route delivery to the people who are involved in this remote foothills community will cost much more than the $1,000 which is now involved in maintaining the Bergen post office.

The third post office I wish to bring to the attention of the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications is that of Westward Ho. The cost of this post office is $1,800 a year. The income last year, as far as stamps and money orders were concerned, was less than $700. It serves 63 householders. The department says 56, but I count 67.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am afraid I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

Mr. Thompson: Might I finish with one sentence, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Regretfully, this is not the practice we have adopted.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson). I am sorry the hon. member started by saying that the minister was not giving care because he was not present in the House. I can assure the member for Red Deer that the minister is in Montreal on post office business this evening. Surely, the hon. member for Red Deer is aware that if he has a problem with post offices in villages in his riding, Montreal also—has a problem with its post offices; and that is why the minister is in Montreal tonight.

I will be glad to bring the hon. member's remarks to the minister's attention on his return. In his absence the minister asked me to provide the member with the following information. I am sure, from the remarks of the hon. member, that he will not be satisfied with this information, but it is what I have been asked to give him.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

There are 10,000 post offices in Canada. By comparison, the United States has only 30,000 post offices, although on a population ration that country should have something like 100,000. In other words, the Canadian public is extremely well served with respect to the number and availability of post offices.

The present status of the program to review small post offices is as follows. The number of post offices closed to date, 1,240; number examined and retained, 1,208; number still to be reviewed, 1,450. This program will be completed on September 30, 1970.

NATIONAL REVENUE—REFUND OF SALES TAX ON GRAIN STORAGE EQUIPMENT

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I hoped that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) would be answering my question this evening because I find it easier to get angry with him over the problems we have in western Canada; he should know how to solve our problems; the parliamentary secretary may not. I will try to be logical in my argument in the hope that it might have some influence on the parliamentary secretary.

I received a complaint from a farmer who had built grain storage facilities in Saskatchewan. He has discovered that he cannot get a tax rebate on this building because it is not the right style. I quote from his letter as follows:

> —the building we erected was built primarily for grain storage and now holds over 25,000 bushels of wheat. The way the grain situation is now, this could be in there for another 10 years with what other wheat we have on hand and the quotas we are getting, even without seeding another wheat crop.

I ask the parliamentary secretary to note the following:

> The provincial government recognized this as a grain storage building and we cannot understand the federal government's view of this.

I quote from another letter received from this person:

> We believe that very few people in this economic situation would build a building costing this much to store machinery and let grain sit outside in piles and spoil. When this much more storage space is needed we feel it much wiser to build one large building than 12 to 14 small bins. We already have 17 other granaries varying in size and a 28' x 40' barn lowered and converted into a grain storage bin, all filled to capacity. To add another dozen small bins would be ridiculous.

From the point of view of economics as applied to this farm, it makes more sense to erect one large building for the storage of grain than to buy several grain storage bins. From the answer given me by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté), or an official of the department, it is not enough, apparently, that a bin should hold grain. It has to look like a grain bin and it should not be capable of use for any purpose but the storage of grain.

I wonder whether the government is serious when it professes to be willing to help farmers who are in trouble because they cannot sell their grain. The Saskatchewan government has recognized that bins of this type are adequate for storage. There is a method by which an individual can apply to his municipality for a permit enabling him to make application for a return of tax. In this case the farmer got a $200 refund, the amount of the 5 per cent sales tax collected by the Saskatchewan government. Thus, one level of government recognizes the principle and I wonder why another level of government declines to do so.

It seems to me the Saskatchewan government acknowledges the seriousness of the situation on the prairies, while the federal government is only playing around. The federal government may not agree with this opinion, but this is what it amounts to. The government should take another look at these cases. Only one farmer has appealed to me, but after talking to other hon. members I know that other farmers are in the same difficulty.

The argument that the grain bins may be used for another purpose is a ridiculous one. No one with any knowledge of the economic situation on the prairies at the present time would believe that a farmer would put up special bins just for the sake of getting a tax rebate. Interest rates alone would rule this out. I maintain that when a farmer puts up a grain storage bin, whether it looks like a granary or not it should be accepted as such provided it holds grain. The Saskatchewan government recognized this principle when it returned the 5 per cent sales tax, and I can see no reason why the federal government should not carry out the intent of its promise to western agriculture in connection with this rebate.

I have one final comment. I am a farmer and if I were erecting another bin on my farm I would probably choose a quonset type of construction because it would make the best sense. If I were to follow the government's logic I would be dissuaded from doing so. The situation to which I have drawn attention occurs frequently on the prairies. These farmers have a case in equity, and it should be considered.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) was surprised to find that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) was not replying to this question. However, since this question concerns the 11 per cent sales tax it is a matter for the Minister of National Revenue. The complaint was that the farmer in question did not get a refund of the 11 per cent sales tax. However, the law provides that the farmer can get this 11 per cent back from his supplier, so maybe there is something wrong in that connection.

This is the answer which the minister has given: The Excise Tax Act imposes the sales tax on the manufacturer, and the department is bound by law to refund this tax to the manufacturer who paid it where the goods are sold under tax exempt conditions. As a result, when a manufacturer of grain storage bins sells them under tax exempt conditions to farmers, exemption should be allowed; but if the tax is charged, the department must refund it to the manufacturer and the farmer should seek reimbursement from the manufacturer. It is normally the practice of manufacturers who have received refunds of sales tax to pass the credit along to their customers. If a farmer applies to the department for a refund of the 11 per cent sales tax on a grain storage bin, he is advised to request a credit of the amount of sales tax paid by the manufacturer on the grain storage bin, from his supplier.

It seems to me that it is the procedure used by the Saskatchewan government that has changed; the law still provides that the farmer can get a refund of sales tax from the supplier. If the hon. member has any specific cases of the government having received the refund from the manufacturer, perhaps he would bring them to the attention of the minister.

AIR TRANSPORT—CTC DECISION RESPECTING PRAIRIE SERVICES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, this is a sad occasion for responsible parliamentary democracy in this House. I noticed that one parliamentary secretary gave prepared replies to the questions that have already been raised tonight. Obviously these replies do not take account of anything that the hon. members might have said in their remarks. This is the second occasion tonight on which I have had to refer to the fact that ministers are derelict in their duty. It is doubly tragic because most of the problems raised concern western Canada, which is passing through an extremely difficult time of economic distress.

The matter I wish to raise tonight I raised over a week ago. It concerns the decision of the Air Transport Commission to downgrade the quality of air service into western Manitoba. In reply to me, as reported at page 3012 of Hansard, the minister said:

> I do not wish to anticipate, but it is my understanding that no service will be discontinued and that the modifications and adjustments contemplated will result in a more viable service being provided to all points now being served. I think a form of rationalization has been undertaken. Once the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission is released, if my hon. friend is still of the opinion that the matter ought to be pursued further I will do whatever is in my competence to do.

Following the announcement that service was being suspended and that the regional air policy, as it affects western Manitoba, was being downgraded from class 1 to class 2 service, I asked a question in the House. In reply to my further question the minister said, as reported at page 3131 of Hansard:

> —if it is a matter which could be the subject of appeal to me presumably somebody will appeal it and I will look at it in that form.

The city of Brandon has appealed the decision of the Air Transport Commission. It is unfair, unjust and inequitable so far as this part of western Canada is concerned. I should like a reply from the minister in regard to a very difficult economic situation that flows from the decision of the commission. The airport, which is actually in the constituency of Marquette and serves an important area of industrial development, has been operating under a government subsidy required for first-class service. It is important to know, in the interests of economic development, whether the subsidy will continue with second-class service. The problem arises from the fact that the landing fees, for example, for second-class service will no longer provide the level of support that has hitherto been provided. It is urgent that the people concerned have some understanding in this regard.

Second, a new passenger terminal is now being constructed at this airport with the concurrence of the Department of Transport, which is participating to the extent of $89,000. This is a commitment in writing and it is imperative that we know just where the commitment stands at the moment. Unfortunately, the effective date is February 16, next Monday. I trust that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), who has in his replies shown a great deal of sympathy and understanding for this problem in terms of ensuring equity and fair treatment for all parts of Canada, will give the matter his urgent consideration.

I trust the parliamentary secretary will communicate to him what I have endeavoured to say tonight with respect to subsidizing Air Canada. Air Canada is indirectly subsidizing many communities by providing service. I should also point out that the huge, government expenditures which are to be made in central Canada, running into hundreds of millions of dollars, to keep pace with the rapidly expanding air age are perhaps necessary. I very sincerely point out, also, that western Canada must keep pace with this rapidly expanding air age, and I suggest to the government that this area is entitled to a fair share of government support.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are a busy man tonight.

Mr. Loiselle: Yes, I am a pinch-hitter. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris was complaining at the beginning that he was surprised to see that the parliamentary secretary had prepared replies. Did he expect an unprepared answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), which would indicate a reopening of the post offices which are closed? I believe I gave a good answer to the question regarding sales tax. I feel that the answers prepared for me are of assistance.

What I am now going to tell the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is what the minister would have told him. He knows that the minister is interested in the western area and will consider the economic situation of that part of the country. I shall not review the CTC decision because the hon. member knows there are procedures provided by law for this. However, I wish to tell him that I am informed that Midwest, a subsidiary of Transair, is continuing to provide service to Brandon using Viscount and Hawker-Siddeley 748 aircraft on a frequency and as a part of a route pattern that was established several years ago.

The CTC has authorized Midwest to provide another sort of service, one that might be identified as being specially designed to accommodate the needs of the community. It is anticipated that the new service will be instituted in a matter of weeks, upon the publication of new flight schedules. In the meantime, I am told that Midwest is doing its best to collaborate with representatives of the people of Brandon in making arrangements for the commencement of the new service.

Having regard to the new argument the hon. member has put forward tonight, I assure him the minister will take note of it. If we have more information than I have given tonight, it will be the minister's pleasure to provide the House with this information.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I understand that under Standing Order 40(4) I am entitled to ask a question, after the 30-minute period, about future House business. In future when we are considering these late-show questions, if it would not be asking too much of the government perhaps it would have in the House the parliamentary secretaries involved with the questions to be debated. I have no quarrel with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport; it is not his problem. Surely these people can get up off their fannies and get here at night to answer these questions.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Loiselle: The hon. member should know that the Minister of Communications has no parliamentary secretary, and neither has the Minister of National Revenue.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. THOMPSON—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TOWARD ADJOURNMENT DEBATE

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to the adjournment debate, and specifically to the adjournment debate of last night involving three grievances raised by opposition members.

The adjournment debate was instituted following a trial period to allow members on both sides to raise questions about problems to which the government had not given satisfactory answers. I am convinced that this procedure has worked well in the past. However, I am concerned that, because of the growing and obvious disregard of the government toward questions raised by backbenchers, not only is the adjournment debate being relegated to the position of being a useless appendage but the institution of Parliament is being downgraded as well. Likewise—and this is why I am forced to appeal to Your Honour at this time—the rights of members of this House are being disregarded to the extent that our usefulness, either in debate or in representing our constituents, is being aborted.

Specifically, in the adjournment debate last night I raised a question regarding the policy of the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications and the Post Office Department to close all low income post offices in the country. While agreeing to this policy as it relates to some low income rural post offices, I questioned the validity of the blanket policy of closing all such post offices. I cited three cases, and had time permitted would have added a fourth, where the closing of the post office not only had an unjust and an adverse effect on the community but where the rural route delivery replacement service would be more expensive than the cost of continuing the present rural post office. I also questioned the minister as to why he refused to seek the opinions of the citizens concerned, and why local officials who were familiar with the situation were not consulted before taking such action.

My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is simply that neither the Minister of Communications nor his Parliamentary Secretary were present in the House last night to hear my question. Instead, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport read a prepared statement which had no relevance whatsoever to the question I raised because it was prepared before my question had been heard. I believe that this is a transgression of the rights of the members of this House.

I would also say that the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley followed me with a question relating to the storage of grain, and again the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport read a prepared statement which was absolutely irrelevant to the question that was raised.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because you are the honourable custodian of our rights, and because you are the one to whom we must appeal when we are in difficulty, as we are here, I appeal to Your Honour to take note of this question of privilege and to take such action as is necessary to bring the government to recognize its responsibility to the members of this House in adjournment debates.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member for Red Deer has, according to the regulations and the Standing Orders, given me notice of the question he wanted to raise at this time in our proceedings, I think I should direct his attention and the attention of hon. members to the provisions of the relevant Standing Order 40(3) which refers to the proceedings at ten o'clock. It states in part:

> A Minister of the Crown, or a Parliamentary Secretary speaking on behalf of a minister, if he wishes to do so, may speak for not more than three minutes.

The hon. member will recognize that the terms of the Standing Order, which is a regulation of the House, as it now stands actually allow any minister or a parliamentary secretary to any minister to answer a question posed to any other minister. Because of this it is quite in order under the Standing Orders as they now exist for a Parliamentary Secretary to reply to a question directed to any minister.

Perhaps the Standing Order should be amended, corrected or changed in such a way that the discussion we have at the time of adjournment would be more relevant, but the Standing Order is there for the Chair to enforce. I have no authority, of course, to change it on my own initiative.

From time to time I have suggested that the procedures of the House and our Standing Orders might be looked into by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. This may very well be a Standing Order that should be considered by the members of this committee. I understand that the committee will be sitting in the near future. If it might be of assistance to hon. members I would certainly be pleased to mention to the House Leaders of the different parties the suggestion of the hon. member and invite them, if they think it could be of assistance, to consider the point raised at this time by the hon. member for Red Deer.

I think I should also bring to the attention of the hon. member who raised this question the provisions of Citation 181(3) of Beauchesne. I am sure it is well known to the hon. member. It states:

> A Minister may decline to answer a question without stating the reason for his refusal, and insistence on an answer is out of order, no debate being allowed. A refusal to answer cannot be raised as a question of privilege, nor is it regular to comment upon such refusal.

I refer to this citation to point out the fact that this cannot be raised as a question of privilege. In any event, I have received notice but no motion has been proposed to follow up the point raised by the hon. member. In these circumstances I think it would not be in order to have a discussion at this time on the point raised by the hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, may I make one clarifying statement on a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a further question of privilege I will allow him to put it. He should realize that if he is allowed to go into the matter further we might well get into a debate on the matter, and I suggest to him there should be no debate. If the hon. member has a question of privilege, then according to the procedures of the House I have to recognize him.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, my question of privilege is not designed to precipitate a debate but rather to make a clarifying statement. I was not only appealing to Your Honour in respect of my question of privilege regarding the interpretation of the Standing Order to which you have referred in reference to Parliamentary Secretaries and ministers but also in respect of the fact that a prepared statement was read without my question having been taken into consideration. It could not have been considered because it had not been heard. It is this transgression and erosion of the rights of myself and other Members of Parliament that doubly concerns me.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should not again comment on the hon. member's further point. As he knows, it happens from time to time that not only are answers prepared a few minutes before they are delivered but questions are prepared a few minutes before they are asked in the House. It would be difficult for the Chair to determine whether the questions or the answers are spontaneous or the product of previous reflection. In any event, I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member. It is one of importance. To give effect to the suggestion of the hon. member I will consider it my duty to bring this point to the attention of the committee.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not quite hear part of Your Honour's remarks. Do I understand that Your Honour would entertain discussion on the ruling—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is the last thing in the world I would entertain at this time.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TABLING OF CLOSING STATEMENT OF NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PRICE STABILITY

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table in both official languages copies of the closing statement of the national conference on price stability and to express my congratulations to the Prices and Incomes Commission for its participation in this conference.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the minister intends to make a statement outlining the government's intention in respect of the closing statement of the conference?

Mr. Basford: Not a statement on motions, but I am here for the question period.

MAIN ESTIMATES, 1970-71

EXPLANATORY STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE TREASURY BOARD

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1971, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board), and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in tabling the estimates referred to in the message just read I should like to point out that these estimates for 1970-71 amount in total to $12,910 million, approximately $892 million or 7.4 per cent more than the total estimates of $12,018 million for 1969-70. Statutory expenditures, those which result from firm commitments provided for in existing legislation, are going up by 11.5 per cent. On the other hand, growth in expenditures for which Parliament will be asked to appropriate funds—the category in which the government has flexibility in the allocation of resources—has been restrained to a rate of 3.8 per cent.

The comparable increase between 1968-69 and 1969-70 that I indicated when I tabled the 1969-70 estimates at this time last year was $1,032 million or 9.5 per cent. The year-to-year increase has therefore been reduced by $140 million, or by more than two percentage points.

The total supplementary estimates for 1969-70 are expected to be $160 million or about the same as the supplementary estimates of $152 million for 1968-69. This compares with $392 million in 1967-68 and even larger amounts in the preceding few years. Any requirement for supplementary estimates in 1970-71 to meet urgent and unforeseen needs will be kept to a minimum in line with the determination of the government to restrain expenditures as an anti-inflationary measure.

Statutory expenditures, those which result from firm commitments provided for in existing legislation, will amount to $6,323 million or 49 per cent of the total estimates.

Statement of Estimates

Virtually all of the increase of $651 million in these expenditures falls under the following three headings:

1. Public Debt
Servicing charges	$195	million
2. Payments to the Provinces
Fiscal transfers	156	"
Hospital Insurance	95	"
Medicare	70	"
Post-secondary Education	49	"
Canada Assistance Plan	38	"
3. Wheat
Carrying costs on temporary wheat reserves and advance grain payments	44	"

It can thus be seen that of the over-all increase, $651 million, or 73 per cent, is taken up by statutory expenditures, and of that amount, $408 million is required for increased payments to the provinces.

• (2:20 p.m.)

At this point I might mention that the provincial governments were asked during the last several weeks to provide us with the most up-to-date forecasts of their expenditures under the Canada Assistance Plan and the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act and for medicare and post-secondary education. Their latest forecasts are consistent with the amounts shown in the estimates being tabled today.

The expenditures for which Parliament will be asked to appropriate funds, the category where the government has flexibility in the allocation of resources, amount to $6,587 million or 51 per cent of the estimates. Additional resources in the amount of $293 million are going to the following few programs to which the government is giving high priority:

Regional economic expansion, an increase of $75 million; bilingualism development, an increase of $52 million; postal services, an increase of $36 million; Indian and Eskimo affairs, an increase of $34 million; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, including police services for the provinces, an increase of $26 million; air services, an increase of $22 million; development and utilization of manpower, an increase of $21 million; international development assistance, an increase of $15 million; incentives to industry for technological innovation and development, an increase of $12 million.

Since the over-all increase in items requiring to be voted annually by parliament totals $241 million, and the above-listed priority programs are increased by $293 million, the combined 1970-71 budgets of all other programs in this category have been reduced from 1969-70 by a net total of $52 million, to an amount of $4,698 million. This reduction, and the resulting requirement to absorb salary and price increases within this lower total allocation means a considerable decrease in real terms of the cost of these programs.

Leaving aside the servicing of the public debt for which there is no option but to pay, the programs for which increases are provided relate to the basic priorities of the country: national unity, social justice, education and economic development here in Canada and in the developing countries.

The planned levels of strength in the Public Service continue the downward trend indicated in the estimates of 1969-70. The table which appears on page LXX of these estimates shows that this downward trend will continue in 1970-71 and indicates a reduction of about 7,500 in the planned level of continuing employment.

The tabling of these estimates marks a major step forward in an endeavour by the government to improve the process of resource allocation and to better inform Parliament and the people of Canada of the objectives, operations and costs of the departments and agencies of government. The form of these estimates is radically different from that which has been followed for more than half a century. For the first time the expenditure proposals respecting departments and agencies are clearly formulated in terms of programs. The objectives and sub-objectives of each program are stated and the nature of the program further amplified through a description of the activities carried on in pursuit of program objectives.

The aggregate of expenditures proposed to Parliament for each program is classified first in terms of these activities and second in terms of the portions of the aggregate to be devoted respectively to operations, to capital and to grants and contributions. Data are provided, under the same classifications, for the forecast expenditure for 1969-70 and the actual expenditure for 1968-69.

When a program involves large expenditures on capital there is provided a table listing the major projects and showing for each the expected total cost distributed between expenditures up to and including the current year, the expenditures forecast for 1970-71 and the subsequent total until completion.

[Mr. Drury.]

In previous estimates all items for loans, investments and advances were grouped together at the back of the Blue Book. In the new form such items are shown alongside the related budgetary expenditures in order to be more informative.

Greater detail on manpower, on grants and contributions and on revolving funds for quasi-commercial operations is provided. Improvement has also been made in the information provided on Crown corporations.

The Blue Book contains for the first time an explanatory foreword which seeks to clarify the technical terms used which, in the past, may have been difficult to understand. Included in the foreword are a number of tables summarizing the details of the estimates which will help to provide a better over-all picture.

All of this material is contained in one bilingual volume replacing the separate English and French Blue Books of former years. I have no doubt that our experience in the House and in committees reviewing estimates will suggest further modifications in form. We will be glad to receive suggestions for further improvement.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the estimates in the form I am now tabling provide a clearer and more informative presentation than we have had heretofore of the proposed allocations of fiscal resources to the budgetary requirements of Canada.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks should be directed to the form of the estimates that are being provided to us. I think it will be an interesting innovation to handle them in this way. I do not want to appear to be nitpicking, but in the past the Auditor General's report was always deemed to be too thick and cumbersome and the books came apart and this year the Blue Book of estimates exceeds in size even the biggest report ever made by the Auditor General. It may be a matter of mechanics but we will see how it works out. That is my comment in that regard.

There is another comment I would make with regard to the form of the estimates. I refer to the insistence upon the publication of strengths of departments only on the basis of man-years required. I would say this is deceptive in many ways. It does not show the distribution of personnel within a department to the degree that is really warranted for the examination of the estimates and the various salary levels, now that we know that confidential instructions have been issued by the Treasury Board with regard to salaries and the non-disclosure of salaries at certain executive levels, particularly with regard to premiums or merit pay. The presentation of the estimates in this form conceals information from members who are entitled to pass on the salary levels and conditions of employment of the government.

With regard to the size of the estimates I do not think anybody who has taken a good look at the totality of the estimates last year and in past years could doubt there would be an increase. The estimates are now approaching $13 billion. Last year the total was just under $12 billion, and with the supplementary estimates the amount will have gone just over the $12 billion mark.

When we consider that in 1963-64 the total estimates or total expenditures of the government were just over $6.4 billion we can see that the series of Liberal administrations has more than doubled government expenditures at the federal level. We have complained from time to time that this government follows the practice of taxing up to expenditures. It is for this reason that we are facing continuous surcharges or additional taxes. Now that the government tax proposals essentially increase tax rates under a so-called simplification of the tax tables—

• (2:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: No, no!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —it is part of the answer that we see this year an increase of some $900 million in expenditures.

Mr. Stanfield: I thought they were going to reduce them.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In the Department of National Health and Welfare hospital insurance, of course, is costing close to $100 million more this year and medicare $70 million more. The President of the Treasury Board did not disclose whether any provision had been made for possible expenditures if the province of Quebec should come into the medicare program. If that were to be the case then any remarks he has made with respect to supplementary estimates would be quite irrelevant because they would certainly be a long way off the mark.

We will see in the press tonight, after its members have had an opportunity to examine these estimates in detail, comment on the highlights of this program. I trust that the committees of the House will also look at these estimates very closely, Mr. Speaker.

As a general conclusion may I say it seems to me that once we see which departments have been given their head and what is happening to them as far as their personnel and spending programs are concerned, we will be able to judge whether the austerity program initiated last August was a true austerity program or an attempted exercise in public relations.

PRIVILEGE

MR. THOMPSON—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT TOWARD ADJOURNMENT DEBATE—REQUEST FOR CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington, that the question of privilege raised by myself earlier today be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

Mr. Trudeau: I did.

An hon. Member: You fellows get used to saying no at home.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL DEFENCE BUILDING, LEBRETON FLATS

Question No. 455—Mr. Winch:

1. What expenditures were made on all aspects of the planning and design of the Department of National Defence Building that was to have been constructed in Lebreton Flats?

2. What are the expenditures both actual and estimated, to date, required to redesign the proposed Department of Transport building to suit the needs of the Department of National Defence?

3. Were any on-site preparations undertaken for the proposed Lebreton Flats building and what were the costs?

4. What, if any, are the plans for the use of the Lebreton Flats site formerly intended for the Department of National Defence?

Questions

5. Would the government of Canada reconsider its decision and give first priority to the construction of the Department of Transport building?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. $1,355,-885.95.

2. Accommodation requirements for the Department of National Defence are presently under review.

3. In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned: Costs of soil investigation and surveys $40,355. No other on-site preparation was undertaken by the Department of Public Works.

In so far as the National Capital Commission is concerned: To make the site available for NDHQ or other uses, the NCC has been proceeding with a program of relocation of Hydro and Telephone trunk services at an estimated cost of $692,000.

4. The use of LeBreton Flats for a combination of public and private uses is now under study by the NCC.

5. No.

PUBLIC SERVICE LANGUAGE TRAINING

Question No. 634—Mr. Coates:

1. How many individuals have been provided with language training in the Public Service of Canada who have completed their training and how many were provided with training in English and how many with training in French?

2. How many individuals in the Public Service of Canada are presently taking language training in (a) English (b) French?

3. How many individuals in the Public Service of Canada have been informed that they must secure a working knowledge of a second language, or (a) they will not be able to continue in the position they presently hold, or (b) they will be dismissed from the Public Service and, in each instance, was the second language requirement English or French?

4. How many individuals have received demotions in the Public Service of Canada because they did not have a working knowledge of a second language and, in each instance, what was the language of the individual in question?

5. What has been the total cost to the federal Treasury for the provision of language training to members of the Public Service since the inception of the language training program and what is the breakdown between the cost of providing training in English and in French?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Public Service Commission, the Department of Veterans Affairs, and the National Film Board as follows: 1. The number of Public Servants and employees of Crown Corporations who have been provided with language training in each year since the program was initiated in 1964 is as follows:

Year	In English	In French	Total
1963-64	10	32	42
1964-65	83	625	708
1965-66	368	2,425	2,793
1966-67	766	2,422	3,188

Of the above, 549 have completed English training and 455 French training at the Advanced Level. It is not known how many Public Servants may have been enrolled in second language training programs not falling under the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission.

2. Between July 27, 1969, to December 17, 1969, 400 Public Servants and employees of a number of Crown Corporations have been attending English courses and 2,950 French courses. It is not known how many Public Servants are presently enrolled in second language training programs not under the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission.

3. At the Public Service Commission no one has been informed that he (or she) must secure a working knowledge of second language or he (or she) will not be able to continue in his (or her) present position or that he (or she) will be dismissed from the Public Service.

However, administrative trainees are informed during their interviews that a working knowledge of the second official language is part of their employment contract. To this day none have refused to honour this part of their employment contract. The Commission presently employs six administrative trainees whose mother tongue is French and six whose mother tongue is English.

During the current staff reductions in the Department of Veterans Affairs two stenographers in Montreal have been declared surplus, partly because their language skills are only in English. Both of these employees have been offered alternative positions in the Department.

4. None.

5. From 1964 to the mid-point of the 1969-70 fiscal year, the total expenditures of the Language Bureau in providing language training to members of the Public Service will be about 15 million dollars. No precise breakdown can be given with respect to the training expenditures for English and French.

Pro-rated on the basis of enrollments, approximately 25 per cent would have been spent on teaching English and 75 per cent on teaching French.

In addition to the Public Service Commission's expenditures the National Film Board spent $112,000 for French training and $28,000 for English training.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT RESEARCH CENTRE

Question No. 742—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. What is the estimated cost of the proposed International Development Research Centre?

2. Where is this Centre to be located?

3. Is consideration presently being given to changing this proposed site and, if so, to what area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. A minimum of $30 million would be allocated for the administration and programs of the IDRC over the first five years.

2. National Capital Region.

3. No. Bill C-12 provides that the Board of Governors, with the approval of the Governor-in-Council, may move the location to another place in Canada.

*TERMINATION OF SERVICE NOTICES, DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Question No. 791—Mr. Diefenbaker:

How many veterans of World War II, by provinces, have received notices terminating their services in the Department of Veterans Affairs since September 1, 1969?

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study by economist David F. Smith of the Mechanical Transport Branch, Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce on "The Effects of Canada-United States Wage Parity Upon the Cost Structure of the Canadian Automotive Industries".

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that this study is an internal departmental document which contains privileged information received in confidence from the industry and therefore cannot be tabled. On this basis, the minister would ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion be transferred for debate because of the shaky nature of this industry.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

PROGRAM TO ENHANCE PRODUCTIVITY

Motion No. 174—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the preliminary cost-benefit study on the new program of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to enhance productivity (PEP) as referred to in reply to Question No. 1,955 as reported in Hansard of June 4, 1969.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that this study will not be tabled. This program is still in the early stages of development and subject to change, and it would not be in the public interest to table a preliminary analysis outlined in an internal working document. The minister hopes the hon. member will withdraw his motion.

Mr. Saltsman: I agree to withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Motion dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

DEVELOPMENT OF ANTI-SMOG DEVICES

Motion No. 194—Mr. Skoberg:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., provided to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs by the United States Justice Department on anti-combines matters related to auto manufacturers and a conspiracy to delay development of anti-smog devices.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the material called for by this motion constitutes privileged communication between two governments, the publication of which would impair the usefulness of such exchanges. I ask the hon. member to consent to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, the minister's explanation is not acceptable. Please transfer this motion for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motions for Papers

TRADE PROMOTION COST—SALES RATIO

Motion No. 202—Mr. Broadbent:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the study on the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce trade promotion policies showing a 12:1 cost-sales ratio as stated by Mr. P. Schutte, Chief of the Trade Fairs Abroad Division of the Department.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that the documents and reports from which this information is derived are internal working matter provided to the department by private firms on the understanding that they will be kept in confidence and used internally only. Publicizing such information would be a breach of this confidence and would make it difficult to obtain such data in the future. In view of this, the minister would ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the statement that publicizing these documents would constitute a breach of confidence. I therefore refuse to accept the answer and ask that this motion be transferred for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COMBINES—QUININE—CORRESPONDENCE PROVIDED BY U.S.

Motion No. 205—Mr. Saltsman:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence, memoranda, etc., provided to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs by the United States Justice Department on anti-combines matters related to international drug companies and the price of quinine.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the material called for by this motion constitutes privileged communication between two governments, the publication of which would impair the usefulness of such written exchanges. I hope that the hon. member would consent to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not think he will, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

[Mr. Speaker.]

CANADIAN TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Motion No. 217—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Gherzi Textile Organization on the Canadian textile industry undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1966-67, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

INDUSTRIAL PUBLIC RELATIONS STUDY

Motion No. 228—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Public Industrial Relations Limited, a public relations study, undertaken for the Department of Labour in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE BOARD LOANS

Motion No. 259—Mrs. MacInnis:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the list of the 77 firms receiving loans from the Adjustment Assistance Board as mentioned in answer to Question Number 2,490 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that it has always been the practice of the Adjustment Assistance Board not to reveal the names of its borrowers. This policy is in line with that taken by term lenders in the private sector. In view of this, the minister would ask the member to withdraw her motion.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, since our taxpayers provide the funds for this board I think they have the right to know who obtains the loans. May this be transferred for debate, please?

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

RESEARCH STUDIES, CRTC ECONOMICS BRANCH

Motion No. 271—Mr. Rose:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the research studies by the Economics Branch of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission on satellites, CATV, microwave and CATV, commercial policy, extension of service, FM radio, integration and rationalization of Canadian broadcasting, mentioned in answer to Question Number 82 as reported in Hansard on page 1137, November 24, 1969.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Radio-Television Commission advises me that the studies mentioned in notice of motion No. 271 for production of papers are based on privileged financial information communicated to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, in accordance with the Statistics Act.

For the above-mentioned reasons and as a result of the request made by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, I would ask the hon. member to kindly withdraw that motion.

[English]

Mr. Rose: Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

REPORT ON ATTITUDES OF INDIAN PEOPLE

Motion No. 300—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report on attitudes of Indian people based mainly on a visit to the Six Nations Reserve on July 16, 1969, submitted to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by Berger, Tisdal, Clark and Lesley Ltd., as referred to on page 6 of the quarterly report on public relations activity, June, July, August, 1969 by the said Berger, Tisdall, Clark and Lesley Ltd.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stand.

Mr. Speaker: Stand.

FEASIBILITY REPORT ON ALBERTA-MONTREAL PIPELINE

Motion No. 308—Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the feasibility report prepared in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the construction of an oil pipeline from Alberta to Montreal.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as the House was informed in response to a similar inquiry earlier last year, internal working papers have been prepared from time to time on various oil policy questions. However, these papers are privileged matter and cannot be tabled. In view of this, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce would hope the hon. member would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has quoted from this report and has made known what purports to be the conclusion of the report, it seems to me hon. members are entitled to it.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

TARIFF BOARD REPORT ON BINDER TWINE

Motion No. 343—Mr. Salisman:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Tariff Board Report on Binder Twine for Bailing Farm Produce.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker the requested report was tabled in the House by the Minister of Finance on June 20, 1969 as sessional paper 85B. In the circumstances perhaps the hon. member will agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at last we have found out how to obtain information: We must ask for something we already have.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—CONSENSUS REACHED BY NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PRICE STABILITY—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who I am sure will be very frank and full in his disclosures.

Mr. Bell: Mostly full.

Mr. Stanfield: I would ask the minister whether the government, having virtually reviled and spat upon guidelines as an instrument for fighting inflation for two years while inflation galloped along, is now prepared to adopt as a guideline for 1970 the consensus reported to have been widely adopted yesterday and the day before with regard to price restraint?

Mr. Benson: Who spat on the Prices and Incomes Commission?

Mr. Speaker: May I point out to the Leader of the Opposition that the question as asked is not proper. If he will refer to the relevant references and citations I am sure he will agree with me that the question was perhaps not in accordance with the procedural requirements of the House. However, since the question has been asked, perhaps the minister might now reply.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I congratulated the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission yesterday on the announcement that was made. I think it represents an extremely useful initiative. There are many implications flowing from the statement on pricing criteria made last night. We shall be meeting within the next few days with members of the commission to consider what implications there are for government. We shall also be discussing with all provincial governments the implications flowing from the statement. We shall be discussing them with the provincial premiers on Monday.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister tell the House what sort of proposition the government intends to make to the provinces with regard to the guideline or consensus which was achieved? Specifically, what support does the government want from the provinces?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I have said in the House before that I hope we shall make the program of the Prices and Incomes Commission as effective as possible. What the government of Canada's position with the provincial premiers will be on Monday and Tuesday is, I think, a proper subject for the Prime Minister to deal with.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to propose any legislation to the House with regard to this matter? Does the government intend to rely simply on moral suasion or does it propose to take punitive action, if necessary, in order to enforce this consensus?

Mr. Sharp: What do you advocate?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I must repeat what I have said. We are studying with the commission the implications of what has taken place—

Mr. Stanfield: You have no policy at all. Sit down.

Mr. Benson: You have no ideas either.

Mr. Basford: —and whether further action is called for or not will be announced in due course.

Mr. Stanfield: You have no policy.

Mr. Basford: I should think, from my reading of the hon. gentleman's speeches over a period of time, that he would welcome the statement that was made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: You have no policy. We have had two years of talking and doing nothing.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister about the price stability conference which concluded its hearings yesterday. Inasmuch as the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission indicated that the next step is to take this matter to the federal-provincial conference, does the government of Canada intend to ask the provinces to take concurrent action to give to the Prices and Incomes Commission the power to make the agreement reached in the last few days applicable, to use Dr. Young's words, to the entire business economy? Does the government intend to ask the provinces to give the commission the power of sanction so as to deal with price increases which have already been put into effect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs just said—

An hon. Member: He has not said anything.

Mr. Stanfield: No. He has not said anything.

Mr. Crouse: Neither has the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously you do not want information.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission indicated that the agreement reached in the last few days must now go before the federal-provincial conference, may I ask what proposals the Prime Minister intends to place before the provincial premiers in order to make any agreement that was reached effective for the entire Canadian economy?

Mr. Woolliams: He does not know the answer.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister does not seem to have any information today, may I go back to the well that was proven dry awhile ago, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can he say if the moratorium on increases in copper prices, freight rates and the prices of other commodities which was to be effective until March 1 will expire on that date or continue for the balance of 1970 in compliance with the agreement reached yesterday?

Mr. Basford: The agreements made between the government and these particular companies to roll back prices, as announced by the Minister of Finance, run out on March 1. Their status after that date will, I think, depend on the reaction of the governments next week to the proposals which were agreed upon last night.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Since industrialists, businessmen and bankers who took part in the price stabilization conference seem to take this matter seriously, being satisfied to lunch on a sandwich or a bowl of soup, is not the government considering as an austerity measure to launch such a practice for ministers, hon. members and officials in parliamentary restaurants?

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice. Has the minister been requested by any of his colleagues to consider the form of any legislation which might be required to give effect to any consensus which may have been arrived at, or any arrangements which may be reached with the provincial governments? Has he asked the law officers of his department to consider the drafting of such legislation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I do not think I can answer the question in those terms. We are, of course, concerned to see that anything the federal government does to ensure the economic stability of this country is done in a constitutional way.

Mr. Baldwin: Am I to take it that no consideration has been given so far to bringing in legislation?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Well—

Mr. Trudeau: Are you sore this went so well?

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I direct a supplementary question either to the petulant Prime Minister or to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and ask either one of them whether the contents of the agreement reached at the close of the conference yesterday were discussed with the government or with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, or whether the contents of the agreement were entirely in the hands of Dr. Young and his associates on the commission?

Mr. Basford: I told the House some time ago that there had been close discussion between members of the commission and officials of the various departments of government. I told the House on Monday, I believe, that officials of my department and other departments were present as observers at the conference.

Mr. Lewis: I did not ask whether they were present as observers. Would the minister inform us whether the officials of his department or of any other department participated in the conference which led to the particular conclusions reached, and whether they advised Dr. Young and his associates, or whether the commission acted entirely on its own, away from those officials?

Mr. Basford: The departmental officials were there; they were observing and they were aware of the documents put before the commission and the positions taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

After increases in prices and interest rates, here we have 250 businessmen, bankers, etc. who reach an agreement. Can the minister say whether the agreements made during the conference will prompt the government to consider the real problem of Canadians: the consumer's chronic lack of purchasing power?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this question may be allowed. The minister might ponder the hon. member's proposition.

INFLATION—ACTION TO SEEK CO-OPERATION OF UNIONS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

As labour leaders did not participate in the discussions with the Prices and Incomes Commission, what steps does the Canadian government intend to take to initiate talks with union leaders with a view to having them take part in this voluntary restraint program?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I would hope, as I am sure all Canadians would, that the union movement in Canada will be as helpful as possible.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question following that one I directed earlier to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Are there at present consultations or meetings between officials of his department and the unions in order to discuss the voluntary restraint program suggested by the Prices and Incomes Commission a few days ago?

[English]

Mr. Basford: For the present, the Chairman of the commission is meeting with the government with regard to the implications of the statement which was made last night. I do not think a new initiative will be taken along the lines suggested by the hon. member until at least the federal-provincial conference is over.

LABOUR RELATIONS

FORT GARRY HOTEL STRIKE—USE OF OTHER PERSONNEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had one question I wanted to put to two ministers, and thus save time. The Minister of Labour and the Minister of Transport were the ministers I had in mind. But in the absence of the Minister of Labour, may I direct my question to the Minister of Transport, and perhaps there could be some discussion about it between him and his colleague. In view of the fact that there is a legal strike in process at the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg, and in view of the fact that management is flying in personnel from other parts of Canada, which seems to be an effort to break the strike, will the minister and his colleague let us know whether it is government policy to engage in strike-breaking of this kind?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may realize that his question contains allegations of some kind. However, the minister may wish to reply to the substance.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to look into the matter. This is the first intimation I have had concerning it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister discuss this with his colleague the Minister of Labour because, after all, both departments are certainly concerned?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

VANCOUVER LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON SITUATION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Labour will be back shortly, or whether he himself will report to the House now or delegate somebody else to do so concerning what is going on in the port of Vancouver? I know that hon. members to my left are sympathetic to the situation in which the western farmers find themselves, but the ports are still closed and I think we are entitled to get an answer.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The minister is due back in the House on Monday, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Rome burns while the Prime Minister fiddles.

TRANSPORT

APPLICATION BY GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY TO BUILD RIGHT-OF-WAY TO HAUL COAL

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister whether his attention and the attention of the government have been drawn to the application of a United States railway company, the Great Northern, to build a right-of-way in British Columbia for the purpose of hauling Canadian coal destined for Japan? If so, what action has the government taken on the matter?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Of course our attention has been called to it. It is a matter which is now before the Canadian Transport Commission. The commission will deal with it in the normal way, and until such time as they have dealt with it it does not appear that any action is required either on the part of the Department of Transport or on the part of the government.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question. Inasmuch as the government of British Columbia seems to be closely involved in these matters, could the minister indicate whether he has had conversations with representatives of that government?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker, I have not.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the neutrality of the Canadian Transport Commission in matters of this kind, since it is a judicial body, does the minister not think that the Department of Transport or the government of Canada should be represented by counsel acting as an intervener or holding a watching brief?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, that proposal is worth consideration and I will be glad to give it such consideration.

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN THROUGH PORT OF VANCOUVER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport appears to be the only minister, other than the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, who has not taken the vow of silence. Therefore I ask him, in the absence of the Minister of Labour, whether he can make any report that will give hope to the farmers of western Canada that transport will continue to be provided and that the loading of wheat will continue at Vancouver between now and Monday next, when the Minister of Labour will return once more to the House.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, all I can say in reply to that question is that the National Harbours Board, for which I report, is ready to proceed as soon as a decision is made about the settlement of the strike. I assume that the only thing that can be done at the moment is to wait until the result of the vote is released tonight. If the result is satisfactory, we will move at once; if not, as the Minister of Labour has indicated, other steps will be taken.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the vote is not favourable, will the House and the country have to wait until the minister returns on Monday?

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the interval, while the government is dilly-dallying, could some boxcars not be diverted to Thunder Bay, rather than waiting for a decision with regard to the west coast ports?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that I would scarcely call an appropriate and proper procedure, in terms of voting, "dilly-dallying". If there is a delay beyond tonight, an indication has already been given in this House that steps will be taken to get the grain moving as fast as possible.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour undertake to report tomorrow to the House and to the people of Canada the result of the vote.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will be in touch with the Minister of Labour this afternoon and will take that matter into consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED U.S. NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A couple of weeks ago, I believe, the minister indicated that the government of Canada had not at that time decided whether to make representations to the government of the United States, as it did on a previous occasion, expressing opposition to the United States decision to explode a massive nuclear bomb underground in the north Pacific. Is the minister prepared to make an early statement on Canada's position?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on February 4, in answer to a similar question by the hon.

member for Fundy-Royal, I said we were expecting to obtain from the United States the results of the previous explosion, and that we would examine these results before deciding whether it was appropriate for us to make any further representations.

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—SITUATION RESPECTING TANKER "ARROW"—REMOVAL OF WARNING BUOY—LIABILITY COVERAGE

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I wonder whether the minister could clarify conflicting statements as to the position of the stern of the tanker Arrow and what is happening to it in view of what he said on Monday about moving it out to sea and sinking it or pumping out the bunker oil.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not surprised at the hon. member's confusion. I have had the suspicion sometimes that there are times when he cannot tell his bow from his stern. Apart from that, the position at the moment is that there are very high winds and 15-foot waves prevailing in the area. Three tugs have a line aboard on the stern portion of the ship. It is shifting on the rock ledge but has not yet moved off the rock ledge. The intention is to keep it on the ledge until the bad weather subsides. It is still floating. As I indicated yesterday, if we can see a way in which to pump the oil into another vessel so that the oil will not have to be either burned or dumped into the water, we will take appropriate action. However, this will not be possible today since weather conditions are such that salvage activities are virtually at a standstill.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I take it from what the minister has said that the situation is now under control. Yesterday he said that it was not.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, it is slightly more under control. When there are 3,800,000 gallons of oil around, the situation is never under control until the oil is disposed of. It is under control to the extent that the seepage from either the bow or the stern sections has been considerably reduced as a result of the ability of the salvage experts to seal off some of the cracks in the hull.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question to the genial minister. I make no bones about the fact that I do know where my stern and my bow are, but from the minister's explanation it sounds as though he is still at sea. In view of the conflicting statements that he made on Monday and Tuesday I ask him whether the department has considered bringing the stern section of the tanker that is floatable to the shore and draining it of oil on the shore, or burning it in a controlled way on the shore, rather than taking the stern farther out and dumping the oil in the deep sea where it will still cause pollution?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, all these possibilities are being examined and tested by experts both in the ecological field and in the salvage field. Whichever method proves to be the least harmful will be the one employed. Certainly, the least harmful method of all, if it can be achieved, is to keep the stern afloat until the oil has been pumped into another container or ship, and this is what we are trying to achieve.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Transport. Is it correct, as has been suggested, that the rock was marked by a buoy until a few weeks ago, when the buoy was removed?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer that question directly. As I said yesterday, a study is under way; an investigation is being made of the entire incident. As soon as a report is available, I will see it is provided to the House and the public.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. Since the present legislation does not provide for unlimited liability insurance to be carried as protection against accidents of this type, could the minister inform the House what is the total liability insurance carried by the Arrow in respect of both vessel and cargo? I also ask whether the minister believes, as does his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, that the polluter in such cases must pay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the second part of the question is in order. If the minister has the information, he might respond to the first part of the hon. member's supplementary.

Mr. Jamieson: The position as I understand it—and I will be meeting with representatives of an international group this afternoon—is that an international fund has been established for this purpose. As I understand it, it is contributed to by major oil companies and has been established for precisely the purpose of covering the costs involved in this kind of clean-up operation. For myself, I have no problem in stating that in my view the responsibility is clearly that of the shipping company and the oil company. Every effort will be made, within whatever powers we possess, to make sure that they pay the costs.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's statement that he does not know whether this rock was marked by a buoy at the time of the disaster, or traditionally, rather than keeping the House and the country waiting for a formal report would the minister undertake to report to the House the next time he is here whether this rock had been traditionally marked but the buoy had been removed?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I will report as fully as possible, consistent with whatever are the legal implications of the inquiry. I simply point out to the hon. gentleman that there are many issues involved here with regard to liability and the like. I do not want, as perhaps he might be suggesting, to jeopardize any legal claims that might be made by people in his own province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the loss of the Arrow on the east coast, will the minister consider placing radar reflectors on the top of spar buoys along the coast of Atlantic Canada, in view of the fact that spar buoys are placed there in the wintertime to replace bell buoys and other markers which might be affected by shore ice? Will the minister consider installing radar reflectors in place of spar buoys, because this might in future prevent occurrences such as we have experienced?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into that suggestion.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TRANSFER OF NERVE GAS FROM OKINAWA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the loss of the Arrow emphasizes what the Minister of Transport said yesterday, that shipwrecks occur regardless of the measures and precautions taken, will he instruct our ambassador to the United States to vigorously protest the proposal of the United States government, or certain segments of it, to ship nerve gas by sea through the Strait of Juan de Fuca?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been in consultation with the United States about the shipment of nerve gas. We have been informed that a decision has been made to make the shipment, although the date has not yet been fixed. I am instructing our ambassador to obtain all the information he can as to the safety precautions that have been taken so we can satisfy ourselves that there is a minimum of danger to the people of the United States and to the people of Canada.

Mr. Anderson: I appreciate the hon. minister's reply, but has he instructed the ambassador to protest this decision by the United States authorities?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, not yet. It may be that on the basis of the information we receive from the United States we may have a reason for protest. The people of the United States have exactly the same interest as we have in maximum safety. If we satisfy ourselves that the precautions are not adequate we will make a protest, but not otherwise because we assume that the people of the United States have just as great an interest in the safety of the movement as we have.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact it is anticipated that the route of the ships transporting the nerve gas will be through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and through Canadian territorial waters, will the minister assure the House that he will make representations to the government of the United States urging that until the government is satisfied that all the necessary protective measures have been taken the ships will not go through these waters but will proceed directly to the United States coastline?

Mr. Sharp: First of all, I should like to reassure the hon. gentleman and the House that there is no intention that the ships will go through Canadian waters. The problem is, however, that in the Strait of Juan de Fuca the waters are narrow. Therefore, we have a legitimate interest in seeing that safety precautions are adequate. If we are satisfied that they are, we will accept them; if we are not so satisfied, we will protest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we have had a number of supplementary questions on this subject and that we should go on to another matter. If we have time, perhaps we can return to the very important matter raised by many hon. members.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REQUEST BY UNION OFFICIAL FOR APOLOGY BY MINISTER

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is he in receipt of a communication from the general representative of the CB of RT, Cape Breton, Mr. Gilbert MacIntyre, taking exception to a recent statement the minister made in the House regarding this union and asking for an official apology and, if so, can he advise what consideration he has given to the request?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I received such a letter, and its contents are based on false assumptions. When the hon. member himself mentioned the name of a union, on January 27, it was not Local 510, but the retired coal miners pensioners union and that is the question to which I replied. There was never any reference to Local 510 in my reply, and I owe nobody any apologies, it was merely a question of misinterpreted facts.

[English]

Mr. Muir: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The minister's statement is completely erroneous. He has accused me of something of which I am not guilty. I did refer to local 510 of the CB of RT, and with your indulgence I should like to go further into this matter at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I point out that the question put on January 27 by the hon. member was as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the first minister. Has the right hon. gentleman received a written complaint from the retired coal miners pensioners union at Sydney—

The hon. member did not refer to local 510. This is the answer to his question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has raised a question of privilege and the hon. member has raised a point of order and given notice that he will pose the question again at the time of adjournment. I suggest that the matter be allowed to rest there for the time being.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): With all due respect to you, sir—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I am rising on a question of privilege, sir. If the minister will look at the appropriate part of Hansard he will see that I did not refer the question to the Prime Minister. The matter to which I had reference was raised on another day. On that occasion the minister went on to refer to a group of old men, superannuated miners, pensioners and so on. I then pointed out to him that it was the union local 510 of the CB of RT whose employees are at present employed in the coal mine in Cape Breton for which the minister is responsible, in case he does not know. I suggest that he correct himself on the point he has raised regarding what I have been talking about. When I posed the question to the minister in this House it was on another day. I shall give him the appropriate pages in Hansard but I should still like to be heard on the late show.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the hon. member still wants to consider the matter at the time of adjournment. I have respectfully suggested to the minister and the hon. member that this appears to be a very interesting point of debate. I certainly do not think it should be pursued as a question of privilege at this time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

LEGISLATION TO PROVIDE FOR SUBSTANTIAL NOTICE OF LAY-OFFS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker following the announcement by General Motors of Canada today that a number of employees, many with up to 17 years seniority, will be laid off at Oshawa on Friday after only a period of two days notice, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour whether the government is contemplating legislation during this session which would compel companies in this country to give substantial advance notice to employees who are about to be laid off?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the first part of the question I cannot comment on a statement of facts of which I am not aware, but I will discuss them with the Minister of Labour. I suggest that the legislation referred to by the hon. member is something he should be proposing to the provincial government, not the federal government.

FINANCE

ASSISTANCE TO MUNICIPALITIES TO CLEAN UP SEWAGE PROBLEMS

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of President Nixon's proposal for a new federal-municipal financing arrangement that in five years will provide every community which needs it with secondary waste treatment, and also special additional treatment in areas of special needs, including communities on the Great Lakes, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether the federal government will match this proposal with a real drive to assist all Canadian municipalities to clean up their sewage problems in five years, with special assistance to those Canadian areas where special need is indicated, such as the Great Lakes system?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I should like to suggest to the hon. member that, while the minister obviously wants to reply, the hon. member is inviting the minister to make a statement which to my way of thinking would be of a rather general nature and ought to be made on motions.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, might I ask the minister if he would make a statement on motions and when?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would very much like to look at the statement of Mr. Nixon which I have not seen to date. The federal government has been assisting with sewage disposal for municipalities for I believe about eight years now, so we are probably about eight years ahead of the United States.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER LEVYING CHARGES FOR USE OF FILMS

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State.

In view of the fact that the National Film Board's decision to set charges for the use of their films, which would prevent a very great number of citizens from using that precious service, does the minister intend to make representations to the NFB, urging them to reconsider their decision?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have already replied to that question several times. Barring new developments, the NFB's decision has already been reconsidered and, as far as the NFB is concerned, reconfirmed. If however new factors are brought forward, it may be changed.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

Was he consulted before the NFB took that decision?

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—CONFLICTING ESTIMATES OF INCREASED REVENUES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, in light of the statement reported last evening and attributed to the Prime Minister of Ontario, which reaffirmed Ontario's calculation of $1.3 billion as the figure of increased revenue represented by the white paper, whether the minister has altered his calculation or can he report any progress to the House with regard to reaching a consensus on the matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I reported to the House, from a cursory glance at the Ontario figures I found an error of $200 million. We offered to meet with the provincial officials immediately and they asked for a postponement of ten days to check their figures.

Mr. Stanfield: In light of the statement of the Minister of Finance and the fact that he is sticking to his position, I wonder whether he is prepared to disclose to the House the research and material upon which the government's calculation is based so that the country will be in a position to judge who is right?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest that this information could be given by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I simply asked whether the minister is prepared to disclose this information to the House. He is a very forthcoming minister and might be prepared to do it.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest he should not forthcome at this time.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not wish to be difficult or stubborn about this, Mr. Speaker, but I simply asked not whether he is prepared to make a statement but whether he is prepared to disclose this material at his convenience.

Mr. Benson: Immediately Ontario came out with different figures we offered to compare our figures with theirs and they took some time to supply us with the details of their calculations. When they did there was an obvious error of $200 million and perhaps many more errors. We then offered to meet with them to compare the figures and they asked for a ten-day postponement. My officials are appearing before the parliamentary committee. The committee has the right to ask for any formation it wants with regard to calculations and so on. I understand my officials have been co-operating completely with the committee.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN QUEBEC—TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION OVER ESKIMOS—RIGHT TO VOTE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Some days ago he informed the House that certain individuals were looking over the situation in northern Quebec and Ungava in connection with the Eskimo population there who apparently are destined to be brought under provincial control. What has been the result up until now of the discussions which have taken place? Second, will he give assurance to these Eskimo people that before action of this kind is taken they will have the right to vote concerning whether or not they wish to continue exclusively under federal jurisdiction, which is constitutionally their right, or have certain portions of the jurisdiction over them transferred to the province?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, to answer the first part of the right hon. member's question, officials who have been assigned to this task by the federal and provincial governments are soon to leave for discussion of this problem with the Eskimos. We have undertaken to consult them on this matter, and this is the reason why we have not reached any decision. Nevertheless, I want to assure the House that any renting of services by the federal government from the provincial government, aimed at giving better service to the Eskimos, will not take away from them any constitutional right. They will continue to be protected by the British North America Act.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not the question I asked. I asked what right the government of Canada has to move these people around as if they are chattels without having a vote on their part to accept. Consultation is all right but approval is a different matter and they have a right to a vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, under the agreements reached by the federal and provincial governments in 1964, it was decided that the Eskimos would be consulted about the development of this procedure and this is what we are doing now. I said that they were being consulted and that is what we are actually doing.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: But they have to have the right of agreement. They cannot be pushed around like that.

AIR TRANSPORT

IMPOSITION OF SURCHARGE BY SPANISH GOVERNMENT ON CANADIAN FLIGHTS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to either the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Minister of Transport. Is it the intention of the Canadian government to make representations to the Spanish government under the bilateral air agreement with regard to the action of that government in imposing a punitive surcharge of flights by Canadian companies with the result that the Canadian companies have suffered extensive losses?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission, I understand, has requested the Department of External Affairs to make inquiries of the Spanish government along the lines the hon. member mentioned.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In the interval is the government contemplating any action vis-à-vis Spanish airlines coming into Canada so that Canadian interests shall not be affected adversely with impunity?

Mr. Jamieson: I will take a look at that suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order having to do with our plans for today. I put it in the form of a question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of the fact that the Parliamentary Press Gallery has invited us all to a reception this evening—and it has done so without any discrimination—can the President of the Privy Council assure us that the House will not sit beyond six o'clock so that we can accept the invitation?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I am intrigued with the fact that the hon. member is keen to get a drink, but I will do my very best not to disappoint his rather unusual request.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They serve orange juice, you know.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INVESTMENT COMPANIES

MEASURE RESPECTING FURNISHING OF INFORMATION, LOANS AND INVESTMENTS, TRANSFERS OF SHARES, ETC.

On the order: Government orders:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-179, an act respecting investment companies—the Minister of Finance.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in respect of the measure which has just been called. Because my point of order goes right to the root of the issue as to whether this question can be put to the House, I think it best that I raise it now. Very briefly, the gist of my point of order is that there has been a breach of Standing Order 62(2) with regard to this measure. I shall read a few lines of Standing Order 62(2), as follows:

The message and recommendation of the Governor General—

I interject to say that this, of course, is the message referred to in section 54 of the British North America Act, which by constitutional decree provides that any financial matter must be preceded by a message from the Governor General.

—in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

I call to Your Honour's attention the fact that this is the machinery which the House has adopted for the purpose of implementing section 54 of the BNA Act. It lays down a mandatory requirement that in three respects this shall be done: First, that the Governor General's message and recommendation must be printed on the Notice Paper when the measure is introduced; second, that the message and recommendation must also be printed in Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced; and third, that the text of the recommendation must be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

An examination of the documents indicates that on January 16 in Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day there appears under the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) a bill entitled an act respecting investment companies, and it is accompanied by what appears to be a recommendation which at first blush would cover the provisions of this bill.

Then on Monday, January 19, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) for the minister—this appears in Votes and Proceedings No. 47—seconded by Mr. Olson, by leave of the House introduced Bill C-179, an act respecting investment companies, which was read the first time and ordered to be printed and ordered for a second reading at the next sitting of the House.

(2), according to which the message and recommendation of the Governor General should be printed in the Notice Paper and in Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced. In other words, there has been compliance to the extent that it was printed in Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day on January 16, and it may well be printed in the original bill. I do not know, because the original bill is in the custody of the Chair and I am not aware of this. It does appear in the copies of the bill which have been circulated. Whether or not it appears in the original bill, I do not know. This may well be where the mistake lies. However, it does not, as it must, appear in Votes and Proceedings.

It seems that there is an incurable defect which, it may well be suggested, can be cured because the text of the recommendation did appear in Routine Proceedings. But that is not enough. Votes and Proceedings is the journal in which this House records officially the proceedings of the House. On a very controversial and contentious measure of this kind, this omission may well be challenged in the courts. There is certainly one particular aspect which requires the recommendation; the one providing for the $200 million guarantee to which there is a great deal of opposition, certainly from me. However, that deals with the substance of the matter, and we are debating the procedural issue. If this matter is challenged, the courts must go to Votes and Proceedings to determine whether there has been compliance and to show that the BNA Act has in fact been complied with.

I submit very simply that at the time the bill was introduced, this did not appear. To show the contrast, let me point out that yesterday we finished dealing with the Expropriation Act bill which was introduced for first reading on November 3, 1969, and in Votes and Proceedings No. 8, at page 54 the following notation appears:

> Mr. McIlraith for Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton), seconded by Mr. Sharp, by leave of the House, introduced Bill C-136, an act respecting the expropriation of land, which was read the first time and ordered to be printed and ordered for a second reading at the next sitting of the House.

Then follows the text of the message and recommendation of the Governor General which is printed pursuant to Standing Order 62 (2). On examining Votes and Proceedings from time to time I note that this new practice, which was established in 1968 under the revised Standing Orders, has been followed throughout this session.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

As I said, it may well be that this bill in its original form—I am not seeking justification but explanation—was introduced last year in the other place and there it was amended very substantially. But this year the government reintroduced it in the House with a number of changes, one of which dealt with what in my submission is a financial measure and therefore requires the addition of a recommendation. The recommendation was obtained, but I have some doubt whether the original bill contained the recommendation. This may well account for the fact that it does not appear in Votes and Proceedings.

I make that argument. If Your Honour accepts my recommendation, you might feel unanimous consent might be given to cure the defect, if hon. members are willing to give it, and I do not know that they are. I urge Your Honour to consider that the omission of the recommendation is very dangerous because, as I have indicated, the fact is that this is a constitutional requirement and failure to observe it might strike at the legality of this measure, not only in the House now but in the future. For this reason it seems to me that if Your Honour upholds my view the matter may well have to be reviewed and a decision taken upon it.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a point of order of which I had not previous notice, so I have not had the opportunity to consult with the officials of the table and to examine the original bill. Therefore, I cannot speak about the actual documents which are in the possession of the officials of the table and the staff of the House. I wish to make several points in this regard, to the best of my knowledge. The hon. member implied in his remarks that there was an irregularity because there was no recommendation last year but there is one this time.

Mr. Baldwin: I was just explaining how this omission might have happened.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The recommendation occurs because of the further additions that were made to the bill in the current edition. I suggest that a distinction should be made with respect to the requirements of Standing Order 62 (2) and the suggestion as to constitutionality. I agree that before a bill is introduced involving an expenditure from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, under our constitution the recommendation of the Governor General is required.

I suggest, however, that if the recommendation of the Governor General has in fact been received—and I have not had the opportunity to check on this fact—we would have to decide whether the provisions of Standing Order 62 (2) are directory only with respect to the carrying on of the business of the House, and do not involve a fundamental defect in the procedure of the House to the extent that the matter could not be proceeded with. I suggest that the provisions under the Standing Order do not involve a constitutional matter; they are with regard to the Votes and Proceedings and Orders of the Day only.

Of course, as Your Honour knows, Votes and Proceedings are not under my direct control. There may have been an omission in Votes and Proceedings on that particular day, an oversight in their preparation. I suggest it is an oversight of a directory character only and does not go fundamentally to the propriety of receiving the bill. Not having had any opportunity to give the matter advance consideration, I regret I cannot bring an argument to bear more fully on it for the benefit of the Chair. But I suggest that we proceed with discussion of the bill. I assure the House that if it be decided that there is a formal defect in the introduction of the bill, it would not be the government's intention not to proceed with the legislation but we would reintroduce it.

I suggest that while the records of the House may be examined with regard to the hon. member's point of order, and while you, Mr. Speaker, may have an opportunity of considering the procedure in this regard, we should proceed with the debate as scheduled this afternoon so that we can at least have a preliminary discussion of the matters involved in the proposals put before the House.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting point of order that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has raised. Like the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), I had no advance warning that it was coming, but I suppose that does not deter me from getting into the discussion. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is pretty hard to get around the language of Standing Order 62(2) so far as our procedures are concerned. To that extent I concur in the argument that has been put forward by the hon. member for Peace River. However, I feel I cannot support his argument that there is any danger of a court case over a piece of legislation because some of our Standing Orders were not followed.

Not having had time to look things up or bring the citations here, I have not got them in front of me; but I know. Citations exist which state that once a bill is finally passed, provided it is within the terms of the constitution the courts do not look back into our procedures to determine whether or not we kept every one of our rules. My, oh my, the courts would be busy if they had to do that. I submit, therefore, that the question of the constitutional requirement being kept really does not come into this question.

Section 54 of the British North America Act says that a money bill is not lawful unless there has been the recommendation by the Governor General. The bill itself, in the printed form that we have it, carries that recommendation, and it may well be a defect that Votes and Proceedings does not show that that recommendation was actually noted by the Chair when the bill was given its introduction. I believe that that is the form that Your Honour usually follows in these bills. Usually, when a bill of this kind is introduced, Your Honour makes a note of the fact that it has been recommended to the House in this session by the Governor General. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think I am bound to take the position that it is not a constitutional problem but it is a procedural one, and I think either one of two things should be done, or perhaps both. On the one hand, the practices of the table in this matter perhaps should be looked into. It may be that when a bill of this kind is introduced, Votes and Proceedings should note that the recommendation was referred to by the Chair. The other thing is that perhaps Your Honour will say again that this is something you should refer to the Committee on Procedure and Organization to see whether the rule does not need to be refined.

In other words, I am not worried about the constitutional angle but I think there is a point so far as the procedural angle is concerned. But if this is the position, perhaps we could resolve it this afternoon by giving unanimous consent to proceed with the legislation at this time, and that is what I suggest.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether other hon. members wish to participate in the procedural discussion, but I believe I am sufficiently guided to reach a decision. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) looks in the direction of the Chair with his customary quizzical glance and I assume he would like an opportunity to participate in the debate; therefore, I will recognize him.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how we can set aside this particular rule requiring notice of the recommendation because, after all, the rules govern how we are to conduct our business. If there had not been 48 hours notice we could not proceed, and it is just as important to have the recommendation in Votes and Proceedings as it is to have a copy of the bill itself. That recommendation goes to the heart of the bill.

I was concerned in rulings given in this House just the other day when certain amendments were brought forward to a bill and they were not included in the recommendation concerning the bill. It is here that the recommendation controls the ambit of the bill and it seems to me just as important to have the recommendation in Votes and Proceedings as it is to have it in the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 62 (2) is self-explanatory and reads as follows:

> The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenu or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

Mr. Speaker, it does seem that this text contains no ambiguity, whereas the arguments put forward by the President of the Privy Council are ambiguous and offer nothing new.

I feel that the case made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is logical, for his point of order emphasizes that, in his opinion, Bill C-179 is contrary to the provisions of Standing Order 62 (2).

As for us, from the Ralliement créditiste, we do not want to delay the debate or to influence your decision. We just want to abide by your good judgment, Mr. Speaker, while hoping that you will as usual apply the spirit as well as the letter of the Standing Orders.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for the views they have expressed on the very important and interesting point of order raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I should say at the outset that the Chair agrees that the requirements of the Standing Order have not been followed. As hon. members have mentioned, Standing Order 62(2) requires:

> The message and recommendation of the Governor General in relation to any bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue or of any tax or impost shall be printed on the Notice Paper and in the Votes and Proceedings when any such measure is to be introduced and the text of such recommendation shall be printed with or annexed to every such bill.

It is obvious that it was not published in the Votes and Proceedings which I have before me. For the record I wish to point out that this is not an error on the part of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), and that the officials of the Chair and of the table recognize that this is an error on their part. We take the liberty of considering it a clerical error. I realize it is perhaps more than that. It is obviously a procedural mistake; but we have to take the responsibility, entirely and exclusively, for the fact that the recommendation was not published, as it should have been published, in the Votes and Proceedings of this House.

This having been said, I go back to the argument proposed by the hon. member for Peace River who referred to the fact that the recommendation of His Excellency is required. I have before me the original submission which came from the office of the President of the Privy Council, which does include with the draft bill the recommendation of his Excellency the Governor General recommending to this House the measure which is now before us for consideration. That is the constitutional requirement. So I suggest that if there is a point before us now, it is a procedural point of order and the suggestion that the adoption of this bill would not be constitutional, or would in some way be illegal, is not correct. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested that any procedural difficulty, any procedural mistake, would be corrected by the passing of the bill, and he is obviously right.

All this having been said, I recognize that an error has been made, that we have not published the recommendation in Votes and Proceedings as should have been done. In view of the fact that this is basically a procedural difficulty, I suggest that it can be cured by the unanimous agreement of the House. If there is no unanimous agreement, I am not too sure how it can be corrected except by the publication of an errata as an appendix to the proceedings of this day and the bringing forth of the same measure tomorrow. That is the only alternative. We either do that or we have unanimous consent to proceed with the bill at this time. If there is no consent, the Chair in consultation with the table officers will find a way to publish a correction in the official records of the House, and the bill could proceed tomorrow or whenever hon. members agree it should be proceeded with.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) whether, in light of the information he communicated to us earlier today, he is in a position to make the full statement he intended to make, or a truncated version? Our consideration today is bound to a great extent by the decision of the minister.

Mr. Speaker: I would hope that the decision taken by the House would be based on the procedural aspect and not on whether the minister will make a long or a short statement. I suggest that hon. members should agree whether they want to proceed or not on the basis of the argument proposed to the House and the decision of the Chair.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest, in light of the assurance that the table, or clerical error will be corrected, that we proceed.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a general view to proceed with this bill. In any event, the error could be cured by giving unanimous consent to having the omission made good in the Votes and Proceedings of today. That inclusion would to all intents and purposes be regarded as a fulfilment of Standing Order 62 (2). The failure to include this particular recommendation in Votes and Proceedings at the appropriate time might well be considered a failure to comply with section 54 of the BNA Act. However, we are prepared to give unanimous consent. If that consent would include having it put on the Order Paper or in Votes and Proceedings for today, that is all right.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-179, respecting investment companies, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to establish a system of reporting, inspection and supervision applicable to a class of federally-incorporated companies that are acting in a substantial way as investment intermediaries and that are not otherwise supervised. The class of companies to which the act would apply may be described broadly as those companies that raise money on debt instruments and use some or all of the money so borrowed for investment purposes.

There now exists extensive legislation providing for supervision and inspection of most types of companies under federal charters that solicit funds from the public on the basis of contracts calling for repayment of the funds at some time in the future or payment of insurance benefits. Such companies include banks, trust companies, mortgage loan companies and insurance companies. The absence of a system of reporting, inspection and supervision applicable to companies that do not fall within any of these classes, but nevertheless borrow funds from the public for investment purposes, represents a gap in the existing pattern of supervisory legislation. The fact that such a gap can have serious consequences has been illustrated by a number of failures of financial institutions within the last few years. Fortunately, these were not under federal charter but we feel action should be taken to avoid such a possibility with respect to federally chartered companies in this category.

Perhaps the main type of company that would be covered by the act are those commonly referred to as sales finance companies. These are companies that engage, to an important extent, in the business of purchasing instalment sales contracts from merchants and in purchasing other types of obligations arising from the sale of goods. The act will, however, apply to certain other types of companies also, where the money raised by borrowing is used for investments of other types.

It should be noted that the act would apply only to companies that raise funds on debt instruments. Thus, it would have no application to those companies that are acting as investment intermediaries but on the basis of funds raised by the sales of shares, including mutual funds. The purpose of the legislation is to see to it that companies remain solvent and able to meet their obligations. Thus, it has applicability only if a company has debt instruments outstanding. Shareholders undertake to follow the fortunes of the enterprise in which they invest and there is no obligation to repay any fixed amount to them.

In outline, the legislation defines the classes of companies that would be subject to it, requires such companies to file annual statements with the Department of Insurance and other information that may be requested from time to time, and authorizes the Superintendent of Insurance to examine the condition and affairs of companies when he considers this necessary. Companies coming under the legislation would be required to obtain a certificate of registry as a means of identification and control. The superintendent would be required to report to the minister in any case where he thought the company's ability to meet its obligations was inadequately secured, and the minister, if he agreed with the opinion of the superintendent, would have the authority to take one or more of several courses of action leading to improvement of the company's financial position or, if the case if serious enough, leading to the termination of the company's activities.

The legislation does not propose to impose any restrictions or limitations on the operations of companies with the exception of a prohibition against investments and loans where there may be a conflict of interest. The general purpose is to establish a reporting and inspection procedure rather than to impose a series of specific rules or regulations with which companies must comply. The expenses of administering the act would be assessed against the companies in proportion to their assets. This is in accordance with the practice now followed as respects supervision of other types of financial institutions.

The bill contains certain provisions that are applicable to sales finance companies only. First, for those sales finance companies that are not now under foreign control, the legislation would limit transfer of shares to non-residents to ensure they remain under Canadian control. The limitations would put a maximum on the total holdings of shares by non-residents of 25 per cent of the issued shares of the company and a maximum on the holdings by any one non-resident of 10 per cent of the issued shares. Existing shareholdings would not be disturbed, but if they are now in excess of the named limits no further increase would be permitted.

[Mr. Gray.]

Second, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation would be empowered to make loans to Canadian-controlled sales finance companies for the purpose of enabling them to meet emergency liquidity requirements, and would be empowered to borrow money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, through the Minister of Finance, for this purpose. Such loans would only be made against adequate security and only for the purpose of short-term liquidity needs, and as he just said this borrowing is done by the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation.

These remarks are a general outline of the nature and purpose of the legislation. Further remarks will now be made in respect of certain aspects that are of particular importance. The act will apply only to federally-incorporated companies and only to companies that are transacting the business of investment or that have been incorporated primarily for that purpose. The act defines the business of investment as the borrowing of money on the security of debt instruments and the use of some or all of the proceeds of such borrowing for making loans or investments, including the purchase of real estate for investment purposes and the purchase of conditional sales contracts, accounts receivable and other obligations arising from the sale of merchandise.

Certain exemptions are provided in the bill. The exemptions are designed to exclude from the application of the act companies where the borrowing or investment activities are a minor part of its business, or where the company confines itself to borrowing from banks and substantial shareholders.

To be more specific, a company carrying on the business of investment, but having less than 40 per cent of its assets in the form of loans or investments, would not be subject to the act. The figure of 40 per cent is the same criterion as is used in the Investment Companies Act in the United States. This figure will have the result of including within the act those companies for which a major part of their assets represent investment-type instruments as distinct from property, equipment or inventory used in the transaction of a company's business.

Also excluded from the application of the act would be companies that have borrowed money but whose outstanding debt is less than one-third of the capital and surplus. This would mean that where the borrowing is small in relation to the company's resources, the act would not apply. Nearly all companies borrow to some extent from time to time, and it is intended that this act apply only to companies that are significantly acting as investment intermediaries.

Investment dealers or brokers would be exempt from the act if they are licensed by a public authority. Such organizations do not act as investment intermediaries in the normal sense of the term, although they may borrow money and may have a substantial portion of their assets in the form of investment-type instruments from time to time. It is thought that they could be exempted if they are licensed by some public authority. Firms that are members of the Investment Dealers Association would fall into this category.

A further exclusion would apply to companies that borrow only from banks or from substantial shareholders. Substantial shareholders are defined as persons who own more than 10 per cent of the voting stock of the company. Companies that borrow only in this way are not raising funds from the public. Most companies borrow from time to time from their banks, but may not be acting as investment intermediaries in any ordinary sense of the term. The exclusion in favour of bank-borrowing would therefore avoid requiring the act to apply to a great many companies that are not of the type where supervision is required or justified. The exclusion in favour of companies that borrow only from substantial shareholders would leave out private companies for the most part.

Another exclusion would be in favour of companies incorporated under part II of the Canada Corporations Act, that is, companies that are formed without share capital for charitable, religious or other similar purposes. The minister responsible for the act would also have the right to exclude a company if he is satisfied that the business of investment is carried on by it in only an incidental way or is of a very short duration.

The purpose of these rather elaborate provisions dealing with the application of the act is to confine its application to companies that are acting as investment intermediaries in a significant way and have a significant amount of debt instruments outstanding.

In order to avoid applying the act to an industrial organization that is set up in the form of a holding company with subsidiary operating companies, provision has been made for regarding the investments by a parent company in a subsidiary as not being investment type instruments for purposes of testing the application of the act so long as the subsidiary is not itself a company that has more than 40 per cent of its assets in investment-type instruments. Thus, a holding company that borrows money from the public and uses the money to finance its operating subsidiaries would not be subject to the act.

Companies subject to the act would be required to file an annual statement with the federal Department of Insurance within four months after the close of its fiscal year. The statement would be in such form as the Superintendent of Insurance determines, but he has the authority to accept a copy of the financial statement and the auditor's report as submitted to the company's shareholders if he considers that this gives satisfactory information. He may also call for such additional information as he may require to carry out the purposes of the act.

The act would require the auditor of a company to be an accountant who has at least six years' experience and who is a member in good standing of an institute or association of accountants incorporated under the authority of a province. This is the same qualification required of auditors under the Bank Act. It may be noted here that companies subject to the Investment Companies Act would also be subject to the Corporations Act, and consequently would also have to comply with the audit provisions specified in that latter act. The minister would have power to enlarge the scope of the audit if he thought that necessary and could obtain reports from the auditor. The Superintendent of Insurance would have power to examine companies subject to the act when he considers that necessary.

The only provision modifying the powers of companies in any way would be a provision preventing investments and loans that are not at arm's length. This provision is the same as that included in the bills to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act that are now before Parliament. In essence, this provision would prohibit an investment company lending money to an officer or director or a member of his immediate family, and from lending money to any person who owns more than 10 per cent of the voting stock. If more than 10 per cent of the voting stock is owned by a corporation, the investment company could not make investments in that corporation.

The investment company would be barred, also, from lending money to or making investments in another corporation if an officer, a director or a substantial shareholder had a significant interest in that other corporation. A significant interest would be considered to exist if the person concerned owned more than 10 per cent of the capital stock of the other corporation. This provision is intended to prohibit the investment company from lending money or making investments where the persons who make the investment decision, or who may be presumed to influence the investment decision, have a personal interest in the investment. Investments and loans that are not at arm's length have been one of the sources of trouble where companies have got into difficulties. It is not sufficient to rely merely on disclosure of the interest of the officer or director in such cases since the problem is to protect the creditors of the company rather than the shareholders.

Companies would be required to apply for and obtain certificates of registry under the act. A limited period of time is given within which a company must make application for a certificate. After the expiration of this period a company is not permitted to increase its indebtedness unless it holds a valid certificate, so long as it remains an investment company.

Where the superintendent forms the opinion that the financial condition and affairs of an investment company are such that its ability to meet its obligations is in question, he is required to report to the minister. The minister, if he agrees with the views of the superintendent and after giving the company a chance to be heard, then has the option of taking one or more courses of action. These would include specifying a period within which the company is to remedy the matters criticized, the imposition of conditions on the company, the withdrawal of its certificate, a direction that the company cease carrying on the business of investment and a direction to the superintendent to take control of the company's assets.

Control of assets of a company by the superintendent would not mean that the company would be out of business. It would put the superintendent in charge of the assets, but it would be expected that the company would continue to carry on its normal business activities until further consideration could be given as to the next step. The superintendent would not have the power to dispose of any assets or initiate any action. His approval would be required before any disbursement or investment could be made.

Where any company has its certificate of registry withdrawn or fails to apply for a certificate of registry within the time provided, the Attorney General would be empowered to apply to a court of competent jurisdiction for a receiving order under the Bankruptcy Act. An appeal would lie from any action by the minister in connection with the imposition of requirements on the company. The appeal would be to the Exchequer Court. The superintendent would be required to make an annual report to the minister on the administration of the act. A list of the companies registered under the act would be published annually in the Canada Gazette.

One special class of companies that would be subject to the act merits particular comment, and I think I should make an additional comment. These are of the class that are usually called sales finance companies. They are defined in the bill as companies having at least 25 per cent of their assets in the form of loans or in the form of purchased conditional sales contracts, accounts receivable, bills of sale, chattel mortgages, bills of exchange, promissory notes or other obligations representing some or all of the sale price of merchandise. Conditional sales contracts issued by a company in connection with sale of its own merchandise would not be considered as investment for purposes of the bill.

As I said, in the case of those sales finance companies that are now under Canadian control a limitation would be placed on the transfer of their shares to non-residents. This limitation is a maximum of 25 per cent of the shares to all non-residents and a maximum of 10 per cent to any one non-resident. This limitation and the terms of the legislation applying it are practically identical with a similar limitation applicable to life insurance companies, trust companies, mortgage loan companies and banks.

At the present time there are operating in Canada a number of sales finance companies that are under foreign control and a number that are under Canadian control. In proposing this legislation the intention is to retain under Canadian control those companies that are now so controlled in order to retain a significant Canadian element in the industry. The proposal would not protect the Canadian-controlled companies from competition but would prevent Canadian-controlled companies from being taken over by non-residents.

A further provision relating to sales finance companies, and in particular to Canadian-controlled sales finance companies, should also be mentioned. Sales finance companies must be able to raise funds in order to carry on their business by way of loans or provision of credit for purchase of merchandise. To retain a Canadian-controlled element in the industry, Canadian-controlled companies must be able to compete on more or less equal terms with the foregoing-controlled companies in order to borrow funds in the market. It sometimes happens that the foreign-controlled companies have access to funds outside Canada, through parent company organizations, which are not available to Canadian-controlled companies. Also, in raising money in the Canadian market foreign-controlled companies can sometimes give the guarantee of their parent company as additional security. This may put the Canadian-controlled company at a disadvantage.

The bill therefore proposes that to give added confidence in the debt instruments issued by Canadian-controlled sales finance companies, and thus put them in a more nearly equal competitive position vis-à-vis foreign-controlled corporations, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation would be empowered to make loans to such companies where loans are necessary to meet short-term liquidity needs. Such loans will have to be adequately secured and would be for terms not exceeding six months. The CDIC would be empowered to borrow from the Consolidated Revenue Fund moneys which might be needed to carry out this function. The maximum borrowing power would be fixed at $200 million.

This emergency lender-of-last-resort facility corresponds to facilities which are available through other legislation for banks, trust companies, mortgage loan companies and investment dealers. It is not expected that any company would have to rely on it except in unusual circumstances, and the lending power is not intended as a substitute for lines of credit which a sales finance company should get and maintain with its bankers. It will, however, provide an emergency facility should unforeseen events cause some liquidity crisis.

This facility should be looked at in light of the whole structure of the act establishing a pattern of supervision and inspection. This structure would be used to keep a close contact with companies and to detect trends in their operations which seem to be carrying unusual risk as far as liquidity is concerned. Thus, it would be expected that information would be available and action could be taken in advance of any emergency liquidity crisis. However, unforeseen events do sometimes occur and it is considered that this lender-of-last-resort facility will add to the confidence in the Canadian-controlled sales finance companies and in the strength of the industry generally.

I would be happy to answer questions or respond to comments made by hon. members in the course of the debate either by way of a reply at the conclusion of this discussion here or, certainly, before the finance committee. I therefore ask the House for its support of the bill at this time.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this bill has had a chequered history. It has had a long legislative history, If the House were aware of just what has happened to it, or the form it took when it first came before Parliament and the purpose of the government in introducing it, I believe we would be in a better position to appreciate what is before us, notwithstanding the remarks of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) who is associated with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

This measure appeared in the Senate on November 12, 1968, as Bill S-17. After undergoing considerable revision it was passed and sent to this House in June of 1969. Here, it was given only first reading. Today it is brought forward again. It has come to us in a revised form; there are several changes which we ought to consider. Let us examine them in some detail.

At one time I think it was suggested that the bill be given the title, "An act to Provide for the Quiet Concentration of Enormous Economic Power in the Hands of the Government." What happened was this: the bill was introduced, not by the leader of the Senate but by another hon. senator who read a statement to the effect that the purpose of the bill was to protect Canadian investors from the collapse of federally-incorporated companies, primarily of the finance and acceptance type, which were not presently regulated or supervised by statute.

Senator Desruisseaux said in the other place:

> Recent collapses of several companies of this type, although essentially involving companies under provincial jurisdiction, have underlined the danger of such a vacuum. Many investors have suffered losses and, on occasion, confidence in the stability of our financial institutions has been shaken.

In the committee hearings in the other place the Superintendent of Insurance candidly admitted that no federally-incorporated company of the provincially-incorporated Prudential and Atlantic Acceptance type had ever been in difficulties to his knowledge. In other words, this was a bill, presumably, to ensure that the sun would rise tomorrow somewhere in Canada. The superintendent also admitted that the scope of the definition of "investment company" went so far beyond the ordinary meaning of those words that all companies federally-incorporated, with certain exceptions, would be included.

I am told the bill originated with the idea that certain amendments should be made to acts dealing with trust companies, loan companies, insurance companies and investment companies. We were told by the Minister of Finance in a speech delivered on May 26, 1969, to the Canadian Life Insurance Association at the Seigniory Club, Quebec, that the philosophy behind this legislation was the protection of the public. Financial institutions and the services they provide are undergoing new developments, the minister said. These changes carry risks and dangers to the public. The new difficulties and dangers magnify government problems in attempting by legislation to give the public the protection it needs. The government, he went on, must have a tool to apply necessary compulsion upon management where the safety of the public is threatened, a tool to correct or clear up difficult situations which would otherwise be damaging to the public and to a whole industry.

Let us see what the minister had to say later in that speech. What we heard on that occasion, I suppose, was a statement of government policy and an attempt to equate that policy with the protection of the public as being the common denominator of the various bills before Parliament, including the one now under discussion. Other bills were before the finance committee at that time. The minister said:

> The proposed Investment Companies Act now before Parliament is intended to complete the general pattern of supervision of financial institutions. It would establish a system of reporting and inspection applicable to those companies (not otherwise supervised) which borrow funds from the public and use these funds, to an important degree, for investment in other enterprises. A wide variety exists in this area, although the principal definable group are the sales finance companies.

The bill before us is a complicated one. It defines what is an investment company and, for that matter, what is not an investment company. There are also provisions for applying the legislation. The minister made it quite clear that the bill deals with federally-incorporated investment companies and none other. Certain companies that will be incorporated after the coming into force of the act, primarily for the purpose of carrying on the business of investment, are exempted from the terms of the act.

On going through the bill we see that certain statements have to be made to the Superintendent of Insurance by companies. There are certain requirements as to auditors. The auditors may also be required to make special statements, not to the shareholders of a company but directly to the minister or to the superintendent.

Provision is made for the appointment of examiners who may enter the premises of any company at what is described as a reasonable time, in order to examine the books. Strangely enough, in this regard the government is not giving these examiners the power to seize the company's books, as they have in the case of examiners and inspectors who are appointed by other legislation that came before the House this session and last session. In fact, the bill provides that examiners shall have a certificate of identity, something that examiners appointed under the atuomobile safety regulations are not required to possess.

As the minister has indicated, certain types of loans are prohibited. I think the basic intent of this provision is good. However, I should have thought the government would have been further ahead if it had listened to the advice given it when the Bank Act was being revised in 1966 and 1967 and if it had followed the recommendations of the Porter Commission on Banking, that such companies be placed under federal jurisdiction. We know that a great number of companies are carrying on business under provincial charter, and these are the companies that have been causing difficulty.

If one of the activities of such companies is the carrying on of some form of banking—and some of these concerns do actually receive deposits from investors—why should they not be brought within the provisions of a general Bank Act, instead of being subject to provisions that relate to chartered banks? If that were the case, there would be appropriate supervision of these companies.

I have no respect at all for the opinion that since certain companies are incorporated by provincial legislatures, the provincial government in question for ever and ever has jurisdiction over them. What is important, I think, is the function of such companies. If these companies carry on activities which normally fall under federal jurisdiction, then similarly they should be supervised by federal authorities. However, the absence of such provision remains because this bill is intended to govern federally-incorporated sales finance companies only or, shall I say, investment companies.

The bill also makes a curious change in clauses 10 to 17, where we find provisions relating to the control of the sale of shares in sales finance companies. Last fall the Minister of Finance made a statement which had the effect of prohibiting acquisition by non-Canadian residents of controlling interests in Canadian sales finance companies. I think that step was to be welcomed. There is no question that Canadian sales finance companies should be under the control of Canadian residents or citizens, just as should our banks, insurance companies and loan and trust companies. I have no quarrel with that proposition. However, I do quarrel with clause 15 of the bill, which provides as follows:

> No sale or disposal of the whole or any part of the undertaking of a sales finance company is of any effect unless and until it has been approved by the minister.

At one time it was thought that there was nothing to prevent the management of a sales finance company selling the undertaking or the assets of the undertaking to a foreign concern. That would be the same thing as selling the shares of the company, because you are selling the business of the company. For example, supposing a sales finance company wants to sell certain assets that are no longer profitable within its portfolio to a competitor. In order to do so it must first get the approval of the minister. However, no provision is made as to the period within which the minister should make his decision. The minister can delay for as long as he wants, to the prejudice of all concerned.

In addition, no provision is made for appealing the minister's decision. In this case the decision of the minister is absolute, whether it be given capriciously or otherwise. I think provision should be made for giving relief to the parties in this regard. No reference is made to the minister withholding his approval because, for example, he considers that the price being paid is too low. He can withhold approval for all sorts of reasons. The parties to the transaction have no means of getting recourse if everyone but the minister is satisfied.

The Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is brought into the picture, with regard to sales finance companies, as a lender-of-last-resort. We all know the history leading to the establishment of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. It has a curious history because it arose as the result of legislation outside the Bank Act and the government of the day did have the moral rectitude or fortitude to recognize that it had sole jurisdiction over money and banking and no provincial government had the right of intervention in respect of deposit insurance.

In any event, we have the curious creation of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation being conditional upon provincial consent in so far as concerns trust companies and other deposit receiving institutions which participate under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. This is not the purpose of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, being merely a lender-of-last-resort under the provisions of the legislation covering sales finance companies. In this role, what is it entitled to do? Under the provisions regarding a lender-of-last-resort to a sales finance company, such a company would be entitled under certain conditions to obtain a loan from the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to enable it to obtain the liquid funds needed to discharge its maturing debt obligation; in other words, the deposit certificates it may have. There is nothing in the bill about shares. It refers to maturing debt obligations. That does not mean the company would necessarily remain solvent. In other words, there would still be a lot of people who could lose a great deal of money, although there are limitations on loans.

The attention of hon. members should be drawn to these particular sections. The measure says there shall be a certificate of registration for such companies. These are issued for a limited term. These certificates may be refused, but I suggest a good deal of explanation must be given as to the working of these certificates and the powers of the minister in regard to registration.

I shall now make some remarks in respect of the general penalty clause. There is no relief here whatsoever. An absolute penalty is provided under clause 37 of the bill whereby every investment company which fails to apply for a certificate of registry within a period of time is guilty of an offence and may be fined up to $10,000. I agree that a person who makes a false statement from the director's office, a servant or an auditor of an investment company, should be penalized financially or otherwise. There is a general provision that every person who causes or permits to be done any matter, act or thing contrary to any provision of the act, the regulations or any order or requirement of the minister or the superintendent, shall be guilty of an offence. But there is no relief; there is no provision for cases of inadvertence, an act of omission or commission which is committed innocently. In any event, a person who is guilty of such an offence is liable, upon summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding $5,000.

Such a provision should carry some relief in that a mistake or act committed innocently, contrary to the provisions or regulations, should not be the subject of this type of penalty, particularly when we consider the powers of the minister to make regulations under clause 32. We do not have here the usual type of clause which is provided in government omnibus bills of this kind. Usually the Governor in Council has the authority to make regulations to ensure the proper carrying out of the provisions of an act. We should like an explanation of this change in wording.

There is in clause 27 a very curious provision in respect of detailed reports. The superintendent, after the termination of the fiscal year, shall make a report to the minister in such form as the minister may direct on the administration of this act during that fiscal year. In other words, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation shall submit to the superintendent a report, in the form prescribed by the minister, of its operations during the year. A report by that corporation pursuant to the act shall be a sufficient report of the activities of the corporation under the act. The clause states that these activities shall not be reported on by the corporation in its report.

I now refer to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. It has reference to the activities of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and provides that the report be made to the Superintendent of Insurance. That is where it stops. There is no provision for the publication of an annual report to Parliament. It is very curious that this should be the case, because the provisions of the act allow the corporation to lend up to $200 million of public funds for the purpose of tiding over one or more sales finance companies. The use of $200 million is not just an everyday occurrence, yet Parliament is not to know about it. No report is to be made to Parliament under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act; it merely requires a report to the Superintendent of Insurance.

I would put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the Superintendent of Insurance does not, then, report to the minister with regard to this provision. If I should be wrong and there will be an ultimate report, I am quite prepared to accept the correction. However, according to the way I read the legislation there is no such provision.

In resumé, let us look at this bill. The Senate made vital changes to the bill. There were certain additions. One was the reduction of the application of the bill by providing an exemption clause in respect of companies which met certain criteria. There was restriction of the government power to enact further legislation by Order in Council. As I said, Bill S-17 as rewritten was passed by the Senate and we now have a new bill. There have been minor grammatical and phrasing changes because the Department of Justice prefers certain grammar and phraseology. There are minor administrative changes. There is the inclusion of one administrative subclause that was not in the Senate bill. I refer to clause 27(3) which is inserted due to the non-Senate, sales finance companies provisions which have been tacked onto the Senate bill.

Somehow or other it seems we had the investment companies coming forward as part of the package of trust companies, loan companies and insurance companies, and suddenly last fall they thought about the sales finance companies. We have the question of trying to withhold changes in ownership. I should point to other things. First of all, there is the system of payment by investment companies for policing whereby each company would be assessed according to its mean assets. There will be difficulty in defining that provision. There will be a difficulty in defining a subsidiary, a firm whose shares are 75 per cent owned by another company. I am satisfied that a subsidiary can be controlled by much less ownership than that. We will see in the committee what the reason is for this 75 per cent.

There is a requirement in the bill that the Minister of Finance approve an investment company's supplementary letters patent. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this would provide just one more hurdle to overcome when solicitors and auditors are trying to satisfy a client's need for fast action from the government in Ottawa.

Clause 4 of the bill is the one to which reference is made in general terms. It would seem to me this is subject to the charge of patronage, because when one reads the clause one finds the following:

> Letters patent shall not be issued under any act of the Parliament of Canada to incorporate a company primarily for the purpose of carrying on the business of investment without the consent of the minister; and no supplementary letters patent shall be issued, in respect of a company that holds a certificate of registry that has not lapsed or been withdrawn, without the consent of the minister.

It would seem to me this introduction of ministerial discretion in respect of this and other types of companies lends itself to the possibility—I am not pointing the finger at any present or past minister—that with regard to sales finance companies the issuance of or amendment to letters patent could be achieved by the right kind of friends making application to the government. After all, one does not have to be born yesterday to acknowledge that this can be done. It seems to me the withholding of consent by the minister could be dangerous.

There are many other provisions in respect of which there will be comment. I am not satisfied that it is simply an administrative bill that the government would like to bring forward. I am not satisfied that there is not included in it an attempt by the ministry to get further and further control over one type of business in this country, as there is in respect of other types. We know changes are going forward to the Corporations Act which would give the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs very extensive powers to examine companies on his own initiative without there being any indication of anything wrong; that is, he could do it merely on the basis that he feels it is in the public interest.

This form of big brotherism has crept in. It is all part and parcel of a course of conduct by this administration in respect of Canadian business. In any event, we intend to examine this bill very carefully in committee. I have, and I am sure my colleagues will have, amendments to propose in respect of certain clauses.

I think that on the whole we must pass the motion for second reading and referral to the committee with reservations. We are not impressed by the legislation but we are prepared to let it go to the committee and to see what happens when it gets there and when it returns to the House.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in looking at the bill before us we get the feeling we have seen it before. It is very similar in many ways to other financial bills which have come before the House in respect of investment companies, trust companies, loan companies, mortgage companies, finance companies, and to some extent the Corporations Act. As these bills are introduced, a number of questions are raised in my mind concerning whether all that is being done is a little housekeeping. The government seems to be trying to protect the investors of these companies. This in itself is a very good thing and should be commended.

I believe we should be going beyond this point in light of the important influence these companies have on our society. We should be asking questions about financial bills beyond the extent to which they protect investors. One difficulty which faces anyone who examines a specific bill is the overlapping which is apparent. For instance, we now have in the trust companies bill indications of overlapping into banking, consumer credit and other business areas. Insurance companies will be investing. Virtually all the finance bills we have looked at include the power to invest; they have blanket clauses in respect of that power. It is difficult to draw the distinction between an insurance company and a company in the investment business. I know that in the other place that difficulty was overcome by changing it from 25 per cent of their activity to 40 per cent. It seems that this has made the situation worse rather than better.

Even corporations that are not considered to be financial institutions carry out a fair amount of investing with their surplus funds. As we examine the economic prospect in the next few years and consider the need to use our investment funds to the best purpose, we must agree that one cannot have financial bills just for the protection of investors, worthwhile as that may be. Financial bills must also reflect the public interest and ensure that the investment funds of this country are used in the best interests of all Canadians. This has not been done in the past.

If we agreed with this principle and did so in the future, we would move ahead much more quickly. We would have more say about inflation and about the nature and extent of growth and productivity. I think the time has come when these overlapping distinctions between financial institutions and corporations should be put together in one corporations act so we could recognize that to some extent they perform similar kinds of functions. To the extent that they are different, special clauses could exist within the framework of an over-all corporations act which would take into account the specific functions of institutions which may be somewhat more specialized than others.

In some ways the different approach to financial institutions under a corporations act might bring beneficial results, particularly with regards to foreign ownership. I find it very difficult to understand the logic of the government and of the other place that financial institutions should be protected from foreign takeovers, but the industry of Canada, the basis of our wealth and prosperity, requires no such protection.

It seems to me that a finance company exercises less influence on the destiny of this country than does investment in automobiles, mining, or pulp and paper, to give a few examples. Therefore, we should be looking at a corporations act that picks up some of the good features of these financial bills and encompasses a total philosophy that we can develop toward the nature and operation of corporations of all kinds in this country. I know that generally this is not done and probably there is not much precedent in other countries for so doing.

When the minister spoke it was quite obvious that some of the bills that come before us—and this one in particular—were to some extent modelled on legislation south of the border. It is time we did something that made more sense for Canada than copying what other countries are doing. We should be developing a philosophy within the framework of an over-all corporations act.

There is another problem that arises in the examination of finance bills, and perhaps it arises in the examination of almost any piece of legislation before the House. I refer to conflict of interest. It has been sensibly pointed out on a number of occasions that everyone has a conflict of interest. Certainly everyone in this House, and perhaps every citizen in Canada, has a conflict of interest. If you are going to insist that people who examine this legislation be absolutely free of conflict of interest, you will never find anyone who can do this kind of work. But it should not end there. While recognizing the difficulties involved in this conflict of interest, and that it is almost impossible to say that anyone who has the slightest conflict should not be involved in drafting this legislation, we can ensure that everyone states their position when they examine the legislation.

If this were done, much of the suspicion that surrounds financial bills and some provisions of the legislation passed in the House would disappear. In my opinion it is not necessary to exclude people per se, because they are involved with financial institutions, from examining them. It may be their experience would be of some help. What is important is that the public know what is their involvement in financial institutions, so they can be judged according to the suggestions they make and the kind of votes they pass on such legislation.

There is not much time this afternoon to do more than make these few brief remarks and to point out that there will be adequate opportunity for us to examine this legislation in the committee. But I urge hon. members, through you, Mr. Speaker, to consider the two main plants that I have tried to make: first, that institutions tend to blend into each other so that it is becoming very difficult to differentiate one from the other. Therefore, we need an all-encompassing corporations act that will take this fact into consideration. Second, in order that absolute confidence be maintained in the decisions taken in the House and in the other place, members of both Houses should be required to state their interest in any legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have now had some time to consider this bill. Unanimous consent, which was essential so that the matter could be placed before the House today, was not withheld. This is a very important bill, and as the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) said, some of us have grave reservations about certain aspects of it and would like to re-examine the bill in light of what the minister has said. In view of the fact that this progress has been made, I believe there is a disposition that Your Honour call it six o'clock, rather than the time which now appears on the clock, so that the bill could again be brought forward at such time as the government sees fit.

I say quite frankly that there is no chance that it can be completed today. In any event, the minister would want to respond to the very reasonable statements which have been made by the hon. member for Edmonton West and the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). I therefore hope that the House in its infinite wisdom will recommend to Your Honour that you now call it six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

COMMUNICATIONS

STATEMENT ON RADIO RELAY LICENCES

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform hon. members of the following decision regarding radio relay licences.

The government of Canada, using the power vested in the Minister of Communications to grant licences to operators of radio-relay systems, is implementing an interim policy regarding the establishment of new communications services using microwave relays. This policy will apply pending possible changes to be recommended by the Telecommission.

In recent years licences for such systems have been granted mainly on technical grounds. However, the growing social and economic importance of this form of telecommunications requires that more attention be placed on other criteria if we are to assure an orderly growth of the Canadian communications system which will assure maximum social benefits and minimum of wasteful duplication of investment.

The use of a systems approach in the granting of licences for microwave relays implies that applicants will have to demonstrate:

That there is some public interest and need to be served by the creation of the new facility;

That existing communications facilities cannot properly satisfy this interest and need;

That the applicant will conform to the standards of service and the technical requirements of the existing network so that the most effective and economical use of the radio spectrum is assured.

This means that licences will not be granted until applicants have submitted a detailed economic-commercial brief that will permit the department to assess the system and make a decision based on these criteria. The applicant will also be required to submit an equally detailed engineering brief so that the department may determine if the proposed facility meets technical performance standards set out by the Department of Communications. Furthermore, the department will not consider itself bound by financial or commercial commitments made by the applicant before a licence has been granted.

The primary objective of these new procedures is to provide for the planning of the efficient and orderly growth of the Canadian telecommunications network in the social and economic interests of Canadians in all parts of Canada. It will allow the Minister of Communications, in the granting of new licences for microwave relays, to determine that the new facilities will provide significant advantages over existing facilities in terms of cost, convenience and quality of service.

The new microwave licensing approach should make it easier for the federal government to perform more effectively its function of co-ordinating national telecommunications policy with provincial requirements and programs of provincial development.

The principles outlined in this statement in no way prejudge the recommendations which may be made to the government as a result of the Telecommission. Consequently this policy is to be regarded as one that is subject to review in the government's over-all study of Canadian communications needs.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I sincerely thank the minister for giving me a copy of this statement well in advance of the time of delivery. I appreciate this very much. However, this brings me to the end of the nice things I can say about the minister and the statement. I quite understand why the minister would want to take off the rather battered steel helmet he wears as Postmaster General and put on the more modern efficient hat of Minister of Communications. I think the House would appreciate a few more statements in the House by him as Postmaster General about the efficiency of the Post Office. This may be irrelevant so I shall not say more about it.

The fact is that when one looks at this statement, as is the case in respect of some other statements—I am not trying to drive ministers away from making essential statements—one wonders whether it was really necessary. I shall just read one sentence from part of the statement:

> However, the growing social and economic importance of this form of telecommunications requires that more attention be placed on other criteria if we are to assure an orderly growth of the Canadian communications system which will assure maximum social benefits and minimum of wasteful duplication of investment.

The minister stopped there but the statement I have goes on to say, "In a field where resources are both scarce and essential for the development of the full potential of all segments of Canadian society."

These are stirring words for the Canadian people. If the minister means that in his program he will take into account the public interest, that is all that needed to be said. We would have thought that all government departments would have done this and would continue to do it, although we have some doubts about some government departments at the present time. Consequently I cannot really bubble over with enthusiasm about this statement. There is one part which I do think is different and needs some further comment:

> That there is some public interest and need to be served by the creation of the new facility.

One wonders how this should be read in light of what has been said by the Chairman of the CRTC in connection with microwave facilities for cablevision. I know that a large percentage of Canadians in the large metropolitan areas of southern Canada are already polluted by the television and radio broadcasts coming into Canada from the United States, but it is the poor people of central and northern Canada who continue to be the objects of the forced infusion of Canadian culture by the authority who should be allowed to decide whether they should have Canadian culture particularly or whether or not they ultimately would like to have it with some variety. When there is a conflict of interest as to how well the public interest is served by the creation of the new facility between the Minister and the CRTC and their interpretation of the Broadcasting Act, one wonders with whom the decision will lie and what will be the result. This is a question which should be answered, particularly in light of what we heard this morning from Mr. Juneau, the chairman of CRTC.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it was good of the minister to send us this morning the text of his statement. Fortunately he sent it by messenger rather than by mail because, judging by the way the mail is coming and going in my home town of Winnipeg, if he had sent it by mail it would not be here until next week.

I believe we all agree with the basic principles which the minister enunciated as the policy of the government. We can support the idea that not only the commercial and technical aspects of applications will be considered but also the whole question of the public interest. This we can endorse. We will, of course, be watching very carefully how the minister and the department interpret this principle in the actual granting of applications.

One thing which is of concern to us and which we think has not been resolved is that the making of decisions with regard to applications for facilities of this kind seems to be divided among the Department of Communications, the Department of Transport and the CRTC. We think this is not a good thing. We think the government should clear up the grey area and specify who has the responsibility because until that is done it will be very difficult to assess who has made the mistake, if one has been made.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

MONTREAL—CONFLICT IN MAIL TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I solicit the indulgence of the House to raise at this time an urgent question of national interest related to the dire situation of mail transportation in Montreal. Under Standing Order 43, I seek unanimous consent of the House to put forward, seconded by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent, the following motion:

That the matter of mail transportation employees in Montreal be immediately referred to the appropriate committee of the House, with instructions to review the cause of the conflict, ways and means of bringing it to an end, accusations brought by the minister against the union and vice versa and all other related questions.

Mr. Speaker, if the House will allow me to give some explanations—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Standing Orders do not allow the hon. member to give explanations. If he refers to them, he will see that he can comment on the urgency of the motion that he is bringing in.

It should never be forgotten that we have to differentiate between Standing Order 26 and Standing Order 43 and I have already taken the liberty to suggest that Standing Order 26 having been modified, we should not place ourselves in a situation where we disregard the decision taken by the House to change the procedure as regards urgent matters.

Under Standing Order 43, the hon. member is free to indicate to the House the urgency of the matter that he is moving for consideration under his motion.

Mr. Valade: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I intended to explain to the House the urgency of the matter and then to state why it is urgent.

A disastrous situation prevails, affecting the whole economy of Canada, both economically and socially. In fact, as reported in Hansard on February 10, the minister stated, and I quote:

I may say that we are quite disturbed and I intend to go down to Montreal tonight. We are concerned about the violence and also the threats by the union to disclose various public activities that have been engaged in in recent years.

Those words spoken by the minister clearly indicate that the question is urgent and of national importance. The whole postal system is presently disrupted.

Welfare recipients no longer receive in due time, as they should, their allowances. The stability of businesses is threatened, since the collection of bills is slowed down. It is a problem which affects the whole Canadian economy and especially the metropolis.

The minister promised the House that he would take the necessary steps to settle that conflict. Up to now, conditions have worsened, and each time the minister intervenes in the conflict, the situation gets worse. The minister must tell us what measures he intends to take to settle that conflict. I am asking the House, if the minister is unable to reply to my question, to agree that the matter be referred to the committee concerned.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion put forward by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie.

Pursuant to Standing Order 43, the motion cannot be formally introduced to the House without unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore, the motion cannot be introduced.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR GRANTING OF CITIZENSHIP TO CERTAIN PERSONS

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-185, to amend the Canadian Citizenship Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to allow the granting of citizenship to persons to whom citizenship has been denied because of membership in organizations considered subversive, who have not been involved in subversive activities, have no criminal record against them, and can qualify for citizenship in every other respect.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: Oral questions.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if my information is correct, last night the Prime Minister had a little supper with several mayors and reeves, and I thought he would make a statement this afternoon with respect to the many matters discussed—the constitution, urban renewal and a tri-level conference. I would hope the Speaker would allow the House to revert to motions so the Prime Minister can make a statement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair is always prepared to allow the House to go back to motions, but the hon. member might raise this matter as a question in due course. It is not a point of order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—SEEKING OF STAND-BY POWERS RESPECTING CONSUMER CREDIT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether it is the intention of the government to seek stand-by powers to regulate the terms of consumer credit, particularly down payments and length of time for payments?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the practice is that if the government is going to introduce legislation, it is announced in due course when the legislation is introduced.

[Later:]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether it is his intention to give serious consideration to the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with regard to the creation of stand-by powers to regulate the terms of consumer credit?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, naturally that committee's report is receiving and will receive very careful consideration but any statement on consumer credit or change in the government's financial policy should come from my colleague, the Minister of Finance.

INFLATION—CONSENSUS REACHED BY NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PRICE STABILITY—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he is in a position today, which he apparently was not yesterday, to tell the House what the plans of the government are with regard to the consensus reached on Monday and Tuesday in the matter of restraints? Is the minister in a position to tell the House what course of action the government intends to follow with regard to that consensus?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Well, I thought, Mr. Speaker, that in my very full answer yesterday I made it clear that we intended discussing the statement by the National Conference on Price Stability with the provincial premiers on Monday.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the desirable objective of the government to set an example in the problem of inflation, does the government intend industry to follow its example of a 9 per cent increase in costs during the year?

Mr. Basford: If we had followed the example we received from members opposite the increase would have been very much greater than it has been.

INFLATION—ACTION TO SEEK CO-OPERATION OF UNIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the widespread scepticism expressed yesterday by leaders of organized labour regarding the results obtained at the conference in Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday, would the minister take the first opportunity on motions to explain the full scope of these results and what role the government is going to ask organized labour to play in this national campaign to curtail inflation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe that opportunity will arise this afternoon and this evening when the House will be debating the motion to be considered today, and I intend to speak on that motion.

Mr. Stanfield: Oh, you are going to tell us then, are you?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, does the House have the assurance of the minister that he will answer that question specifically in the debate this afternoon? Yes or no?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca on a supplementary.

Mr. Hees: Get on your feet.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister of evasion.

Mr. Hees: He won't say one word about it.

Mr. Trudeau: Would you?

Mr. Hees: You stick around for the debate and I will tell you a few things this afternoon that will do you a lot of good.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Athabasca now has the floor.

Mr. Yewchuk: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Will he be prepared to answer questions today or is he going to sit and pout throughout the question period as he did yesterday?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURES TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT AMONG YOUNG CANADIANS

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister if I can get his attention. In view of the very significant increase in unemployment among young single Canadians between the ages of 14 and 19 and also young married people between the ages of 20 and 34, is the government considering special emergency measures for dealing with unemployment among the younger members of Canada's labour force?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer that question, may I remind my hon. friend that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate has dropped consistently since last October.

Mr. Hees: It has not.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: It is up this month and will go up.

An hon. Member: The minister should be accurate.

Mr. Hees: He knows that perfectly well.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member will do a little research before he makes his speech this afternoon.

Mr. Hees: My research was done for me by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I saw a report this morning and I hope the minister will also look at it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my understanding that a question was asked by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. Perhaps the reply should be directed to that hon. member. I also understand that the minister had not quite finished replying to the question. I ought to remind hon. members that we have an opposition motion for consideration later today and it will to some extent, I gather, cover much of the ground now being investigated by questions which have been asked and answers given. Perhaps we should exercise some restraint now in this regard and hold our fire for later in the day.

Mr. Broadbent: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I thought the minister was about to conclude his answer.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I was about to put the unemployment and employment situation in perspective by saying that the seasonally adjusted unemployment rate, which stands at 4.5 per cent, has experienced a monthly reduction since last October. I think that is important to remember. I think it also important to state that the unemployment rate in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces today is lower than it was a year ago and that the unemployment situation in various parts of the country has to be considered.

Mr. Hees: What about Ontario?

Mr. MacEachen: May I reply directly to the question of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. We are constantly attempting to ensure the entry of young people into the Canadian labour force. Just a few days ago I made a statement about our program for students. We intend to continue it in the forthcoming year. However, there is no plan at the moment to introduce any emergency program along the lines suggested.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As usual, the minister's answer had nothing to do with the question asked. Since the minister said on January 15, in replying to a question of the hon. member for York South, that his department would consider changes in the rules for manpower retraining as they affect young people, is he now in a position to announce to the House what his decision is in this regard?

Mr. MacEachen: No, Mr. Speaker. That examination of the rules under the Canada Manpower training program is under consideration both by the National Advisory Council on Manpower and Immigration and by the committee of deputy ministers. The change proposed is of great significance and we are not sure at the moment that we have all the facts in order to make a proper judgment.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister consider that a 10 per cent unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces constitutes an improvement over last year when the rate was 10.1 per cent?

An hon. Member: Try to adjust that one.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question about this pattern of dropping unemployment. Since the unemployment rate in Saskatchewan has "dropped" to the highest level in ten years, will the minister tell us what programs will be undertaken in that province?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must once again remind hon. members that it is obviously against the practice of the House and against the rules, citations, Standing Orders and other authorities to discuss during the question period as extensively as we are doing now a subject which will be considered later today. I remind hon. members that perhaps these questions might be asked tomorrow, but at present we have before us an order, of which hon. members have notice, which will permit some hon. members to submit their representations. I hope that we shall give those other hon. members who have other important matters to raise an opportunity to do so. Again, I understand the importance of the matter and do not want to cut off hon. members who have questions to ask about this situation. I ask the cooperation of all hon. members so that we may go to another subject as soon as possible.

EXPEDITING OF REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT POLICIES UNDER STUDY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a related question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Notwithstanding what his colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, had to say about this matter and in view of the very alarming growth of unemployment in certain pockets in the regionally disadvantaged areas of the country—I am thinking here of the Atlantic provinces and of Quebec especially—is the minister prepared to expedite some of the regional development policies currently under study?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall reply to the hon. member that under the new program the loans granted to industry are about four times what they were last year, and the amount increased from $200 million to about $530 million. The same applies to the number of jobs created and I think this program of industrial incentives is meeting the objectives we had set. Next year there will probably be a much greater increase.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister prepared to cope with the very serious pockets of unemployment in certain regions of the country, including his own province, Quebec, the Atlantic provinces and western Canada, in a special way?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what we are doing now.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Heaven help us.

Mr. Trudeau: You people don't know what is going on.

[Translation]

TRADE

EFFECT OF ENTRY OF GREAT BRITAIN INTO COMMON MARKET ON CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

After the introduction of a white paper in the British House of Commons, would the Prime Minister tell us what the Canadian government intends to do with regard to farm product exports, which will likely stop, and what proposals it intends to make to Great Britain or the Common Market in order that such exports continue?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that his question is very general and that the information he seeks would be better suited to a statement on motions by the minister. Perhaps the hon. member might so rephrase his question.

Mr. Dumont: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES RESPECTING NORTHWEST PASSAGE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the minister or any person in his department or in any other department at present negotiating or carrying on discussions with the United States of America about the degree of sovereignty Canada will be permitted to exercise over those Arctic waters immediately adjacent to the north coast of mainland Canada, usually known as the Northwest Passage?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, unlike the hon. gentleman, I do not think we require the permission of any country in the world to assert our sovereignty.

Mr. Baldwin: Why don't you do it, then?

Mr. Nesbitt: I shall excuse the minister's flippant remark, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister please answer my question? Are discussions or negotiations going on with the government of the United States over the question of sovereignty in this area?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we do not negotiate our sovereignty with anyone.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will put the question in such form that even the minister can understand it. Are discussions going on with the United States government concerning the Arctic waters immediately adjacent to the north coast of the Canadian mainland? In particular, are discussions going on about the passage of United States ships through those waters and the right to that passage?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the only part of the question that I can answer directly, because I do not understand the first part of the question, is the second part—

Mr. Nesbitt: Come off it!

Mr. Sharp: With regard to the second part, we are not having any discussions with the United States government regarding the passage of any vessel through our waters.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister discuss with his colleague, the President of the Privy Council, bringing back to the House for discussion the motion in the name of the hon. member for Athabasca so that members on both sides of the House can express their views on the vacillating and wishy-washy attitude of the Prime Minister on this issue?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED RECOGNITION OF COMMUNIST CHINA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this seems to be the day of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Today is a particularly important anniversary. It was a year ago today that the Canadian government decided to carry on negotiations, if I can use that expression, with Communist China regarding recognition. Will the minister say whether negotiations are going on? Have there been any meetings in recent days in Stockholm? Can the minister make a statement which will not approach in optimism that which he made nine months ago when he said that recognition was just around the corner?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if I may answer the questions in order, yes, negotiations are going on. We have had recent meetings and we expect to have others very soon. Never at any time did I say anything except that I thought the negotiations would be long, difficult and, I hoped, successful.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister intend to continue these negotiations of servile futility—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact it is now suggested that Communist China has promised military aid to the Arab side in the conflict in the Middle East, I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether that has changed Canada's attitude concerning its recognition of Communist China?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure about the attitude of the hon. member and his colleagues, but on this point the government is absolutely clear. If we can, we intend to move to recognition of the Peking regime, which in our opinion will greatly advance the cause of world peace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does that place the Canadian government on the side of the Arab nations in the difficulty in the Middle East?

Mr. Sharp: The answer to that is no. In this particular dispute we remain dedicated only to the attainment of peace. I hope that is also the attitude of the hon. member.

FISHERIES

COMMERCIAL SALMON FISHING LICENCES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I will let the Secretary of State for External Affairs rest for a moment and direct my question to the President of the Privy Council. I ask this question not only on my own behalf but on behalf of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands who would have asked it yesterday if he had not been called out of the House. Will the minister agree to make immediate arrangements for a reference to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of the question of commercial salmon fishing licences on the Pacific coast of Canada? I might say this is a matter of urgency, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister of Fisheries has indicated his willingness to have this done.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps the President of the Privy Council did not hear my question.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would repeat his question.

Mr. Barnett: I asked the President of the Privy Council if he would agree to an immediate reference of the question of commercial salmon fishing licences on the Pacific coast to the standing committee. I pointed out that the Minister of Fisheries has already indicated his willingness to agree to such action.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I apologize to the hon. member for not having attended to his question the first time. Since we will be making an immediate reference to the committee of the estimates for the coming fiscal year, it seems that this would be the best opportunity to raise this question. At the moment the committee system is very heavily involved in legislation and estimates. I think we should do everything possible to make sure they can focus on those responsibilities rather than adding additional orders of reference.

Mr. Barnett: A further supplementary question. Because of the fact that referral of the estimates to committees involves a very wide scope, and in view of the fact that if this proposal is to be dealt with by the committee it must be done by April 1 in order to provide a specific opportunity for west coast fishermen to be heard if they so desire, will the Minister reconsider his position and discuss with the Minister of Fisheries a specific reference of this subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has now made his representation.

SEALS—DECISION ON REQUEST FOR COMPROMISE IN DATES OF HUNT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries. Can the Parliamentary Secretary answer the question which was taken as notice on February 5 regarding the unlicensing of some people on the east coast of Newfoundland?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked if we would consider changing the dates for seal fishing which have been set from March 22 to April 29. These dates have been negotiated with Norwegian government officials and we have no intention of renegotiating. These dates have been set and they will stay that way.

Mr. Lundrigan: In view of the representations which have been made to the minister and members representing the east coast, is the government planning to announce a program shortly which will compensate these people for their loss of income as a result of the elimination of the present seal fishery?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we are perfectly aware of this. We have discussed the problem of the loss of income these people will suffer.

We have also discussed the possibility of changing these dates. Our scientists have advised us that because of conservation measures it would not be proper to change the dates. The programs we have initiated over the last year have been beneficial to the fishermen, more so than in any year in the past. We hope our programs will continue to benefit the fishermen this year, too.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lundrigan: I think the minister's Parliamentary Secretary has misled the House in not answering the question I raised and by giving the impression that the government does have a program. The government does not have a program, and false information has been given to the House regarding a program of the Department of Fisheries which hon. members have just applauded. This kind of misrepresentation is certainly not in keeping with the attitude of the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

IMMIGRATION

PASSAGE THROUGH CANADA OF AMERICANS EN ROUTE TO CUBA

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Is he aware that 500 young Americans are passing through Canada on their way to Cuba? Can he tell us if the governments of Cuba and Canada have reached an agreement whereby the transfer of these American immigrants to Cuba has been authorized?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is no such agreement. These people have been treated in the normal way as persons seeking transit through Canada to the United States and vice versa.

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—SITUATION RESPECTING TANKER "ARROW"

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is to the Minister of Transport. I am glad to see him in the House today although, according to the roster system, he is not due to be here. In view of the fact, as reported this morning, that the stern of the Arrow has now sunk in Chedabucto Bay, can the minister make a statement as to what the government plans to do to try to abate and restrict the pollution of the water from the sunken stern?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I anticipated that there might be some questions on this important matter; hence my reason for being here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: It is a fact that as a result of the extremely severe weather experienced yesterday in the area of the wreck, the stern portion of the vessel slipped even farther off the ledge on which it was impaled. As a result, all of the vessel but the funnel is under water. This sinking did not result in any large additional expulsion of oil, but it does mean that a larger amount is seeping out of the vessel, apparently as a result of the extra rupture in the stern section.

If hon. members opposite are interested in the details of this matter, then they might at least give me the courtesy of remaining quiet while I try to answer the question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: The present position is that we are now trying to examine means through which we can burn the oil in the forward part of the ship, and do the same thing with the stern section in its present location since we cannot attempt to move it away from where it is on the bottom of the ocean.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since the efforts of the Minister of Transport have been ineffective in dealing with this problem, and since the problem has arisen in the minister's own constituency, may I ask him whether he will impress upon his cabinet colleagues—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask a question in those terms.

REQUEST FOR LISTING OF PHOSPHATE CONTENT OF DETERGENTS ON CONTAINERS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Pending legislation to outlaw phosphate detergents, will the minister assist concerned consumers to prevent water pollution by requiring detergent manufacturers to list the phosphate content on all detergent containers sold to the public?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I replied the other day that all efforts in this regard were co-ordinated by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I think the question should properly be directed to him. There is at the moment no law at the federal level to make such labelling mandatory.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I must follow through with a supplementary. The reason I turned to the minister was that his colleague thought that women were too stupid to make use of such labelling and that they would go ahead and buy the high phosphate detergents anyway. Since the minister realizes that all women are not stupid in this matter, would he try them out—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, with certain ministers I would be afraid of the risk to their home life, but I am not a bit afraid in this case. Will the minister in his wisdom please give women the opportunity to be informed of the phosphate content of detergents and to behave like the responsible citizens which most of them are?

Mr. Speaker: As a result of the hon. member's representations, I am sure there will be a dialogue between the two ministers concerned.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to ask this question of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but since he is not in the House today I should like to direct it to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Would the minister consult with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on whether a statement can be made shortly with respect to whether or not the minister is going to take federal action to ban phosphates in detergents?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, after the previous question I think I had better consult first with my wife.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

SHIPPING

DISABLED TANKER OFF SOUTH COAST OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a very urgent question related to the previous line of questioning to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister indicate whether he has received a report about another disabled tanker, this time off the south coast of Newfoundland? If so, can he give the House the assurance that the situation has been contained and that we will not suffer another tragedy of the kind we have just had?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, early this morning there was a report that a small tanker owned by the Irving interests had a fire in the engine room while in the vicinity of Placentia Bay on the south coast of Newfoundland. The last report we have is that the fire is out. The motor vessel Petite Forte has taken the tanker in tow and is proceeding to Argentia.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REDUCTION OF ACREAGE BY OTHER COUNTRIES—CANADIAN REDUCTION—PAYMENT TO FARMERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the genial member for Saskatoon-Humboldt in connection with the wheat situation, and in particular his visitation to Saskatchewan or western Canada yesterday. Will the minister say, first, whether any arrangements or agreements have been arrived at between other wheat growing exporters to reduce their respective cereal acreages this year? Second, will the minister say whether the government is now considering, in view of the interview he gave while in London, having some ten million acres taken out of cultivation over a period of two years, with the government paying some $20 an acre to farmers who are in the position of having to reduce their acreage?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first question is no. In answer to the second question may I say that the question contained a reference to certain figures which bear no relationship to anything that I did say. I should like to assure the right hon. member and other members that the government is very seriously looking at the problems of land adjustment, resource adjustment and acreage adjustment in the prairie region in the hope of producing advice that will be meaningful to individual farmers in time for seeding this year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the minister for his answer, but I now ask him whether the government intends, whatever may be the acreage determined upon, to make a payment to western farmers who go out of the production of wheat pursuant to a direction given them by the government of Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, this is a question about our intentions. We will be able to reply as soon as our minds are made up.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary question. Is the minister in agreement with the statement that the Prime Minister made the other day, that western farmers who ride on $20,000 tractors and own land worth $100,000 to $200,000 do not need help?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek on a question of privilege.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I regret to raise this question of privilege, but on Tuesday when the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board was in the House I rose to be recognized on a number of occasions. The question period expired without Your Honour having recognized me. During that time you had asked the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar whether he wanted to ask a question. He did not, but he passed on the opportunity to another colleague. Your Honour still failed to recognize me later in the period. I have been rising today ever since the question period started and you still have not recognized me. I do not mind taking my turn, but I do think Your Honour should recognize us in turn.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member looks around he will see that each day many members try to get recognition from the Chair. The Chair attempts to be as fair as possible, though perhaps I am not always successful in my attempts to satisfy all hon. members. The Chair will recognize the hon. member in just a moment, but I think I should first see the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar who rose on a supplementary question. I will call on the hon. member immediately afterwards.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, in case you misunderstood my remarks, may I say we are quite prepared to wait our turn, but we do not think we should have to wait until someone else asks three questions.

Mr. Speaker: That is a very good point.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board whether he can tell the House if the proposals he made when out west in regard to acreage reduction received favourable support from farm organizations in the western provinces?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I was in western Canada yesterday meeting with a number of farm leaders to discuss a variety of ideas. The discussions were very good indeed, helpful to me and to my thinking in regard to our programs. This was the purpose of this kind of meeting and I think it served its purpose very well.

Mr. Gleave: I have a further supplementary. Could the minister give the House any information as to when we may hope that grain will be shipped out of the west coast ports?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members know that a vote is taking place there. I hope that upon its successful conclusion grain will again begin to move very quickly.

FINAL PAYMENTS ON DURUM WHEAT—DEFERRED WHEAT DELIVERIES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, in order to avoid a series of oral questions, I should like to ask the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board whether he intends to accede to the request made on February 4 that he make a statement on motions regarding the Durum wheat account in order to explain the lack of final payment on that type of wheat and to clarify and update information respecting deferred wheat deliveries for the 1968-69 crop year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I should like to assure the hon. member that the hon. member for Assiniboia keeps this subject very close to my mind.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another question to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McIntosh: Let me put a direct question to the minister. Does the department or the government intend to make a final payment to the Durum wheat producers?

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. McIntosh: I might also add that the way the government leaked this information through the member for Assiniboia and a senator is not the way to inform the public. I ask the minister: Are you going to pay it or are you not going to pay it?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I was not sure whether I had been left with a question or simply allegations. I should like to assure the hon. member that I have no way of knowing how something could leak which does not exist. That is something about which he is no doubt an expert. The whole question of payments is a very complex one involving final calculations before the pools can be closed, and that information on the final position is not available. Some information on the state of the law in this regard should be available to the hon. member as a result of the research staff that has so generously been made available to him.

Mr. McIntosh: I did not ask you about the pools, I asked you about the Durum wheat account. Is there a legal technicality involved in whether you can or cannot make this payment to the producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should direct his question through the Chair, of course.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I direct that question to the minister through the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, before I ask my supplementary I might point out that—

Some hon. Members: Sit down! Order, order!

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have not more than one minute before the end of the question period. The hon. member should ask his question quickly.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I was about to advise that the minister—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is now down to 30 seconds.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Would the minister in charge of the Wheat Board assure the House that wheat will be moved through the west coast ports even though the government might have to revise the plans it put into effect so efficiently four months ago?

An hon. Member: "Reviving", is the right word for the government.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, at the present time we are optimistic that all products may soon be moving again from the west coast. Obviously the movement of grain through that port, as through other ports, is a matter of very fundamental importance to us. That suggestion will have to be taken into consideration if the worst comes to the worst.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Hees: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should like to correct an error. I have done some further research since I corrected the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and I find that his figures are right.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council what business is proposed for the balance of this week and next week.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the business for Friday will be government order 49, that is the amendment to the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, to be followed by government order 67, an amendment to the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act. On Monday next, the first item to be called will be government order 66, to amend the Supreme Court Act, to be followed by government order 68, the Shipping Conferences Bill. On Tuesday, we intend to resume the debate on government order 29 with regard to the National Parks Act, to be followed by the resumed debate on government order 61 with regard to the Investment Companies Act. We will then deal with government order 36, the Canada-Sweden tax convention. On Wednesday, the business will depend on the progress achieved to that point. On Thursday it has been suggested there might be an opposition day, the subject of which is to be discussed between house leaders.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the House Leader a question in respect of the order of the business. Will he tell the House when the government proposes to proceed with the report stage and third reading of Bill C-175, which has now completed the committee stage?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize the fact that it would be difficult to proceed with it in the House before it is reported back from the committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order related to the motion I introduced earlier in the House.

I want to take this opportunity, when the Minister of Communications and Postmaster General is here, to ask him about the revolving postal strike at Montreal, in view of the fact that the minister is likely to leave for a few days.

Could not the House agree to revert to motions so that the minister could make a statement on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member suggests that the minister should make a statement on motions. Unanimous consent of the House would, of course, be needed for us to revert to motions, to allow the minister to make that statement.

[English]

I have to ask the House whether there is unanimous agreement to revert to motions to allow the Minister of Communications to make a statement.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I regret to say—

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member can go on to his question of privilege when I am through with my remarks on his point of order.

As there is not unanimous consent, unfortunately, the minister will not be allowed to make the statement suggested by the hon. member who is now rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

On an issue of public interest or of national urgency, I believe that hon. members expect the government to inform the public, through its representatives, as regards the solutions it proposes. The prevailing national urgency affects 3 or 4 million people in the metropolis, and the minister refuses to make a statement today on motions. Therefore, I would ask him to tell us if he intends to make a statement tomorrow, or later on, because he is often away from the House.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I hope to be in a position to make a statement Monday, but we have taken some measures so far and we are getting ready to take others—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister. He cannot of course make such a statement at this stage. I recognize with the hon. member that the matter he raised is important and urgent. As the House withheld unanimous consent, the statement cannot be made immediately.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I give a brief intimation in respect of today's business. This is an opposition day and we have had some discussion on the opposition side of the House as to whether we should make any change in the rules regarding the time of speeches. The consensus was that we should not do so and that the provisions of Standing Order 58(13) should apply. However, in order that the largest possible number of members might be able to take part, we hope there will be an understanding that no one will ask for an extension of time.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Is it so agreed?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the last part of the hon. member's comments. Would he repeat the point?

Business of the House

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My suggestion is there be no change in the rule regarding the length of speeches today, but that there be an understanding no one would request an extension of time.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That would seem to be reasonable.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, I think so, despite the fact that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs should need more than 20 minutes to deal with the question.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should like to correct the impression that the hon. member attempted to leave a few minutes ago that I was leaking information for the government. Quite the opposite is true in this case. It was I who informed the minister of the danger in the situation with regard to Durum producers and the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek based his question on information I provided to him.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, on the same question of privilege may I say that I think perhaps the hon. member for Assiniboia assumed too much. At least he does so far as I am concerned. Maybe the minister can speak for himself. I would never have mentioned anything about it if the minister had not suggested it was the hon. member for Assiniboia who was bringing him all this information. I said this information was leaked to the Durum producers and the people of western Canada by the minister through the Liberal senator from Assiniboia and the hon. member for Assiniboia. The minister would not answer the question. He has not yet answered whether the government intends to pay the Durum producers what is rightfully theirs.

I studied this problem long before the hon. member for Assiniboia—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has given his comments. I do not think there really is a question of privilege. In view of the fact that the hon. member had referred to the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek, I thought that member should be allowed to say a word. Since we have recognized there is some urgency involved in allowing hon. members to participate in the very important debate, and that hon. members' contributions be restricted to 20 minutes, I suggest we should commence the debate which is the order of business for today as soon as possible.

Mr. McIntosh: I just want to put the record straight—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have ruled there is no question of privilege and I ask the Clerk to call the order of business for today.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, you allowed the hon. member to get his whole statement on the record—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT AND CONTROL INFLATION

Mr. Lewis (for Mr. Saltsman) moved:

That this House condemns the Government's policies which have deliberately created unemployment up to a crisis level, thus placing the country in danger of a recession, but which have failed to stop the rapid and continuing increase in the cost of living, and this House therefore calls for the immediate implementation of full employment measures, and a comitment to a comprehensive prices and incomes policy.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I regret that the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) unfortunately has a cold which has affected his voice so that he is unable to move his motion. My colleagues and I thought it would be valuable for this House to discuss the question now before it between the time of the conference which ended the other day and the time of the conference of first ministers which is to take place on Monday.

We place in the forefront of our concern, as I suggest should every member of this House, the unemployment figures which were released only this morning. I am sorry the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) is not here because I want to say to him that in explaining those figures he made the kind of statistical statement, undoubtedly in complete innocence, which misleads the House and the people of Canada. The fact of the matter is that, despite the gracious acknowledgement from the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), if you look at the unemployment statistics the seasonally adjusted figure for January is almost always the lowest in the year because of statistical reasons which I do not intend to go into. The minister is taking some consolation from the fact that there was a dip in the seasonal figure based on an entirely false understanding of the figures. This is misleading, apart from the gravity of the present situation.

We say that the government's policies have been deliberately designed to increase unemployment, to slow down the economy. I say to the members of the government that this is the only policy in which they have really succeeded, because unemployment has gone up and the economy has slowed down. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is neither a prophet nor the son of a prophet so far as I know, but he certainly prophesied correctly when the other day he emphasized that he expected unemployment to go to 6 per cent. He has it. He has 6.1 per cent for January and I suspect, by looking at the unemployment figures for other years, that the unemployment rate now as I am addressing this House may well be closer to 6½ per cent than to 6 per cent. But altogether more disturbing even than this figure itself, although it would be enough, is the fact that there is no indication the government is ready to call a halt to this continuing descent into recession.

The Prime Minister and his colleagues are so obsessed with the subject of inflation in a completely wrong context, and are so hidebound by traditional use of their doctrinaire orthodoxy, that they show little concern for the well-being of the Canadian people in the next year or two, particularly the working people who increasingly will be unemployed in this country. I say the unemployment figures are serious not only because the rate has gone up to 6 per cent nationally but because when you look at the figures you see results which are disturbing even more deeply than the over-all figure. One finds that the unemployment figures in the Atlantic provinces and in Quebec continue to be considerably higher than the national average. It is true that the unemployment figure in the Atlantic provinces has not gone up and is about the same as it was a year ago, but I submit it was high enough a year ago at 10 per cent and could hardly be expected to go any further without an even greater disaster for the people in that region. The same is true in respect of the province of Quebec, where the figure has remained about the same at about 8 per cent. I make the same comment in that regard.

What is important to note from the point of view of the welfare of Canada's economy and Canadians across the country is that, for the first time in some years, the unemployment figures are increasing across the country. For the first time in some years the actual Ontario figure is as high as 4.2 per cent. The figure for the prairie provinces is as high as 4.6 per cent and the figure for British Columbia is as high as 7.3 per cent.

What that means is that right across this country, no longer limited to any particular regions, the unemployment figures have reached a dangerous point which indicates a definite recession in the economy of this country. I ask members of the House and the people of Canada to note the following fact about these figures, perhaps one of the most disturbing of all, that is that unemployment has affected and is affecting the young people of Canada considerably more than the middle aged and older members of Canada's work force. The largest increase is to be found in the group of 14 to 19 year olds. Canadians just leaving school are unemployed. The country cannot take care of them, and all the bitterness, alienation and resentment that that produces in the breasts of young people who are faced with this kind of situation is horrible to contemplate, having in mind the future of this country.

The next largest group of unemployed is to be found in the group aged between 20 and 34, which again means that young people who may have just married and have young families are hit the hardest by the scourge of unemployment which the government has deliberately produced in its alleged fight against inflation. This rich, affluent country about which the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and every other minister boasts, is unable to give work to the young people leaving our schools and to the young people who have entered adulthood and are beginning to build a family life in this country.

Finally, I ask hon. members and I ask the people of Canada to note that this deliberate government policy of increasing unemployment is the greatest boon to Levesque and the separatists in Quebec and threatens the unity of Canada from coast to coast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: The disaffection in the prairies, the disaffection in the province of Quebec, the feeling of injustice in all the regions of this country which are disadvantaged, are justified once again by the government's policy of deliberately increasing unemployment. I keep on repeating and will continue to do so, that this increased unemployment is not an accident, is not the result of the workings of the economy left alone, but is the result of deliberate government intentions and deliberate government policies. If the rest of Canada is unhappy about the state of unemployment now, I am sure that the Prime Minister and his colleagues the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) are gleeful about the fact that their intention to increase unemployment has in fact succeeded.

In our view this is a ruthless, inhuman policy. Any government that deliberately increases unemployment in the country is a ruthless and inhuman government. When the prime minister of a country stands up or sits down in front of a camera, no matter where, and coldly says: "I can take 6 per cent unemployment", he indicates he is a leader whose heart is suspended way up in the air somewhere and who has no sympathy for the victims of unemployment. That kind of leader of a country can only be condemned by every right thinking person.

Such a policy is not only ruthless and inhuman, it is self-defeating. The first result of such a policy is the tremendous loss of thousands of millions of dollars in the production of goods and services. To have 6 per cent of the work force unemployed at any given time means the loss of one twelfth—since it is one month we are talking about at the moment—of many billion dollars of wealth which those people would otherwise be producing for Canada and for the world.

It is self-defeating also because large unemployment means an increase in welfare costs and welfare rolls. I heard from my colleagues from Newfoundland the other day that, for example, in some of the constituencies they represent, 11,000, 18,000 and even 20,000 people are on the welfare rolls out of a total constituency population of about 60,000. All over the country, wherever unemployment hits, the result is more people on welfare. Not only does that mean the destruction of the dignity and self-respect of the people who are forced to be on welfare, but it also means the loading on the cities, towns and provinces of vastly increased costs in the welfare field, costs which neither the municipalities nor the provinces can possibly afford. What we have is higher unemployment deliberately induced by government policy. We have resentment and disenchantment across the country as a result of this policy; we have the destruction of the dignity of thousands of Canadians who are put on the rolls, and we have the disappointment and bitterness of young people who cannot find jobs in their affluent country.

There has been no effect of that policy on the price level in this country. Prices have been steadily going up, and the rate of increase has hardly been affected by this ruthless and inhuman policy of the government. So that as a result of this policy unemployment has increased, with the effect which I have suggested, and there has been no effect at all—and I say this with emphasis—on the continuing and steady increase in prices for the housewife, for the pensioner and for all the people on fixed income in this country. I do not know of any policy that deserves condemnation more than this deliberate policy which results in increased unemployment and increased prices at the same time, walking side by side up the ladder of destruction of the wellbeing of the Canadian people. Why is that?

My colleagues and I suggest that the reason for the failure of this policy is that it fails to recognize the modern kind of economy in which we live, and the fact that prices in the basic industries no longer respond to the supply and demand of the market. We are suffering from managed and administered prices in the most important areas of the economy, and they no longer respond to the broad fiscal and monetary policy. Indeed, these large corporations fashion the market, fashion demand, and therefore the hope that if you reduce globally the total purchasing power in the hands of the people you will automatically have a drop in the price level has been proven wrong, because in analysis as well as in fact that is not the way in which the modern economy works.

That takes me to the conference which ended on Tuesday night. A certain euphoria has been created in this country by the announcement which emanated from that conference and its development has been aided by my good friends of the communications media in the press gallery and elsewhere. I hope that they are right. My colleagues and I will be delighted if in 1970 this conclusion of the conference will affect the lives of the Canadian people in some way. But I hope I do not sound merely negative when I say to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that I remain extremely sceptical of the alleged agreement which was reached.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I want to take a few minutes, Mr. Speaker, to deal in two or three places with that agreement. I must do so in order that we do not have any false illusions about what is likely to come. I read one of the so-called agreements, and it reads like this:

More specifically, where higher prices are needed to cover higher costs—

And listen to the following words:

—and market conditions make them feasible, business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would ensure that price increases were clearly less than the amount needed to cover the increases in costs at a normal volume of output and sales.

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? What has business undertaken generally to do? It has said, "If I can make as much profit in 1970 as I did in 1969, if market conditions permit me, if the volume of my out-put and sales permit, if I do not suffer any reduction in my profits then by gad I am going to be generous enough not to increase my prices up to the level of the costs." What guarantee of lower prices is that? That is not a declaration of price stability; that is a declaration of profit maintenance, and nothing less than that.

Then, there is another statement, Mr. Speaker, a particularly generous and philanthropic offer from the banks, the trust companies and mortgage companies, one that only an ingrate like myself could find less than satisfactory. Just listen to the generosity of these people:

Specific commitments have already been given by the chartered banks for 1970 not to increase their existing schedule of service charges in Canada.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that members of this House feel consoled by that fact. The banks in this country have increased their service charges to a point which is usurious, which is immoral, which has resulted in immense profits for the banks and now they say, "Boys, having gouged you sufficiently until now, you may sit there and I will not gouge you any more." That is supposed to help the people of Canada?

They have also undertaken not to increase interest rates charged on Canadian dollar loans in Canada—

Listen to this, Mr. Speaker.

—except to the extent of any corresponding percentage point increase in the rates payable on Canadian dollar personal savings deposits.

Despite the fact that the banks have had phenomenal profits, and despite the spread between the interest rates they pay depositors and the interest rates they gouge from the public when they make loans—that spread is large enough now—they are saying, "If we have to pay a quarter or a half percent more to the depositors, despite our great concern for Canada's economy, despite our bleeding hearts for the welfare of the Canadian people, despite the fact that it is our nature to be generous and philanthropic, if we have to pay that much more to our depositors you will have to pay a quarter or a half per cent more on the loans that we make to you." That is the kind of arrangement or agreement to which everybody in Canada is supposed to answer "Yes and amen", with the conviction that it will do something for the economy of Canada in 1970.

I shall quote from two other agreements, Mr. Speaker. One made by the general merchandise sector of the retail and wholesale trades reads:

The general merchandise sector of the retail and wholesale trades in determining pricing policies during 1970 would undertake not to increase initial markups on its various merchandise categories unless realized profit per dollar of sales would fall below that of the base period—

The base period being 1969 in most cases.

What kind of undertaking is that? It says in simple language, "If we can make the same profits in 1970 as in 1969 we will not increase the initial markups, but if our volume falls, or for some other reason our profits are affected, the markups will go up." I pause to interject that when you have 6.1 per cent unemployment across the country the likelihood is that in many areas of Canada the volume of sales will in fact fall, and the wholesale and retail outlets will not have as good a year as they had a year ago. The volume of their sales will probably fall off and, therefore, their prices will go up. And all this will be in accordance with the agreement which the minister hailed as valuable.

The same kind of thing applies to the grocery sector which undertook not to increase initial markups on the same qualification, namely, that there would be the same realized profit per dollar of sales. I am sceptical of the value of this document because as far as I can read it, and I think I can read, and as far as I heard the comments from some of those who attended the conference, I am confident there is no intention on the part of the business community to do anything for the price level unless their unnecessarily high profit level is maintained in 1970 as it was in 1969, and that is no consolation to the people of Canada. That is not going to roll back the cost of living in this country. It is going to keep it as high as it is, and probably continue to push it up.

In this statement there is some reference to the fact that nothing effective can be done for the control of inflation unless there is a comparable measure of restraint "by wage and salary earners." All I can say in response to that is that from my knowledge of the labour leaders in this country they would be just as ready, if they were willing to mislead the people of Canada, to sign an agreement about wage and salary restraints which contained all the weaselling qualifications that the alleged agreement of big business contains, and it would not mean anything.

Sure, the labour leaders would come tomorrow, if they were willing to mislead Parliament and the people, and would sign an agreement saying, "We will refrain from seeking wage increases if our standard of living is increased by X per cent just as it was in 1969 over 1968." They would sign that, and they would then be misleading Parliament and the people of Canada in the same way as, innocently, Mr. Speaker—I do not accuse anybody of bad faith—as innocently as those who have signed the document to which I have referred and from which I have quoted.

Despite this document, the result is that the government's policy in 1970 will again fail, as it failed in 1968 and in 1969. Canada will continue to face growing unemployment, or at least a high level of unemployment—even if it does not increase, it is high enough now—and a growing cost of living, or at least a high cost of living. Again, even if the cost of living does not increase any more, it is high enough now. This is why we felt this motion should be discussed today, between the conference that ended and the conference that is to take place. It was for this reason that, on behalf of my colleagues and myself, I condemned the government policies in the strong words that I have used, and I admit they were strong words.

I wish to spend the few minutes left to me in indicating what in our view might have been—and I say "might" because no one can be positive about these things—a successful policy in the fight against inflation. We say voluntary restraint is ineffective and ineffectual, and that the kind of declaration which came out of the conference of business and professional people the other day is of little value, that all the ways in which the undertakings are hedged around mean they will not produce any effective or substantial or meaningful drop in the price spiral. The only way to deal with the situation in an economy such as ours is to impose a comprehensive prices and incomes policy with teeth, if necessary selective price controls and selective controls on all the other sources of income in this country—profits, interest, dividends, wages, salaries and the rest. Only when you have a comprehensive incomes policy, only when you have a genuine price control policy with teeth in it, has anyone in this House or anywhere else the right to ask the working people of this country, who are the majority after all, whether white collar or blue collar, to take less in wages than their bargaining power might obtain.

I would hope that if one had this kind of policy that the spokesmen for the organized work force in Canada and, so far as there is such a thing, the spokesmen for the unorganized part of the working force in Canada would agree to fit into such an over-all policy. They will always be morally obliged to ask that special consideration be given special groups because in fact too large a portion of the work force in Canada is at such a low level of income that it would be heartless to keep them there. There are regions in this country which have a much lower level of wages and salaries than other regions and it would be necessary to give special consideration to them.

Speaking for my own party and not for anyone else, within these human and socially desirable changes in the program, I would hope that the labour movement would agree to a wage and salary program. However, I am with them without qualification in rejecting such a program until such time as there is effective price control and a comprehensive incomes policy touching the rich as well as the working people in this country.

We have to do certain things immediately to recompense those groups hit hardest by inflation and a rise in the cost of living. We should have abolished long ago, and if the government had any social heart it would have done so, the idiotic 2 per cent ceiling on the cost of living adjustment for old age pension and supplementary benefits. The least that should be done for the old people in receipt of pensions and benefits is, to make sure that their dollar in 1970 buys the same amount of goods as it bought several years ago. We ought to make the adjustment in the full cost of living increase and the same for welfare benefits and minimum wages.

I see by the clock that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. Some points that I have not dealt with will be taken up by other speakers from my party and other parties if they catch your eye. I want to conclude by saying to the government that neither I nor my colleagues particularly enjoy making strong declarations concerning unemployment and the rising cost of living and condemning the government for them. I would be a much happier member of Parliament if it were possible, conscientiously and honestly, to congratulate the government for having accomplished something for the people of Canada, but it is impossible to do so as the record of the government in this field has been abominable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: It has been heartless and inhuman; it has resulted in a bad future for the country; it is unforgivable; it is out of date and we cannot but condemn it.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to have the privilege of hearing whatever excuses the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has to offer before speaking, but since he does not choose to take the floor I shall do so quite happily.

There can be no doubt but that it has been the policy of this government for some two years to create slack in the economy, and to deliberately create unemployment. I go back to the statement made by the former minister of finance, now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), in the fall of 1967, in which he stated this: "I have taken the position consistently that as far as I am concerned and the party associated with me, I do not accept this as a civilized way of fighting inflation".

For some two years I have been advocating and suggesting to the government that it use a guidelines policy in order to reduce the necessity for fiscal and monetary austerity. Yesterday, if I heard him correctly, the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked me what my policy was. I have not had the slightest hesitation in the last two years in saying very clearly what the policy ought to be with regard to fighting inflation. The former minister of finance, the present Minister of Finance and the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) have poured scorn on this approach and that is why I have been pressing the ministers in the last couple of days. I have been trying to find out what they really intend to do, what their policy is with regard to the consensus reached here on Monday and Tuesday last.

We have a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he is going to stick to austerity even if unemployment goes over 6 per cent. It has reached that figure, Mr. Speaker. I say again that it is not a question of what the Prime Minister or his ministers are prepared to stand for; it is a question of what the economy can stand.

Mr. Stanfield: I say without hesitation that we have to go back a long way to find the country in a worse position psychologically than it is today, partially at least as a result of the unfortunate fiscal, financial and economic policies pursued by this government. For these ministers to have set their faces stubbornly, and I say stupidly, against the kind of policy that for the last six months has been recommended by the Prices and Incomes Commission has been a gross dereliction of duty. They are allowing the Prices and Incomes Commission to go through the motions as if they were supporting a policy of guidelines at a time when it is very, very difficult to do this because of inflationary pressures which are so deeply built into the economy today.

I should like to ask the minister why this policy was not resorted to some time ago, rather than the policy of simply and deliberately creating unemployment. Mr. Speaker, we still do not know what the government's policy is with regard to these matters; we still have nothing but evasion from the responsible ministers and the Prime Minister as to their intentions; nothing but evasion and a refusal to state policy.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not know exactly what is meant in the motion by "a comprehensive program of incomes and prices policy". I do not know whether the sponsors of this motion envisaged a continuing system of price controls or something of this sort. To me, that is inconsistent with the type of economy we have in this country and anybody who looks at it must quickly come to the conclusion that if you are going to have a continued system of price controls then you are driven to the next step, and that is a thoroughly planned economy. This is not the policy I support.

From my observation, no country in the world has succeeded in developing a satisfactory planned economy as that relates to the manufacturing and distribution of consumer goods. What we are talking about surely, and this is what the Prices and Incomes Commission was talking about, is a method of breaking the inflationary psychology which will give us a chance to come back to an even keel and allow our traditional policies to have a chance, which they have not had during the last few years, of maintaining our affairs on an even keel. I do not hesitate for a moment to support the efforts of the Prices and Incomes Commission. Admittedly, the consensus that has been reached is far from perfect, but I am delighted with the progress that has been made and must say that the reliance of successive ministers of finance on tough fiscal policies which have done a great deal of damage to various parts of the country is, in my view, completely unjustified.

Successive ministers of finance have not succeeded in controlling inflation by these methods. Despite the minister's evasiveness, I hope the government will follow through the limited consensus which has been reached with a consistent, sensible and humane policy that is consistent not only with price stability but with the concept of justice in the country, a concept which has been totally lacking on the part of the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and other ministers on the government side. It has been totally lacking.

Let us see what has happened. We have heard much about the cutbacks the government is to introduce in public service employment, yet when I examine the figures published in the book I hold I see that between September 30, 1968 and September 30, 1969 the number of employees in the government service has increased; the number projected for one year hence is higher than the number now employed. What then is all this talk about that we have heard since last summer about cutbacks in the numbers of government employees?

Mr. Dinsdale: Propaganda.

Mr. Stanfield: When one examines the government's own figures it is evident there has been no cutback. The number of employees on strength as of September 30, 1968 was 236,000, and as at September 30, 1969 was 4,000 higher, at 240,000. The projected strength as at March 31, 1970 will climb to 248,000 employees.

If one looks at reports one will not see evidence of an expansion in government expenditures in slow growth areas of the country. For example, if you look at the public works' estimates, the public works have been used by humane and wise governments as a means of doing something useful and at the same time providing real relief, you will see that the estimates for this year are down for Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They do not even seem to exist for Prince Edward Island, although I know that they are included in the government's estimates. Public works estimates are also lower for Saskatchewan. At the same time you will see provision in the estimates for a new sort of overseas club to suit the ego, I suppose, of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. You will also find cutbacks in the defence expenditures, particularly across this country; at the same time the government intends to spend millions of dollars building a new defence headquarters. That just does not make any sense. What the government says just does not add up.

It seems to me that now it is almost impossible for the government to explain why it has stuck for the past two years to its policy of deliberately slowing down the economy, why it has been so low and unimaginative in seeking alternatives and why it stubbornly refused to accept approaches it now is gingerly allowing the Prices and Incomes Commission to venture into. I and others have made suggestions to the government about action in these areas for the past two years. I should like to hear the Minister of Finance explain why he pooh-poohed this type of approach and whether he now means to take action. Perhaps he does not mean to do anything about our present situation; perhaps the government is merely taking us through another charade.

We see high unemployment figures for slow growth areas of the country. I am concerned about those areas and about the people or workers in this country who are unorganized. To help these people we must use the tools available to us, and I say that a program of guidelines represents a tool that has been available to us for some two years. For a long time the government has refused to use it and we still don't know whether it is prepared to use it. It is my hope that the people of this country, whether they are in business or in organized labour, will be sufficiently concerned about the lot of the poor, forgotten little Canadian who is not organized, does not work for big business and does not hold shares in any big business that, for a limited time at least, we may reach agreement as to guidelines that are clearly in the interest of the country and of Canadians who are not organized. We must protect such Canadians, and especially those who live in parts of the country where it is difficult to obtain adequate employment. I hope we can put aside charges that are hurled at big business and big labour and come to some consensus that is in everybody's interest.

Mr. Stanfield: I say the government has been grossly derelict in its duty in this regard. I hope it has taken up the challenge, although it has not said clearly that it will. I fervently hope if the government has the temerity and the strength to be prepared to stick its neck out to this extent, that it will obtain the support of business, labour and all people in the country. There is not much risk in doing this for a limited period of time. We must escape from the vicious inflationary spiral. In approaching this matter let us keep in mind the ordinary Canadians, and there are millions of them, who do not belong to large organizations. They will not be protected unless Parliament and the government protects them, and God knows, the government has not done so yet.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot accept the allegations contained in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). I offer him my sympathy for not being able to be here today because of a cold. In fact, I suspect that the verbosity of the motion reflects the difficulty my hon. friend had in trying to pick holes in our policy. Our policy is a rounded comprehensive program to curb inflation without creating recession. It involves strong fiscal and monetary measures. It also involves enlisting the support of all Canadians in restraining their demands upon the economy.

The government is charged with deliberately creating unemployment. I will show that while unemployment continues to be a problem, the New Democratic Party is away off the mark in the figures they have quoted. The government is charged with causing a recession. I will attempt to show that the economy is still strong and that our policies are flexible enough to ensure that this strength will continue. The government is asked to adopt full employment measures. The fact is, the thrust of our spending programs is directed at overcoming our real unemployment problems in our less developed regions in Canada. We are also asked to have a comprehensive prices and incomes policy. Our policy is comprehensive and we are making progress in arresting inflation.

I was pleased to see that what the NDP meant by a comprehensive prices and incomes policy was really price and wage controls. The hon. member said they would not work on a voluntary basis. We, as a government, do not agree with this. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said we should impose guidelines.

Mr. Stanfield: I didn't say impose.

Mr. Benson: He said we should set guidelines on prices and wages in the country. What good are guidelines unless one is going to enforce them? We have, through our policy, arrived at guidelines which are acceptable to the people who have to carry them out.

I am tempted to repeat the words of a famous U.S. economist, who, in replying to a questioner said, "Sir, I don't agree with the question." I am tempted to repeat these words because the government is being accused of deliberately creating unemployment up to a crisis level. The facts are that the rate of unemployment, after allowing for normal seasonal movements, has been declining for the past several months. From a seasonally adjusted rate of 5.1 per cent last October, the unemployment rate declined to 5.0 per cent in November, fell further to 4.8 per cent in December and, according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in a release issued this morning declined again to 4.5 per cent last month.

Lest one say in this period of the year unemployment always declines, I wish to put on record the seasonally adjusted unemployment rates over the past year. They are as follows: 1969, January 18, 4.4 per cent; February 15, 4.4 per cent; March 22, 4.3 per cent; April 19, 4.5 per cent; May 24, 4.8 per cent; June 21, 4.9 per cent; July 19, 4.7 per cent; August 23, 4.9 per cent; September 20, 5 per cent; October 18, 5.1 per cent; November 15, 5 per cent; December 13, 4.8 per cent and January 17, 4.5 per cent. It is a fact of life in Canada that in January unemployment is typically higher than in the summer months. I will go back a few years to show what the January figures have been since 1959. 1959, 9.5 per cent; 1960, 8.8 per cent; 1961, under a Tory government, 10.8 per cent; 1962, 8.5 per cent; 1963, 8.3 per cent; 1964, 6.9 per cent; 1965, 5.9 per cent; 1966, 5.1 per cent; 1967, 5.2 per cent; 1968, 6.1 per cent; 1969, 5.9 per cent and 1970, 6.1 per cent.

Mr. Lewis: Those are the unadjusted figures.

Mr. Benson: Those are the unadjusted figures, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lewis: I am amazed you use the unadjusted figures.

Mr. Hees: You don't have the other figures?

Mr. Benson: I am sure they were not as great as in January 1961.

Despite the fact that the motion before the House is based on wrong premises, I welcome the opportunity to speak on an issue which is greatly troubling Canadians, and about which the government is taking deliberate and positive action, the issue of inflation. At the beginning of next week the first ministers of the country will be meeting to discuss this issue, among others, and early next month I expect to bring down a budget which will give hon. members a further occasion to discuss fully the state of the Canadian economy. I would anticipate and hope for considerable debate on the problem of inflation. Today, I want to talk about what is causing inflation, what the government is doing about it, and what the issues are that confront us as responsible Canadians.

First, let me say that those who put the problem of inflation in the context of unemployment or inflation are putting the matter the wrong way. As Canadians we do not face the question of whether we want less unemployment and more inflation, as some have put the issue. Nor do we face the question of whether we want more unemployment and less inflation. We do not have either of these choices before us. Rather, the issue is how we are going to rid ourselves of the menace of inflation. We do not have a choice as to whether or not we are going to adapt to and live with inflation; the fact is, we cannot and will not live with the kind of inflation we have been experiencing these past few years.

If this country is to enjoy high levels of employment, steady economic growth and improvements in economic and social justice, then the first order of business is to rid ourselves of inflation. I need not recite figures to show that prices have been rising rapidly. Hon. members opposite will no doubt bring this forcibly to our attention in the course of this debate, and Canadians generally are too painfully aware of the high prices they have to pay for goods and services they buy, of the interest rates they have to pay for money they borrow, and of the shrinking value of savings they have accumulated during their lifetimes. If for no other reason than to protect those who are suffering because of inflation, and who cannot muster the strength or bargaining power to try to protect themselves, inflation must be beaten.

But there are other compelling reasons. Some people argue that inflation is inevitable, that it arises from outside of the country and that we should take our lumps by adjusting as best we can. Let me deal with this issue, since it has a number of aspects.

It is true that inflation is a world-wide phenomenon. As a matter of fact, if we look at the battle against inflation during 1969, we find that in our fight against inflation the cost of living rose less in Canada than in almost all other western countries, including the United States. However, this is little room for consolation. In our major trading partners, in particular in the United States, there exists today a high degree of inflation and we cannot escape that fact of life. But it is equally true that these same nations are taking determined steps to deal with the problem. As they succeed in beating inflation, as they surely will, we as Canadians will find international competition tough and indeed, unbearable, if we have not likewise succeeded. We need not be reminded that one dollar in every five that we earn comes directly from exports, and our earnings and jobs that flow directly and indirectly from exports come to more than that. In addition, of the value of everything we buy, one dollar in five represents goods and services produced abroad. If we are to compete in our own domestic markets, we need to defeat inflation.

But let us not take much comfort from the fact that others are doing no better in controlling inflation than we. If we are to protect our jobs and to improve our living standards, we need to be able to compete with others both in foreign markets and in our own domestic markets. That is why those who believe that we can create more jobs for Canadians by adapting to inflation while others eradicate it are, I believe, living in a fool's paradise.

Secondly, we are advised by some to adjust to inflation by various devices to protect those who are unable to protect themselves. Admittedly, when injustices created by inflation become stark, it becomes necessary to find temporary palliatives. But I emphasize that the cure is only temporary. As a general proposition, attempts to adjust to inflation only worsen the disease and, ironically, the more successful one is in devising schemes, the more deep seated inflation becomes. Recent experience bears this out. The more people feel protected against inflation, the more they believe that inflation will continue. The more they act on the assumption that inflation will continue, the more inflation there actually is.

Worse still, some groups try to get ahead of the game by anticipating further inflation. They speed up their purchases; they demand income increases that more than offset past price rises; and as a consequence prices and costs rise even more. So-called adjustments for some become higher costs for others, and inflation becomes self-reinforcing.

Thirdly, attempts to adjust to inflation create difficulties in the capital markets. There is an extreme reluctance on the part of savers to commit their funds for long periods of time, except at very high rates of interest. It becomes more difficult for borrowers to sell long-term bonds, and governments in particular are forced to cut back on essential public investments and services, or raise taxes, or do both. Likewise, prospective homeowners needing mortgage funds are forced to pay record high interest rates, or cannot find the money at all. These then, Mr. Speaker, are some of the effects of trying to live with inflation: the unprotected get hurt, job opportunities are jeopardized and money is hard to come by for necessary social capital.

Let me turn for a moment to the causes of inflation before I outline the approach of the federal government to solving the problem. The root causes of inflation are to be found in attempts by Canadians to take more out of the economy than they were capable of putting into it. Demands of all kinds for goods and services, both public and private, were greater than our ability to satisfy them. The incomes generated by these demands of consumers, business, governments and foreign purchasers of our products were greater than the flow of goods from our economy and prices inevitably rose.

Mr. Lewis: I wonder whether the minister would permit a question. I observe the extensive notes he has, and I should like to ask him whether these statements are based on some research that members of Parliament will be able to see, or whether they are just assertions by the minister, to my knowledge completely out of date.

Mr. Benson: I do not believe that they are out of date, Mr. Speaker, and I will stand on what I say in the House of Commons.

Mr. Stanfield: Is the minister talking of the past or the present?

Mr. Benson: The past and the present.

Mr. Stanfield: If the minister will permit a question, is he taking the position that inflation today is due to excessive demand?

Mr. Benson: I am saying that we have moved into inflation through excessive demand.

Mr. Stanfield: That is why I asked the minister whether he was talking of the past or the present.

Mr. Benson: We have inflation now. Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, the higher incomes rose, the more prices increased. The whole exercise has, of course, proved frustrating, self-defeating and wasteful. The approach of the federal government has been to establish a program to restrain increases in demand to rates more in line with our underlying capacity to grow. At the same time, the government has been developing and enlarging programs to expand our capacity to produce, but this is essentially a long-term action.

In the immediate period, the main instruments available to the federal government are fiscal and monetary policy. During the past year these instruments have been employed in a way so as to restrain demands. In my budget of last June, I planned for a surplus as a means of fighting inflation. I have indicated that the surplus will be achieved; indeed, it will be somewhat larger than I anticipated. As a result, apart from Canada Savings Bonds the federal government has not been a net borrower this year. In fact, it has been a small net supplier of funds to the market.

At the same time, the Bank of Canada has been able to restrict the expansion of credit, and has been helped in this operation by the sharp reduction in borrowing requirements of the federal government. Provincial governments have been asked to co-operate in this fight against inflation. Where possible, the restraints of the federal authorities have been placed on those areas of the country where the inflationary pressures have been the greatest, so as to minimize the effect on the less fortunate parts of the country. In the coming year, the federal government is planning to continue its policy of restraint.

Yesterday my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), tabled the estimates for the coming fiscal year. In these we have provided for items to which we and the other parties in this House attach high priority, such as support for underdeveloped regions of the country, support for Indians and Eskimos, manpower retraining programs and incentives to industry for technological developments. But in spite of these items and increases in costs of important shared programs which we do not directly control, we have reduced the rate of increase in government estimates.

I believe that the policy of restraint will work. By making it more difficult to act in an inflationary way and easily accede to cost or income increases, the rate of price increase will diminish. However, there may still be those who are counting on a continuation of inflation and who will continue to demand far more than the economy can produce. Against a background of general restraint on demand, to the extent these groups succeed the more the economy will generate inflation and the less it will generate real production and jobs. It is these groups who will be creating inflation and unemployment.

It was in order to minimize the effects on production and employment, and to speed the adjustment to stable economic growth without inflation, that the government established the Prices and Incomes Commission, so much derided by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). My colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) will say more about the commission in a few minutes.

The job of the commission is to convince those who exercise some power of decision that it is in their own self-interest to scale down their demands to levels that permit a quick return to non-inflationary growth. We were all gratified, except perhaps the deputy leader of the New Democratic party, at the results of this week's conference where some groups indicated a willingness to participate in a voluntary exercise to restrain prices as an initial step in an over-all program. As members are aware, the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission will be reporting his results to the meeting of first ministers next week, where the problem of inflation will be discussed by the federal government and the provinces.

I firmly believe that this approach of seeking the co-operation of important decision-making groups in the country to reinforce and support the general policies of restraint of the federal government—and hopefully of all the provinces—is the best solution.

Mr. Stanfield: Why wait until 1970?

Mr. Benson: Our restraint programs started much earlier than that. As I have explained to my hon. friend, in our opinion it would have been useless for the government simply to establish guidelines unilaterally without taking further steps to reinforce them. I remind the hon. member that he said he would not be in favour of price and wage controls.

Mr. Stanfield: That is right.

Mr. Benson: What the hon. member wants is for the government to hope that people will do this or do that. It is a better policy to have people exercise restraint at their own particular level. The alternatives of either an even more restrictive fiscal and monetary policy, or a massive program of price and wage controls, would be more painful and disruptive than what has been accomplished. They cannot be ruled out entirely if things took a serious turn for the worse, but surely the country will suffer less if it can capitalize on the willingness of our important groups to help with the job by observing reasonable restraint in their demands.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I would remind hon. members, particularly those in the party which moved this motion, that any system of price controls would necessarily involve wage controls, and wage controls would in a single stroke suspend the freedom to bargain collectively. This freedom, and the other practices of our market economy, should not be cast aside lightly. They have done a great deal to make this country grow. We are confident that as the year proceeds and a program of voluntary restraint gets into place, we will make substantial progress in solving what we feel is our most important economic problem.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has just talked about inflation, price controls and agreements between business men and government agencies to curb inflation.

We are considering a motion presented by the New Democratic party, which reads as follows:

—this House therefore calls for the immediate implementation of full employment measures, and a commitment to a comprehensive prices and incomes policy.

Mr. Speaker, the reason for the present high unemployment figure in Canada is precisely because we have a surplus of products.

The minister said earlier that we should increase productivity with a view to raising the standard of living. Another minister asserted the direct opposite, and the minister without portfolio responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Lang) said recently in a press release, and I quote:

The minister without portfolio repeated what he had said previously, that grain growers in the Prairies would do well to reduce substantially their output.

The same thing is asked of eastern milk producers. We have too much wheat, too much milk, too many clothes, too much lumber, too many foodstuffs, too many cars, too much furniture, too many TV sets, too much of everything!

And now the New Democratic party suggests a policy of full employment. But for what purpose? In order to produce more wheat, milk, TV sets, furniture, cars, food, while people lack adequate purchasing power to buy those products? That is the trouble, and yet, the Minister of Finance keeps mum on that matter. In his opinion, this bad situation is due to the fact that salaries are too high, to producers, to manufacturers, in short to everybody except the credit makers in Canada. We must not mention these people!

Smiling and with an air of triumph, the Chairman of the Incomes and Prices Commission, Mr. Young, accompanied by his Vice-Chairman, Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie, appeared on TV Tuesday, February 10, to announce that industrialists, businessmen, bankers and dealers attending the National Conference on Price Stability had agreed to unite in a common front against inflation and to accept restraints, with the blessings of the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the Leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Douglas).

This is a great day. Indeed, responsible men put chains on themselves lest the federal government find heavier ones for them.

After having increased interest rates and prices, it is agreed not to decide any further increase. This does not improve by one cent the buying power of the unemployed, of the welfare recipients, of our retired people and of the old. It is fine to agree not to increase prices but this will hurt the sale of goods. According to them, inflation is responsible for the increase in the cost of living. But, everybody agrees on that!

Prices are in excess of the families' buying power. Then what? Inflation must be stopped! Certainly and this is urgent. Moreover, the minister just said so. But if someone is sick or should have a limb cut off, the sickness should be cured and the sick limb should be cut off. If your toe has to be amputated, you will not have your arm cut off.

Prices must not be allowed to rise. Everybody agrees on that.

But are not prices set in line with costs? Logically, the stress should have been put on reducing production costs before lowering prices. But this has been ignored, and it is suggested that the fight should be against the consequences rather than against the causes of inflation, of price increases.

The Minister of Finance has just given the causes of inflation. I intend to give him others. Businessmen, men in politics, members of the Prices and Incomes Commission, are making fools of themselves by not tackling the causes of price rises. The opponents of Social Credit usually say that putting its theories in practice would lead to inflation.

The Liberals said it and they still repeat it occasionally. The Progressive Conservatives said it also and the economists have repeated it. Today Canada and the United States are faced with inflation, like almost all the nations of the western world. Who is responsible? Social Credit, which is not applied anywhere, or the present financial system?

The Créditistes know what inflation is, like the Liberals, the Progressive Conservatives and the socialists. I do not know whether they know it well but we do. Unlike the other political parties which are all in the service of finance and do not want to get out of the system, the Créditistes know the solution to the problem of inflation.

It is said that inflation consists in a steady increase in prices or else in a too abundant supply of money in circulation when goods are scarce.

If a member or a minister, for instance, goes into a shop, a grocery store or a supermarket, he will not notice any scarcity of products. The shelves are chock full of goods of all kinds, newspapers carry pages and pages of advertising offering all that the Canadian consumer needs. What drives the consumers away from Morgan's, Simpsons-Sears' or Eaton's? It is not the shortage of products, but the lack of money.

Automobile manufacturers are forced at the present time to slow down their production in Detroit, Windsor and Ste. Therese. Why? Because of a shortage of iron, steel, bodies or specialized workers? No. Because there are not enough solvent buyers and consumers.

It is therefore clear that the inflation we are experiencing is not in accordance with the well known English definition of "Too much money chasing too few products". Why, then, are prices going up? For what reason would producers, dealers and retailers increase their prices if they cannot sell their products at current prices? If prices are increasing it is because production costs are rising.

Let us consider some items that go into production costs and into retail prices of finished products. We know that costs include the price of the raw material, capital costs of the plant and the cost of production itself.

Is it possible to cut down expenses? Is it possible to say to the farmer, the lumberjack, the miner, the fisherman that their income is too high and that prices will increase?

Will we tell the employees of the C.N.R. for example—which is granted every year funds to make up its deficit—that their wages push up transportation rates too much?

As for construction and maintenance costs of factories and equipment, are we going to say to construction workers, machinists and tool-makers that they must accept a cut in salary because the price of manufactured products is going up?

In the case of contractors and dealers, should profits be prohibited? If such is the case, it should be clearly stated and profit control should be established.

Are my colleagues of the opposition ready to suggest that school and municipal taxes or personal and corporate taxes be reduced? Are they willing to abolish the sales tax on building materials? Are they ready to tell the provinces: These are your taxation fields. We do not want them anymore, we do not want to impose anymore taxes. Come on, do something.

As for finished products, there are bank credits at almost each stage of production. For the purchase of raw materials processing, plant building, primary production, in a word, at every stage of manufacturing, banks grant credit. Credit is available to secondary businesses, wholesalers, retailers in short, to everybody. The whole production is financed by bank credit. Before a product is finished, a part of its cost was financed through bank loans. Are bankers willing to reduce the cost of making this credit? Are they ready to reduce the interest rates that are causing price increases, knowing that the interest adds up to the cost of all in-between production?

Much has been said about this problem during the meetings held in Ottawa, and the Minister of Finance has not mentioned it earlier. Yet, bankers attended the recent work sessions which lasted two days. Why has not the government asked them to reduce their interest rates?

Production of any kind needs credit. But if potatoes and wheat grow in fields, money does not grow either in fields, in plants, or in the taxpayers' pockets. And yet, money and credit are in circulation. Where do they come from?

Money appears when banks give credit to producers, manufacturers and to the government, and right from the beginning, money "claims its wages", and bankers, their interest. Then bankers compel industrialists, manufacturers, businessmen and retailers to squeeze the public by forcing them to set prices at a higher level than the amount of credit agreed upon. But with a little reflection it is realized that $1 million in credit has been given, an additional amount of $100,000 is claimed, which amount, in addition to being added to the price, creates a mathematical impossibility since how can more money than is distributed be received during a production cycle? We from the Ralliement créditiste are disturbed to find that people of good position, millionaires, captains of industries, bank chairmen and accountants are not aware of this mathematical impossibility.

The manufacturers, Mr. Speaker, are bound by the obligation to take out of the wallets of the consumers more money than they have distributed in the course of production.

Even if he were an angel, even if he abstained from food and gave up his profits, the manufacturer will always have to squeeze, through the prices, out of the public the money he has to return to the bankers and also the interest of that money.

If the Prices and Incomes Commission or the manufacturers who had a meeting do not know that, they would do better to go back to school and to study hard. If they did not find that in their political economy books, they would better throw them into the dustbin, because such books are incomplete or simply misleading.

Rising costs should be checked in order to allow consumers to meet their needs with the goods offered them in large quantities. But how? Through price controls set by some control boards? We have found that prices depend on costs. They are not decided by orders in council nor are they subject to a bureaucracy of inspectors.

Prices are set according to cost accounting and the government or the boards or the bureaucrats cannot distort it nor force the producer to ignore his own costs when marking his goods.

What must we do against rising costs? If the other political parties have solutions to suggest, let their members tell us about them. We shall analyze them and, should they prove effective, support them.

But as they have no solution to offer, let them accept the one proposed by the Créditistes, namely, the setting of the adjusted price, the compensated price, the fair price. What is the fair price of an item? It is exactly what it costs to produce it. The actual cost of production is the cost of materials used, of labor, of the wear and tear of equipment, of food consumption and wear and tear of clothing worn by technicians and workers who contributed in any degree to the desired production.

The use of materials and the consumption of food in connection with the manufacturing of a table, for instance, will constitute the actual cost of the latter. As regards production, financial cost should also be taken into account. This cost is never passed down to the consumer but is included in the price of the finished product.

The only thing that remains to do is to allow the consumer to buy the production at its actual cost by making a price adjustment. If such statistics were established in Canada, it would soon be seen that the total price charged for the country's production, over a certain period, exceeds the total amount of consumption during the same period.

It would be seen, for example, that when consumption reaches $50 billion, production offered to consumers, i.e. the total of prices to consumers, reaches $60 billion. In order for consumers to purchase the total production, they would have to purchase $60 billion worth of production for $50 billion.

The proper solution would therefore be a $10 billion discount which would permit consumers to purchase the $60 billion worth of products for $50 billion. Who would be the loser? Nobody. If someone sells a $60 item for $50, he should receive a 10 per cent discount.

Where would this discount come from? From the nation's credit, from the Bank of Canada, the financial institution which belongs to the Canadian people and that the government can use. That form of credit is based on production which, when made equal to the purchasing power, could be sold. That is unlike the endless refrains or patter that we have heard so far in this debate. The Minister of Finance claims indeed that productivity must be increased, whereas another minister suggests that production must be cut down to fight inflation.

There is only one way to solve the problem of the high cost of living and high prices: the compensated discount of Social Credit. Otherwise, you have nothing but flounderings, clashes, wrongdoings and big failures.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, a while ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) spoke of balance between inflation and recession. We must avoid recession and fight inflation.

Indeed, we are lost in a system where inflation does affect prices. However, recession also affects the Canadian taxpayers.

An editorial, broadcast over a Quebec television station last January 7, dealt with the renowned economists Keynes and Friedman. Keynes is the favorite economist of the Minister of Finance and those who have studied political economy. Here is what the editorial said:

> For over 20 years now, most of the western countries have substantially followed the economic and fiscal theories of one John Maynard Keynes, a famous English economist.

He was a success in England.

But back to the quotation:

He convinced almost all politicians that through fiscal policy and public expenditures, and by acting on interest rates, efficient balance between inflation and recession could be reached.

That indeed is what the Minister of Finance said a while ago, as a good disciple of Keynes.

I quote again:

Now, since that time, the purchasing power of money has gone down steadily ... and this tendency has grown considerably in the last two or three years. It must be pointed out that that theory suited politicians singularly—

In fact, they juggle with interest rates, fiscal measures, the reorganization of fiscal structures, etc.

I go back to the editorial:

—because it allowed them to indulge in expenditures, of guaranteed electoral value, financed basically by the loss of purchasing power of the taxpayers. Just as certain evils die hard, so do certain theories. It seems obvious that the Keynes system does not work or, to say the least, that it leads to extremely serious problems; yet, there are many who only swear by him.

The Minister of Finance is one of those who swears only by him. Again I quote the editorial.

As long as some sort of consensus has not been reached at the level of the politicians as to the true causes of inflation ... it is difficult to see how such an evil can be cured. As long as certain provinces are charged with a special responsibility with regard to inflation—

This is exactly what happens. Alberta and British Columbia, two prosperous provinces are being asked to lower the standard of living of their citizens to that which prevails in poorer provinces instead of trying to raise the standard of living of the Canadians who live in poorer provinces to that of their fellow citizens in Alberta and British Columbia, the only two Créditiste provinces in Canada without a direct provincial debt. I continue with the quotation:

As long as we put the blame on the citizens unable to control their consumption; as long as we pass the buck here and there ... inflation will continue with renewed vigour.

It is certainly not Social Credit which creates inflation. As was said—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a question of privilege. Some hon. members opposite asked for the unadjusted unemployment rate as of January 1, 1957. I said I would obtain it for them, and I have it now. It was 5.7 per cent in January, 1957. I might say that it was a lower percentage than in any January when the Tories were in power.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): My colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in his speech a few moments ago replied to the motion of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) that is before the House today. But I am glad to take this opportunity to review with you, Mr. Speaker, one of the steps that has been taken to introduce supplementary methods of dealing with the severe inflationary problems that we have in Canada today, namely a supplementary policy of appointing the Prices and Incomes Commission in order to reduce the effect of the general measures of the economic policy on employment, output and on the less prosperous regions of the country. I am amused at the fact that when the purpose of the Prices and Incomes Commission is to design and develop policies to avoid that which the deputy leader of the NDP said should be avoided, he and his party have done nothing for months and months but pour scorn on the Prices and Incomes Commission and the government's efforts to appoint and support it.

I wish to remind the House, as did the Minister of Finance, that the general measures which take the forms of fiscal and credit policies must have, as has been confirmed at the beginning of the week by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, a central place in the government's arsenal on any attack on inflation. The purpose of our supplementary approach through the Prices and Incomes Commission is to slow down inflation more quickly than those broad instruments can do and to permit us to take our foot off the brake more quickly than would otherwise be possible.

I was delighted to hear the speech made today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), who has obviously read a document that I had for some time assumed he had not read, namely the white paper on price stability that we tabled in the House over a year ago in which we outlined some of the undesirable side effects of tight fiscal and credit policies and how we were seeking ways to avoid those undesirable side effects.

Let me remind the House of some of the history behind the present situation. Hon. members will recall the fact that several years ago the Economic Council of Canada was asked by the government to undertake a special study of the relationship between prices, costs, productivity and incomes, the problems of reconciling price stability with other economic goals, and the policies and experience of other countries in this regard. The Economic Council's report on that study stressed the importance of monetary and fiscal policies, on which the deputy leader of the NDP poured scorn today, and it recommended a number of long-term policies such as labour mobility and training programs, which the government is following. But on the matter of an incomes policy, the council defined such a policy as having three main components: a set of general guidelines for incomes and prices in the whole economy; a means of making those guidelines relevant for individual price and wage decisions; and a means of inducing conformity to the guidelines.

At that time the Council recommended against this approach for Canada, although it did not completely rule out under all circumstances the adoption of an incomes policy in this country. They recognized that there could be circumstances in which sufficient voluntary support might be rallied behind that program to make the policy effective for a temporary period. In December, 1968, I tabled in the House the white paper on price stability which analysed the inflationary problems facing Canada and gave notice of the government's intention to establish the Prices and Incomes Commission. Following publication of the white paper I held consultations with a large number of businessmen, leaders of the trade union movement, professional people, consumers and others. In those consultations we discussed the potential role of the commission and obtained a wide measure of support for the policies proposed in that document.

I would like to draw particular attention to one key sentence in that white paper. Speaking of the experience of other countries with incomes policies we pointed out:

—this experience has shown the critical importance of having broad acceptance of voluntary restraint.

As the House knows, the commission was appointed last July, and the Leader of the Opposition both before the appointment and since has been asking questions almost daily in the House, somewhat ridiculing me as the minister responsible for the commission and ridiculing the work of the commission. As I said today, I am delighted to see him solidly behind the program of the commission, and delighted to discover that what he has been saying for the last year he really did not mean at all.

The commission began work immediately, and in August they began to explore a concerted program to bring about greater price stability with representatives of business, labour, the professions, and with the federal and provincial governments. The commission noted at that time that the governments of Canada and the United States were committed to bringing this inflation to an end, and, as the Minister of Finance confirmed today, that is our determination. We have adopted credit and fiscal policies designed to achieve this. But given the momentum and the pervasive nature of the inflationary forces, this will take time and might have undesirable side effects. It seemed to the commission, and it seems to me, that a smoother, shorter and less painful transition back to price stability could be achieved if some way were found to cut directly into the spiral of price and income increases to slow it down more quickly. If this could be done, it would be possible to moderate government policies of budgetary and credit restraint earlier and soften some of their most painful side effects.

The commission was told on October 17, after a series of meetings, that the leaders of the two major trade union federations rejected as impractical any approach that might involve an explicit formula limiting wage and salary increases. The commission then decided to explore with business leaders alone the possibility of working out a more limited set of commitments applicable to price decisions through 1970. The objective would be that price increases should not exceed what might be necessary to recover increases in cost, and should normally be clearly less than that.

Exploratory discussions with the business community were encouraging enough to justify the commission's proposing a national conference on price stability, the conference that was held on Monday and Tuesday of this week. Quoting briefly from a preliminary background statement of the commission I read:

The first step would be to try to work out, through informal consultation with business executives representative of various industries, specific criteria for business pricing policies during 1970 which, if widely observed, would result in fewer and smaller price increases than might occur otherwise. Such criteria would necessarily require of business firms a meaningful effort on their part to do as much to limit price increases as could reasonably be expected of them in the absence of corresponding restraints on wage, salary and other income increases.

If suitable criteria could be worked out at a national conference representative of all parts of the business community, the Commission would then ask business firms generally to observe such criteria in their pricing policies during 1970.

The results of that conference are known to all hon. members. I tabled in the House yesterday the statement of the National Conference on Price Stability. It has been referred to many times in this debate and I do believe it would be helpful for readers of Hansard if the statement tabled yesterday were to appear as an appendix to today's Hansard. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, is there agreement to that?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: If we are to have the minister's speech we might as well have that also.

[Editor's Note: For document above referred to see appendix.]

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am amused at the remark which has been made by a member of the opposition, particularly since the Leader of the Opposition supported the whole statement. The results of that conference, as now tabled and appended to Hansard, are consistent with what the commission was asking. I understand that in some respects, they are even more effective than the commission felt it could confidently expect. I might quote one section of the communiqué which reads:

There was broad agreement among those attending the Conference on the following:

(a) Business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would reduce the number and size of price increases they would normally make in 1970.

(b) More specifically, where higher prices are needed to cover higher costs, and market conditions make them feasible, business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would ensure that price increases were—

And I emphasize this.

—clearly less than the amount needed to cover the increases in costs at a normal volume of output and sales.

The deputy leader of the NDP has quite wrongly interpreted that statement to mean profit stability for the coming year. It clearly indicates there should be pressure on profits, a squeeze on profits, and the businessmen attending the conference understood that to be the case.

[Mr. Basford.]

I want to take this opportunity once again, as I did yesterday, to congratulate not only the Commission on their success but also all those who took part in the conference, for the consensus reached represents a most important offer by the business community as one step toward easing our inflationary problem. I am delighted that the Leader of the Opposition is now supporting that consensus. For our part, we are most impressed by what the conference achieved this week. We regard it as a most important initiative in what must be a continuing process in seeking restraint in all forms of prices and incomes. The Chairman of the commission, as he and I have both made clear, will be reporting the results of the conference next week to the federal-provincial meeting which is to be held in Ottawa. They, the commission, will be seeking the broadest possible support from provincial governments for the program of the commission and for a co-operative and co-ordinated approach to the problem of inflation.

In our own policies, and in support of the commission's program, the government of Canada will do whatever it can to help supplement our more general measures against inflation with this imaginative supplementary program of the Prices and Incomes Commission. The commission has developed its program with a combination of patience, skill and enthusiasm. It is in this spirit that the government approaches other elements in our society, others making price and wage and salary decisions, and other governments in the full hope and belief that we can achieve a sense of national purpose that will turn the tide and bring this inflation to an end.

As the conference stated in the first page of its communique:

While the groups represented at the Conference are prepared to take an initiative as a contribution to a broad program of restraint, they emphasize that an indispensable requirement for the control of inflation is a comparable measure of restraint by wage and salary earners, by governments at all levels and indeed by everyone.

We support that statement, Mr. Speaker, and we certainly will be following that statement in the hope that others will do so also.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order

40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows:

[English]

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Pollution—Chedabucto Bay —Developments following grounding of tanker "Arrow"; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Serré)—National Film Board—user charges; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Unemployment Insurance—Commission Advertisements Respecting Fraud.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT AND CONTROL INFLATION

The House resumed consideration of the motion (Mr. Lewis for Mr. Saltsman):

That this House condemns the Government's policies which have deliberately created unemployment up to a crisis level, thus placing the country in danger of a recession, but which have failed to stop the rapid and continuing increase in the cost of living, and this House therefore calls for the immediate implementation of full employment measures, and a commitment to a comprehensive prices and incomes policy.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, as a member from Ontario I appreciate the opportunity of saying a few words on this motion which deals chiefly with unemployment. I am at a loss to know why the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen), who is responsible for unemployment, is not in the House, and why he has not been here all afternoon. This motion deals with unemployment and with other matters directly affecting him.

So far as the lecture or speech of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) is concerned, I would like to remind him of what Dr. Galbraith, noted American economist, told the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. He was asked whether voluntary measures would be satisfactory in controlling inflation, and he said absolutely not, that voluntary methods were only a politician's way of hiding behind what he should be doing. He went on to say that the three factors which were responsible for inflation were, first, the great number of social benefits that had been brought into operation—he was dealing both with the United States and Canada—and, second, it was a case of too many dollars chasing too few goods; third, it was because the multinational companies and unions could not agree.

He pointed out that a union would strike for months until finally the company in question would say, "We must operate, and so we will pay the increased wages." The increase was then tacked on to the price of the goods and finally found its way to the consumer, particularly to those who were not in the union group and who suffered the most. Despite all the things which the minister said about the great conference that was held this week I think time will prove it was nothing but an exercise in futility.

With regard to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), who gave us a great line of statistics and a great raft of material, I say that whoever prepared that material should forget about all the statistics. He should return to the grass roots and ask the fellow who operates a small factory in his own town what is the cause of inflation and unemployment. That fellow will give the minister a lot of right-off-the-cuff facts of life which have been responsible for bringing about this unemployment. He will mention taxes. He will say, "You have taxed us to the point where we have to increase the cost of our product and now the white paper proposals indicate even more taxes. We have just about had it. This is the last straw and it is going to break the camel's back." Now, he is more interested in selling his factory than in running it.

The man who receives a pay cheque will tell you that the rise in the cost of unemployment insurance, the rise in income tax and the Canada Pension Plan deduction, all leave him with a take home pay less than it was before. He wants the same take home pay and, therefore, there is a demand for higher wages.

These are some of the facts you learn as you go around. Never mind all these statistics, all this theoretical material that is handed to members by these theorists we have. Let's get down to the facts of life, and what really causes this unemployment. As we know, the people in western Canada did not receive the money they should have received from the sale of wheat. Their purchasing power has been decreased and they cannot buy farm machinery. What about the importation of boots and shoes, textiles, heavy technical equipment, freezers and appliances from other countries? All these factors have affected the consumer market to such an extent our factories have had to lay off people.

Ask your contractor, and he will tell you of people who have to pay interest rates of 10, 12 and 14 per cent to get a roof over their heads. What has this government done about putting any kind of control on interest rates? Not a thing! We have not had so much trouble since we lifted the ceiling on bank rates. I know the other side of the story too. If we had not allowed interest rates to rise, money would have flowed into other countries. Surely, however, Canada could have sat down with the United States and said, "Let's make a North American effort to see if some control cannot be put on interest rates". These are some of the things you learn when you talk to the manufacturer.

I would have liked to compliment the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on a couple of things as far as the manpower offices are concerned. In the Guelph-Kitchener-Galt area they have an excellent office which is doing a good job. I also wanted to thank him for the free telephone service instituted. However, there are also some things that are not working well and are indirectly related to this motion before us. The government is cutting down on staff in local offices which are being hamstrung by this fact. I would suggest that if staff is to be cut that should be done at head office rather than in the area where staff is needed the most. Next, I would mention the counselling service. I know of cases where people have been counselled to go into a line of work for which they are not suited or which is already overcrowded. These things should be looked at very carefully.

Now, I think the government has a moral responsibility with regard to companies which come into Canada and buy up existing Companies. A factory in my area which had been operating for 40 or 50 years was sold to a large American company which operated it for about a month and then closed it. About 300 or 400 people were put out of work. No attempt was made to try to relocate them in other employment. I maintain that when a foreign company comes into Canada and buys out one of our old, established companies there is a moral obligation to the people who have worked their whole life for the firm. However, these companies do not seem to agree; they just buy it, close it up and say, "See what you can do to find a job". I think this is a place where the government could help. I know of another company that is buying out a firm which has operated in our area for many years. The Guelph plant is to be closed and moved to another city.

We have mobility insurance which enables the department to pay travelling expenses for an unemployed person to go to another area. Would it not be more sensible to go to a firm which is contemplating moving "Continue to operate in this community and we will subsidize you to a certain extent." The department could use the money which would have been available to pay the transportation costs of the employees moving to other communities. It is very difficult for people to be transferred when they have obligations in their own community. I think the manpower department could have a talk with the new buyer. The firm I have in mind employs 400 people and if it is closed they will be out of work. The factory will be moved to an area 50 miles away. These are some of the factors the government should think about which cause unemployment.

I said, Mr. Speaker, I would not use statistics since that is all we have heard this afternoon. Let us talk some common sense about the effects of unemployment on these communities. In the Guelph area on February 3 there were 1,760 people unemployed, an increase of 1 per cent over January and I expect that the next report will show another increase of 1 per cent. Here we are in the golden horseshoe of Canada, the Guelph-Galt-Kitchener area—

An hon. Member: And Stratford.

Mr. Hales: —and Stratford, a highly industrial area where we should be moving ahead and have the lowest unemployment of any part of the country, yet we have 4.9 per cent of the labour force registered for employment this month. If this is the situation in one of the greatest industrial areas of Canada, what is it going to be like in other areas? I am sure members from Quebec, Newfoundland and western Canada will dwell on this at great length.

So, Mr. Speaker, I am going to conclude by saying what I said at the beginning. The problem is one of taxation, taxation and more taxation to the point where the manufacturer is just about to say, "I have had it; come and buy my outfit. I do not care whether you are from the United States or any other country, buy me out. I cannot stand this taxation any more." I hope the Minister of Manpower and Immigration will read the few suggestions I have made about his department. He will see that I appreciate what has happened in connection with the area office.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter under discussion is a serious one. I hoped it would be discussed in a nonpartisan way but, after seven years here, I have given up that hope. Of course, the opposition will lace into the government. We are expected to support government policies. This whole issue will probably disappear at ten o'clock this evening. I do not intend for one moment to criticize or support the government, but I have great criticism for established or conventional thinking and the conventional thinking that is behind our attempts to remedy the inflationary cycle. The clearest illustration of conventional thinking is to be found in thinking that says the earth is flat. There are still people who believe that. There is a flat world society, and its thinking probably epitomizes conventional thinking. I do not say that the conventional thinking of government advisers who try to solve our economic crisis goes quite that far; but their thinking does not make much sense.

For example, people say this about our unemployed, "Well, what about it if the man is out of work; if he is a carpenter, he can do something else—build a fence, or a boat, or work elsewhere. Let him take a little lower wage and eventually the whole thing will iron itself out." That may have held true 50 years ago. Today, a man unemployed is absolutely unemployed because all the trades are protected. The carpenter cannot pump gasoline or paint a fence. If he is a carpenter he must do carpentry or nothing. When a man is unemployed today he suffers most grievously and loses his sense of dignity and daring. For perhaps 25 or 30 years after being unemployed, he will be most cautious and careful and never dare to venture because the frightful consequences of unemployment today are most severe.

Although statisticians may tell us that 5.5, 4.8 or 4.9 per cent of the work force is unemployed, they do not really know anything about unemployment. It matters little to the unemployed man that there are 200,000 others in the same boat as he. Our conventional thinkers ought to realize that the consequences of unemployment for any one man are most severe.

I came across another example of conventional thinking when talking to a senior official of a department. I asked, "Tell me sir, if you are to restrict credit and make money more expensive, how will that cure the inflationary cycle?" He said, "You see, what really happens is this: We raise the bank rate; that means that industries and entrepreneurs must pay more for the use of the money they borrow. Therefore they have to meet this extra cost by cutting costs." I said, "How does the entrepreneur cut his costs?". The reply was, "Of course, he must make his plant more productive and lower his wage costs." I then asked, "And how does he lower his wage costs? Will he go to his men and say, 'I will not pay you $3.70 an hour anymore but offer you $2.50 an hour to work for me.'" Of course, his workmen will not work for those wages, and therefore the idea that they will is nonsense. Yet the whole idea behind our tight money policies is that somehow wages will be brought down.

The officials also said, "Of course, the businessman would have to restrict his production." Anyone who knows anything about business knows that once you reach a certain level of production you cannot cut back without serious consequences. You have only one choice: Go ahead at any cost, no matter whether you have to borrow money more expensively, and try to produce more to stay in business or go bankrupt. You cannot reduce your production; it does not work. Everything is presold months ahead. Futures are sold; money is advanced; your machinery must be productive or you go bankrupt. Clearly, conventional thinking is wrong in this field and conventional ideas will not work in the fight against inflation.

Similarly, price and wage controls will not work either. We accepted them in wartime when we all felt patriotic. Besides, you could not take money out of the country, because the flow of money was restricted. Also, wage and price controls were designed to hold down production of civilian consumer goods and increase production that would go into the war effort. I have no doubt that business and labour will not support wage and price controls; even if they do, the controls will not work.

I will now talk about an issue most hon. members here have tiptoed around. I can understand the NDP not talking about this issue because, of course, they represent labour. We who are Liberals or Conservatives have tiptoed around the issue of labour-management relations. It does not matter whether you follow the ideas of John Maynard Keynes, Galbraith, Friedman or any other economist, including the leader of the Social Credit Party. Inflation has a simple definition. If your gross national product, as in Canada's case, increases by 1.2 per cent and wages and prices by 7 per cent, you have 6 per cent of inflation no matter whose theories you subscribe to. The only answer is that we must increase our gross national product. Sooner or later we shall have to introduce legislation to keep wage increases proportional to increases in the gross national product or to productivity of industry; otherwise, we are bound to have continuing inflation.

I have great trust and respect for organized labour. It wants to see the country progress. It is time to consider methods other than work stoppages for solving labour-management disputes. We have had strikes for a hundred years and it is time we changed our system of solving labour-management disputes. Consider what happens. Labour and management argue about something, there is a strike and production stops. In addition, we have about 42 days a year for holidays, and thus our gross national product decreases. The unit costs of labour do not go down. Labour wants higher wages for its members. It is time we recognized labour as an entity in our society and abandoned ideas that it is a quasi-legal, half recognized and half unrecognized institution. Organized labour is and must be with us. It must be given responsibility as well as rights, but we must find some other method of solving our disputes than work stoppages. Unless we do this, we will get deeper and deeper into inflation.

My reason for participating in this debate is that over the last three or four years we have observed a repetition of examples of restriction. Don't do this; don't do that; curtail this project; curtail this mine; don't manufacture more, manufacture less. One would think we were discussing a country as old as Holland, Belgium, England or Scotland. But we are not. We are setting policies for Canada, a country of hope and promise. All Canadians should be daring. We should take great risks and accept great challenges. Why in the world are we telling ourselves: Hold back; don't go ahead.

I have talked to some new Canadians who are absolutely amazed at this attitude. I refer not only to the federal government, but to the provincial governments, municipal governments and to some businesses. There is no confidence. Everybody says: Hold back, wait. Something might happen. Don't dare challenge anything. This is the wrong attitude, Mr. Speaker. Unless this government and all the people in Canada reverse their ideas and spend as much time and energy on new projects as they now spend on trying to restrict projects, we will not have more to enjoy nor can we look forward to a better future. This should be the thrust behind our financial departments and institutions.

I wish to make some specific recommendations to the government. How can all this be done? How can we get confidence back into our businessmen and young Canadians? First, we have to support new risks and challenges. The Canada Development Corporation would be a wonderful way of doing this. We have to amend most of our corporate or business laws. At the moment our laws merely encourage speculative-type ventures. There are no corporate laws in Canada which protect an investor or invite participation. This situation must be changed.

We would do well to follow the United States example where a participant in a small company is well protected. He has a voice in it. We do not have this protection in either our federal or provincial laws. Most important, money must be available to small businessmen, the keen, young men with hope. This money must come from the banks, whether they like it or not. The banks were not given a monopoly in the business of usury. They were not given the right to enter the consumer finance field with interest rates of 18 and 20 per cent as a marginal benefit to Canada. The business of the banks is commercial banking. That is their business. We have control. Whether the banks like it or not, they should be forced into this field and out of the consumer loan market. That is not their avenue. Despite all the protestations of the banks that they provide cheaper money for people to buy boats and luxury items because they charge only 18 per cent interest instead of 22 per cent, it is nonsense. The business of the banks is to support our industry and commerce. They should be told this without question.

I cannot emphasize too often, Mr. Speaker, that we must rid ourselves of our inferiority complex. We must eliminate these restrictions. We must go ahead. The only way we are going to solve this inflationary cycle is to be more productive. This will ensure that our prices and wages keep in line.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the remarks delivered this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) were a curious combination of contradictions, distorted priorities and neanderthal economics. He suggested it is government policy to restrain inflation without unemployment. He then admitted that unemployment has become very serious. Later on, he tried to suggest it is really not so bad and he tried to leave the suggestion with us that things are getting better. Then, the minister went on to give his own definition of the current economic situation in Canada and suggested that the demand for goods is outstripping the supply. Later on he hedged on a question put to him as to whether the present inflationary situation was one of demand-pull inflation. The minister said that this is what started the present inflationary situation. He suggested the demand for goods is outstripping the supply in face of an admitted unemployment situation.

The minister went on to tell us that present policies were working, but then admitted that there was a very strong rate of price increases and noted that this would probably be pointed out during the debate. He gave no indication that there would be any change in these policies which obviously are not working.

The minister said that the government intends to continue with its present policies, policies which are obviously not working within the context of today's economy. He anticipated charges of a recession. He quoted two sets of unemployment figures at different times to try to prove different points. He suggested that the economy was strong and then went on to admit the government is taking action to help some very notable weak areas in the economy. He admitted there are unprotected people in the economy who have been seriously hurt as a result of government policies. The attitude of the Minister of Finance is that he is willing and prepared to do anything to fight and defeat inflation, even if it kills him and in the process kills the country as well.

We also heard this afternoon from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). He correctly noted our scornful attitude toward the Prices and Incomes Commission. I hope the minister does not overlook the fact that our principal scorn is directed at the inadequacy of government policies and the framework within which this commission has to operate. The minister took solace from the report of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs on rising interest rates. He interpreted this as support for the government's stand. The minister may be aware that there was another point of view expressed in that committee as well. He may be aware there was a minority report issued by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) and myself on behalf of the members of the New Democratic party. I recognize that this report cannot be officially tabled in the House, but just in case it has not come to the attention of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I would like to see that a copy is placed in his hands. I wish to have this copy taken across to his desk. I recommend it to him in order that he might learn that an alternate set of policies was put forward. I certainly commend the proposals put forward in this report.

The minister tried to defend an indefensible position. Certainly, it is his business if he wishes to defend the outline of price review procedure provided in the release issued after the meeting this week of the Prices and Incomes Commission. The review of prices would take place after increases had been made. It would take place in secret, behind closed doors with a totally inadequate procedure. It is the minister's business if he wishes to defend this sort of statement and to take solace in the statements contained in the release, such as one which reads as follows:

> Business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would reduce the number and size of price increases they would normally make in 1970.

My kids have a very short and to the point comment they make in response to a statement like that: Big deal. I do not think it is going to be a deal that will favour the Canadian people very much. I was happy that the minister asked to table the statement, and I understand it is now to be appended to Hansard. This will enable the readers of Hansard to see for themselves just how big a hoax this conference has been.

The classic definition of inflation, referred to this afternoon by the Minister of Finance, is that it is a case of too much money chasing too few goods. Let us ask ourselves the question: Is there too much money in our economy? I think that such a suggestion is very questionable. If one looks at the figures relating to money supply as compiled by the Bank of Canada over the past year we see that the money supply in Canada has remained in a virtually stationary position for a number of months now.

Is it a case of there being too few goods? I do not think such a case can be made if we note that the industrial capacity of this country is continuing to grow. At the same time as we see growing unemployment and idle industrial capacity, inventories are increasing. I do not think there are too few goods in this country. However, we do have growing unemployment. In introducing the motion today, my colleague from York South (Mr. Lewis) cited figures just released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. It seems to be the attitude of the government that it must rescue Canadians from their present plight by throwing many of them out of work. The government seems to suggest that unemployment is the cure for inflation; certainly that has been the thrust of their policies for many months now.

This policy of the government will not work. It seems to me there is ample evidence on which to reach the conclusion that it simply will not work. We have continuing price increases; at the same time we see growing unemployment, the current figure being above 6 per cent. In addition, we must regard unemployment in today's society as an unacceptable device for implementing government policy, whatever it might be. I think it is a case of sheer callousness on the part of a government that is prepared to tolerate unemployment and to implement its policy in face of the conditions which confront Canada today.

I should like to give an example of a case that came to my attention during the Christmas recess of the House of Commons. This example, which is only one of many in the country, illustrates the plight of many people as a result of the policies being followed by the government. In the city of Regina I happened to meet a policeman with whom I am acquainted. We had a short chat together, during the course of which he asked me, "What in hell is Trudeau doing when he says he is prepared to tolerate a 6 per cent level of unemployment?"

He then went on to give me an example of one effect of this type of policy. He told me about a young fellow who got into trouble in the city of Regina and as a result found himself in jail for a period of time. This policeman was successful in obtaining parole for the young man because he was married and his wife had just had a child. He told me that this young man was looking for a job; that he was trying to help him, but could not find him a job. He is a man of some skill, yet he could not find a job. At the same time, he is aware of his responsibility and the pressure of his domestic situation, having a family to support. The policeman told me that, understandably, this young man felt the world was against him, and that sooner or later this young fellow would again get into trouble because of the circumstances in which he found himself.

Is this the type of situation that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the government are prepared to tolerate? I submit that this type of policy is utterly intolerable. The government seems to live in a fairyland of its own making, pretending it can talk away today's problems. At the same time it permits bank profits to increase. An article in the Ottawa Journal of Monday, December 8 last, indicated that the banks' net profits, amounting to $157 million, were 26.5 per cent higher than the $124 million they made in 1968. Their profits from operations, before appropriations for losses and income taxes, were a whopping $469 million, an increase of 23.5 per cent over 1968. We have very little evidence that the government is going to restrict bank profits in any way. The banks have given some sort of undertaking that for the balance of this year they will not further increase their charges. They are certainly high enough now.

I suggest that the government's present policies will not work because we are living in a new world, a world the Liberal government helped create, in terms of Canada's present economic structure. This is a fact the government fails to recognize. It thinks that things can be done very much as they were in the old days. Today we are living within an economy of administered prices, where capital spending decisions are made independently of the public interest. The most recent example of this was the announcement of the 1970 capital spending intentions of Canada's major corporations. Their capital spending in 1970 will be 14 per cent above the 1969 level.

We also have a high degree of foreign ownership and control of the Canadian economy; many economic decisions are made outside Canada. There is growing disparity of income and economic wealth and power in Canada, and this has broad social consequences. The influence of the United States economy continues to grow in Canada in terms of both trade and investment. The government is bankrupt of any sort of effective policy to deal with this situation. It lacks the courage to develop adequate policies and is unwilling to tackle the basic issues now facing Canada's economy. Government policy has placed Canada in an economic straitjacket. The government has used fiscal and monetary restraint in a way that has resulted in what I suggest is an unacceptable unemployment level; and it is prepared to tolerate this situation.

The government's fiscal policy puts a lower value on public spending than it does on private spending. This has weakened the government's position in managing the economy. It has resulted in hardship for many—pensioners, veterans, people who have been laid off work, farmers, those living in city slums and in areas of the country that are economically deprived. The monetary policy of the government consists of restricting the money supply, allowing higher interest rates, fixed exchange rates—all of which has not slowed down capital spending but, rather, has made it more difficult for people on fixed, low and medium incomes to finance their needs. Our fixed, foreign exchange rate has made it more difficult to act independently and to resist the influences and pressures of the United States economy.

I should now like to deal with the regional impact of the government's policies. We know full well the unemployment situation in the Maritimes and in Quebec. We now have a new situation in Saskatchewan. Figures released today show that the unemployment level in Saskatchewan is 5.5 per cent. If one takes into account the many people who are not included in the labour force that was surveyed, I think we can safely estimate that today's unemployment level in the province of Saskatchewan approaches 15 per cent. If anyone doubts my figure, I can show him the method by which I came to that conclusion.

The fact is that today there is a very serious economic situation in Saskatchewan. The province is well into an economic recession. The relentless downhill slide of farm cash income, resulting from low wheat sales and depressed prices, continues; and prospects for the future are not very encouraging. There seems to be no relief for farmers in terms of new, federal government policies or, for that matter, provincial government policies.

I could go into some detail on the situation of the Saskatchewan economy, but time does not permit. I think the conclusion we can arrive at is that the economic situation in Saskatchewan, Quebec, the Maritimes and other regions of the country reflects the failure of the government's regional development program to come to grips with our regional economic problems.

The Minister of Finance often suggested that regional development policies would offset the effect of national policies of economic restraint in so far as they apply to regions of Canada which are experiencing difficulty. This is not the case. I suggest special programs are required to help Saskatchewan and other disadvantaged areas in the west. The entire province should be declared a designated area under the Regional Development Incentives Act. We require special assistance to encourage agricultural adjustment and to overcome emergency agricultural situations. The government has taken refuge in the voluntary restraint program that is being developed at the present time. I prefer to refer to it as a Boy Scout effort, because I suggest that financially it will not work. Orthodox economic policies will not work in the present situation because we are living in a different world and we must adopt a different approach.

The hon. member for York South has already suggested that a comprehensive incomes policy is an essential program to deal with our economic situation. Such a policy would apply to all income. The suggestion has been made that there is some hesitation on the part of organized labour to go along with this policy. I should like to draw to hon. members' attention a memorandum of the Canadian Labour Congress to the government of Canada, dated February 8, 1967, which states:

> It is our view that one of the essential elements in a successful "war on poverty" involves a more egalitarian distribution of our nation's wealth. This can be achieved in a variety of ways. One mechanism that we feel deserves mention is commonly referred to as incomes policy. The definition of incomes policy varies widely but one aspect of such a policy that is too often ignored is the creation and subsequent administration of a more socially equitable policy for distributing income in the economy. It is unfortunate, therefore, that in much of the discussions of incomes policy a much narrower definition seems to have been applied. Incomes policy too often appears to have become a euphemism for wage policy and this, in turn, has been used as synonymous with wage restraint.

I hope the Minister of Finance takes note of that statement. It is then stated:

> If labour has not been noticeably enthusiasitc about incomes policy the reason lies here. On the other hand, labour would certainly give consideration to, and he prepared to discuss with other groups, an incomes policy that formed part of a total plan to distribute our nation's economic wealth more equitably.

I suggest other basic programs are required; programs to control capital spending in our economy, particularly where so much of our economic activity is in the area of capital expansion. We must take steps to reduce our dependence on the United States economy, particularly through the establishment of a Canada Development Corporation. We need help for victims of inflationary pressures—pensioners, farmers, those whose incomes are reduced and all low-income people. Some of the government surplus to which the Minister of Finance referred this afternoon could be used to this end. We should control interest rate spreads and the profits of financial institutions. We need a floating exchange rate, which the Minister of Finance so summarily rejected. We need a tax on advertising and promotion costs. We need help for municipal and provincial bond financing programs.

I suggest that the government's present policies have been, and are, a total failure. The government should change its course of action before it is too late and before its policies result in the ruination of much of Canada's economy.

Mr. Barney Danson (York-North): Mr. Speaker, I have enjoyed most of the debate this afternoon. Unfortunately, I had to miss some of it. It rather stuns me that there is so much acrimony and blame being attached in this respect, because the problem is so serious that everyone should take it seriously. I would rather we did not try to win debating points by blaming one another, particularly in view of the fact no one seems to have the real answer.

It has been my privilege to be a member of the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs studying interest rates. This really turned into a study of inflation. The more we got into this question, the more complex we realized it was. Opposition members seemed to be terribly sure of the causes and answers, yet anyone who sat through those hearings knows that economists like Dr. Arthur Smith, Professor John Kenneth Galbraith and Professor E. P. Neufeld of the University of Toronto—men each with different points of view and highly regarded in their field, but without consistent answers—believe that we must approach this problem in all sincerity and look at its many facets and technicalities in order to come to grips with it.

When constructive suggestions are made that is good. We must try many of them and study those we have not tried, to see whether they are feasible. I have heard about a comprehensive incomes policy but what this means is incomprehensible to me. This is a matter we should study and apply if it seems to have any hope of success.

There is another area which I think should be studied but which we did not have the opportunity to come to grips with in the committee. I have in mind the establishment of perhaps a new index or the expansion of existing indices such as the consumer price index which reflects increasing inflation. The problem today is that when we set interest rates, we must allow for the possibility or likelihood of inflation. When a landlord sets the rent he must take into account the inflationary factors and build them into the rent. The lender takes the inflationary factor or the expectation of inflation into consideration when fixing interest rates. The same thing applies to prices and wages.

If we could establish a suitable index or perhaps several indices that would reflect what is happening in certain segments of the economy, those people who set rents and interest rates, wages and prices could hopefully—I say "hopefully" because it is all hope and nobody has any real answers—set their interest rates, rents, wages and prices without allowing for the expectation of inflation. This would eliminate the effect of inflation which results from including the expectation of inflation. This is not simple, and I realize it does not involve an easy answer. We should study this matter. By leaving out a consideration of inflation expectation we might reduce inflationary pressure and to a certain extent help eliminate the inflationary expectation which might occur. If it does occur and it is reflected in this index, the effects on prices, rents, incomes and wages could be adjusted at intervals perhaps on a quarterly basis to compensate for the actual increase in inflation. I should like to see a great deal more study in this regard.

The report of the committee, which I think is a good report because it is many-faceted, looked at this matter realistically. It suggested many possible approaches and indicated many causes. It referred to the effects this has on the service sector of the economy. Great emphasis was put on this question and I should like to re-emphasize it today. We do not know too much about it. The economists seem to be at variance as to how much of our gross national product is represented by the service sector. After some investigation, I am satisfied that some 50 per cent of our gross national product is represented by the service sector. Some say it is as high as 70 per cent. I believe, from information I have received from economists with whom I have spoken, this is inclusive of government. If the service sector of our economy is 70 per cent of the gross national product, I think it is evident that we must look at the situation much more seriously than in the past and obtain more information and facts. As there is more automation and cybernation leisure will become more and more prolonged—except in respect of Members of Parliament! We might have assistance by that time to help us look more deeply into this question.

High interest rates and unemployment, in my opinion, are not weapons used to fight inflation but are consequences of monetary and fiscal policies designed to combat inflation. If we can beat inflation we should be able to lessen increases in interest rates and unemployment. I believe this is just what the government is trying to do. The Prices and Incomes Commission, the Bank of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada are all trying to come to grips with the situation. Many people criticize present measures, but I have yet to hear anyone express alternative solutions which have any credence. We are not sure about the consequences and must consider many facets in our approach to the fight.

The fight against inflation will not be won by individual action; it will take a broad approach by all sectors of our economy and society, each doing what they or he or she can do. The implementation of mandatory price and wage controls presents vast administrative problems and costs which, except as a very last resort, are unjustified or unnecessary in our generally buoyant and free economy. When we begin, we do not know where to stop. This system would permeate into every sector of our society and economy and bureaucracy would be overwhelming. I do not think this would help our economy. I do not think we have time to establish such a bureaucracy even if it were desirable. We have quite enough already. I am hopeful that we would come solidly to grips with this problem before such action came into play.

The principal culprit is inflation psychology, or what some people call inflationary expectations. I referred to that in my suggestion in respect of an index. Whether we are management, labour or consumers—and we are all consumers—we believe that inflation will continue. People who have bet on this in the past have been right. We are so confident, as a result of our experience in recent years, that prices will continue to rise that we are prepared to buy anything now in the sure knowledge that it will be cheaper than delaying our purchase. Most, but not all, are confident that our incomes will be adjusted upward to compensate for price increases to which we so easily succumb.

An hon. Member: What about MPs?

An hon. Member: See Stanley Knowles.

Mr. Danson: Except for present company. What union negotiator in his right mind—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am in my right mind.

Mr. Danson: What union negotiator in his left mind—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Touché!

Mr. Danson: —would accept a settlement today that did not allow for inflation? On the other hand, this very expectation helps feed the fires of inflation by increasing costs. Let us look at the situation in respect of the steelworker who recently spent 80 days on the picket line for a wage settlement that will be largely dissipated by inflation before the contract expires. How do we end this spiralling chain reaction? I suggest we are now at a time when we can slow down and even reverse this spiral.

I think the meeting between the business leaders of Canada and the Prices and Incomes Commission is a good sign. Sure, the communiqué was vague, but I think there is a possibility of success if everyone comes to grips with the government's fiscal and monetary policy. High interest rates, unemployment and high taxes have started to make us think, and perhap worry. This is the first stage in combating the inflation psychology.

More than this however some segments of our economy perhaps as a result of subtle or not so subtle government persuasion have begun to react. The banks have agreed to hold back on announced interest rate increases and increased service charges. I wonder how many others have not as a result announced increases that would certainly have occurred. Some producers have announced a rollback and delay of price increases. Two of our major department store chains have withheld rate increases on credit accounts. By their actions, I am sure they have forced others to withhold increases. Even doctors and other professional groups are joining the fight and practising restraint.

There is a pyramiding effect to such action just as surely as there is a pyramiding effect to price increases. The timing of further action is critical because in each case the announced restraints are temporary. It is costing money to those practising restraint. They will only be willing to make restraints permanent if it pays them to do so. It will only pay off if the rest of the economy, including all of us as consumers, show equal determination to join them in anti-inflation efforts. If we do not, we might have to go through a long period of continuing, and perhaps crippling inflation before we have another opportunity comparable to that which we have today.

I believe when we see everyone beginning to pull together it is time for labour to cease to opt out; it is time for labour to stand up and be counted with the rest of Canada, with the businessman, the consumer and everyone else. I realize labour has been, unfairly, a whipping-boy in the past and I can understand its reluctance to become involved in some of the efforts to date. But I believe there has been enough good will shown in so many sectors that it is time for labour to opt in instead of out. It is time for labour to stop blaming others and saying this should have been done sooner, that it is too late to do it, or that it does not agree with what is being done.

I think the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) said it is time we all started pulling together. If labour would do this, I suggest that business would do something about profits. Profits do not always come into people's pockets; this only happens when they become dividends. I suggest business might very well consider a restriction on dividends. This could have a very great effect on our economy.

There are two types of investors. There are those who invest for growth and those who invest for return. Those who invest for return can find adequate return with mortgage rates as they are today. Those who invest for growth should be delighted to see the dividends reinvested in businesses which create jobs. This would create growth and more jobs for labour, with ultimately better rates for everyone. Labour should at the same time accept its share of restraint in order to improve the economy. I should like to develop this theme further, Mr. Speaker, but I see my time is up. I should like to deal with it at another time in greater detail.

Mr. MacEwan: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, we have been treated to speeches this afternoon by a couple of cabinet ministers who were preaching the gospel of their doctrines and policies. Not being an economist, a member of the finance committee, or even particularly knowledgeable on this subject, I do not intent to deal with these matters. They are beyond me, and I believe they are also beyond the Canadian people.

In any event, this evening I want to talk about that part of the NDP motion pertaining to unemployment. We have heard it said—this has been confirmed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and is something we have long suspected—that this government can think of no alternative to a policy which imposes unemployment and hardship upon an increasing number of Canadians.

We heard the Prime Minister say at a press conference that even if unemployment reaches 6 per cent or more, he would not lose his nerve. There is not much question about his having to have nerve to make that statement. His ability and that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to manage the economic policy should concern all Canadians. It is incredible to me, and indeed to many other people, that the government, which sought so eagerly to convey the impression that it was interested in new ideas and dedicated to a just society, should resort with such unconcern to one of the oldest, crudest and cruellest of economic policies, namely, creating unemployment. The government is deliberately creating unemployment to prevent increases in wages and prices.

I shall refer for a few moments to a local matter and the role of regional economic expansion in the Atlantic area. Last week we had a debate on this matter. I do not intend to go into it at any length, and I did not take part in the debate. However, it is my belief that if the government means what it says, namely, that it wishes to help designated areas such as the Atlantic region, that is where the policy of regional economic expansion should be applied.

The minister, when speaking at various times in the House and outside and writing in various pamphlets, has pointed to all the jobs that have been made available by his department. He has also stated that the officials of his department have spoken to officials of the provinces, and he hopes that in this way agreements will be reached by April 1 of this year. I trust that this will be the case. We on this side will be waiting anxiously for April 1 because we want to see some benefits being derived from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. There were bands marching, and a lot of fanfare at its inception; but we are interested in the old, green stuff—the money.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEwan: That is what we want. Of course, it would mean increased employment in our area. This is one way of doing it. It has been said today by some hon. members on the other side that the unemployment rate has not increased very much; that in fact it has decreased. I pointed out, in a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen)—a minister from my area, a transplanted Cape Bretonner—that it is now at 10 per cent compared with 10.1 per cent at the same time last year. That is not much of an improvement.

• (8:10 p.m.)

In Quebec unemployment has risen to 8 per cent from 6.7 per cent. In Ontario it has risen to 4.2 per cent from 3.1 per cent in December. On the Prairies it is 4.6 per cent, up from 3.3 per cent in December and 4 per cent in January of last year. In British Columbia unemployment rose to 7.3 per cent of the labour force, up from 5.5 per cent in December. The matter of unemployment in the Atlantic area is very serious; it and Quebec are the hardest hit areas. I trust the new department will be able to improve the employment situation.

The eastern shore area of Guysborough, in my riding, is one in which this new department could do a lot, in co-operation with the province, to build tourist facilities and pave roads. Such works would provide employment. We are waiting for April 1 to see some of the results from this department.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): April 1 is All Fools Day.

Mr. MacEwan: A lot of things happen on April 1. We will have to wait to see who are the fools. I hope it is not the Canadian people. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) mentioned another matter which was referred to earlier in the session by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). That is the training of our younger people for employment. The hon. member for York South pointed out that the largest group of unemployed were in the 14 to 19 years age group, and the second largest comprised married men from the age of 20 to 34 years. Many complaints have been received by members of this House concerning the regulation which provides that in order to receive assistance under the manpower set-up, an applicant must be out of school for a year and have been in the labour market for three years. I maintain that this regulation is unfair.

In answer to a question which I asked last session, the minister said we have to train our older people first. But as pointed out by the hon. member for York South, the largest group of unemployed consists of younger people. The minister should re-examine this regulation. By training these people he could help alleviate the unemployment situation.

The withdrawal of the winter works program is also reflected in the unemployment rate of 6.1 per cent. Hon. members will recall that last session the government had a special committee set up to meet various people in industry, but it withdrew from the establishment of that committee. A winter works program could provide employment for many people in my area. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration says that this program has been replaced by a training program. But, Mr. Speaker, that program has not been adequate. The government should reconsider this matter.

Our great Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) has been closing post offices in my area and all over Canada. Coming from a city like Montreal—incidentally, it is a city I like to visit—perhaps he does not know that the local post office means a great deal to the small rural area, to the village or local community. Although he comes from Montreal, I believe the minister should know this because I am told that in his younger days he was a travelling salesman in the Atlantic area, selling flour or something of that sort. In a village there is perhaps one store and the post office. People look forward to getting their mail and buying their stamps. The minister has not looked at the human side of this matter.

When a post office is closed, it puts people out of work. A question was placed on the Order Paper and the answer, which I believe was given last Monday, showed that the amount to be saved by closing post offices is only $1 million. You might say that is a lot of money, but this step has taken the heart out of many small communities. Certainly it will not help the government when the next election comes around.

In the province of Nova Scotia public works are important; We need wharves, breakwaters and dredging operations. But we notice that in the estimates for the current year, running to the end of March, 1971, estimates for public works, for the province of Nova Scotia show a reduction of approximately one half. The amount in 1969 for this purpose was $5,655,000; for the current year it is $2,780,-000. Apparently our minister from Nova Scotia has not had much sway with the cabinet. Public works in larger areas are not as important as they are in areas like mine. Fishermen require these facilities in order to do their work and look after their families. This is another instance of disregard by the government of something that is important to the Atlantic area.

In 1962 the government of the right hon. John Diefenbaker introduced a program of subsidies for shipbuilding in Canada. It has been cut back in successive years and will be practically abolished by the end of 1972. This step has also contributed to unemployment. The program was designed to give assistance to our shipyards and to enable them to be competitive with foreign shipyards. As we know, most other countries grant subsidies to their shipbuilders. We know that in connection with the shipbuilding program the government has set up a committee headed by Commodore Robertson. I trust that this committee will present a report before too long, and I hope that the government will reconsider its action in this respect.

Around this time of year the CNR can always be counted upon to do something to gladden the hearts of its workers. In my constituency, and also in the constituency of my colleague from Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir), this year that "something" will be the laying-off of maintenance men as of April 1. The number of maintenance crews will be reduced, and I am worrying about the safety factor. Under the new set-up, one crew will cover 52 miles. This will cause more unemployment. I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) to look into the matter. I do not know whether he has done so, but I repeat that this policy is creating unemployment in these areas.

Some time ago the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) questioned the government about disabled veterans. It did not give me any satisfaction to hear the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) say that some veterans were being laid off. I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) about the matter, and he replied that they were not laying off many in the Department of Veterans Affairs. When I asked him about veterans in other departments, he replied that he could answer only for those in his department. That is the trouble. The Department of Veterans Affairs is going downhill because this minister from New Brunswick is not doing his work; he is not looking after the veterans of our country.

No matter what happens, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Canadian people will not forgive a government that will put up with unemployment and will in fact cause unemployment. The Minister of Finance, sometimes referred to as Gentle Ben, has proven that with respect to the policies for which he and the Prime Minister are responsible, he is not so gentle. It is hard for a man without work, out of a job, to go home and eat flower power; it just cannot be done.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I would call on the Minister of Finance, who is here. Perhaps the Prime Minister will also enter this debate and tell us how the government will improve the unemployment situation in this country, a situation which should never have been allowed to occur. We ask how long the government can afford to ignore the spectre of mass unemployment that looms over the horizon. This government is accountable to the Canadian people in this matter—let us see them do something about it.

Mr. Alastair Gillespie (Etobicoke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my first remarks to the wording of the motion before us. There is a peculiarly old-fashioned ring to the wording, "That this House condemns".

This is the language of the Oxford Union, the language of yesterday. It is a peculiarly unconstructive, unprogressive sort of language. It focuses on moral issues in the sense of moralizing. It does not come to terms with the real issue that should be before this House, the issue of the misery of those who are unemployed. Where is the concern on the part of those who have placed this motion before us to do something, to build, to share? Where is the spirit of wanting to help? Where is the spirit of those who wish to help the victims of inflation? There is no suggestion in the motion, no feeling for the utter helplessness of those who are unemployed and suffering defeat—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order at this time, Mr. Speaker, to draw your attention to the fact that the member now speaking is violating the rules by reading directly from a document.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: On the point of order, I would draw to the attention of the hon. member and all members of this House that there is a long-standing tradition that one does not read speeches. I shall exercise a certain degree of latitude, as has been the practice of the Chair heretofore, and invite the hon. member to refer to his notes in a general way.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, let me assure you that what I have here are no more than notes; they are handwritten. It is not a prepared speech.

Mr. MacInnis: Try to get along without them.

Mr. Gibson: He is doing all right.

Mr. Gillespie: If hon. members opposite are interested in my remarks, I am prepared to continue. If they have made up their minds to close their ears—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): What minds?

An hon. Member: Now, Donald, you have been a good boy today.

Mr. Gillespie: There is no feeling for the suffering, for the personal sense of defeat of those who are unemployed and their families.

An hon. Member: You missed a line.

Mr. Gillespie: I would have been more persuaded by the speeches if I had sensed the kind of understanding which this problem of inflation requires.

Mr. MacInnis: There are the notes again.

Mr. Gillespie: Let me refer to three particular areas. First, I should like to preface my remarks by drawing to the attention of the House the fact that the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs tabled a report last Friday after some months of consideration. It is a substantial report and was fully reproduced in Votes and Proceedings of last Friday which all members found on their desks last Monday morning. One of the points the report made was that inflation is affected by a number of things, not least by the kind of activities that occur in key industries.

John Kenneth Galbraith, in evidence before the committee pointed out that the key industries, or what he called the industrial heartland, were a substantial part of the problem of inflation today. In the key industries he included the whole question of the housing or construction trades. Many members will recall the headlines of last summer regarding the construction trades, to the effect that carpenters will get $240 a week and more benefits, and that Metro's 4,500 carpenters in the commercial field will receive a wage and fringe benefits package of $1.97½ an hour over two years, an increase in the order of 30 per cent. Other articles pointed out that these increases would increase housing costs in the metropolitan Toronto area by approximately 12 per cent. That is to say, a house which had previously cost $20,000, not including land, would in future as a result of these increases cost $22,400. There is no suggestion in the motion put by the NDP that this sort of increase, which is well above any productivity increase by the economy, has an inflationary effect. They speak of a total incomes approach.

The government, on the other hand, has recognized in a major way the problem of housing in this area. Not long ago the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras) drew to the attention of the House the importance of this whole area and presented a program which involved greater expenditure on public housing than on any other occasion in the past. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this is one way of compensating for a situation which inflation has helped to disturb.

What about regional unemployment? The government has produced programs under the department of Regional Economic Expansion which are aimed at the very problems we are all concerned with, unemployment and slow growth in the most disadvantaged parts of Canada. This is a selective government approach. Where have we heard a constructive suggestion? How does an incomes policy, undefined, help to develop income in areas of slow growth? Mr. Speaker, I cannot help sharing suspicion of many that some opposition members wish to score debating points on the misery of other people.

Mr. Hees: You are the third guy to say that. They had the same speechwriter.

Mr. Benson: You guys could stand one.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there is some sensitivity here on the part of the opposition to a very legitimate point. After the report of the House of Commons Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs was presented, two of the opposition members of that committee submitted their own report to the press and they condemned the committee's report in much the same language as their motion. They said:

> The majority report is a meagre document whose premises and conclusions we cannot accept. It is a compendium of unimaginative orthodoxy that is neither fair nor workable.

They used the word "orthodoxy" to suggest that in some ways it was old hat. I suggest that if they have new ways of dealing with the problems of inflation and unemployment, they should put them before the House. Those who at least read the report know that they were more concerned with wrapping the Canadian economy in a cocoon to insulate it from the world than in dealing with the realities of the world. They acknowledge the fact of interdependence but suggest in some way that we can legislate our own independence from world economic forces. I think all hon. members realize that the rate of inflation in Canada is more influenced by foreign factors than by domestic ones.

What is wrong with a program of restraint? The government has put forward an appeal to all Canadians in all parts of Canada—I say, to all Canadians and not just to the leaders of Canada—to show restraint. The meetings last week indicated that there is a significant body of opinion in Canada which is prepared to accept and work toward a progressive and constructive approach to solving the problem of inflation through restraint in prices.

I think all hon. members of the House are waiting to hear how other members of the community are prepared to react. All of us, I think, are disappointed or perhaps saddened by the lack of sensitivity to a national problem evinced by a particular group. I would hope for and welcome any initiative the Canadian Labour Congress might make at this time to show that it, too, is on the side of restraint.

The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in its tenth report made various recommendations. These recommendations were directed at the following:

> (a) Making management, labour and all sections of the economy more accountable to the public interest.

I say, let us hear from all sectors of the Canadian public and from all leaders of all sectors. The second set of recommendation was directed at:

> (b) Increasing the effectiveness of federal government fiscal, monetary and economic measures that may be applied to regulate the economy.

I commend to all hon. members the specific recommendations which follow in this regard. The third of the general class of recommendations is directed at:

> (c) Concerting the spending plans of the federal government, the provincial governments, and through the provincial governments, those of the municipalities.

Is this orthodoxy? If it is, I say we need more of it. I argue that the time is long overdue for the private sectors and governments of all levels to join together in a spirit of common purpose for a concerted approach to the problem of inflation. We should do this with the spirit of purpose which suggests the idea of sharing rather than condemning. This is the way we will deal with the problems of inflation; this is the way we will deal with the problems of unemployment.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, we are called upon to vote tonight on a motion from the New Democratic party condemning the government's policy which has deliberately created an increase in unemployment, and has failed to stop the cost of living from rising, thus causing worry and unease amongst the people.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote in favour of the motion, because there are now 485,000 unemployed in Canada, that is 6.1 per cent of the labour force. In the province of Quebec alone, the unemployed number 178,000, or 8 per cent of the Quebec labour force and 36.7 per cent of the total number of unemployed in Canada. Montreal alone has 50,000 unemployed. If that is not enough to worry the government, will there ever be a situation serious enough to upset our country's administrators?

We have heard this afternoon a minister and some government members who apologized to us for the present situation. I had the opportunity to hear speeches by Liberal members during the sixties, when the Conservatives were sitting on the government side, and I find that today's speeches are quite different from what we used to hear then. You should have heard men like Mr. Martin, Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. Chevrier, shedding crocodile tears on the plight of those workers who were at that time unemployed. Well, today, the situation is exactly the same as then, and we no longer hear those lamentations from the government side. If we were to believe what those on the other side of the House tell us, the workers never had it so good. Yet, facts tell quite a different story.

[English]

A few moments ago I was listening to the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) saying, at the start of his remarks, where is the spirit that is needed to help those who are hurt by inflation and the high cost of living? May I say to the hon. gentleman that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) understands this situation very well because he has suggested that a working man and family can do very well on $30 a week—that is enough for him to get along with. The hon. member also asked for some suggestions. Let me say here that none are so deaf as those who do not want to hear. Members on this side of the House have made suggestions which have always been rejected by those who sit on the treasury benches. So let us not be fooled by this kind of talk.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Ricard: I have only a short time to speak, and lots of ground to cover. I ask the hon. gentleman to wait until I have finished my remarks and then I shall be glad to answer his question. We have suggested time and again that if the government really wishes to help those who are unemployed, it should eliminate the 11 per cent sales tax on construction materials. Has this been done? We have also begged the government not to impose for another year the 3 per cent surtax. What was done about that? That tax certainly hurts those who are unemployed. So let us not be fooled by that kind of talk, Mr. Speaker.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I should also like to make a few suggestions. In my opinion, the government should bring back the winter works program because it used to help find work for those who were idle in wintertime.

In addition, construction of overpasses could contribute to eliminate railroad crossings. Such projects could get under way in early fall in order to provide winter employment for workers.

It is undeniable that in our economy we must take a more direct interest in the field of manufacturing. Much could be done indeed to boost the number of jobs if we were more concerned with everything related to manufacturing.

A great number of raw materials could be finished in Canada instead of being exported unprocessed.

I will speak briefly, in order to allow other members to take part in the debate, but I will surely not miss the opportunity to repeat that my constituency is really in a disastrous economic situation. Indeed, almost 15 per cent or 25,000 or 30,000 workers in the St. Hyacinthe area are unemployed. It is the highest level of unemployment ever registered in my area. The distress and the hardship due to unemployment are of great concern to me as well as to a number of families.

I should like to appeal once more to the minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and urge him to make of the region of St. Hyacinthe a designated area. Several of our plants have closed their doors, several others are now operating part time and some have to lay off many workers. Such a situation cannot continue. If we wish to attract new plants in the region of St. Hyacinthe, we must give it the same advantages as are enjoyed by the neighbouring towns liable to compete with it. It is therefore imperative that this region be classified as a designated area.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not say anything further, but I would like to repeat that we must at all costs solve this problem since our workers will not always be satisfied with promises only. Concrete measures must be taken to help them and as their spokesman, I ask the government to do them justice.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member a question?

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask his question only with the consent of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard).

Mr. Ricard: I will accept a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gillespie: How would the elimination of the 3 per cent surtax help those who are unemployed? They are not taxpayers.

Mr. Ricard: I think the hon. member has had very little to do with unemployment. Before you can draw unemployment insurance you must have been an employee prior to becoming unemployed. When you are an employee receiving pay, the 3 per cent surtax affects you.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, the recent conference of business leaders which was held under the auspices of the Prices and Incomes Commission has been heralded by the government as a conference on price stability. We in this party, and many other people in this country, believe that is a misnomer. It should more correctly have been called a conference on profit maintenance, because according to the communiqué and everything else we have heard, this was not a conference on rolling back the cost of living to lower levels or ensuring that it will not go up. According to the communiqué, the business leaders agreed they would reduce the number and size of price increases they would normally have made in 1970, but they made no effort to say they would not make price increases. They said they would help in contributing to a broad program of restraint, on certain conditions. I quote from the communiqué:

> —they emphasize that an indispensable requirement for the control of inflation is a comparable measure of restraint by wage and salary earners, by governments at all levels and indeed by everyone.

In other words, to put it in plain, simple English, they will not make as big profit increases this year as they normally would have done, provided everyone else does exactly the same in restraining any increases that they might be seeking. If that is worth heralding with loud hosannas, I don't think the people of this country are going to believe it. It amounts to very little. Even this they hedged about when they said "if called upon to do so". We have not heard any loud and clear calls going out from the government asking them to do so. We do not believe this amounts to anything very real at this stage. What the people attending the conference said was that if everybody else in the country will restrain themselves, they will agree to make less profit than they would have expected to make in the normal course of events.

This afternoon the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) expressed surprise. He said that we in this party had long been demanding the line of income and price restraint that we are now getting. He was surprised that we were now heaping scorn on it. I wish to again point out the difference between what we in this party have been seeking and what we have got. We have always said that voluntary restraint and moral suasion will not work, that there must be a complete, over-all income policy and not one for just one section of the population. We have on our side in this issue the Economic Council of Canada. The council has said that wherever moral suasion guidelines have been tried, they have failed. They have warned that this policy will not work in this country. I do not see why the government has the Economic Council to advise it and then flies in the face of its advice.

We in this party have always said that there must be a prices review board. Manufacturers and other business concerns intending to make price increases would have to justify them before this board. But what we are told in the communiqué from the Prices and Incomes Commission is that businesses have agreed to a formula by which there is no necessity for them to advise the government before a price increase is made, but that there may be a possible review after the increase. That is not what we have been asking for, Mr. Speaker. We want to see a prices review board with teeth in it, which would ensure that price increases were justified before they were made.

We have over and over again said that these reviews should be made in public so that the public would know what was going on. Instead of that, this communiqué states that the businesses have agreed to having these reviews made in secret. We believe, and have stated many times, that where the taxpayers of this country have paid their money into government coffers for the use of government services, the government has no business fencing those services off from the public and carrying on their operations in secrecy.

This simply means that the government does not trust the public, that the government wants to do things which the public will not approve. The government adopts a "take it or leave it" attitude by presenting the public with a fait accompli. These are the points on which we take quite a different approach to that of the Prices and Incomes Commission.

In the fourth place, we have always said that all forms of income must be included in a prices and incomes policy. Instead, the government adopts a piecemeal approach by proposing to deal with business and labour as though they were the only sectors of the community. The previous speaker but one, and others, could hardly restrain themselves in their desire to get at the throat of organized labour. They have misquoted organized labour over and over again, not only in this debate but on other occasions. I should like to put on the record the position of organized labour as presented by the Commonwealth Press Association in Ottawa on October 15 last:

> Before labour will agree to any wage freeze it must be shown that the federal prices and incomes commission can halt rising prices, says Donald Macdonald, president of the Canadian Labour Congress—
> "We've prepared to sit down at any time, with any group, agency, or individual and seriously discuss an incomes policy.
> "But by an incomes policy we mean that all forms of incomes would have to be considered," he said.

These would include prices, profits, salaries, professional fees, rents, wages, interest rates and all other forms of income. I say, please, let this be the last time hon. members opposite are so anxious to go gunning for labour that they say wrong things about what labour has said. Organized labour has said it is willing to sit down and discuss an incomes policy, provided all forms of income are included in that discussion. But it is not prepared to be the whipping-boy of the government so that attacks can be made on wage increases gained by organized labour. Other sections of the community have secured far larger increases.

Fifth, we have always said that the government's piecemeal approach would not work, and we say so again. What does inflation mean in the lives of the majority of Canadians? We have been given what was described as the classic definition of inflation, but in the lives of the majority of ordinary Canadians inflation simply means that the cost of living is rising faster than their income to meet it. In far too many cases this condition is compounded by the utter disaster of unemployment which overtakes families.

We have been told in the past that in periods like this we have to choose between a rising level of unemployment and a rising cost of living. Under the gentle ministrations of this government we no longer have that choice: we have both conditions. We have a 6.1 per cent rise in unemployment, the highest level for two years, and the cost of living has been climbing at an accelerating rate for the past three years. In 1967 it climbed by 3.6 per cent; in 1968 it climbed by 4 per cent; in 1969 it climbed by 4.5 per cent; and it is still rising in 1970. Let me point out that during this period the government and its very similar predecessor government have been at the helm. Who are the victims of this inflation? They are the old, the ill, the people on low incomes and, yes, the low-paid employed.

Hon. members opposite have been telling us about the high fringe benefits received by some members of organized labour. I wonder whether they realize that the average gross income of workers in manufacturing industries in Canada, as of November, 1969, was only $5,723. I suggest that unless the income of hon. members opposite is comparable to $5,723, it ill behooves them to heave rocks at people who receive the fringe benefits they describe. No matter how many fringe benefits they receive, it would take between now and the millenium for them to come anywhere near in sight of the type of income enjoyed by many people in this country, those who have been complaining about inflation yet whom inflation does not hurt.

What is the position of our farmers today? They have unsold wheat on their hands. Even for what they can sell, cereal crop prices have dropped between 15 and 20 per cent during the last two years. While they are unable to sell their wheat, and the wheat that they can sell has dropped in price, the interest rates they have to pay have risen from 6 per cent to 9 and 10 per cent. The prices they have to pay for farm machinery have also risen steadily over the same period.

What has the government done to meet inflation at this time? Inflation did not begin yesterday, or the day before the Prices and Incomes Commission held its conference of big business leaders. Let me tell the House a few of the things the government has done to beat inflation. They talked about voluntary wage and price restraints, but they did nothing when the Steel Company of Canada and other steel companies raised the price of steel by more than 20 per cent. The government was silent when International Nickel Company raised the price of nickel by 24 per cent. In fact, the government refused the demand of the United Steelworkers of America for a public investigation of these price increases.

Having established the automobile trade pact, the government still permits the automobile manufacturers of Canada to charge the Canadian automobile purchaser more than $200 per car over the U.S. price, even though the U.S. price includes additional shipping charges. At the same time, they handed a present of forgiveness to car manufacturers to the tune of $80 million worth of customs duties that the manufacturers should have paid. The new Transportation Act has given the railways greater freedom to increase freight rates, which have risen substantially. The banks have been freed of any restrictions and can now charge any interest rate they see fit. The sky is no longer the limit because interest rates have soared beyond the sky and into the stratosphere.

The government has also raised interest rates under the National Housing Act. Today's mortgage rates run from 9 to 12 per cent, a crushing burden on any worker who wishes to purchase a home. The government has taken no action to stop land speculators. Land costs in most metropolitan cities have risen over 100 per cent during the last decade. The cost of home ownership is beyond the reach of most hourly paid workers.

This is the record of the government up to this point in its fight against inflation in this country. Do you wonder, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians from coast to coast are sceptical about this gathering of senior business personnel who, in order to join in the fight against inflation, are willing to take a little less in the way of profit than they would had they not bowed moral suasion and restricted themselves? This is not fighting inflation. This is tokenism, and tokenism of the most revolting character in the eyes of the ordinary, decent-minded Canadian.

What are the proposals that the government should lay before the provinces next week? First of all, we say there is a need for a comprehensive prices and incomes policy, and that all sectors of the population should be represented. Has the government invited the people who are suffering from inflation to any conference to discuss what can be done to solve their problems? Not on your life! The only people who have been invited to conferences are those who suffer much less from inflation than the groups to which I have referred.

As I said earlier, forms of income should be considered in making prices and incomes policy. There has been objection to having control, selective or otherwise. Objections to controls come from the type of people and groups who say we are suffering from inflation. But these people are not concerned about individuals who suffer from inflation and who have seen the cost of living go up, up and up to the point where they are not able to live an ordinary and decent life.

In my city of Vancouver, during the Christmas recess I heard a welfare organization making representations to the city council. They asserted that the social welfare allowances were still at the level they were in May of 1965, while the cost of living had spiralled tremendously since that time. How can these people live? Injustice should not be frozen. Restraints should be placed on the increase in the cost of living. The 2 per cent ceiling on old age pensions must be replaced by an escalator clause. Why should old age pensioners be placed in a worsening position as a result of the cost of living today?

My colleague the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) pointed out, as far as he was able during the brief time at his disposal, what I want to mention very briefly at this time. We are not saying that these other forms of social benefit, including a guaranteed income, can be accomplished without an extension of the economic base. We have for years been urging that a Canada Development Corporation should co-ordinate and develop general economic policy in this country.

A few years ago the government was liberally-enough minded to believe that we might successfully introduce a policy of this kind. They talked about the establishment of a Canada Development Corporation for developing sources of income and revenue. But now the government says no more about establishing this agency. There are many things we could reduce in government spending. I cannot help remembering the expenditures made recently by this government, which were far from necessary. I cannot forget the Prime Minister's entourage of 17 people, at a cost of $306,165. When the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, was in office he got by with seven people at an expenditure of just about half that amount, a total of $128,659. The Prime Minister before him, Mr. Diefenbaker, had three executive assistants, at a cost of less than $50,000.

If it is important that we curtail expenditures, we should begin here. The place to start restraints is right here in government. This has not taken place. As a matter of fact, if there had been restraint in this and other quarters we would not have had to spend $7 million on Information Canada this year, the agency for managing government propaganda so that the government will not receive all the lumps it would otherwise get, and deserves.

I have one more minute, Mr. Speaker. I have been watching the clock very carefully. I feel these things should be said. The establishment of voluntary price restraints is not the way to go about solving this problem. We feel the minister should make an effort to place restrictions by law in the proper areas. We need legislation to control the cost of living, as we need it to control traffic, garbage collection and any other sectors of our living where the public needs service and protection.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I always listen to the advocacy of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) with a great deal of interest and sympathy. Occasionally there are almost traces of onesidedness in her remarks. None the less, it is the most charming kind of onesidedness we have in this House.

Far from deliberately creating the crisis, as suggested in the motion before us, the very opposite has been the case as a result of government policies developed over the past year. The fact that the very opposite is true is reflected in the statistics. I will not deal at length with the statistics because they have been quoted and referred to by many other members during this debate. The fact is that the policies which have been pursued to date, far from creating an unemployment crisis—even though unemployment is too high—have had the opposite effect. Since the unemployment peak in September and October, the seasonal adjustment in respect of the unemployment rate in Canada has brought the rate down from about 5 per cent to about 4½ per cent.

If one looks at the raw statistics in respect of unemployment for January, he will see that they are roughly the same this year as they were for the last three Januaries. The statistics show that the level of unemployment was 6.1 per cent in 1968, 5.9 per cent in 1969 and 6.1 per cent in January of this year. The level is lower now than the tragic level of the early 1960s. In considering the statistics, I do not think a case can be made that government policies today have deliberately created unemployment to a crisis level. In fact, I think one could make a case that the heavy restraint policies of today have been maintained without creating unemployment levels to the point of crisis.

What are some of the components of this new mix of policies? First I refer to the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. This department was instituted six or seven months ago to bring together all the economic development programs and agencies used by various government departments. These have been put under a single department. As a result, there has been some progress in overcoming regional disparity and discrimination in respect of job opportunities. This has been a worth-while contribution to our economic growth; a great deal of success has been accomplished in this regard.

This department recently announced that in 1969 the rate of new job creation was more than four times that of 1968. If we follow the projects currently offered by the department, it is expected that about 22,000 new jobs will be created in the next year or two. This is evidence of an approach to traditional policies of economic and fiscal restraint by putting into position countervailing policies to create job opportunities in non-inflationary areas of the country.

Similarly, in the Department of Manpower the program to create manpower mobility and assist people to move from places of unemployment to places of greater job opportunity and acquire new skills has had some success in counterbalancing the toughness of current monetary fiscal policies. Other policies of fiscal restraint, for example the effort to cool-out some of the construction boom in certain provinces, have also been recently implemented. This is a new approach of having a regional rather than universal impact to give protection to areas of slow growth which in the main are most vulnerable to national policies unless this kind of policy is adopted. The government's policy of restraint on its spending is another component in the better and newer mix of policies which helps prevent this total impact having perverse effects on unemployment.

The approach of the Prices and Incomes Commission is also a new approach. I think, rather than carping on some of the travails faced by the Prices and Incomes Commission we should welcome it because in my view it represents perhaps the most important new step in the over-all policy that this government has brought into being. I think it is clear why a more direct approach to prices and incomes restraint is necessary. It is clear, I think, because we have seen in the past two decades the limitations of monetary and fiscal policy in economic management.

It is true that monetary and fiscal policies have been directed more to overcoming periods of slack. They have not been so successful in other periods of inflation. The excessive use of monetary and fiscal restraint in the past has led to excessive levels of unemployment. These have been the perverse effects of escalating these two elements of policy. The missing element has been a more direct approach to prices and incomes. That approach is being attempted now, with some success.

I, for one, hope that organized labour will not stand aside from this effort to develop a national strategy of prices and incomes restraint. I think we can look, as we do, very sympathetically at the problems faced by organized labour in participating in this important exercise of restraint. It is obvious that organized labour does not have the strong central bodies which would enable it to enter into negotiations wherein it might take positions and hope to have those positions observed by local and regional bodies of organized labour. I do not say that in criticism of organized labour. This is one of the problems it faces. I would hope it would make an effort to strengthen the central bodies in the labour movement in order to participate effectively in the development of restraint, and indeed in the development of strategy with other groups in the economy.

We have seen in the past a lack of effective government leadership in the field of labour-management agreements. I do not think it is enough to ask labour and management to get together. The government must be involved in that process because it is a political process. It must do so in the common interest and ask important economic bodies in the country to adjust their individual interests for the common good.

My view is that this government has put itself in a central position to lead in that kind of negotiation. I hope organized labour will see a new environment, a new context and a new framework and will take part in this program more boldly than it now seems willing to do. There have been constitutional difficulties which have caused organized labour to hesitate. This government does not have all the constitutional powers necessary to carry through prices and incomes restraint on a controlled basis if controls are necessary.

I hope that at the federal-provincial conference, on the threshold of which we now are, a look will be taken at this constitutional limitation in an effort to overcome some of the difficulties in the field of rent control. Moreover, I think a point organized labour would wish to make in entering into negotiations for prices and incomes restraint would be that over-all social policy should be part of the context of discussion. I mean by that, things such as income maintenance, social security programs, medicare and an approach to a guaranteed annual income.

I think these are matters organized labour could bring into the negotiations and thereby make a contribution. I hope, with the possibility of enlarging the scope of these discussions, it will get in with both feet. In my view no group has a larger stake in the success of new methods of control and a new approach to economic management than the labour interest. To realize this one need only look at the estimated increase in the labour force of Canada. In the Economic Council of Canada reports one can look at the figures and see that in the 15-year period from 1965 to 1980—we are already a third of the way through that period—the labour force in Canada is expected to grow by 50 per cent; that is to say, by 3½ million persons.

If we put those 3½ million persons in a different perspective, we see the enormous challenge Parliament faces in respect of a successful economic policy. The addition of 3½ million people to the Canadian labour force in this period will equal the addition to the combined labour forces of Great Britain, West Germany and Italy. We will have as many additional workers here in this period as those three countries. This 3½ million people will equal the total Swedish labour force. The employment of these people is one of the major challenges this government and Parliament faces in devising economic policies that will enable us to establish policies of restraint without turning down the economy.

In the past, the tools we had in fiscal and monetary fields succeeded only by going to the extreme and turning down the economy. In my view, the only way we can successfully approach this question today is with a prices and incomes policy as suggested here—a comprehensive policy of prices and incomes restraint. That is the policy the government is attempting to adopt.

It is true that if a voluntary restraint system, which is the first step, does not succeed, we must take another step—adopt more direct controls and seek constitutional authority, because such a policy would require federal-provincial agreement. But as much as anything we want to be assured that no important economic interest in Canada will not be part of the effort to make the policy a success, because if we fail there will be very serious consequences to employment and economic growth in this country. That is all the more reason why the program and the policies of regional economic expansion must succeed.

I was very interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) and the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom), who asked that more regions be designated. That may not be the proper approach, but surely it is one approach we must consider very seriously. The direct approach to prices and incomes, rather than an excessive use of other tools, is an absolute necessity in solving the serious problems which face us.

In my view, this requires that organized labour review the position that some parts of it have taken already. I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway that it would be silly, and indeed tragic to try to isolate the important labour interests in this country. The contribution which labour has made to our economic growth is very great and its participation in a debate of these problems is essential.

To induce labour to join in these discussions will require good leadership by this government. I think that has been given. This is why I think the motion before us suggests on the whole a hollow and outmoded approach, in fact a stereotyped approach to the questions that we face, except for the part which speaks of the need for a comprehensive prices and incomes policy.

In summary, I oppose the main purpose of the motion. I think it takes too narrow an approach. I think the government is developing a more effective mixture of policies which will mean that we will not have an unemployment crisis and we will be able to maintain, over a reasonable and necessary period, effective policies of restraint. In my view the maintenance of these policies of restraint over an effective period will achieve greater success if we adopt a direct approach to the problems of prices and incomes.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I will take only about ten minutes because a number of hon. members wish to get their points across. Having listened to previous speakers across the way take part in the debate since early this afternoon, there is only one thing with which I have been impressed; that is, the insincerity of their remarks. I listened to the hon. member for Etobicoke (Mr. Gillespie) and to the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. O'Connell), and I cannot understand how hon. members can stand in the House and make remarks about the employment situation with such conviction.

There is only one conclusion that I can draw, that is, that the quicker we allow television into the House to expose the hypocrisy which takes place here, the better off the Canadian nation will be and the more respect will be shown by members of this House for the electors in this nation.

I should like to speak for a minute about my reaction to the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. If I only say this, I will be satisfied that I have made a contribution to this debate. He spoke about the great programs under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion which will create employment in Canada. For example, he indicated that we should not worry too much about unemployment because it has remained at the same level. In fact, he is admitting that the just society has fallen flat on its face, and that unemployment has remained at the same level.

He did not say what the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) said, namely, that we are better off and that unemployment has decreased. He said it has remained at the same level and that we have not achieved the great just society that was talked about so much. He said that the rate of job creation is four times as great.

I have in my hand two small documents from which I should like to quote. The first one is a report of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the period January 1 to January 31, 1970, on the operation of the Regional Development Incentives Act. There were 31 incentives given to industry. If I may be parochial for a moment, let me state that Newfoundland, it has been estimated, has an unemployment rate of around 22 per cent. This is the worst situation that has ever existed since I became a Canadian in 1949. It is a most distressing state of affairs, because I think we have gone beyond the stage of a recession in my province.

Every small businessman in Newfoundland is terrified. There are two types of people in my province: those who are unemployed and those who are terrified of becoming unemployed. The minister speaks about the programs instigated by his department. Let me state some facts. In January of this year 31 grants were made under the Regional Development Incentives Act. One went to Newfoundland, resulting in an estimated additional employment of 11 persons and a total input of $64,000. This is what the member speaks about. What a lot of nonsense!

Let me relate to the House some facts which it was impossible to get from the minister in answer to questions which have been asked of him, but which we have received as the result of the ingenuity of some hon. members in our party who added up the figures from reports which come out every month.

The following is the total amount of money which has been injected into the Canadian economy under the incentives program since it started, including the two announcements in February of this year: In British Columbia, $70,000 was granted under the regional economic incentives program; in Alberta, $1,200,000; in Saskatchewan—the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) will want to take issue with this, and he has been up on his feet every day—not one cent has been granted; in Manitoba, $1,400,000; in Ontario, $350,000; in Newfoundland—the slow growth area of Canada—$215,000; in Nova Scotia, $137,000; in New Brunswick, $745,000; in Prince Edward Island—too bad the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. McQuaid) is not here, because he would love to hear this—$15,000 was granted. I left Quebec to the last—you can draw your own conclusion from the figure—$13,454,094 was granted. These are the facts of the situation, and this is what the minister talks about when he refers to his great program.

Since the government's program of austerity has taken hold in Canada, it has been applied equally across the whole of Canada. Every single government department in my province has applied the same stringencies and restrictions as in the most progressive parts of Canada. There were two men in the Department of Transport in my town who had 24 years experience and who were laid off with nothing more than a notice telling them to put in their names at the manpower centre.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) agrees that fishing facilities are necessary and economically justified, but he is sorry; there is no money for them. In dozens and dozens of places this is the excuse given to every member who represents the provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and in some cases, I imagine, Quebec, especially the Gaspé area.

The Department of Transport eliminated the passenger railway service in Newfoundland. They laid off the men who man the repair stations across the island, and they cut back 60 or 70 men in recent days. The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has placed a restriction on the employment of casual workers in my province. No more has been made with regard to the Bonne national park which might employ a couple of hundred men. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) eliminated our sea fishery, which means that another 100 men are out of work. And we have 11 jobs created by the Department of Regional Expansion!

We have the same thing happening in the Post Office Department. The same kind of programs that the minister introduced to mess up the Post Office elsewhere in Canada have been implemented by him in Newfoundland. The biggest reason for this goes back to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As far as I am concerned as a Canadian, this is the biggest problem we have. The Prime Minister of Canada has no feeling, no knowledge and no understanding of what it means to be unemployed and to live in a slow growth area. For example, we have the Prime Minister talking about his great effort in regional development, and he has convinced other ministers. The greatest tragedy in our nation today is that the Prime Minister has made up his mind, regardless of the consequences of unemployment, that it is going to be the answer to inflation; and the saddest part of the story is that other ministers in this government—I notice the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) peeping through the curtains—have not the gumption to take issue with this kind of approach. Some members asked today, what are our suggestions? Right now any member from my province—and we have all done this—could stand up and in ten minutes tell the government of this nation the areas where I can go in and create hundreds of jobs. I can point out 15 or 20 areas in my constituency where it is economically feasible to create fishing facilities. I can give the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) proof positive of the need for a $2 million investment right in my own town of Gander. We can get no action on it, although the minister agrees it is justifiable. The Minister of Finance agrees that the fiscal policies of the government which are applied equally across Canada are having an adverse effect on my province and on the whole of the east coast. We should be getting about $10 million for national parks on the west coast of Newfoundland, but that is not happening.

With respect to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen), the men employed in his department's local office in Gander cannot make phone calls like they used to, because now they have a budgetary restriction on the number of phone calls they can make to the people in my riding. I have asked that department to make a special effort to send its officials out to the communities which have 40 per cent and 50 per cent unemployment. But they have not the manpower and, the money to travel, nor the money to make the necessary phone calls, let alone money for the programs which could upgrade the skills of these people and temporarily alleviate the effects of unemployment.

As far as I am concerned as a Canadian, unless we can get a modification in attitude on the part of the Prime Minister of our nation, there is only one simple answer; that is, that we must have a change of government. That may sound partisan. We can begin by having a change of prime ministership in Canada and go ahead from that and have ministers of the Crown, especially ministers from the east coast—we have a couple from there—who can take issue with the present starvation measures being implemented by the government.

If I had more time I could outline in detail some of the areas in which the government has no excuse for not moving on, other than that the Prime Minister has laid down a rule and he has the other ministers toeing the line. This is the biggest reason for unemployment in my part of Canada.

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, for just a few moments I would like to speak about the unemployment situation in Saskatchewan, the province in which I was born and where I have always made my home.

An hon. Member: You are reading.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): I am not the only one. Saskatchewan had a remarkably low rate of unemployment until the last few months, when it climbed above the national average. But high as it may be now, it is still deceptively low, because unemployed people and young people seeking jobs tend to leave Saskatchewan to swell the population and the labour force or the unemployment statistics in other provinces. This is not because we have had Liberal or NDP governments since 1934 in Saskatchewan, but because Saskatchewan people are adventuresome and willing to take chances—in other words, not Conservative.

Other factors contributing to our easy mobility are that our weather is harsh, although invigorating, especially in winter, and that it is not far to prosperous Alberta and B.C. to the west, or to prosperous Ontario and Quebec to the east. Not only that, but most of us have relatives, if not friends, in those provinces.

Mr. Woolliams: Would he hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): When I have finished. As a result, Mr. Speaker, Saskatchewan's population has remained almost static for over 40 years. We have not even retained our natural increase. For example, in June, 1967, our population was 958,000. Last July it was 959,000, and it has gone down considerably since then.

This exodus, and the recent high unemployment in my area, are in large measure due to the decline in wheat sales and the consequent shortage of cash in the hands of the farmers.

Since the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appointed a minister with exclusive responsibility for the Wheat Board and the grain industry, some improvements in wheat sales are in prospect for the balance of this crop year and for future years. Prairie people expect a great deal of Saskatchewan's cabinet minister, and I know he is putting tremendous effort and determination into his arduous task. I am sure that all prairie farmers, and I hope all Members of Parliament, wish him well.

Saskatchewan is in dire need of more industrial development to provide jobs for our young people and for the people who cannot make a living on our farms. It was very gratifying to learn that at least part of Saskatchewan has been designated as eligible for industrial development grants. I am at a loss to understand why the whole province was not designated as was Manitoba, including the city of Winnipeg. Regina and Saskatoon were left out. The only reason I can think of is that the decision must have been based on statistics which were two or three years old. But even in those areas which have been designated, progress toward industrialization is very slow. As the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) mentioned—and this is an example of what opposition speakers do—there have been very few grants paid to Saskatchewan; but he picked out one month and said that therefore Saskatchewan had no money assigned to it under the regional incentive grants program. The facts are, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Lundrigan: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is giving false information to the House, because Saskatchewan has not received a cent since the inception of the legislation. The hon. member should know that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): The fact is that Saskatchewan has had at least two projects approved, but I am not sure whether the money for them has yet been paid. The hon. member was quoting statistics for one month only. To my knowledge only one or two small projects have been approved. Other possible projects are being held up for what seems to be an unnecessarily long time, awaiting the agreement of the federal government. I appeal tonight to the goverment to extend the area eligible for assistance and to speed up action on applications now pending.

But what about the unemployed people who leave Saskatchewan? They have been given to understand that the Department of Manpower and Immigration will assist them and their families to move to places where employment is available. However, some of my constituents are having difficulty in getting this assistance. One man with a large family was laid off in Saskatchewan. He is an industrial welder. At his own expense he went to B.C. and found work and worked for a month to make sure that both he and his new employer were satisfied. This having been accomplished, he went back for his family. When he tried to obtain the moving assistance, he was told that a position as a welder had just materialized in Saskatoon and therefore he was not eligible for assistance to move to B.C. This matter was finally straightened out to the satisfaction of this former Saskatchewanite who now lives, works and votes in British Columbia.

Tonight I received a telephone call from another Saskatchewan man who had moved from Moose Jaw to Alberta to take a job. He is having the same kind of difficulty. I hope he eventually gets the help he deserves. I ask the officials in charge of manpower service to administer these programs more liberally. Let's stop throwing roadblocks in front of these enterprising people who get out and find jobs for themselves.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to express my never-ending wonder at the ability of the opposition to level such blanket condemnation at the government without making any real contribution by proposing practical solutions to the problems they describe so eloquently and in such exaggerated terms. I also marvel at the tactics of the opposition. They seem to assume that all they need do is repeat something long enough, and enough times, and people will believe it. In spite of repeated denials by those in a position to know, the opposition still insists that there is a deliberate policy to create unemployment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): This is patently ridiculous, Mr. Speaker. No government, not even the previous Conservative government, would be so foolish as to adopt such a policy. The facts are that some unemployment is the unfortunate, unwanted and lamented by-product of the only methods available to the government in the fight against inflation.

Unrestrained inflation would cause much more suffering and, eventually, much more unemployment than we are now experiencing. Our Prime Minister and others in the cabinet are doing everything possible to get voluntary restraints which would control inflation without imposing excessively harsh fiscal and monetary policies.

I hope that current negotiations for voluntary restraints are successful. All Canada will be watching anxiously next week to see whether the provincial governments will co-operate in these voluntary restraints.

An hon. Member: Pass the buck.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): The people in the prairies will accept price and wage controls, I believe, if the voluntary system does not soon prove successful.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question, Mr. Speaker? I think the hon. member will admit that there is unemployment and distress in Saskatchewan. Would he mind explaining to the House why it is that two or three years ago the largest grain exporting nation in the world was Canada, and now we are in fifth place?

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who asked this question seems to know all the answers to other things. He should know also that many countries in the world have increased their production of wheat. The production of wheat throughout the world has increased tremendously and many countries, once importers of Canadian wheat, are now themselves exporters of wheat. He knows this as well as anyone in this House.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have been very interested to listen to the remarks of my neighbour from Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas). When he comes into the House he reminds me—

An hon. Member: Of an apple polisher.

Mr. Southam: —of Mr. Clean on his white charger who is going to fix up everything in this country with his recommendations. I wish he would impress the cabinet with some of his suggestions. If he did, we would not have this situation in Saskatchewan today. I rise to lend my support to the motion condemning the government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam) would mind reading a little louder. I can hardly hear him.

Mr. Southam: Thank you; I shall. I rise to lend my support to the motion condemning the government policies which have deliberately created unemployment up to a crisis level, thus placing the country in danger of a recession, and which have failed to stop the rapid and continuing increase in the cost of living. This House therefore calls for the immediate implementation of full employment measures and a commitment to a comprehensive prices and incomes policy.

In Saskatchewan today we are faced with the most serious economic situation we have been confronted with since the hungry thirties; I would not be exaggerating if I said, in our history. Not only have we a most serious and depressed situation in our agricultural industry, but for the first time in many years we have one of the highest rates of unemployment of any region of Canada. At one time, happily, we were rated as one of the "have" provinces but now, thanks to the policies or lack of policies of the federal government, we have again slipped back to the embarrassing category of a "have not" area of Canada.

Unemployment in the agricultural sector of the Saskatchewan economy has greatly increased as a result of the Liberal government's apparent policy of supporting the principle of providing cheaper food for Canadians at the expense of the producer. During the past year and more recently, another cause of unemployment in the prairie region has come to light. I am referring to the proposal of Canadian Na'ional Railways to implement their master agency plan all the way from the Lakehead to the Alberta boundary. This concept, developed through technological advances in recent years, is designed to concentrate the various services usually available in hundreds of stations along the CNR lines over past years into a few large urban centres, and is slated to become effective on April 1, 1970.

For the sake of the record I would like to list a number of the services that our citizens have had available to them over the years and are now to be denied. They include rail passenger service, local incoming and outgoing l.c.l. shipments, travel advice, ticket service, telegrams, box car orders for moving grain, express service, express money orders, etc. Now all these services are being taken away from our rural people. Besides these facts, the agent and his wife and family who have always been an integral and important away from our rural people. Besides these communities are having to move.

Now we are faced with the horrible prospect of hundreds of agents and their families being plucked from their homes and normal job environment, many of them not having been assured of work in another part of the system, not to say anything about the inconvenience and cost that will face the thousands of Canadians living adjacent to or in the towns and villages that will be affected by this plan. None of us wants to close his eyes to the advantages of technological advances in our society, but coupled with this goes the responsibilities of those in authority to see that human suffering is prevented and that sociological upheavals do not take place.

A few years ago we spent many days in this House and in committee developing the new transport act, and we established a new body called the Canadian Transport Commission headed by the often referred to czar of transport, Hon. Jack Pickersgill. During those debates and deliberations we were led to believe and to hope that we had reached a sense of rationalization in all matters related to transportation. But what do we find today, particularly in western Canada which is a captive market? We find service cut-back, we find highly increased freight rates, we find many applications for rail line abandonment, and now last but not least, this master agency plan set out by a government-owned company to greatly reduce service. At the same time the company appears so heartless as to place many of its faithful servants in the ranks of the unemployed.

What is the answer, Mr. Speaker? The basic solution is to have our government, advised by its ministers of transport, labour and manpower and immigration, step in and insist that the CNR slow down the pace of this plan and allow these things to take place by normal attrition.

I have many pieces of correspondence on file from station agents and top officials of labour unions representing station agents and others affected. I do not intend to name these agents who have written to me, but I want to quote for the record a statement made by one of them who has to face his customers day after day. This is indicative of the mood of people in the west. He wrote:

> Everywhere I go people come up to me and say: "What has happened to railway management, have they gone out of their minds or have they no regard for the problems of the west?" It is a hard question to answer but it is a problem that must be dealt with now before the situation turns to violence.

Communications have been taking place for almost a year now between officials such as Mr. T. B. Goodwin, general chairman of the Communication Employees Union, and railway officials such as Mr. F. E. Easterbrook, vice-president of T-C Division, Montreal; Mr. W. T. Wilson, vice-president, Montreal and Mr. J. L. Cann, general manager of the prairie region, all emphasizing the seriousness of the upcoming problem and all suggesting a slowdown of the inception of this program and advocating the normal process of attrition.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that I have already brought this problem to the attention of the government on several occasions, as the record will indicate. I again want to refer to the importance I place on the government defending the costing formula that was developed by the Canadian Transport Commission and which is presently being contested by Canadian Pacific Railway before the Supreme Court of Canada.

Naturally, I must join with my many colleagues who have spoken in this debate in strongly condemning the government's policy of fighting inflation by creating unemployment, which in turn creates human misery and suffering. I also support the position that my colleague, the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacEwan), took this afternoon on the question of post offices across Canada. In this area, again, the government is imposing a heartless program on the small rural communities and people living in them. This applies to Saskatchewan as much as to Nova Scotia. There are hundreds of small hamlets and towns dotting our rural scene, each with its post office, postmaster or postmistress. The post office is central to these communities. the government's heartless policy of closing many of these small post offices is causing much unemployment.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate who spoke before me pointed out the failure of regional incentive programs in Saskatchewan. The province has not benefited as much as it should from such programs, as the hon.

member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) suggested. Proposals have been made, but no money has been forthcoming and no job opportunities created to ease the job situation in our western area. So I ask, Mr. Speaker, where is the just society in a situation such as this?

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the opposition motion put forward by the New Democratic party and now under study strikes me as basically ill-founded, especially because of the exaggerations it contains.

On the one hand, the government is accused of having deliberately caused economic ills such as unemployment, recession and inflation—as if a government could want such things to happen—and, on the other hand, it calls for the adoption of measures guaranteering full employement, and the application of a comprehensive prices and incomes policy.

To my mind, the motion does not make much sense, and once again, as always, we see that it is extremely easy to accuse, to criticize, and to request instant remedies to all evils, but much more difficult to suggest concrete, realist, practical and efficient steps, for instance, to check inflation, reduce unemployment and keep industrial production from decreasing.

The speeches made today by the members of the opposition contained no solution capable of solving the present economic problem which, besides, is not the monopoly of Canada, but exists as well in all industrialized countries, at least in the free world.

Canada is now faced with a number of economic problems but they are not as serious as in some other countries. The provincial governments could follow the example of the federal government and meet its suggestion by restricting their expenditures and by wholeheartedly contributing to the war against inflation. Were the big companies and other bodies also willing to co-operate, I am sure that the economic situation would improve and that confidence would be restored for, basically, our economy is sound.

We can rely on large natural resources and if we can manage to go on selling our products at competitive prices, Canada will go on expanding just as it has for the past few years, under the Liberal leadership.

Indeed, for the past seven or eight years, we have witnessed progress unprecedented in our history. During that period, Canada has demonstrated that it had grown into an industrial power. It has become one of the greatest trading nations of the world.

In the field of exports, for instance, our performance has been astonishing. From $5.2 billion in 1959 our exports have increased every year to $14.5 in 1969. This means an increase of 180 per cent over a 10-year period. If we want to get an idea of the progress made, we simply have to remember that our exports increased by 30 per cent only in the '50's which were considered quite good years.

This is due mainly to the action of this government. I will mention, for instance, the auto pact with the United States which led to better co-operation between the government and the industries, and to a better promotion of the finished products. An outstanding achievement in 1969 was the legislation introduced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) which led to the setting up of the Exports Corporation which provides new services for the promotion of exports.

To keep our markets, we have to remain competitive with other countries and curb inflation which remains at the present time the main problem facing Canada. The constant rise of consumer prices has not left unconcerned the federal government which is conscious of its role and its responsibility in that respect. It particularly looked after those on a fixed income as, for instance, those getting a pension or retirement benefits.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 58(11) the proceedings on the motion now before the House are deemed to have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POLLUTION—CHEDABUCTO BAY—DEVELOPMENTS FOLLOWING GROUNDING OF TANKER "ARROW"

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, if Aristotle Onassis were to visit Nova Scotia at this moment, he would neither be admired for his collection of coloratura sopranos and other interesting women nor applauded for finding a haven from the tax the rest of the world must assume—the income tax. Instead, I suggest that if Mr. Onassis were to visit Nova Scotia he would be boiled in low-grade bunker oil because the wreck of his ship will probably cause a greater disaster to Canada than the Torry Canyon caused to British beaches a number of years ago.

My concern in raising the matter of the Arrow this evening is that what happened, happened not only in one part of the country but could happen in another part of Canada. For example, if the Arrow had gone aground on the shoals on the west side of the entrance to Halifax harbour, that port would have been tied up for months and possibly years. The same could have happened in Saint John, or the St. Lawrence River, for that matter. We are met with a very serious situation and I think that three points particularly have to be considered.

First, the weather was reasonably calm for February at the time the accident occurred. At that time, when remedies might have been available which would work in calm water, it was necessary to spend the time deciding exactly what should be done. I do not think it is unreasonable to suggest that the government and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) in particular have a duty to have plans available for emergencies such as this. They have been developed elsewhere in the world in great abundance. Why did Canada not have a plan? Instead, we were faced with rather ridiculous experimentation. I say "ridiculous" because it should have been known exactly how to ignite fuel such as is aboard the Arrow. When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) made his point about planning, I thought it was a very sensible suggestion.

On the day following the grounding of the Arrow the minister said there was no major threat at that time. Yet all the elements were there to cause a holocaust and disaster. My second point concerns regulations and control. The minister said, as recorded at page 3358 of Hansard:

> I am not at all sure any regulation would have, in fact, changed the situation.

I suggest there are a couple of regulations which could have, in fact, helped to avoid the Arrow disaster. There could be a requirement that ships such as the Arrow use certain shipping lanes. I also suggest that they have Canadian pilots on board so that captains and crews could not sneak along a coastline with which they are not familiar, short-cutting, when they are carrying a lethal load.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: I believe these two suggestions could very well have been part of the regulations. Then if the regulations were not adhered to, the ship could be prohibited from touching any Canadian port. My third point deals with navigational aids. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) mentioned the possibility of installing radar reflectors. In January of this year I placed a question No. 835 on the Order Paper, dealing with an apparatus known as radar transponder beacons. These cost very little, yet they greatly improve navigational safety. We received a very curious answer from the Minister of Transport who was not very definite as to whether the buoy that was supposed to be on duty had been removed. I would think that would be a point of information that would be pretty obvious, but the minister seemed to hedge on his answer when pressed on the point by the Leader of the Opposition.

Yesterday the minister stated that the situation was slightly more under control. Wihin a matter of hours the stern section of the Arrow settled down into deep water even with the assistance of three tugs which were trying to keep it afloat. The situation of horror has now been compounded. I talked to Nova Scotians when I was home last week end. Some of them were absolutely white in the face, particularly those from Cape Breton, because the Cape Breton shoreline is the immediate target of this disaster. They were absolutely white with rage that such an incident could be allowed to happen in a civilized country.

Heaven only knows, Mr. Speaker, how long it will take to cure this situation. I imagine it will be decades before life along that shoreline returns to the situation that existed before the Arrow grounded itself a week ago. I suggest that when the immediate crisis is over there must be a public inquiry by the best commissioner that can be found. He should be given the widest possible terms of reference; the public conscience will not stand anything less.

In the immediate future we should apply ourselves to such cleaning-up tasks as bringing in legislation to impose proper penalties on both the carrier, in this case Mr. Aristotle Onassis, and the supplier of the cargo, Imperial Oil. I think the supplier has a duty not to put his cargo into just any ship that is passing through. He must be responsible for seeing that the highest standards of seamenship are practised on the vessel, and that every possible care is taken so that the ship will operate as if the lives of Canadians were at stake. I am exasperated and I cannot—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is not here tonight, but I wish to inform my hon. friend that according to my information the minister is leaving almost immediately for Halifax, Nova Scotia, to make a personal inspection of the scene and to conduct his own inquiry into how the accident happened.

I also undertake to bring to his attention the suggestion made by the hon. member in regard to navigational safety. I wish to inform the hon. member that while the policy of providing adequate navigational aids for the conditions which prevail along our coast is not being re-examined at this time, the effectiveness of navigational aids in all ports is under continuous review. Where changes in traffic or other conditions dictate the need, aids as required will be provided.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER LEVYING CHARGES FOR USE OF FILMS

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked in the House an important question concerning the National Film Board's decision to set charges for the use of their films.

I raised this question because I feel as, indeed a number of institutions and educators do, that as a result of this decision a great many citizens, and specially young people, will be deprived of this valuable service.

To warrant its decision, the National Film Board gives the following reasons: first of all, the austerity program which prevails in the country; secondly, those who benefit from government services will be called upon to assume a larger part of the cost of these services; thirdly, a better service must be offered to the public.

In the light of these arguments, I look upon this decision unfavourably.

First of all, there is the austerity program. I do not question in any way the necessity of that policy at this time. However, its implementation must in my opinion be based on sensible priorities whereby essentials must take precedence over superfluity. I think that the same austerity policy should not be applied with respect to the education of young Canadians in the same way that it may be applied, for instance, with respect to the closing of some useless embassies.

According to the National Film Board, those who benefit from its services must meet a larger part of their costs. In the context of a just society, this notion when applied literally is totally inconsistent. Thus those who receive social welfare allowances are certainly not the ones who will bear the lion's share of the cost. The same goes for many other services. As a rule, people who benefit most from services are often those who can least afford to pay for them. The field of education is certainly not an exception.

Finally, the National Film Board believes that it will be in a position to offer better services if it imposes a fee for film rentals. Yet, the services it gave before were excellent.

I fail to understand how fees—rather high in certain cases—will better the service. A service is not improved by making it harder for those who want to use it or even by penalizing those who benefit from it.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this decision of the NFB will destroy everything that has been accomplished so far. The use of films as teaching aids is rather recent. Although their convenience had been demonstrated during World War II, it took many years for the teaching profession to be convinced and to learn to use them. In addition, a great effort was needed to prove the value of this aid to school boards and to induce them to provide the funds necessary to buy projectors.

In short, it was necessary to launch an overall program in order to have this teaching aid known and appreciated as well as to make it efficient. Charging rental fees would break teachers of the good habit of using audio-visual aids. With the expenses this would involve, would it really save money?

The NFB is well known for the quality of its productions. Over the years, a cultural wealth which is difficult to assess fully has been put on film. For the sake of an austerity policy, can we allow this cultural spring to dry up at the very time when Canadians are more and more aware of the need to know their country and their neighbours better?

Rental fees will result in additional annoyances for the organizations and school boards concerned. These fees will first have to be provided for in the budget; then the films will have to be shown on precise dates so as to avoid extra expenses. This program will therefore have no flexibility. Lastly, it will mean extra work for the administration. I feel that the savings anticipated from the carrying out of this new policy will not compensate for the inconveniences resulting from this decision.

So that Canadians may continue to take full advantage of a service necessary to their utmost fulfilment, I urge the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) to make representations to the National Film Board in order to get its directors to reconsider their decision.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for the interest he has shown in the NFB, a very important Canadian institution. I am sorry that I cannot add much to the answer given yesterday by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) during the question period. It is of interest to note what Mr. Saumier had to say on the matter in his recent report, and I quote:

> The self-financing experience carried out with regard to the film-library appears worthwhile; an analysis of the results of this experience will show whether it is possible to make this field of activity more self-sustaining.

However, the Secretary of State said yesterday that if new factors had to be taken into account, this decision of the NFB might be amended.

I thank the hon. member for his comments and his useful suggestions which will be taken into serious consideration.

APPENDIX

February 10, 1970

CLOSING STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON PRICE STABILITY

The National Conference on Price Stability, called by the Prices and Incomes Commission, met in Ottawa on February 9 and 10. It was attended by senior officers of national business and farm associations, representatives of professional groups, leaders of a broad spectrum of the Canadian business community and observers from the federal and provincial governments.

The Canadian business community had previously demonstrated its willingness to exercise a meaningful degree of restraint in pricing policies in 1970 through proposals made to the Commission by the Canadian Chambre of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Retail Council of Canada and the Canadian Bankers' Association.

While the groups represented at the Conference are prepared to take an initiative as a contribution to a broad program of restraint, they emphasize that an indispensable requirement for the control of inflation is a comparable measure of restraint by wage and salary earners, by governments at all levels and indeed by everyone.

There was broad agreement among those attending the Conference on the following:

(a) Business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would reduce the number and size of price increases they would normally make in 1970.

(b) More specifically, where higher prices are needed to cover higher costs, and market conditions made them feasible, business firms generally, if called upon to do so, would ensure that price increases were clearly less than the amount needed to cover the increases in costs at a normal volume of output and sales.

(c) The Conference recognizes that domestic price criteria should not be applied to goods sold mainly in export markets. The Commission will keep the position of export industries under review and if it finds that developments in some of these industries are impairing the general price restraint program, it will seek appropriate solutions to the problems.

(d) Business firms would be prepared to co-operate with the Prices and Incomes Commission in such price reviews as it might decide to conduct (a brief outline of the proposed review procedure is appended).

(e) The Conference recognizes that over most of agricultural production farmers do not have any significant discretion over the level of prices they receive. The representatives of agriculture present agreed that in the narrow range where the marketing system permits some price discretion, farmers, if called upon to do so, would act during 1970 in accordance with the general pricing criteria and procedures.

(f) Specific commitments have already been given by the chartered banks for 1970 not to increase their existing schedule of service charges in Canada. They have also undertaken not to increase interest rates charged on Canadian dollar loans in Canada, except to the extent of any corresponding percentage point increase in the rates payable on Canadian dollar personal savings deposits. Trust and mortgage loan companies have agreed not to increase the existing spread between their prime mortgage lending rates and the highest rates paid on their term borrowings, and to refrain from increasing existing service charges on savings accounts. Representatives of life insurance companies, credit unions and other types of financial business affirmed their full support for the Commission's restraint program, and agreed that the principle that price increases should be held within cost increases should apply in their own operations.

(g) That professional groups would be prepared to participate in a broad program of price restraint and to recommend to the provincial associations that they postpone or limit increases in existing fee schedules for professional services during 1970.

(h) Representatives of the transportation, telecommunications and utilities industries endorsed the Commission's general criteria for price restraint. As a positive expression of co-operation, the members agreed to provide the Commission with thirty days' notice of any intent to increase general rate schedules.

(i) The general merchandise sector of the retail and wholesale trades in determining pricing policies during 1970 would undertake not to increase initial markups on its various merchandise categories unless realized profit per dollar of sales would fall below that of the base period. In such cases increases in markups would be sufficient only to restore returns to the level of the base period.

(j) The grocery sector of the retail trade in determining pricing policies during 1970 would undertake not to increase initial markups unless realized profit per dollar of sales, calculated on the volume of sales carried on over their entire operation would fall below that of the base period. In such cases increases in markups would be sufficient only to restore returns to the level of the base period.

(k) It is recognized that costs have been advancing particularly rapidly in most sectors of the construction industry and that special steps are needed by all concerned to reduce the rate of increase in these costs, including efforts to level out the flow of construction work. The representatives of the construction industry agreed that individual firms in the industry if called upon to do so would during 1970 absorb a proportion of their increased costs in accordance with the general pricing criteria.

Outline of Proposed Review Procedure

The price reviews are intended to ensure that the revenues produced by a price increase are less than the increases in costs that led to the price change, unless the increase in price is needed to improve a demonstrably inadequate rate of return on capital investment. Reviews will not be broad studies but will concentrate solely on compliance with the proposed pricing criteria.

The Commission is to be informed as soon as possible about any major price changes, but approval by the Commission in advance of the change in price is not necessary, and would not in general be practicable. The reviews will be conducted by a qualified staff of senior government officials and business executives who will be working with the Commission on a temporary basis.

Information needed to determine relevant revenue and cost changes will be requested by the price review staff in private meetings with the firm or firms involved. Actual operating records will be requested in most cases. Assistance in analysing data will be sought from firms but any conclusions reached will be made by the Commission as an independent body.

One of the main reasons for conducting price reviews on a detailed basis is to sort out cost changes arising from a change in the volume of sales from those due to a change in the price of inputs. The year 1969, or the nearest fiscal year, will in general be used as the base year when considering changes in costs and revenues. In cases where this would be clearly inappropriate, a suitable alternative base period would be selected.

During 1970 some firms may well experience unit cost increases as a result of a temporary decline in their volume of sales or output because of adverse market conditions. Such cost increases cannot be regarded as automatic justification for an equivalent price increase. On the other hand, some firms will experience unit cost decreases as a result of increases either in the volume of sales or in efficiency. In these cases, firms are expected to pass on some of the cost savings in terms of lower prices. The price review teams will attempt to decide what is reasonable price behavior in response to unit cost changes brought about by changes in volume. Consideration will be given to both the size and the likely duration of the "abnormal" sales volume.

Because of the care with which the price reviews must be made, it is proposed to concentrate them on important price increases by major firms and by market leaders in smaller markets. Some additional reviews may also be undertaken of less important price increases reported to the Commission by customers or other interested parties.

PRIVILEGE

MR. VALADE—MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE—LACK OF INFORMATION FROM POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

I am sorry the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications is not in the House to express his opinion on the question of privilege, but I appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, and ask you to rule on this matter I consider most important. My question of privilege relates to the right of members to get information from ministers, a right which should not be restricted.

The Postmaster General and Minister of Communications yesterday refused to give the House information on the activity of post office in Montreal and the decisions which the government is considering in this connection.

My question of privilege is based on two quite specific reasons. In the first place, the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications as well as the government refused yesterday to accept a motion seeking to defer to the appropriate committee the problem of the serious crisis in the field of mail delivery in Montreal. In the second place, the minister has explicitly refused to ask the consent of the House to return to motions, in order to tell the House about the decisions taken by the government concerning the possible settlement of the problem created by mail delivery in Montreal.

Now, after that explicit refusal, the minister granted an interview in both languages on C.B.C. television. I believe this is a prima facie case of privilege, since the minister flatly refused to give the House the information which he gave later on television.

I think this Cabinet is going too far and that such an attitude may well lead to autocracy, which is more and more annoying and unbearable for hon. members who are entitled to be kept informed by the government.

In view of the fact that the trend is becoming generalized, I felt I had to rise to defend the right of hon. members to be kept posted by the government on its decisions, and pursuant to standing order 43, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax East Hants:

• (11:10 a.m.)

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization be directed to study the following question: whether a Crown minister may refuse to reply to questions concerning the responsibilities of his department addressed to him in the House and then proceed to supply such information to mass media.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will consent unanimously to have the matter referred to the committee since for a long time members of all parties have been complaining that ministers refuse to reply to their questions here in the House and later make comments on television or to the press.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Sainte-Marie, has given notice to the Chair, pursuant to Standing Order No. 17 (2), of the question he wished to raise in the House.

I must however draw his attention on the fact that the notice he has given to the Chair is in relation to a question of privilege pursuant, as I said, to Standing Order 17 (2).

The hon. member now wants, within a question of privilege, to propose a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. It seems to me that this is somewhat irregular. This kind of motion should be made on motions, as the hon. member did yesterday.

As for the question of privilege, that is, inasmuch as the Chair has to decide whether that question actually is a question of privilege, may I once again remind the hon. member that on several occasions, during this session and the preceding ones, the same controversial matter has been submitted to the Chair. On each of these occasions it was decided that even if a member has a grievance—however legitimate—in the sense suggested by the hon. member, it cannot be considered as a question of privilege.

A point very similar to the one raised today by the hon. member was submitted for consideration by the House a few days ago, Wednesday, February 11, as shown on pages 3465 and 3466 of Hansard. The Chair ruled that there were no grounds for a question of privilege. I think I should bring the attention of the hon. member and all other hon. members to Citation 181 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Procedure, 4th Edition, which would indicate that a grievance such as that raised by the member cannot be the object of a question of privilege.

I must therefore inform the hon. member that there is no prima facie question of privilege and that I cannot agree with his suggestion to the effect that his motion be introduced immediately. I regretfully do so, because the hon. member has raised an interesting point. However, another way more consistent with Standing Orders should perhaps be found so that the matter he has dealt with be considered by one of the committees of the House.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FINANCE, TRADE AND ECONOMIC AFFAIRS

Eleventh and twelfth reports of Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs—Mr. Gillespie.

[Editor's Note: For text of above reports, see today's Votes and Proceedings.]

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—RENT CONTROL AND PROFESSIONAL FEES—ACTION AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government at the forthcoming federal-provincial conference to seek action with respect to rent controls and a freeze on fees for professional services? Will this be considered on the provincial or the federal level or on both levels?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): All these questions concerning inflation, raised both on the initiative of the federal government and as a result of recommendations or advice received from the Prices and Incomes Commission, will be discussed by both levels of government, and we will seek to act in a co-operative fashion.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the government is successful in achieving any of the results it desires with respect to the conference and action on the part of the provinces, will such action require legislative approval by Parliament or by the provincial legislatures? If so, and in view of the rather hopeless answer I received from the Minister of Justice the other day—

Mr. McIlraith: That is a gratuitous comment.

Mr. Baldwin: —is any consideration being given to drafting legislation?

Mr. Trudeau: It began as a hypothetical question, Mr. Speaker, and remained that way.

INFLATION—CONSULTATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON PROPOSED CONSUMER CREDIT CURBS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister held consultations with his provincial counterparts regarding the proposed curbs on consumer credit and, if so, what was their reaction?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the matter of consumer credit of course has been mentioned by the federal government, as we indicated publicly previously, but no decision has been made in this regard. We have discussed the idea with various interested parties, but no decision has been made by the government.

Mr. McGrath: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister held discussions with the provincial governments on consumer credit curbs?

Mr. Benson: I have held discussions with provincial treasurers on a great many matters, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the principle of regional selectivity apply to any proposals concerning consumer credit, rent controls, and controls on professional fees?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, as I stated, no decision in this regard has been made at all.

[Later:]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. It is supplementary to certain questions asked earlier. Is a provincially selective application of rent and consumer credit controls one of the proposals to be advanced by the federal government at next week's federal-provincial conference?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, a great many matters will be discussed next week at the federal-provincial conference. I do not think one could go into the details of everything that will be discussed at the conference.

[Later:]

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With no thought of going into details, is there any intent or proposal of the federal government to apply any type of controls on a selective provincial or regional basis? If so, is the Prime Minister going to redefine his concept of one Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question as asked is in order.

LABOUR RELATIONS

VANCOUVER LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE—COLLECTIVE AGREEMENT RATIFIED

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that most of the south shore of Vancouver harbour comes within the constituency of Vancouver East and that the operations there affect all of Canada, is the minister in a position to give us a full report on the situation involving the longshoremen on the west coast?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As hon. members know, it is doubtful whether ministers can give lengthy and full reports without reverting to motions. Perhaps the minister might give a brief, full report.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): To summarize, Mr. Speaker, the agreement was ratified by a healthy margin of 279 votes. I take this opportunity to thank the hon. gentleman who through the week helped me convince certain of his constituents that this was in their best interests. The agreement was ratified, the men went back to work in a very orderly fashion at eight o'clock Vancouver time, and by this evening the port will be back in full operation.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the announcement the minister has made with respect to Vancouver harbour apply also to other ports in various parts of British Columbia?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, Port Alberni was a much more difficult port for political reasons, but it too saw the light.

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he bring us up to date on when he expects to bring in amendments to the pertinent labour legislation, based on the Woods task force report?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I hope at this session, Mr. Speaker, but I would point out that the hon. member himself on previous occasions has expressed the view that he would not include as part of the law any restrictive provisions that would automatically deny either employers or employees their rights under the law.

SUGGESTED INTERVENTION OF MINISTER OF LABOUR IN MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour. In view of his success on the west coast and his other successes during the past year, would he consider offering the services of his department to the Postmaster General in settling the postal dispute in Montreal?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): I have a supplementary for the Minister of Labour.

Has the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) called upon the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to settle this dispute?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—MEASURES TO ASSIST PEOPLE ON LOW INCOME

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that, according to the news this morning, over 1,666,000 Canadians earn less than $3,000 per year, could the Prime Minister tell the House what measures he intends to take so as to increase the income of those people and enable them to face the cost of living?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will admit, I am sure, that his question is of a general nature, and any answer must be in the form of a statement on motions.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I shall rephrase my question.

Since the White Paper on Fiscal Reform, recently tabled by the government, shows that half of those who earn less than $3,000 per year will be exempt from income tax, does the Prime Minister intend to make hnown in the near future what we he has in mind for the other half?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the member has already answered the first question, and I was just going to say that the White Paper is designed precisely to help those people who in this country have an insufficient income. However, before talking about helping the other half, we are waiting for greater support on the part of the member and opposition parties with a view to helping the half that is worse off.

Mr. Fortin: As I was elected precisely to help the half that the government does not assist, I would like to ask the Prime Minister if he intends to make a statement regarding the fate that his government has in store for that other half, taking for granted the opposition's co-operation.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, first we must be helped in order to help everyone.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

PROJECTED SECOND VOYAGE BY "MANHATTAN" THROUGH NORTHWEST PASSAGE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government which involves overlapping ministries so perhaps I had better direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister who can have the appropriate minister answer. Has the government been in discussion with the Humble Oil Company or the United States government with respect to plans for a second voyage of the Manhattan?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question overlaps at least two or three others asked this week which have been answered by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, and a question of privilege. I beg to differ with the right hon. gentleman, but the question has not been answered nor to my knowledge has it been asked in the House. There were other related questions but not this one specifically. I repeat: Has the government or any department been in discussion with the Humble Oil Company or the United States government with respect to plans for a second Manhattan voyage?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has simply reiterated the question asked in the first place.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. Prime Minister does not care to answer the question perhaps I can direct it to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It appears that nobody will answer it.

OIL

REPORTED SECRET AGREEMENT ON EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—REDUCTION OF VOLUME

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. When speaking in Calgary he said that exports of crude petroleum to the United States amounting to 800,000 barrels a day would be cut in half by reason of a secret agreement the government had with the United States. Would he care to comment on the secret agreement?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether the question asked is in correct form in regard to the subject matter but perhaps the minister should be allowed to answer.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure which press report my friend is referring to but there is no secret agreement, of course. The correspondence was tabled some time ago in respect of our agreement with the United States in this area. What I said to the meeting was that the nominations in the region of 800,000 barrels a day are extremely difficult for the American administration and they are far beyond the amount in the letters that have been tabled. I indicated that there probably would have to be a cutback but I did not indicate any quantities.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The minister has now said that there is no suggestion as to the amount. Is there an agreement between Canada and the United States in this regard that there will definitely be a serious cutback in the export of crude petroleum from this country to the United States?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, there is an agreement which was engrossed in an exchange of correspondence in 1967. That agreement provides for exports of 332,000 barrels per day in districts 1 to 4. Under present nominations and flow this is being exceeded, and certainly this is of great concern to the United States. We are attempting to the very best of our ability and with all our resources to renegotiate a position satisfactory to both countries in the short term.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

TAKEOVER OF CANADIAN CHANNING CORPORATION BY INVESTORS OVERSEAS SERVICES

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not here today may I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the current takeover of yet another Canadian company by a foreign-based company, and I am referring to the purchase of Canadian Channing Corporation Limited, one of Canada's oldest mutual fund organizations, by a firm known as Investors Overseas Services with Swiss headquarters, will the minister inform the House what action the government intends to take in regard to this matter?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not had a chance to look into this matter in detail. I know that Canadian Channing had been foreign-owned until a few months ago when it was purchased by employees through another corporation. I understand from what I have seen in the press that it has now been sold to IOS, but I do not know the details of the transaction and will have to ask for them.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question arising out of the minister's answer. Is the question of whether a company taken over by foreign interests has just become a Canadian company or has been a Canadian company for a long time relevant?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, actually these are both Canadian incorporated companies. It is a question of who owns them; that is what I am interested in.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF DESERTERS FROM U.S. ARMED FORCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General which relates to questions I asked him previously about his inquiry into allegations of improper activity by officers of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police with respect to the deportation of three young United States citizens on January 25. Has the minister completed the inquiries he has undertaken? Also, how are the inquiries being carried on?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet completed the inquiry. It is being carried on at this stage by officers of the RCMP not from the Vancouver area involved.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Is the Solicitor General co-operating in this inquiry with the Minister of Manpower and Immigration? I ask this because the matter is of concern to both departments. I do not know which officers of which departments may have been involved, but is there co-operation between the two departments with respect to this inquiry?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL PARKS

SUGGESTED UNDERWATER PARK IN GULF OF GEORGIA

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development which arises out of a speech made in Vancouver last night by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. The latter minister suggested the establishment of an underwater park in the Gulf of Georgia. Is this being considered by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I also read the speech of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. My colleague and myself have been discussing this proposal several times in the last few months, and my officials have undertaken a feasibility study regarding the establishment of the first park of this type in Canada.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—REPLIES FROM PROVINCES TO LETTERS FROM PRIME MINISTER

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister with respect to mineral rights in Canada's offshore areas. Has the Prime Minister received replies from any of the provinces to his letter of November 30, 1968, to which he referred in his statement to the House on December 2, 1968, and to his subsequent correspondence of February 27, 1969, with respect to Hudson Strait, Hudson Bay, James Bay, the Northwest Territories and the Arctic Islands, to which he referred in his statement to the House on March 4, 1969?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot from memory verify all those dates but I would confirm that substantial correspondence has been exchanged between the premiers of the provinces and myself on this matter. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been very actively pursuing with the provinces, the policy we laid down in the fall of 1968 and I believe certain meetings have already taken place between individual provinces and the minister or his officials toward a settlement along the lines we hope to achieve in our policy.

Mr. Dinsdale: Could the right hon. gentleman indicate whether on balance the attitude of the provinces has been positive or negative in reference to this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubts about this question.

GRAIN

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF POLICY CONCERNING ACREAGE REDUCTION—EXPORT OF BARLEY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt. Because of the high degree of uncertainty that exists throughout western Canada as to the course to be followed by the government in connection with the suggested reduction in acreage which the minister has referred to and the admonition on his part that those farmers who have a large amount of wheat on hand should give consideration to not sowing any this year, will the minister say when he expects to be able to notify the House and the country as to the policy to be determined? Up to the present there have been these haphazard statements—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think I did in effect refer to this question yesterday, indicating that we were giving the fullest possible attention to the matter and that, while I cannot set a date for making further statements on it, we are aware of the fact that we should try to do so as soon as possible. This is certainly our objective.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary questipn, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister's attention been brought to the fact that farmers in western Canada are anxious to get rid of their barley surplus? One case involves Dave Roberts of the Green Acres Fertilizer Company at Lethbridge who had found markets in the United States for four million bushels of Canadian barley. The right to export was forbidden and the sale was frowned on by the Wheat Board.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there is no trick at all to finding markets for Canadian grain products below the prices at which they are offered by the Canadian Wheat Board in ways which would in fact hurt and destroy the whole price position. I am happy to remind the right hon. member that sales of wheat and sales of barley are substantially higher this year compared with the figures for the last two years. In fact, exports of barley will likely go to two and a half to three times the figure of last year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that answer sounded like the result of a memory test. That was not what I asked. Why was this company refused the right to export? They could have sold four million bushels of barley at 78 cents a bushel.

Mr. Lang: I think the right hon. member himself at one time supported the policy of marketing grain outside Canada through the Canadian Wheat Board.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the right hon. member in a moment, but I would like to remind him and the minister that they seem to be engaging in a debate at the present time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Speaker: The right hon. gentleman says no. I am just saying this is my impression.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister may be indulging in that sort of thing. He is playing with the rights of the western farmers and doing nothing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

MEASURES TO COUNTERACT DECLINE IN URBAN DWELLING STARTS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Will the minister be announcing soon any steps proposed by the government to counteract the alarming decline of nearly 40 per cent in dwelling unit starts in urban centres for the month of January, as just announced by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think I announced some significant steps that the government plans when I tabled the CMHC budget on February 2 with an increase of $174 million. This will provide for a substantial increase in housing starts for the sector of the market that is really in trouble—the low income sector.

AIR TRANSPORT

AVAILABILITY OF SERVICE AND PARTS FOR AIRCRAFT PURCHASED BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Merci beaucoup, monsieur l'Orateur. I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the Canadian government purchase of four Boeing 707 aircraft at a cost of $56 million, will the minister please state where he plans to service these airplanes and whether there are parts for this make of aircraft available in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: I think the question is out of order and should be put on the order paper.

[English]

Mr. Paproski: Une question supplémentaire, monsieur l'Orateur. Is the minister aware that the aircraft design that he has purchased is 12 years old?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

HAY LAKES—ALLEGED MISUSE OF BAND FUNDS BY GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS—DEATHS ON STURGEON LAKE RESERVE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the minister been advised of the allegations made by Chief Harry Chonkolay of the band council of the Hay Lakes band of Indians of irregularities in the use of band funds by government officials, including the use of blank resolution forms and the use of this money in part for private industry and also for provincial purposes?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this alleged charge made by the chief, but I can assure the hon. member that I shall inquire immediately, and if irregularities have been committed by some of my department's officials, they will be punished accordingly.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister request his colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is to spend a few hours covering all of northern Alberta at the end of this week and the beginning of next week, to inquire into this allegation? Would he also ask him to inquire into the situation with regard to the Indians on the Sturgeon Lake reserve where in the last two months seven pre-school children have died, five having been suffocated in a fire and two having died from starvation and being frozen to death? Would the minister ask his colleague to make inquiries into the situation there?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this last question was asked in the House last fall and we answered it. As far as the first question asked by the hon. member is concerned, this is a problem that comes under the purview of my department and I shall look after it immediately. It does not come under the jurisdiction of my colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—EXTENSION OF COPPER PRICE INCREASE SUSPENSION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the prediction of the president of the Canadian Electrical Manufacturers' Association that if the recent suspension of the copper price increase is removed it will force a two per cent increase this year in the price of electrical goods manufactured in Canada, is the minister discussing with the copper producers the extension of the price increase suspension agreed on several weeks ago, particularly in view of the so-called commitments made at the conference this week in Ottawa?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in my view the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs answered this question fairly well the other day. He said that this situation is constantly under review in light of the consensus reached by business at the conference of the Prices and Incomes Commission this week and in light of the coming federal-provincial conference on this matter. We will have something to announce before March 1.

Mr. Orlikow: Could the minister answer my question with a very simple yes or no?

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether he supports the principle of secret balloting in the House which would mean that hon. members could disregard decisions taken within the caucus?

Mr. Speaker: I would suggest to the hon. member that his question is not acceptable.

FINANCE

REPORTED MOVEMENT OF FOREIGN CAPITAL OUT OF CANADA

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister give the House a clear picture of the current position of the movement of foreign capital in and out of Canada in order to clarify confusing stories that foreign capital is being taken out of Canada at an accelerating rate in the wake of the publication of the white paper on taxation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member should be responded to in a general way by a statement on motions.

POLLUTION

LEGISLATION TO BAN PHOSPHATES IN DETERGENTS

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It arises from opinions advanced in the committee on national resources that the federal government possesses authority to limit or ban the use of phosphates in detergents. Will the minister tell the House whether he intends to make a clear statement as to his plans in this regard? Does he propose to move an amendment to the bill in committee?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): A week ago today, if I recall correctly, I announced in the House that we intended to move in connection with this matter. Inasmuch as the spirit of the Canada Water Act is based on co-operation with the provinces, I have been discussing the situation with my provincial counterparts during the past week, and I can assure the hon. member that we intend to proceed either by way of an amendment to the Canada Water Act or by means of a separate statute; we have not yet decided on the preferable method.

Mr. Aiken: The minister made statements on this subject last Friday and again on Monday in which he seemed to be speaking on both sides of the question. May I ask whether he intends to proceed to introduce such an amendment on his own as part of the federal responsibility?

Mr. Greene: We intend to proceed by whatever method will be most effective in ensuring that phosphates are controlled and, ultimately, banned.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): In view of a statement by a cabinet minister in British Columbia that he is prepared to introduce ancillary legislation supplementing federal policy if the federal government will send him a draft of the provincial legislation required, may I ask whether such a document has been sent to the B.C. Legislature? If not, when will it be sent?

Mr. Greene: I have discussed the question with the British Columbia minister in charge of water quality in that province, and I am certain we can move in such a way as to meet his views and deal with this problem.

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Perhaps my supplementary will take care of the one in the mind of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, who I see is trying to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the minister to send Bills C-105 and C-180, both of which deal with the banning of phosphates, to the committee in order that these bills can be examined at the same time to determine whether it would be desirable to incorporate their provisions in the Canada Water Act?

Mr. Greene: I am not sure as to the present status of those bills. As far as phosphates and detergents are concerned I believe we already have the information required, and we are prepared to take whatever action is necessary.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Will the minister give a definite assurance that legislation will be introduced during the present session to ban detergents—phosphate detergents?

Mr. Greene: Phosphates in detergents. As I said, the exact method by which we shall proceed has not been decided, but I can assure the hon. lady, who has taken a great interest in this matter, that whatever action we take to regulate and ban this substance will be taken as quickly as possible.

Mrs. MacInnis: The minister did not hear my question. I asked whether legislation would be introduced this session.

Mr. Greene: If that is the method which is required as a means of control, then, in fact, it will be.

HARBOURS

COME-BY-CHANCE—PROVISION OF DOCKING FACILITIES FOR OIL REFINERY OPERATIONS

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question should be directed to the Minister of Public Works, Mr. Speaker, but in his absence and in the absence of his Parliamentary Secretary perhaps the Minister of Finance will answer it. Has the government conducted or caused to be conducted a feasibility study into the proposed Come-By-Chance oil refinery? I am asking this question because of the government's reluctance to approve an application for financial assistance to the company in connection with private docking facilities.

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that this is the type of question which would normally be placed on the Order Paper. If there is urgency, however, the minister might be allowed to reply.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I think I would prefer to wait untill the Minister of Public Works is here. The question is really directed to him.

POLLUTION

MONTREAL—PUBLICATION OF REPORTS ON AIR CONTAMINATION—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare but since he is not here I will put it to his parliamentary secretary.

Has the minister undertaken an inquiry on air pollution in Canada bearing in mind the recent reports on the situation in Montreal and, if so, does the intend to make these reports public in the House or elsewhere?

[English]

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Health and Welfare is conducting a national air sampling program in conjunction with the provinces. I believe the minister will decide any question related to the reports which will be available.

[Translation]

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Are these reports complete and does the department intend to bring in legislation in this respect at the next session?

[English]

Mr. Haidasz: This is a matter of government policy which will be announced in due course.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

PROJECTED SECOND VOYAGE BY "MANHATTAN" THROUGH NORTHWEST PASSAGE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has he or his department received notice of a projected voyage by the Manhattan some time during the months of April or May?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that my department has received such a request.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary on this subject, and further to a question on February 2 which I have just been able to locate. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the Canadian government has been requested to agree to a second trip by the Manhattan, as was done in the case of the first voyage?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not read the reference which the hon. member just mentioned but my recollection is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that no request had been made concerning any such voyage.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): This is a supplementary question to the Prime Minister in connection with a question asked a few moments ago. Will the government of Canada permit the Manhattan to make any voyage through these northern waters without the permission of the Canadian government being granted?

Mr. Trudeau: Thanks to the reference which was given in the preceding question, I have the answer given by the minister. If the answer is correct, and I think it is, this question is hypothetical. The reference also answers the first question which was addressed to me. The minister said, as reported on page 3081 of Hansard:

> With regard to the specific question whether the U.S. government has asked us about a second trip of the Manhattan, I think I made it clear in my previous answer that I did not know whether the Manhattan was to make another trip. Indeed, I do not know also whether the United States government would in fact make such inquiries. It is the Manhattan itself which would be making the voyage, not the U.S. government.

[Mr. Haidasz.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing hypothetical about the subject of Canadian sovereignty in the north. My question to the Prime Minister is simply this: Will the government of Canada insist that there shall be no such voyage without the permission of the Canadian government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we might insist that my grandmother should wear wheels, but it is still hypothetical.

POLLUTION

USE OF CONTINGENCY PLANS IN DEALING WITH OIL FROM WRECKED TANKER "ARROW"

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on January 14, 1970 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry indicated that contingency plans for dealing with the adverse affects of oil pollution had been developed. My question to the minister or his Parliamentary Secretary today is: were those contingency plans used in the case of the recent oil spill from the tanker Arrow, and how successful have they been in the opinion of the department?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I am not sure whether they were or not; I would have to check. I know they are doing everything humanly possible to check this pollution, and I imagine they would have used those measures.

[Later:]

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary that relates to my original question. Are copies of these contingency plans available and, if so, where can they be obtained?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

THE MINISTRY

DELAY IN REPLYING TO CORRESPONDENCE FROM MEMBERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the difficulty being faced by private members who are experiencing agonizing delays of up to two months in receiving replies from his ministers to very straightforward requests for information, does the Prime Minister feel that this inefficiency is in any way related to the imposition of the austerity program upon the civil service, and would the Prime Minister be good enough to look into the matter on our behalf?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the record will show that in no previous session have so many questions been answered so quickly by any government.

Mr. Rose: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If I may clarify the matter for the Prime Minister, I was not speaking of answers to questions on the Order Paper but of replies by ministers to personal correspondence from private members.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put this question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that several months ago we passed a bill in this House to appoint extra judges in various provinces and there has been a delay, would the Prime Minister assure the House, in view of the backlog of cases piled up in various courts, that these appointments will be made expeditiously?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, I think that all of the judges for whom there is room under the statute have been appointed except for one.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question. I say this with all due respect, but there are several vacancies for judges in Alberta which have not yet been filled, and we are asking for some action in this regard.

Mr. Trudeau: On this question, Mr. Speaker, all of the Alberta judges were appointed at the cabinet meeting yesterday.

Mr. Woolliams: Then when will the announcement be made, and could we have the names or are these secret appointments?

Mr. Trudeau: I must inform the hon. member that his name is not on the list.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the cabinet yesterday appoint a justice of the Court of Appeal of New Brunswick, a position that has been vacant since last September?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will take the hon. member's request under consideration.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. The minister has asked western farmers not to grow wheat this year, and this will result in loss of income to western farmers. Is this the minister's method of asking the farmers to fight inflation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's question is clearly argumentative.

POLLUTION

CHEDABUCTO BAY—SUPERVISION BY FISHERIES DEPARTMENT OF ACTIVITIES CONCERNING TANKER "ARROW"

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries whether he can assure the House that the Department of Fisheries is supervising the activities at Arichat where the Arrow is situated?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. I know there are a lot of officials there, but I do not know what they are doing.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills to which the concurrence of this House is desired: Bill S-18, an act respecting Brunner Corporation (Canada) Limited; Bill S-19, an act to amend the Parole Act.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, APPLICATION, OIL AND GAS COMMITTEE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill S-5, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether some responsible minister is going to make a statement on this bill.

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, at the outset may I say that the order paper for today has this bill in the name of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). Recently, a change was made which transferred responsibility for the bill from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Speaker: Before we proceed further perhaps it might be understood, if it is so desired, that the bill should be presented to the House in the name of the minister. This can be done in a formal way. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, Bill S-5, to which this House is being asked to give second reading, provides in effect for extension of the provisions of an act passed by this parliament and will apply to the vast areas off Canada's sea coasts. In the briefest terms, Bill S-5 amends the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, which became law last June, in such a way that it will apply not only to the Yukon territory and Northwest Territories, but also to Canadian lands offshore from our sea coasts—in other words, to those areas which are commonly called our continental shelves.

The amended act would provide for more comprehensive statutory control over oil and gas operations, the prevention of waste and pollution, and the safety of operations for persons working in Canada's offshore areas.

The Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act was the product of several years of study and discussion by federal officials and industry representatives. It was designed originally so that it could be applied to both the northern territories and to the offshore areas. Since the need was considered to be more urgent in regard to the territories in view of recent discoveries of gas in the southwestern portion of the Northwest Territories, and now oil at Atkinson Point, it was decided earlier that the then draft act should be completed and enacted with all possible despatch to ensure the orderly development of those new resources in the Canadian north.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

The time has now come for the act to be extended off Canada's offshore areas as well in order to cope with the increasing tempo of offshore exploration activities, in particular drilling for oil and gas. The need is increasing day by day. Drilling operations have been carried out off the west coast and in Hudson Bay, and extensive drilling programs are now under way off the east coast. It is possible that discoveries could be made in these areas in the near future.

The importance of having legislation pertaining to the offshore as comprehensive as would be provided by Bill S-5 is emphasized by incidents such as those which have occurred in the Santa Barbara Channel off California. Pollution is a matter of paramount importance with respect to the vulnerable multi-resource ocean environment. We must not only ensure conservation of the living resources of the sea; we must protect the recreational and other uses of the water, and we must as well preserve the environment for the owners and users of the shoreline. Extension of the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act to the offshore will provide comprehensive statutory authority for effective supervision and control over oil and gas activities, and it will also provide for regulations concerning the safety of the personnel involved.

Accidents elsewhere in the world have provided us with valuable lessons. For a considerable time now, well before the Santa Barbara Channel disaster, the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has been evolving an excellent system for controlling offshore oil and gas exploration and drilling activities. I am pleased to say that the oil industry has been most co-operative. I might mention here that other countries have been taking notice of our practices in this regard, and interest has been expressed at the United Nations in connection with discussions there concerning the shape of a possible international system to govern the mineral resources of the deep oceans beyond the limits of national jurisdiction.

Hon. members may already be aware of the arrangements we have in Canada with regard to co-ordination between industry and governmental agencies involved in the utilization of the offshore. The primary purpose is to ensure that the special requirements of governmental agencies with offshore responsibilities are made known to industry and that industry in turn meets these requirements. To the best of my knowledge, no better arrangements of this type exist anywhere, and here again other countries have shown great interest in the Canadian example.

There are several governmental agencies in addition to Energy, Mines and Resources that have practical responsibilities related to the offshore, not the least of which are those of the Department of Fisheries, in connection with the conservation of living resources; the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in connection with the mineral resources underlying Arctic waters; the Department of National Defence, in connection with defence installations and naval operations, and the Department of Transport in connection with the many aspects of navigation and shipping. It is required that the agencies concerned receive advance notice of proposed offshore exploration programs. This notice would include location, nature of program and type of equipment to be used in the program.

For example, the Department of Fisheries and Forestry receives 90 days' notice, the Department of Transport 60 days' notice, and the Department of National Defence 45 days' notice. This advance notice allows time for each of these agencies to react to a proposed exploration program as may be appropriate. An agency may wish, for instance, to have a program modified for some good reason as to timing or location. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources has, therefore, already put into effect a system of procedures governing offshore oil and gas activities that provides a number of safeguards. The department requires, for example, that operators obtain prior approval by the department for all proposed offshore exploration programs, including each individual offshore well. We are now in need of the statutory authority that would be provided by Bill S-5 in order to enable us to continue evolving regulatory requirements and supervisory controls to keep pace with accelerating offshore activity and technology, and to place us in the position of being prepared to handle the new and complex situation that will arise upon the advent of commercial production.

Hon. members will find the significant amendments to the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act in clause 3 of the bill, where the area of application of the act is enlarged by new section 3(b) to cover "those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada to a water depth of 200 meters or beyond that limit to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil thereof". This wording is derived from the Geneva Convention on the Continental Shelf, which instrument of international law confirms Canada's sovereign rights to explore and exploit the resources of our submerged continental margin.

The purpose of the next section, new section 3(c), is to tie the subject act into those acts which provide for land disposition matters in the territories and the offshore, the Territorial Lands Act and the Public Lands Grants Act, so that there can be no doubt on the part of the international community as to the extent of Canada's claims to mineral resources in these regions.

Finally, the intent of the last paragraph of new section 3 in the bill is to ensure that there will be no conflict with any solution that may come out of the negotiations which are now going on with the provinces in respect of the administration of offshore mineral resources. Hon. members will note that the amended act would not apply to any area within the geographical limits of a province or to any area where the administration of the oil and gas resources has been transferred by law to a province. Other amendments are chiefly to provide for the participation of officials of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in respect of those areas which are the responsibility of that portfolio.

The technical provisions of the act which the House is being asked to amend were explained to the House last April, when the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act was moved for second reading. They remain unchanged. I shall therefore not dwell upon them at length, but shall merely reiterate the main purposes the act pursues. Firstly, it seeks to ensure the recovery of as much oil and gas from a given reservoir as technology and economics permit. This means, for example, that the energy in the reservoir, which pushes the petroleum into the well bore, must not be inefficiently dissipated.

Secondly, the act provides for pooling and unitization among the petroleum companies so that an oil or gas field will be operated as if it were owned by one company. This, Mr. Speaker, is to ensure that only the minimum number of wells required for efficient production will be drilled and that these wells will be located at the best possible positions throughout the field. The result, of course, is greater efficiency and lower production costs. Thirdly, the act provides for the setting up of the necessary administrative system and for appeals by industry with regard to administrative orders and directives.

I should like to mention at this point the great degree of unanimity on both sides of the House with which the technical provisions of the act under consideration were approved. What does the future hold for the offshore? We cannot say with certainty, for it is hidden in what the mariners of old called "Davey Jone's Locker". As I have already pointed out, one cannot predict when a major discovery will be made—it could be tomorrow.

The image of a wild and barren sea must be revised and it is being revised by our oceanographers, geologists and geophysicists. Although such words as "offshore" and "continental shelf" have become part of our everyday conversation, few Canadians as yet have a clear conception of what they mean. Think of them, if you will, as a portion of our territory that happens to be covered with a relatively shallow layer of salt water. The average depth of water over the Grand Banks of Newfoundland is less than the maximum depth of Lake Erie, by far the shallowest of the Great Lakes. With modern petroleum technology, exploration at such depths has become commonplace. And these continental shelves are vast, their area amounting to about 40 per cent of our land area. Think of it—at one stroke the mineral-resource area of our country has been increased by more than one third. It is true that much of the continental shelf in the Arctic is covered by sea ice and is difficult of access, but it is already being studied in depth by the scientists of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. Indeed, it is an oil discovery in the American Arctic, onshore in Alaska less than 200 miles from the Canadian border, that has sparked an unprecedented interest in both Arctic exploration and Arctic navigation.

Not only are our continental shelves accessible to mineral exploration, especially oil and gas exploration, but their geological composition makes them highly promising from a prospecting point of view. Much of Canada's continental shelf consists of sedimentary rocks of the type in which petroleum is found. The Canadian Petroleum Association made an estimate not long ago that the petroleum potential of our east coast shelf alone, including only areas to a water depth of 200 metres, amounts to some 25 billion barrels of oil and 150 trillion cubic feet of gas. This does not take into account the large areas covered by considerably deeper water. The fact is that Canada's continental shelves extend to water depths considerably greater than 200 metres in many places.

[Mr. Orange.]

These are indeed astronomical figures that strain the imagination; but scientific and technological achievements in recent years and months have shown that sceptics are the losers and visionaries the winners. It is true that we still know relatively little about the geology of our offshore areas—less in fact than was known about the geology of Alberta on the eve of the epoch-making Leduc oil strike of 1947. The gaps in our knowledge, however, are rapidly being filled by government and private scientists, with those of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in the van.

The growth in exploration activity has been phenomenal. The offshore area under federal exploration permits off the east coast alone now covers 260 million acres, about twice as many acres as the four Atlantic provinces combined, including Labrador, and stretching in an unbroken belt for some 2,000 miles from the Gulf of Maine in the north easterly direction to the Grand Banks and thence to Hudson Strait. In total, approximately 500 million acres are presently held under offshore Canada oil and gas permits. This means that more than half of Canada's submerged continental margin is now covered by permits. I need hardly point out that this activity is even now bringing important economic benefits to the coastal regions, particularly along the Atlantic, and that these benefits will multiply with the discovery of commercial quantities of oil or gas.

Yet the very magnitude of these activities and the economic and social consequences that flow therefrom oblige us to subject them to the most searching scrutiny and to view them in the largest possible framework, in time and space. We are dealing here with a national patrimony which must be applied not only for the immediate welfare of the Canadian people but also for generations yet to come for whom we hold these non-renewable resources, actual or potential, in trust. This is a sobering thought which requires a sober and sagacious response. I believe that the bill now before the House meets this requirement.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) is the sponsor of the bill, it seems that the subject matter of the bill should be placed more properly before the Committee on National Resources and Public Works. I wonder if the House would give unanimous consent to permit the transfer of this bill as it now stands on the order paper from the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development to the Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Speaker: Is it unanimously agreed that the motion now before the House be amended in the sense proposed by the parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: No.

Mr. Aiken: I do not know whether I am permitted to do any more than say yes or no. The Committee on National Resources and Public Works now has the Canada Water Act before it, and will study it for a period of anywhere from six weeks to two months perhaps. It seems to me that it would be very difficult for the committee to handle this bill. But, unfortunately, we were not consulted.

Mr. Speaker: There might be further discussions later on during the day on the point. At the moment, it can only be proposed to the House by way of a formal motion which requires unanimous consent. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary may wish to have discussions with representatives of the other parties before a reconsideration of the matter later today.

Mr. Barnett: May I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker, in relation to the matter which was raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). I would not want the impression to be left in the House that the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development is not also occupied with important matters.

Mr. Speaker: Has the parliamentary secretary completed his remarks?

Mr. Orange: Yes.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the bill that has been placed before the House has been prepared somewhat hurriedly by the government. There is some confusion as to who is responsible, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) is still in the House. I hope he will remain with us for a while because when the discussion began this afternoon I asked of the government which responsible minister would be piloting the legislation through the House. We still have not quite clarified that point. My good friend, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Orange) has been handling the debate up to the present, but, we have not yet decided to which of the two committees the matter should be referred.

Mr. Barnett: The minister is part of a hydraheaded monster.

Mr. Dinsdale: The reason I have indicated that I trust the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will stay in the House is there is a strong feeling that there are some fundamental points that have to be clarified during the course of our discussion today, issues that revolve upon important jurisdictional questions as between the federal and provincial governments. It would seem to me that only a minister of the Crown who has been active in whatever negotiations have taken place around these areas can provide answers to the House at present.

It was only as recently as June 27, 1969 that royal assent was given to the original act which was then entitled an act respecting the production and conservation of oil and gas in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, which indicates just how uncertain the government is in respect of these matters. In less than 12 months the government has come before the House with amendments to the original act. This is either an indication of poor housekeeping on the part of the government or of the fact that jurisdictional problems have not been properly sorted out, or else it could be, and I am sure this is another aspect, that the progress in mineral and oil exploration in the areas originally designated under the act, that is the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, has been proceeding so rapidly that additional legislative terms of reference are required at this time. It is quite true that there has been a great upsurge of interest in northern development.

I suppose this is related to the famous Prudhoe Bay discovery in the State of Alaska, which occurred just over a year ago. I want to underline that Canadian interest in this area even predated that of the United States government, as indicated by the legislation of 1969 and the further amendments that are before the House now. It is unfortunate that government action was delayed, or at least that enthusiastic support for mineral and oil exploration in the north was dampened down until such time as our American friends were out in the forefront in the exploration field.

In his introductory remarks, the parliamentary secretary indicated that oil will be discovered. It is quite possible that oil could be discovered tomorrow, or at any moment. With the intensity of exploration now going on in the north this is certainly quite probable, but by the same token, Mr. Speaker, oil could have been discovered much earlier in the Canadian northern territories had the pace of enthusiasm and interest in northern development, which was generated during the early 60's, been continued throughout the latter part of the decade.

To get to the heart of the bill, and I notice that this concern was expressed in the other place when Bill S-5 was before those hon. gentlemen, I would like to inquire of the minister what degree of agreement and co-operation has been reached on the basis of consultation between the federal and provincial authorities? The chief purpose of the amendments before us is to define and delineate the continental shelf adjoining the mainland. In the light of the discussions that have been taking place for a number of years, it seems to me that if this legislation is to have any real significance and practical success in its implementation, a reasonable degree of concurrence should have been achieved by the provincial and federal levels of government. I trust that the minister of resources will make a statement, because no information along these lines was included in the opening remarks of the parliamentary secretary.

I would also like to hear comment from the minister on what degree of consideration this matter has received in the Resource Ministers Council, the administrative innovation established in areas of federal-provincial dispute with particular reference to resource matters. To me that would seem to be the ideal machinery for ironing out the obvious difficulties which have plagued the implementation of government initiative, both at the federal and provincial levels in the important matter of off-shore resource development.

At one time, and I am wondering whether this situation still prevails, Mr. Speaker, in order to be absolutely certain of their position with reference to areas of jurisdictional dispute, the mining and oil companies took out permits from both the provincial and the federal authorities. In view of the substantial amounts of money involved in exploration, they were not going to take the risk of being cut out because of difficulties existing between both levels of government. These were some of the questions that were raised in the other place.

During the course of the committee hearings in the other place on Bill S-5 the matter of jurisdictional responsibility was not clarified, not even in the testimony of the two departmental officials who appeared before the committee, Mr. G. M. McNabb, Assistant Deputy Minister, Energy Development, and Dr. D. G. Crosby, Chief, Resources Administration Division. It was the hon. Senator Connolly who raised the issue as to whether concurrent permits were still necessary for private industry operating in this field, and in reply Dr. Crosby said:

> For the most part, Sir, people who have permit coverage from the federal government also have the same coverage from the appropriate provincial government. They have gone to both levels of authority.

So, I presume that the situation still prevails. Then Senator Connolly asked:

> You may have to go to the courts in some cases, is that it?
> Dr. Crosby: I do not think, Sir, that this will necessarily become the case. We anticipate that agreements will be reached with the provinces and that these will be enshrined in legislation. As such, they will become the law of the land, of course, both provincially and federally.
> Senator Connolly: In legislation?
> Dr. Crosby: Yes. As an end result of the Prime Minister's offer, it will be necesary to enact legislation, I should point out that I am no legal expert, Sir, and, speaking completely as a layman, I am at your mercy.
> Senator Connolly: We are at yours, too.

That re-echoes the sentiments of members on this side of the House. We are completely in the dark with respect to the present status of jurisdictional problems between the federal and provincial levels of government. I trust that the minister of resources will help clarify this matter before we carry our discussions too far today.

The comments made in the committee in the other place suggest that this amending legislation, which follows so quickly on the initial enactment of the bill, will require almost immediate further amendment, because it was indicated that Bill S-5 is merely anticipatory of further legislation to come. Earlier in our proceedings today I inquired of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)

whether he could help clarify this situation. I did so deliberately because I think it is of the utmost importance to this debate that members of Parliament have some definite information as to the state of negotiations between the provinces and Ottawa.

In my question I indicated that there had been correspondence flowing from the Prime Minister's office beginning on November 29, 1968, followed by a further letter on February 27, 1969, in an attempt by the federal government to get the agreement of the provinces to precise delineation of jurisdictional responsibility. This resulted, I suppose, from the transfer of certain lands from northern affairs to the new resources department in 1966. At one time resources came exclusively under the old department of northern affairs but now they are divided between northern affairs and the resources department. The uncertainty, the confusion that seemed to prevail in the government benches, Mr. Speaker, at the outset of the debate today indicated that even within the government itself there is still no decision where the respective areas of responsibility lie. I trust that the minister will make a statement this afternoon which will indicate where the negotiations represented by the correspondence from the Prime Minister's office rest at the moment. I think the government owes it to the members of this House and the opposition to clarify this point before we can make any final decision on where we are heading with reference to Bill S-5.

In addition to the problems of intergovernmental disputation, there are other matters to be decided of course. The case of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon and the position that they occupy with reference to Bill S-5 would seem to me to be of the utmost importance to the Maritime provinces. This arises from the fact that, as the parliamentary secretary has indicated, clause 3 of this bill quite precisely and specifically delineates the territorial rights under the legislation. For example, it states that the offshore limits would extend to a water depth of 200 metres which would be approximately 650 feet. This is not an absolute figure, of course, because water levels vary from time to time and the whole situation with reference to the position of St. Pierre and Miquelon and the offshore continental shelf in respect to those two islands would, I presume, be a matter of continuing discussion between the government of Canada and the government of France at the present time.

The Prime Minister has referred to the Supreme Court decision of 1967 which resulted from the reference made to that body arising from the dispute on the west coast. Again, I think it should be clarified whether the government of Canada regards the Supreme Court decision in favour of the federal government's claim with respect to the west coast situation as applying to other coastal areas of Canada as well. I trust information will be forthcoming along this line.

My greatest concerns with regard to the proposed amendments have to do with the situation in the Northwest Territories, and in particular the Canadian Archipelago, arising from the current discussion on sovereignty. The original Bill S-29 did not precisely delineate the continental shelf and the offshore limitations. Under the amendments, the Canadian Archipelago will be subject to the same terms of reference as the coastline continental shelf. It will be readily seen, Mr. Speaker, that this immediately raises the whole question of Canadian sovereignty in northern Canada. Members of the official opposition feel strongly that before we can proceed further in the discussion and consideration of Bill S-5, the government should in no uncertain manner—which would be quite a change for the government—reaffirm the sector principle of sovereignty in Bill S-29. This has always been regarded as the position of Canda with reference to Arctic sovereignty, until the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) speaking on behalf of Canada began to vacillate on the matter on legalistic and even technical grounds.

I regard clause 3 as representing a very serious threat to Canada's traditional position of sovereignty in the Archipelago, Mr. Speaker. Because of that I should like to move an amendment, seconded by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in the following words:

That all the words after the word "that" be left out and the following substituted therefor: this House, by reason that the Territorial Sea and Fishing Zones Act, chapter 22 of the 1964-65 statutes, extends and applies, except as therein provided, to every act of Parliament and every order, rule or regulation thereunder and the Governor in Council has failed to exercise his powers under that statute to issue lists of geographical coordinates of points from which baselines may be determined to establish the inner limits of the Arctic portion of the territorial sea of Canada and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has not caused charts to be issued delineating the Arctic portion of the said territorial sea wherefor the Arctic submarine areas adjacent and superjacent to the coast of Canada, to which the bill applies as mentioned in clause 3 thereof, are not known to and cannot presently be determined by this House, and by reason of the immediate relevancy to the bill and the said statute of the declarations, recommendations and other matter set out and contained in the first report of the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, presented to the House on Tuesday, 19 December 1969, relating to the sovereignty of Canada in the Arctic, will not proceed upon this bill until that day next following the day upon which the question is put for concurrence by this House in the said report, or, if Parliament is not then sitting, then on any day next thereafter that Parliament is sitting.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must say that initially I have some misgivings about the admissibility of the amendment. I prefer to consult with Mr. Speaker on the matter and possibly a ruling could be given after the luncheon adjournment.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I assume that the dictates of intelligence will impel Your Honour to accept the amendment after consultation. That will be fine.

An hon. Member: What intelligence?

Mr. Baldwin: I was speaking of the dictates of intelligence and not of the intelligence on the government side. That is a lost cause. If Your Honour has not accepted the amendment, then perhaps at one o'clock you might hear arguments from hon. members on this side in support of this reasoned amendment.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I support the bill, including the principle that we should claim possession of continental shelf areas off Canada's coasts. I believe this bill has implications with regard to the sovereignty issue and the pollution issue and is relevant to any claim we might have to the economic consequences of oil development in this area. Mention has been made of the constitutional or jurisdictional issue. May I, in this connection, call the attention of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) to a speech the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) made. Actually, I wish to read an excerpt from a letter sent by the minister to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). It is signed "Jack Davis". As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries has advocated that we establish an underwater park in Georgia strait, and the letter contains part of his argument in that regard. It reads in part:

[Mr. Dinsdale.]

The constitutional position is also quite clear. As the nation owns all of the land surface below the low water mark off our shores, the areas in question do not have to be transferred from the provincial government. No negotiation with a provincial authority is necessary nor do we have to compensate private interests and assemble acreages to the same extent that we do on land.

I think everyone knows that the Minister of Fisheries is an authority on this matter. I wish he would decide to establish an underwater park in the waters adjacent to the Northwest Territories and make a similar declaration about those waters and the Arctic Archipelago.

Mr. Anderson: Will the hon. member permit a question? For the sake of those hon. members who have been following the hon. member's speech with great attention and interest, could he please let us know the date of the letter he referred to so that other hon. members who wish to may obtain copies of it?

Mr. Thomson: It is dated February 2, 1970. I am wondering if the minister of fisheries has informed that great white father in Victoria, Premier Bennett, of this particular jurisdictional position. If so, I should be interested in hearing Premier Bennett's answer.

This bill also relates to the question of pollution. The minister of fisheries has suggested that if we protect our fish we protect ourselves. I am prepared to accept that as sound reasoning, although it seems probable that he heard this from his friends the fish. He is saying that what is good for fish is good for Canada. This reminds me of an argument I heard south of the border to the effect that what is good for General Motors is good for the United States. The minister's approach is somewhat newer.

An hon. Member: It sounds like a fishy argument.

Mr. Thomson: The minister of fisheries has suggested that, "It is all right for you to drill for oil off Canada's coast, but don't dare drill for oil in Georgia strait because we want to put an underwater park there." He is seeking the co-operation of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The oil business is important to Canada and passage of this bill will bring some measure of certainty to our oil interests. For instance, those involved with oil matters will now know which level of government has authority to issue regulations governing Canada's coastal waters.

This should bring a measure of certainty to the entire oil industry and to those who manufacture oil drilling barges. We manufacture such barges in Canada; I saw a picture of one which had been built in Halifax. I recall discussing with the representative of a shipbuilding firm the problems of shipbuilding, and part of our discussions touched on this particular issue. I ask, why should not Canada specialize in building vessels we will use a great deal? I think the proposed amendment will bring a great deal of certainty to our total business economy, including that area engaged in the business of constructing oil drilling barges.

There is another area which concerns me, Mr. Speaker. Last year parliament passed Bill S-29, but that bill has not yet been put into force. The government house leader said we must hurry and pass a number of government bills. Those bills were passed, but they are not being utilized. The bill to which I referred is one of those which has not been put into effect. The house leader was telling us not to delay, yet Bill S-29 has not been put into force; nor has the government set up the oil and gas committee mentioned in Bill S-29. Why, Mr. Speaker? Why is the government hurrying the House to pass legislation and then dragging its feet in the administration of that legislation? It has not even established the regulations called for in the bill. Why has it not done so, Mr. Speaker? The companies affected are not quite certain what is happening. Why does the government not bring this legislation into force? The bill was passed towards the end of June. It was sound and contained good law. The opposition was urged not to drag its feet; Parliament passed the bill but the government is not utilizing it. Why? Rather than agree with the position of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, who has urged some delay, I should like to kick the government and tell it to get the lead out.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomson: The government pushed the legislation through, but has not acted on it. I suggest, in addition, that the credibility of the government house leader has been called into question because the government has not hurried to implement the legislation.

Mr. Baldwin: What credibility?

Mr. Mahoney: You are going too far.

Mr. Thomson: The government is red hot about passing legislation but slow in administering it once it has been passed.

Mr. Dinsdale: There is a little confusion on the government side.

Mr. Thomson: The parliamentary secretary suggested that the need for such legislation as this is increasing. I agree with that statement. This bill is a good measure in that it will institute controls over those companies wishing to drill for oil off Canada's coast or on Canada's continental shelf. We ought to pass it now and, if necessary, amend it later. In the meantime, let us pass a measure which will show that we are concerned about the pollution problem and that the continental shelf off Canada's shore is our land.

• (12:50 p.m.)

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I am very anxious that this amendment be passed and made law at the earliest possible date. I think that anxiety is shared by the industry that will primarily be affected by it. I think the industry shares the mystification of the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) as to whether the government shares that anxiety.

The act which we are now amending received royal assent last June 27, yet the oil and gas committee authorized by section 4 of the act, and whose existence is an essential element of the system of control and conservation envisaged by the act, has yet to be appointed. I have no idea what other steps, if any, have been taken to implement the act.

While the present amendment is very important in that it will bring uniformity to the administration of an important field of the law regulating the petroleum industry, the fact remains that the present act, unamended, embraces the entire area of federal responsibility where production and conservation are a reality rather than an expectation. One might hope that the committee would be appointed and put to work immediately, even though there may be some delay in bringing under its jurisdiction that part of our federal petroleum and natural gas resources administered by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The government may have some information that has yet to be published but, as far as I am aware, all discoveries to date on federal lands lie within the jurisdiction of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and are amenable to the provisions of the act as passed last session. There is no apparent good reason for further delay in implementing the act. Perhaps the minister or his parliamentary secretary will take the opportunity, in closing the debate, to explain the reason for the delay; although admittedly this minister has no direct involvement in the existing act.

Basically, this amendment will bring offshore production under the ambit of the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. The mixed up situation regarding the offshore exploration near Vancouver points out the urgency of an early rationalization of the rules under which the industry is to work. There is something very unreal in the present situation, which sees the industry complying to the letter with the regulations established by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, spending large sums of money executing the program demanded of them by the department if they are to keep their permits in good standing, yet threatened with the positive caveat of the fisheries department that if they find something there is no way they will be allowed to recover it.

This is a government that prides itself, and with very good reason in most cases, on taking a business-like approach in its dealings with the business community. I do not for a moment downgrade the importance of the ecological considerations involved in the offshore production of oil. Even if one were disposed to ignore them, the examples are too dramatic and too grave to permit that. It is equally difficult to ignore the anomaly of the conflicting policies of different government departments, each having concurrent jurisdiction, in relation to this aspect of the industry's operations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mahoney: It is an aspect which will bring very substantial long term economic benefits to Canada if significant offshore resources of oil are found. The industry has a right to expect an early rationalization of the government's approach. The country at large has a right to expect that rationalization will fairly balance the potential ecological risks against the potential economic benefits.

I am not sure that the "no way" attitude of the fisheries department indicates a particularly objective, scientific or rational approach to a very important problem. It is common speculation, I do not know whether based on fact or not, that existing regulations governing the operations of the petroleum industry in the federal field are being reviewed. I accept the speculation as having a considerable basis in fact and I agree that a revision is most desirable in the light of discoveries on and near federal lands. However, there is a tendency on the part of laymen, and I am one of them, to get very excited about an oil or gas discovery and to assume that a single important strike is proof positive that a substantial field has been found. It is equally easy to assume that discovery of an important field in one location will almost certainly be followed by discovery of an important field nearby. All of this is not necessarily so, and the authorities considering revisions of the existing regulations should remember this.

The Prudhoe Bay discovery has given great impetus to exploration in the Canadian Arctic. It has raised our expectation of success to a very high level. The Atkinson Point oil discovery and the Panarctic gas discoveries have all tended to reinforce this optimism. It is all right to be optimistic, but let's not be sanguine.

Prudhoe Bay is an immense oil field, but still only a few wells have been completed and some dry holes have been found on the structure. It is significant that in the great Alaska oil rights sale last fall, the oil companies that had the best access to information, those with actual information in the field, did not pay exorbitant prices for more land. Oil accumulations the size of Prudhoe are extremely rare. The only field of comparable size to be discovered in North America was discovered in east Texas at the turn of the century, 70 years ago. Undoubtedly much more oil will be found in the Canadian Arctic, but the chances of finding a new Prudhoe Bay are slim.

Mr. Dinsdale: Don't be so pessimistic.

Mr. Mahoney: The authorities should also bear in mind that short of discovering another Prudhoe Bay, our Arctic oil is going to be very expensive where it counts, at its market. Wellhead price is only one consideration. Exploration costs are relatively high. Transportation costs will also be relatively high. Neither Prudhoe nor any other discovery yet made or likely to be made in the future will support the idea that the Canadian Arctic will be another Kuwait.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Orange: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been some discussions with hon. gentlemen opposite regarding the reference to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works of this particular bill and there has been general agreement that the order should be changed to refer the subject matter of this bill to that particular committee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege as regards the motion moved by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I wish to say that we Créditistes do not agree in principle with his proposal for a gentleman's agreement to transfer the subject matter of Bill S-5 from one committee to another.

[English]

We don't agree.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me if there is no unanimous consent, the issue is closed. It ceases to be an issue.

Mr. Fortin: I have raised the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not understand how there could be a question of privilege arising out of that, but I am prepared to listen to the hon. member.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

In fact, we agree that this bill be referred to the committee. On the other hand, however, the Parliamentary Secretary did not consult us to conclude his gentlemen's agreement. He contacted the representatives of the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party, but walked by me twice without stopping or even acknowledging my presence. He certainly knows that I am the house leader of the Ralliement Créditiste.

There are 14 of us members of the Ralliement Créditiste in the House. We have been officially recognized, not only by Parliament but also by the Canadian people, as a separate political group and we intend to assert our rights. When the Parliamentary Secretary first introduced this motion, the Chair did say that it was an agreement between all parties.

Therefore, I must protest—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not sure whether the hon. member has a question of privilege. He may have a legitimate ground for complaint. Perhaps we should leave it at that.

It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You can speak all you like, now.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Prior to one o'clock the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) moved an amendment to Bill S-5. I suggested at that time that I might consult with Mr. Speaker and with members of the table. I am now prepared to give a ruling. However, before I do so I might like to hear the advice and suggestions of hon. members, if any hon. members wish to be heard.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, may I first refer to the ruling on a reasoned amendment made by Mr. Speaker on January 15, 1970, to be found at pages 2427-8 of Hansard, where a reasoned amendment was rejected. May I point out that this amendment is different in context and approaches more closely the type of amendment that has been accepted in the past. I should like to refer to May's seventeenth edition, page 527, where the author deals with reasoned amendments. It is stated that a reasoned amendment may fall into one of several categories, the second of which is:

> It may express opinions as to any circumstances connected with the introduction or prosecution of the bill, or otherwise opposed to its progress.

Then, at page 528 May deals with the effect of the acceptance of a reasoned amendment and states:

> The technical effect of such an amendment is to supersede the question for now reading the bill a second time; and the bill is left in the same position as if the question for now reading the bill a second time had been simply negatived or superseded by the previous question. The House refuses on that particular day to read the bill a second time, and gives its reasons for such refusal; but the bill is not otherwise disposed of.

It is my submission that this amendment falls particularly and directly within this rule. The amendment states that certain additional information must be forthcoming before the bill can properly be considered. The amendment suggests some other course be followed, namely that a previously introduced report on sovereignty should be disposed of before reading the present bill a second time. I would think that this is the ultimate reason for accepting the amendment. We have before the House now certain questions of sovereignty over Canada's northland with which the House has not dealt, and about which there has been a good deal of controversy. The matter has been discussed; a report has been laid before the House previously but not concurred in.

The bill we are considering hinges very largely on the question of sovereignty in the north, since some of its provisions define the outer limits of Canadian sovereignty. In our opinion this bill derogates from Canadian sovereignty in the north; this opinion has been expressed hitherto and will be further expressed during the debate.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, fundamentally this amendment seeks to have the bill not now read a second time but delayed until the report on sovereignty has been dealt with. It is, in fact, a dilatory amendment that would force the bill to follow another House order in terms of priority. For those reasons, I think this is specifically a case of a properly reasoned amendment being presented to the House in order to delay second reading of a bill until a certain event has taken place and another order of the House has been considered and disposed of.

It has been held on previous occasions that a reasoned amendment may be quite lengthy in its preamble, provided that in substance the essence of the amendment is to delay the reading of the bill. This is not in the time honoured tradition of a three months or a six-month hoist, but it is most definitely a motion of that type which delays second reading until certain things have been dealt with by the House. I think it is a perfectly straightforward and proper amendment on second reading. I suggest it should be accepted.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I would have entered the debate were it not for the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). I believe it is very important, in the interests of Canada, to make two points. In the first place, there has not been any contest by any party outside of the country or any doubt on the part of the government of Canada about our claim to the continental shelf. In fact, the position has been the very opposite; that is, that the continental shelf whether in the Arctic or anywhere else adjacent to Canada is under the complete sovereignty of the government of Canada. I say this because it relates to the relevancy of the amendment to this particular bill and because I think it is important to declare it here again, as it has been declared unequivocally before, so that the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka do not prejudice Canada's interest, that we do not acknowledge in any sense the jurisdiction of any other state with regard to the continental shelf, the subject matter of this particular bill.

I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to clause 3 of the bill which deals in express terms with the submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada to a water depth of 200 meters or beyond. I affirm here, on behalf of the government and Canada, that there is no accuracy in what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka said when he suggested there is any doubt about Canada's exclusive jurisdiction there.

An hon. Member: Read the bill.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I refer to clause 3, and emphasize the fact that in this bill we are talking about the continental shelf.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, are we, under the guise of a point of order, to be permitted to debate Canada's sovereignty? I thought we had a point of order before the House and not the substance of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must say I am developing the same misgivings. I would invite the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), now having made the opening statement, to discuss the procedural question before the Chair at the moment.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would say in respect of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that I am surprised he is joining with the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka in giving away Canada's clear rights in the north.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have said nothing about the substance and I did not intend to say anything about the procedural point, but I insist that the only point that is now before Your Honour is the procedural admissibility or inadmissibility of the amendment.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I hope the hon. member is not prepared to give away Canada's interest in this.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a question of privilege—

Mr. Aiken: On a point of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There are two hon. members rising on a question of privilege. I have already made one suggestion to the President of the Privy Council. I will hear the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on the question of privilege and then the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my point of privilege is that I have said nothing either directly or by implication that has anything to do with the substance of either the bill or the amendment now before the House. When the minister suggests that I am giving away something belonging to Canada he is incorrect and he is going far beyond the bounds of what is proper in this debate. It was my intention to remain silent on this point of order because I have some doubt about the admissibility of the amendment, but if he keeps on I may change my mind.

Mr. Aiken: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I resent the suggestion by the President of the Privy Council that I am trying to give away the rights of Canada. I suggest that if the President of the Privy Council would read the bill he would see that is what his government is doing. I have a map here that will show it. I intend to establish this later in the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the President of the Privy Council and others will agree with me that perhaps we should revert to the particular procedural question which confronts the Chair at the moment and confine our argument to that question.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, might I refer to the following reference from May's seventeenth edition at page 527:

> The following rules govern the contents of reasoned amendments:—
> The principle of relevancy in an amendment governs every such motion.

May I point out that it is perfectly proper, in the course of arguing a point of order on a question of relevancy, to refer to the subject matter of the bill in question on which second reading is being moved and to refer to the subject matter of the amendment. I take it there is no contest on that point. All the amendment refers to is the question of the territorial seas of Canada, the waters surrounding the Canadian mainland and the waters of Canada but what the bill refers to are those submarine areas adjacent to Canada to a water depth of 200 meters or beyond. We have here no question of territorial waters or a three-mile limit or a 12-mile limit or questions of navigation or non-navigation. This particular bill relates to the continental shelf, the sea-bed underlying the waters.

What I said about the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, in the form of an injunction, was that I hoped he would not be intervening in this debate to cast any doubt on the fact that we have an uncontested jurisdiction over the continental shelf. We have here an amendment referring exclusively to the question of territorial waters. It refers to a report in which the question of the territorial waters was raised. I suggest therefore, because this bill relates to the continental shelf and the marine areas in and about the continental shelf, that an amendment with regard to navigation is not relevant in this particular case. The amendment, therefore, should not be accepted.

Mr. Woolliams: You keep the establishment going.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I cannot imagine the hon. member keeping anything going, useful or otherwise. Perhaps I might refer to the ruling of the Speaker of January 15, 1970 already referred to by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka. He selectively read from the ruling at that time. May I draw Your Honour's attention to the words recorded at page 2428 of Hansard of that date where the chair referred to Section (1) of citation 393 of Beauchesne's fourth edition which was quoted at length:

> An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a Bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading. It must oppose the principle of the Bill.

What we have here, in effect, is an amendment which does not oppose the principle of the bill. It really is, in a guise, a statement of policy and a statement of policy not even about the subject matter of the bill itself. It is a statement of policy with regard to the question of the territorial waters. Because it is irrelevant and because it does not oppose the principle of the bill, I suggest the amendment should not be accepted.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what I thought before you spoke.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to restore this debate to the dignity of a reasoned argument on a procedural question. In doing so I applaud Your Honour's decision in trying to prevent the rather deplorable and sly attempt by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) to get around the mealy-mouthed position the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took in the past.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Madonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I now proffer to the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) the same piece of advice I offered the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Baldwin: I feel better now, Mr. Speaker.

I will now proceed to speak on the procedural question. I should like to point out that I do not think the minister has really directed his mind to the bill in its entirety. It is true that clause 3 deals with the question of the submarine areas, but if hon. members would look back to clause 2 and subclause 3, they would find a new definition of pipeline which brings into question offshore installations or vessels. In other words, the definition of pipeline is extended to include offshore installations or vessels. How far offshore—

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): To the depth of 200 metres.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister has not contributed to the debate so far, and I think that the longer he remains silent the better off this House will be. With regard to the installation of vessels, we want to know how far offshore this would apply and to what extent. Are we entitled to consider that offshore means any part of the water between the islands of the Arctic Archipelago and the mainland? This has been brought into issue by the government in this clause. It purports to affix to the word "pipeline" an artificial interpretation, and therefore we are entitled to say that it is not proper for this Parliament to come to a decision on this matter until it has decided what the government has not had the intestinal fortitude to decide, namely, what are the limits of our sovereignty so far as the Arctic waters are concerned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I thank hon. members. I am now prepared to make my ruling on the amendment of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale).

The hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and the President of the Privy Council in their interventions on this question mentioned the ruling of Mr. Speaker on January 15 last when a reasoned amendment in relation to the bill to amend the Canada Water Act was before the House. I suggest to hon. members that the ruling on that occasion is relevent and applies in full measure to the amendment now being considered. I should like to quote two sections of that ruling. Paragraph 5 on page 312 of Votes and Proceedings which is an excerpt from May's, citation 382, reads:

> It is also competent to a Member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a Bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress; or seeking further information to the Bill by Committees, Commissioners, the production of papers or other evidence or the opinion of Judges.

In my view, the really operative part of that citation is the following: "a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill". Farther on, the same ruling refers to section 1 of citation 393 of Beauchesne's Fourth edition which reads:

> An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a Bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading. It must oppose the principle of the bill.

In my view, the amendment moved today by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is substantially the same as the one moved by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) on January 15. I am afraid that, for the same reasons, I cannot allow the amendment.

Mr. Pat Mahoney (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, when we rose at one o'clock I was discussing the proposition that with all the optimism we may reasonably entertain regarding our prospects in the Arctic, in the Northwest Territories, certainly the fact of Prudhoe Bay or the fact of the oil and gas discoveries on our side of the boundary give no reason to be sanguine. We have no reason to expect an extension of Prudhoe Bay nor any good reason to think that we are likely to find an oilfield comparable to that. I am not myself a geologist or a geophysicist. However, I think that the better geological and geophysical opinion with respect to Prudhoe Bay is that it is a basin limited on the east by the British Mountains which run along the Alaska Yukon border, and that, to the extent that such areas as the Mackenzie delta have resources comparable to Prudhoe Bay, those resources will comprise a separate basin from Prudhoe Bay and not an extension of it.

There is also a tendency in some quarters to think of our Arctic reserves as money in the bank to be conserved and spent at our complete leisure. This is totally irresponsible. The momentum of exploration and development must be maintained. Oil demand could very well slacken in 10 or 20 years. It has happened to other industries—coal is an example—and it could happen to petroleum. The automobile is a prime target in the campaign against pollution. With this impetus there is every likelihood of a breakthrough in automobile power source that will level off the demand for petroleum in the foreseeable future. I love our forests and I am grateful to those who have fought so hard to conserve them, but I hope their motivation was not that the cordwood market was going to get better.

In addition, we cannot let our share of the world market drop. Others will be very happy to pick it up, and again technology increases the risk of a loss of markets. The Colorado oil shales in the United States constitute the world's largest known oil reserve. The United States government has not granted leases there, but the pressure is on and many feel that existing technology will permit the extraction of oil at a price competitive with other energy sources.

So I repeat, let us not, in revising these regulations covering our best industry assume that a slowdown in the industry can be absorbed with impunity. About 30 cents out of each of the billion dollars spent last year by the petroleum industry—some $300 million—was spent in direct purchases from central Canada. A good portion of the other 70 cents was expended on commodities manufactured in central Canada. A significant slow down in exploration by the industry would have a serious short-term effect in all Canada. The adverse effects might, in the long-term, become perpetual.

Much bitterness in western Canada started with the federal colonialism that preceded the transfer of resources to Alberta and Saskatchewan. The position of residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories is not particularly relevant to this specific bill, but it is certainly a problem that must lie in the back of our minds as we think about the activity in the petroleum industry in those Territories.

Finally, there are three changes which the authorities should consider. The need for incentives to explore, built into the present pre-Prudhoe regulations, has certainly modified. I would recommend that for the future, serious consideration be given to removing the added royalty option, and adopting the Crown reserve system, as I believe that lands returned to the Crown and auctioned by it create a competitive situation resulting in new waves of exploration. One factor the government will have to consider is a calculation of the royalty return against income from auction bids and increased exploration.

Secondly, I am concerned with the way all lands in a given area are being disposed of by filing. The filing method has been necessary to stimulate exploration in a very difficult region, but the government should retain representative blocks to be auctioned at appropriate times.

Thirdly, the stake of Canadians in their own natural resources is a legitimate area of concern, even if it is grossly over-stated and distorted in some quarters. The government's decision to maintain its position in Panarctic Petroleums Ltd. was welcomed by all Canadians, except perhaps by a few speculative bargain hunters. Consideration should be given to offering direct participation to more Canadians in this venture. Perhaps when present participants want to dispose of all or part of their interests, as has occurred in the past, allegedly with some resulting dilution in the ultimate Canadian participation, a secondary distribution to Canadians might be considered. Unlike the NDP I have never felt that Canadian participation in commercial undertakings could be entirely satisfactory when channelled through the government.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I reiterate that while this amendment is most desirable and should be adopted without undue delay, there seems no good reason why realization of the concept envisaged last session in the original bill should be delayed. Let us get on with rationalizing Canada's relationships with this vital resource industry.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to speak at a later stage on this bill, but in view of the fact that the issue which I want to raise has already been referred to in the discussion of the amendment, I would like to take my turn now. I wish to make a few comments about one aspect of the bill that very deeply concerns me.

I think there are two matters that have to be considered seriously, not as to the detail or content of the bill itself, but as to its general effect. The first is what I consider a derogation of the sovereignty of Canada in our northern waters by virtue of a definition in this bill. The second is the question of a Supreme Court decision relating to offshore rights, which concerned only the west coast of Canada, and following which it was intended that there be further consultations before the federal Parliament acted on the matter for the whole of Canada.

I think it is well known that there was a gentlemen's agreement, if one could describe it so, that after the Supreme Court decision ruling the offshore limits of the continental shelf off the west coast to be federal Canadian territory and not provincial, there would be a series of conferences between the federal and provincial governments to straighten out this problem in the rest of Canada. This morning questions were asked by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) about what replies the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had received from the provinces. He answered that some replies had been received, but he refused to indicate which way the provincial people went and whether or not there was any agreement at all on the question of offshore rights. These are two things that are affected by this bill.

As to the second question, I do not wish to expand on it at the moment except to say that as far as I can see the federal government is proceeding without consultation or provincial consent to define the limits of the federal interest in the continental shelf. This, I repeat, is being done without going through the formality of consulting the provinces to find out whether agreement can be reached. In that way, by bringing forth this bill at this time, the government is creating more difficulties than it is solving.

The first matter I raised, concerns our sovereignty. I want to put it this way. The original act, which this bill proposes to amend, applied to oil and gas in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. I think that was a pretty clear definition. I believe that at that time the Canadian people, the Canadian government, and people beyond our shores had no doubt whatever where our territories were. They comprised the whole areas contiguous to Canada, extending from our east and west coast north to the North Pole. As I say, I do not think anybody had any doubt about that. That is the way the act read.

Now clause 3 of this bill proposes to define a further area, and provides that the act will henceforth apply to:

> (a) the Yukon Territory or the Northwest Territories; (b) those submarine areas adjacent to the coast of Canada to a water depth of two hundred metres or beyond that limit to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil thereof;

My argument is just this: now that we have a definition of our territories, which includes the seabed to a depth of 200 metres at any point beyond our coast, this opens up the whole question of where our coast is. The question is raised whether this clause defines Canada's coast as the northern part of the mainland of Canada and not the islands. It leaves the question open as to where the territory will end as between the mainland and the islands, and just to make the whole matter worse there is this definition of a depth of 200 metres.

According to the way I figure it, 200 metres is 111.1 fathoms, which is the equivalent of about 666.6 feet. I have a map here, which is an official map of the northern part of Canada, on which all the depths of waters are given. It is a map of the Arctic Islands, Davis Strait and the Beaufort Sea, including connecting passages. I know the depths that are given on this map for many of the locations lying between the islands and between the mainland and the islands. Now, I remind you again, Mr. Speaker, that the depth set forth in this particular bill is 200 metres which is 111 fathoms, and there are many locations—

An hon. Member: Are you going to table it?

Mr. Aiken: There is an interjection from the hon. member. This happens to be a public document which the hon. member can get for himself if he can talk the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) into giving it to him. Not only that, but it is published by the Government of Canada.

Many of these depths run to 450 fathoms, which is four times the depth defined in the bill. What I am saying is that the definition giving Canada jurisdiction over its resources to a depth of 200 metres must leave in doubt those areas that are 450 metres in depth.

Mr. Orange: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Aiken: Is it a question of privilege?

Mr. Orange: No. I wish you would permit a question.

Mr. Aiken: Yes.

Mr. Orange: The hon. member read that portion of the section referring to the 200 metres, and I wonder if it would be useful to read the balance of it.

Mr. Aiken: I read the balance.

Mr. Orange: It reads:

> 200 metres or beyond that limit to where the depth of the superjacent water admits to the exploitation of the natural resources of the seabed and subsoil thereof

Are we not talking there about 200 metres or beyond?

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member generally asks intelligent questions but I do not understand that one. I read the whole section when I started. All right then, what does it mean? It reads: "200 metres or beyond to where the depths of the superjacent water admits of the exploration of the natural resources of the seabed". Is that what we have sovereignty over or is it not? If we have sovereignty over 200 metres or beyond 200 metres to some other undefined depth, what is the other undefined depth? Why are we admitting that there is any location in the Arctic waters over which we do not have sovereignty?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Aiken: This is what I want to know. What portions of these areas are not Canadian territory? I say it is all Canadian territory, regardless of the depth of the sea. Surely, that is not the point at all. Surely our 12-mile limit or 3-mile limit does not depend on how deep the water is. Surely, our sovereignty does not depend on how deep the water is.

I know this bill was drafted with oil and gas exploitation in mind. I say that with this in mind, there has been a complete oversight of the side effects that the bill would have, one of which would be an admission that there may be part of the Canadian Arctic waters over which we do not have sovereignty. Regardless of how you cut it, that is the way subclause (b) of this bill reads. That is what I am objecting to. We are cutting away at sovereignty. The government refuses to make the simple statement, "The Canadian Arctic is under Canadian sovereignty". If they will just make that statement, we will be all right but they will not do it. The Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development brought in a strong report. We only debated it one day because the government had no alternative, since they were ruled out of order when they tried to stop it. The motion for concurrence in the report has gone back on the Order Paper and we probably will not see it again.

The purpose of the amendment which Your Honour has ruled out of order—for which I am going to substitute another which will not be ruled out of order—is to delay the passage of this bill until the question of Arctic sovereignty is settled once and for all or the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development considered and settled. We must not leave this great gap, which leaves us wondering what this bill means. We must settle the main issue, where our sovereignty ends. I do not want to see this House pass a bill which limits our sovereignty, or appears to limit it, until after we have given this Parliament the opportunity of saying, "The Arctic is ours." We have not had that opportunity yet.

I have no criticism of the amendment being ruled out of order, but I am explaining why we would have liked to proceed in this way. We have preferred to follow the course suggested in the amendment but if we cannot, then we are prepared to use the direct method, the six months' hoist. We feel so strongly that we should not deal with this bill and the limitations and the derogations of our sovereignty contained in it until after the main issue is settled, that we are prepared to move the amendment. We think, Mr. Speaker, that logic must force any member in the House to support such an amendment. We are not only putting the cart before the horse, we are putting a very rickety cart before the horse and it may fall apart before we know where we are going.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) that the motion be amended as follows:

> That the word "now" be deleted and the words "this day six months hence" be added at the end of the question.

Oil and Gas Act

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have listened with a great deal of attention to the motion which has just been moved and to the debate which has taken place on this bill today. I have a few comments to make on the bill in general and then possibly I will come back to the amendment a little later on.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Bill S-5 is an act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act. I see it as a further amendment to Bill S-29 which was passed last year. In fact as I recall it, Bill S-29 received royal assent on June 27, 1969. While I am on the subject, Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment on the lack of government action on Bill S-29. Constantly, we hear from ministers across the way that the House is being exceptionally slow in pushing legislation through. Here we have a fine example of legislation passed over eight months ago not being implemented. The government pushed for passage of this legislation; it had to go through in a hurry. But what happened? Regulations covering the drilling of oil were to be set up. I ask the minister responsible, where are those regulations at this time, eight months after the bill was passed. I will tell you where they are, Mr. Speaker. They do not exist. At least, they are not published. They may exist on paper to the extent that people in the department are working on them. Those people know what legislation is to be introduced and that regulations must be drafted in connection with the legislation to be passed by Parliament. Why then do we have to wait months and months for those regulations which give effect to the legislation? I say this constitutes a disgraceful approach to the problems concerning oil and gas exploration in this country.

The bill which was passed provided for the establishment of a committee relating to oil and gas matters. I know that several government supporters are unhappy about this delay in setting up the committee. Where is the committee? It does not exist because this lackadaisical, do-nothing government just has not put into effect legislation the House of Commons passed months ago. I resent this delay and we need only look around us to see its result.

We have problems in the north and problems all over Canada because the government has failed in its job of regulating the exploration and development of our natural resources. This should be done in an orderly and sensible way. It amazes me to see any government in the world being stupid enough to give out permits covering tremendous areas for oil and gas exploration without having adequate safeguards that will regulate and protect those resources for the people of Canada. We see an example of this in the north. This is not a matter of trying to stop exploration; that is not my aim. We are trying to make the government realize that we must have an orderly and sensible approach to resource development. If we do not have that approach we will run into the same problems and troubles which have pestered the world for generations and will continue pestering it.

Let us take a look at what is happening in the north, for example. We have over 100 million acres of land in the Arctic islands under gas and oil leases; we have over 10 million acres of our Arctic waters under oil and gas leases. People want to go into the area and explore, and yet there is no proper set of regulations governing pollution in the Arctic. We are told by experts the world over as well as in our own departments that if there is a serious oil spill in the Arctic, tremendous damage will be done. Yet we have not even undertaken the necessary research in this area; we have not even undertaken research into the ecology that is absolutely necessary in order to be certain what measures ought to be taken in the event of an oil spill.

We must examine all possibilities. You cannot blame the companies for going into the area; they are looking for territory to explore. You cannot blame them if the regulations are not laid down and if they go ahead and search for oil and gas without them. After all, they are in that business. But, government departments concerned ought to know about the potential problems and what regulations will be necessary to meet those problems. It gripes me to think that we must wait for a dreadful disaster before we are prepared to move. That is why I think that, along with a bill of this sort, we ought to introduce regulations governing the companies undertaking this exploratory work in order to protect as widely and effectively as possible other resources which might be affected by oil pollution.

An excellent example of pollution from an oil spillage is to be seen on the east coast of Canada today, where the Liberian tanker Arrow went down. About one month ago, in an answer to a question I had placed on the Order Paper, I was told that the government had set up contingency regulations for dealing with emergencies such as this. However, I find that there is no such list of contingency measures in the department. Is it not amazing? A disaster takes place on the east coast of Nova Scotia and we stand around, wringing our hands, not knowing what to do while tremendous ecological damage is being done.

Last year when the amendment to the Canada Shipping Act was being considered we supported the concept of total liability for damages; that is, we wanted Canada to have the right to collect the full cost of any damage done to our environment as a result of an oil spill. That clause was deleted; apparently the government was awaiting the outcome of the Brussels conference. The consequence of that deletion is that today, following a major disaster on the east coast of Canada resulting from an oil spill, we have no remedy. We will not know for years how much ecological damage has been done and we have no legislation to cover the situation. I say this is wrong. I lay the blame at the door of these ministers and departments responsible for having the regulations and controls drafted and who have failed, particularly during the last year, to take the required steps.

I shall now talk about other sections of Bill S-5, Mr. Speaker. It extends the jurisdiction of the act previously passed to the oil and gas areas that do not lie within the geographical limits or under the administrative control of any of our Canadian provinces. I think this is good. The extension of jurisdiction will cover the continental shelf which lies off our east, west and northern coasts; it also covers the Arctic islands and the shelves surrounding them. At least, I presume this is what the bill covers.

We have been in desperate need of adequate guidelines and regulations to cover oil and gas exploration and development in all parts of our federal jurisdiction. I am certain that far too few protective measures are now incorporated in the regulations which govern the search for oil and gas. Our federal government should be the watchdog over our resources; it should guard them from ruthless exploiters whose only goal is to make a fast dollar and who often have no regard for the safeguarding of our other resources. In many areas, our own departments have done little or no research into the long term results from faulty or careless resource development. I touched on that a few moments ago.

I wish to take a few minutes to deal with one or two other problems in connection with oil exploration. In doing so I shall use some material from a brief prepared for the Canadian Wildlife Service by Dr. Warner in the fall of 1969. Dr. Warner received assistance from other individuals in preparing this brief. The result was a very comprehensive and thoughtful document which showed that Canada was not researching problems dealing with oil exploration along our continental shelf and in the Arctic.

I wish to refer to several sections of this brief in order to show members of the House how absolutely essential it is that we do not delay making regulations and safeguards which I believe are desperately needed. I shall quote a couple of paragraphs from this brief, because if oil leaks can occur in other countries where drilling is under way we can bet it will happen in the Arctic or the continental shelves on the east and west coasts of Canada. I quote from the bottom of page four of the brief as follows:

> —there are now over 9,000 oil wells pumping from submerged areas of the world's continental shelves.

This is on a worldwide basis. A little further on Dr. Warner gives some information which he has checked. He says:

> Reports now available indicate that in the Baltic and Caspian Seas oil leakage from drilling and pumping activities is resulting in grave losses to wildlife, principally the migratory waterfowl and seabirds, and to the commercial fisheries. The widely reported recent catastrophic blowout of an offshore oilwell on the Santa Barbara coast, where crude oil under pressure leaked through fissures in permeable sedimentary strata, has graphically illustrated what can happen during such underwater operations.

I shall not talk about the Santa Barbara oil spill. We all know the tremendous amount of ecological damage that has been done. We know there is an $800 million suit against the federal government by interested groups who feel they have a chance of forcing the United States government to pay. The next paragraph of the brief should cause us to think very deeply about what could happen off the shores of Canada or in the Arctic unless we have adequate safeguards. Dr. Warner states:

> While the industry claims such operations are quite "safe", an engineer presently employed by one of the companies heavily involved in offshore drilling stated privately that the life expectancy of such offshore platforms was less than ten years, owing principally to the damaging effects of storms, collisions from ships, and other environmental hazards. It has, for example, been reported that an entire drilling rig was carried away by ice in Cook Inlet, Alaska.

This does not mean pollution will take place, but if the drilling-rig involved had struck oil, the damage would have been immense.

If one adds to this the problem of breaks in the submerged pipelines serving these offshore units, the magnitude of the potential for environmental contamination becomes clear. Such underwater pipelines have been broken by ice action at a water depth of 250 feet.

These are interesting comments by someone who has checked into the possibilities that could occur from oil drilling in these areas. There is a host of other interesting material in this brief. I suggest that every member of this House read and study it. The problem is, what has the Canadian government done to ensure that the type of pollution which this researcher is talking about does not take place? What have we done to investigate and implement some safeguards?

The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development recently checked into the sinking of a supply barge in the Arctic. In fact, a couple of supply barges were sunk. We do not know fully what they contained. I understand one contained oil and the other contained some type of supplies. I have a question on the Order Paper at the present time requesting information on the supplies which were lost. This is another matter which should be considered by the department concerned. Perhaps the means of transportation is not adequate. Are proper safeguards being taken by the companies transporting supplies and goods from the mainland to the Arctic islands? Many of these supplies are flown in, but some are brought in by barge. Research programs should investigate designs, etc., of Arctic transportation. This matter should be very carefully checked. There should be regulations to ensure that Arctic waters are not polluted because a company does not have adequate knowledge of the type of transportation it should use in these areas.

There are many other problems in connection with oil. I have examined a few of them. Contingency plans are supposed to be available in the event of oil contamination anywhere off the east, west or north coast of Canada. Adequate contingency plans should be available. Unless such plans are available, and we have equipment that can be used to nullify the effects of these spills, we should be very careful how we go about laying out huge areas for oil and gas exploration. It would be very simple to cause irreparable damage to the ecology of our country when looking for gas and oil.

[Mr. Harding.]

I have just one or two more points to make Mr. Speaker. Other members in our group will deal with other aspects of the bill. I want to mention one point in passing. It seems there has been mixed jurisdiction as far as the continental shelf is concerned. A Supreme Court decision indicated that the continental shelf off the west coast of Canada came under federal jurisdiction.

• (3:10 p.m.)

I presume there will be a similar test as far as the continental shelf off the east coast of Canada is concerned. Provinces do not easily give up the hope of their right to exploit what is potentially a source of great mineral wealth. In a sense one cannot blame them. But it is important that the necessary regulations be laid down. As has been pointed out today, a situation has developed in which both federal and provincial governments are receiving payment from oil companies in respect of leases. This is nonsense. Jurisdiction must be either federal or provincial.

The regulations laid down to protect the natural evironment must be strict, and they must be uniform throughout Canada. I suggest to hon. members and to those piloting this measure through the House that there must be no delay in establishing the necessary regulations so that this bill and companion measures shall, indeed, protect every section of our continental shelf as well as the shores which would suffer the full consequences of any oil spill.

Blame for delay in establishing these regulations must rest with the department responsible. Good and effective regulations must be drafted. Along with this work must go sound research to ensure that the companies concerned are using the right kind of drilling equipment, not material which over a period of time will rust and allow pollution to occur. There are many vital interests to protect. The fishery is one. Tremendous damage could be done to water fowl which nest in the north. These are things too precious to be lost, yet there is a risk of losing them if we are not vigilant, if we fail to take the measures which need to be taken.

In closing, may I say I am pleased that the bill will go to the committee on national resources for study and comment. I do not say this because I happen to be a member of that committee but because I believe this is the committee which should deal with the subject. It has already been considering the question of pollution on a wider basis, and I believe this experience will serve as a good foundation upon which to suggest regulations which might be attached to legislation of the type we are considering. I endorse this legislation. It is a step in the right direction. I hope we can tighten it up with a good set of sound anti-pollution regulations.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we compliment the Parliamentary Secretary on his courage and high measure of statesmanship in piloting this measure through the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: In my opinion it could have a serious affect on the Northwest Territories. Both by expression and implication it amounts to a serious diminution of Canadian sovereignty over the waters of the Arctic. This is an issue in respect of which the Territorial Council has shown far greater courage than this lily-livered government in stating an honest position with regard to sovereignty.

There are one or two considerations which persuade me to support the motion of my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken), but before doing so I wish to enlarge on a point mentioned earlier by some hon. members. We are dealing with an amendment to Bill C-48 which was enacted in June of last year, shortly before the infamous attempt by the government to force down the throat of this House certain rule changes on the ground that the government needed the powers contained in Standing Orders 75B and 75C in order to assure the early passage of legislation which it considered urgent.

We find that this important Bill C-48, enacted last year, has never been operated. Today we are being asked to effect its amendment. How much credibility can one attach to hon. members opposite, when they follow a course of conduct of this kind? This is the sort of treatment to which we are subject in the House by a government which really does not know whether it is coming or going most of the time. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) talked about 74 measures which the government needed passed in 74 days. I hope hon. members will bear this in mind when spokesmen for the government come to us and ask: Why did you not pass this legislation? Let them remember that we enacted Bill C-48 last year, an important bill, and that it was not even acted upon.

I wish to make two points concerning the merits of the amendment. I believe it is completely wrong to bring forward such an amendment at this time. I am amazed that the government has done so. I think of the phrase "Whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad." We know the government proposes later to introduce legislation dealing with pollution in Arctic waters and the inland waters of the north. Why, in the name of heaven, was the amendment not kept until that time in order that we might engage in a proper debate on all the important issues involved? These are important issues which we in the opposition have attempted, with the limited weapons at our disposal, to bring before the people of Canada in an effort to get this government to reassert the unequivocal declaration which previous prime ministers and administrators have made.

• (3:20 p.m.)

In view of these facts, for the government to take this provocative action now and to include within its proposals amendments that challenge the entire question of Canadian sovereignty, because this is what they have done; let there be no mistake about it—

Mr. Olson: No.

Mr. Baldwin: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) can say what he likes, but he knows little about wheat and even less about Arctic sovereignty. On reading this bill there is no doubt that a further challenge is brought forward by the government to the cardinal principle of sovereignty over the waters of the Arctic which by tradition, declaration, assertion, geography and occupation have been, and even without this government's help will continue to be, Canadian waters.

As the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka has said, the original bill introduced last year, Bill V-48, provided in clause 3 that the act was to apply to oil and gas in the Yukon territory and Northwest Territories. That did beg the question; but at that time the government had not stooped, as it has since, to taking this weak-kneed and vacillating position on Arctic sovereignty.

Those of us who were interested in this bill assumed that the words "the Yukon territory and Northwest Territories" meant an area not only of land but of waters which for at least 100 years had been accepted as being within the sovereignty of the Canadian people. We now find that by amendment to the interpretation section, section 2, the definition of the word "pipeline", for example, has been extended to cover offshore installations or vessels. I suggest this is an obvious acceptance on the part of the government of the fact that the exploration, development, production and transportation of oil is going to involve to a considerable extent the use of waters in the Arctic.

Now is the time, if there ever was a time, for the government to say that by "waters" it means those waters which are Canadian waters; that this is an expression which, according to the interpretation of "sovereignty" and past assertions, has been given a meaning that is unchallengeable and is undenied. But the government has left the position completely open. What does the government mean by "offshore installations or vessels", a phrase now to be found in the interpretation of the word "pipeline"? It leaves the impression that there must be very grave limitations upon Canadian sovereignty over the waters of the Arctic; certainly that view is consistent with such a change.

In addition to that, as my hon. friend from Parry Sound-Muskoka said, clause 3, which provides that the act applies in respect of oil and gas in the Yukon territory and Northwest Territories, now begs the question even more. The people of Canada have believed that the Yukon territory and Northwest Territories have traditionally in the past extended, and still extend, to the waters of the Arctic archipelago, the waters between the Arctic islands and the mainland.

Clause 3 now proposes a positive weakening of that assumption in the introduction of certain finite conclusions. For example, there is reference to submarine areas, to lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada. I suggest this is an obvious admission that part of what we have always in the past regarded as waters of the Canadian Arctic may not necessarily be the case, since the government is placing a limitation on what in the past has been a wide and unrestricted interpretation of what is the Canadian Arctic.

If the government had any doubt in its mind, this was the time to express it. We are now faced with the situation that not long ago members of the United States Congress referred to the possibility of the government of that country placing in service a fleet of icebreakers to push through the Arctic commercial vessels of U.S. companies such as the Humble Oil Company. Fortunately, a serving naval officer who was giving testimony at the time qualified the effect of this by saying that the waters in question were Canadian Arctic waters. He subsequently amended that statement by saying they were waters which were close to and related to the Canadian Arctic.

There is, nevertheless, an obvious and determined effort being made by commercial interests in the United States to seek and obtain what they suggest is the right to unimpeded passage through the waters of the Canadian Arctic. Those were the exact words used at a hearing in Washington some time ago. Those words, or words to that effect were also used, I understand, by Mr. George Ball when giving evidence before a committee of this House.

At a time when the government should be asserting in the strongest possible way the right of the Canadian people to sovereignty over these waters, we find the government bringing in an amendment which, in effect, challenges even the interpretation that had been placed on these waters by the previous act. I simply do not understand it, Mr. Speaker. Our party is not approaching this question in any narrow, chauvinistic way. We seek this right solely for the purpose of being able to establish control and the right to regulate the passage through these waters of vessels of any nation. This right has been asserted in the past.

In 1925 the then minister of the interior and the Parliament of that day passed regulations which provides that any vessel, scientist or explorer passing through the Arctic had to apply for and obtain a licence to do so. That right, I understand, was not denied but was in fact accepted by the U.S. government. Later, during the course of the DEW line operations, Canada laid down a regulation which provided that vessels passing through this area from the United States were compelled to obtain a waiver under the Canada Shipping Act. This was questioned to some extent, but was accepted in due course.

Then we have the statement of a former Prime Minister when he was Canada's ambassador to the United States in, I believe, 1946 or 1947. A number of declarations have made abundantly clear what our rights are. As I say, we are not asserting these rights simply because we want to colour the map red or blue for Canada; we are asserting them as a matter of national safety and security. These rights are assured any nation under the 1958 and 1959 conventions. Even if it were held that the waters in question were territorial, we have the unchallengeable right to pass regulations that are in the interests of our national safety and security.

In view of the situation caused last week by the oil tanker which grounded off the west coast of Nova Scotia, surely no one in this chamber would dare challenge the right of the Canadian government, acting for the people, to reassert our rights and say: Passage you may have, but passage on conditions which we, in our right as trustees for the Canadian people, must lay down.

We hear talk about tankers of 300,000 tons. In the name of heaven, what complete destruction, in an ecological and environmental way, would be caused by a tanker of this size being wrecked while attempting a so-called unimpeded voyage through the Arctic waters! We do not ask this government to break new ground. We simply ask it to stand up for the rights of the people of Canada and reassert what has always been accepted in the past. I refer to the sovereignty, even in a limited way, of Canada and over these waters, not for narrow nationalism but to protect the rights of our people and the hope that in the future the north will develop as it should, uncontaminated by the dreadful results of the type of disasters which could take place.

We heard that when the Manhattan reached home she had two or three large holes, one large enough to drive a truck through. I am instructed that the holes were in places where oil tanks would normally be. This ship was only able to complete her voyage with the aid of the Canadian ice-breaker. These are the facts we are placing before the House. Surely the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) would admit that they made a mistake by refusing to take this position earlier. Surely they can accept the recommendation of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the members of which were there, saw the situation, heard evidence and looked into the legal situation. The committee, in a reasoned, objective and non-partisan way made a recommendation which must be accepted. I believe if the question were put to a vote in the House, it would pass with a very substantial majority.

We are asking that the amendments which are included within the four corners of Bill S-5 be not proceeded with at this time. We are not denying that in a technical way and for certain technical reasons there are advantages to these amendments. We say, however, they should not be proceeded with and that the House should use this occasion to demonstrate to the government that the people of Canada object very strongly to the attitude of the government in failing to make the declaration which it should make in order to justify our claim to sovereignty over these waters.

At one time I dismissed hon. members opposite as coming within the interpretation of the Vice-President of the United States when he referred to the silent majority. They are now speaking up. Hopefully, this is a good sign for the House. I urge hon. members opposite to support the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and say to the government that it should not proceed with this bill. The government should first accept what the committee has recommended and, second, it should bring before this House for debate the legislation which the Prime Minister indicated will be introduced in respect of the pollution of our northern waters.

That legislation should be brought down and we should debate it. Let us first accept the recommendations of the committee and then, Mr. Speaker, we can deal with this matter. In that sense I plead with hon. members of this House to accept this amendment.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development which drafted and presented to the House a report on Arctic sovereignty which, as has been mentioned several times, had the unanimous endorsation of all the members of that committee. Therefore, I believe it should be apparent that I am as concerned as any member of the House that we should make a clear declaration of Canadian sovereignty over the waters which lie between the islands of the Arctic archipelago.

I took an active part in the debate on the amendments to the Canada Shipping Act. Had those amendments passed, they would have placed the liability for the cost of incidents such as occurred off the coast of Nova Scotia—I refer to the break-up of the Arrow oil tanker —on the owners of the vessel or cargo. Therefore, I do not quarrel at all with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) with regard to the need for exercising complete Canadian control over the passage of oil tankers through Arctic waters.

I have often enjoyed the reasoned and cogent arguments presented in this House by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) and the hon. member for Peace River, but their arguments today in support of the amendment which they placed before the House are a little beyond my comprehension. I am not too good at some of the long words, but I think the proper word to use in respect of the amendment is that they have completely obfuscated the matter of Arctic sovereignty. Therefore, at the outset I should like to make clear that I have no intention of supporting the motion for a six months' hoist, which we ordinarily understand to be one to kill a proposal. I believe my view is shared by my colleagues in the New Democratic Party.

The hon. member for Peace River referred to clause 3 of the bill and pointed out that it contains what was in the act passed last year, which is now chapter 48 of the statutes. Clause 3 refers to the Yukon territory and Northwest Territories. That part of the bill was passed, and I submit with deference to the learned gentleman from Peace River that what was the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories last year is still the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories. Therefore, nothing in this bill in any way detracts from the area of Canada encompassed by the Yukon territory and the Northwest Territories.

If I understand this proposal correctly, we are talking about the sea bed; we are not talking about the geographical boundaries of Canada. If the waters within the Arctic archipelago rightfully are internal waters of Canada, and therefore part of the Northwest Territories, this fact is not in any way lessened or detracted from by the proposals in this bill.

What is important is that we are saying we intend to exercise sovereignty over the continental shelf which is rightly ours as a result of the Geneva convention which gave the sea bed to the adjacent coastal states. Therefore, we must consider this whole proposition, realizing that we are talking, not only about the Arctic Ocean and the sea bed under it but about the Pacific Ocean and the Atlantic Ocean.

Far from weakening the position with regard to our sovereignty in the Arctic, I suggest this bill may strengthen it. I do not have the chart to which the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken) referred. However, I suggest that an examination of that chart may very well show that certain areas north of the Canadian mainland which this bill will cover in so far as the exploitation of oil, gas and other resources of the sea bed are concerned, would not be included in an exercise of sovereignty which would include as internal waters those lying between the islands of the Arctic archipelago and the mainland.

I will not go into the question of the sector theory, but I just throw the suggestion that at least so far as the argument about jurisdiction over territorial sea or inland waters is concerned, this bill does not weaken our position. Therefore, I think the argument for its delay on the grounds advanced by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and the hon. member for Peace River falls to the ground. I hope they appreciate that I am not in any way discounting their concern that our government take a firm position on the question of our exercise of sovereignty. We in this party are with them on that point.

If one were to consider the question of whether we should go slow on the provisions of this bill, one might come to the conclusion that perhaps of greater concern is the question raised by my colleagues, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) and the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), namely, the question of the potential danger to Canada and to future generations of Canadians of any sort of oil exploitation in underwater areas.

The examples they mentioned of the California coast and the incident which is fresh in our minds—which is not directly related to the bill—of the destruction of the oil tanker and the resulting serious harm to the ecology of the east coast, should put this matter very much to the fore when we consider a proposal for the exploration of oil and gas in underwater areas within the boundaries of the continental shelf.

With this point in mind I have examined the act that was passed last session, with particular reference to the authority which, as has already been pointed out by my colleagues and others taking part in the debate, has not been exercised—in this case the authority of the Governor in Council to make regulations. The act as it now stands does give some authority in section 12 (m), (p) and (q). I think it is important before this bill passes through the committee stage, at least for the government to make clear the substance of the regulation which it intends to enforce in respect of these paragraphs of the section. In order to underline the point I am trying to make, I should like to read them. The paragraphs read as follows:

(m) prescribing the conditions under which drilling operations may be carried out in water-covered areas and any special measures to be taken for such operations; . . .

(p) prescribing minimum acceptable standards for the construction, alteration or use of any works, fittings, machinery, plant and appliances used for the development, production, transmission, distribution, measurement, storage or handling of any oil or gas;

(q) prescribing the measures necessary to prevent pollution of air, land or water as a result of the exploration and drilling for or the production, storage, transportation, distribution, measurement, processing or handling of any oil, or gas or any substance obtained from or associated with oil or gas;

We are considering an amending bill which in effect says that we will take steps to control the exploration, development and utilization of oil, gas and other resources which may exist under the sea bed adjacent to our coast on any of the three oceans. Therefore, members of the House, members of the committee and the Canadian people should know in detail how the government intends to exercise the authority conferred upon it under those paragraphs of section 12 of the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act which was passed by the House last year.

It seems to me logical that if there is to be a pause at any point in our proceedings on this bill, it should be at the committee stage until the committee is thoroughly satisfied that the steps the government is taking under the authority granted it in those paragraphs will be exercised in a manner consistent with the preservation of other aspects of our environment. The committee should also ensure that the exploitation of oil and gas reserves is carried out in a way that will not cause damage which outweighs its economic advantage.

In this connection I should like to quote briefly from a statement made recently by a person who some would say is quite knowledgeable in this area:

Protection, however, is a difficult subject. In recent years we have been mesmerised by technology. We have been mesmerised by advances on the scientific front—advances which have been concerned mainly with physics and inorganic chemistry, with electronics and nuclear power.

But the unique thing about our planet, about our earth, about our water, is that it harbours living things. Ours is a living planet in a lifeless universe. And yet our modern technology has been concerned, much more, with lifeless things. It has been concerned about lifeless space, about instant communications and about the generation of power.

Our study of life itself, by comparison, is in its infancy. Biology has been, to some extent, neglected. Ecology, even though it deals with the inter-relationship of living things, is a new word. Perhaps these inter-relationships are too complex for us to understand. But we must know more about these life-giving processes, these living cycles, these vital inter-relationships. We must know about them for our own good and for the good of life itself.

What worries people most are the immense powers which inanimate science—lifeless science—

I suppose one could say the immense powers proposed for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene).

—has given us to destroy life on this planet. If these new powers are used thoughtlessly our biological balance will be upset.

I would like to have heard that statement made in this House by its author, because it is a statement made by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis). I have hardly ever quoted in this House a statement made by a member of the government with more approbation than I do those remarks of the Minister of Fisheries. The sad thing is that it was not a statement of government policy, because it was prefaced with the words:

I would like to make one thing quite clear at the outset. I am speaking as a Member of Parliament.

In other words, he emphasized that he was not expressing government policy. I suggest it is a rather sad thing when the Minister of Fisheries has to go off into a corner to some little Liberal workshop in Capilano to make a statement of that kind, rather than getting up in this House, in a debate such as this, and making it as a statement of policy of the government concerning the exploitation of the inanimate resources of our country.

The considerations expressed by the hon. member for Capilano are the important things which should be in the minds of members of the committee when this bill is being discussed in detail. In committee we should have answers to the kind of questions which he raised in that statement, before the committee reports the bill back to the House. As we are all becoming increasingly aware, these are not matters to be dealt with lightly.

My colleague from Kootenay West made brief reference to a statement about the delicate balance of the ecology of the Arctic. The northern affairs committee has had quite a number of representations made to it on this subject and has discussed the matter. Some of its concern is indicated in its report to this House. That report has been only partially debated, and we have no indication that the House will ever be allowed to come to a decision on it.

The contents of this bill are of immediate concern to a member who comes from the province of British Columbia, because of the oil exploration that was carried out on the sea bed of the coast of B.C. a year or so ago. This exploration was in the outer waters lying offshore from the west coast of my constituency, and more recently in the inside waters of Georgia Strait. This bill, if passed, will become operative in respect of all or part of those areas. I say all or part, Mr. Speaker, because the question of the jurisdiction over certain areas is still up in the air. According to statements made in this House on earlier occasions, the Strait of Georgia is one of those areas. Whether it will come within the ambit of this bill is open to question. Of course if the proposal contained in the remarks of the Minister of Fisheries about an underwater park is implemented, we may not have to worry about whether a federal or provincial minister is involved in the granting of oil permits for drilling in the Strait of Georgia. The suggestion made to the Minister of Northern Affairs (Mr. Chrétien) by the Minister of Fisheries, if it has not already been well noted should be well noted by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

There is another point I would like to make on this issue. It has been touched upon during question periods, when we sought to obtain clarification of the status of waters such as the Strait of Georgia so far as oil exploration and the issuing of oil leases are concerned. Unless the situation has changed quite recently, the minister told us that an offer was made to British Columbia to put Georgia Strait under provincial jurisdiction, but that there had been no indication from the government of that province as to whether it was prepared to take action on the offer. I suggest that, whether or not we are to have an underwater park in Georgia Strait, enough time has elapsed since that offer was made to the government of British Columbia that the federal government should now announce that the offer is withdrawn.

I say that, Mr. Speaker, at least in part because it is obvious that the Premier of British Columbia, who sometimes seems to imagine he is a sort of tin-pot emperor, is not prepared to sit down and discuss any question intelligently with the government of Canada. At least, if he does it is a very exceptional situation. I want to make it clear in this House—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

[Mr. Barnett.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-20, an act respecting the labelling, sale, importation and advertising of consumer textile articles to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

It being four o'clock p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions, private bills.

OIL AND GAS PRODUCTION AND CONSERVATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, APPLICATION, OIL AND GAS COMMITTEE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill S-5, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Inasmuch as you saw the clock so quickly and did not let me finish calling the Premier of British Columbia a tin-pot emperor, I hope you will allow me to adjourn the debate.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT

PROVISION THAT RAILWAY COMPANIES RECEIVING GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY SHALL NOT ACQUIRE INTEREST IN MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT UNDERTAKINGS

Mr. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Laurier) moved that Bill C-25, to amend the National Transportation Act (fair competition of railway companies), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-25 which I had the privilege to introduce in the House this afternoon is entitled: "An act to amend the National Transportation Act". It could have also been called: Unfair competition of railway companies. This bill was read for the first time on October 30, 1969. I hope that today we shall be able to pass the motion for second reading and reference of the said bill to the Transport and Communications Committee which would make it possible for the parties involved to appear before the committee and to state their views with regard to this measure. The explanatory note of the bill reads as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide that no railway company receiving money from the government of Canada or from any agency thereof may acquire interest or control in motor vehicle transport undertakings; receiving no subvention or subsidies from the State and being free enterprises, it is only fair that the said railway companies be not subsidized in part for acquiring such free enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the National Transportation Act, which I introduced today, provides that no railway company receiving public funds can acquire any interest in or control of a highway transport undertaking.

This bill has two main purposes: first, to prevent the two largest means of transportation on land, railways and trucking firms, to fall under the control of the same interests; second, to abolish discrimination by prohibiting railway companies greatly favoured by the federal government to compete directly on the highways with private trucking enterprises which must depend on their own financial means.

I think that competition should be based on efficiency and economy. Public grants should not make it possible for a mode of transport to take over another one.

To ensure a sound economy, the intrusion of railroad companies in a competing field is forbidden in most countries, including the United States, because it leads to unemployment, monopolies, and allows a transportation firm to compete with itself. This runs counter to the spirit of the Sherman act on coalitions and monopolies in the United States also probably counter to the combines legislation in Canada.

Mr. Camille Archambault, executive manager of the Association du Camionnage du Québec Inc., who appeared recently before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, submitted a brief proving not only that railways compete dishonestly with trucking firms by reducing their rates beyond reason to stifle competition, but also that through their illimited financial means and subsidies from Ottawa they move industries about and can, to a great extent, determine where and how Canadian cities should develop.

In the public interest, I feel that shippers must have the choice of two distinct modes of transport truly in competition with each other. I agree entirely with the American legislation that stipulates that one mode of transport cannot take over another one. In case of a strike, for instance, one can imagine the disaster that would ensue if all means of transport were controlled and administered by the same company.

The present federal legislation concerning the jurisdiction as regards transportation enabled the CNR and the CPR to get into the trucking business. The Quebec Truckers Association had to institute proceedings against the CNR that provided services without a licence from the Quebec Transport Board. That company was found guilty by the court. Later on, they were prosecuted by the Quebec government. Besides, there is another case pending in the Superior Court, in order to have the purchase, by the CNR, of road transport undertakings parallel to their railway lines declared illegal.

As regards the CPR, some proceedings were instituted against them so as to determine the jurisdiction of that company and others are still pending.

Those various facts convinced me of the need for Parliament to pass legislation similar to the American legislation so as to present a mode of transport from buying up another one. Moreover, I believe the legislation should clearly determine the jurisdiction of the federal labour code and of the National Transportation Act, as concerns Part III.

Proceedings are pending as far as the federal labour code in concerned. A Montreal judge said that under the present act, based upon the British North America Act, a trucker providing a city service from one area to another in the metropolis does it in the interest of Canada as a whole, because some of his trucks are used occasionally for interprovincial transport. As far back as 1867 the Fathers of Confederation had already ruled that interprovincial transport by railway, by water or by any other means which were found to help the country's development should come under the jurisdiction of the central governent. Considering the time when they made it, I do not think anybody can question this decision but we are no longer in 1867, we are in 1970, in the space age. Obviously, road transportation, whether interprovincial or transcontinental, has contributed and is still contributing to the development of the country. However, it is also an assential factor in the growth of the provinces and they were the first to encourage trucking. We should therefore confine ourselves to the economic realities entrenched in facts and be relevant, in spite of the 1867 Constitution and notwithstanding the decisions of the courts. It does not make sense to me when some argue that when the operations of trucking businesses are partially carried outside the limits of a province, the whole of the business, including the strictly provincial or urban transport, should automatically fall under the National Transportation Act and the federal Labour Code.

The Americans, whose economy in the field of transport is, in my opinion, one of the most progressive and developed in the world, agree that it is the actual motion of the vehicle which determines whether the business falls under the federal legislation and the Inter-State Commerce Commission.

In Canada, we are facing two realities: the legal or constitutional reality and the economic reality supported by facts.

In order to clear up the uncertainty that exists nowadays about the jurisdiction over road transportation, it would be well, I think, to state that the railway companies must keep to their own field, that is the railroads. However, trucking companies, whether provincial or urban, are under provincial jurisdiction, and only interprovincial vehicles, and those which link Canada to foreign countries, as well as their drivers will be ruled by Part III of the National Transportation Act or will fall under the federal labour code.

I hope that hon. members will allow this bill to be referred to the Committee on Transport and Communications which will examine it more closely.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on the bill introduced by the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) and in so doing to state my general support for what it is broadly intended to cover. However, I must make two reservations that apply to the bill. In the final analysis, I think it should go to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, there to be more closely scrutinized with the help of expert witnesses who might be called.

My first qualification is this: In these days transportation is not a single factor but a total mix. Transportation involves all forms of transport which are important to our economy. More important, not only must transportation efficiently move objects being transported, but we must ask ourselves whether any particular mode of transport gives to the user the best possible service. We all know that in Canada today our national railways are deeply involved in road transportation and no one really suggests, nor does this bill suggest, that this is improper. Quite the contrary is true. There are many indications that where rail service has been cut back or abandoned in recent years in certain parts of the country, the people living in the areas affected have suffered very serious privation.

My other qualification relates to the widespread use of varying modes of transportation by railway companies, and in particular I refer to air transport. The explanatory note to the bill is as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide that no railway company receiving moneys from the government of Canada or from any agency thereof may acquire interest or control in motor vehicle transport undertaking; the said undertakings receiving no subvention or subsidies from the state and being free enterprises, it is only fair that the said railway companies be not subsidized in part for acquiring such free enterprises.

My qualifications relate in part to the utilization of other forms of transport in connection with air freight. What do these words mean, "The purpose of this bill is to provide that no railway company receiving moneys from the Government of Canada"? There are many ways in which companies owning a broad range of transportation facilities can receive money directly or indirectly from the government. As part of my qualified support of the bill I ask that it be sent to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications for further study in connection with this question.

My next comment relates to a fear which exists in many parts of Atlantic Canada. Under our present law there is nothing to prevent the government of Canada pouring a tremendous amount of money into Sept Iles and developing a modern container port there. Indeed, this House has before it recommendations that a container-port ought to be developed. As a member of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, I hope the government will move swiftly on that recommendation.

If the bill is intended to provide protection against railway companies moving into the Sept Iles area and operating trucks to the west of the Saguenay River system, I am against it. On the other hand, if it is trying to create a monopoly or near-monopoly in the area, my support for the bill becomes virtually unqualified. As I have said, it is the total transportation package that hon. members must be concerned about. We must make sure that all Canadians obtain the most efficient transportation service available.

Further, I should not like to see Canadian National Railways or, for that matter, any railway company tie up all modes of transport to Sept Iles—which as hon. members may know is not served by rail along the shore of the river—to the extent that a monopoly might be created which could disrupt efforts being made in the port of Halifax to develop an efficient container service. We cannot support too many container ports. This aspect of the matter worries me in view of our National Transportation Act. There is nothing in the act to prevent that happening. I am not saying that a single agency could do it, but that situation might develop.

On the other hand, I should hate to see this virtual monopoly being given to any railway company without there being recourse for redress by this House. The absence of such recourse would have a disastrous effect on the work being done at public expense in Halifax. It seems to me there is not room for two or three container ports. Speaking for myself, if the bill we are considering provides some protection against a so-called monopoly, that could be detrimental. I urge hon. members to consider having these and related questions referred to the committee, which should also look at the wide powers the National Transportation Act has with relation to modes of transport serving areas which constitute a captive market.

On these two grounds, and with these two minor qualifications, I support the bill. The first qualification is that we must accept transportation as a total package and not as something that can be separated into different modes. The other one is the detrimental effect it could have on other areas of Canada and the absence of control of the National Transportation Act if a single agency determined to move in this way. I congratulate the mover of the bill and urge that it be referred to the standing committee for further consideration.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part briefly in the debate on Bill C-25. I was particularly pleased to hear the hon. member who preceded me speak about the monopolistic attitude of the railway companies and other companies in Canada. As a member of the transport committee, I believe that our main purpose is to ensure that all Canadians are provided with the most effective and efficient transportation system. I am sure this is exactly what the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) meant. He is concerned about a monopoly being instituted in this country which will take over all forms of transportation.

I express some doubt about this bill. We must all realize it is too late and too little, in a general context, to be an effective measure at this time. All of us in the standing committee who visited the maritimes not long ago realized that truck transportation is included under the Maritime Freight Rates Act. I believe if we were to propose a bill at this time dealing with railways only, we would soon have to propose an amendment to the National Transportation Act to deal with trucking systems.

I am sure all those who feel we should keep this country united from east to west realize we must have an efficient trucking system. We are not really looking at the over-all monopoly end of it when we talk about allowing the railways into the trucking industry. The main concern of this House should be that we provide an efficient transportation system.

If the transportation users of this country are to receive the type of consideration they should, naturally we have to look at the entire transportation system. I am not sure of the words of the member who introduced Bill C-25 when he stated that the United States prohibited any form of competition in this field. In the explanatory note it is said that the purpose of the bill is to provide that no railways company receiving moneys from the government of Canada or any agency thereof may acquire interest or control in motor vehicles. I have not gone into the general field to the same extent as the hon. member, but I wonder whether some of the railway companies in the United States also have an interest in trucking concerns. I am not prepared to express an opinion on that matter.

If we are really concerned about railway companies receiving moneys from the federal government and entering into competition with trucking companies, we must say the same about trucking companies competing in any other field. If we are worried about a monopoly in one field, we must be worried about a monopoly in all fields. It should be very clear that if this bill is referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, these questions should be dealt with. More explanation must be given to the House before I will support the bill.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in participating in this debate on Bill C-25. As indicated in the explanatory note, the purpose of this bill is to provide that railway companies which receive subventions or subsidies from the government do not purchase or control trucking concerns. I wish to state at the outset that I do not think taxpayers' money should be used to compete with free enterprise. In other words, I do not agree with subsidies being given under the National Transportation Act or the Maritime Freight Rates Act to help railway companies compete with the trucking industry.

The purpose of this bill is not only to ensure that the railway companies do not purchase trucking companies; it is specified that the railway companies which receive subventions or subsidies should not acquire control of trucking companies. It should be pointed out that there is a slight difference here. These subsidies should not give to the railway companies an unfavourable advantage in competing with independent truckers.

I was a member of the committee which visited the Atlantic provinces and the north shore of Quebec last year. I was present at the transport committee meeting at Lévis when the president of the Canadian Association of Truckers presented his case. My impression of Mr. Charbonneau's testimony was not that he was so much concerned about any particular subsidy being given to the railway companies, but that this indirectly gave the railway companies an advantage over the independent truckers. I do not agree with him. The record must clearly indicate that even though the CNR receives subventions or subsidies from the government of Canada, this does not mean that in the operation of truck freight or express delivery it is competing with the trucking industry.

We must bear in mind that the railway companies maintain their own track systems. In addition to operating expenses they have large capital expenses which independent companies do not have. The Canadian trucking industry does not have to pay for the roads it uses. It does not have to maintain the roads. I appreciate that they pay sales tax and fuel tax, but they do not have the responsibilities that the railways have.

I was amused when the president of the Association of Truckers said that the trucking industry was at a disadvantage because the railway companies were operating trucking companies. His testimony differed from that of Mr. Palmer, the president of the Atlantic Association of Truckers who appeared before the committee in Fredericton last year. Mr. Palmer said the trucking industry in the Atlantic provinces was not concerned that the CNR or CPR may purchase trucking companies in the Atlantic provinces. He clearly stated that the trucking industry in the maritimes could meet that competition so long as the railways did not manipulate their invoices and waybills in a way that would take advantage of the Maritime Freight Rates Act when they were making deliveries by truck.

Mr. Palmer made the allegation that the CNR was receiving a subsidy from the government of Canada under the Maritime Freight Rates Act to transport goods, say from Montreal to Moncton. Then supposing material was to be shipped to Sussex, 40 miles from Moncton, and could not be transported by rail for one reason or another, the CNR would collect a subsidy on the part of the route from Moncton to Sussex. That part of the route would still be covered by the MFRA.

When Mr. McDougall, the vice-president of the CN Atlantic area, was before the committee, he said this only happened when the railway company had operated a station at the point earlier and had then closed it down. I am repeating what Mr. McDougall said: He told the committee that in no instance did the CN use the subsidy to compete directly with the trucking industry.

I am drawing attention to the conflict between the view of the president of the Canadian association and that of the president of the Atlantic association. The president of the Atlantic association said clearly that he was not concerned about the CNR and CPR buying trucking concerns in the Atlantic provinces, because he felt his people could compete with them.

I return to the principle of whether the railway companies should or should not enter the trucking business. I should like to see this issue discussed and decided by Parliament. In other words, Parliament should decide whether the railway companies should be permitted to buy-out trucking operators. I am not sure whether it would be advantageous to prevent their doing so. It seems to me that the trucking industry is trying to preserve its interests. If it could get rid of its biggest competitors, CN and CPR, it would be better off. I do not see anything wrong with Canadian Pacific and Canadian National going into the trucking business so long as they do not use the subsidies they receive from the government to this end. It leads to better competition; it leads to more efficient service; it keeps the trucking industry on the ball.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) that the trucking industry has made a significant contribution to the economic expansion of our country.

During the hearings held in Lévis by the Transport and Communications Committee, it was pointed out that Northern Quebec, for example, had been developed exclusively through the trucking industry, and the same is true of the paper industry in the Chibougamau area.

There is no question of belittling the part played by the trucking industry, but it is unfair to say merely that the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific or some other railway company are using government subsidies to purchase trucks or trucking companies.

In my opinion, we should make sure that the grants will not directly be used in an unfair competition with the trucking industry.

Before concluding my comments, I would like to say a few words about the M.F.R.A. grants, a question which was raised by Mr. Palmer before the members of the committee in Fredericton. Indeed, I would have liked the Canadian Transport Commission to decide whether really the C.N.R. or the C.P.R. in the Atlantic provinces were entitled, thanks to the M.F.R.A. grants, to pay the transportation costs of products by truck. This issue seemed to me very confusing. In other words, the Canadian National somewhat deviated from the principle under which the M.F.R.A. applied only to railway transportation. Of course, before the passing last summer of the legislation on the assistance to trucking in the Atlantic provinces, I would have liked the Canadian Transport Commission to render a decision which would have indicated whether the C.N.R. had acted in a legal way.

[English]

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): This is quite a controversial bill, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to compliment the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) for bringing it in. Although it is not a government measure, it is one to which we should give a good deal of study. Railways subsidized by the treasury are entering the trucking industry to an increasing extent. In many cases these railway companies have behaved very unjustly toward a lot of settlements. I say this because they did not complete the branch lines which they had been given charters to build. This resulted in many injustices to communities in my constituency.

Now the railways are trying to put private trucking companies out of business. Since they are subsidized in the first place, they can very easily do this. They can haul in trucks piggy-back most of the way, and then put private enterprise out of business. It is likely that small truckers pioneered this business in the first place, the railways companies not having thought it worth while to complete the branch lines they had been au horized to build. This is a situation which deserves close study by all hon. members. We have all seen what the railways can do by moving trucks piggy-back over the long haul and then delivering within a district by road.

It is possible that some of these communities would never have received the benefits of a trucking service had not private businessmen been enterprising enough to provide it. Now, apparently, the railway companies intend to put the private firms out of business. I believe they are again taking advantage of the rural communities in their master station plan. They are doing a disservice to many of these places by removing the station agent and using through-trains. Now the attempt is being made to put the small trucker out of business.

I think this matter warrants very careful consideration before we allow any company which has been subsidized to this extent to compete against private enterprise and push other companies around, as they very easily could. Many companies were prevented from building lines because the national railways had the charter, even though they never fulfilled their part of the bargain. Many truck lines would not have been required had these rail lines been completed. I think the House should take a good look at the bill before giving it passage.

National Transportation Act

Mr. Judd Buchanan (London West): Mr. Speaker, with some regularity in the past we have condemned and criticized our railroads for their lack of aggressiveness and their complacency. It is my understanding that an article which appeared recently in the "Harvard Business Review"—it has apparently been their most requested reprint—used the railroads as the classic example of what they called "marketing myopia". It was said to be the industry that has shown outstanding lack of imagination and lack of initiative.

At the turn of the century the railroads were dominant and all-powerful. It is my understanding that somewhere along the line Sir Edward Beattie remarked that he would far rather be president of the CPR than prime minister of Canada. Yet half a century later one finds throughout North America the majority of the railroads in receivership, in bankruptcy, or surviving on subsidies paid them by governments. Certainly they suffered during this period from marketing myopia and allowed the trucking industry, the airlines, the bus companies and pipelines to take over a substantial part of their market. They conceived of themselves as being in the railroad business, not in the business of transporting people and moving goods, or in the business of serving or developing markets.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, they suffered from marketing myopia and belatedly have been shaking off their lethargy; and now as we move into the last half of the 20th century it is my opinion that this bill proposes to push them back into the railroad industry and to once more limit their vision.

Bill C-25 proposes that if a railway receives subsidies or moneys from the government, it may not acquire, directly or indirectly, any interest or control in a trucking firm. If there was a way in which the railways could misuse subsidies paid to them for the purpose of buying truck lines, one could readily support the principle of this bill. The intention of the National Transportation Act is to enable all modes of transport to compete on fair conditions. The government does not propose to make taxpayer's money available to the railways for the purpose of buying up independently-owned trucking firms.

There are three points to be made about Bill C-25. First is the nature of the subsidies that the railways receive; the fact that each subsidy is paid to the railways for a specific purpose that does not include the purchase of truck lines and that leaves nothing extra for the railways to use on that account. The second point is that there is a provision in the Railway Act that bars any railway under federal jurisdiction from mixing up its railway and trucking accounts in a way that would enable the trucking operation to obtain indirectly any subsidy from the government. The third point is that there exists in the National Transportation Act a specific provision, the object of which is to prevent acquisition in the transportation field which will unduly restrict competition or otherwise adversely affect the public interest.

Although the railways receive, as yet, no subsidies for passenger services, they are entitled to such subsidies if the Canadian Transport Commission determines that a service they operate at a loss must be continued in the public interest. The railways will have no money from this source to play around with in regard to truck line purchases. The National Transportation Act does not permit any extra in compensating the railways for passenger losses. The appropriate section does not permit compensation for the full loss which the railroads incurred. I understand they get approximately 80 per cent of the loss, which has to be certified by the commission.

The only large-scale subsidy that the Canadian railways receive is what is left of the subsidy that had its origin in the Freight Rates Reduction Act of 1959. That act reduced railway non-competitive class and commodity rates and provided $20 million to the railways in compensation for their revenue loss. By 1967 the $20 million in annual rail subsidies had risen to $110 million. There had been two more wage settlements. Rail rates remained frozen. The policy of governments of that day, both Conservative and Liberal, was to restrain further across-the-board freight rate increases pending the introduction of new national transportation legislation and they continued to compensate the railways for the revenue losses incurred as the result of the freight rate freeze.

Railway rates were frozen in 1959, and for a period of seven years did not move upward. Operating costs were not frozen; on the contrary, they were increasing substantially. The losses sustained by the railways in not being able to raise their rates were compensated from the federal treasury. When there is on the one hand a frozen price structure, and on the other hand a situation of substantially increasing costs, it is obvious that nowhere can a subsidy be applied except in the situation for which the subsidy is created, namely, the defraying of losses sustained. There is no evidence to sustain a contention that subsidies given to the railroads have played a significant, or any, part in their acquisition of truck lines.

I think another significant point, and one of which we should be aware, is that the large-scale subsidy to which I have just referred and which amounted to roughly $120 million in 1967 has since been going down each year at the rate of $14 million. At the end of the fiscal year 1974 it will have disappeared. The railways received $96 million in 1968, $82 million in 1969, and will get $68 million in 1970, and so on, on a reducing scale, with a final payment of $12 million in 1974.

Another concern one must have about this question, one that quite possibly the author of the bill had in mind when he framed it, is that even if a railway has no opportunity to finance the purchase of a truck line either wholly or in part from subsidy moneys paid to it, does the rail carrier not have the opportunity, once the purchase is made, to inject into its truck line financial sustenance drawn from government subsidies or other moneys?

The answer is that the law requires the railway companies to maintain separate accounting of the assets and earnings of their rail and non-rail enterprises. The law also requires that the railways maintain separate accounting of the operation of their various modes of transport. If, for example, a railway company operates a railway, subsidiary truck lines, an airline and steamships, the accounts for each mode shall be separately maintained. The object of this requirement of the law is to prevent cross-subsidization of rail and rail-controlled modes of transport.

These provisions impose responsibility for enforcement upon the Canadian Transport Commission. To ensure that the conditions set out are met, the commission is required by section 387 to review and revise the uniform classification of accounts at intervals no longer than every two years.

The third point emphasized was the statutory protection of the public that already exists in the National Transportation Act. In the context of section 20 of that act, one of the stituations covered is the purchase of a truck line by a railway and the possibility of restriction of competition or the creation of a monopolistic situation which might work against the public interest. The act provides that in the case of an objection, the Canadian Transport Commission, following an investigation which it must conduct, may disallow the proposed acquisition of that truck line by a railway if it is the commission's opinion that the acquisition would unduly restrict competition or otherwise be prejudicial to the public interest.

Subsidies paid to Canadian railways are of a nature that leaves nothing for the purchase of truck lines. In addition, the National Transportation Act contains safeguards for the public interest in respect of acquisition by a railway of a competing truck line. I believe it is the hope of all Canadians that an integrated road-rail system can reduce the distribution cost in our country, and that by combining the advantages of low-cost rail transportation with the flexible advantages of highway delivery our transportation systems can assist in opening up high-cost, low-volume markets. Canada is too vast and sparsely populated to be deprived of the very obvious advantages of an integrated road-rail system. It seems to me that is the intent of this bill and I therefore find myself in opposition to the principles it embraces.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, as this is a private member's bill I shall be brief in my remarks because I think it should probably come to a vote. It is obviously not the intention of the government to protect private enterprise, because if it were this would be a government measure. I see a necessity in this socialistic state which we are rapidly approaching for some protection for private enterprise. This is the reason I speak in favour of the bill. I see the necessity, however, for the railways to be a paying proposition. But I suggest that if the railways streamlined their operations properly they would not find it necessary to engage in the private enterprise trucking industry.

I join my colleague the hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Cadieu) in reminding the railways that their policy over the past 40 years has been strictly selfish. They do not try to give proper service according to the charter under which they were set in operation. The railways claim they have continually lost money in operating passenger service. One speaker mentioned they have had no compensation for this loss. They have not had compensation in cash grants for the loss, but one need only look at the vast holdings, especially of the CPR, to see that they have been paid in the form of oil and mineral rights alone, not to mention the real estate they own in every major city of Canada. I venture to suggest that if they sold their rights-of-way at present real estate prices in any major city in Canada, they would be compensated for all the losses they have ever suffered in providing the transportation services they have provided.

When the railways have lost money they have always been able to come to the federal government, unlike ordinary free enterprise, and have the government come to their rescue. During one particular depression year the CPR received no less than $60 million in the form of an outright gift. Indeed, at one time it would have been better to have been head of the CPR than prime minister of Canada. With socialism rushing upon us, I am afraid a bill of this type is needed to protect the private citizen of Canada. I hope members of this House will stand, be counted and say that this bill should at least be passed in principle.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I understand that my friend suggested that members of the House would like to see the bill passed. I have an opinion in that regard. In my opinion some hon. members are against the bill, and I must be allowed to express my opinion. I hope my hon. friend will extend this privilege to me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are used to you on the late show.

[Translation]

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to congratulate for his patience and energy our colleague the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Leblanc) who, for the second consecutive year, is bringing in this bill which is important as we found out this afternoon in listening to the debate. Some members may have opposed the principle of this bill which tends to eliminate unfair competition to private enterprise. This is the reason why the member for Laurier brought in the bill.

Despite their opposition to some clauses of the bill, the members who spoke have at least recognized that private enterprise must be protected. Some hon. members may oppose the principle of this bill, but I believe that most of them will agree to it.

On the other hand, I understand that the hon. member for Laurier expresses some fear, but we must also admit that grants awarded by the federal government to the railway companies are not used for the purchase of private trucking businesses. As a matter of fact, they are used only to make up the railways' deficits.

Under section 387 of the Railway Act, funds provided by the central government or any government agency, to the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National, must not be used for the purchase, control or operation of private trucking businesses, which have the right to exist, because they contribute to a great extent to the economy's growth.

On several occasions this afternoon it was said that private enterprise plays an important role in trucking. Thanks to the suggestions made this afternoon and to some hon. members' obstinacy, we might manage to protect private enterprise and perhaps, in some fields, improve the condition of the trucking concerns, while recognizing that some competition, unfair to neither of the parties concerned, should exist. Any hon. member should keep on making suggestions—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Hymmen) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Hymmen: Mr. Speaker, may I have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to presenting reports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

MR. McGRATH—PHASING OUT OF ARGENTIA NAVAL BASE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege under Standing Order 17. At 4.30 p.m. this afternoon, Newfoundland time, an announcement was made in Newfoundland that the Argentia naval base would be phased out and that approximately 600 Canadian citizens employed on this United States installation would be laid off on 30 days' notice.

My question of privilege is based upon the fact that we have raised this question in the House on a number of occasions. I rise in my place today on behalf of my colleague the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) who is not aware that this has taken place because he is now on his way to Newfoundland. My colleague the hon. member for St. John's West, myself and other hon. members have raised this question in the House on a number of occasions.

Clearly, there is a responsibility on the part of the government of Canada. We find it reprehensible and an act of gross irresponsibility that this announcement should have been made in the way it was by the commander of the base. We feel that if there was to be an announcement of this nature, inevitable though it may have been, it should have been made in the House of Commons. It was only this morning, before the House convened for the day's sitting, that I directed a private inquiry to the government to ask what was the status of the U.S. naval base at Argentia at the present time. I was told that they did not know, and that telegrams were being exchanged back and forth.

I find it difficult, if not impossible, to imagine that this announcement would have been made without the advice or consent of either the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). This is a crippling, crushing blow to the already crippled economy of Newfoundland which is currently suffering the consequences of an unemployment rate in excess of 20 per cent.

I rise today on this question of privilege to serve notice that we should expect a statement from the government, when the House meets on Monday on exactly how the government can reconcile this announcement, made in the manner in which it was, with its statements in the House and with the current activities of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Clearly, the responsibility is placed squarely on the shoulders of this government to act very quickly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

At 5.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AIR TRANSPORT

DEFERMENT OF PROCLAMATION OF TAX ON FARES

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement on the air transportation tax. As the House will recall, a bill was passed by the House on December 11 last and later given Royal Assent which provided for tax on air fares, to be imposed directly on purchasers of fares and collected by the airlines. It was to come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

The Prices and Incomes Commission has asked governments to delay increases in charges that are intended to recapture a larger proportion of the costs of services provided to the public. As part of its response to this request of the commission the government has decided to defer proclamation of the air transportation tax until 1971.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, on December 11 last an amendment providing for a six months' hoist was moved by this party to the motion for second reading of the bill in question. That amendment was voted down. I am glad to see now that the minister has taken note of the very sensible words spoken then by the hon. member for Edmonton West and other hon. members of the House on the opposition side and has decided upon the course of wisdom. I only hope that the minister and his colleagues will listen to us a little more frequently and that with the help of the additional research staff now provided for the backbenchers of the Liberal party, all of whom voted against us on that bill, we can hope for a little more discretion—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we also voted against this tax so we too are glad that it has been postponed until next year. One dares to hope that the response the government has made to the request of the Prices and Incomes Commission is an indication that there will be no tax increases in next month's budget or, better still, some decreases.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—TABLING OF STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table copies of the remarks made today by the Prime Minister, on the problem of inflation as seen by the federal government, to the federal-provincial conference.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce a change in the business for today. As previously indicated, the first item of business today will be the Supreme Court Act amending bill, C-182, which is government order No. 66. I had announced last Thursday as the second item of business government order No. 68, the shipping conferences bill. I regret to say that we will not be in a position to go ahead with it today. Instead we will go ahead with government order No. 61, Bill C-179, respecting investment companies, to be followed by government order No. 36, the Canada-Sweden Tax Convention.

Proposed Legislation

LAW REFORM COMMISSION BILL

ESTABLISHMENT, OBJECTS, POWERS AND DUTIES, ETC.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-186, to establish a commission for the reform of the laws of Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

NORTHERN INLAND WATERS BILL

CONSERVATION, DEVELOPMENT AND UTILIZATION OF RESOURCES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-187, respecting inland water resources in the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DISCLOSURE OF INTERESTS BILL

ANNUAL DECLARATION BY SENATORS, MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT AND CERTAIN OTHERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-188, respecting the disclosure of financial interests by Senators, Members of the House of Commons and certain other persons.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on June 6, 1969, the Prime Minister said he would welcome constructive suggestions concerning the problem of conflict of interest. I believe that that request was made in good faith and this bill is a response in the same vein. Its purpose is to require that Senators and members of this House and certain other persons make an annual declaration of their outside financial interests so that the public will be able to judge whether a conflict of interest is involved in the formulating or the support of any particular piece of legislation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale).]

PAROLE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONSECUTIVE AND CONCURRENT SENTENCES, EFFECT OF FORFEITURE

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General) moved the first reading of Bill S-19 (from the Senate), to amend the Parole Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TEXTILE LABELLING BILL

MEASURE RESPECTING CONSUMER ARTICLES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved the first reading of Bill S-20 (from the Senate), respecting the labelling, sale, importation and advertising of consumer textile articles.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME SECURITY PLAN

Question No. 590—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to implement a new income security plan to replace the present system of public assistance as recently recommended by the Federal-Provincial Task Force?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Government of Canada is presently conducting a study of federal social security programs. Any decisions arising from that study will be announced by the Government in the usual manner.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM COMMISSION

Question No. 633—Mr. Coates:

1. What has been the total number of recommendations submitted by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, to date, and how many of these recommendations are (a) purely federal (b) federal-provincial (c) purely provincial in character?

2. Of the recommendations submitted in the three categories above, how many have been acted upon and, in each instance, what was the recommendation and what action was taken by the federal government?

3. Of the recommendations submitted by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism that have been acted upon by either the federal government or through federal-provincial co-operation, what has been the federal government's contribution financially?

Questions

4. Has the federal government provided the provincial governments who have acted upon recommendations that were provincial in character with financial assistance and, if so, what were the recommendations and what was the amount of financial assistance in each instance?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): To date, the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism has published three volumes of its Report. Book III was tabled on December 17, 1969; the Government has not yet taken any position regarding its recommendations.

Book I contained fourteen recommendations, of which two were directed to the federal Government. One of these recommended that English and French be formally declared the official languages of the Parliament of Canada, of the federal courts, of the federal Government and of the federal administration. The other recommended that the federal Parliament adopt a federal Official Languages Act and the Governor in Council appoint a Commissioner of Official Languages charged with ensuring respect for the status of French and English in Canada. Six other recommendations would involve both the federal and provincial Governments, and a further six were addressed essentially to the provinces.

Book II contained 46 recommendations. Of these, twelve were directed to the federal Government but will require federal-provincial co-operation to implement; the other 34 appear to be essentially in the provincial domain.

As the result of passage by Parliament of the Official Languages Act, the federal Government has taken action in respect of the two recommendations of Book I which were addressed to it—with the exception of the appointment of the Commissioner of Official Languages. In accordance with section 19(2) of the Official Languages Act, this appointment will be submitted to Parliament shortly for approval. The federal Government has also accepted the principles underlying the other recommendations of both Books I and II in which it is involved; they are presently under study by all the governments concerned.

To date, the federal Government has made two financial commitments to the provinces regarding these recommendations. The first of these commitments is to pay 50 per cent of the cost of preliminary studies undertaken by the provinces in this field. The second was announced in the House of Commons by the Secretary of State on November 6, 1969; this statement appears as an Appendix to the House of Commons Debates of that day. Under this commitment the federal Government indicated its willingness to co-operate with the provinces in respect to provincial bilingualism programs in the field of education to the order of approximately $50 million for a full year of operation. Negotiations to this end are presently under way.

[Mr Coates.]

CANADA PENSION PLAN COLLECTIONS AND PAYMENTS

Question No. 751—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What was the total amount collected for the Canada Pension Plan in 1968?

2. How much was paid out in 1968?

3. What was the total amount collected for the Canada Pension Plan since its inception?

4. How much has been loaned to each of the provinces during the total period?

5. What is the total amount credited to the Canada Pension Plan, including all loans as at December 31, 1968?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Contributions—$686,017,000; Total Revenue—$765,344,000.

2. $10,274,000 was paid in benefits for the calendar year 1968.

3. The amount of contributions from the beginning of the plan up to the end of December 1968 is $1,840,433,000. The total revenue for that period is $1,962,718,000.

4.

Securities of or Guaranteed by	Investments in dollars $
Newfoundland	34,523,000
P.E.I.	6,435,000
Nova Scotia	70,170,000
New Brunswick	53,487,000
Quebec	3,912,000
Ontario	1,042,945,000
Manitoba	108,247,000
Saskatchewan	82,576,000
Alberta	164,896,000
British Columbia	267,942,000
Gov't of Canada	10,386,000
All Jurisdictions	1,845,519,000

5. The balance of the Canada Pension Plan Account as of December 31, 1968 was $1,916,200,993.

OATH OF ALLEGIANCE, CYC PERSONNEL

Question No. 767—Mr. Diefenbaker:

Are members of the Company of Young Canadians required to take the Oath of Allegiance and, if not, for what reason?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Company of Young Canadians as follows: The members of the Company of Young Canadians are not part of the Public Service. The requirement to take the Oath of Allegiance set out in the Public Service Employment Act would therefore not apply in such cases.

POLLUTION STUDY BY DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Question No. 772—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Is the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources undertaking a study on pollution and, if so (a) have private consulting firms been engaged to conduct all or part of this study (b) what companies or individuals have been hired and what amounts of money are these to be paid?

2. Was there any competitive tender for these studies and, if so, who were the other companies and what were their respective bids?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1 and 2. A major part of the over-all Water Sector Program of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources consists of activities involving various aspects of environmental pollution, with particular reference to water pollution. These activities include a wide range of investigations and studies which are being conducted both inside and outside the Sector.

The question asks for particulars on "...a study on pollution...". Without more specific identification of the study referred to in the question, it is not possible to provide the requested information.

TELESAT CANADA ACT

Question No. 779—Mr. Orlikow:

On what information did the Prime Minister base his statement of November 21, 1969 at Harrison Hot Springs, British Columbia, that the Act which established Telesat Canada aroused no controversy and almost no discussion at the last session of Parliament?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): The reference to the Telesat Canada Act in the Prime Minister's speech of November 21st, 1969 was directed not to the quantity of discussion both inside and outside Parliament at the time the Bill was under debate, but rather to the nature of that discussion. The speech discussed the social and political implications for Canada of certain events. The establishment of Telesat Canada aroused relatively more comment about the proposed corporate structure of the agency than about the implications for Canadian society of a satellite communications system. It was in this sense that the passage in the speech was intended to be understood.

VISIT TO CANADA BY THE QUEEN

Question No. 780—Mr. Schumacher:

1. Was a formal invitation extended to Her Majesty the Queen to visit Ottawa when she is in Canada July 5 to July 15, 1970?

2. Will the Prime Minister be on hand personally to welcome Her Majesty to Canada and, if so, what are the dates and what are the arrangements for this formal welcome by the Prime Minister?

3. Did the Prime Minister state that the Details of the visit will be made public in the form of a press release and, if so, will it now be the practice of the government to refer to arrangements made for Her Majesty by press release, rather than by statements in the House of Commons?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): 1. No. In view of the short time available to Her Majesty for this visit, it was Her Majesty's wish and the wish of the Government of Manitoba and the Council of the Northwest Territories that she spend as much time as possible at their centennial celebrations.

2. The final program for the visit has not yet been approved by the Queen. However, it is planned that the Governor General and the Prime Minister will be on hand to welcome the Royal visitor.

3. Announcements concerning Her Majesty's visit will continue to be made in the House. Detailed plans will be quite lengthy and the government has no objection to tabling these in the House at the appropriate time. It is the government's wish, however, to give the widest possible publicity to this Royal tour, including the issue of appropriate press releases.

LOANS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT BY CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 810—Mr. Mather:

1. What is the total in dollars loaned to the Government of Canada by the chartered banks in the past five years?

2. Can the Bank of Canada issue credit, in the form of loans, to the Government of Canada?

Questions

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The chartered banks do not make loans to the Government of Canada. They do buy and sell Government of Canada securities, and their holdings of such securities are published each month in the Canada Gazette.

2. Under Section 18(1) of the Bank of Canada Act, the Bank of Canada may make loans to the Government of Canada but in practice has rarely done so. The bulk of the Bank's assets are in the form of Government of Canada securities and its holdings of such securities are published weekly and monthly in the Canada Gazette and in the Bank's own publications.

CANADIAN COMMUNICATIONS SATELLITE

Question No. 814—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. When is it expected that Canada's communications satellite will be ready for launching?

2. What is the current estimated total cost of constructing and launching the satellite?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): 1. Telesat Canada informs the Minister that more precise information on the launch date for the Canadian domestic communications satellite will not become available until after the contract for the project definition phase is complete. In the meantime, the Minister is given to understand that Telesat Canada expects that the first satellite will be launched in 1972.

2. As stated in the reply to part one of this question, precise information on costs will not become available for several months.

ADJUSTMENT TO PENSION PAYMENTS

Question No. 831—Mr. Robinson:

Will the federal government consider repealing the 2% maximum on the cost of living adjustment to pension payments and replace it with an escalator clause directly proportional to changes in the Consumer Price Index?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): As in the case of other policy decisions relating to the adjustment of pension payments, these matters will be considered and announced in the usual manner.

SASKATOON—LOW RENTAL HOUSING UNITS

Question No. 839—Mr. Gleave:

What is the amount to be contributed by (a) the federal government (b) the provincial government (c) the City of Saskatoon, toward construction of 50 low-rental housing units to be constructed in two projects in that City?

[Mr. Mather.]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The amounts to be contributed toward the construction of 50 low-rental housing units to be constructed in two projects in the City of Saskatoon are: (a) By the Federal Government, $402,825.00; (b) By the Province of Saskatchewan, $107,420.00; (c) By the City of Saskatoon, $26,855.00.

SASKATOON—HOUSING UNITS FOR RESIDENTS OF INDIAN AND METIS ANCESTRY

Question No. 840—Mr. Gleave:

What is the amount to be contributed by (a) the federal government (b) the City of Saskatoon, toward the acquisition of the 11 existing single-detached housing units to be made available to residents of Indian and Metis ancestry in that City?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The amounts to be contributed toward the acquisition of the 11 existing single detached housing units to be made available to residents of Indian and Métis ancestry in the City of Saskatoon are: (a) By the Federal Government, $91,500; (b) By the City of Saskatoon, Nil. The remaining 25 per cent will be contributed by the Province of Saskatchewan.

VALUE-ADDED TAX

Question No. 861—Mr. Robinson:

1. Will the federal government consider the "value-added tax" when the changes in the tax system are being considered?

2. If the "value-added tax" is to be utilized, will it be effected at all levels of production (manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, etc.)?

3. What advantage would such a tax have for Canada?

4. How much money is it estimated could be obtained by such a tax?

5. Would such a tax obviate the necessity of any other direct or indirect taxes and, if so, what ones and how much would be the financial loss of the other sources of taxation?

6. How many countries now use the "value-added tax" and with what success or failure?

7. Would the "value-added tax" apply to services as well as products and, if so, what services would be affected.

8. Would such a tax in any way affect provincial tax revenue potential?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The government studies various features of the tax systems of foreign countries to benefit from their experience, but consideration of any new tax would be a matter of government policy that would be announced at the appropriate time.

2. See number 1.

3. Not known.

4. This would depend upon rate of tax.

5. The replacement of one tax by another would be a matter of government policy.

6. Nine countries in Europe now use or are in the process of introducing a value-added tax.

7. This would be a matter of government policy.

8. This would depend upon the form and weight of the tax.

LIVERPOOL HARBOUR, N.S.—DREDGING

Question No. 869—Mr. Crouse:

1. Is the government planning a complete dredging survey of Liverpool Harbour in Nova Scotia and, if so, what will be the extent of this survey, and to what depth will dredging be carried out?

2. Has the government any plans for actual dredging operations in this harbour and, if so, what is the amount of funds that will be allocated for this project?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. Yes from highway bridge to Fort Point including mooring area behind the public wharf. Dredge depths would be 14 feet below L.W.O.S.T. in mooring area behind wharf and 11 feet below L.W.O.S.T. in access channel area.

2. It is planned to include an item for $50,000 in the 1970-71 Estimates to cover. Execution will depend on availability of funds.

AMHERST, N.S.—NUMBER OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION EMPLOYEES

Question No. 884—Mr. Coates:

How many employees of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion are presently located at Amherst, N.S., and what will be the total employment on April 1, 1970?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): As of January 21, 1970, 40; As of April 1, 1970, 45.

VEGREVILLE, ALTA.—CLOSURE OF POST OFFICE FACILITIES

Question No. 890—Mr. Mazankowski:

What post office facilities in the constituency of Vegreville are presently under review for closure within the next fiscal year?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Flat Lake, Alberta; Hazeldine, Alberta.

BANK OF CANADA—SALE OF TREASURY BILLS

Question No. 893—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. How many offers did the Bank of Canada receive for the sale of $160,000,000 worth of Treasury bills on January 15, 1970?

2. What were the highest and lowest bids?

3. What offer was accepted?

4. At what interest rate were they sold?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. There were 89 bids totalling $352,085,000 for $160 million of treasury bills offered at tender January 15, 1970. Of this total amount, bids of $259,085,000 were in respect of $130 million of 91-day treasury bills and bids of $93 million were in respect of $30 million of 182-day treasury bills.

2. As stated in the regular weekly release published on January 15, the prices on the highest and lowest bids accepted were, for the 91-day bills $98.092 and $98.088, respectively, and for the 182-day bills $96.216 and $96.213, respectively.

3. Answered by 2.

4. As stated in the regular weekly release referred to in 2 above, the average interest rate on the accepted bids was 7.81 per cent for the 91-day bills and 7.89 per cent for the 182-day bills.

CBC—ESTABLISHMENT OF TV TRANSMITTER STATIONS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Question No. 903—Mr. Marshall:

1. What progress is being made by CBC in establishing TV transmitter stations in the Great Northern Peninsula in Western Newfoundland, in St. Anthony, Englee, Forrester's Point and Bonne Bay?

2. Are transmitters being designed for installation at these points?

3. When is it expected that they will be completed?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The Corporation has had a television transmitter (Frontier Coverage Package) in operation at St. Anthony since October 1968. Plans for an installation at St. Anthony which would provide live network service have had to be delayed because of budget restrictions imposed on the Corporation and at the moment it does not appear that such an installation could be in operation until some time in 1972. The permanent plan for St. Anthony calls for a rebroadcasting transmitter at Englee, as an intermediate step to bring the network service into St. Anthony. The schedule for Englee has also been delayed for the same reason and the target date is 1971. Investigation is presently underway to determine whether or not it will be possible to provide live network service to St. Anthony on a temporary basis directly off-air from the distant CBC transmitter at Baie Verte. The Corporation filed an application with the CRTC in July, 1969, for a rebroadcasting station at Bonne Bay and is awaiting a decision from the Commission. In general, a 12-month period is required for construction and equipping of a station after CRTC approval is received. An installation has been planned for Forrester's Point and an operational date has been tentatively set for late 1972 (subject to availability of funds).

2. No.

3. See 1 above.

JASPER NATIONAL PARK—COST OF GATEHOUSE

Question No. 924—Mr. Sulatycky:

What was the cost of building the structures used as the gate and gate-house at the west entrance to Jasper National Park?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Kiosk Cost, $2,500; Power plant and transmission lines, 9,000.

JASPER, ALTA.—COMMERCIAL AND RESIDENTIAL LEASES

Question No. 925—Mr. Sulatycky:

1. How many commercial leases actually used for commercial purposes are there in existence in the townsite of Jasper?

2. How many residential leases are there in existence in the townsite of Jasper?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. There are 95 commercial leases in Jasper Townsite.

2. There are 510 residential leases in Jasper Townsite.

BANFF, ALTA.—COMMERCIAL AND RESIDENTIAL LEASES

Question No. 926—Mr. Sulatycky:

1. How many commercial leases actually used for commercial purposes are there in existence in the townsite of Banff?

2. How many residential leases are there in existence in the townsite of Banff?

[Mr. Pelletier.]

3. How many residential leases are there in existence in the townsite of Banff held by persons who do not reside permanently in Banff and what are the names of those persons?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. There are 160 commercial leases in Banff Townsite.

2. There are 760 residential leases in Banff Townsite.

3. It is not possible to separate the non-resident lessees from the resident lessees without making a search of records dating back several years and inquiring from each leaseholder as to his actual residence at the present time. Disclosure of the names of lessees would be a breach of confidence.

FEDERAL GRANTS TO COOL-AID

Question No. 930—Mr. Goode:

Has the Government of Canada made any grants or grants available to a Vancouver-based organization known as Cool-Aid which provides assistance to alienated and transient youth and, if so, under what terms and conditions were such funds granted?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes. The Department of National Health and Welfare approved a grant to The Greater Vancouver Youth Communications Centre Society (known as Cool Aid) in Vancouver for the fiscal year 1969-70. The grant is for an experimental demonstration project and was awarded under the terms and conditions for such projects as specified in The Welfare Grants Rules 1969 P.C. 69-11/777.

BOEING OF CANADA LTD.

Question No. 945—Mr. Burton: (Supplementary)

1. Has the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, under the Regional Incentives Act, authorized or provided an incentive grant to "Boeing of Canada Ltd." and, if so, what is the amount of the grant?

2. What is the total estimated cost of the project for which the grant was provided and what is the nature of the project and its location?

3. Who are the directors and chief executive officers of "Boeing of Canada Ltd." and what is the address of each?

4. To what extent is this company non-resident or foreign-owned or controlled?

5. What is the name and country of the known non-resident ownership in this company?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows:

1 and 2. This information was contained in the monthly report, tabled in Parliament on the operation of the Regional Development Act.

3. As of December 31, 1968, the directors and executive officers of Boeing of Canada Ltd. are: H. P. Burress, Vice-President and General Manager and Director, Alicia Street, Arnprior, Ontario; W. M. Allen, Director, c/o The Boeing Co., Seattle, Washington, U.S.A., W. J. Kane, Director, c/o The Boeing Co., Seattle, Washington, U.S.A., R. W. Tharrington, Director, c/o The Boeing Co., Vertol Division, Morton, Pa., U.S.A.; K. R. Patrick, Director, Bedford, Quebec; R. G. Peers, Director, 630 Dirchester Blvd., Montreal 2, Quebec; J. K. Prince, Director, c/o The Boeing Co., Seattle, Washington, U.S.A.; J. S. Ciechan, Director, c/o The Boeing Co., Vertol Division, Morton, Pa., U.S.A.; H. S. Tremper, Director, c/o The Boeing Co., Vertol Division, Morton, Pa., U.S.A.

4. 97.0 per cent non-resident owned.

5. The Boeing Company, United States.

NOVA SCOTIA—ESTABLISHMENT OF SATELLITE PARK

Question No. 947—Mr. Crouse:

1. Is it the intention of the government to establish a satellite park along the coast of Nova Scotia as a supplement to the facilities provided by Kejimkujik National Park and, if so, what will be the location of the satellite park and what is its estimated area?

2. How much money has been set aside for the development of a satellite park?

3. On what date does the government estimate development work for a satellite park will be undertaken?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The National and Historic Parks Branch have conducted field studies in the Cape La Have area of Nova Scotia. The study results are not yet complete.

2. None.

3. Until an agreement with the Province of Nova Scotia has been negotiated, no development can be undertaken.

CAPE BRETON-THE SYDNEYS—PUBLIC WORKS PROJECTS

Question No. 949—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

What projects are planned by the Department of Public Works for the coming year in the constituency of Cape Breton-The Sydneys?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works):

Location	Project
Sydney	Marginal Wharf—Paving
	Marginal Wharf—Warehouse floor repairs
	Old Naval Building—Alterations
North Sydney	Public Wharf—Fender repairs
	Indian Beach—Dredging
Alder Point	Public Wharf—Approach improvements

In addition minor maintenance will be carried out at various locations as required. All are subject to the availability of funds.

RCMP VESSEL "WOOD"

Question No. 958—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is it the intention of the government to decommission the RCMP patrol vessel Wood and, if so, at what date?

2. At what yard was Wood built, when and at what cost?

3. Where is she stationed and what area does she patrol?

4. How many miles has she logged, per year, on patrol duty?

5. What repairs or refits has she undergone, in what yard or yards, and at what costs?

6. What is her complement of officers and crew?

7. As a result of her patrol work, how many charges have been laid, what was the general nature of such charges and how many convictions resulted?

8. What is the approximate cost of operating her for a year?

9. If the answer to Part 1 is in the affirmative, for what reason or reasons?

10. If the answer to Part 1 is in the affirmative, what disposition will be made of the vessel and will there be any restrictions on the type of would-be purchasers?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. Yes, by April 1, 1970.

2. (i) George T. Davie & Sons Limited, Lauzon, P.Q.; (ii) Commissioned June 28, 1958; (iii) $1,513,833.

3. Stationed at Halifax, Nova Scotia. Patrols Canadian Atlantic Coast from Canada—U.S. Border to Northern Labrador, Gulf of St. Lawrence and St. Lawrence River.

4. Average 15,145 miles per annum since commissioning.

5. Refit April, 1961, D.N.D. Halifax, N.S., $7,912.; refit Jan., 1962, Halifax Shipyards, N.S., $14,781.; refit Feb., 1963, Purdy Bros., Halifax, N.S., $11,892.; refit Feb., 1966, Steel & Engine Products, Liverpool, N.S., $8,000; refit Feb., 1967, Purdy Bros, Halifax, N.S., $6,500.

6. Officers, 1; Crew, 35.

7. No statistics available as this vessel carried out a support service for land-based personnel enforcing Customs Act, Canada Shipping Act and Migratory Birds Convention Act for five separate R.C.M. Police divisions.

8. $355,097.

9. Operation of this vessel by the R.C.M. Police can no longer be justified due to changing operational and enforcement requirements which can now be effectively met by smaller vessels, and thus a ship of the Wood's size is no longer necessary.

10. The Wood will be disposed of through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation, who will be able to advise of any restrictions on the type of would be purchasers.

REMOVAL OF PLATES OVER SERIAL NUMBERS ON TRACTORS IMPORTED FROM ENGLAND

Question No. 959—Mr. Skoberg:

1. Has the RCMP been advised of the removal of plates over the serial numbers on tractors imported from England as reported at page 2531 of Hansard and, if so, what were the results of the investigation?

2. If the person or the persons involved have been identified, have there been any charges laid?

3. If the person or persons have been identified, and there have been no charges laid, for what reason?

4. Is the investigation proceeding and, if not, for what reason?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Not known.

CAMPER TRUCKS AND TRAILERS AND PRIVATE BOATS ENTERING CANADA

Question No. 961—Mr. Reid:

1. How many camper trucks and camper trailers entered Canada during 1969, 1968 and 1967?

2. How many private boats entered Canada, either by being pulled on a trailer or on top of cars, during 1969, 1968 and 1967?

3. How is this information obtained?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): 1. Statistical records not maintained. Camper trucks and camper trailers when temporarily imported by non-residents for health or pleasure purposes are documented on temporary entry permits at highway ports of entry for control purposes only and not for statistical reasons. Since the control is exercised by the issuing ports, a central record is not maintained of articles so imported.

2. Statistical records not maintained. Private boats entering Canada temporarily, either by being pulled on a trailer or on top of cars, are documented on temporary entry permits at highway ports of entry for control purposes only and not for statistical reasons. Since the control is exercised by the issuing ports, a central record is not maintained of articles so imported.

3. Not applicable.

RETIRED ARMY CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES—APPLICATION OF PENSION INCREASE

Question No. 964—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Will civilian employees who retired from employment with the Army since 1952 get the 2 per cent increase which was announced in December and, if so, what will be the annual increase for civilian employees who retired from the Army during 1952-53-54-55-56 for those who earned six thousand dollars per year?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of Treasury Board): It is the Government's intention to present to Parliament legislation that would provide increases to pensions paid under the Civil Service Superannuation Act or Public Service Superannuation Act, effective April 1, 1970, to former civilian employees including those having retired from work with the Army.

Employees in the above category who retired on full pension in the years shown below after having 35 years of contributory service, for example, with an average salary of $6,000 over their last ten consecutive years of employment would receive the following amounts as an addition to their monthly pensions if this legislation is approved by Parliament.

Year of Retirement	Monthly $
1952	149.80
1953	139.09
1954	131.95
1955	121.24
1956	110.53

Question No. 967—Mr. Harding:

1. For the years 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969, how many charges were laid against individuals or companies by persons in the department responsible for the enforcement of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys Act and Regulations regarding violations of the Act and Regulations dealing with pollution of waters?

2. How many of the above charges resulted in (a) convictions (b) dismissal of the charges (c) withdrawal of the charges?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

POLLUTION CHARGES LAID UNDER INTERNATIONAL RIVER IMPROVEMENTS ACT

Question No. 968—Mr. Harding:

1. For the years 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969, how many charges were laid against individuals or companies by persons in the department responsible for the enforcement of the International River Improvements Act and Regulations regarding violations of the Act and Regulations dealing with pollution of waters?

2. How many of the above charges resulted in (a) convictions (b) dismissal of the charges (c) withdrawal of the charges?

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

CHARGES LAID UNDER NATIONAL PARKS ACT

Question No. 971—Mr. Harding:

1. For the years 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969, how many charges were laid against individuals or companies by persons in the department responsible for the enforcement of the National Parks Act and Regulations regarding violations of the Act and Regulations dealing with pollution of waters?

2. How many of the above charges resulted in (a) convictions (b) dismissal of the charges (c) withdrawal of the charges?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. One charge was laid against an individual in Jasper National Park.

2. The charge resulted in a conviction and a fine of $5.00.

*RESPONSIBILITIES OF MINISTER WITHOUT PORTFOLIO FROM YORK-SCARBOROUGH

Question No. 1,009—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What are the responsibilities of the Minister without Portfolio from York-Scarborough?

2. Does he have any responsibilities related to the Privy Council Office?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is as follows: 1. As announced by the Prime Minister on October 15, 1969, the Minister without Portfolio, the member for York-Scarborough, assumed "particular responsibility for the work of the Secretary of State Department in the field of citizenship. This involves questions of naturalization and the citizenship courts, and also the department's developing program to encourage and assist various groups of residents, including ethnic groups, to play a more active part in the life of Canada."

On February 10, 1970, the Prime Minister announced in the House that the minister would also, in respect to Information Canada under the Supply and Services Department, "take responsibility for its planning and development to be as ready as possible for operational status at the beginning of the new fiscal year."

2. No.

ESCAPES FROM SPRINGHILL MEDIUM SECURITY INSTITUTION

Question No. 1,010—Mr. Coates:

1. How many escapes have taken place at the Young Offenders Medium Security Institution at Springhill, N.S., and in each instance (a) what was the date of the escape (b) how many inmates were involved (c) what was the length of time the inmates in question were at large?

2. Was the general public informed of the escape of an inmate or inmates from the institution in each instance and, if not (a) in which instances was the public informed (b) what reasons were there for not informing the general public?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): 1. Eight, as follows: Escape No. 1: (a) 8 May 1969; (b) One; (c) 6 hrs. 30 min. Escape No. 2: (a) 8 June 1969; (b) One; (c) 2 hrs. Escape No. 3: (a) 17 Sept. 1969; (b) One; (c) 14 hrs. Escape No. 4: (a) 23 Sept. 1969; (b) Two; (c) 6 days. Escape No. 5: (a) 17 Oct. 1969; (b) One; (c) 14 hrs. Escape No. 6: (a) 6 Nov. 1969; (b) Two; (c) 5 days. Escape No. 7: (a) 12 Nov. 1969; (b) Three; (c) 1 hr. 30 min. Escape No. 8: (a) 18 Jan. 1970; (b) One; (c) 30 min.

2. See sub-paragraph (a) below. (a) In all cases except Escape No. 2 and No. 8: (b) In both escape No. 2 and No. 8, the escapee was seen to run into small woods near the institution, all sides of which were easily kept under surveillance, thus permitting the early apprehension of the prisoners without the public being exposed to danger because of lack of knowledge of the escape.

Questions

CONSTRUCTION OF POST OFFICE, WENTWORTH, N.S.

Question No. 1,011—Mr. Coates:

Is it the intention of the government to construct a post office at Wentworth, Nova Scotia and, if so, when does the government intend to call tenders for the construction of this post office?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): No.

ST. LAWRENCE CENTRE FOR THE ARTS

Question No. 1,012—Mr. Gleave:

Did the Canada Council contribute funds to the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts in Toronto and, if so, in what amount?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canada Council as follows: The Canada Council has awarded the Toronto Arts Foundation, on behalf of the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts, the following grants: in 1968, $15,000 for the development of the theatrical program of the Centre; in 1969, $140,000 for the first theatrical season of the Centre which should begin on February 26, 1970.

[English]

SALES TAX ON STAPLE FOODS

Question No. 1,026—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Is margarine subject to the 12 per cent tax?

2. What other staple foods are subject to sales tax?

3. Is it the government's intention to remove sales taxes on staple foods as a part of the campaign to fight inflation and reduce the high cost of living?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. Yes, except for consumption in the Province of Newfoundland.

2. None.

3. This is a matter of Government policy. If the Government should decide to propose an amendment to exempt margarine from sales tax it will be announced at the appropriate time.

EXPENDITURES UNDER REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

Question No. 1,033—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Under the Regional Development Incentives Act, in what places or areas in (a) Manitoba (b) Quebec (c) New Brunswick (d) Newfoundland (e) Ontario, were expenditures of moneys approved up to the end of December 31, 1969?

2. What was the amount of such expenditures for each of said projects?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): This information was contained in the reports respecting the Administration of the Regional Development Incentives Act tabled on October 27, 1969, December 4, 1969, and January 12, 1970.

REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON POLLUTION CONTROL EQUIPMENT

Question No. 1,039—Mr. Robinson:

Will the federal government consider the feasibility of removing the sales tax on pollution control equipment in order to create an incentive to control pollution?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Equipment described in part XIII of Schedule III of the Excise Tax Act is exempt from sales tax. If the Government should decide to propose additional exemptions from sales tax it will be announced at the appropriate time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE FUND—ADVERTISEMENTS WARNING AGAINST FRAUDULENT CLAIMS

Question No. 1,058—Mr. Paproski:

What was the name of the advertising agency employed to prepare advertisements, which were published recently in national newspapers, warning against fraudulent claims against the Unemployment Insurance Fund?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Goodis, Goldberg, Soren Ltd., Toronto.

SUBSIDY PAID TO TURKEY PRODUCERS 1960 TO 1969

Question No. 1,125—Mr. Robinson:

What was the total subsidy paid to turkey producers during each of the years 1960 to 1969 inclusive?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Nil.

SASKATCHEWAN—REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE GRANTS

Question No. 1,142—Mr. Southam:

1. How many Regional Development Incentive Grants were awarded in Saskatchewan in 1969?

2. Where were the locations and what was the amount of grant in each case?

3. How many Regional Development Incentive Grants will be awarded to Saskatchewan in 1970?

4. Where will they be located and what will be the amounts?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1 and 2. This information was contained in the reports respecting the Administration of the Regional Development Incentives Act tabled on October 27, 1969, December 4, 1969, and January 12, 1970.

3 and 4. This information will be contained in subsequent monthly reports, as offers are accepted.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—POSITIVE PROPOSALS BY GOVERNMENT TO FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister's remarks to the federal-provincial conference this morning contained no positive proposals for controlling inflation but only general expressions of intent, does the government intend to make such positive proposals to the conference before it terminates?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, one of the main items on the agenda, from the remarks made by the Prime Minister, is measures to contain inflation. This is the purpose of the federal government and we hope also of the provincial governments. This is a time when I think there should be co-operation and that the federal government should seek co-operation and not, of course, order them about which would be impossible in any event.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. No one, of course, is suggesting that the federal government order anybody about. They cannot do it.

Mr. Baldwin: Except their own backbenchers.

Mr. Hees: I would ask this supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government suggesting positive measures to the provinces involving ways by which the federal and provincial governments can control rising unemployment, both regional and national?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman knows very well that the Prices and Incomes Commission has proposed a series of steps affecting business and government, and these are under discussion at the conference.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, a further supplementary question. I asked the Acting Prime Minister if the federal government was going to propose measures for controlling unemployment?

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. I thought the hon. gentleman was referring to inflation. So far as unemployment is concerned, of course it is the desire of the government to minimize unemployment and that, of course, is one of the reasons we are working so hard to control inflation, because the outcome of inflation is unemployment.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government asking the provincial governments to limit their increases in expenditures this year to the 9 per cent by which the federal government is increasing its expenditures this year?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we hope we shall have the co-operation of all governments in measures to contain inflation. Certainly, one of the most important measures is that expenditures under the control of each government should be limited as far as possible.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

PROJECTED SECOND VOYAGE BY "MANHATTAN" THROUGH NORTHWEST PASSAGE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of a report from Houston, Texas, that there is now a 50 per cent chance that the Manhattan will make another voyage through the northern waters of Canada in April, can the minister say whether the government has now received any requests, communications or intimations in connection with this proposed trip?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the information we have is rather the same as the report that has been referred to by the hon. member. We have heard that there may be a chance that the Manhattan will travel through our northern waters again but we have not yet had a definite request; we understand that Humble Oil Company has not yet made up its mind whether the ship will make the voyage.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the government taking any action in the meantime by way of strengthening the regulations to make sure that if there is such a voyage there will not be a tragedy involving the pollution of our northern waters?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I believe that experimental voyages of the kind undertaken by the Manhattan are very much in Canada's interest. The ship will carry no oil cargo but only that oil it will need for itself. It is very important for us to find out the conditions under which these waters can be used safely. That is why the government welcomed the first voyage of the Manhattan. If the company wishes to undertake a second voyage, we would co-operate and welcome the effort because we believe that as the result of such voyages we will find out the conditions under which it will be safe to traverse these waters.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What price Canadian sovereignty! Heaven help us!

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister used the words, "our northern waters", is it the position of the government that the Manhattan or any other oil tanker must seek permission from the Canadian government in order to make a voyage through the Northwest Passage?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in the past they have sought our co-operation, which I am sure is the best evidence that they understand our position in the north.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the position of the government that the Manhattan or other similar vessels must seek the permission of the Canadian government before going through what the minister described as "our northern waters"?

Mr. Sharp: There seems to be some misunderstanding about this.

Mr. Baldwin: Not at all.

Mr. Sharp: When ships pass through our waters, wherever those are, they do not seek the specific approval of the Canadian government. They are assumed to be on innocent passage and we do not question them. We assume that the Manhattan, if it is to go again, will undertake an innocent passage. Indeed, the purpose of the voyage would be to find out, by way of this experiment, what conditions are like in the north. That is why we welcome it and have co-operated and given our permission in the past.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What price Canadian sovereignty!

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Secretary of State communicate with his colleague, the Minister of Transport, to make sure that if the Manhattan does make the voyage she will fly the Canadian flag when in our waters, something that did not happen on the last trip?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member is making a representation rather than asking a question.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister ascertain whether the Department of Transport or the government has received a direct request for the use of Canadian icebreakers in the event this voyage takes place?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I explained in answer to the initial question, we have not yet been told whether the Manhattan will undertake a second voyage. There is uncertainty about it because I do not think Humble Oil Company has yet made up its mind. It is clear that if the ship were to undertake the voyage it would have to have the co-operation of Canadian icebreakers. These, of course, would be available.

[Later:]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question concerning sovereignty over our Arctic waters. Is the government considering the reinstitution of the policy of the Mackenzie King government of issuing licences to ships and aircraft going through or traversing the Canadian Arctic sector? I refer to licences such as those issued by the Canadian government under Mackenzie King to the MacMillan-Byrd expedition?

Mr. Sharp: I shall take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): A supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has the government prepared base lines for the Arctic islands area? If so, when will the government be proclaiming them?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of areas where the government has not drawn base lines. It is not the intention to complete the map at the present time.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Sharp: To do so in some areas would be to take an action that might compromise the position of the Canadian government in future declarations.

NATURAL RESOURCES

REQUEST FOR MORATORIUM ON OIL AND GAS EXPLORATION PENDING STEPS TO PROTECT ARCTIC ECOLOGY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister. Will the department responsible review its position in relation to the call by the Canadian Wildlife Federation for a partial moratorium on oil and gas exploration in the Arctic region until it has acquired the information, technology and trained personnel as well as adequate safeguards to ensure the fullest protection of our Arctic ecology?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will give consideration to this suggestion. Of course I cannot say that we will follow it, but we will certainly look at it.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INTERIM INCREASE IN PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I ask him whether his department and the government have received a request from the Royal Canadian Legion, that because of the desperate circumstances of many veterans across Canada receiving war pensions and war veterans allowances, for an interim increase of 10 per cent in the basic rate of war disability pensions and a 15 per cent interim increase in war veterans allowances? If it has been received, will he give sympathetic consideration to the plight of these veterans across the country who find themselves receiving little or no consideration, especially having regard to the increases that have been provided for retired civil servants and the like?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have received these representations. We have also read the editorial in The Legionary. I repeat what has already been said in the House, that the whole structure of social legislation is at present under review by the government of Canada. The same attention and sympathy which have been shown by this government to veterans will continue in the future.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, surely the minister does not suggest that war veterans allowances and war pensions for disabilities are in the same category as social legislation? These are matters that deserve consideration and should not be postponed by a procrastinating government.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the requests that I am sure all hon. members have been receiving from veterans receiving war veterans allowances and other pensions, is the government considering some form of increase, albeit temporary or interim, until such time as its review is complete in order that the present pensions will at least keep up with the increased cost of living?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is repeating in substance what has already been asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Benjamin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was trying to ascertain whether, until such time as the government has completed its review, it is considering granting a temporary or interim increase?

Mr. Dubé: The government is considering all possibilities, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In the meantime the veterans starve.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ARGENTIA, NFLD.—CLOSING OF U.S. NAVAL BASE—PLANS TO COPE WITH UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the imminent closing of the naval base at Argentia, Newfoundland, what special plans does the government have to cope with the additional unemployment which will be created by the closing of this base?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): All the departments concerned are on the job—the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and all the others. They have been given special instructions to do everything possible to see that Canadians who are released find alternative employment or are offered retraining facilities and whatever additional help can be provided.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—EFFECT OF AUSTERITY MEASURES —ADVICE FROM BANK OF CANADA GOVERNOR

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question. In view of the fact that Mr. Roberts of the United States Federal Reserve has warned that the kind of austerity measures being implemented by the United States and Canada could trigger a serious recession and further unemployment, has the federal government received similar advice from the governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): The advice received from the governor of the Bank of Canada is, of course, confidential unless it is published by him.

Mr. Woolliams: Is there an agreement between the Canadian and United States governments with regard to these austerity measures which are now bringing about regional and national unemployment in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: Obviously there can be no agreement that our fiscal, monetary or other policies should be the same.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION TO HOLD COMMONWEALTH PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE IN OTTAWA

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): My question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Is the Canadian government extending an invitation to members of the Commonwealth to hold the forthcoming Prime Ministers' Conference in Ottawa?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I am happy this question has been asked, because there have been some misleading reports in the papers that Canada is reluctant to have the meeting in Ottawa. This is not so. We would be prepared to fall in with the consensus among the heads of government as to the location of the meeting. If it is to be in Ottawa, we would welcome it. We have taken part in some discussions, of course, about the timing; we would prefer that it be at a time when the weather is agreeable, and we would prefer 1971.

[Mr. Sharp.]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Having regard to the accusation, perhaps false, that Canada's foreign policy is orientated toward a continental approach, would the Acting Prime Minister tell us whether Canada intends to actually invite the Prime Ministers of this multinational commonwealth to meet in Canada?

Mr. Sharp: There seems to be a fair interest in coming to Ottawa; I think it is sufficient for us to say they would be welcome here. We would welcome the Commonwealth Prime Ministers, as I am sure we should all do, if they care to come here. They know they are welcome. A special invitation is not necessary.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): The minister speaks in fulsome terms about welcoming the Prime Ministers Conference. Did not the government of Canada in 1969 refuse the opportunity to have the Prime Ministers Conference here?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INVITATION TO PRESIDENT OF FRANCE TO VISIT OTTAWA

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs; it is related to the same theme of reconciliation. In view of the fact that the President of France is visiting the President of the United States next week, has Canada extended an invitation to President Pompidou to come to Ottawa either before or after his visit to Washington?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that this question has been asked before. However, the Acting Prime Minister might wish to reply.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the question put by the right hon. member for Prince Albert was out of order but I just want to deny the validity of the statement he made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The denial is not in accordance with the truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps that is a matter for debate. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mr. Fairweather: What about the President of France?

Mr. Sharp: I answered a similar question some time ago. The President of France visited Canada and the head of our government has not since visited France. I think the invitation ought to be the other way.

LABOUR RELATIONS

PACIFIC PRESS, VANCOUVER—ENTRY INTO CANADA OF U.S. PROFESSIONAL STRIKEBREAKER

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): In the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister arising out of the strike at Pacific Press in Vancouver. Is the government aware that Leroy Norton, a professional strikebreaker from the United States, has arrived in Vancouver to help break the strike at Pacific Press?

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member is asking whether the government is aware that a certain individual has arrived in Canada. I doubt whether the question, simply stated in those terms, is in order.

Mrs. MacInnis: Would the government look into these circumstances having regard to the fact that this individual came to Canada for a similar purpose on another occasion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): It is my understanding that this strike falls within provincial jurisdiction. My attention has not so far been drawn to the report.

Mrs. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, this question directly involves the entry of an individual into this country from the United States.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER LEVYING CHARGES FOR USE OF FILMS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is directed to the Secretary of State. In light of representations made to the minister by the Newfoundland Teachers' Association, will the hon. gentleman indicate whether he intends to take action to relieve the financial burden which will fall upon Newfoundland schools by deferring or removing rental fees charged by the National Film Board for films needed by these schools which will otherwise be denied the use of this educational service?

Mr. Speaker: Here again, I have the impression that the question has been asked before. Nevertheless, the minister might be allowed to answer.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I can but repeat the reply which I gave the last time—it was on Thursday last, I believe—namely that this policy had been studied. Unless new factors intervene, no change is foreseen.

[English]

Mr. Marshall: Does the minister not feel that something should be done to help schools which will not be able to afford to rent these films in future? Is this not a factor which ought to be taken into consideration?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary is in the form of a representation or submission and he has to assume it will be taken into account.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): If the Secretary of State is saying there is to be no change in the policy, will he kindly advise me why, in a letter he wrote to me, he tells me the matter is subject to review and that there may be a change in the decision?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the question is argumentative.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary on this subject which I should like Your Honour to rule out of order so that it can be debated at ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will realize that he has not yet asked his question, so there is no assurance it will be debated at the time of the adjournment.

[Translation]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister.

Would he have some statement to make concerning charges made last Saturday against the Prime Minister of Canada by the Premier of Quebec who said that the federal government was interfering in provincial affairs, especially as regards relations between Ottawa and the municipalities, which fall under provincial jurisdiction?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member is merely inviting a minister to comment on a statement made outside the House, and such a question is normally not allowed.

[English]

DRUGS

MARIJUANA—REFERENCE OF NON-MEDICAL USE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): I have a question I wanted to address to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence, perhaps the hon. gentleman's Parliamentary Secretary could take it as notice. Is consideration being given to referring the issue of the non-medical use of marijuana to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): I assure the hon. member I shall bring his representation to the attention of the minister.

FISHERIES

HADDOCK—ICNAF QUOTA PROGRAM—PROCEDURE FOR RECORD-KEEPING AND ENFORCEMENT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): My question is intended for the Minister of Fisheries; in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. It relates to the minister's press release of February 9 in which he stated that all ICNAF member nations will be limited to a quota of 12,000 and 18,000 metric tons of haddock in two areas. Could the Parliamentary Secretary inform us whether a procedure to cover record-keeping and enforcement of this quota program, including the type of fishing gear used, has been worked out and agreed upon by all ICNAF countries?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): I shall have to take that question as notice. I have listened to some of the discussions; I do not think they have yet been completed.

INFORMATION CANADA

ISSUING OF NEWS RELEASE FOLLOWING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I wish to ask the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada whether Information Canada will be issuing a news release at the close of the dominion-provincial conference tomorrow?

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio. In view of the minister's statement on television on Saturday evening assuring the people that Information Canada would not promote anything that had not been passed by Parliament, I should like the minister to say how he can justify taking over the administration of a new body which itself has not been established by Parliament?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is argumentative.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CHEMICAL AND BIOLOGICAL WEAPONS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In light of the decision announced by President Nixon in respect of extending the ban on germ or chemical warfare weapons to include chemical toxins, will the Acting Prime Minister consider making a statement to the House concerning the position of the Canadian government in respect of the production, development and storage in Canada of such chemical and biological weapons.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The government has under consideration a statement on its whole position in this field which includes the problem involved in the question asked by the hon. member. I should think it would be included in the statement Canada would be making at the opening of the resumed disarmament discussions in Geneva.

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL STRIKE—ACTION BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Communications. Could he tell us if the mail is now moving in Montreal or whether he has any report on the present situation there?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I regret to say that the situation has deteriorated in Montreal this morning. As a result officials of the department have been in touch with the CSN. I have asked them to come up here tomorrow morning at which time I intend to make clear to them that if the illegal, irresponsible and violent strike of recent weeks does not terminate the government will have no choice but to take extraordinary measures.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED MISUSE OF BAND FUNDS BY GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or his Parliamentary Secretary with regard to the question I asked last Friday. Has the minister yet completed his inquiry into the allegations of irregularities on the part of departmental officials made by Indians of the Assumption Band Reserve, allegations which were made some time ago? Is he able now to report on this matter?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the inquiries are still continuing. The minister hopes he may be in a position to report tomorrow.

Mr. Baldwin: In view of the fact that the telegram from the Indian Band Council contains a request for a parliamentary inquiry, would the parliamentary secretary bring to the attention of the minister and the chairman of the appropriate committee the desirability of having a very careful and detailed parliamentary inquiry in respect of these allegations?

Mr. Honey: This will be given consideration, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—ADEQUACY OF ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege arising out of the answer given today to question No. 1,033 which was placed on the Order Paper on February 2. The question was:

1. Under the Regional Development Incentives Act, in what places or areas in (a) Manitoba, (b) Quebec, (c) New Brunswick, (d) Newfoundland, (e) Ontario, were expenditures of moneys approved up to the end of December 31, 1969?

2. What was the amount of such expenditures for each of said projects?

The answer is not in keeping with the rules and indeed is a facetious brush-off. It is as follows:

This information was contained in the reports respecting the administration of the Regional Development Incentives Act tabled on October 27, 1969, December 4, 1969, and January 12, 1970.

Sir, I submit that the fact the government will have egg on its face if it answers properly is no justification for such an answer.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to inquire into the matter and report on Wednesday.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

NATIONAL HEALTH PLAN PAYMENTS FOR OPTOMETRIC SERVICES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence may I direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary who may wish to take it as notice and reply tomorrow. Now that a consensus has been reached among the provinces regarding optometric services, can the minister advise when these services will be acceptable for cost-sharing payments under the national health plan?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

NATIONAL ARTS CENTRE

USE BY THOSE WITH LOW INCOMES

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the observations made by the chairman of the board of trustees of the National Arts Centre regarding use of the centre by unemployed persons, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he would urge the board to give favourable consideration to use of the centre by people in the low income brackets such as old age pensioners and others?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making a representation which he must assume will be noted by the minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SASKATCHEWAN—DECISION ON EXTENSION OF DESIGNATED AREAS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion I should like to direct my question to his Parliamentary Secretary. Could the Parliamentary Secretary inform the House whether a decision has been taken on proposals made recently to extend designated areas in Saskatchewan under the Regional Development Incentives Act? If so, could he inform the House of the decision?

Mr. Speaker: I would point out that it has been suggested on previous occasions that this kind of information should be given by way of a statement on motions or the question might be placed on the Order Paper. If there is particular urgency in respect of the specific question, the minister might be allowed to reply.

Mr. Burton: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that there have been developments since this subject was last referred to in the House. It is a matter requiring urgent consideration and I would hope the Parliamentary Secretary might be able to respond.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I will bring the question to the minister's attention.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister of Labour indicate whether there is any hope for an early conclusion of the Vancouver longshoremen's strike?

An hon. Member: It is over.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): It was over on Friday and the men returned to work on Saturday.

ROYAL VISIT

GRANTING OF AMNESTY TO INMATES OF FEDERAL PRISONS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I had better preface my question to the Solicitor General by saying I have been home during the past week and therefore the information I am about to seek may have been given. I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether the government, in taking account of Her Majesty's visit to Canada this year, is considering the use of the Royal prerogative to grant a special amnesty to inmates in federal prisons?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. I will pay attention to the representations made by the hon. member, but I have nothing further to add to the answer I gave a week or ten days ago.

IMMIGRATION

DEPORTATION OF DESERTERS FROM U.S. ARMED FORCES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General. Has the minister completed the inquiry into allegations of improper activity by officers of the RCMP in respect of the deportation of three Americans on January 25?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No.

Mr. Nystrom: Could the minister indicate to the House when he expects the completion of the inquiry?

Mr. McIlraith: I expect to have the report within a few days—the sooner the better. However, until we find all the witnesses it is useless for me to use a crystal ball.

Mr. Nystrom: Will the minister undertake to make a statement on motions to the House when the report is completed?

Mr. McIlraith: I have already said in answer to the hon. member who raised the question a few days ago that I would give an answer to the questions posed by him. The nature of any answer and whether it would be on motions or otherwise will have to be determined when we see what the information is.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): When the minister said he was endeavouring to find the various witnesses, did he imply that the three individuals who were allegedly deported unlawfully will be consulted as potential witnesses, or that their side of the question will be reviewed and considered?

Mr. McIlraith: It is very doubtful whether we will be able to interview them, but I should add that I am quite sure the right hon. gentleman would be the first to check me if I were to attempt to bring in an incomplete report to the House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, of course I want a complete report, and they are the people who know all about it.

AGRICULTURE

INVESTIGATION OF REMOVAL OF SERIAL PLATES FROM IMPORTED TRACTORS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I have a question for the Solicitor General. In view of the answer given by the Minister of Agriculture, as recorded at page 2531 of Hansard, with regard to the removal of serial plates on tractors imported from England, in which the minister suggested that "the police were informed of that some time ago", and in view of the answer received today that the RCMP had not been informed of this incident, will the minister now say whether or not he will have a complete investigation conducted into this affair?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker, but the Solicitor General will look at the answer given today to see whether the representation made by the hon. member requires attention, and if it does it will be given immediate attention.

CANADA LABOUR (SAFETY) CODE

INQUIRY AS TO IMPLEMENTATION OF REGULATIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. It relates to the Canada Labour (Safety) Code which Parliament passed, because it was urgent to do so, three years ago last December. Can the minister say whether the various sets of regulations to be passed under that Act have not been put into effect?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): As the hon. member pointed out, there are various sets of regulations. If he would put the question in writing I would be able to give him a detailed report. I would prefer to do it that way so as not to mislead the House unintentionally.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With the information which he has on his desk, can the minister tell the House whether the safety regulations respecting the railroad industry have been passed?

Mr. Mackasey: The information on my desk does not tell me this, however, I will find out for the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to suggest to the hon. member and to the minister that perhaps this is the type of question which should normally be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That would take a year.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPREME COURT ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING APPEALS

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-182, to amend the Supreme Court Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Briefly speaking, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to broaden the access to the Supreme Court of Canada, particularly on matters involving disputes in law, mixed law and fact, and in disputes that may originate from federal administrative tribunals in this country. While broadening the access to the court, the bill tends to reduce those appeals involving matters of fact alone that would now get there "as of right", in order to allow the Supreme Court of Canada more opportunity in its heavier role to deal with matters involving the constitution, matters of federal and provincial statutory import, and matters of legal importance. In other words, this would relieve the court of some of the burden of reviewing cases involving mere factual appraisal and would give the court more opportunity to review matters of law.

I might say that in matters of import, any provincial court of appeal can still grant leave and will be able to grant leave to the Supreme Court of Canada on any matter, whether of fact, of law or of mixed fact and law, and indeed the Supreme Court of Canada retains its power to grant leave to appeal to the highest court in this country on matters of law, mixed fact and law, or matters of fact. So, by leave of the Supreme Court of Canada or of the provincial court of appeal there will continue to be complete access to the highest court. What we are doing here is eliminating to a certain degree appeals "as of right" involving mere factual matters.

The Bill does not deal with the structure of the court or with the constitutional position of the court but merely with certain housekeeping items and certain methods of appeal from the lower courts to the high court.

I wonder whether, before I give a cursory explanation of the bill—because the bill if adopted on second reading here will go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—I might, with the consent of the House, include two tables in Hansard. One table deals with the numerical summary of cases heard by the Supreme Court of Canada between 1955 and 1969, and the second table lists the number of motions heard in the Supreme Court of Canada between 1955 and 1969; in both cases the years are inclusive. These tables will illustrate, for the benefit of the House, the increase in the volume of business before the Supreme Court. Perhaps I might have the consent of the House to have those two tables printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: The text of the foregoing tables is as follows:]

Motions heard in Supreme Court of Canada, 1955-1969: 1955, 10; 1956, 10; 1957, 12; 1958, 48; 1959, 66; 1960, 89; 1961, 73; 1962, 104; 1963, 87; 1964, 89; 1965, 110; 1966, 99; 1967, 130; 1968, 139; 1969, 129.

Quebec	153	198	162
Ontario	229	174	267
Total	537	569	644

The above summaries do not include motions in Court which have increased from 10 in 1955 to 129 in 1969. This increase results from amendments to the Criminal Code and the Supreme Court Act in 1956.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Without going into a clause by clause analysis of the bill, which would be trespassing on the rules of the House at this stage, I should like to describe four amendments of primary significance. The first is that all the applications for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada shall in the future, with the exception of cases involving an offence punishable by death, be heard by three judges of the Supreme Court. It is the general rule now that three judges should be petitioned for leave to appeal, but there are still a number of statutes on the books which allow a petition for leave to appeal to be heard by one judge alone. It seems to me that this is too restrictive and that one judge of the Supreme Court of Canada should not himself have the jurisdiction to decide whether the court should hear a matter of importance. As I said, applications for leave to appeal involving offences punishable by death will continue to be dealt with by a quorum of five judges.

The second matter to which I should like to draw the attention of the House is the amendment I have already described to section 36 of the Supreme Court Act which is the general section giving a right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada on matters of law, mixed law and fact, and fact.

Under the present law that section gives a right of appeal "as of right" when the matter in dispute is over $10,000. The proposed amendment will confine the grounds of appeal to questions that are not questions of fact alone. As I said, section 36 deals with appeals "as of right". The fact that we are restricting "as of right" appeals to matters of fact alone does not mean that factual cases cannot still get to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of leave granted by a provincial court of appeal or by leave granted by the Supreme Court of Canada if, in the opinion of either court, the matter is of sufficient importance, albeit a factual matter, that it deserves to be heard by the court.

The third aspect of the bill to which I should like to draw the attention of the House deals with habeas corpus. The Supreme Court Act now vests jurisdiction in the judges of the court to issue writs of habeas corpus in criminal cases. This jurisdiction is concurrent with that of the judges of the superior courts of the provinces. By that is meant that an imprisoned person may seek a writ of habeas corpus from either a judge of the Supreme Court or a judge of a provincial superior court.

Prior to 1965 there was no appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of habeas corpus in criminal matters from decisions of Superior Court judges of provincial courts, but in 1965 the Criminal Code was amended to provide for appeals in matters of habeas corpus from provincial superior courts, through the appeal procedures to the Supreme Court of Canada. Now that access to the Supreme Court from judges of superior provincial courts is provided for, respecting habeas corpus in criminal matters, it is considered unnecessary that the concurrent original jurisdiction should be continued.

Finally, by way of a fourth point, appeals may now be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada which circumvent provincial courts of appeal with leave of those courts if the parties consent and the amount in controversy exceeds $2,000. It is proposed that the granting of leave be vested in the Supreme Court rather than the provincial courts and that the requirement concerning $2,000 be dispensed with.

The bill contains a number of additional amendments of lesser significance which might be described as housekeeping amendments relating to notices of appeal, deposit of security, supplementary rules of procedure and the use of law stamps. With two exceptions, the amendments contained in this bill are the same as those included in the bill to amend the Supreme Court which was introduced in the Senate as a government measure on September 24, 1968, and passed by the Senate on October 23 of that same year. I want to deal with the two differences.

The first exception is that in the Senate bill it was proposed to amend section 36 of the Supreme Court Act to provide that the right of appeal thereunder was on a question of law alone. As already indicated, this new bill amends section 36 to provide that an appeal lies on a question that is not a question of fact alone, thereby allowing for appeals as of right under that section on questions of mixed law and fact. This change was made after receiving representations from the Canadian Bar Association which struck a special committee to review the earlier bill, and that committee was of the view that to provide a right of appeal on a question of law alone was too confining.

The Senate bill also proposed increasing the figure of $2,000 to $10,000 in respect of those appeals already mentioned which can be taken to the Supreme Court without prior determination by provincial courts of appeal. This would have brought the monetary figure of those appeals in line with those in section 36.

This proposal ran into considerable opposition when the bill was before the Senate, and indeed from certain hon. members in this chamber, on the ground that it would reduce the public's access to the Supreme Court. As leave to appeal to the Supreme Court will have to be obtained, from the Supreme Court it is not considered necessary to have any monetary limit. If on an application for leave to appeal the Supreme Court considers the appeal has merit it should and will go forward regardless of the amount involved.

That is a brief summary of the purport of the bill, Mr. Speaker, and if the bill receives approval on second reading and moves to committee, then of course in the usual way we can deal with the clauses in detail.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I might say at the outset that we on this side of the chamber certainly endorse the bill going to committee, and we wish to congratulate the minister on the changes that he has made from the bill that was debated in this House on October 7, 1968. I am very happy to see the monetary requirement taken out of the previous bill. As I said on that occasion, when the Senate proposed to change the amount from $2,000 to $10,000:

> I am against such a step on two grounds. Over the week end Senator Roebuck said—and I agree with him—that we are really shutting the door of justice in the Supreme Court of Canada to citizens of the country if we enact a provision stipulating that cases before that court must involve $10,000 or a question of law. The average citizen of Canada will be denied the right to go before the highest court of the land, which to me is a very dangerous approach to justice.

There is no doubt that the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada are over-worked. But there are two ways to get around the problem. One is to increase the number of judges of the Supreme Court, and the other is to provide them with the assistance that U.S. Supreme Court judges receive. In the United States, Supreme Court judges have the assistance of young lawyers of top scholarship, who help in the writing of their judgments. Here in Canada with respect to the Supreme Court we must preserve what is good. As Thomas Jefferson once said:

> We owed it to do, not what was to perish with ourselves, but what would remain, to be respected and preserved through other ages.

The proposed amendment to the original bill S-8, which is now S-182, which changes the words "on a question of law" to "on a question which is not a question of fact alone" is a good amendment.

It is a fundamental principle in any appellate court, whether it be in the appeal court of a province or whether it be in the Supreme Court of Canada, where there is a question of fact and fact alone there can be no appeal. As Your Honour knows, the trial judges are the lords and masters of the facts. Once they have properly and in accordance with the rules of evidence found the facts, those facts are the facts of the case. However, if wrong inferences are drawn from the evidence, or a finding of fact by a trial judge is based either on no evidence or wrong evidence, then that becomes a question of law, or at least a question of mixed fact and law.

It has always been a good rule of law that the Courts of Appeal are in as good a position to draw inferences as a trial judge. Therefore, I congratulate the minister on accepting our viewpoint, and agreeing to appeals, to use the proper terminology, "on a question which is not a question of fact alone."

I have said over and over again in this House, and maybe that is one contribution which I have made, that there should not be a law for the rich and another one for the poor.

It is in the application of the law that discrimination arises. Therefore, to base the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada on monetary amounts is wrong in principle, contrary to natural justice, and is a carry-over of the old laissez-faire philosophy.

I hope that when this bill is studied by the committee it will be seen that the appellant will have two methods of proceeding. One is to apply for leave to appeal prior to the hearing. That of course cuts down the costs because it does not require that the appeal books be printed. On the other hand, if the appellant wishes to appeal direct without that leave, I trust the bill provides that he may do so but he must satisfy the court that the matter involved does not concern a question of fact alone.

I do not know of any better rule than that the trial judges should be the lords and masters of the facts. But it does give a trial judge real power, and it is a known fact that sometimes facts are shaped and trimmed, stated and restated in order that an appeal cannot go any further because the facts are all tied up. The finding of a fact by the trial judge is all powerful, and as I understand reviews of the appeals of the Supreme Court of Canada made by a research group, and covered recently in Maclean's magazine, trial judges' judgments in Canada are restored more often by the Supreme Court of Canada than the reverse.

• (3:10 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Always.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody says always, and he is correct. Putting it another way, when provincial appellate courts endeavour to interpret the facts as being a mixed question of fact and law, the Supreme Court of Canada very often reverses the Provincial Appellate court. It is, therefore, important, in the light of this fact, that our appeal courts be made up of very strong men and good men. We have a good court of appeal in western Canada. If I may digress I would say that the new judge, Mr. Clermont, Q.C., an able lawyer who has been appointed to the Appeal Court of Alberta, will be an asset to that court. His appointment is in keeping with the high tradition which has been followed by the various ministers of justice throughout time.

I now turn to a recommendation I should like to make. Having congratulated the minister, I must now say that I feel one thing has been overlooked. I should like to refer to a case that stands unchallenged and unchanged by this bill, and I hope the committee will do something about it. The case is Goldhar v. The Queen, and the citation is 1960 Supreme Court of Canada Reports, page 60. This appeal concerns the right of the Supreme Court of Canada to hear an appeal as to sentence. It was held, with dissent, that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal against a sentence imposed for the commission of an indictable offence. Now, on the face of it, one would say you have your courts of appeal in the provinces and that would be sufficient review. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to your attention and to the minister's attention the situation which results from a social problem now existing in our society. Because of the widespread use of drugs by young people across the nation, certain apparent injustices occur.

If we had a computer and fed into it the data covering all the charges laid concerning drugs, the election made by Crown counsel whether to proceed under the Narcotics Control Act or the Food and Drugs Act—which makes an awful difference to the kind of sentence handed out—the age of the people charged, whether 15, 16, 17, 21 or older and whether the trial was by judge and jury, judge alone or magistrate, we would be shocked at the variation between the sentences imposed in one part of the country as against another, on an identical charge. Sentences vary from a fine, a heavy fine, to incarceration for a year or two years. When the courts deal with incarceration, because of the provisions of the Narcotics Control Act, sentences for trafficking vary from seven years to life. This is entirely different from the Food and Drug Act under which it is much easier to proceed by summary conviction and that could lead to a variation in sentence from one year to five years for 18 and 16 year olds.

What we need, Mr. Speaker, is uniformity in sentencing, whether a man or woman lives in British Columbia, the Maritimes or Ontario. If the charge is identical, then so should the sentence be. Of course, without being critical, you cannot get uniformity by merely passing an act which provides a maximum of seven years or life for trafficking in a narcotic. What you can do is try to get uniformity in the courts of appeal and in the decisions of trial judges.

Now where does the Goldhar case fit into the situation? Since the minister has taken my advice on the amendment with reference to the monetary situation, I hope he might also take my advice with reference to the Goldhar v. the Queen case. The decision in that case reads:

> This Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal against a sentence imposed for the commission of an indictable offence.

The indictable offence in this case involved trafficking in narcotics in British Columbia. The sentence was appealed on the grounds that it was too stiff. The Supreme Court of Canada never considered the duration of the sentence but only whether they had a right to hear the appeal.

The first point I want to make clear is that if the Supreme Court of Canada were given the right to review the sentence—under certain circumstances it may be more a question of asking for leave than getting some rules laid down—we should not find a situation where a person charged with trafficking got anywhere from one to five to seven years, depending on the judge or how the people in that particular region feel.

When this bill comes before committee I would hope it would be amended to make certain that the Supreme Court of Canada can hear appeals as to sentence. The law is not an exact science and in the Goldhar case the present Chief Justice, a very distinguished jurist and scholar, dissented, but the court ruled that:

> This Court has no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal against a sentence imposed for the commission of an indictable offence.

After reviewing the law, Justice Fauteux, who wrote the judgment for the majority, stated:

> For these reasons, I am clearly of the view that nowhere in the relevant provisions of the new Code—

He is not referring to the last amendment, but when the Code was completely overhauled a few years ago.

> —did Parliament indicate, either in express terms or by clear implication, any intent to alter the prior state of the law, under which there is no appeal to this court in the matter of sentence.

In other words, section 44 of the Supreme Court of Canada Act did not change the law and there is no right of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, either with leave or without leave, on a question of sentence.

In Alberta, young men and women were given five years for various offences under the Narcotics Control Act. The Appeal Court reviewed those sentences and cut them to two years less a day. This is a great difference. As the minister pointed out, some of the young people did not have the means to retain counsel. One young person has written to me that he pleaded guilty before a magistrate and got three years. This was before the decision by the Court of Appeal. Another young person was sentenced to four years, signed a waiver of appeal and now has no right of appeal. His offence was no more serious than some others who did have counsel and had the money to go to the Appeal Court. Surely, that is injustice. The only hope I have lies with the parole board which does such a fine job in these cases, sometimes allowing young people daily leave in order that they can take employment.

I have told the minister that I will go along with the changes in the act but that we should make certain that anyone who has been found guilty or who has even pleaded guilty to an indictable offence and feels that he did not get justice should be able to take the matter further, even to the Supreme Court of Canada. Rules should be laid down to be followed by trial judges in order that there be uniformity in the law. This is my recommendation, Mr. Speaker, and my party's recommendation. Since the minister accepted our other recommendations, I trust the committee will accept this one.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, as the minister said, the amendments proposed in Bill C-182, an act to amend the Supreme Court of Canada Act, are largely concerned with technical matters; a tidying up, not really earth-shaking legislation. I suggest to the minister that while we appreciate this and are in general agreement with the proposals, the act nevertheless requires a thorough going revision and review. Anyone who has had occasion to worry about the Supreme Court of Canada Act knows it is complicated, obscure and antiquated. Although the bill seeks to tidy up the act, may I commend to the minister, in the spirit of the federal law commission he has just announced, that the act be looked into as a whole. I think it ought to be rationalized, brought up to date and made clearer for those who wish to understand it.

It is also true that the present act does not raise any fundamental issues with regard to the composition of tribunals. May I sound a conservative note here and say that when this matter is considered I hope we will not rush headlong into the United States practice of having such appointments considered by the Senate, the House or any committee of either body. I would sooner rely on the good sense of the minister, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his colleagues, no matter what party is in power, to avoid partisan and improper appointments, than see appointments to the judiciary treated as a matter sensitive to political agitation.

Before dealing with the actual amendments before us, may I say a word about the Supreme Court of Canada as an institution. We hardly appreciate in Canada that this institution is of major and fundamental importance to our entire parliamentary democracy and that it is a tremendously important part of our constitutional set-up. Yet in the words of the poet whose name I forget, it is unwept, unhonoured and unsung. Not only that, but the proceedings of our Supreme Court of Canada in large part are unobserved. I think that is wrong. In our country the Supreme Court of Canada is as important an institution as the Supreme Court of the United States is in the United States. The names of United States Supreme Court judges are household words. Hordes of tourists pour through the United States Supreme Court buildings, and they have to be turned out at 15 minute intervals. The personalities of the judges are scrutinized to see if they are of conservative or liberal temperament—and I use these terms in the non-political sense.

Yet in Canada, somehow or other, our people overlook the importance of this most important institution. If the government sums up enough courage to bring in a firm form of income control, the whole matter could become a constitutional issue which the court will have to determine. It is my hope that it will be determined quickly by a reference. If the government does what I think is its duty to combat inflation, it will deal firmly and effectively with this subject. The matter of whether the government, under the constitution, has authority to bring in such a far reaching measure is also something the Supreme Court of Canada may have to decide.

We hear much these days about the subject of pollution and the House has before it a bill respecting water quality. Before the Committee on National Resources and Public Works, experts the other day were discussing the question of who has jurisdiction in this field. Personally, I am of the view that the co-operation of all levels of government is necessary. But in the final analysis, I believe that there is a firm constitutional responsibility on Parliament and the Government of Canada to deal with this all pervasive subject of pollution. If it is to be dealt with, then sooner or later and I hope sooner rather than later, it will have to be considered by the Supreme Court of Canada. The life, fate and well-being of Canada rests with that court. The Supreme Court of Canada is a very human institution, but it is a great institution nevertheless.

I know of no man who was more highly respected as a judge than the late Chief Justice Duff, before whom I had the honour, as have other hon. members here no doubt, of appearing on several occasions. There have been few greater minds in any court in any part of the world. Also, I think it is appropriate at this time to pay a tribute to the Chief Justice of Canada, Chief Justice Cartwright, who is to retire I think at the end of this month. He is a great judge and a great gentleman. In view of his imminent retirement, I think it is perfectly proper for me to pay a tribute to him in this House.

The Supreme Court of Canada has been the guardian of the fundamental rights of Canadians. One could refer to a whole line of cases that bears this out. The court brought down what is known as an unofficial bill of rights; it struck out the infamous Padlock Act; it decided against the Press Act of Alberta; in the Boucher case it brought down a judgment which limited sedition to a reasonable scope and prevented charges of sedition being used to suppress fundamental freedoms of speech. In the Roncarelli case a provincial prime minister was required to pay damages for intimidation of the man who was only trying to assist in administration by giving bail to a witness of Jehovah. In a recent case involving only $10 the Supreme Court of Canada gave leave to an appellant to appeal because the court was of the view that a fundamental right was involved, the right of a citizen to post on his own home an election sign saying, "Vote for Joe Bloe", or whatever the name might be. The Supreme Court of Canada, by a five to four decision, held that what was done constituted an attempt by way of municipal bylaw to infringe on political rights of Canadians. Having been a successful counsel, I naturally think that this was an excellent decision.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Your client had a perfect right to post his notice, but he showed bad political judgment.

Mr. Brewin: I have said enough to indicate that what we are now discussing, the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Canada, is of very great importance. The court itself is most important as a Canadian institution.

Perhaps I ought not to deal with the details of the bill since I can speak on those when the bill goes before the committee. I submit that the provision that applications for leave to appeal must be heard by three judges is excellent. In the Truscott case only one judge made the decision with respect to leave for appeal. I think the Supreme Court of Canada ought to have reviewed the case ab initio instead of reviewing it only after great public clamor. I approve of the amendment to section 36 which provides that appeals to the Supreme Court lie on questions that are not questions of fact alone. That makes sense. The Supreme Court, after all, is a most important tribunal and must deal with important matters involving the constitution. It is primarily a court of law and must determine what the law is. I think it is well to allow the lower courts to determine questions of fact as a general rule.

The amendment with regard to habeas corpus sounded very reasonable and logical according to the ministers' explanation, but I shall have to look into it more closely because, after all, habeas corpus is a writ affecting the liberty of the subject and we must examine carefully this ancient right. We know that appeals from provincial courts may be adequate in such matters; nevertheless, I reserve my right to comment on this amendment at a later stage in the proceedings. There is a provision which would allow appeals to circumvent provincial courts, to use the language of the minister, and make the hearing of them depend on leave instead of a monetary limit. That is sound. I entirely agree with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that appeals should not be measured out by the exact monetary amount involved.

We will not obstruct or delay the passage of this particular bill. It is a small bill, a tidying up bill. We not only take this opportunity to pay tribute to the court, but also to say to the minister the court could be even more effective if a thorough job was done in revising this act. By relying on the tidying up processes, there is sometimes a tendency to confuse the unfortunate members of the law profession, because they have to follow all the amendments from time to time. That is not easy. I would like to see the whole act subjected to careful scrutiny, rationalized and made dependent in nearly every case on the leave of the Supreme Court of Canada because that court is best able to judge the cases which have significance as a whole. I think they can be trusted to grant leave to appeal where real issues of law or liberty emerge, and where issues of the rights of Canadians are seriously endangered.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I want to thank the House for the speedy disposition of the last bill. I have had it indicated to me from all sides of the House that there is a willingness to move into the private members' hour at this stage because of the change in the order of business. I wonder whether that agreement has been relayed to Your Honour?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed the House now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is understood that according to the Standing Orders there is a limit of one hour for the consideration of private members' business which will be before the House at this time. I have been given to understand it is the wish of the House that we rise immediately thereafter to give hon. members an opportunity to prepare for the debate which will be called later on.

Pursuant to special order, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills.

Mr. Forest: I understand the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is on his way and will be here in a minute to discuss his bill. He is ready to proceed.

Mr. Woolliams: We have just been too fast, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Brewin.]

Mr. Speaker: I find it difficult to agree with that suggestion. If it is the wish of the House, we shall wait a moment until the hon. member for Parkdale arrives so that the motion can be put to the House.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTION THAT TAXES AND RENTAL PAYMENTS BE MADE DEDUCTIBLE

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes and rental payments of accommodation by tenants to be deductible from federal personal income tax up to a maximum allowable of five hundred dollars each year.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to introduce again in this House a motion designed to come to the relief of the over-burdened Canadian taxpayers. In doing so, I hope to bring to the attention of the federal government, and especially to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the urgent need to ease the great burden of the Canadian taxpayer who is not only heavily taxed but, in some cases, the victim of double taxation.

It is my opinion, one which I believe is shared by many people, that those who dwell in owner-occupied homes as well as those who live in rooming houses and apartments deserve favourable consideration from the Minister of Finance. The growth of our cities in Canada is reaching a critical point. The federal government has a stake in the provision of financing for houses as well as the provision of incentives leading to the creation of greater employment opportunities for city dwellers and to lend money to the municipalities to enable them to provide such essential services as education, protection, and measures to reduce pollution. However, the extent to which the federal government can be involved in the affairs of our cities is limited by the terms of the British North America Act, and provincial governments, which have most responsibility for land use planning, regional economic planning, regional servicing and education have, unfortunately, not yet produced adequate policies and programs to deal with the problems of our urban areas.

Most of these fields have traditionally been left to local municipalities whose power to raise money to keep abreast of the demand for more services caused by increased industrialization and growing urban population is limited. And so we are subjected to increased municipal taxes every year. In his inaugural address to the Toronto City Council on January 7, 1970, the Mayor of Toronto stated:

> If there was one message which came through loud and clear during the last municipal election, it was the appeal from home-owners of this city that they cannot afford to pay higher taxes.

Among other things, Mr. Speaker, the mayor also stated that he was most disappointed to see no mention in the federal government's white paper on tax reform of a resolution which was considered by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities calling for a new provision to allow municipal property taxes to be deducted from individual taxable income. Such a provision is allowed in the United States and it avoids the injustice of forcing a homeowner to pay a tax on income which had already been taxed.

A person paying property tax is, in effect, paying a double tax. The hard-earned money with which Canadians pay their property taxes has already been taxed to death by provincial and federal governments. Many tax experts have described residential taxes as being inequitable and regressive bearing heavily upon those who can afford to pay them least. At the present time, property taxes paid by businessmen are deductible; property tax paid by apartment-owners is also a deductible item. Single-family zoned homes rented to tenants fall into the same category. Furthermore, the owner of an apartment building can take advantage of corporate tax law by deducting his operating costs, mortgage interest costs and municipal taxes whereas dwellers of owner-occupied homes, like tenants in boarding houses and apartments, get no such relief when computing their federal income tax.

Reading the speeches and resolutions of the mayors and councillors of Canadian municipalities it becomes obvious that there is a growing dissatisfaction with the senior levels of government for failing to give the subject of municipal taxation the attention which it deserves. The rumblings of discontent are growing louder each day. I believe it is imperative that the Minister of Finance, together with his provincial counterparts, give this matter serious attention, and, I hope, favourable consideration.

House and property stand at the centre of most people's lives. Proper shelter means security. It also means independence and privacy. It contributes to a better family life and to conditions which make it more satisfactory to raise a family. Unfortunately, the increase in the housing costs index between 1964 and 1967 showed it to be the most rapidly rising component of consumer prices in that period.

Senior citizens are particularly at a disadvantage as far as municipal taxes are concerned. I am sure hon. members would agree that inflation has most affected those who lived on fixed incomes. Older people with limited retirement incomes are obliged to exist on small pensions. In their earlier years senior citizens denied themselves many things in order to pay off mortgaged homes. Today they find themselves faced with ever-increasing municipal taxes. Many of them are forced to sell their homes and live in apartments. But tenants in apartment houses also face rent increases whenever municipal taxes rise.

By supporting this motion, hon. members will make it possible not only for those who reside in owner-occupied homes but also for people who live in boarding houses and apartments to claim an exemption in connection with their personal income tax. This would ease the intolerable load of taxation which is now such a heavy burden on Canadians. I believe the finance committee of the House of Commons should consider the subject matter of this motion in the course of its study of tax reform. I hope the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray), who assists the Minister of Finance, will support my motion as he supported a similar motion which I presented to the House during the last session of Parliament.

Mr. Speaker, this is a rare opportunity for us to reduce federal income taxes. I am sure the people of Canada would welcome action of the kind proposed in the motion, and this is why I appeal to all hon. members to support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I had not intended, Mr. Speaker, to take part in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz), but I learned of it earlier this afternoon while I was on the plane with him, and I thought it was a particularly interesting motion inasmuch as the opinion expressed in it has been a platform of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition.

What originally concerned me was that in referring to tenants there might have been a certain amount of discrimination with the result that one section of society, the householders, would be given a tax advantage while another, those who were renting accommodation, would receive no such benefit. I was, therefore, pleased to see by the terms of the hon. member's motion that there is to be no such discrimination—that the proposal covers both householders and those who are renting. In these circumstances, I am pleased to speak in favour of the motion; it appears that even though the government is attempting to discourage home ownership, to judge from some of the proposals in the white paper on tax reform, here is a parliamentary secretary who believes the time has come to give a break to those who own or rent homes.

I should like to say that, on the one hand, we have a government member attempting to bring relief or some incentive in respect of home ownership, while at the same time, his party is proposing reforms or changes to our tax structure which would hamper the small businessman. It is unquestionable that he has played a great role in respect of home ownership. Further, we say that this white paper, in effect indicates there is a desire on the part of the government to bring homes into a proposed capital gains structure. These two things indicate there is something wrong in respect of the thinking of the government. I am glad to see that my hon. friend has now set the government back on a proper course. Perhaps he might refer the matter to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing, and they might look upon his motion with some sympathy.

I think it is time we started to realize that the home owner, as was so adequately stated by the parliamentary secretary, has been undergoing tax frustration which leads him to the point where he says, well, what is the sense in owning my home. It is not necessary to refer to the white paper. However, I think this motion would give an incentive to the home owner in the form of some tax relief. What about those on fixed incomes and those on pensions who also need a break? Apparently they are not to be given a break. It would appear to me that if the government were sympathetic to the hon. member's motion, relief would be given. The government might then be in a position to say, this is the just society and we are attempting to bring the legislation into line to show that we are giving some thought to those people on the bottom of the economic ladder, that we have heart, contrary to what a former secretary of state actually indicated.

I should like to mention another point with regard to the motion. There has been a suggestion that the government cannot move in respect of the municipalities because the municipalities are the creatures of the provinces. It is suggested this creates a constitutional hang-up, which is amazing. Here we have a motion, the effect of which would be to give direct assistance to those affected by urban living. In this motion we are saying that, regardless of the constitution and the fact that the municipalities are creatures of the provinces, we can become involved and therefore can entertain such a motion which would give some assistance. I should like to point out that although it might seem at times that the constitution can be a barrier in terms of direct government intervention, in many instances this is not so. Here is one instance in which it is clear that the federal government can intervene to relieve the frustration of urban living.

I hope, as stated by the parliamentary secretary and the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing, that the Minister of Finance will be sympathetic to what we believe is a very commendable motion in view of the frustrations resulting from increased urbanization. In view of the lack of enthusiasm in respect of the government's proposed changes in taxation, and even if the government is insistent on these changes, I hope we are now at a stage, where some relief can be given those who own and rent homes. Since some members on the government side believe in this proposal I hope we are at the stage where we can say that a home can still be a man's castle and not subjected to undue taxation.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be impossible for anyone who comes from a residential urban area and who represents people on modest incomes, as I and the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) do, not to be entirely sympathetic with this resolution. The resolution calls upon the government to give consideration to granting relief in respect of taxes and rents. I should like to point out, as I believe most hon. members are aware, that no group in our population is more frustrated or feels more unhappy than that group of people on small fixed incomes whose home ownership is being threatened by the ever-rising burden of real estate and income taxes and, for that matter, the rising rentals. I do not suppose there are any members from urban areas who do not receive almost daily cries of anguish from those suffering from this situation.

I think the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is to be warmly commended for bringing in this resolution, I believe not for the first time, and for bringing this human urban problem to the attention of the House. I am not completely satisfied about the limits he proposes. I notice all that is being asked is that the government should give consideration to this matter. The government is not being asked to legislate in this regard. Certainly I think we in this party can support the resolution, although as I said I am not quite happy about the $500 deduction as the overall amount. As I read the resolution, this $500 would be deductible from the tax and not from the taxable income. I suspect some people might be beneficiaries in this regard who do not need to be beneficiaries and who are more able to pay their proper real estate and income taxes. I think that should be looked into. I think the limit of the benefits to be given should be considered. I should like to hear what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has to say about the effect of this proposal, although after having heard him I might disagree with him.

I would suggest to the hon. member who introduced this resolution there is another aspect in respect of the exemption which should be looked into. I have in mind the giving of an incentive through income tax deduction or exemption to those who improve their houses. One reason for the so-called decay or deterioration of housing in urban areas is the fact that the cost of repairs is a tremendous burden. With the tax and other burdens many owners feel they are unable to maintain their houses at proper standards. I think the matter of an exemption in respect of those home owners who spend money on repairing existing housing should be considered. The Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing is not here, but I never like to let an opportunity pass without saying in respect of the whole field of housing management that attention should be paid to the question of rehabilitating the existing stock of housing as against the necessary but not more important question of building more public housing, in particular for those in the lower income brackets.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we in this corner—perhaps I should not speak for the whole corner because I might easily be repudiated for adopting too wide a constituency, and therefore perhaps I should say we in this party—think this resolution is worthwhile because it deals with a vitally important subject. It aims in the right direction in using our tax laws to assist and benefit those who need it most. We think this is an eminently proper subject for discussion. If this resolution is passed, it might well be referred to the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so they can examine the matter and suggest alternative proposals to do what we know is of basic importance if there is to be a just society in this country, and that is to relieve the burden on the small home owner and the small income tax payer of this country.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, it seems that this motion has two objects: one is to help the citizen with his problems in financing his house, and the second is to bring about a more equitable Income Tax Act or a reformed tax act. While I am sympathetic to both goals, I do not know whether this motion is the best way of accomplishing these ends.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Here comes the hatchet.

Mr. Allmand: I am listening to the very interesting comments of my friends in the opposition and I will deal with them a little later.

Mr. Alexander: With the oh, oh's?

Mr. Allmand: I agree fully that many Canadians are having difficulty in financing their housing. They are having difficulty with their mortgage payments and their residential and school taxes. But, as I said, I have doubts as to whether this type of motion will best help these people. Last year the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) had a similar motion on the order paper but, if I remember correctly, he did not have the $500 maximum. He is nodding that he did. Several years ago I spoke on a motion such as this in which there was no maximum of $500 and which did not apply to rental. At that time I objected to the motion because I felt that the people who needed help most were not getting it. For example, those who had $100,000 or $50,000 homes were getting much larger deductions than those who had $10,000, $15,000 and $20,000 homes. I did not think it was fair that the measure to help people with their housing should be based on the value of their homes, as residential taxes are. I felt that if we wanted to help people with housing, there were better methods of doing it than merely allowing them to deduct their residential taxes.

The motion today puts a $500 maximum on this proposals, but I still feel that it does more to help those with bigger homes than those with smaller homes. While I approve of the motion because it merely states that the government should give consideration to the feasibility of these measures, I have a real question in my mind as to whether this type of measure is the best way of helping those people who have trouble in financing their own homes or in paying their rent.

Mr. Alexander: We will be discussing it in the committee.

Mr. Allmand: That may be the best way, but this is not a motion for second reading of a bill which automatically goes to a committee. It is a motion that the government should give consideration to a certain measure, and I feel that this debate is an occasion when members of the House can put forward their counter proposals and their doubts concerning the motion.

As I said, like many hon. members I am very sympathetic to the problems of people who are trying to pay for their homes, and I am particularly sympathetic to those who have lower incomes and cannot purchase a home. I feel that if we introduce measures, they should be directed more to those people, and this motion does not really deal with the problem. It might be better to provide direct grants to people who are having difficulty, let us say by amending the National Housing Act, so that we might directly subsidize those on low incomes who need housing. It may be that we should give tax credits to those on medium or low incomes to help them finance their housing, or we could even provide exemptions or deductions as proposed in the motion to be applied only to those who are 65 years of age or over.

I have noted recently that several municipalities around Montreal have decided to freeze residential taxes once a person goes on pension. I think this is very worthwhile because most people buy homes in the early years of their working lives, when they are in their 30s and 40s. They buy a home looking forward to a certain income which will allow them to pay up their homes and to pay their taxes. However, what is happening is that people retire at the age of 65 on company pensions or government pensions which are more or less fixed. They have these large homes which they purchased in previous years and on which residential and school taxes are increasing, but their incomes are fixed. I congratulate those municipalities which have recognized this problem and decided to freeze residential taxes for those who have retired. Perhaps we should give this proposed exemption for rental or for taxes to people who have retired at the age of 65. Perhaps that would be more equitable.

I have other suggestions also. Perhaps for people on lower incomes we should give tax credits, or perhaps we should restrict the measure to those who really need it rather than apply it to all those who own their own homes because, as I mentioned, those with the larger homes would get larger exemptions.

This brings us to a real difficulty whenever we talk about reforms and exemptions. It is very easy for a member of Parliament or for a politician to approve new exemptions for this and new deductions for that. This is an easy way of becoming popular with a group of constituents. However, if we are to be responsible, when we propose exemptions and deductions which will mean that the government will lose a large amount of revenue—and if this measure were to be accepted the government would lose a very large amount of revenue—and if we want to maintain our government services at the same level, we should think of ways to make up that loss in revenue.

That has been one of the difficulties we had in the debate on the white paper on taxation. Many people approved increased exemptions, for example, for those people on fixed or low incomes or exemptions for people who work and who need to have day care for their children. It is easy to approve such exemptions, but those people also disapproved of the necessary measures to make up the lost revenue. As I said, if we are serious about motions such as this and we want to grant exemptions to people in certain areas in this country, if we want to grant them deductions which will cost millions or perhaps billions of dollars, we have to be ready to increase taxes in another area in order to maintain our revenue at the same level and to give the same services. Otherwise, we are being irresponsible and acting as demagogues, even though we are catering to the legitimate wish of everyone to lower the tax burden. But you cannot have it both ways. You cannot lower tax burdens and also increase services to the public. You have to deal with both problems.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) said some very fine things. However, I was a bit disappointed when he stated that the government was attempting to discourage home ownership. I thought that was very unfortunate, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether he really meant that. I do not see how anyone can seriously say the government is attempting to discourage home ownership when only two weeks ago in this House the minister responsible for housing introduced a budget for CMHC which increased its funds by $200 million. In this inflationary period, I think the government is doing its best to shift priority to housing, and within that area is attempting to shift priorities from general housing programs to public housing programs.

When a government is dealing with limited amounts of money its real problem is to allocate that money according to proper priorities. We cannot go on suggesting that exemptions be given in many, many areas, which might all be laudable, if we are not also prepared at the same time to suggest methods of making up the losses in revenue.

As I said at the beginning, Mr. Speaker, I think we should implement measures to assist the Canadian people with their housing, but I think that those measures should be implemented through the National Housing Act and not through the Income Tax Act. However, I would support this motion since it only states that the government should give consideration to the proposals contained in it. Perhaps I am wrong. Perhaps the doubts I have raised in this debate are without foundation. Perhaps we can help those on low income by proposing amendments to the Income Tax Act to allow them exemptions such as are suggested here. But while I support the motion, I have a feeling that its adoption would do more to help those who have larger incomes, who have larger homes, and would not really help those who are having difficulty either purchasing their own homes or paying the high rentals in effect today.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to go on record as saying that perhaps in my enthusiasm, listening to the hon. member when he began his remarks, I jumped to an unwarranted conclusion and threw in an "Oh, oh." I would like to withdraw that "Oh, oh" because I see that he is in favour of the motion, with certain misgivings.

Mr. Skoberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, would the House allow the hon. member who introduced the motion to clarify the $500 each year, whether it is deducted from the taxable income or the tax?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid that option is not open to us at this stage.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, of late I seem to be on my feet quite often congratulating Liberal members—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bigg: Wait for the break—for taking a personal stand which is often at some variance with the stand taken by the government. Some years ago I suggested it might be a good idea if we had an all-party caucus once a month and cleared some of the items which come up from time to time upon which there is little difference of opinion between well-meaning members of Parliament. I think this is one of those items.

There is hardly a person who does not know that the Canadian homeowner is carrying a terrible burden of double taxation. I know the argument that we have to look after the deep pocket. That is a fine argument in a socialist minded country, but it is not the only answer. There is some such thing as equity. Just because a person has made a few honest dollars I do not think governments at any level, municipal, provincial or federal, have any God given right to take all that money.

Half of the letters I get these days are about taxes. I would say that every third letter I get concerns the high taxes on private property. I am glad to see that this motion proposed by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) comes right to the point, and covers both home owners and those who rent their accommodation. Rents are exorbitantly high for the middle and lower income Canadian, who is told by his landlord that he, the landlord, faces a crushing burden of taxation. For this reason I wholeheartedly support the motion. I would not be consistent if I did not, because during every budget debate in the last 12 years I have mentioned the crushing burden of double taxation.

We often make comparisons with the situation in the country to the south of us. In the United States, some relief is given to home owners because their mortgage payments are taken into consideration in calculating income tax. Mortgage interest charges are deductible from taxable income in the United States. I am not particularly touched by the desire of the government to lend people money to build houses, because we know that the current rate of interest is 9 per cent, if not more. A sum of $200 million will not build all the houses we need in Canada, not by any means. The people who need the money the most are not in a position to pay 9 per cent interest on it.

Some 20 years ago I lived in Ottawa. At that time I could have bought any number of lots within commuting distance of Ottawa at anywhere from $200 to $300. Today those lots sell for $4,500. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Côté) are looking for other places to find money I suggest they should heavily tax the land robbers, the people who are buying up farm land around our major cities, and making young people pay $4,000 for 50 foot lots.

At present if you do not have $5,000 in hand to buy a lot you are no longer a Canadian; you have no right to live here. Or you may need to borrow $5,000 at 9 per cent interest just to buy a 50 foot lot. A great many of our young people just starting out cannot afford this, let alone the cost of a $15,000 or $16,000 house on such a lot. What are you going to do when you retire? The 500,000 civil servants in Canada today have no security of tenure. What are they going to do if they have a $5,000 lot and a $15,000 home with all the burdens of increasing taxation.

Only ten years ago I built a home in a village and my taxes were $200 a year; today they are $700. I am not blaming the municipality since everybody is asking for services and the municipalities are carrying a great deal of this cost. When the federal government wants to escape responsibility, after having brought in many socialistic ventures like medicare, they just pass the cost on to the municipalities who find it a crushing burden. Why take the money from the homeowner? Why not go where the big money is being made? Every Canadian has a right to own a home but at the present time faces a crushing burden if he earns $6,000 or $7,000 a year and is trying to raise a family.

There is nothing wrong with the principle of equalization of taxes if everybody gets the same services. In Alberta, however, you pay the same taxes in a village as in a city. For the city dweller, there is the advantage that all the family can live at home while attending school and university while it usually costs the country dweller $3,000 to $5,000 a year to send a child to university in the city.

I want to compliment the member for Parkdale for bringing up this matter. One of the reasons there is such a poor attendance in the House today is that my party has people at the Chateau Laurier working on the white paper. No doubt when the press write their reports it will be said that the Conservative Party is against the white paper and tax reform; that we represent too many of the landed aristocracy of Canada and the multimillionaires. This is nonsense. We represent tax reform on a sensible basis and we believe that taxation in Canada today is inequitable. I think we should come up with an answer and get the money to run the cities, the provinces and the country at the place where exorbitant profits are made, wherever that may be.

Before I get any suggestions from the labour side, I have a message for labour as well. I want them to draw the line somewhere. I attended a labour conference once and all I heard was that they wanted more.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Bigg: More is not good enough when you are getting enough. I am not afraid of the labour vote. Labour votes for me because I tell them the truth, that every labouring man in Canada is entitled to a good living and entitled to relief from double taxation. That is why I am even agreeing with my so-called political enemies, but my enmity remains inside this House. When I go out I shall compliment the member for Parkdale for taking a maverick stand. If enough members took the same stand we would not be down-graded by governments of all kinds, as we are. I am a maverick in my party, too. I am not afraid of big government, whether it be Conservative, Liberal, CCF, NDP or Social Credit. Give them too much power and they will abuse it.

One thing that alarmed me more than anything else was being told in this chamber that I do not amount to anything. I do not mind that; my skin is thick and my shoulders broad and I am sure I shall take worse criticism before I die. But to say that the seat I fill is not important to the people of Canada is another thing. I may not be filling it well, but the responsibility to the people of Canada remains where it has been for the last thousand years. This is the only institution I know of that lies between the taxpayers of Canada and greedy governments, call them what you will.

Members today, unfortunately, are only too prone to be yes men to the faceless group behind the government. In the 12 years that I have been here I cannot track them all down, but somewhere somebody seems to be calling the punches and some way we seem to be able to do very little about it. I still think that if every one of the 265 members got up in their places and talked they would prove that the most powerful weapon on earth to get things done is the human tongue.

I suggest that it may be important that we have an all-party caucus. It is not good enough to take the important issues facing this country and hide them in committees or in committee reports which will rest on the table forever. The only way I know that we can be effective is to get somewhere behind closed doors and get things done. We cannot wait 20 years for relief from double taxation and I do not even think that we can wait until we get a consensus in the Chateau Laurier this afternoon. Even if we did get a consensus, there are 70 Conservatives down there and we know that when they come up with their report it will be misinterpreted. Someone will say that we are against this sort of relief. But we know where the crux of the matter lies; we are not taxing the proper people. If it is socialism to say that the fellow who is making the big profit should pay big taxes I will go along with it. But I will not say it is a sin to work or to put your back into the job, and that the fellow who does the work should pay the shot for everybody who does not want to work.

Sooner or later we shall all have to say to the Canadian government that we want fewer white papers and more green paper in each pocket. Canadians want more money left in their pay envelopes after they have payed taxes to all three levels of government. It is our responsibility to tell those attending the federal-provincial conference that all three levels of government are taking more than 50 per cent out of every man's wage dollar. As members of Parliament, members of provincial legislatures or of city councils, we have arrogated unto ourselves the right of spending the taxpayers' money on project A, B, C or D or on this priority or that. I do not think the people of Canada will stand for this much longer. They do not want to see us hiding behind the constitution. We say, "Blame the provinces.". The provinces say, "Blame the federal government", and everybody says, "Blame the municipalities". The cities are here to stay and we must find some rational way of financing them. I hope the provinces are here to stay, because I would not like to see the federal government becoming so strong that provincial rights will not be respected. Believe me, regional disparities will never disappear unless the provinces remain strong and in control of their own affairs.

Mr. Gilbert: Don't talk it out, Jack.

Mr. Bigg: We cannot shrug off our responsibility by blaming someone else.

Mr. Gilbert: Don't talk it out.

Mr. Bigg: No. I will not talk it out. I have just about finished. An examination of these questions is long overdue. We should give homeowners of Canada and those paying rents in Canada immediate relief from double taxation.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Social Security—Inquiry as to tabling of white paper; the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir)—Cape Breton Development Corporation—Request by union official for apology by minister; the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—The Canadian Economy—Inflation—Alleviation of fiscal burden.

The hour for consideration of private members' business having expired, pursuant to special order of the House made earlier this day I do now leave the Chair until 8 p.m.

At 4.37 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INVESTMENT COMPANIES

MEASURE RESPECTING FURNISHING OF INFORMATION, LOANS AND INVESTMENTS, TRANSFERS OF SHARES, ETC.

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 11, consideration of the motion of Mr. Gray (for Mr. Benson) that Bill C-179, respecting investment companies, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, this is one of those rare parliamentary occasions when the background of the proposed legislation and the circumstances surrounding its introduction are more revealing and important than the terms of the bill itself. Because of this I would like to recall briefly some of the origin of Bill C-179, a pale and bloodless mutation of Bill S-17 which died unlamented at the end of last session.

In its original form as introduced by the government in the other place, the bill was sufficient to have completely altered the economic and political power structure of Canada if it had become law. The original definition of an investment company in that bill, the extraordinary powers invested in the Superintendent of Insurance—a non-elected departmental official—and other features contrary to the spirit of a democratic, free enterprise economy would have given the government more power over the general economy of the country than any Canadian government has ever had in time of peace. If Bill S-17 has passed into law in its original form, it would have affected a larger number of Canadians more directly than any other economic measure with the exception of the budget. Its true intent, I believe, was the socialization and control of investment in Canada.

It will be recalled that members of the other place became so alarmed by the radical changes proposed by this legislation that they took the unprecedented step of bypassing the law officers of Parliament and hiring outside counsel to redraft it. The bill was studied at length and in detail in committee and many expert witnesses were called. It is significant that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stubbornly declined to appear before the committee to explain the bill about which he spoke freely outside Parliament at the time. Also, the deputy minister of justice was not permitted to appear to explain the complex legal ramifications. Thanks to the alertness and determination of members of the other place, the bill was almost completely shorn of its most objectionable features and was passed on to us. It died, however, when the House of Commons rose to end the session last July. For all practical purposes the bill we are considering today is identical to the version finally accepted by the other place.

I have felt it necessary, Mr. Speaker, to recall these circumstances because I believe the original government concept of taking over a large measure of control of private investment in this country, as reflected in the original Bill S-17, is one piece in a carefully plotted program of all-embracing state control. We see signs of this in other measures the government has brought in or is planning to bring in, such as the amendments already in force to the estate tax system and the proposed tax reforms contained in the white paper.

For that reason, I do not believe this government will be content with passage of the legislation now before us. At a later date we may expect to see either tough amendments to this bill or completely new legislation that seeks to achieve what failed with the emasculation of Bill S-17. I do not believe for a minute that this government will be satisfied with anything less than complete domination of the social and economic life of Canada—overwhelming, centralized, socialist power.

As to the provisions of the bill as it is now before us, there are many points to criticize in varying degree. One of the most important omissions in the bill is that no provision is made to make privileged the information obtained from corporations by government under its terms. Communication of such information, except perhaps in certain very special circumstances, should be absolutely prohibited and penalties for breaching this prohibition should be provided in the bill. Precedents for this are to be found in the existing Statistics Act and in the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act.

In addition, there should be a provision that no public servant who during his stint with the government had access to investment companies' confidential information could divulge such information should he leave the government service for a position outside. The need for this provision is obvious in view of what occurred shortly after Bill S-17 was originally introduced. Mr. A. B. Hockin, the then assistant deputy minister of finance responsible for economic analysis and government finance who was intimately concerned with the passage of Bill S-17, left the public service on January 1 of this year to take a position with a large New York city investment house.

Such a situation would be most unjust and unfair were this bill to pass and a public servant, privy to confidential information obtained unders its provisions, decided to leave to take a position with a company that was a competitor with the others with whom he had been dealing as a representative of government. Any investment company that could lure away the Superintendent of Insurance, with no provision to make information acquired under this bill confidential, would score a great coup. There are many other areas of objection, Mr. Speaker, but many of these have already been dealt with by other speakers. I would simply make it clear that I believe the few areas where correction is indicated for the public good could be adequately taken care of by amendments to existing statutes. I do not think a new piece of legislation is necessary.

What I am chiefly concerned about is the trend, apparent in most of this government's legislation, to encroach more and more on private business and to ever further inhibit private and individual decision and initiative. We are in an era where our economic health and national development depend upon flexibility in commerce and industry and upon the ability of quick business decisions being made in order to adapt to changing circumstances. It seems to me that in legislation such as this we are continually smothering this ability.

The dead weight of bureaucracy is crushing private enterprise. Gradually, the central government is acquiring more and more control in areas it has no legitimate excuse for entering. No doubt legislation such as this will be greeted with unqualified approval by members of the New Democratic Party. After all, the theory behind legislation such as this was taken from their political manual. I hope the Canadian public will wake up and realize that the guiding principles underlying the creation of the so-called just society are socialist principles, and that today's Liberal philosophy aims at realizing the shop-worn socialist dream of rigid, centralized state control of every aspect of life. I shall watch the progress of this bill through committee with considerable interest, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a few comments before this bill receives second reading, as I suppose it will. I do so more in sorrow than in anger, though there is good occasion for anger.

First of all, I wish to point out in a related context that when the government talks about the great urgency of its legislative program—the necessity of putting through 74 bills in 73 days—we ought to view these claims with great caution. On Friday, for example, we gave second reading to an amendment to a bill which had been put through the House last June on the basis that it was desperately required. Yet when we came to debate the amendment we discovered that the bill had never been proclaimed.

Today, the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray), a very genial minister—if I hesitated then for a moment, it was not because I do not really consider him to be genial but because I was looking for another adjective to accompany the word—told the House that a bill which had been passed here two months ago, and which had been sent to the other place, would not become operative for the very reasons which we on this side had indicated were valid reasons for opposing it.

We have before us a bill which has had a most extraordinary and chequered career, as my hon. friend from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has pointed out. It was introduced in the other place last year. It was torn to pieces by the members of the other place and almost completely re-written. Then it was introduced in this House for first reading only. Today we find it brought back incorporating most of the changes made by the Senate, together with additional changes. There is no doubt we would have been led to believe that this, too, was an important measure which had to be passed last year. In view of all this, one can readily understand that we on this side are doubtful about the honesty and legitimacy of the government's claims in connection with its legislative program, and we intend to scrutinize closely whatever program is proposed to us.

As my hon. friend from Edmonton West stated, this bill was changed substantially in the Senate and is now introduced in completely different form—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I would prefer at least some of the conversations now being held between hon. members to take place behind the curtain. I am finding it difficult to hear the hon. member.

Mr. Baldwin: I thought hon. members were agreeing with what I have to say, Mr. Speaker. It might well be they could agree by voting later as we would wish them to vote. The fact remains that we are considering this evening a measure in line with a trend which has been developing for years, particularly during the present session. I have looked at this measure and I am shocked at the extent to which it would assign to the government extraordinary powers in so many ways.

I checked the bill clause by clause, and without debating the clauses in any way I wish to run down the list in order to substantiate the claim I am making. This is a government which is hungry for power. It secures power in a great many ways, particularly through its legislative program. Your Honour will find that each bill is really little more than a regulatory clause surrounded by other clauses. The one before us is a typical example.

In a dozen or more clauses authority is given to the minister and to the officials of his department to act as their whim might dictate. It is true that general and vague guidelines are laid down, but in the final analysis, with one exception where provision is made for appeal to the Exchequer Court, the minister and his officials are given complete discretion in dealing with these corporations. I do not stand here to defend the investment corporations; I hold no brief for them. I point out, however, that the two companies in respect of which problems arose and large losses were incurred by creditors, shareholders and others, were both provincially-incorporated companies. To my knowledge, no federal investment company has been required to seek assistance because of financial difficulties.

This is not to say, of course, that such a situation could not arise. Indeed, I think it is wise that a government should take precautions to protect those who need to be protected. But when we consider the extraordinary extent to which the government has gone to demand power and authority, we cannot but ask ourselves where it is going and what does it want. For example, clause 2 provides that where a company has borrowed money on the security of its bonds, the money shall be presumed to be borrowed for the purpose of investment within the meaning of the act unless the minister is satisfied to the contrary. The minister is given unrestricted discretion in deciding whether he is satisfied on this point.

I turn now to clause 3(2), which is the clause giving the minister power to grant exemptions. It states that the minister may grant exemption from the application of this act to any investment company if it is satisfied that certain things have been brought about. This discretion is given to the minister to say to a company, "We can take you out of the provisions of the Act," if he is satisfied that such-and-such are the facts. I do not know who will administer this provision. I do not know whether it will be my hon. friend or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). It may be administered by perfectly good and respectable people, but I say there should be no right to give to people involved in political life the uncontrolled power to make these judgments or decisions.

Subclause 3 gives the minister the power to revoke the exemption if he is satisfied of certain conditions. Clause 5 gives the officials of the department, particularly the Superintendent, power to require necessary information and facts. I can understand that there is a need under certain conditions for information to be made available before the provisions of the act are invoked; however, when one reads this clause one notes it permits the officials of a minister to call for company information at their uncontrolled discretion or whim.

I say that this adds to the general dangers which are built up in this legislation because of the extent to which the government is clothed with unnecessary powers. The minister is given the right to call upon the company auditors, not only for the information which they are by law compelled to give to the company but for any other particulars which the minister wants at his sole discretion or on the recommendation of the Superintendent. This is a very unusual departure in dealing with companies of this type.

The next clause is a further right on the part of the minister to grant exemptions. Clause 9(4) reads as follows:

> Where any person or group of persons is a substantial shareholder of an investment company and, as a consequence thereof and of the application of this section, certain investments are prohibited for the investment company, the minister may, by order, on application by the investment company, exempt from such prohibition any particular investment or investments of any particular class, if he is satisfied that the decision of the investment company to make or hold any investment so exempted has not been and is not likely to be influenced in any significant way by that person or group and does not involve in any significant way the interests of that person or group, apart from their interests as a shareholder of the investment company.

That is not the kind of power which should be placed in the hands of an elected politician, no matter who he may be. Hon. members of this House who have sat idly by during discussion of legislation after legislation and have permitted these powers to be given to the government some day will have to answer to the people of Canada.

In clause 15 there is a right given to the minister to prohibit any sale. No sale or disposal of the whole or any part of the undertaking of a sales finance company is of any effect unless and until it has been approved by the minister. This, also, is not the kind of power which should be placed in the hands of an elected politician. I shall not make a suggestion in respect of alternatives here, but it seems to me these are powers and authorities which heretofore have been vested in the courts. It may well be that the reasons are adequate if the government should say that for certain reasons there should be a tribunal established. But a tribunal independent and free of government influence should have the right to make these decisions. It is wrong to leave this power in the hands of the government.

The minister has the sole right to issue certificates of registry and to revoke certificates of registry of companies. Clause 21 (1) reads:

Where, in the opinion of the Superintendent, the financial condition and affairs of an investment company that applies to the minister for a certificate of registry are such that the ability of the company to repay all moneys borrowed by it on the security of its bonds, debentures, notes and other evidences of indebtedness that are then outstanding and to pay all interest thereon is inadequately secured, he shall make a special report to the minister recommending against the issuing of a certificate—

That, then, can be revoked later by the minister. By virtue of clause 22, when it comes to the attention of the Superintendent that there are problems, and the Superintendent believes any of these assets are not satisfactorily accounted for, he may take control of the assets of the company and maintain such control on his own initiative for a period of seven days or, with the concurrence of the minister, for any longer period the minister considers necessary in the circumstances. From this decision of the minister there is an appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Clause 29 provides that the minister may under regulations and conditions approved by the Governor in Council authorize advances to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. These advances may be up to $200 million. Finally there is the usual compendious clause, clause 32 which reads as follows:

The Governor in Council may make regulations to ensure the proper carrying out of the provisions of this act.

I think that clause is improperly drafted. Who is to judge what is the proper carrying out of the provisions of the act? I think the committee which dealt with the matter of statutory instruments suggested a form of wording, and these certainly are not its words. The minister should give consideration to changing this clause to read; "The Governor in Council may make regulations to ensure the carrying out of the provisions of the act". I think the "proper carrying out" is something which should be left to the discretion of the cabinet.

I have probably covered as many as 25 subclauses in the bill where discretion and control is passed to an elected official of the government. I think it is completely wrong that this bill, like all other bills dealing with companies, corporations and financial institutions, should be so framed. There is a case to be made for security and for certain precautions to be taken, but I strongly suggest the people of this country would feel a good deal happier if this were done by and the decision left in the hands of a tribunal independent of elected officials.

The power of the minister to do many of the things proposed in this bill at a time when an election is approaching is, I suggest, a power which we in this House should regard with apprehension. I have mentioned this matter on other occasions. I do not know what effect my continuous repetition will have on the government—very little, probably—but nevertheless it is my intention to make a continuous case of my assertion that this is an unnatural and improper power which the government does not really need to carry out the objectives in this legislation. That point should be brought to the attention of the public.

• (8:30 p.m.)

The only other comment I want to make is that I have very grave doubts about the necessity of making $200 million available. I do not see why the taxpayers of this country should have to establish a kitty for any company which is in difficulties. I agree with my friend, the hon. member for Edmonton West, and I would go a little further. There is a case to be made for reviewing the provisions contained in the Porter Royal Commission which pointed out that the way to deal with problems of this kind was to invoke the right to bring the so-called near banks under federal jurisdictions and make them subject to the provisions of certain of the precautionary legislation; and, of course, also make them eligible under the provisions of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act.

I think this would be far better than leaving in the hands of the minister and the Superintendent of Insurance the right to pay amounts up to an aggregate of $200 million in order to bail out corporations which may be in trouble. I think it would be much better to establish those corporations as near banks, characterized in that way, thereby giving them the protection which is available. As to provincial institutions, they could by application, if their assets and financial statements are such as to make them eligible, take advantage of the same provisions.

For this reason I am very dubious about parts of the legislation. I hope the committee will scrutinize it with care. Having in mind our experience in the past, I trust that the points I have mentioned will be the subject of discussion by the committee. I assume the bill will be given second reading tonight and will go to the committee. I hope that when the committee has finished its examination, it will have spent some time in considering these aspects of the measure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must remind the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think that hon. members opposite would like me to take a few minutes at least to respond to some of the comments they have made.

The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) raised a question regarding the authority given in clause 15 of the bill, as did the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). As the House will recall, this clause specifies that no sale or disposal of the whole or any part of the undertaking of a sales finance company is of any effect unless and until it has been approved by the minister.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

The hon. member for Edmonton West expressed concern that this requirement might cause delay in implementing any purchase or sale. He thought it was reasonable with respect to the sale of the entire business of the company because he recognized that it would be tantamount to selling control of it. But he appeared to be objecting to the fact that ministerial approval would be required for the sale of even a small part of a sales finance company which would be under the jurisdiction of this act.

Let us remember that the purpose of the clause is to prevent the sale or control of a Canadian sales finance company to non-residents. It was considered that if the way were open to sell the business, little would be accomplished simply by controlling the sale of shares of the company. As I have said, this provision has also been criticized by the hon. member for Peace River. He suggested that this is a new and unusual form of power to give to the government or to one of its ministers.

I would point out to the House that there are precedents for this requirement in the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Loan Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act. Under these acts, the sale of all or part of the business of a company under their provisions requires governmental approval. At present it is the approval of the Treasury Board that is required, but amendments to these acts propose that this be transferred to the appropriate minister, recognizing the change in responsibility of the Treasury Board in recent years. I am informed that no difficulty has arisen in the past concerning delays in obtaining approval from the government for the sale of all or part of the assets of companies coming under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Loan Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act.

The hon. member for Edmonton West also raised a rather interesting point about the provision in the bill before us giving the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation authority to make loans for short-term liquidity purposes as a lender-of-last-resort to Canadian sales finance companies. The hon. member referred to clause 27(3) on page 36 of the bill. He noted that the Superintendent of Insurance is required to report to the minister on the administration of the act, and he also remarked that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is required to report to the Superintendent on the activities of the corporation pursuant to this act. He went on to assume that there would be no other report concerning the activities of the corporation. However, clause 27(3) specifies that the report of the CDIC is submitted to the Superintendent "for incorporation by the Superintendent in his report to the minister under subsection (1)".

The hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) made some rather sweeping assertions, as did the hon. member for Peace River, with respect to the purpose of the original bill, and for that matter the purpose of the bill presently before us. I would point out that both the original bill that was before the other place, and this bill, would have covered only companies coming under federal legislative jurisdiction. Neither bill, therefore, would have had the effect of permitting the government, as I think the hon. member for Dauphin suggested, to take over all investment in the country, since obviously there are many companies the activities of which would fall within the definition of "investment company" under the bill before us which would remain under provincial jurisdiction.

Let us remember that the purpose of this legislation is to ensure the greater protection of investors in companies of this type that come under federal jurisdiction, and to protect the public generally from the bad effects that would come about if one of these companies should collapse, as has happened to several companies under provincial jurisdiction. Certainly the purpose of the legislation in protecting investors would also mean the preservation of their investments. Therefore, I suggest that it is not a sound argument, which the hon. member for Dauphin attempted to put forward, that this legislation in some way would threaten the system of private property in this country. It seems to me that the effect of this legislation is just the opposite, to create conditions which would help preserve institutions of private property and investment in Canada.

The hon. member for Dauphin suggested that there might be the possibility for officials to make improper use of information which they obtained in administering this legislation. If I am not mistaken, officials are already bound by oath under other legislation which would prevent their making use, either while officials or after they leave government employ, of any information they obtain while in the service of the government. The hon. member for Dauphin made reference to a gentleman who was a very capable and respected civil servant who, some months after leaving government service, went into another position with an investment firm.

I am sure that his reputation for integrity is such that aside from the requirements of his oath there could be no problem about the way he would deal with any information he might have obtained if this legislation had been in effect when he was a government employee. If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, a previous Superintendent of Insurance after leaving the employ of the federal government went on to become an executive of a large insurance company, and there was no suggestion that he was in a position to do something that was not appropriate. In fact he is a gentleman who continues to have a high reputation in the insurance industry generally.

If I am not mistaken, in the United States similar legislation has in fact existed for many years, and as far as I am aware it has not hampered investment or business activity. On the contrary, it has helped because it has provided a basis of security and safety and encouraged the creation and maintenance of a climate which in general encouraged the making of investments. I would suggest that if we have similar legislation in Canada, at least so far as the companies under federal jurisdiction are concerned, it would help to continue an appropriate climate of confidence in them that would encourage rather than harm investment.

If I might say so, Mr. Speaker, legislation of this type prevents people from misusing opportunities that may come to them through the existence of a market economy, and helps strengthen the existence of such an economy in the interests of the public generally. The hon. member for Peace River went on to review certain clauses of the bill in an attempt to show that they gave unwarranted power to the minister and the officials. But after referring to certain clauses he weakened his argument somewhat when he discovered that in fact there was the right of appeal, at least with respect to certain of them.

Mr. Baldwin: Just one.

Mr. Gray: Several of them, I think, not just one. I would like to point out to the hon. member and the House, Mr. Speaker, that if I am not mistaken authority of the type which he complained about is found in legislation governing the operations of trust and loan companies, and banks for that matter—legislation that has been on the statute books for many years—and I do not recall hearing complaints about the abuse of this authority. Instead, there has been generally the highest praise for the Superintendent of Insurance and his department for the way they have carried out their duties. If anything, the call from the public has been to give the Superintendent greater authority to make sure there is not a misuse of assets, or the power to carry on business under these acts in a way that would threaten the investment of shareholders and depositors or cause harm to the public generally.

Mr. Baldwin: It is not the Superintendent who worries me; it is the minister.

Mr. Gray: I would also tell the hon. member that, again if I am not mistaken, with reference to the trust and loan companies legislation, insurance companies legislation and the Bank Act, there is authority given to the minister to make decisions of the very type about which the hon. member is complaining at this point.

The hon. member for Peace River says that no federal company that would come under this legislation fortunately has as yet had the problems that occurred with respect to several companies that are under provincial jurisdiction, and he seems to be putting this forward as an argument against the adoption of legislation of this type. Surely, he and his party are not suggesting that we wait until something happens along the lines of the Prudential Finance collapse before we act in this Parliament? This is a strange argument, but it is the one he seems to be making. I think the public generally, and the depositors in companies of this type, desire us to act and to ensure that nothing like that does happen in future with respect to companies that will come under the legislation that is now before the House.

The hon. member has said that the government will have to account to the people of Canada for proposing such legislation. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that not only this government but particularly the official opposition will have to account to the people of Canada if there should happen to be the collapse of a company of the type that would come under this bill, and because the attitude of the official opposition impeded the placing of adequate legislation to protect the investors on the statute books of the federal government.

But finally, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River was willing to admit there is a case for some type of legislative action. I believe he used the term "a case for security." We suggest that if he is right in this—and he is—the government must have the authority to move quickly to protect depositors and the public generally. I think that those who held certificates in Prudential Finance would have been very happy if the Ontario provincial government had had the legislative authority to move quickly along the lines of the authority proposed in this legislation to protect their interests.

Mr. Speaker, dealing with a further point raised by the hon. member for Peace River, he referred to the authority of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation to borrow up to $200 million from the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister would not wish to mislead the House but he referred to depositors with respect to sales finance companies. The public buy only certificate from sales finance companies, or they participate in their shares. These are the only two forms of investment that can be made by the public in sales finance companies.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I used the term because many people who buy certificates might well feel they are doing something in the form of depositing. But the hon. member's point is well taken. The people who held certificates in Prudential Finance thought they were making a form of deposit for which they had protection. I thank the hon. member for his accurate terminology. People who buy certificates could well feel that they are making a form of deposit guaranteed by the certificates, and I think we should not overlook this aspect. But I do not quarrel with the hon. member's words of precision.

If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, dealing with the power of borrowing of last resort by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, I would like to point out that the figure of $200 million is a maximum figure. We are putting an upward limit on the borrowing that can be made by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. The authority to make use of this power to borrow is spelled out in very precise terms in the legislation, and basically it could be used only under very limited conditions through lending by way of last resort; and if I am not mistaken, it is not the minister—contrary to what has been suggested by the hon. member for Peace River—who has the right to carry out such borrowing.

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not say the minister had a right to make provision for the borrowing. It is the minister who under regulations laid down by the Governor in Council gives the money to the corporation.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, I understood the hon. member to refer to the minister in the terms that I have spoken. If my recollection is not correct, I stand corrected. Hansard of course, will speak for itself. But it is basically the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation that would be borrowing from the Consolidated Revenue Fund and would be making use of these moneys, as a lender-of-last-resort under certain very specific conditions to Canadian-controlled sales finance companies to ensure that they are in no worse position because they remain under Canadian control.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, as hon. members have said it should be possible to give the clauses of the bill very detailed scrutiny in the finance committee of the House. I certainly hope this will be done. I expect it will be done. As I said earlier during second reading, this bill will fill a gap in the pattern of legislation designed for the supervision and inspection of financial institutions under federal jurisdiction, and will therefore help carry out the obligations of the federal government to protect the interests, not only of those who hold such certificates in them but those who invest in such companies, and the public generally. I therefore ask the support of the House for this measure.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

INCOME TAX

IMPLEMENTATION OF SUPPLEMENTARY AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADA AND SWEDEN

Hon. Herb Gray (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-156, to implement a supplementary income tax agreement between Canada and Sweden, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the House will expect me to provide some explanation of this bill. Briefly, as its title indicates, the purpose of the bill is to give legislative effect to the recently signed supplementary income tax agreement with Sweden. In substance, the bill is similar to the bills implementing income tax agreements or supplementary income tax agreements between Canada and other countries that have been approved by the House since 1942. Canada now has in force 15 comprehensive income tax agreements, several of which, including the Canada-Sweden income tax agreement, have been amended by supplementary agreements.

The purpose of the present supplementary agreement, which forms the schedule to this bill, is to provide an exemption from Swedish income tax in respect of remuneration paid by a Canadian province to a provincial public servant for services he renders to the province while he is resident in Sweden. This will, in particular, give tax relief to an official of the government of Ontario who has been resident in Sweden but has been taxable by Canada as a deemed resident of Canada pursuant to section 139 of the Income Tax Act.

To ensure a measure of reciprocity, the supplementary agreement provides that a similar exemption will be given by Canada for remuneration paid to officials of political subdivisions of Sweden; but since Sweden has no political subdivision like a province, it also provides that both countries will give an exemption for remuneration paid to officials of local authorities of one of the countries posted to the territory of the other country. The existing agreement provides a reciprocal exemption for the remuneration of officials of the national government of one country serving in the other country.

The amendment proposed by this supplementary agreement would bring the agreement into line on this matter with the terms of most of Canada's other income tax agreements, which contain an exemption for remuneration of provincial officials and, in some cases, for remuneration of officials of local authorities.

The general policy of the government in recent years has been that income tax conventions should not be revised until the tax reform program is nearer to completion. An exemption has been made in this case because the matter is not a major one and the change is unlikely to conflict with decisions of Parliament on tax reform. And we have, of course, been pleased to be able to help provincial administrations in this way with the co-operation of the Swedish government and Parliament.

The supplementary agreement will come into force after it has been given legislative approval in both countries. I understand that such approval has already been given by the Swedish Riksdag. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am asking this House to support the bill at this time.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of making any extensive remarks with regard to this bill, except that I think it will not be necessary for it to go to committee. It seems appropriate, therefore, for me to move, as I did the other day, that the motion of the minister be amended by the following words:

That this bill be read a second time and be considered by the committee of the whole.

In fact, the provisions of the bill are so simple that it would be a sheer waste of administrative time to send the bill to committee and have it come back here. Therefore, we are quite prepared to consider the amendment. Whilst I am continuing my remarks, perhaps the wording of the appropriate amendment could be worked out. I am sure all of us in the House are so disposed, and as soon as I have concluded my remarks I will make that amendment.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Speaker, if I might rise on a point of order to respond to the hon. member's suggestion, perhaps the House would grant unanimous consent to having the original motion amended.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is what I would do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: May I intervene at this point. My understanding was that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) would make that proposal at the conclusion of his remarks. Perhaps I should ask the House whether there is unanimous consent to so amend the motion. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lambert, Edmonton West) agreed to.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I think there is no question that this bill will cover public service pensions and service pensions, and not the old age pension because that does not come into it at all. I think it is quite salutary to have such agreement between the two countries. I would point out, however, that this measure clearly shows up some of the difficulties that will arise upon implementing the proposals in the white paper on taxation.

It has been clearly admitted by a number of officials and by the minister that some proposals hinge on amending tax treaties, particularly with the United States. This very simple amendment to the Canada-Sweden tax agreement will take months to negotiate and process before it comes into law. If Canada is to renegotiate, as the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Gray) said, 15 or 16 tax treaties with various countries, whose interests are not identical, because Canada proposes to change its tax system, there will be a period when it will be absolutely impossible to forecast the incidence of tax on individuals or corporations in any country involved in a tax treaty with us.

If it is the government's intention to somehow or other complete public hearings and the preparation and enactment of legislation for January 1, 1971, particularly with respect to capital gains, there will be a very long period in which the provisions of tax treaties will override the taxation system and more inequities will be introduced into the system. I merely cite that as an example provided by this bill.

I am sure that the Canadian government and the Swedish government started negotiations with respect to this treaty a considerable time ago, but it still has some distance to go before it becomes law. All I say is, let us not be fooled. In the white paper we will find admissions, particularly with regard to the United States. It will be a long, hard and difficult process to negotiate the changes that Canada will want in the tax treaty, in the event that it is able to enact the legislation proposed in the white paper.

What sort of deal have we there? I suppose it will be confusion more confounded than before. In so far as this bill is concerned, we will have no further observations to make unless, of course, some of my colleagues wish to make personal remarks about Sweden. In any event, I commend the bill to the House and shall later commend it to the committee of the whole.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to the bill now before us, and no wish to hold up its passage. We agree with the proposition that it be considered in committee of the whole instead of by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which is already loaded down with work.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister to give us details of the specific application of this bill and the reasons for bringing it in at this time. I take it that some special cases must have been in mind when this agreement was concluded, particularly in the circumstances outlined by the hon. member for Edmonton West when the bill was being considered for second reading.

Mr. Gray: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I shall be happy to do that. First may I thank the hon. member for Edmonton West for his very constructive suggestion which led to the decision of this House to consider the bill in committee of the whole and thereby has helped expedite the business of the House in a positive and constructive way.

May I now respond to the question raised by the hon. member who has just spoken. The Ontario Department of Economics and Development asked the Canadian government to do what it could to secure an exemption from Swedish income tax for their trade representative in Stockholm. I am informed that the only feasible way for the Swedish authorities to do this, since the Ontario representative did not have diplomatic status, was to amend the income tax agreement.

The supplementary agreement makes two other changes. The present agreement is one-sided in that Sweden gives an exemption for officials from Canada regardless of their nationality, whereas Canada gives an exemption only if the officials are citizens of Sweden. The supplementary agreement, therefore, will provide a truly reciprocal regime by restricting the exemption given by Sweden to exclude citizens of Sweden and broadening the exemption given by Canada to include citizens of third states.

In other words—perhaps this will explain the point a little more simply—the exemption will in future not apply to remuneration paid by the sending country to citizens of the exempting country, but will apply to remuneration paid to citizens of the sending country and also to any citizens of third states who are employed by the sending country. I should add that the exemption for citizens of third states is required by the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, which Canada has ratified. I hope these remarks will provide the information which my hon. friend has requested.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I want to correct a wrong impression. When speaking previously I used the word "pensions". I should have said, "other than pensions". In my speech before second reading I mentioned pensions paid by governments. I should not have referred to pensions because what is involved is merely salaries paid by governments, since income of other kinds is also excluded.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, in this bill we have a perfect example of co-operation between two great nations of the world. I wanted to put that remark on the record.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And what is the hon. member's name?

Mr. Skoberg: The minister previously suggested that there are similar agreements with 15 other countries. I am wondering whether there are any exceptions in addition to the ones he referred to in his opening remarks.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, the 15 agreements I referred to are with the following countries: The United States, the United Kingdom, New Zealand, Australia, Trinidad and Tobago, South Africa, Ireland, France, West Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, Norway and Japan. I have been informed that a number of these agreements in the past have been amended by supplementary agreement for purposes similar to those which led to this bill being before us. I regret that I do not have the information with me at the moment which would enable me to tell my hon. friend the content of the supplementary agreements, but I would be happy to try to provide this information to him directly, outside the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BROADCASTING OF DEBATES BY RADIO AND TELEVISION

The House resumed from Monday, February 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale):

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, in consultation with Mr. Speaker, be directed to study the question of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House and its committees, including the legal, procedural and technical aspects thereof, and the question of arrangements made for reporters for the electronic media in the Parliament buildings.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I believe I had had the floor for about 30 seconds when this motion was being debated on February 2. Some of my friends are wondering whether I intend to speak for another 39 minutes and 30 seconds. I assure them that I have no such intention.

As I indicated on February 2, the members of this party are happy to support this motion for reference to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization of the whole question of radio and television broadcasting of the proceedings of this House, its committees and interviews within this building. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, some of us have supported this idea for a long time. Some of my colleagues who are here at the present time have presented motions in previous sessions for the broadcasting of the proceedings of this House, and some of us have to admit that we were urging that the proceedings of the House be broadcast by radio back in the days before there was television. Therefore, it is good to see this motion, which is in line with views some of us have held for a long time.

There is one particular reference in the motion which I would like to commend in a special way. I refer to the requirement that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, when it deals with this matter, should do so in consultation with Mr. Speaker. I am quite aware of the reasons for the change that was made a few years ago providing for our committee on procedure to be chaired by a member other than Mr. Speaker, but I still think there was merit in the pattern we used to follow in having Mr. Speaker as the chairman of committees on procedure. His presence always produced a certain unifying effect that was not completely there in all the proceedings of our committee in the last session or two. This issue is such an important one that I think it is particularly advisable to have Mr. Speaker meet with the committee, and I am glad that has been included in the motion.

The rationale for considering the broadcasting by radio and television of our proceedings, both of the House and of committees, has been stated a number of times, Mr. Speaker. One hardly needs to repeat it tonight. Let me simply say that although there was a day when there was no Hansard record of what went on in the Parliament of Westminster, and although there was a day when the press were not allowed to cover Parliament, the fact of the matter is that those days were superseded and it came to be recognized that the public had a right to know what its Parliament was doing. Surely just as in the past the public had the right to know what Parliament was doing through the medium through which people got their news, namely the press and the printed word, so the public has that right today through the electronic media which are the main ways by which people know what is going on.

Whether we like it or not—and we may as well like it because it is here—we are in an electronic world. People know what is going on, whether it is in the educational, religious, sport, political, international sphere or what have you, and they know it instantaneously by hearing it on radio or seeing it on television. If it is important for the people of Canada to see the Stanley Cup play-offs or Grey Cup game instantly on their television screens, I think Parliament is also important to the people of Canada and they should have the right to hear and see what is being done on their behalf and in their name in this place. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues I want to register our wholehearted support of the proposal that this matter be studied as set out in the resolution that is now before us.

I would like to emphasize the point that there will be problems and difficulties. They are bound to arise, but that is no reason for our not going ahead with this. As a matter of fact, not only will there be problems to iron out but if, as I believe we will, we get to the point of broadcasting, for example, the proceedings of this chamber, it will make a real difference in how we perform in this House of Commons. It will probably make a more significant and substantial difference than anything that has yet happened to this House of Commons. I have been here long enough to have seen two physical or mechanical innovations, both of which made a difference in the character of this House.

Mr. Baldwin: Three, if you include the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not regard this government as an innovation. I regard it as a throw-back.

Mr. Baldwin: I meant mechanical.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I started to speak on two mechanical innovations that have come into this chamber in my time here. The first of them was the introduction of the loud-speaker or amplifying system that we have in this House. I forget how many years ago it was installed, but when I came here and when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. McIlraith) came here, we did not have the amplifying arrangements. We had to get by under our own steam and Mr. Speaker had to hear me even though I sat in the back row pretty near the end of the chamber.

The result of it, Mr. Speaker, was that in those days participation by members in all parts of the House was not as widespread or universal as it became once we got the amplifying system. Those in the back row that could not be heard were far more discouraged than the backbenchers think they are today. Those with weaker voices who could not be heard had to go back to their constituencies and say that they did their work in committees instead of on the floor of the House.

When we got the amplifying system it created a surge of equality. Some of us who could shout and be heard thought we were losing our advantage when the timid people could also be heard. The fact is it was good and produced a change in the House of Commons. It became not just a place where the few down front or the few with loud voices took part; it became a place where everyone could take part on an equal footing.

The second mechanical change was the introduction of our instantaneous translation system. This, too, produced a change in the House. I give credit to the right hon. member for Prince Albert who was Prime Minister at the time this system was introduced. It did far more toward making this chamber a bilingual place than anything else which has been done.

Back in the days before we had instantaneous translation it used to be, as old-timers will remember, that the English version of Hansard contained in an appendix at the end the English translation of what had been said in French that day. On many days there was no appendix; no French had been spoken. It was difficult for the French-speaking members to use the French language because they were not immediately understood, so they tended always to use English or not to speak at all. This chamber has been made more broadly representative; it has been made a place in which the two languages are equal because of the introduction of this mechanical arrangement for instantaneous translation.

The point I am making is that these two mechanical innovations have brought about changes in the actual character of the House of Commons. There is no doubt in my mind that if television is brought in it will have the same effect. It may do something for our attendance. I do not think we would be very excited about being on television tonight, with the number of members who are here at this moment—and this is a pretty good attendance for a Monday evening when the business of the day has not been particularly exciting.

Mr. Nowlan: They knew you were going to speak.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says they did not know I was going to speak.

Mr. Nowlan: They did know.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I stand corrected; I am now told they did know. But even this would not provide very good entertainment, the attempt the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) and I are making to engage in some sort of banter.

I think it will have this effect: if we waste time, if we fool around, if we engage in trivia and nonsense the mail will be terrific; we shall be put in our places far more effectively than at the present time. I think it will be good for Parliament to be seen and to get the reaction of the public. I think it will bring about a change in the way we perform in Parliament, and that is all to the good. As a matter of fact, it may do something which all of us want to happen: it may put Parliament back into an important place in Canadian life.

There is a lot of talk today about Parliament not being relevant, not being concerned about the people, and it is said the people no longer consider it to be important. Maybe one of the reasons is this: the public sees sports events, panel discussions, events in the international field, church services, wars and tragedies—people see all these things on television but they do not see us. One of my hon. friends says this is the funniest show of all, the best in town. But they do not see us. I suggest that once they do it will put Parliament back into the centre of Canadian life. They may turn us off, but that will be a challenge to us to do something about the kind of performance we give in this chamber.

We have lately made an attempt to reorganize the work of this House so that more of the detailed work is done in committees, leaving this place as a debating forum for the important and major issues. We have moved a long way in this direction by sending virtually all bills to standing committees instead of dealing with them here in committee of the whole. It is true that an exception was made tonight. But it still seems to me that too much unimportant detail is discussed here amid the trappings of this building and this institution. Put in television terms, it would look better if details were dealt with in a small committee room where men and women were working on the particular items before them at the time.

This proposed innovation would involve not only changes in the way in which we perform, in how we speak, in how we look, and all the rest of it—including, perhaps, even the way in which we dress—but it would produce changes in our rules, in particular, changes in the relationship between the House of Commons and its various committees. I am not afraid of this. I hope none of us is afraid of it. Parliament may change so greatly that if Mackenzie King were to come back he would not recognize the place. Some of us may not recognize it as the kind of place it was when we first came here. But it is not important simply to keep things as they are. What is important is that we should make this institution responsive to the needs of the Canadian people. What is important is that it should serve the Canadian people and make them feel there is some affinity, some relationship, some understanding between them and ourselves as their Members of Parliament.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Maybe I am being too hopeful; maybe I am reading too much into the possibilities of the use of the electronic media. But we can certainly go a long way. We cannot go downhill any more; we can only go up. I like the idea that if this motion carries, the people are to have the chance to see their Parliament in action and to become more a part of it than at the present time. I therefore have much pleasure in supporting the motion now before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges-C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad tonight to say a few words on this motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). I believe that coming from the government, as it does, this motion will certainly bring more rapid results than if it came, say, from a private member of any party.

I certainly think that the Committee on Procedure and Organization, which includes government and opposition members will seriously consider the matter and report to the House which, after considering the report and possibly amending it, will make some excellent recommendations to the government.

Of course, I would like to share the enthusiasm of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as regards the results this measure might bring. I do not readily see those effects, because several problems arise. This evening, I should like to express my opinion on that subject. As I said, I am in favour of this motion. It is possible to provide the Canadian people with better information while prompting hon. members to make the debates more interesting.

Having said a few words in favour of this motion, I intend to make some comments so that the Committee on Procedure and Organization might become aware of the views of hon. members. In my opinion, it would not be easy to arrange for the television broadcasting of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. Speaker, my remarks may be desultory because I do not want to take too much of the time of the House. Besides I would like to give my colleagues who are concerned about that matter an opportunity to make suggestions.

I believe that some purely technical problems will not be easily dealt with. Indeed, who will choose the speakers on the matters to be discussed? Would all sittings be televised or only parts of them? Who would do the editing of the debates if not all sittings were televised? Who would decide of the time and the day when such debates would be televised?

In Great Britain, this problem has been widely discussed. No final decision has yet been reached in that connection. I have been told by some hon. members at Westminster that the debates will probably never be televised. Others are more optimistic and hope that part of the discussions will be televised. However, I did not have the opportunity, during my brief stays in London to meet the members who were in favour of the complete television broadcasting of the debates.

As for the broadcasting of the committee proceedings, I would answer in the negative. Instead, we should televise the proceedings of the House of Commons.

I believe it is technically possible to televise some debates of the House. For instance, I can imagine quite well, while a bill on air and water pollution is under consideration, a one hour program in the course of which te minister or his representative, and the leaders of the opposition parties, or their spokesmen, could express their opinions.

I would like to share the optimism shown by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about the Grey Cup and the Stanley Cup games, but I very much fear that the viewers would not take as much interest in the debates of the House of Commons. I would be agreeable to have, in the course of one week, two periods of televised debates previously recorded in the House at a given time.

On the other hand, I would view with a critical eye the live broadcasting of debates, on account of the high costs involved. As a matter of fact, one channel would have to be set aside for that purpose, since our debates usually go on from 2 p.m. to 10.30 p.m.

In addition, I do not see how we would get the housekeepers interested, in the afternoon, in the broadcasting of the House debates, when other programs are scheduled and when ladies have other things to do. I do not see either who would be interested in watching the House proceedings at 7 p.m.

I think there should be, at least at the beginning, some—

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Lachance: Certainly—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In English—

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, has the hon. member considered the possibility that just as we now provide Hansard, in particular the blues, for the whole day to the press, and the press makes a decision concerning what to publish, maybe we should provide a television tape of the whole day and let the television people decide what to broadcast?

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, it is an interesting suggestion, but I do not think that we should always leave it to reporters to decide what should be televised.

I feel that if tomorrow we televised the Oral Question Period, there would be at least 200 members—the Prime Minister and the other Cabinet members being unable to do so —who would rise to ask questions. Some of these questions would certainly be important and urgent, but I am afraid that, on the other hand, there would be a run for publicity.

In my opinion, it is up to the hon. members to decide what should be telecast, and I will say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that I do not object in principle to have all debates telecast. After all, it is purely a technical matter of operating costs and publishing.

I think that hon. members would agree to have debates televised were the government to reach that decision, but the spending of some $100 million to telecast all our debates and all the meetings of our committees would surely be criticized.

[English]

Mr. Horner: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would permit another question. He just said he is sure hon. members would agree with him if the government put it forward. I wonder if he would be prepared to declare a free vote on the question and let everybody decide according to their own wishes, rather than having a government motion to this effect.

[Translation]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, it is, of course, an excellent suggestion. I believe that if a free vote was taken in the House, it should be on this matter, because votes have not always been as free as the members would have liked.

Mr. Horner: Oh! oh!

Mr. Lachance: I have carefully weighed every word. I am afraid members have not always had all the freedom they would have wished for, but that does not mean there has not been any freedom at all.

I am happy the Government has introduced this motion, because it can be passed quicker than if it had been introduced by an ordinary member.

I know that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) made a detailed study about this question. He submitted reports. I had the honour to sit on the standing committee on procedure which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Center mentioned earlier and that was presided over by the Speaker of the time.

In my opinion, the debates might be broadcast twice a week at a time when serious people, those who are really interested in the commonwealth would be able to look at those programs which might be scheduled for 11.30 p.m., so that the viewers might choose between more or less interesting moving pictures and the broadcasting of the debates in the House which, that goes without saying, would be given all the appropriate publicity.

Furthermore, after such a program, just like after a hockey or football game, the parliamentary reporters or the representatives of the electronic media could discuss the bill after the spokesmen of the government and of the opposition had set forth their viewpoints. We could even then choose the three stars and select the best speakers.

There is surely some way of rousing the interest of a certain part of the population for public affairs.

• (9:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Horner: You have not scored any goals tonight.

[Translation]

Mr. Lachance: Mr. Speaker, I have no illusions as to the rating such programs will achieve, for they will certainly never have the rating enjoyed by hockey and football games. They will be information programs rather than public entertainment programs on which the tremendous publicity is subsidized by Canadian taxpayers.

[Mr. Lachance.]

I am not against this practice but one must nevertheless give the facts and recognize that those magnates who own the hockey or football clubs are the ones who get the profits. And even if that is a part of the game of democracy, with which I agree to a certain extent, I suggest that when it comes to informing the public about the nation's business or public affairs, we should be concerned about the cost.

I do not think that we could get sponsors who would be ready to pay large sums of money for the broadcasting of the debates of the House of Commons. We would have to know whether such advertising would be shown. Would it be after the speech made by the head of the government, after that of the leader of the opposition, or after those of the leaders of the various political parties?

With regard to the premises which could be used for the television broadcasting of our proceedings, we must admit that this House has no such facilities. It is possible to set them up. We could easily reduce the size of the public galleries which, sometimes, are not even large enough to accommodate all the people who wish to come in. However, it is possible. I have had the opportunity to visit other more modern parliaments where special rooms have been set up in order to facilitate the television broadcasting of the proceedings.

I am thinking, for instance, of the Parliament in Vienna which is equipped with wonderful broadcasting studios. However, they are not much used because it has been realized that it was not very easy to televise the debates.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of televising our proceedings as an experiment which would become permanent only if all hon. members were willing to co-operate.

I am also in favour of a scientific experiment. I think that we should show Canadians that we observe the proprieties.

The House of Commons is not a theatre, but a place where the representatives of the people gather to express their opinions. They are not bound, however, by the opinions of their constituents.

We have all noticed that the committees sometimes sit at the same time as the House. There are times when we play hosts to delegations, represent the government or the House of Commons at interparliamentary meetings abroad; it is not always possible for us to be present in the House of Commons.

It is not easy to reconcile all interests when, for instance, a certain bill is to be introduced at a given time. The purpose of televising the debates is not to show how smart we are, or that we are present in the House, but rather to inform the public on what goes on there.

We all know that at a certain time, on such a date, a newscast will be televised on a certain bill to inform the public. This is somewhat similar to when the House of Commons is to be photographed for the pamphlet on the House of Commons: everyone manages to be present.

If the members attach such importance to a mere photograph, how much more enthusiasm they will show if every Monday night, at eight o'clock, by mutual agreement with the leaders of the parties, the proceedings on a bill are televised. This will encourage the members to attend the sittings of the house, and we can then make a better impression on Canadian citizens.

This could also be improved by televising a beautiful political "match," provided of course we give the required facilities to the producers.

We must admit that we do not provide the pressmen with all the necessary facilities, because nowadays, they must observe a rigorous discipline while playing an essential role.

I hope that the committee on procedure and organization will study this problem seriously and that it will soon present a report to the House.

• (9:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in the limited time left at my disposal tonight I will endeavour to state why I am opposed to this motion. It was interesting to listen to the previous speaker. He spoke at length on the subject matter of the motion, mainly in opposition to the principle, but from time to time affirmed that he was in favour of the principle. It was nice that he did so, because one could not reach that conclusion listening to him. That is why I asked whether his party would allow a free vote on the matter when it came back to the House, or would allow a free vote with no whips when the subject matter was considered in committee. I doubt it very much, Mr. Speaker. In fact, I would go so far as to say that the members appointed to the committee from all parts of the House will in the main be members who support the idea of televising the proceedings of the House. I am against this principle.

I would like to deal with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said. He believes our proceedings must be televised so that the people of Canada will know what parliament is doing. Does he for one minute think that Parliament makes decisions as to how the country is administered? Surely a man of his experience in the House knows better than that. He went on to say that this is a major debating forum. The people of this country want to know where the decisions are made, where their protest letters should be sent, and how best they can get their problems considered. I will deal later with the question of how best they can have their problems dealt with and considered.

The hon. member went on to say that television in this House would significantly change the role of Members of Parliament and would even go so far as to change the dress of members. What is this place: is it a stage on which we are all prepared to act a part? We know some members of the House are already being handed scripts. Are they now to be handed the right coloured tie and shirt, along with the script to read, and act a part? Are they to be told, "This is a speech on wheat. The western farmers are mad. Be sure you act mad"? Are they to be told, "The middle-class will be confronted with a terrible burden because of the white paper on taxation. Be sure you act as if you are concerned and annoyed"? Is that the role of Members of Parliament? Mr. Speaker, we are representatives of the people. If we in this House forget that principle, we can no longer lay claim to the fact that we have representative government.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre went on to say that the same problems were posed when Hansard was first introduced. Television in this House would in no way be similar to Hansard, for a number of very clear reasons. The written word is far different from watching a picture and seeing the words spoken. The old adage of seeing is believing is still very true in Canada.

Today, because we have been subjected to the written word so much by the newspapers, people have become somewhat sceptical of what they read in the newspapers. Things are quoted out of context, which amounts to misinterpretation. It is said that seeing is believing. Hansard records what I say; it does not record how many people listen to me. Television will record how many people listen to a speech that is being made. It will record the number of supporters in a member's party who are listening to him, and the number of people in the House generally.

If a member is making a very logical plea on behalf of the taxpayers he represents, and he finds that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) is chatting away in the back row and not listening to him, on occasion that may be all right; but if this shows up on television, one quick picture will discredit the whole worth and logic of his argument. I would dwell on other differences between television and Hansard if time permitted, but may I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

SOCIAL SECURITY—INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the debate that we have just had, I suppose it is appropriate to remark that we have now reached the time of the late show, for those who are still up and still able to see what there is to see and decide whether or not to believe it. My subject for tonight's late show arises from a question that I asked on Thursday, December 18, as indicated in Hansard at page 2130.

• (10:00 p.m.)

May I say at the outset that there are times when a minister or a parliamentary secretary in replying to a late show question complains that the questioner brought forward material that had not been introduced when the original question was asked. I admit there are times when we on the opposition side do expand our questions. But may I draw the attention of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, because I assume he is answering my question tonight, to the fact that when I asked this question on December 18, it had two parts. I hope he can reply tonight to both parts.

The first part of my question had to do with the tabling of the white paper on social security. I urged, indeed, that it be tabled without further delay and expressed the hope that it might be tabled when we came back in January. That, of course, did not happen and we are now in the month of February. I still urge upon the government the early tabling of this white paper on social security but I may say—this is an enlargement of what I said on December 18—that we over here feel we should not only have the white paper on social security but we should be given in public the Willard report which we understand is the basis for the white paper.

I stress the point that in these days when we are being sold the idea of Information Canada and being told that this government wants to give us all the information it can, it just is not in keeping with that stance for us to be refused an important document like the Willard report on social security. Mr. Speaker, if there is anything to this talk of participatory democracy, if there is anything to the idea that the government agrees to the recommendation of the task force on information that all reports should be made public, here is an opportunity to show it. The whole question of social security is a terribly important area, and I submit we are entitled to see the Willard report and to have the government white paper on social security with the least possible delay.

Mr. Speaker, the other part of my question on December 18, was in these words:

> May I again ask the minister whether, in view of the delay in tabling the white paper, the government will consider providing for an interim increase in the old age security pension?

I received no answer to that question on that occasion just as I received no answer two nights before, so I put it again, Mr. Speaker. Everyone knows that our older and retired people are having a most difficult time to keep up with the rising cost of living. They are mentioned every time the subject of inflation comes up—the poor pensioners, the people on fixed incomes. I commend the government for recognizing this need in the case of retired civil servants whose pensions are to be increased in April this year. I submit that this need is real for all our retired people. It does make sense in today's conditions to come through with an increase in the basic amount of the old age pension, and I urge that this be done.

I do not know what the Willard report recommended nor what the white paper on social security will say, but surely these reports do not suggest going back to the means test or passing the buck to the provinces. Surely they confirm that we should move forward in social security. If we are to move forward, that means an improvement in the pensions of our citizens who are on old age security. If that is the case, why wait for all these white papers and all the machinery we have to go through? Why not bring in now a proposal for an interim increase in the old age security pension? That is the second and the major part of the question I raise at this time, and I hope the parliamentary secretary is in a position to give a hopeful or favourable answer to it tonight.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, at the outset in replying to the hon. member I should like to point out that this government, and especially the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), have not remained idle in trying to help as much as possible the older citizens of our country. If we look at the estimates for the fiscal year 1970-71 we will see that expenditures under the old age security fund have jumped $143 million, reaching a total of $1.9 billion, which is the highest in our history.

This increase is explained by two main factors. On the one hand there has been the lowering of the required age; consequently, an estimated additional 50,000 people will be benefiting from the basic flat rate and the income supplement. On the other hand, while in the past old age security had no escalation, the fact is that that we now have some escalation in benefits. This escalation has permitted many of our older citizens to benefit.

Finally, I should like to point out to the hon. member that the federal government is prepared to share half the cost of further supplementing the old age security and guaranteed income supplement through the Canada Assistance Plan. At least one of the provinces has recently increased this supplement and brought the total amount of the benefits up to $150 a month. I also wish to add that there is no upper limit to the federal government's contribution through the Canada Assistance Plan; however, the initiative must come from the provinces which also determine the amount of supplement to be paid.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I emphasize that this government through its Minister of National Health and Welfare is doing all that is possible at the moment to help our old age pensioners while studying the situation and deciding upon its policy, which will be made known through the white paper on social security and which will, I hope, be tabled as soon as possible. I will again bring the matter of the tabling of the Willard report to the attention of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope that on his return from the Indian reserves, the minister will be able to make a decision and announce it to the House.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—REQUEST BY UNION OFFICIAL FOR APOLOGY BY MINISTER

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape-Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, on January 27, as reported at page 2861 of Hansard, I posed a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with reference to written complaints from the retired coal miners pensioners union at Sydney Mines, signed by their secretary, Mr. Pius Hennessey, regarding the manner in which pre-retirement benefits were being paid by the Cape Breton Development Corporation to former coal mine employees. At that time I asked whether in view of the constant complaints that were being received the Prime Minister would cause an investigation to be carried out into all the ramifications of the subject. The Prime Minister took my question as notice.

On January 29, as reported at page 2963 of Hansard, I again brought the subject to the attention of the Prime Minister with reference to an investigation into the whole matter because of further protests from the CB of RT. The Prime Minister did not seem to be aware of the subject, and a hazy reply was received from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). As a supplementary, I pointed out that continuing telegrams of protest and other communications were being forwarded to myself and ministers concerned, and I then directed a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) asking if he would cause an investigation to be made into the whole matter.

The minister replied that he had been in touch with Devco and that no complaints had been made either to Devco or to his department. He went on to say that the union to which I referred was "in fact a small group of superannuated employees which is called a union and which has no connection with the United Mine Workers of America who have made no request in the name of those pensioners." This, of course, is a translation of the minister's words.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

I then rose on a point of order and pointed out that the information relayed by the minister was erroneous because I had in my hand a letter of protest from the president of a CB of RT and GW local which represents men who are at present working in the Devco coal mines, namely, mine examiners and shot-firers. This, I understand, is one of many communications of protest which have been forwarded. Despite the fact that in my point of order I advised that it was a local union from the CB of RT, the minister did not comment. Had he done so, sir, we should not be debating the matter tonight.

On February 11, as reported at page 3484 of Hansard, I asked the minister if he had received a communication from the general representative of the CB of RT and GW in Cape Breton, Mr. Gilbert MacIntyre, taking exception to a recent statement the minister made in the House regarding this union and asking for an official apology. The minister replied to the effect that he had received such a letter and that its contents were based on false assumptions. The exchange in the House to which I referred took place on January 29. That is when I referred to the letter of protest from the local union of the CB of RT and GW, not January 27 as stated by the minister on February 11 as reported in Hansard.

To clarify the situation I would like to read a copy of the letter which was forwarded to the minister, dated February 5, signed by Mr. Gilbert MacIntyre, general representative of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. He states:

Honourable Sir:

The January 29th 1970 issue of Hansard, page 2964, records your part in a debate concerning benefits paid retired coal miners by the Cape Breton Development Corporation (Devco).

In reply to a question from Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-Sydneys, you stated: "I got in touch with Devco, no complaint was made either to Devco or to my department. The Union to which the hon. member is referring is, in fact, a small group of superannuated employees, which is 'called a union' and which has no connection with the United Mine Workers of America who have made no request in the name of these pensioners."

Honourable sir, it appears that you have been grossly misinformed on several counts. For your information and for the record, the following comments are "matter of fact."

(1) The so-called "union" you refer to is local 510 (salaried shot-firers and examiners) of the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers. Certified by the N.S. Labour Relations Board in 1962 subsequently covered by section 35 of federal Bill C-135.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys).]

(2) Local 510 of brotherhood, as well as local 504 (clerical staff with Devco) and local 509 (technicians with Devco), as well as our C.B. District Council of CB of RT & GW and the Cape Breton Labour Council have on a number of occasions complained about the compulsory aspect of the pre-retirement plan.

(3) CB of RT & GW, as well as other Nova Scotia labour bodies (with the noted exception of the UMW of A., district 26) have complained concerning the mandatory act of forcing men on the street at a considerable loss of income. We, to date, believe that the decision of accepting the Devco pre-retirement plan should be purely voluntary on behalf of the individual affected.

(4) There have been numerous letters and wires concerning these protests, which should be on file.

In view of what appears to be you being misinformed on this matter, I believe it not unreasonable to expect an official apology from yourself to local 510 (salaried shot-firers and examiners) for an obvious rebuff of their proud union status.

Also it is our intention to continue to press for the elimination of the compulsory aspect of the Devco pre-retirement plan, for we find it as a "minimum benefit, providing maximum poverty."

Yours very truly,

Gilbert MacIntyre
General Representative
CB of RT & GW

In conclusion, I feel that in view of the circumstances the minister certainly owes this union an official apology. Here again, I appeal to the minister to have a complete investigation carried out in regard to the method and circumstances surrounding the payment of pre-retirement benefits, with particular reference to the use of unemployment insurance funds and the compulsory aspect of the pre-retirement plan. I have asked this of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and this minister, and I feel it is the only way it can be clarified. Not only does the minister owe the CB of RT an apology, but also the retired coal miners pensioners union at Sydney Mines about whom he has spoken in a derogatory manner.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe this House is the ideal place to seek clarification of problems, but stating false problems and merely seeking to spin out words or just speculating on what has been said can serve no useful purpose.

What then is the problem the honourable member raised in the House? A very simple one. On January 27—not January 29—he directed the following question to the Right Honourable Prime Minister:

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the first minister. Has the right hon. gentleman received a written complaint from the retired coal miners pensioners union at Sydney Mines regarding the manner in which benefits are being paid?

[Translation]

He was quite sincere when he put that question. All right. And then on the 29th, referring to the same question, he said, and I quote:

[English]

Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister and concerns the method used by the Cape Breton Development Corporation to compensate retired coal miners. Further to the question posed to the Prime Minister on Tuesday of this week—

That would be the 27th.

—asking for an investigation into the whole matter in view of the continuing protests from the unions concerned and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister took my question as notice—

So the hon. gentleman was referring to the question he posed on the 27th concerning the retired coal miners.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Read on. The next page.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I can read on if you wish.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Page 2964.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): It goes on:

—in view of the continuing protests from the unions concerned and in view of the fact that the Prime Minister took my question as notice, may I ask the right hon. gentleman if he is in a position to shed any further light on this subject?

Does the hon. member wish me to read on further?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If the minister would look, he would find that on the next page I referred to the local union of the CB of RT, and the minister did not reply.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I did not reply. How then, could I have referred to local 510, if I did not reply? This is the whole point at issue. I did not reply to that. I was referring to this union of retired pensioners, that is all.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Continued telegrams and communications!

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Now, Mr. Speaker, the other union was never referred to, that is local unit 510. It was rather the retired employees union that was mentioned—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Portneuf.

[English]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You lose your time. You lose everybody's time for no purpose at all.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): You are too hotheaded. Why don't you grow up?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Portneuf has the floor.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Be careful of your blood-pressure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Portneuf.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—INFLATION—ALLEVIATION OF FISCAL BURDEN

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, February 13th I asked the following question: In view of the recent reduction in the so-called "Vietnamese" tax by the government of the United States for the purpose of assisting consumers in the present economic recession, could the Right Hon. Prime Minister tell us if he intends taking similar action?

[Translation]

If so, for which tax can the Canadians expect a reduction?

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said not a word. However, in the light of a statement he made on Monday the 9th of February, to launch the national conference on price stabilization, I think we might get an affirmative answer in a few minutes.

In the few moments I have left, I shall say to the Prime Minister that while he tried to hoodwink Canadians, the results have run counter to his expectations. Indeed, the people are not asleep. They are more awaken than ever. Faced with the high cost of living, they live in anxiety and in the expectation of positive results from this administration.

• (10:20 p.m.)

How can inflation be created without the administrators being aware of it? Of what use have been the royal commissions and task forces set up since 1960? Have not two inquiries been ordered in 1961, one on health and the other on taxation? In 1962, an inquiry was caused to be conducted on banking and finance and in 1963, another on biculturalism and bilingualism.

In 1964, the first report of the Economic Council of Canada was tabled in the House. Did it not deal with the economic outlooks for Canada for the period ending in 1970?

Since 1965, of what use have been the reports of the Tariff Board?

Since 1966, what steps have been taken following the report of the joint special committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on consumer credit?

Since 1967, what advantages have consumers derived from the establishment of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

In 1968, were not the elections to cure our economic difficulties? And you remember that economic problems were but the result of the administration of a minority government while a majority government would have been necessary to restore the balance. Where is this balance that this government was going to bring us?

What will bring us, in 1970, the Prices and Incomes Commission which was created in 1969? Will it explain why the people have to tighten their belts while the Prime Minister is increasing his allowance? In view of the fact that the Prime Minister has already covered the distance between Montreal and James Bay on foot and by canoe, will the Commission recommend to him not to use government airplanes any more?

Will the Prices and Incomes Commission reveal that it is the increase of taxes of all sorts which is mainly responsible for pushing the cost of living up? Will it tell the government that it is useless to count on the co-operation of workers from small businesses with a low income and that it cannot rely on the co-operation of labour unions to check the increase in the cost of living, since in heavy industry where there are unions the salaries they have succeeded in obtaining for the employees represent but 6 per cent of the finished product?

[Mr. Godin.]

Will the Commission make the government understand that the farmers are very badly paid, whether for their dairy products or for their wheat?

Will the Commission take into account that the grocer, the wholesaler, the milkman work for fractions of a cent, and that on each $19 purchase of cigarettes the value of work and tobacco represent but $3 and $16 are for taxes?

Will the Prices and Incomes Commission make known to the population that without taxes, gas would sell at 4 cents a gallon?

Will the members of the Prices and Incomes Commission be honest enough to admit that they are dealing with imaginary bandits and that the thieves are not those they are asked to find?

Since under the present system the Canadian government gets the largest share of the profits, can we expect an income tax reduction shortly? In January, the American government reduced by 5 per cent its so-called Viet Nam tax and will reduce it by a further 5 per cent in June. Can we expect something similar from the Canadian government, since the Prime Minister stated on February 9, and I quote:

> Control of inflation is a challenge for Canada as well as for our neighbours and our competitors. We cannot afford to do less than they are doing.

In order to do as well as the Americans, on what items of the fiscal revenues will the next reductions be applied? Will they be applied to estate taxes, the excise tax, the 12 per cent sales tax or the personal income tax? Will the reductions be applied to the 4 per cent personal income tax, or the 3 per cent one or on the so-called social development tax of 2 per cent, or again on the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials?

Mr. Speaker, questions are asked every time new taxes are levied and all Canadians are entitled to an answer.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the government wants to help consumers and all Canadians. That is why they are engaged in a close fight in order to check inflation, which hurts everybody, especially low-income Canadians.

This afternoon, I made a statement in which I said that the government had decided to postpone until 1971 the proclamation of a new tax on air fares, which was passed by Parliament last fall.

But as the hon. member knows, we have in general a parliamentary system under which the government states its new proposals only in a budget speech made in the House. But as we know, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has already said he would make such a speech in the near future.

It is with the co-operation of all economic areas of this country more than in any other way that we shall succeed in our fight against inflation.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FORTIN—OBJECTION TO PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege concerning the tabling of the report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, whose study dealt exclusively with the dairy policy.

This committee had been given its terms of reference on December 18, 1969, under a motion moved by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) which was recorded in Hansard on the same day.

I then expressed my opposition in no uncertain terms. Hon. members will also recall that the Minister of Agriculture had asked for unanimous consent by the House to refer the essential aspects of the question to the agriculture committee.

Here is what I said, and I quote:

> We are ready to accept the motion of the Minister of Agriculture. However, there is a point which remains to be cleared up before we give our approval, and that is whether the report on the study on the dairy industry made by the committee on agriculture during May and June last will be tabled in the House and whether it has anything to do with the minister's motion.

Mr. Speaker, I then stated my position unequivocally, as follows:

> If it is two different matters, we cannot give our approval—

The unanimous consent of the House was then sought.

> —but if, on the other hand, it is a report on that study, we will gladly give our consent.

That was my position. Mr. Speaker, I contend that the first report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture cannot be tabled in the House as long as the committee has not satisfied the sine qua non condition I had set namely, that it state its position with regard to the report on the special study made on the same matter in May and June last in Eastern Canada and which was rather costly. Mr. Speaker, this is actually the truth, and you will understand why there has been a breach of our privileges.

The special study conducted by the Committee on Agriculture during a special trip of committee members, has never been reported to the House. Why? Because, the findings of that study are at variance with the dairy policy of this government. This is also why the government members who sat on that committee have never made any effort to urge the Committee on Agriculture to submit its report. Nevertheless, that trip entailed some public expenditures. Indeed, it lasted almost 15 days. The committee had been asked to consider substantially the same matter than that the one referred to it, pursuant to the motion introduced on December 18 last.

Mr. Speaker, I then said that if that was a related study to be conducted within the framework of this study, we would support the motion for unanimous agreement, but that, on the other hand, if those were two separate matters, we would not endorse it for the following reasons.

First of all, it was another proof that government members were trying very hard to use their majority not only to control the proceedings, but even their contents. Secondly, it meant double expenditures of public funds, which is reckless spending. Finally, had I agreed to the request for unanimous consent, the report of the journey made by the Standing Committee on Agriculture would have never been published, because its recommendations could not but blame the government.

In fact, I agreed to it on the express understanding that the findings of both special studies would be recorded in the same report. But the minister did not want to reply, claiming he would rather avoid a debate—needless to say—and he left it to the committee.

Again I refer to page 2118 of Hansard. At the end of my remarks, one can read the following and I quote:

We lay down a stipulation.

Since our stipulation was not met and the committee in its study did not take into account the conclusions reached in another study, subsequent to a special trip concerning the matter, I submit that this report cannot be tabled because we had not given unanimous consent.

If I were not now rising on a question of privilege, that would amount to contradicting myself. I put the matter to the House, in the hope of finding understanding and co-operation, for an essential standing order is at stake, the need to have unanimous consent to refer a question to a committee.

Mr. Speaker, since we have not given unanimous consent and the committee has not indicated its position on this matter, as was suggested by the minister himself on December 18, I move the following:

That the report of the Committee on Agriculture submitted to the House in accordance with a motion to that effect on December 18, 1969, not be concurred in but be referred to the Committee so that the latter may add, as an appendix to the report, the findings and recommendations of the special study made in May and June last, pursuant to an order of the House.

I am also sending you a photostat copy of Hansard for your information.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has kindly informed me of his intention to rise on a question of privilege. He has done so in accordance with the Standing Orders, thus enabling me to study during the few minutes at my disposal, the very interesting point that he has raised.

Basically, the hon. member for Lotbinière suggests that a committee has looked into a matter subject to a condition that he had stipulated himself. He now suggests that the condition was not fulfilled and, in consequence, he asks the Chair not to accept the report that has just been submitted to the House.

[Mr. Fortin.]

The hon. member will understand that it is quite difficult for the Chair to study all the reports laid before the House in order to determine whether the stipulations laid down for their consideration have been complied with. I doubt very much that this is a question of privilege. I rather think that the hon. member has aired in the House a grievance which, in my opinion, is serious.

I recall very well the circumstances under which the motion to which the hon. member for Lotbinière has referred was made and I also remember that he had given his approval, subject to that stipulation.

He now says that it has not been complied with. I doubt very much that even in such serious circumstances it is possible for me to reject the report just brought before the House.

May I suggest to the hon. member that the point he now raises could be put forward when the motion for concurrence of the report is moved in due course.

I deem it necessary to draw the attention of the member for Lotbinière to citation 318(2) in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, fourth edition, which reads as follows:

It is the opinion of the committee, as a committee, not that of the individual members, which is required by the House, and, failing unanimity, the conclusions agreed to by the majority are the conclusions of the committee.

And further on:

If a member disagrees to certain paragraphs in the report, or to the entire report, he can record his disapproval by dividing the committee against those paragraphs to which he objects, or against the entire report, as the circumstances of the case require; and can put on record his observations and conclusions, as opposed to those of the majority, by proposing an alternative draft report or moving an amendment to the question for reading the draft report a second time.

Paragraph (3) of the same citation reads as follows, and I quote:

A member will not be permitted in presenting a report to make any remarks on the subject-matter; he can only properly do so on a motion in reference to the report.

In other words, the objection raised by the hon. member deals with the substance, and in my opinion, should be considered when the motion for concurrence in the report comes before the House.

The hon. member has raised an interesting point which I shall consider with sympathy during the next few days. But, I may possibly err in ruling at this time, that there is no question of privilege. The point is very serious, and I have come to the conclusion having taken all circumstances into account, that it is a grievance rather than a question of privilege. This grievance could be presented by the hon. member when the House is considering the motion for concurrence in the committee's report.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to your kind remarks with great interest.

However, I wish to point out to you that this is precisely the point. If the House agrees today that the committee's report be presented, this will mean that we—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I want to assure the hon. member for Lotbinière that I understand perfectly the point he is raising as well as its importance. But having considered all the aspects of the question—and I had this opportunity for a few moments before the opening of the sitting—I had to arrive at this conclusion. I said so to the hon. member. I may not have considered all the aspects of the question. In the next days, I intend to look further into the matter. But, for the moment at least, I must arrive at the conclusion that the question of privilege cannot be raised. It could possibly be when the motion for concurrence in the report is introduced but, there again, I cannot assure the hon. member that his question of privilege will then be deemed in order. In the light of the circumstances, it would be preferable to abide by the ruling I have just made.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I brought a motion before the House and I should like to know whether it has been ruled out of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must realize that the motion can only be introduced if the Chair recognizes that the question of privilege is well taken. If the Chair feels that there is no question of privilege, the motion cannot be introduced.

TRANSPORT

TABLING OF STATEMENT ON CHANGES IN DEPARTMENTAL ROLE AND STRUCTURE

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41 (2) I am now tabling in the two official languages a statement on the changes to be made in the role and structure of the federal transport portfolio.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This is the first opportunity I have had of bringing up the point. The Minister of Transport has just tabled a statement on the changing role and direction of the Department of Transport. As I understand it, he issued a press release on the subject this morning and went on television and told the nation about these changes. If we in this House are to be responsible to our constituents, then we must make sure that the cabinet, the executive branch of government, is responsible to the elected representatives of the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Horner: The House ought to be made aware of the devious manner in which the government is destroying the worth of Parliament. For the minister to make a statement outside the House about a vital matter before informing the elected representatives of the people is, I submit, wrong in principle. I wish to bring to the attention of the House and the country the fact that the government, by acting in this way, is slowly eroding and destroying the very principles upon which our parliamentary democracy is founded.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The point raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot has been raised on previous occasions by other hon. members.

Mr. Horner: Not often enough.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says "not often enough". I am not sure that I agree with that statement. In any event, the point has been raised in a very serious way from time to time by other hon. members. It is a matter of interest whether there is a point of order or a legitimate question of privilege as to whether hon. members of the House have the right to receive information from ministers prior to statements being made outside the House. That is the very point raised by the hon. member.

I recognize that the point is well taken. The point has often been raised in the past, not only in the last two or three years that I have been associated with the Speakership but on many occasions in previous years, that statements have been made outside the House which perhaps ought to have been made in the House. I am not expressing an opinion. There is a long series of decisions in the jurisprudence dealing with the matter raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot. A very similar point was raised by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie the other day.

On the basis of the jurisprudence and previous decisions, the Chair has had to come to the conclusion that the matter should not be put to the House as a question of privilege. This being so and particularly since there is no motion and in view, as I said, of the precedents in the matter, I would not think that this matter should give rise to a debate.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The Minister of Transport seems anxious to reply. I doubt whether that should be allowed. If the minister is allowed to reply, at that point we will have a debate on a question of privilege and I do not think we should proceed on that basis. In this instance I have to make the same ruling as has been made in the past by previous Speakers and by myself on a few previous occasions. I think we should go on to another subject.

Mr. Jamieson: May I rise on a question of privilege?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. minister can rise on a new question of privilege.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, merely for the record and not in any debating form or anything of that nature, I simply want to record the fact out of respect for this House and out of respect for the principle which the hon. member for Crowfoot raised, I did in fact last night invite the members of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications and any other interested members to a full briefing on this matter before, indeed, it was released.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Obviously we are getting involved in a debate. The hon. minister has sought to reply to the hon. member on his own question of privilege. I have to rule for the minister the same way I ruled for the hon. member. I told the hon. member there could be no debate on his question since there was no question of privilege. The minister sought the floor on his own question of privilege. I have to rule that there is no question of privilege and there should be no debate on that question either. This may go on for a long time. The hon. member is rising on a third question of privilege?

An hon. Member: A second for him.

Mr. Horner: This is a new question of privilege and I am raising it at the very earliest opportunity, which I understand is when a question of privilege should be raised. The question of privilege I raise at this opportune time is that the minister did call a special committee meeting but my office was not informed of the time. A committee meeting called in such an informal manner should not and cannot supplant the House of Commons.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Horner: It was only called for those people who were lucky enough to hear of the calling and were available for the meeting. It was in camera. It had nothing to do with the procedures in this House. As I understand Beauchesne, citation 100, paragraph (7), which deals with this whole subject matter, it can only be judged by the House itself. I believe—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not interpret Beauchesne as it ought to be interpreted. I say this in fairness to the hon. member. My interpretation, and I believe it is the traditional interpretation, is that a decision has to be taken by the House when the Chair has ruled there is a prima facie case of privilege. This is a decision which in all instances the Chair unfortunately has the duty and responsibility to render. My thought when the hon. member raised the point originally was that because of precedents it could not be raised as a question of privilege. I was hoping the minister would not raise the subsequent question of privilege; however, he did.

The hon. member is rising on another question of privilege. I have to rule again that this is a matter for debate with reference to a long-standing grievance which individual members may very well have against the executive. Unfortunately for the hon. member and for other hon. members who feel the same way as he does, that such statements should be made in the House rather than outside the House, the weight of jurisprudence is there to say that the matter cannot be debated. The Chair is in the position of having to rule that it is not a question of privilege, although it may be a very legitimate grievance.

I seek the assistance of hon. members to go on with the business of the chamber. I realize this is an important question. Maybe I should look into the matter further, but I believe from time to time I have looked into it quite closely. For the moment I ask the assistance of hon. members to allow the House to go on with another subject.

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if the ruling which you have made in your wisdom is allowed to stand now, any future government is given the right to treat matters of great importance to Parliament and to the country in this way, and I feel—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is not raising a new question of privilege. If I am to remain Speaker of this House I cannot allow hon. members simply to disregard decisions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I see around me 262 members who would be better Speakers than I am, but for the moment I stand in this place and hold from hon. members the responsibility to be the Speaker of this House. I have made a decision. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has always been one of those who have supported the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I seek his assistance.

Mr. Hees: I have always supported your decisions, Mr. Speaker, and I accept this one. I was about to appeal to Your Honour's sense of fairness and ask you not to make your final decision now but to delay it for a few hours for consideration, as has been done in the past. Whenever you make your decision, I and my hon. friends will accept it.

Mr. Speaker: As the hon. member will recognize, this is a point which has been raised very often. If it were a new point, perhaps the Chair would not be justified in making an immediate judgment. But it is a point which has been raised on numerous occasions—not only this year, not only last year, but on many occasions—and the decision has always been the same. While there may be a grievance there is not a question of privilege, and I feel bound by the decisions of my worthy predecessors and by the earlier rulings I myself have made.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I rise in my usual non-controversial way to make a statement which I think has been agreed upon in connection with the business of the House for the balance of the present week.

The first item today will be as announced previously, the resumed debate on second reading of the bill to amend the National Parks Act, to be followed by the resumed debate on second reading of the oil and gas conservation amendment. For tomorrow we would call the report stage of the bill to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act and Thursday would be an opposition day under the auspices of the Ralliement des Créditistes—the Social Credit Rally. On Friday we would take up the third reading of the Company of Young Canadians bill if it has not been passed on the previous day, to be followed by the report stage of the International Development Research Centre bill.

CANADIAN INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

TABLING OF ANNUAL REVIEW FOR 1969

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and in French of the annual review of the Canadian International Development Agency for 1969.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to present a non-controversial motion to the House. I ask leave, seconded by my hon. friend from Sainte-Marie, to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the postal slowdown in the city of Montreal which has crippled mail service, a concern which is within the administrative responsibility of the government of Canada and which has presently reached crisis proportions.

• (2:30 p.m.)

May I simply state that I am moving this motion for what I think are obvious reasons. Great concern has been expressed in many quarters at the minister's mishandling of the dispute which began on February 2 and is already imposing costly burdens on mail users in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the Leader of the Opposition for interrupting his statement. I know we are operating under relatively new Standing Orders, but the Standing Order in question indicates that the only statement that can be made by an hon. member making a motion under Standing Order 26 is the statement that he has proposed for consideration by the Chair. I suggest that the hon. member has given the essence of his argumentation, and I think a ruling should be given on the basis of the statement presented to the Chair under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

I can assure the Leader of the Opposition and all hon. members that this is a rather difficult decision to make. I fully understand the complexity of the problem that is now before us. It is never easy in any circumstance for the Chair to decide whether the business of the House should be adjourned for the purpose of considering a specific matter of urgent and national importance.

This is a matter of urgent importance and national interest. In the circumstances I am wondering whether we should adjourn the House to consider the matter. In many of these decisions the Chair has to make a judgment decision by taking into account the facts as they are known to Mr. Speaker. I sometimes wonder whether this means that I should consult with hon. members who are familiar with the situation, or whether I should be satisfied with reading the newspapers and listening to radio or television broadcasts and then making my judgment on the facts as they are known to me. I am afraid that this is all that can be done.

Without having held consultations of any kind, my understanding from my reading of the news is that consultations or meetings are to be held today. Obviously these consultations will be of some importance and their results will be relevant to the urgency of this matter. My own view would be that I would be well advised not to make an affirmative ruling at this moment, though this is without prejudice to the right of the Leader of the Opposition to make his motion tomorrow or at a later date depending on the outcome of discussions which may be taking place at this time.

On the basis of this rather unprofessional information I would think hon. members would agree with me that it would not be wise for the Chair to put the motion at this time. It might be premature on my part to put the motion today. However, at the same time I fully reserve the right of the Leader of the Opposition to propose the motion to the House either tomorrow or later.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: The member for Charlevoix is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the House would agree to revert to motions, but since it has been said a moment ago that the Postmaster General had a very important meeting this morning with the C.N.T.U. officials in connection with this important mail problem in Montreal and its national implications, I wonder whether the House would agree to the minister making a statement about the meeting held this morning. If there is unanimous consent, I think the minister might inform the hon. members.

Mr. Speaker: Does the House agree to revert to motions so as to enable the minister to make a statement on the subject mentioned by the member for Charlevoix?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be an agreement. Let us therefore revert to motions.

[English]

I recognize the minister so he can make a statement at this time.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

POST OFFICE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON MONTREAL DISPUTE

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I met the leaders of the C.N.T.U. this morning. The position of the federal government was discussed at length, and I handed the union leaders a letter describing this position in definite terms. It would be advisable, with the unanimous consent of the House, that I table copies of this letter in the two official languages. I feel this would clarify the situation and keep all members posted.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The minister is suggesting that the House give unanimous consent to allowing the minister to table a certain document. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, on Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: If it is the unanimous wish of the House, the letter referred to by the minister could be printed as an appendix to Hansard. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of letter, see appendix.]

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's tabling of documents will not make the present situation very clear to the House. A statement by him might give members the opportunity to make comments. In my opinion, the minister should be allowed to make a statement. Evidently, without having read the documents he has just tabled, there can be no comments on the meeting and his discussions of this morning with the C.N.T.U. representatives.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: This puts the Chair in a difficult position. The minister was invited to make a statement.

Mr. Fairweather: He did not make one.

Mr. Speaker: Well, the minister spoke to the subject. According to the Standing Orders, one spokesman on behalf of each of the parties in opposition has the same privilege. It may be that some hon. members felt the statement might have been more complete, but a statement was made. Hon. members have the right if they wish, as representatives of their parties, to speak and reply to the statement made by the minister.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, a long time ago, according to ancient history, the Israelites found it difficult to make bricks without straw. Similarly, I am tempted to accept the challenge of making a statement on the minister's non-statement.

There has been filed some sort of letter. I am very much afraid that in my absence the minister, who has been in hot water a good deal, has really got himself in the steam this time. I am very sorry that things have reached such an impasse in Montreal, where a very serious stoppage of mail has developed and where there have been outbreaks of violence. While I cannot for a moment condone some of the reports of violent activity, neither can I exonerate the minister from developing, through his abrasiveness and his typical incapacity for dealing with people who work for and in his department, the kind of regrettable relationship that has brought about this mail stoppage, one that is affecting not only Montreal and its environs but everyone in the country. In these days of austerity, with so many services being cut back as far as the Canadian public is concerned, if we cannot expect at least reasonable delivery of mail under reasonable conditions, then we have reached a very unhappy situation.

There is much more that could be said, but I am far more anxious for the mails to go through and for the minister, by happenstance, by circumstance, by luck or by some sign of the Zodiac, to come to a successful conclusion of this problem than I am to make political capital out of what is a regrettable situation. I hope there is something more in the letter than there frequently is in the communications of the Minister of Communications.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, the minister's non-statement was so short that I did not catch everything he said. However, without for a moment condoning the acts of violence which are taking place in Montreal and without knowing the full details of the particular difficulty in which the minister is now, we have had sufficient experience with the minister and with his complete refusal to try to deal with the employees of the Post Office Department with any kind of equity and common sense that I am not surprised he is in trouble.

I can remember that on an earlier occasion the minister was asked to bring in some people who understand what labour relations are in the 1960's and 1970's instead of 100 years ago. The minister brushed aside such suggestions only to have an arbitrator tell him that what he had been doing in respect of a specific case was completely wrong. I know there are other difficulties in the Post Office Department which will come to a head shortly. I can only join with the hon. member for Hillsborough in asking the minister to look into the matter again, meet with the people himself and encourage his officials who have been so incompetent in dealing with labour relations in the past to try to reach a solution which will be equitable not only to the department but to the employees who have worked for the department for some considerable time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the statement just made by the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans), when he tabled letters is, in our view, the most remarkable he has since he became minister.

While I was listening to him the other day on a CBC program, the minister merely replied to the sensible questions put to him by the interviewer: those are illegal strikes. Four strikes have started among postal employees in Montreal, and all are illegal. Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect I would like to stress. When a minister or any other employer is himself involved in a conflict, his duty is not to assess the legality of the conflict but to see to it that it is solved and that the Canadian people are given flawless service.

Postal services are essential, but the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications, through his legal or illegal support of patronage, has created a situation where the people of Canada's metropolis are now severely inconvenienced.

What is more, I read in today's Le Devoir and I quote:

A Montreal radio station has announced that Mr. Kierans had threatened to make Toronto the main transfer point for mail, but Le Devoir has been unable to confirm this news.

Of course, neither the newspaper nor any member of the opposition succeeded in having the news confirmed because right from the start, the minister was firmly glued to his seat and let the conflict get worse.

Mr. Speaker, we hope a jury set up for this purpose will solve the conflict and will force the minister to take his responsibilities in order to ensure a perfect service and to eliminate political patronage in this sector.

Postal services are expensive enough, since the implementation of the minister's new policy, to warrant the population an impeccable service.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GRAIN

NON-PRODUCTION OF WHEAT—ASSISTANCE TO FARMERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Wheat Board. Would the minister, who evidently has now advised many western wheat farmers not to plant wheat on their land this year, say whether this announcement or statement of government policy is to be followed by any government measure which will make it practical for the farmers in question to survive through the year without farming their lands?

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of the cash and income position of the farmers on the prairies is under review. The point, of course, which the Leader of the Opposition seems to have missed is that the farmers to whom I was particularly speaking have sufficient grain on hand already to meet the quota they are likely to have for this year and next year. So their gross income is fixed by the fact that they have this grain on hand. By the non-production of their land they will have less costs for the period and therefore this will improve their net income position.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I assure the minister I did not miss the point but perhaps I did not quite grasp the point of how a farmer can farm without farming. I would ask the minister to explain to the House and the country, having given this advice to the farmers—and I suggest the minister has an obligation to do this immediately—what measures he has to advance on behalf of the government to enable the farmers to accept his advice and survive with any acceptable standard of living?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, it is my hope at an early date that we will be able to make further statements concerning government policy in respect of the use of agricultural land in this area. I said I hoped this can come at an early date because we are conscious of the fact that it is important for the farmer, who has his seeding plans to think about, to have such information as soon as possible.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, this supplementary question is based on a hope on my part that I may receive an answer. Is the minister in a position to say whether the government is prepared to adopt any program of providing some payments for farm storage in respect of wheat stored on the farms of farmers who the minister expects to live off the wheat they grew last year and the year before?

Mr. Lang: The issue of payments to farmers for grain stored on the farm is rather a distinct and different issue. We do have that matter under consideration along with many others. I have made it quite clear that I consider it to be an obvious point that the agricultural industry should arrive at some sensible conclusion about the desirable amount of inventory for the agricultural industry as a whole to hold. Having reached that decision, we must decide how and in what way the inventory should be held in order to minimize the cost of holding it and thereby maximize the return to the farmer.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the income of the western farmer is not only fixed but is rapidly approaching zero, can the Minister without Portfolio tell the House what real objectives the government has in terms of selling wheat and providing adequate income so that the farmers do not all go broke?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me the hon. member is reiterating in substance a question just asked by the Leader of the Opposition.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether his declaration of defeatism and despair with regard to the western farmer represents the result of his deep thought and consideration of this problem when in London?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the question as asked is in order.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. After the fresh-air treatment we have had from the minister I wonder whether he would clarify the situation in respect of the farmers having grain on hand to meet their 1970-71 delivery quotas by indicating what these deliveries might be? Will there be a six-bushel quota, a four-bushel quota or the unit they have this year?

Mr. Lang: It is my hope and expectation that we will be making fairly firm statements about the expectations for this year and next year in connection with delivery opportunities. I should point out to hon. members that in fact the sales effort by the Canadian Wheat Board has met with tremendous success during the current year. As a result there will be another 260 million bushels going into export during the rest of the crop year.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of the fact that the only time a federal minister asked the western farmers to take land out of production, the government of that time paid the farmers a stated amount per acre as an incentive and as compensation for the fact that their land would not be producing any paying crop, may I ask the minister now whether it is the government's intention to pay the farmers an acreage payment for every acre they take out of production at his request?

Mr. Lang: I should like to make it perfectly clear that what has been going on so far are discussions between myself and a number of farmers about the logical position in which they are, and no statement of government policy on this has been made as yet. The question of what will be contained in a statement of government policy will have to await a statement of that policy.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How about a logical government policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We will try to allow all hon. members who wish to ask supplementary questions to do so during the 40-minute question period, but perhaps we should try to limit ourselves as much as possible and allow individual members one or two supplementary questions each, which will just about take up the 40 minutes.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I ask the minister one further supplementary question. Are we to understand from the minister's statement now that he was not enunciating government policy but merely telling the farmers how to farm, and that the government has no intention whatsoever of compensating the farmers for following his advice?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that the minister is quoted as saying, in the context of his remarks that farmers leave their wheat land idle, "that there were 24 million acres planted to wheat last year that cannot be usefully switched to another crop", will the minister advise the House whether it is his opinion and that of his officials that all other grain commodities that might be grown on this land are now in sufficient or surplus supply and that no other commodities or other kinds of grain need to be grown?

Mr. Lang: The best opinion available, as indicated in such things as the Outlook Conference, was that the acreage available for grains and crops other than wheat last year was about the right amount of acreage for those crops again this year. That does not mean that each crop should have the same acreage. Indeed it is indicated that there should be some increases in some crops and small decreases in others. It means that there is in fact only a small margin of room for additional production in the total non-wheat area, and this leads to the problem of what to do with land if it is moving out of wheat production. The obvious thing that must be avoided is that it go in great quantity into the non-wheat crops and produce serious oversupply in those areas.

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio. In his reply to the Leader of the Opposition he said that some farmers had enough wheat to supply the market for the next two years. Is he implying by that remark that the farmer can live and meet his expenses for—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is argumentative.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio. In view of the most recent statements of the minister, is he now recommending to the government that a deficiency payment should be made to farmers in western Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, government policy will be announced as soon as it is decided.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister without Portfolio. I wonder, when the minister announces to the House government policy that will be followed to assist and advise the western farmers in their dilemma, whether he will assure the House that he will not simply advise them to diversify into livestock feeding operations and thereby create another problem for the farmers in the east?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that was very much what was in my mind when I talked to farmers about acreage diversion problems, that to simply take their acreage out of wheat and put it into other crops would be relatively dangerous because the other crops would then be in over-supply.

[Later:]

Mr. McKinley: Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister misunderstood my question to a certain extent, in spite of my explanation, and farmers will not find it satisfactory to have a minister like that in charge of their business—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, he should try to ask it at this time.

Mr. McKinley: I will, Mr. Speaker, thank you. What I particularly asked was that the minister not simply inform western farmers that they should go into the feeding of livestock and thereby put the eastern farmer out of business.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, will the minister undertake to make a statement on motions in the near future clarifying the government's position on the matters upon which he has been questioned today? Will he also undertake to follow up on reports of further opportunities for grain sales and wheat sales to eastern Europe, including the country of Roumania in particular?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I can assure hon. members that the Wheat Board and the government follow up any report and any possibility for grain sales. I would expect that before too long I would be in a position to make a statement on government policy in this area.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question of the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Wheat Board. Would the minister kindly inform the House when his leave of absence from the University of Saskatchewan expires?

Mr. Baldwin: Are there any judicial openings in Saskatchewan?

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REVISION OF QUOTA SYSTEM

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): My supplementary question to the minister is: Has the minister now received the recommendations of the special committee which is revising the Wheat Board quota system and, if so, will he make a statement to the House on motions on this urgent and important subject?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): We do not have the final report from the group of men advising us on the quota system, but I hope to have it at an early date and then to make a statement on the proposed quota system or any changes in it.

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PLANS TO INCREASE SALES ON LONDON MARKET

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a supplementary question for the minister. Would he take the first opportunity on motions to outline to the House what action the government plans to take in view of the information given to the minister and the members of the Wheat Board who were with him in London a few days ago that the reason Canada has been losing sales on the London market is that the Canadian export program has not been adjusted to meet the changing demands of that market during the past several years?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): That statement is an over-simplification of a very complicated subject. The loss of sales to the United Kingdom was due in good part to the fact that during a major portion of the year in question we were holding our minimum prices at the IGA level when many of our competitors were not, and I do not propose to make a statement on motions on that subject.

Mr. Hees: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In other words, in this government's view the customer is always wrong.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: Are there any vacant judgeships in Saskatchewan?

[Translation]

PROTEIN CONTENT OF CANADIAN WHEAT

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member for Frontenac wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Frontenac.

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board.

Have studies been carried out or are there some under way to ensure that Canadian wheat for exports will have a higher protein content?

[English]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): This question is under consideration at the present time, and I expect that we will be in a position to make statements on it in due course.

DEFINITION OF DURUM WHEAT—FINAL PAYMENT

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Minister without Portfolio now have a statement to make regarding the definition of Durum wheat and whether a final payment will be made on this grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not have any statement to make.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF TASK FORCE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the importance of the report of the task force on agriculture to the farmers' spring plans and the fact that the minister has had it in his hands for the past several weeks, can he inform the House and the farmers of Canada when this report will be tabled?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as soon as it is printed.

POSSIBLE MORATORIUM ON PAYMENTS ON FARMERS' LOANS

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture which is related to this whole topic. In light of the very stringent economic situation at present existing in the agricultural industry and more particularly in western Canada, can the minister say whether any decision has been made with respect to declaring a moratorium on the repayment of interest and principal on current farm improvement loans, Farm Credit Corporation loans and machinery syndicate loans?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I have answered a question similar to this one several times in the House. I can repeat the answer by saying that any person who has a Farm Credit Corporation loan and wishes to make an application to the corporation and can substantiate that he is unable to make the payments may have those payments deferred. But the hon. member should be aware of that because I have stated it about 14 times in the House.

[Later:]

Mr. Southam: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is related to the one I put to the Minister of Agriculture a moment ago. In view of his arrogant reply to me that he had answered this question 14 times before, did he give those answers outside the House because he sure as heck didn't give them in the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I should like to direct a supplementary question to both ministers but in light of the fact that the minister in charge of the Wheat Board has had to answer a number of questions, I will direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture.

The question is related to the one put by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain with regard to the repayment of interest on loans. In view of the Barber Commission report and the number of foreclosures on farm machinery by machine and finance companies and in view of the minister's talks with the machine companies with regard to the findings of the Barber Commission on the sale of farm machinery, would he request in the future—I know he has not done so in the past—that these machinery companies place a moratorium on foreclosures and on the reclaiming of their farm machinery until the farmers are in a position to sell grain and to pay for the machinery, which they mostly want to do?

Mr. Olson: It is not quite right to say that I did not discuss this matter with some of the manufacturers—

Mr. Horner: You said so yourself.

[Mr. Southam.]

Mr. Olson: —although it was not a subject matter that was contained in the Barber Commission report. But I did draw to the attention of the presidents of some of the companies that there was some concern about this matter, and they have advised me that they have renewed and deferred a large number of the notes that they are holding for farm machinery in Canada.

Mr. Horner: Would the minister disclose to the House and to the country the number of loans that were being foreclosed and the percentage of loans on which the machine companies have agreed to place a moratorium or to delay foreclosures?

Mr. Olson: I am not sure I can get that information in the way asked by the hon. member, but certainly I could ask them whether they could provide us with some of that information.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—ESTABLISHMENT OF A PARK IN ST. MAURICE

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Has his department made any decision concerning the national park in the St. Maurice valley?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, no final decision has been made; however, I am supposed to meet with the provincial authorities tomorrow concerning that problem as well as that of the Forillon national park.

[English]

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO DE HAVILLAND STOL AIRCRAFT PROGRAM

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce if there has been federal government assistance involved continue its DHC-7 STOL aircraft program and, if so, what is the nature of this assistance and its extent?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, up to in the decision of de Havilland Canada to now the government has given $1.4 million for this program but another $3.1 million will be added to that, making a $4.5 million total.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

HAY LAKES—ALLEGED MISUSE OF BAND FUNDS BY GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for which I am sure he is waiting. I see him opening his music book. Can he reply to the question I asked yesterday and Friday with regard to the allegations about irregularities with regard to the Assumption Band resolutions at Hay Lakes?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did receive a telegram Friday from the chief concerned. I immediately ordered an investigation, and some officials of the Financial Branch of my department will go on the spot without delay in order to ascertain whether there have been irregularities.

The first report I received states that every expenditure has been approved by the band council. However, an official of my department will investigate more fully on the spot either today or tomorrow, or later this week.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that some of the allegations, which are substantiated by affidavit, are that the chief and the band council signed resolutions in blank which were subsequently filled out by departmental officials, will the minister co-operate and facilitate the inquiry by the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development into these very serious charges, having in mind the position of unrest in which many Indians now find themselves in in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am expecting a report from the officials of my department on that matter. As for my hon. friend's suggestion, I shall be pleased to study it, and I shall advise the House accordingly.

[English]

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister and ask him if the Auditor General and his staff have been called to investigate this discrepancy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with that aspect of the administration.

[English]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ACQUISITION OF CANADIAN COACHWAYS BY GREYHOUND LINES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Some weeks ago I asked him about the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission to approve the application of Greyhound Bus Lines of Chicago to acquire Canadian Coachways. The minister promised to look into the matter and to consider my request that the Canadian government intervene to prevent this takeover. Is the minister prepared to make any report to the House on what decision he has reached?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is a rather lengthy reply on this matter which I apologize I ought to have given to the hon. member earlier. If it is agreeable to him I will give it to him in writing now. If there are subsequent questions on it he can ask me at that time.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): As a supplementary question may I ask the minister if, in looking over the transcript, he has read the briefs of some of the other bus companies which point out that the granting of this application to Greyhound will mean they will have a virtual monopoly, and will control 70 per cent of the bus mileage in western Canada, and if in the light of that the minister does not think this takeover should be prevented in order to maintain some competition?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary is an argument.

POLLUTION

WRECKING OF TANKER "ARROW"—SIGNING BY CAPTAIN OF FORM AUTHORIZING SALVAGE ATTEMPT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and I hope you will bear with me briefly while I lay the groundwork for it. When the oil tanker Arrow grounded on Cerberus rock on Tuesday last, the salvage master at Halifax ordered the tug Foundation Valiant to the site, and had the tug Foundation Vigilant available. In order to make an attempt to salvage the ship, Lloyd's open form had to be signed by the captain of the oil tanker. Did the captain of the tanker agree to sign this form so that an attempt could be made to salvage the Arrow by putting a line on board the ship?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer this question of my own knowledge. I will look into it immediately and advise the hon. member as quickly as possible.

Mr. Crouse: While the minister is looking into that aspect of the question, will he also indicate or ascertain if possible why permission to lighten the Arrow was refused by the captain of the tanker when the tanker Imperial Acadia arrived on the scene at midnight, Tuesday?

WRECKING OF TANKER "ARROW"—NATURE OF INQUIRY

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Transport since he was not in the House the other night when I took part in the late show. Will the inquiry ordered into this disaster be conducted by somebody completely divorced from the Department of Transport and from the oil shipping industry?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are looking into what is the most appropriate method. I agree with the hon. member that it should be an independent inquiry, and whatever is the best method to achieve this, that we will use. May I also apologize to the hon. member for not being here for the late show. It was due to an error in the late show notification procedures, as I think he knows.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister did not make a statement in the House today on the reorganization of his department, will he consider making a statement in the House at the earliest moment, say tomorrow or this week, on all aspects of this Arrow tragedy, including whether the reorganization of the department will help the Department of Transport respond to such unfortunate accidents in a way that will prevent damage to our coasts?

Mr. Jamieson: I shall be glad to make a statement later when the situation is clear, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Mr. Nowlan: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister could include in his statement the relationship, if any, that there has been between the National Research Council and the Defence Research Council on the whole question of how oil pollutes water and how to get rid of it.

WRECKING OF TANKER "ARROW"—DAMAGE SUFFERED BY FISHERMEN

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. I should like to ask whether he and his department are pursuing any course to assess the damage suffered by the fishermen as a result of oil escaping from the Arrow, and whether the minister is considering any recourse against those responsible for the damage with a view to the government and the fishermen being recouped for the damage likely to be suffered?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker. Mr. John Daziel, of the fisheries department is acting as coordinator of a technical group on ecological control in the area looking into the damage to marine life. We are also actively looking at the possibility of recovering costs which may be suffered by the fishermen in the area.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if there was in fact a contingency plan to deal with the adverse effect of oil pollution?

Mr. Davis: I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that contingency plans have been under discussion and in the process of development for about 12 months, under the chairmanship of the Department of Transport.

Mr. Bell: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. May I take it from the minister that there were not, in fact, contingency plans as intimated by his Parliamentary Secretary on January 14?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I understand there were contingency plans under development and meetings were being held as recently as three weeks ago to finalize these plans.

LABOUR RELATIONS

FORT GARRY HOTEL STRIKE—USE OF OTHER PERSONNEL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. On Wednesday of last week I asked him if he would look into the matter of the Fort Garry Hotel in Winnipeg bringing in outside personnel to maintain operations in the face of a legal and legitimate strike. Has the minister been able to do so and has he been able to do anything to put a stop to this practice?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to do anything to put a stop to the practice. I have brought the reports to the attention of the CNR which operates the hotel and this seems to me as much as I would be able to do under the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister discussed this matter with his colleague, the Minister of Labour, who has a labour code which calls for fair labour practices?

[Translation]

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL—MEASURES TO SETTLE POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications.

When will the minister be in a position to advise the House that he has found a way to settle the present postal dispute in Montreal and what steps does his Department intend to take to settle this dispute?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General and Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker I would advise the hon. member to read carefully the letter I just tabled. He will then be better informed and learn about the measures I intend to implement.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Can the minister tell the House if his department intends to transfer the postal distribution centre from Montreal to Toronto as a step conducive to the settlement of this dispute?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I never said that and nobody can ascribe such an intention to me. I merely said that temporarily, the mail sent from one part of the country to another would not be routed through Montreal.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to know whether the minister, after his meeting this morning with union representatives, was given the assurance that the agitation will cease in Montreal and that regular mail deliveries will be resumed. If not, can the minister tell us what contingency action he intends to take, such as the steps he mentioned yesterday were to be taken today in order to bring about normal mail delivery in Montreal?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I told the two CNTU representatives this morning that I certainly intend to apply the legislation as adopted by the House.

The law requires that I call for tenders and that is what I did. We have adjudicated contracts to five new contractors. The agreements are signed and we are bound by them. Therefore, we only have to decide what we can do for those who will not be hired by the new contractors.

There are some steps we can take with the assistance and support of my colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen). At this stage, may I say that Mr. Grenier, assistant deputy minister of Manpower and Immigration was present at this morning's meeting. At the end of the meeting, all were aware of our position and I told them I was at their disposal whenever they wanted.

Mr. Asselin: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Did the union accept the minister's position and will they advise the workers to resume mail delivery in Montreal?

If they rejected it, does the minister intend to take strict measures to ensure the mail delivery?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, the representatives of the CNTU have asked the minister to guarantee the statute of their union. I simply told them: Your statute is spelled out in the contract which binds you to your employers. You have already lost one, that is Rod Service Limited, and you are in the process of losing another. That is your business.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the minister in the midst of his flight of oratory, but I think this is more a debate than a series of questions and answers.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

When the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications says that the present strike in Montreal which paralyses the postal service is unlawful, does he say that on the advice of a legal counsel from the Department of Labour or from his own department?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, even the union representatives admit that their present activity is unlawful.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I want to put a supplementary question to the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications.

As it was said that new contractors were responsible for mail delivery, will the government find itself under the obligation to buy the trucks of G. Lapalme Inc.?

Mr. Kierans: In view of the fact that, last year, we granted a contract for one year only, it is necessary to assure now the contractor that if the contract is terminated at the end of the year, as we did, he cannot, of course, claim for tax purposes the full depreciation on the trucks. We shall accept, then, to buy his trucks if he is willing to sell them.

This strike is not only unlawful but I can add that at the present time the people of Montreal are blackmailed by the union members.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question based upon the minister's conciliatory letter. Has the minister ascertained from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration that the unemployment situation in Montreal is such that he can obtain 350 drivers immediately?

Mr. Kierans: Yes. Mr. Speaker, you suggested a little earlier that I was brief in my statement. Perhaps you will permit me to welcome the hon. member for Hillsborough back to active service in the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, as an exchange of courtesies I should like to ask the Postmaster General if he would tell us, in relation to the contracts signed with other subcontractors, does the department require re-employment of those persons already employed by Lapalme Inc.?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for Sainte-Marie for his courtesy. I would say that this is not something that we do at any time. We simply ask for submissions and tenders and award the contracts in accordance with the law to the lowest tenderers, while taking into account such conditions as capability, financial stability and so on. This is what we have done. Their arrangement with that particular union, whether it be the Teamsters, CNTU or any other union, is their affair. I could not myself—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we ought perhaps to go on to another subject, because there are only two minutes left before the end of the oral question period.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPLICATION RESPECTING FLOODING OF LAND NEAR SKAGIT RIVER

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources .Perhaps he could take it as notice. Has the city of Seattle applied to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources for an exemption under the International River Improvements Act to allow the Seattle Power and Light Company to flood Canadian territory by raising the height of the dam on the Skagit River?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that is a proper question for the Order Paper.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

NORTHWEST PASSAGE—PREPARATION OF REGULATIONS RESPECTING NAVIGATION AND POLLUTION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the House if his department is preparing appropriate regulations with respect to navigation and pollution in the area known as the Northwest Passage. Also, is he providing for appropriate navigational aids in the areas?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder how urgent this question is. It seems to me that this question and the one asked previously might be the types of questions which normally ought to be placed on the Order Paper.

Mr. Nesbitt: With respect, Mr. Speaker, Your Honour will perhaps recall that a number of questions have been asked in the last few days with respect to the immediately projected voyage of the Manhattan through this area. It is a large ship. Perhaps Your Honour might permit the question in the circumstances.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have forgotten part of the question. In any event, so far as navigational aids and the like are concerned, many such aids are in place and have been in place for some time. We are constantly attempting to upgrade them, regardless of the kind of activity going on in the area and regardless of whether the Manhattan is to undertake a second voyage or not. On the matter of pollution, hon. members will recall that, as indicated in the House, legislation in that regard is coming forward.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Manhattan is to undertake the projected voyage through the area, will the ship require a special permit from the Department of Transport to go through these waters?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I have said repeatedly that this is a hypothetical question. There has been no request for the Manhattan to go through.

FISHERIES

CANADA-U.S. DRAFT AGREEMENT ON FISHING PRIVILEGES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry about the draft agreement between Canada and the United States regarding reciprocity of fishing privileges in the fishing zones of each country. If the minister is agreeable, we could immediately and without debate refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for examination before ratification.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I understand that it is a draft agreement which is subject to ratification. It would have to be ratified both by the Canadian and United States governments. It is not really appropriate, therefore, to make it available for this House at this stage.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, surely a just society can conceive ways of doing things differently. I submit the minister ought to give our people an opportunity to see what it is that has been negotiated.

Mr. Stanfield: This government will not do that.

Mr. Baldwin: Not this fishy government.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, may I make a supplementary answer to a previous question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has expired. Is the minister seeking permission to continue the question period beyond the allotted time for the purpose of answering a question asked earlier this afternoon?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INDUSTRY

ASSISTANCE TO DE HAVILLAND STOL AIRCRAFT PROGRAM

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I make a supplementary answer with respect to the de Havilland DH-7 STOL aircraft. The figures given were for this year only. In the communiqué issued yesterday, I said that this matter would be reviewed at the end of the year.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION, ACQUISITION, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-152, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-152 purports to amend the national parks policy of Canada and, among other things, to set up another Crown corporation to take this rather difficult business out of the realm of politics. If I thought that the purpose of the bill was to reform the national parks policy of Canada and take such an important subject out of the realm of politics by setting up another Crown corporation, I should support it. But on neither of these counts am I satisfied; nor do I think Canada's best interests would be protected by passage of this bill.

I shall confine most of my remarks to the way this problem affects the people of Alberta and, of course, the people of Canada. I have some intimate knowledge of the subject because I had the honour to represent the electoral district of Athabasca for some ten years. Wood Buffalo Park, an area of some 14,000 square miles, is mostly in that constituency. That park is larger than ten of the countries of Europe.

When the government tries to sell its parks policy it trots out arguments about the love of nature, the preservation of beauty and the conservation of our animal life. When I tried to use some common sense in connection with the subject as it pertained to Wood Buffalo Park, I saw many crocodile tears shed over the whooping crane. Some 50 whooping cranes are now left, and I do not think that we need put aside 14,000 square miles of territory to protect the whooping crane. Anyone who argues that way is being preposterous. The whooping cranes all nest in a very limited area and need only a few square miles of land to be protected forever.

The examination of our national parks policy should not be undertaken lightly. We must consider not only the 20 million odd Canadians who may enjoy utilizing out-of-door recreational activities but the many hundreds of thousands of visitors from foreign lands who come to our parks. The parks form an important keystone in the tourist industry of Canada which is providing numerous jobs for Canadians. I hope that the idea of people working hard and honestly for their living is not becoming an anachronism, particularly when the people are entrepreneurs.

I, for one, think that no government owned and operated corporation can supply the type of service required by those who enjoy fresh air or contemplating the beauty of our mountains and parks as well as those private individuals who are dedicated to supplying those facilities which will preserve the natural beauty of which we are so justly proud. I am against the present trend evidenced in Bill C-152 being foisted on the tourist industry of Canada which apparently has been almost completely ignored in our search for a national answer to this important problem. Perhaps we ought to consider for a moment just how the problem has come about. Why should individuals in Canada claim they have any right to live or operate businesses in our national parks? The answer is fairly simple. At the time the national parks were set up there were no service towns in a great many of these areas.

I wish to deal with the town of Jasper. The people who lived in Jasper were asked to co-operate, invest, build their homes and to invite their friends to come there. The Canadian National Railways moved their railway town, Lucerne, which at that time was several miles away, and set up the town of Jasper. They moved their divisional point there and in order to spur growth the Lake Edith subdivision was created. This is a few miles from the town of Jasper. The problem which affects the Lake Edith subdivision is typical of the problem which we face when we drive people out of the parks.

These people were given renewable leases for 42 year periods. One of the stipulations was that they were to comply with certain rigid standards. From my own experience gained from visiting these subdivisions and the town of Jasper, these people not only adhered to these standards to the letter, but went further than that. They built beautiful homes which are a credit to Canada. Rather than taking away from the natural beauty of Jasper Park, in many cases they added beauty comparable to that in the beautiful recreation areas in Switzerland and other parts of Europe. The chalets, hotels and business places they built are a great credit. I see no reason why in the future these people, who have done so well in the past, should not be allowed to retain their family, business and community interest in the towns scattered throughout our parks. These were their own creation. Without them the popularity of our whole tourist industry may not have gained the international reputation which it enjoys today.

Over the years a true community spirit has developed in Jasper. The people are proud of their well kept homes and yards. They are proud of the achievements of their sons and daughters in sports which have been engendered by the use of the parks up to the present time. They are proud of their social, military and business activities. The people of Jasper are proud of a job well done in providing services to the travelling public and to the transportation industry, without which the use of our parks would have been impossible. I refer of course to the railroad companies and their employees who live in these communities. They are proud of their friendships which they have developed with travellers from all parts of the world. They are proud of the recognition they receive amongst the tourist resorts of the world. The people of Jasper and Banff are proud of the fact that they have continually lived in these towns and have developed well managed businesses, homes and communities which have been maintained and improved until the natural beauty of their surroundings has been enhanced rather than downgraded by the fact that they live there.

Canada's great playgrounds and great heritage of wildlife and splendour are in good hands. An attempt is now being made to change the lives of these people and these communities with a mere stroke of the pen. Their leases are being cancelled by legal means or foul. An appeal against the unilateral and arbitrary cancellation of leases has been won by residents of the parks in the Exchequer Court of Canada, but the parks department has appealed the ruling. As this matter is sub judice, I do not hope to influence the matter one way or another. However, I detect a certain undue haste to have Bill C-152 passed before the decision of the court is given.

Leases are not to be renewed. Land rentals are to be increased up to 4,000 per cent. Why? The regulations are being made more stringent. Decisions of the department are being delayed longer and longer in a snarl of red tape. A campaign of harassment against the residents is evident, and the people feel strongly about it as is indicated by their correspondence with their members of Parliament. They are continually complaining, but apparently their complaints fall on deaf ears. If the minister is aware of these complaints, he has not made any utterances which have allayed their fears.

Although it is difficult to pin down, these Park residents are being accused, and I have heard these accusations, of taking advantage of the position in which they have been. They have been accused of exploitation of the public. These accusations have been hurled against them without cause. It is the desire of some empire builders to take away from the people of Canada one more area and to enshrine it in bureaucracy. This is all being done with high sounding phrases which indicate the whole matter is above politics. I do not think there should be anything in Canada above politics. I think politics must be the highest calling in this country.

It is an insult to this institution and those of us who sit here who are properly adjusted, well-meaning men to suggest there is any necessity whatsoever to take matters out of politics. Politics should be at the level which I am talking about today. Parliament is and must remain the supreme court of the land. To say this is a democracy and then set up a few bureaucrats behind closed doors to run our affairs, thus taking them out of politics is sheer nonsense. I am not a cynical man, but I am practical. This is the last thing that should be done if the individual rights of Canadians are to remain where they should be, out in the open.

It has been said that we need an ombudsman. I like to think that we have 264 ombudsmen. This House is the place in which power should reside in Canada. I am not saying that the whole situation of national parks does not need to be looked at and looked at well, but it must be done with full consultation. It should certainly be done with the advice and consent of those people who have already established, not only in Canada but throughout the world, a reputation for being nature loving, a reputation for wishing to preserve beauty and a reputation for being willing to give their time, their talents and their money to see that the people who use the parks are encouraged to get out and enjoy them.

Nobody in his right mind would suggest we leave these parks with a high wall around them to prevent people from using them. And, of course, if people are to enjoy them we must resort to 20th century methods of getting them there rapidly and economically. We must also make sure that the ordinary people can enjoy the parks when they get there. These parks were set aside by our ancestors in their wisdom so that people could visit and enjoy them. It is not only those who can afford to stay in expensive hotels in Jasper on expense accounts who should benefit from them. The size of the parks is such that it is possible to zone them and still give the people an opportunity to get there and enjoy their beauty. It is not necessary to maintain them simply as a playground for the rich or as a means by which overambitious civil servants can build another empire.

Parks in other areas of Canada may present different problems. I do not think we have sufficient parks. Again, we fall back on the old excuse of the constitution. The provinces should be consulted on this matter; they are represented in this city at this very time. Consultation should be undertaken with them to find out whether they are willing to set aside further land for public use. If the federal government expects to acquire more land for this purpose it will have to get the people involved—the little people of Canada. Proper consideration and consultation is necessary or else the provinces will sit on their high horse and say: We alone are the protectors of civil liberties. Sometimes it looks as though this is true; it is a pity if it is.

I rarely criticize in this House unless I have a practical solution of some kind to offer. I do not advocate a simple hands-off policy. I do not say we had all the answers long ago and that nothing should be done to change the situation. Indeed, I believe it is time to follow a definite policy in connection with the zoning of our parks. Such a policy is necessary if we are to avoid confusion, injustice and political interference. I believe we must set aside the townsites in some way by agreement with the provinces—turn them back to the full jurisdiction of the provinces. It may well be provision should be made for a corridor through the parks for the sake of better transportation; the railroads did it before the parks were even opened up. We might well have to take the original act and revise it. In this regard, Bill C-152 is perhaps long overdue. But I do not want to see the parks get into the hands of greedy and ambitious people who trot out the whooping crane or the disappearing bison as excuses for denying the people of Canada proper access, or who, on the other hand limit the proper conservation of our wild life and natural beauty on the grounds that there might otherwise be certain injustices.

As to leases, I say that when it comes to paying compensation, or changing the terms of leases, let there be no star chamber tactics. The people of Jasper Park have told me they are quite willing to give up their leases any time it can be shown to them in fair discussion that their particular properties are needed for higher good. And by this, being the well-adjusted citizens they are, they mean that their property would be used by more people to greater advantage while still preserving the wild life and beauty to which I am sure we are all dedicated. This is an attitude on their part which I think has been overlooked. I have no hesitation in saying that these are the people to whom we should look for advice. They are not cold statisticians. Over the last 40 to 50 years they have shown the people of Canada and the world the type of hospitality which has given Alberta and western Canada a name which is a byword in the tourist industry.

As I say, there may be regional differences in what is required, but the general policy applied should be uniform. The Prince Albert National Park, created some years later than those in Alberta, has avoided some of the difficulties I have been discussing. Nevertheless, I understand there is a move on foot at the present time to expropriate owners there as well. I should like to know, and they would like to know—since these services must be provided by somebody—why it is that one person owning a motel should be expropriated to allow another person, arbitrarily chosen behind closed doors, to take over a perfectly legitimate way of earning a living. Why should land and property be removed without cause and given to somebody else?

Another point I wish to make is this: we should develop a national policy with regard to the parks and with regard, also, to the treatment of individuals. Why should leases be granted in one province for 99 years, in another for 42 years and in a third for 21 years? Why cannot the period be the same? I do not think we are likely to get away from this type of disparity by simply handing the whole question over to a Crown corporation which may or may not be in full possession of the facts. And if the corporation does happen to be in full possession of the facts, what guarantee is there that it will be in a better position to ensure equality of treatment across Canada than, say, a committee of this House?

Many other hon. members wish to speak in this debate. We want to hear from all the different areas in Canada. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that if this national parks policy is discussed openly, if we talk to the people of Banff, Jasper, Glacier Park and Wood Buffalo Park with the same frankness as they are willing to show, there need be no worries about constitutional difficulties or political infighting. These people are concerned primarily to earn an honest living by giving a service to the people of Canada. If anything can be learned from the record of the past, we can be sure that the future of our national parks will remain in good hands.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, this new bill on national parks could at long last facilitate the creation of this type of parks within the boundaries of Quebec.

The difficulties encouraged in drawing up the plans for the Forillon Park in the Gaspé Peninsula would have been lessened had this legislation already been adopted, and provided the minister does not intend secretly to modify the ultimate objective of those parks, I cannot but approve Bill C-152.

Indeed, the agreements reached between Quebec and Ottawa should not give rise to new sterile conflicts. Quebec is and must remain absolute master within its territory. Any beating around the bush designed to decrease the authority of the provinces within their respective territories would only be due to the ill will of the federal government for, in the final analysis, whether the money comes from Ottawa, the provinces or Quebec in particular, it always comes out of the pockets of the taxpayers. It is therefore unjust and inadmissible that a sector of the population should suffer from the consequences of constitutional disputes. For too long now Quebecers have suffered losses of money, prestige and progress because of the stupid stubbornness of the successive provincial governments whose verbal quarrels have engendered all the evils from which Quebec now suffers.

I should not like to blame exclusively the provincial governments. The whole ambiguous situation is caused by the federal government. The centralizing thrusts of the government, and more particularly of the Liberal governments, gave rise to all those difficulties. The offending paternalism of the federal government towards the provinces does not help matters either. The insatiable appetite of the federal Liberal government is only equalled by its cheekiness in offering or refusing the money required for the development of the provinces.

Such a childish game must stop. If the bill before us now sets clear relations between the parties concerned, upon the signing of the lease, strained relations such as the ones prevailing now with regard to Forillon park will be avoided.

We must avoid facing the same problems while preparing the plans of the future national park of the St. Maurice valley. For more than a year now, I have concerned myself greatly with that project, I have even made interventions in the House to that effect. Up to now, there was relative satisfaction as to the progress of that project. However, it seems that quarrels will break out as to the site of this national park.

An unbiased and very active committee, known as the committee of the future Mekinac national park, was set up.

I have received representations from almost everywhere and there is general agreement as to the site proposed by that committee. The St. Maurice valley wants its national park for it would be an economic incentive for the area.

We congratulate the Shawinigan committee especially, for their wonderful publicity. Moreover, the committee of the future Mekinac national park has become known through its studies, its briefs and its plans which they submitted to all concerned. The most important of those studies led to the selection of a remarkable site, which will be in the interest of the higher and the lower St. Maurice valley. The fact that forest workers had to be protected was taken into account. The economic survival of the eastern shore of the St. Maurice depends directly upon the forest. It is thus logical to propose a site where no important forest development is foreseen for the next 50 years. We can thus protect an important and essential industry of the area.

When choosing a site, it is necessary not to take into account the selfish interests of some individuals. The federal government will have to consider objectively all the projects that will be presented. The St. Maurice Valley will reject every biased argument, for instance, avoid choosing the eastern shore of the St. Maurice on the ground that it is part of the constituency of a Créditiste or the western shore because it is part of the constituency of the minister in charge of national parks, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) or because the Quebec Minister of Labour owns a cottage there. No. Let us be serious and realistic.

A national park must serve the people. The cost, the profit-earning capacity, public opinion are factors that are too important to be considered lightly and, consequently, the minister will have to take them into account.

In my humble opinion, the project that has been presented by the committee of St. Tite and of Ste. Thècle with regard to the choice of a site must be studied carefully and accepted. And especially, the minister must be very careful not to flounder in the meanders of the party in office in Quebec.

If one had to deal with one government only, there would probably be no difficulty. But since two levels of government are involved and bearing in mind that Quebec will soon call an election, any patronage or any undue influence that might prevail in such an important choice as that of the site for a national park should be viewed with suspicion.

Before talks go any further, I would like the responsible minister to be duly warned of the situation; he should not be deluded with political considerations, but should only be concerned with practical purposes. Quebec should accept the establishment of national parks on its territory. It has already recognized that principle.

I have always felt, however, it was unfortunate that for many years Quebec should have suffered a loss of money because of a misunderstanding with the central government. It would have been better I think to give the Quebec government the means to establish its own provincial parks while waiting for other agreements to be reached. Knowing how the Quebec government proceeds as a rule, it is better to take all that we can now although we might have, however, to preserve the major principle of the territorial sovereignty of the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely believe that the main purpose of this bill, as can be seen when we read between the lines, is to settle the conflict with regard to the stand taken by the responsible department and the Quebec government in that respect. If a change were made to the existing legislation and if the leases already signed were to be recognized by Quebec, this would preserve its territorial sovereignty. Thus, there would be no reluctance to promote the establishment of national parks in Quebec territory, particularly in an area such as the St. Maurice valley, where there is not a sufficient variety of industries. The establishment of such a park could greatly promote the economy of the area.

Before closing, I will then repeat that I am in favour of the principle of this bill. I hope that the minister will not get over concerned with minor issues when the time comes to select a site for a national park in the St. Maurice valley.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, since the rules of the House were amended we approach a bill on second reading a little differently than we did a year or so ago. Now, we approach a bill like C-152 to amend the National Parks Act with the knowledge that we are sending the bill to a committee where it will be examined clause by clause. We know that the members of the committee from both sides of the House will have an opportunity to call in experts to ensure they send back to the House a bill that has been amended and which can perhaps be improved at the report stage. So, it is in this spirit I approach the few remarks I wish to make in respect of this bill today; that is, with the idea of introducing perhaps a new suggestion into our consideration of national parks in Canada.

Only a few days ago the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) made the suggestion that the Strait of Georgia, the waters enclosed by the west coast of Canada and Vancouver Island, be made Canada's first national water park and that the waters of the Strait of Georgia, the land under the strait, the fish which swim in that strait and the marine life be protected under our National Parks Act. The people on the west coast have been very troubled about the possibility that the Strait of Georgia would be drilled for oil and that this enclosed body of water might become subject to the type of tragedy which has recently taken place in the Maritimes. The same type of tragedy has taken place off the coast of California where ruptures in the seabed at the site of offshore drilling have caused oil spills which have endangered marine life and destroyed valuable beach lands along the California coast. With this in mind, the minister made the bold suggestion that we might look further afield in respect of the establishment of parks in Canada and that these waters which now are vested in the federal government might indeed be transferred for purposes of a national park. In this manner, we could protect this great marine area.

This is a time when we are very concerned about the pollution of our environment, with the ecology of the lands around us and with the ability of the land to support life as well as the ability of the waters to support marine life. It is with this in mind that perhaps we should be approaching the matter of our national parks, I believe, with the idea of advancing a step further to a national marine park of the nature I have described and which has already been described by the Minister of Fisheries. So, I simply wish to add to the discussion this afternoon by leaving with those who will be examining the bill in the committee this idea; that they look at Bill C-152 in an effort to make sure that it is broad enough to embrace a concept of this kind. When they call the expert witnesses from the department, I hope they will obtain sufficient information about such an idea to make sure we are not, in this bill, restricting the right of the government of Canada to create marine parks for the enjoyment of Canadians. I leave that idea with the House on second reading and with those who will consider this bill clause by clause in the committee shortly.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, until the conclusion of the question period I had no idea of rising, even though I had some strong objections to the contents of this bill. What caused me to decide to speak is the fact that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), as soon as his bill was called, could have won any competition in Olympic racing as he ran out of the House so that he would not be here to listen to the discussion of matter of paramount importance in relation to the preservation of our parks.

Mr. Honey: On a question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: This kind of interruption—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The parliamentary secretary is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the privilege?

Mr. Honey: I will tell my right hon. friend the question of privilege. The minister and the government have given me the responsibility in this House of Commons—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is no excuse.

Mr. Honey: Perhaps the hon. member would allow me to finish. Whether he agrees or not, the responsibility has been given to me. The right hon. gentleman is a champion of the rights of Parliament and is always critical of those who would move to a congressional system. This is an opportunity in Parliament for private members to participate. As the right hon. gentleman knows, I have the authority of the minister and the government to pilot this bill through. The minister is watching the proceedings very carefully and reads Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Farthest from my thoughts is it that he will not make a "honey" of a job of it, but the fact remains that ministers should be here. That is what they are for. We have more ministers in the present government—30 in number—than any government has ever had, and fewer ministers stay in the House. First, a selective system was started, and now they have a system whereby ministers take leave of their responsibilities with chronic abandon.

I am in entire agreement that the parliamentary system should be preserved but, sir, what we are witnessing is a total disregard of Parliament. Minister after minister leaves the House, refuses to answer questions, determines for himself the rights of Parliament. If this had only happened once, one could have excused it.

On February 4 the following matter was raised by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). Incidentally, I want to point out that the minister was advised that I was going to speak about his conduct as I never speak about anyone in a critical manner unless that person realizes that I am going to speak about him. This is what the hon. member said:

> Possibly there is an excuse for the minister's absence this afternoon. We are told that all day tomorrow as well, the minister will be gallivanting, or perhaps attending to important business, out west visiting Indian reservations. There is just no excuse for this. It is the minister's duty to be in the House when measures as important as this are presented. No one would object or complain about his absence. What we are complaining about is the fact that when this major piece of legislation is presented he is not here.

I seldom speak except on matters that I feel affect the prerogatives of this institution. I have never in 30 years seen Parliament treated with the egregious contempt that is being shown to Parliament by the present administration. There is a complete disregard of this institution. Indeed only the other day the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that these are the kinds of things that bring about the republican system of government. What we are facing is the degradation of this chamber. Debate no longer continues as it did over the years, nor does exchange of opinions and differences, with the minister listening to the suggestions made and then acting, if he decides that they are worthy of consideration, to make possible amendments.

I dislike comparing Parliament today to what some have compared it, but under the present Prime Minister Parliament has been compared to a cemetery operated by its own occupants. That is a direct allegation that this institution is being bypassed.

The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) made a suggestion for the creation of a marine park which is worthy of consideration. He did it in a most exemplary way, but toward the end of his remarks he said he hoped that when this bill found its way into committee the committee would be able to listen to witnesses and make recommendations. Sir, the committee system which was introduced about a year and a half ago in its present form has been virtually emasculated by executive control.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: One hon. member present in the House at the moment himself pointed out that a direction was given to the Liberal members of a committee to do that which the government wanted done. We can think of another recommendation which came in from one committee having to do with northern waters and northern sovereignty, and when the government expressed its dislike for it, it died.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but I am having great difficulty in reconciling his present line of argument with the subject matter of the bill before the House. It seems to me that one of the difficult tasks which a Speaker has is to try to enforce in some measure the rule of relevancy. The rule is straightforward, that on second reading we should be dealing with the principle of the bill. The hon. member is much better aware of the rules than I am, and I appeal for his co-operation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am building my argument, Mr. Speaker. I am going to point out clearly and definitely that what is being done here, in essence, is to establish a corporation for the purposes set forth in this act to be known as the National Parks Leaseholds Corporation. It is simply a transparent subterfuge to substitute a soulless corporation for those human elements that are necessary in connection with these parks.

I was saying that Parliament is being treated with contempt. If I may ask, with the greatest of deference, since when has it become irrelevant to point out that Parliament is being degraded as a result of the action of the minister, similar as it is to actions taken by other ministers? Surely, may I say with all the deference in the world, we have not yet reached the point in this Parliament that we dare not say of them over there that they are destroying this institution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have mentioned the minister. Let us find out some of the things that he said. I was very much interested in the attitude that he took toward the people of Banff who made representations to him and pointed out the injustice of what was being done. What did he tell them in answer? He told them, in effect, to go to a warmer climate than is to be found in Banff. He told them that he would pay no attention to them. He made it perfectly clear that no matter what their objections were they were going to accept the dose that he and his bureaucrats had concocted and that, regardless of their views or opinions, these measures would be put into effect. He said: "You can either accept or get out". Is it parliamentary practice for a minister of the Crown, a servant of the people to say to the people of Banff: "If you do not like it, get out"? Surely, this can never be described as democracy in action.

What did the minister do at Jasper? What he said in effect was: "If you do not like it, move out". The summary of what he said is as follows:

> Chrétien also told us, point blank, that if we aren't prepared to toe the line and evidently accept willy nilly the dictates of the department, of which he is the political head, we can "get out"—

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Honey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wonder could the right hon. gentleman indicate from what he is reading?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I beg your pardon.

Mr. Honey: Would the right hon. gentleman indicate from what he is reading?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am reading from a complaint from one of those people who has been tragically treated in the town of Jasper.

Mr. Honey: Identify him.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the parliamentary secretary has not seen the letters from Banff and from Jasper, then I doubt whether he has all the qualifications necessary to pilot a bill through the House of Commons that destroys contractual rights. You see the reason—

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I asked the right hon. gentleman if he would identify the letter from which he was reading—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already identified it.

Mr. Honey: —under the rules of this House.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Under the rules of this House? That is only when I quote portions from it. Is the hon. gentleman starting to teach me rules?

Mr. Honey: Well, Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. If I might just clarify my understanding of the situation, the document the right hon. gentleman is referring to is not a public document. He is not obliged, as I understand it, to go beyond what he has done. It might be a question of courtesy, but that is a matter of judgment for hon. members. I am certainly not in a position, if I correctly interpret our practices, to require the right hon. gentleman to name the person who has written the private letter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the hon. gentleman wants it on Hansard, I will have the whole letter put on, since it sets out clearly and definitely the arbitrary injustice and tyranny which is being perpetrated. Does he want the whole letter on Hansard?

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, I have no idea of the contents of the document or letter from which the right hon. gentleman is quoting. He quoted parts of it, and I think it would be reasonable for the right hon. gentleman to identify it. That is all I ask.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, yes, running away, because the hon. gentleman knows that what I have before me is a document that sets forth in clear and definite words the situation whereby an agreement entered into solemnly, a contact, is to be set aside by the government of Canada, and in order to get the government off the hook a Crown corporation is being set up. The hon. gentleman is very anxious for me to read from this and I would be glad at any time to place it on the record, perhaps on the next interruption.

It deals in particular with the amount that national park residents pay on their leaseholds, as distinct from freehold.

National park residents pay on their leaseholds (as distinct from freehold) the annual rentals set by the department responsible. From inception 1914 or thereabouts, the annual rentals for all lots were $10.00 and $8.00 per annum for corner and inside lots respectively. There is a clause in the lease which calls for a revision every ten (10) years starting in 1920...No increase in annual rental was suggested or made in 1930 nor in 1940. However, in 1950, when the affluent society began to appear the rentals were raised 50 per cent and no one protested. This brought the annual rental to $15.00 and $12.00 respectively for corner and inside lots. 1960 saw no increase in the older leases—

And they continued at that rent.

Now, this bill provides:

National Parks Leasehold Corporation—to develop, manage and maintain property in the parks, the direction of the administration, management and control of which is entrusted to it—

The land rentals on the older leases, some of which have been renewed for a further period of 42 years and paying an annual rental of $12.00 or $15.00, or proportionately higher should two lots or a portion of a lot be included in the lease, now find themselves saddled with varying amounts from $81.00 to $2,880.00. The lot assessed at a fee of $81.00 is located between the Post Office and the Athabasca Hotel...The $2,880.00 lot and one half (1½ lots) was originally leased as a residential lot and is used as a residence by an elderly retired banker who has resided for the greater part of his life here. This lot is now zoned commercial.

Not a few lots have been elevated to $225.00 mostly occupied by elderly or retired citizens or people of the labouring class—people on fixed incomes, verging on the poor bracket. The percentage increase in the case of the last mentioned is 1,900 per cent if you please.

The letter goes on to deal with this.

Contracts that are made and solemnly entered into ought not to be broken by the government of Canada. There is no doubt, as the hon. member for Pembina (Mr. Bigg) said, arrangements could have been made to bring about some agreement, but nothing of that kind was done.

Let me read now from the Calgary Herald, of January 16, 1970:

If residents of the townsite of Banff don't like living under federal administration, they can leave, Jean Chrétien, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, said Thursday.

Mr. Chrétien said in an interview nobody is obliged to live in the park and if they don't like the situation "they can drive east or west and they won't have to live in the park."

Wasn't that the height of courtesy? What colossal impudence and arrogance, only exceeded by the fact that when his bill is before the House the Minister stays away. This is the kind of treatment that the Eskimos are getting up north in Ungava. They are being pushed around by this minister as though they were cattle. Their constitutional rights are stepped on. This is the minister who no doubt says to those poor Eskimos up there, "If you don't like it, get out." And that is what some of them are doing. They are trying to keep their constitutional rights by living in the territories. Mr. Speaker, I read on:

Residents of Banff, who have to lease their land from the government, have complained that the cost of leases has risen and, in some cases, leases have not been renewed. They are also complaining about a tax increase.

Mr. Chrétien said they had no right to complain because they haven't invested money in the land anyway since they haven't had to buy it.

That was not the attitude of another minister occupying that portfolio, who is the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) today. When he, with his knowledge of Parliament and his appreciation of equities, was in the position of the minister there was none of that type of thing in dealing with fellow Canadians—"If you don't like it, get out." I presume that is the reason the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development got out today, because he did not like the possibility of hearing any criticism.

If what the goverment is doing, through that minister, to the Eskimos were done anywhere else in the world there would be marches in Canada. They are only a few, so they get stepped on and treated in the most egregious and contemptuous manner in the same way as these people in the parks. That is why I rise, Sir, to ask, is there any possibility of any change in this bill? Will there be alterations made as a result of discussions? Only if the govenment agrees. If the committee dares bring in any recommendations that have not been accepted by the minister, what will happen to them? You and I know they will receive that cavalier treatment which was so brilliantly enunciated, and in such eloquent language, by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Givens) who referred to members of the House of Commons in terms of bovine anatomy by saying, we are just as useful as an udder on a bull. I must say that never has this Parliament received a more cryptic and correct description than the hon. member's words the other day. I am not acquainted with bovine peculiarities but taken at face value, what he said indicated that, even though he is a citizen of the city of Toronto, he knows his bull.

To sum up, as far as those two parks are concerned there has been a scandalous, inexcusable disrespect shown and a contempt of Parliament. The people living in these parks are entitled to be treated as human beings. What business is it of any minister to say, "If you don't like it there, get out." All I can say is that if he continues to treat other Canadians in the way he is treating the people in those two parks, and the Eskimos, possibly he has a solution for himself in those words.

Seriously speaking sir, is this Parliament to be treated as though it belonged to the government of Canada and to a minister? The Eskimos write, but they are not heard. They are being denied their constitutional rights as the people in those two parks are being denied their contractual rights. It does not matter how they object, what is stated will be carried out.

We have not heard the last of what is being perpetrated on those Eskimos. I want to hear that discussed. I want to find out why, under the Bill of Rights which is now in effect and superior to any statute passed since 1867, human beings belonging to a primitive race with unusual abilities, who are Canadians equal to the rest of us, are to be stepped on, sneered at and given no equity or justice. They are going to be consulted but they do not have to approve.

In other words, the minister or those who are sent up there will say to the Eskimos, "This is what we are going to give you. Do you like it?" If the answer is no, then they will be told, "Well, you can get out". That is what he said to the people of Banff and that is what he said to the people of Jasper.

I recall the words of a great parliamentarian, Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest that ever was in this chamber. I heard him speak when I first came and I quote his words:

> It is the will of Parliament, not that of the government that is the will of the nation. When the Prime Minister says that he speaks for the whole of the country, he is mistaking the echo of his words for the voice of the Canadian people. It is Parliament which is and must remain the authorized exponent of public opinion and of the public will.

Sir, Parliament is being treated as a puppet by this minister. The people who will come under the control of this Crown corporation will have lost their rights. Just imagine a soulless corporation giving any consideration to those moral and emotional things, to legal rights, when the minister says, "Whatever your legal rights may be you are not going to be able to assert them." This bill constitutes, as the attitude of the minister shows, a further example of what I have contended is taking place. Parliament is being downgraded, undermined; its basic mission of freedom is being subverted. It is time we in this House realized what is taking place as day by day and week by week members are treated with a disregard not in keeping with the words of the Right Honourable Ernest Lapointe which I just quoted which, in epitome, represents the actuality of Parliamentary responsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the right hon. gentleman would permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Surely.

Mr. Honey: Would the right hon. gentleman agree with me that it was his government which, between 1958 and 1962, ended leases in national parks in perpetuity and limited the longest term to 45 years or 42 years?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that has been answered over and over again by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). These myths may satisfy the hon. gentleman, but they do not represent the facts.

Mr. Dinsdale: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am pleased that I was in the House to hear an outstanding legal presentation of this matter. My friend, the parliamentary secretary continues to deal in—

An hon. Member: Lies.

Mr. Dinsdale: —innuendo, insinuation and terminological inexactitudes. Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled in this regard to indicate precisely what the situation is. I will have to do it by being fairly specific on the matter. The information should be in the hands of the parliamentary secretary. He is purporting to conduct this legislation through the House and the information is available from the department responsible for these matters. In 1958, a moratorium was declared on any further alienation of national park land until such time as the development policy could be reviewed in each of the western parks and plans to meet the high standards of national park development presented to the people of the parks themselves, so that they might decide and comment on any proposals.

The question of perpetuity of existing leases when they came up for assignment or renewal became a matter of controversy in 1962. At that time, it was decided that there would be no interference on assignment with the government guarantee of perpetuity. Furthermore, it was decided that the question of perpetuity on lease renewals would not be dealt with at this time. Rather, renewals were for 42 years plus 21 years open-ended. By that time, the whole matter would be reviewed and this fundamental principle guaranteed by the Canadian government would have come under consideration. The policy which cancelled perpetuity came in 1963, after the change of government.

Mr. Laing: We have the order in council.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am prepared to recognize the parliamentary secretary but I would like to voice one misgiving here. I recognized the right of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) to clarify a point on which he feels there has been misrepresentation. On the other hand, I am concerned that we are now approaching debate on the matter and as the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) suggests, I am trying to allow the record to be corrected without getting into debate. In this regard I would seek the co-operation of members.

Is the parliamentary secretary rising—

Mr. Honey: On the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), Mr. Speaker. If I had the leave of the House, perhaps I could table two orders in council.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not a question of privilege.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Honey: On the question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, if my right hon. friend wishes me to, perhaps I might refer to the Orders in Council. The first Order in Council is SOR/58-330 and is dated August 7, 1958.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I say that I do not object when the hon. member tries to fill in the record, but his remarks have nothing to do with any question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am inclined to agree. I must say I am having misgivings about the original question of privilege. I am trying to be as fair as possible to both sides of the position. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary would like to seek leave—

An hon. Member: Let us have the proof.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I think the parliamentary secretary originally wanted leave of the House to table the two Orders in Council. Perhaps that would be our simplest procedure, if there is consent.

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The parliamentary secretary will speak when he closes the debate. He will then have an opportunity to make a full reply to questions asked and to make a statement.

Mr. Bell: Bring the minister in and let him make a statement.

Mr. Honey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, since there is no unanimous consent for the tabling of the Orders in Council, perhaps I could refer to them briefly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have not yet put the question to the House. Is there unanimous consent for the tabling of the Orders in Council?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. Bell: The minister should come to the chamber and table them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary wishes to rise on a question of privilege, I see. I have some misgivings about the position in which we are. However, the Chair will recognize him on a question of privilege.

Mr. Honey: May I point out, Mr. Speaker, and I am speaking to the question of privilege of the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, that the first Order in Council I referred to provides that section 3 of the National Parks General Regulations is revoked and the following substituted therefor:

Where the value of a lot, exclusive of buildings and improvements, in a townsite or subdivision is less than five thousand dollars, a lease of such lot for any term not exceeding forty-two years may be granted . . . by the Minister—

And so on. The next paragraph deals with a parcel of land exclusive of buildings and improvements outside a townsite or subdivision which is worth less than $5,000. The term is not to exceed 21 years.

The second order in council I beg leave to refer to is SOR/62-78 dated March 1, 1962. It provides as follows:

Subsections (1) and (2) of section 3 of the National Parks Regulations are revoked and the following substituted therefor:

3. (1) The Minister or an officer of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources authorized by the Minister may grant a lease for any term not exceeding forty-two years, with an option to renew for a further term not exceeding twenty-one years—

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like to know if this sort of circus we are witnessing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to hear the hon. member on a point of order but I was about to rise myself. I again say that I have doubts about the procedure we are following at this point. As I said at the outset, I have tried to be as generous to both sides as is possible; perhaps I have been too generous. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might like to refer to this matter when he closes the debate. At this time, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a further question of privilege.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I will hear the hon. member on a question of privilege. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat? However, I should not like to see the present discussion continue, for the very reason I have suggested. If the hon. member wishes to raise a question of privilege, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. Dinsdale: On my question of privilege and as a point of clarification, may I say that what the parliamentary secretary has indicated is what I said. He confirmed what I said. The question of perpetuity was never violated. The rights of the citizens were taken into consideration because they had been granted by the Crown. The alienation of new lands is another matter.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to conclude my remarks by five o'clock but I am afraid I shall have to adjourn the debate at that time and deliver the remainder of my remarks during the evening session. Bill C-152, which is before the House this afternoon, amends the National Parks Act. Actually it is a heavy looking document of some 48 pages, most of them taken up with giving us a detailed description of the boundaries of our national parks which are, of course, mentioned in the amending legislation. I find that clause 3 suggests new ideas for park management and would create a corporation known as the National Parks Leasehold Corporation. This actually would be a Crown corporation which would develop, manage and maintain property in the national parks of Canada. This change from existing policy seems to be of doubtful value and could lead to major headaches in national parks development. This new Crown corporation will consist of a president, vice-president and five other directors, each of whom will be appointed by the governor in council and hold office for a term not exceeding seven years. They are all eligible to be re-appointed.

I note in one of the clauses a very interesting stipulation that a director ceases to hold office on attaining the age of 70 years; this provision apparently does not apply to the president or vice-president. It seems to me that the retirement ages of officials staffing this new Crown corporation should be the same as that for civil servants. I do not see why someone should hold a position in a corporation until he is 70 years old or older. This is something the committee might well look into.

Another real danger that could arise from the proposed change in jurisdiction is that an increasing degree of commercialization of our national parks could well take place. The corporation's need for funds with which to cover operating expenses could lead to its granting commercial concessions not in keeping with the aims and objectives set out in our National Parks Act. Once we lose the power of scrutiny in the House of Commons, we shall no longer be able to fulfill our role as watchdogs over our national parks development. We are creating a Crown corporation which we shall have little power to scrutinize. I view this development with a great deal of apprehension. It seems that perhaps members of this House will lose a rather precious right, the right to criticize and direct policy so far as our national parks development is concerned.

I am of the opinion that the House of Commons is gradually exercising less and less responsibility over many fields of public endeavour. I regret this trend in government because we are reaching the point of losing control over the public contact with another of the key organization in our society. In this case, the new Crown corporation will not be answerable to the House for its actions with regard to park development. None of the Crown corporations are. We might be able to criticize development, but the Crown corporations are not answerable to us for the policies and programs which they are going to carry out. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that very capable individuals will serve as directors of the corporation, but I personally feel the move is fraught with many dangers as far as our future park policy is concerned.

I feel this is the time to speak out and let my views be known. I have always been interested in conservation. Over the years I have seen some extremely short-sighted moves in relation to our provincial and federal parks. On the whole, our national parks have, in my opinion, been much better managed than the provincial parks. There might be some dispute on this score with those in the provincial field, but I believe that our national park service has been run much better than its provincial counterpart.

Canadians must at all times be constantly on guard to ensure that commercial interests do not pressure the politicians at all levels of government to give up some of our present park reserves or try to stop other reserves from being set aside. This has happened in the past and is happening in Canada today. I have seen large logging and mining interests persuade provincial governments to change the boundaries of some of our parks so that some mineral or forest wealth could be available to them for exploitation.

Pressure has already been put upon those in the federal jurisdiction with regard to potential reserves being put aside for park purposes. Unless we are strong and determined enough to resist this commercial pressure, and in many cases government apathy, Canadians will find in a very few years that our park reserves and resources are insufficient to meet our needs. I feel that full and adequate plans for park reserves must be made now. These plans must be made in relation to Canada's expected growth over the coming generations and our ever-increasing need for recreational areas.

I wish to deal with several specific aspects of park development which are related to this bill. I believe they should be raised at this time. There is a great need in Canada today to set aside additional areas for park purposes. There are different classes of parks and I believe we should add substantially to each class. However, I wish to mention specifically one class of park which has been sadly neglected by all levels of government. I refer to the wilderness parks which should be preserved in their natural state for all time.

There is an urgent need in Canada today for more of these wilderness areas to be set apart in every Province of Canada. It is essential that an undisturbed area of our Canadian heritage be preserved if we are to be able in the future to really see what Canada was like in the early days. These areas would serve as sources of study for our scientists and naturalists in the years to come. They will perhaps be the last refuge of many of our present forms of wildlife and plant life.

The national parks which I envisage, Mr. Speaker, would include the best terrain possible for this type of park. I should include those areas which have unique Canadian flora and fauna. If there should be conflicting interests in these areas, which are rapidly disappearing, I feel in most cases the national interest would be best served if the area were set aside for park purposes. If we are to preserve wilderness areas for future generations, we must move quickly. For example, choice areas in the Northwest Territories must be dedicated now to park purposes.

We must also negotiate additional areas with the various provinces. The natural historical needs of the Canadian people must be protected and secured by immediate action on this important measure of resource conservation. Today, Mr. Speaker, about 2.8 per cent of our total area is reserved as national and provincial parks. In my opinion this is not enough. Let us not be placed in the embarrassing position of having to buy back park resources which we should have had the good sense to preserve in the first place. All we have to do is look around in every province of Canada and we will find we have sold natural park areas which should have been preserved. Today, we find that the recreational facilities which we need in the provinces have been sold to private interests. Both the federal and provincial governments are in the embarrassing position of being forced, on many occasions, to buy back choice pieces of land, possibly to give public access to some of the lakes for recreational purposes.

I have one or two other specific items with which I would like to deal. This is a good place to stop if Your Honour would like to call it five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—trade—radio and television tube imports—threat to Canadian industry; the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher)—veterans affairs—effect of closing of Veterans Land Act offices outside big cities; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—unemployment insurance—commission advertisements respecting fraud.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely Public Bills.

[Mr. Harding.]

Mr. Forest: At the request of the two hon. members who have presented the first two bills appearing on today's Order Paper, we are prepared to stand them and proceed with Bill C-29 in the name of the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA DAY ACT

MEASURE TO SUBSTITUTE "CANADA" FOR "DOMINION"

Mr. J. E. Brown (Brant) moved that Bill C-29, respecting Canada Day, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-29 which I am moving today is a short, simple bill which has the effect of repealing the Dominion Day Act and substituting therefor the Canada Day Act. The bill merely substitutes the word "Canada" for the word "Dominion" as it appears in the present Dominion Day Act. The bill also provides that Canada Day shall be kept and observed as a legal holiday on the first Monday of the month of July in each and every year.

• (5:00 p.m.)

During the summer recess I was approached by a group of my constituents, members of the Junior Chamber of Commerce of Paris, Ontario, and asked whether I would support a bill of the nature I am introducing this afternoon if it were brought before Parliament. I immediately undertook to find out whether there was such a bill set down on the Order Paper at the commencement of the session. I found there was no such bill, so I have no hesitation in moving one myself and submitting it, as I am doing this afternoon, for the consideration of the House of Commons in the hope that if hon. members agree it will be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I feel that the bill keeps July 1 of each year in its present perspective, as it is looked upon by a large majority of the people of Canada who would like to feel we have a day called Canada Day, a day set aside each year at which time we could celebrate Canada's birthday, its creation, its formation. I believe it would give to every Canadian a sense of pride, if you will, a sense of importance of our country as an entity in the world. So, Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation whatever in moving the second reading of this bill and submitting it for the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I should like to make a few brief observations on this bill, one with which I am largely in sympathy. It seems to me we must do one simple, clear-cut thing at this time in Canada's history in relation to our national day, and that is, remove the anachronistic term Dominion Day, appropriate in my judgment for many years when it was associated in the minds of so many Canadians with a particular and close relationship with Great Britain. In my judgment, both constitutionally and in the general attitude of the people, this issue of filial loyalty has passed. Thus, one evident virtue of the hon. member's bill, is the suggestion that we call the day what in fact it is for most Canadians—Canada Day—and drop the once appropriate but no longer appropriate term "Dominion".

What would the passage of this bill accomplish? Right now it would add a small, perhaps, but hopefully relevant impetus to a legitimate sense of national pride. I do not like to over-emphasize the virtues of nationalism because no one with a sense of history can forget that the virtues of nationalism tend very often to turn into the vices of something quite different. But it seems to me that in our country we have for far too long been quiet Canadians, if you like. For far too long have we sat back and looked with a particular kind of grudging admiration upon our more boisterous and aggressive neighbours to the south, contenting ourselves with a quiet, smug satisfaction at being different. It appears to me that this is more an expression of some form of masochism, or the lack of a proper sense of identity, than anything else. Perhaps more than at any other time in our history, this is the moment to assert ourselves as a national entity—particularly when we see our economic sovereignty being gobbled up almost on a daily basis, again by no deliberate malicious act on the part of our southern neighbours but as a result of aggressive action on their part and acquiescent behaviour on ours. It is time we as a nation stood up for what most other nations take for granted, namely, the full and unqualified control of our national resources and geographic boundaries. It is time, too, we began to convey to those who are growing up in this country a sense of legitimate pride in what it means to be a Canadian. One of the first steps in this direction would be to call Canada Day Canada Day. One does not want to exaggerate the significance of such a step, and the hon. member who put forward this bill did not do so.

The traditions of this country are not those of the country to the south. Ours is a multiracial tradition, one which has tried to preserve and not to obliterate certain racial distinctions. It has in the main been a peaceful tradition. It has often been thought that somehow Canada missed out by not participating in the glorious adventure—it was really a tragedy of the civil war. Many Canadians, including, unhappily, a number of historians, have lamented our peaceful tradition. But I am not one of those who think this is something of which we ought to be ashamed. Indeed, I believe it is something of which we should be proud.

I shall not go on extolling the virtues of what it means to be a Canadian. This could more properly be done on Canada Day. I should like to disagree with part of the proposal put forward in the bill by the hon. member. I have a private bill on the Order Paper, which hopefully will be reached later this session, the greater part of which is similar to the bill presently before the House. However, there is one difference, and I think a significant difference: the bill before the House proposes that Canada Day be celebrated on the first Monday in July.

On balance, I do not think that is a good idea. There are certain days for celebrating events which we never change because we feel they have a certain historical and symbolic significance. I suppose Christmas is the most outstanding example of this. No one, to my knowledge at least, has ever proposed that we begin the celebration of Christmas on the third Monday of December, for example. This is because, for Christian civilization, the birthday of Christ has a particular significance which we are not going to change just to coincide in some convenient way with our holiday plans.

I do not want to suggest that in terms of significance the proposed Canada Day has the same historical import as Christmas day, but I do suggest that it is analogous in importance. Canada Day should be a day for Canadians to enjoy, certainly; but it should also be a day during part of which there are appropriate opportunities for politicians and others in the community to reflect in a serious way on what it means to be a Canadian; to reflect upon what we would hope to do with this nation of ours in the years ahead. Therefore, I suggest we should heighten its significance in contrast or comparison with other holidays that fall on the first Monday of the week and which are appropriately enjoyed by us all. We should make a distinction in terms of our holidays, and Canada Day should be set apart so that it falls on July 1. We should celebrate the event on the day it occurred.

For some this is, perhaps, a minor point, but for me it has a significant, symbolic difference. If our July 1 celebration fell on the first Monday of July every year, then I think the tendency would be very great indeed for all of us simply to treat it as another long weekend. Indeed, as suggested to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), it is quite possible that in the very near future the first Monday in July would fall on July 4. In that event, we would have the grand possibility of having a joint celebration with our United States friends. As a Canadian with some sense of genuine pride in our past, I do not think that for sake of the convenience of a long weekend it is appropriate for us to have our holiday coincide with that of our U.S. neighbours. Let each of us celebrate our own traditions in our own way and on different days. I am sure that no American would suggest that the July 4 holiday be changed so that it would be celebrated on the first Monday in July.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, although I am in general agreement with the provisions of this bill—I think it is a sensible measure, the general intent of which should be speedily approved—I do not agree that we should switch our celebration from the first of the month to the first Monday of July. Incidentally, it is worth drawing the attention of the House to the fact that a similar bill was passed by this House of Commons some 20 years ago. It passed through all three readings. However, I am informed that when it reached the other place, that deep and musty other chamber, it was turned down, and in the intervening period the idea progressed no further.

It is my hope that before the end of this session, if not this bill then some similar bill will not only pass through the House of Commons but get through the other place as well. In that event, in the very new future Canadians will have not a Dominion Day, which reflects the old tradition, but a Canada Day which more accurately reflects the desires and modern traditions of the current generation of Canadians.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown) introduce his bill to call our national day Canada day, and I consider it a privilege to be able to speak in favour of the bill. I am in favour of any measure which brings home to our young people in particular the love of country and sense of patriotism which I think in past years has been lacking.

I always like to refer to such things as our oath of allegiance, our flag and other symbols of Canadianism. However, I deplore the fact that when my little boys take their oath of allegiance in Cubs and Scouts no mention is made of our beloved country. It seems to me that things like that are important in the development of our young people and in their patriotic outlook toward their own country.

Certainly, the idea of a national day called Canada Day is the kind of thing that strikes a happy note with me. To some, Dominion Day represents certain things; it may denote other things to others. The same problem is encountered with our national anthem. Many people in years gone by really have not known exactly what our national anthem is. Many people today do not know what the first of July represents. Some refer to it as Confederation day; others call it Dominion Day, and many even call it Canada Day, though this bill has not been passed.

I think the time has come to clarify the situation in some positive way. As the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) pointed out, I think the word "Dominion" denotes something from the past, something that we do not need in Canada anymore. I believe there is even a note of subservience attaching to it. This would be eliminated by changing the name of our national day to Canada Day.

I ask the House to pass this bill on second reading, to send it immediately to committee, and not to talk it out. In this way we could get a private member's bill that is really sensible through the House and passed into legislation. We hear so much about the inadequacies of backbenchers. It is said that backbenchers cannot put measures forward, that if they do so they are cast aside. Let us show that this is not the way things are done in the House of Commons. Let us show that when we want to we can put legislation through, especially when we believe in it. I, therefore, ask the co-operation of all hon. members in this regard, and I ask the House to pass the bill as quickly as possible.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this bill proposed by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown) is of great interest to me. I listened intently to his remarks and those of the preceding speakers. I have one point of argument with the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart). He insinuated that no private member's bill which appears before this House is really sensible. I certainly do not believe this is true. I think there are some pretty wonderful suggestions brought before this House which often make more sense than some of those coming from the government benches. I wish the House would pay a little more attention to some bills presented by members because this would encourage backbenchers to bring some positive ideas before the House which somehow seem to have difficulty in finding their way here in the form of legislation under government sponsorship.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, through you I should like to say to members of the House and the hon. member for Brant, I believe this to be a very timely bill. There has been a great deal of confusion about July 1 which actually is our founding day. For many years it has been called Dominion Day. This suited very well the situation which existed then. However, times have changed and our status constitutionally has changed. I think this bill is merely an effort to keep up with what has already taken place. It would seem to me that if we could remove the confusion which exists in the thinking of many of our people we would be performing a real service to our country. I believe this applies particularly to the young people of Canada. July 1 is our national day already and there is no better way to define that national day than by calling it Canada Day.

I find myself a little perplexed concerning whether or not this holiday should be celebrated rigidly on the first of July, regardless of the day on which it comes to pass, because I believe there is some merit in the suggestion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). However, I recognize there is also merit in having this holiday on the first Monday in July in order to provide a long weekend, which usually is the first major holiday after the closing of school. I believe this is something the committee could profitably consider. I would hope members on the government benches at this time would permit the bill to be referred to the committee where it might receive detailed study. I say this as an expression of support for the principle of the bill and commend the hon. member for Brant for bringing it before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief, because I hope the bill introduced by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Brown) will be agreed to and referred to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

I just had to take the floor to congratulate the mover of the bill, who had the opportunity to introduce it in the House. As a matter of fact, I put a similar item on the order paper, on a few occasions, but the draw did not go my way, whereas the hon. member for Brant was a little bit more fortunate.

I am glad to note that the bill is apparently getting support from all hon. member, at least from all those who have expressed their opinion so far, and I hope it will pass.

It shows an improvement over other similar bills as it sets this legal holiday on the first Monday in July, allowing for a long week-end during the vacation period, whereas at the present time the holiday is on the first day of the month which often falls in the middle of the week.

I feel that this bill should be adopted. As mentioned by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I believe it was passed by the House in 1946 but referred to the Senate at the end of the session too late for the upper house to render a decision on it. So it was left pending.

I feel that the word "Dominion" now in the act has a colonial connotation and is obsolete. It is now confusing because that holiday is often called "Dominion Day" or "Canada Day" or even "Confederation Day". I believe it would be well to make a real national holiday of it, called "Canada Day".

Specially since the adoption of the statute of Westminster I feel the word "Dominion" is no longer justified. Actually, we have become a completely free and independent nation, a self-governing community which freely and voluntarily joined the British Commonwealth.

The word "Dominion" having a colonial flavour involves a concept of domination, and we want neither to dominate anyone, nor to be dominated by anyone.

We shall thus have the opportunity to express, as citizens of a free and independent nation, our pride in being Canadians, and to proclaim it through all possible means.

Symbols have some importance for expressing this national pride. As it has already been stated, we, Canadians, are somewhat timid when it is a question of showing our national pride.

The Canadian government has taken a few steps in the right direction by adopting a national flag. I hope that the national anthem shall be officially adopted soon and that the creation of Canada Day will afford us another opportunity of showing our national pride.

Symbols are of some value and I am happy to note that the House appears willing to co-operate by proclaiming the first of July as "Canada Day". I hope that the House will agree to this.

[English]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I enjoy very much participating in private members' hour and congratulate those who have the initiative and interest to bring forward suggested legislation. In this instance, however, I am of the opinion this measure clearly demonstrates that progress and improvement cannot always be equated. I listened with interest to the last speaker and his reference to our not being a colony. He is quite right. I believe it is important to bear in mind that as this country moved from a subservient and sub national status to full fledged nationhood it was following the path, as one great historian has written, from colony to nation. I am sure that changing the name from Dominion Day to Canada Day will not, of itself, enrich the celebration. We should bear in mind what we celebrate on July 1. I am not one of those who believe we must shift around from Monday to Monday. I would be embarrassed if we were to celebrate our national day on July 4.

• (5:30 p.m.)

I think that we should celebrate the day on a specific date rather than try to fit it in following a convenient weekend. A national day in any country reverts back to a time of great achievement. In some countries it is a revolutionary episode such as the taking of the Bastille or the signing of the Declaration of Independence. The great moment in Canadian history, one which reflects its unique character among nations, is surely that it has achieved nationhood by peaceful means, by the getting together of different communities; and since they happened to get together in the city which I have the honour to represent, I feel very strongly about the idea that in 1867 a new country was created, one which was not called Canada. There were provinces before that called Canada. The new entity was a new political society which was called the Dominion of Canada.

That was our unique contribution to statecraft, and it was a contribution of which no historian need be ashamed. The Fathers of Confederation were builders in every sense of the word, men of vision, men of compromise and men of political genius. This is the day which we honour and the day on which a new country was formed. It is a uniquely Canadian expression and we are constantly looking for these things. It has nothing to do with subservience. We are told that it is based upon the experience of one of the maritime leaders, who was naturally one of the most religious men at the London Conference, who was inspired by what he read in the 72nd Psalm: "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea and from the river unto the ends of the earth".

In Latin our motto reads: "A mari usque ad mare". Canada grew from its beginnings in Charlottetown, Quebec City and then Westminster. We broadened our institutions, but always under the framework of that which was created in 1864 and finished in 1867, the dominion structure. Thus the nation progressed.

I ask hon. members to look at the statute of Westminster which we honour by raising the flag on December 11. We find there that the dominions were not colonies; that they were autonomous states. It was this very dominion which led us in a peaceful evolution from colonial subservience to full-fledged nationhood. Robert Borden did not have to drop the name "dominion" to hold office in a country which was fully independent and recognized in the League of Nations and in the chancelleries of the world as a free state.

This is no reflection upon the motives of the hon. member who sponsored this bill—he is a man for whom I have the highest regard—but I think it is an indication, so prevalent these days, that to change is always to go forward. I submit that here is a measure which for historic, geographic, constitutional and indeed religious reasons—and surely we have not lost some of the threads of our religious background in this society—should not pass.

I listened with interest to the remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) with whom I have been travelling of late, and I say to him that if his bill were before us I would support it because I think that the depiction of the great prime ministers of the country on the currency of the land is a forward step and one which enriches our history. To do what is suggested in the bill before us, however, does not enrich our history; it forgets the past, ignores the significant uniqueness of this country which makes us not a republic and not what Macdonald wanted to call it but a unique society peacefully achieved, democratically developed and internationally recognized.

In "dominion" we have a concept in which Canadians of all the provinces surely can find meaning. I adhere to the name "dominion" and I will try to do my best to adhere to the goals which were advanced when that name, as the country, was first created.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I gather that there is some disposition to pass this bill and refer it to the committee. I am in agreement with that but I wish to point out seriously, and I hope not narrowly, that last week on February 10 the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) introduced a bill recommending changes to the Hazardous Products Act, the principle of which has been adopted by the government. It could easily have been referred to the committee and been considered there in light of the new legislation which the government announced is being introduced. For some strange reason government members talked the bill out.

I hope that this is not a one-way street; that is, I hope the government is not permitting only government members' bills to go through second reading stage and be referred to committee. Therefore, while we are agreeable to this action today—and I hope the bill will go to committee—I hope the government will reciprocate and will let some of our bills go through which are just as worthy as this one.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to say that during this session some bills presented by members of the opposition have been passed and sent to committee. I remember one particularly, introduced by a member of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), which received this treatment.

Mr. Bell: What has been the proportion of government bills passed?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, since there does seem to be a recognition of the fact that this bill will be passed and will go to the committee, I just wish to confirm what my colleague has said—that we want this to be done. We do have a reservation about Canada Day always being celebrated on a Monday. For example, we do not want to celebrate it on July 4, but that is a detail that can be dealt with in the committee.

With regard to the remark about bills introduced by a member on this side of the House not being passed and sent to committee, I think that my friend, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), will feel that if this bill is passed, in effect approval will be given to the bill which he has on the Order Paper, Bill C-104, which also asks that our national holiday be known as Canada Day. We will be happy to see this bill passed and go to committee for study and possible amendment on the one point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

CANADIAN CURRENCY

EFFIGY OF FORMER PRIME MINISTERS TO BE PRINTED ON BANK NOTES

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane) moved that Bill C-30 respecting Canadian currency (effigy of former prime ministers), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Bell: Is it a worthy bill?

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): It is so worthy that it has already been accepted. Mr.

Printing on Canadian Bank Notes

Speaker, I am going to speak on this bill only briefly. I suggest that it be withdrawn, because since I introduced it the government decided to adopt it. Whether my prodding of the government made it adopt this measure, I shall leave to the historians to decide. I introduced the bill the last session and reintroduced it this session, and the government announced recently that it would adopt the measure.

• (5:40 p.m.)

When I introduced this measure it was with the intention that Her Majesty's effigy remain on one of the bills, perhaps the $20 bill, and that former prime ministers should be placed on all other bills. I believe that rather than this the government has seen fit to leave the effigy of Her Majesty on the $1, $2 and $20 bills and depict former prime ministers on the remainder. Since the matter is a fait accompli, I would suggest that the House concur in my removing this bill from the Order Paper at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I understand you will be asking for unanimous consent for this action, and we are in favour of it; but I would ask that on the $30 bills we depict the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed that Bill C-30 be withdrawn and the order discharged accordingly?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and bill withdrawn.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, due to the remarkable progress we have made this afternoon I think there would be a general disposition to call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NATIONAL PARKS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION, ACQUISITION, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-152, to amend the National Parks Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Speaker, just before the adjournment I was speaking on some of the main amendments outlined in Bill C152, an act to amend the National Parks Act. I expressed my concern over the trend in government to turn many of these vital public functions over to Crown corporations, over which this House has very little control. When it comes to these very vital resources, the national parks, I believe we should have a good look at this legislation and satisfy ourselves that we are moving in the right direction before we pass it.

There are one or two points I should like to make about park development—you might call it general resource development—which are very pertinent to the legislation before us. All members are aware that the various parks throughout Canada, municipal, provincial and federal, are of different types and categories as far as development is concerned. Some parks allow logging and mining within their boundaries: this is something which naturalists and conservationists have been fighting for generations, and I presume will go on fighting it. That is the reason I believe there is more concern today than ever before over the need to set up a large number of wilderness parks where nothing in the way of commercialization is allowed. As I mentioned earlier, I do not believe we can proceed too quickly to set up such areas.

When it comes to general resource development, I do not believe that either the federal or provincial administrations should be too pleased with what has happened in the past. In many instances we find that resource development in Canada has been based on single-purpose development: it might be, for example, the damming of a stream that flows into a national park and the one thought in mind is to obtain hydropower from the dam. The damage that might be done to the ecology of the country, to the wildlife and to the potential tourist industry is never weighed in the balance.

We have been a wasteful nation in this regard. I believe when it comes to general resource development, all provinces in our nation—and all countries, in fact—should very carefully weigh every aspect of any potential development. We must consider the matter in that way, otherwise we will find that we cause far more damage—as we often have—than the good we derive from a particular resource which we are trying to develop. I wish to read a short paragraph into the record to give an indication of what has happened in resource development everywhere in the world:

• (8:10 p.m.)

If there is anything that history demonstrates it is that an economic raw resource region gets poorer in the process of having its resources extracted. The resource rich regions in the U.S. are the poorest regions. The Appalachian region from Pennsylvania to Alabama produced $500 billion worth of raw wealth for the markets of the world and yet are the poorest predominantly white region in the U.S.

This applies not only to our neighbour to the south but to regions in Canada where resource development in many instances has not been properly carried out. The long-run results have been devastated areas. I hope that those responsible for our parks will in future try to avoid this situation occurring in our resource areas.

I should like to say a few words about one of our outstanding national parks, Glacier National Park in the Rocky Mountains. The park borders my constituency in the north. The potential of this outstanding national park, which strides the Trans-Canada Highway, is truly tremendous. In it we have a number of timber berths which the government is in the process of buying from the owners. I do not know how far advanced are the negotiations. Last year the government was negotiating, and I hope all the timber berths have been obtained and that the Crown owns the entire land surface within this beautiful national park. I think the matter touches the rights of individuals and I feel that when an area is set aside as a park, adequate and full compensation should be paid for timber berths and the like which have been expropriated. The national government should have complete control over such areas in all ways. I think this is a generally accepted concept of park ownership in Canada.

Glacier National Park is only one of many parks in Canada and I am talking about it to illustrate my general point. Within the confines of Glacier National Park is a remarkable cave system known as the Nakimu caves. Increasing interest and enthusiasm is being generated over these caves, which I understand are longer and deeper than originally thought. They are an outstanding examples of a cave system, perhaps the best to be found not only in Canada but in the entire western hemisphere. Their development potential, I understand, is currently being studied by the parks branch of the department.

The point I make is that the authorities have known about these caves for years. I understand they were discovered in 1904 by a chap called Deutschman who lived in Revelstoke. Following the custom of the day, he staked two mineral claims around the caves to protect his interests. The following year the Crown purchased these mineral rights for about $5,000. I think the chap negotiating the sale was the head of one of the national parks in British Columbia. He knew a good thing when he saw it and very wisely negotiated the sale.

In the early days the Canadian Pacific Railway used these caves as an attraction. Glacier National Park has a fantastic background of railway history. As I say, the CPR knew a good thing when it saw it. In the old days before they had the Connaught tunnel under the mountain, the railway went over Rogers Pass. Consequently, people visited these caves and came from all over the world to view this natural wonder. Gradually the caves fell into disuse. Some development work was undertaken but finally, when the depression struck, all work was curtailed and the caves were closed.

In the last few years people connected with the parks branch of the department have explored the caves and found they are far more extensive than was originally anticipated. I wish the government would look into this question because the caves are one of the natural wonders of the nation and would attract people to this national park. Not only is there a unique cave system in the park, but there is also some of the finest scenery and hiking to be found anywhere in North America.

I am worried in case the Crown corporation established under the bill tends to put money into those parks which large numbers of people visit and fails to develop these natural attractions. That is why I believe this bill is perhaps taking a step in the wrong direction. I do not think this sort of Crown corporation ought to handle our parks development. I could say much about Glacier National Park; it is connected with the railway history of this nation and particularly the linking of the west with the east. That is a fantastic story. When the railway was taken through the Rocky Mountains this area proved one of the toughest sections through which to build the railway system of Canada. There is a fantastic background of stories linking the park with the pioneering of the railways. It would be a natural spot for displaying old, historic engines and everything connected with the early days of the railway. This park happens to be in British Columbia, but other parks which I believe have similar potential are to be found from one end of Canada to the other.

In a moment or two I will sit down and allow other hon. members to take part in the debate. Before I do that, I again wish to stress the point I made earlier: there is an urgent need for Canadians to set aside far more acreage for park purposes than is now the case. I understand that Japan has 10 per cent or more of its land mass in parks; Germany has 8 per cent. They are smaller, more densely populated countries, but they realize the value of recreational assets for the needs of the population.

Although Canada is relatively underpopulated, we must not delay much longer in picking out some of the choicest areas and setting them aside for park purposes. An area in which the federal government cannot escape responsibility is our northern sections. In the Yukon and Northwest Territories there are outstanding areas which should now be set aside for posterity. Already we know the move is on to the north.

There are gas, oil and mineral explorations going on there. We will have clashes with companies who say, "This is a good area for mineral development. Why should we conserve it for park purposes?" This is the tug-of-war that will take place between these interests and the long-run interests of Canadians generally. No one knows what type of development will take place in the north a couple of generations from now. The ecology of the area must be protected. We must not have just one or two parks in the north; there must be a series of parks set aside. The time to do that is now. We must move quickly. We must move into those areas and make certain they are retained for Canadian use for all time.

[Mr. Harding.]

Mr. R. J. Orange (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to talk about the principle of national parks, with particular reference to the national parks which now exist in northern Canada and those which are proposed.

I congratulate the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) and his predecessor for having taken hold of a political football—to anyone who has followed this debate, it is obviously that—and tried to achieve some semblance of order out of the chaos that exists in the national parks with respect to leaseholds, the principles which determine who can live and work in a national park, and the purpose of our national parks. At the same time I think there are areas which must be studied, particularly as they affect the people who live in our national parks or in areas surrounding them.

I would now comment briefly on the visit of officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development last winter during which they appeared before the Northwest Territories Council in Yellowknife to announce almost unilaterally a proposed national park in the Northwest Territories. I do not think any one of us who was involved in this question objected to the principle. We did not object to the location. However, we did object to the fact that in all probability there had been no consultation with the people directly affected. I am referring to the Indian people who have used the area of the proposed national park in the east arm of Great Slave Lake as a traditional trapping and hunting grounds. I also refer to the people who have expended a great deal of money, energy and effort to find out if there are non-renewable resources in the area.

The proposed park will be one of the more exciting parks of the Northwest Territories. It includes the area of the Lockhart River, including the magnificient falls and part of the Macdonald fault which is one of the more exciting mineral areas on our continent. It includes the treeline as it moves into the barrens. In time it could provide for the people of Canada some of the most exciting and interesting parts of our national parks system.

On the other hand, the proposal put forward by the national parks administration failed to take into account the fact that there were people who had deep involvement, the Indian people at Snowdrift and around Great Slave Lake as well as the people involved in the mineral industries. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development recognized the outcry and hue that came from all concerned, including citizens of the north who really had no direct involvement in the proposed national park other than looking forward to having a park in the north. They said to the minister, "We believe that what you are proposing is all right, but for heaven's sake sit down and talk with us; tell us what your plans are. We will tell you what our objections might be, and maybe we can get together and work something out."

With due credit to the minister, he met the Indian people of Snowdrift. He told them in no uncertain terms—I was present on that occasion—that in no way would their traditional rights be affected by the establishment of a national park in the area. The minister assured them that the other Indian bands situated along Great Slave Lake would be involved in the discussions. He had discussions with the mining industry. In this way he has been able to establish some form of agreement.

I wish to make reference to three principles involved in a document which was presented to the minister by the Mining Association of the Northwest Territories. The Northwest Territories Chamber of Mines proposed that a park be established in the Lockhart River area with boundaries approximately the same as those proposed by the national parks, to be administered by a government department; that principles involved in parks policy take into account minor changes which would be compatible with the requirements of the mining industry and the Indian people; that the parks administration come up with a concrete plan which would in effect outline for the people of the north, the people of Canada, their intention with respect to the development of this vast wilderness area.

I think, Mr. Speaker, there has been a meeting of minds. I believe there was compassion, understanding and negotiation. Many of the hurdles, the unfortunate circumstances of last winter, have been overcome. We as Canadians can now look forward to a national park in the east arm of Great Slave Lake. This will be one of our most exciting national parks, perhaps not for this generation but for generations to come.

Earlier today I listened with interest to a number of members who made reference to Wood Buffalo National Park, that area which comprises 17,000 square miles of northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories. I was a little surprised at some of the comments as to why this national park was established. There was reference to the whooping crane and it was said that the park was designed to protect the whooping crane. This, Mr. Speaker, is a lot of nonsense. This park was established in 1928, as most hon. members know, to provide a sanctuary for the fast-disappearing buffalo. Those familiar with the history of the buffalo on the prairies recognize they were a dying species by the mid-twenties. A far-sighted proposal of the government in those days led to the transfer from the prairies of a great number of buffalo to the Wood Buffalo National Park, where they now number approximately 15,000. There, this magnificent species of animal, a symbol to many of the old way of life in Canada, is protected against hunters and against disease.

Originally, though this area was called a national park it was not really a national park but a wilderness area. At the present time problems are arising which concern the province of Alberta, the government of the Northwest Territories and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in connection with the future of this park. There is no doubt that in the opinion of most people the great portion of this national park ought to be maintained in its natural state as a habitat for the buffalo, the bison from the prairies and the other species of wildlife which exist in the area.

The park is part of our heritage. However, there exist within the area, particularly on the western side, mineral resources which I believe could be significant in the development of western Canada. I am referring primarily to the gypsum deposits which now lie within the park but which must somehow be freed for exploitation without interfering with wildlife and its habitat.

I look to the possibility of extending the road system which now goes as far as Fort MacKay, north of Fort McMurray into the national park and Fort Smith in the Northwest Territories, so as to create a circular route for Canadians and others who wish to visit this region of northern Alberta and the Northwest Territories.

We look to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and his counterpart in the Alberta government to sit down in serious discussion and work out in detail the future of Wood Buffalo Park in a way which would free those areas which seem to be good resource areas, while at the same time developing the north-south routes which are so important to the opening-up of the north. I would ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to give us a report, either on second reading or during the committee stage, on the progress of the discussions which are taking place with his counterpart in the province of Alberta.

At the outset I said I supported the principle of this bill. We must remember that the purpose of setting up the Crown corporation is to separate the management of leases and leaseholds from the management of the parks themselves. Let us get on with building facilities within the parks and at the same time minimize the kind of thing which has taken place in this Parliament during the last eight or ten years—the discussion of whether or not our friends should have leases, what they should pay and how they should pay it.

In conclusion, I should like to make a suggestion in which I believe and which I consider to be most important. As we develop our national parks system across Canada—and we should do this with all possible haste—we should look to the Canadian Arctic with the intention of establishing a National Polar Park there. I am thinking of preserving within such a national park the kind of wildlife which we may not see on this planet in the years to come. I have in mind the polar bear, caribou, the narwhal, the seal and the walrus in the coastal areas. I hope the minister, in his anxiety to create new national parks, will look upon the Canadian Arctic as a prime area for the establishment of a national park in the far north of our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I regard it a privilege to take part in this debate. For a number of years major portions of Banff and Jasper National Parks were within my constituency. Under the redistribution arrangements affecting electoral districts, the boundaries changed prior to the last election. However, because of the proximity of my constituency to the two major national parks I can still speak with familiarity about these major components of our national parks system.

I do not think it would be redundant if I were at this point to review briefly certain aspects of the set-up of our national parks. I believe it would be relevant after several days of debate to remind ourselves just where the national park areas are and just what problems have arisen with regard to them. At the present time the federal government possesses something less than 30,000 square miles of Canadian landscape tied up in the national parks. Half of this area consists of the Wood Buffalo Park in the far north of Alberta, to which the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange) has just referred. Few tourists ever reach this wilderness area. Of the remaining national parks area, 94 per cent is in western Canada which contains less than 30 per cent of Canada's population. The national parks area in Ontario is insignificant—a few square miles at Point Pelee, Thousand Islands and Georgian Bay. There is one in the province of Quebec just in the process of formation.

An hon. Member: One.

Mr. Thompson: One is coming, but I do not think it has been formalized yet. From this background it can be readily seen that the question of national parks is one which basically involves western Canada. Certainly, the whole problem with regard to leaseholds relates only to western Canada. For this reason the bill before us is one in which the representatives of the west, particularly those who live in the proximity of the parks, have a special interest and concern.

I would say in as non-partisan a way as I can—my remarks will not be partisan because I believe the real issue goes deeper—that many of those who discuss park administration, and even many who have taken part in this debate, do not really understand from personal experience and involvement just what this bill will mean to a certain portion of our country and its citizens.

My concern about this bill is that it proposes to place the rights of a sizeable portion of Canadians under the administrative responsibility of a Crown corporation. I believe this is a regressive step, one which will take us back to colonialism of the worst kind. One of the basic concepts that has been democratically developed in our Canadian way of life is the right of people to express themselves in government, be it local government, provincial government or federal government. Those who are of necessity rendering a basic service to our national parks will not only be denied their rights; the bill would also violate the Canadian Bill of Rights and take us back to a system I thought we had got away from 100 years ago.

The establishing of a crown corporation of this sort is not a new idea. I have in my file letters written in 1963 dealing with the subject. I was interested to note, on going through some newspaper clippings, that in 1965 and 1966 there was much talk about the possibility of setting up such a Crown corporation. I had hoped this idea had died long since, but apparently it has been in the minds of those people whom I believe are basically responsible for some of the confusion about which the hon. member for Northwest Territories has just spoken. I refer specifically to some senior members of the national parks administration in the civil service.

If there was any confusion, as suggested by the hon. member for Northwest Territories, it was caused by those who misguidedly proposed that certain areas of the Northwest Territories should be taken over as national parks, without any consideration being given to the opinion of the administration in the Northwest Territories or those who have their homes in the proposed park areas. The confusion came as a result of the bureaucrats in the department who drafted policy without full consideration of the people concerned.

This gives the House some indication as to how this proposal of a Crown corporation developed. It is a proposal that we as elected representatives in this House must unitedly find difficult to accept, certainly difficult to support. I do not see how many of my colleagues on the government side of the House can lend their support to this type of legislation since it denies rights that I believe are basic to Canadian citizens.

I am convinced that the policy outlined in this bill is wrong. It will be our responsibility, and particularly the responsibility of the committee members who study the various aspects of the bill, to make sure that the legislation is fully understood. Indeed, I hope the bill will be rejected. I know it is difficult to talk about the progress of the bill at this time, but it is legislation we should seriously think about before giving it our support. Certainly that is the intention of those on this side of the House. My remarks on this point are directed to government members. I do not think any member of the House will disagree about what should be the basic concept of a national park. May I simply go back to some of the earlier definitions that were in the minds of those who first set up our national parks and with which we can all agree.

According to the statutes of 1887 we read that the national parks, which were conceived and established at that time, were for the benefit, advantage and enjoyment of the people of Canada. According to the statutes of Canada for the year 1911, the national parks were defined as public parks and pleasure grounds for the benefit, advantage and enjoyment of the people of Canada. In 1930 it was again stated that the parks "are hereby dedicated to the people of Canada for their benefit, education and enjoyment, subject to the provisions of this act and regulations, and such parks shall be made use of so as to leave them unimpaired for the use of future generations". No one disagrees with those objectives. That is what the parks are intended for, and these definitions underline what is the basic purpose of our parks.

In this regard I am also reminded of remarks that were made in 1966 by the minister then responsible for parks. He said that the preservation of individualism requires us to spend some time away from the pressures of our daily labours. He said that recreation is essential to all of us, and will become increasingly so as industrial organization progresses and the machine continues to divorce us more and more from the world of nature in our daily lives. We on this side accept that definition because it is correct. I do not believe that any of us who oppose this bill have any intention but to uphold the spirit of the definitions I have put on record and to expand the services and facilities of the parks not only for the people of our generation but for generations to come.

Having said that, there are several basic points that we must take into consideration as we look at the legislation before us. First of all, I believe it is the direct responsibility of Parliament, consisting as it does of the representatives of the people of Canada, to oversee the public property that it is intended to use for purposes falling with the definitions given to us by the statutes of Canada, namely as public parks. To relegate this responsibility to a Crown corporation is wrong: not only is it wrong; it is an abdication of our responsibilities.

All of us have had experience in dealing with problems connected with Crown corporations. For example, the people that we represent may have a legitimate complaint about, or objection to certain facets of, say, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. We put forward their complaints in this House in the form of a question, either orally or on the Order Paper, or raise the matter in debate. Then we are told by the minister responsible that he cannot interfere with the administration of the CBC since politics must be divorced from the administration of the CBC as a Crown corporation.

Consequently, we decide to write to the president of the CBC or to some other senior official in that organization. I have many letters in my files to verify the fact that they invariably write back saying they are sorry but they do not determine the over-all policy of the CBC; that the Parliament of Canada is responsible for this. So you are caught betwixt and between. The Crown corporation will probably act as it sees fit, anyway. This is the sort of danger we face in establishing a Crown corporation to administer leaseholds and, indirectly, the rights of those Canadians who live in our parks and service the facilities therein.

It is not difficult to ensure that our national parks are preserved so they fulfil their intended purpose. The parks should be preserved not only for their natural beauty but in the interests of promoting those sports and recreational activities that admirably complement their terrain. I refer particularly to winter sports. However, as I say, these recreational facilities in our parks can be so constructed that they in no way interfere with the beauty of the park and its enjoyment by the Canadian people. There are some wilderness areas in our parks that should be classified as such. The hon. member for Northwest Territories illustrated this point when he referred to the Wood Buffalo Park in northern Alberta.

There is no real reason why that park should be categorized in the same way as Banff and Jasper National Parks. It is strictly a wilderness area which provides a haven for the buffalo herds. I believe these should be preserved. However, at no time will the Wood Buffalo National Park be used in such a way that it compares with Banff or Jasper National Parks. Should the fact that there are important mineral deposits within that area mean that they should never be developed? Certain wilderness and other areas which may exist in major parks like Waterton, Banff or Jasper should be delineated as such, but at the same time we should allow the controlled development of the resources which may be in the area. This is particularly true in respect of Wood Buffalo Park. The hon. member spoke about negotiations between the government of Alberta and the federal government. These negotiations have been going on for many years. How will the negotiations be improved by signing the administration of the park over to a Crown corporation?

Then there are the townsite areas. In my opinion there is no reason why the areas included in these townsites should not be administered in an altogether different manner from the wilderness or recreational areas of our parks. It would seem to me that the passage of legislation such as this to set up a Crown corporation would even further confuse the picture and deny the right of self-government and citizenship to the people who happen to live in the parks. The rights of Canadians must not be violated. It is the responsibility of Parliament to protect these rights. Whenever people live in the parks we have a responsibility to ensure that their rights are protected, as we do for those who live elsewhere.

The people living in these parks are not exploiters; they are not people who have taken unfair advantage of their place of residence within a park. Some people may have abused the privilege but I ask, where are these culprits? There are very few people in the parks who do not carry out their responsibilities in a loyal and satisfactory way; therefore, consideration must be given to them. We are talking about individuals and communities of people.

It might be interesting to look briefly at the people who are living in these parks at the present time. In 1969 in Jasper—I am speaking now of the townsite and the people living there—30.2 per cent gained their livelihood from railroad employment. Several major transportation lines, either highway or railway, pass through this national park. It is logical to expect there must be people to service these facilities within the parks. Because Jasper is a railroad divisional centre and a large proportion of people work for the railway, are the people there to be denied their right of citizenship? Of the people living in Jasper 17.4 per cent are tradesmen—tradesmen are necessary so far as the building and maintenance of facilities are concerned—and 15.4 per cent of the people are governmental employees. These are for the most part people who are employed by the parks administration.

There are in Jasper 9.4 per cent of the people who are widows or retired citizens. They are not people who have moved in from the outside; they have lived there and their homes are there. Are they to be denied the right to remain where they have lived and served during their lifetime? Only 16.2 per cent of the people living in Jasper derive their income from tourism or commercial services rendered to people who visit or who are living in the parks, such as government employees, railway employees, and so on. In Banff the figure is a little higher; 26.6 per cent of the people—definitely a small minority—gain their livelihood from services provided in the park for tourism as it relates to the commercial life of Banff.

These people give their lives to the area and serve their fellow citizens. It is wrong to place them in the classification of exploiters and greedy capitalists. I believe the most important point is the denial of self-government to these people. Are we to deny to a portion of our citizens the rights defined in the Canadian Bill of Rights? Are we to deny them the right to govern themselves so far as local government is concerned? Why should it not be possible for the people living in the townsites within the national parks to administer their own local affairs, as do people living in any other town or village in Canada? I do not think there is any argument to refute that right. These are not irresponsible people; they are as responsible as any of us in this House or people in any other community in the country. Is it not possible to have clear regulations established basically by the national parks administration under which these people would be able to carry out their responsibilities as citizens of our country under Canadian democracy? It is wrong to relegate these people to the faceless bureaucracy of a Crown corporation?

I hope the government will realize these things before it is too late. In my opinion, rather than having a Crown corporation the parks administration should be divorced from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It would be advisable that the person responsible be either a minister without portfolio or someone more closely associated with the problem, so far as concentration of time and responsibility is concerned. I am told the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development devotes less than 5 per cent of his time and responsibility to the over-all, important projects related to the national parks. One cannot expect him to give the necessary time to the different aspects in respect of the parks. I suggest that one reason park policies have been evolved and thought out by bureaucrats living in Ottawa who are not associated with the parks is that ministers have not had time to devote to the responsibility which the parks entail.

I think the hon. member who represents the three major national parks in Canada—Waterton, Banff and Jasper—made some very timely comments. He is a member of the government, and I believe he should be commended for having had the courage to stand up and express the opinions many of us have been trying to express in this debate and in debates of previous years. The hon. member emphasized that the key issues are communication and the community accepting responsibility for its own welfare. The lack of communication is not something which has arisen in the last year and a half or in the last six, seven or ten years. It has been a characteristic of the communities of Banff and Jasper almost since their inception. I could refer to other timely and relevant points which the hon. member outlined in the problem as he sees it. One would hope the government would listen to this voice of logic and reason from among its backbenchers, especially when it belongs to one who is the representative of the people in the area. He is one person who ought to know the situation.

Again, in this area we should make sure that the rights of the people who live in the parks are protected and that the principles enshrined in the Bill of Rights are extended to them as they are to the rest of us, so that they are not considered second-class citizens. I agree with the hon. member for Northwest Territories that more parks should be established in that part of Canada.

As I look at this vast and beautiful province of Ontario and the beautiful province of Quebec across the river, it seems to me there should be more national parks in these provinces. But the administrations of these two provinces have resented the federal government coming in and setting up national parks, and I believe they have a very good reason for taking that attitude. If this bill should become law, I am afraid we will forever block further areas of Canada, in so far as the organized provinces are concerned, coming within the national parks administration. The fears of the provinces have stemmed from the fact that they object to assigning any of their territory to the federal government—in this case to a Crown corporation—as it relates to leaseholds within the parks. They will definitely not want to do it. I think it is very likely that this legislation will eliminate the possibility of further national parks being established, with the exception perhaps of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

In closing, I believe that to place our fellow citizens under the administration of a Crown corporation would be tragic and reverting to colonialism. To submit them to the undemocratic procedures of a faceless, impersonal and bureaucratic agency is wrong. Therefore, I am opposed to this legislation. I appeal to members of the government to consider what will happen if this measure is passed by the House.

I do not even believe the legislation can be amended so as to protect the rights of the people living within the parks. The only way in which the proposals set out in the legislation can be advantageous is by eliminating the bill altogether and making sure that there is closer ministerial supervision so far as concerns the development of the policy that governs the parks. We should also strengthen the administrative services of the parks.

The people responsible for the routine administration of the parks have done a very good job. If one were to compare the way in which our parks are administered with the way in which this is done in the United States, one would realize that we have a superior administration. The same comparison can be drawn between parks administration in Europe. Our parks administration ranks with the best. The problem is with policy at government level. I believe that Parliament is responsible for parks policy, not just a few senior bureaucrats who are trying to dictate policy which they think is best when actually they do not seem to know what the situation is. Thus, I hope we will take a careful second look at this bill lest we bring to pass something we will regret in the years ahead.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few moments to enlarge on some of the points that have been made briefly, and to stress other points. We realize that Bill C-152 means many things to different people, just as parks mean different things to different people. To some people parks means a place where they can go for leisure; to other people they are places where they can go to see wildlife, the beauties of nature and many other things that we are not able to see in the large urban centres.

[Mr. Thompson.]

What we must really understand is the true concept of national parks. Is it really the beauty of nature that attracts people to the parks? I think all of us can agree that it is. Do Canadians really believe that national parks belong to them and will belong to them in perpetuity? We know that this is also true. We also know that the people of Canada thought the government of this land would hold our national parks for them in trust forever. This is one of the concerns that I have in considering the bill now before us.

Another point we must consider is whether we wish to retain the natural beauty and the ecology of these areas in exactly the same condition. There are two national parks which hold special status, namely, the national parks of Banff and Jasper. This point has been amply brought forward by many of the speakers who have taken part in the debate. I believe we must ensure that these parks are preserved unimpaired.

Another concern is to ensure that these parks are preserved forever. This leads us directly to the question of why we are establishing a corporation to administer the parks instead of continuing the present method of operation. Members who have spoken on this subject have done an excellent job in explaining why the establishment of a corporation would not be in the best interests of Canadians and of Canada as a whole.

I am sure many of us realize that the primary concern of many Crown corporations is the balance sheet. We have noted in our study of the estimates that services have been cut in some Crown corporations in order to make a good impression upon the government. We have also heard the government saying that an austerity program must be enforced. A perfect example of this is the cuts that have been made to the staff of the National Film Board—the very people who represent our national identity. The same thing could happen to our national parks if they were put under a Crown corporation. The government would then be able to say it will establish an austerity program which will apply to the national parks, and it will deliberately cut the very programs which the people of this nation deserve.

Another aspect to which we should pay attention concerns the blot on our landscape created by billboards, service stations and hot dog stands, which may bring the national parks corporation a buck today, and to heck with tomorrow! An analogy can be drawn from within our international airports which are being filled with billboards advertising liquor, automobiles and cigarettes. Who decided the policy which permitted this, and when was it decided? I am sure that no Member of Parliament really knew what was going on when this decision was made. The same thing might happen in the national parks if they are put under a Crown corporation.

I would like to again emphasize the point I made about billboards blossoming within our airports, because it seems to me that if this bill passes in its present form the Crown corporation responsible for the national parks would allow billboards to be put up in the parks. I can assure you that the people of this nation will not take kindly to any government or Crown corporation allowing hot dog stands and billboards to be erected throughout our countryside.

Another point I would like to make concerns the creation of the latest national park mentioned by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), namely, the Gaspé National Park. I realize that the province of Quebec needs this park. However, the point we are all missing is that it is a 99-year proposition. This gets away from the idea of national parks from coast to coast being part of a national identity, because at the end of 99 years the province of Quebec—if it happened to be in the province of Saskatchewan, the same thing could apply—the province could pay back the federal government and take over the park and the entire concept of national identity and national parks will have gone down the drain. I object most strenuously to this type of legislation being allowed to pass in this House when we consider the entire concept of national park.

We know that too many provinces and too many corporations will use some sort of drawing power to bring people to an area. We suggest that whenever a national park is being established strictly for the benefit of drawing power and commercialism—and what comes with commercialism everybody in this House knows—it is a wrong concept and a wrong method of doing things.

If we wish to retain our identity and have truly national parks it is high time we did exactly that and kept these national parks in perpetuity. This is the only way they could possibly exist under these conditions. In the town of Jasper, as was mentioned by the previous speaker, the hon. member for Red Deer, there are many people now employed in the railway industry and many other service industries. Surely Banff and Jasper in particular should be given self-government.

I am sure that the remarks made by my colleague from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) are very apt and absolutely true as you look at the situation that now exists. He said that people living in Banff and Jasper—and he said it many years ago—should not be the prisoners of their environment. No one in this House would like to see anyone a prisoner of his environment and recognized as a second-class citizen. Unless we recognize that Banff and Jasper in particular have a say in this over-all proposal, and have some means of communication, we are telling them that many people are not first-class citizens.

The officers of our national parks are to be commended for their diligence in trying to preserve a parks identity in this nation. I think it is only right that we give them due credit for that. Too often we hear criticism along the lines that they are not doing a good job, but the officers of these national parks are endeavouring to carry out a policy with which many of us in this House agree. If we are now to suggest that we turn the parks over to a Crown corporation—as members have said, a faceless corporation that does not have the proper feeling and the heart—we are doing a disservice to everybody concerned. I would urge that no consideration be given to establishing a Crown corporation in this particular field. Crown corporations have served and do serve many useful purposes in many fields, but this is a human relations field, it is a social science field, and it is one place where we do not want or need a Crown corporation.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in this debate I would first of all say that the constituency of Crowfoot runs very close to the national park at Banff. I have a particular attachment to the national park at Banff because my brother was the member of this House who for nine years represented the old riding of Jasper-Edson. I can assure the House that I listened to him many times, after this House had shut down, when he spoke of the problems of Jasper park and the bureaucratic set-up that was administering the national parks at both Banff and Jasper. So I take part in this debate with indeed an interest in the affairs of the two major parks in the province of Alberta, and also with concern for the growing interest in the playgrounds and recreational facilities at Waterton. These contribute a great deal toward our tourist trade in the province of Alberta.

I think this legislation goes much further than concerning itself with the basic facts of the national parks of Canada. It epitomizes the attitude of the government with regard to the whole aspect of responsibility. I spoke on the question of responsible government on a point of privilege this afternoon. I did not get far at that time, but I fully believe the dripping water will wear away the stone at some time. This is one more attempt wherein I take it upon myself, as other members have, to point out the callous attitude of the government in paying no attention to the citizens now living within the national parks.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) quite logically and deliberately pointed out who those citizens are, why they are there and how they came to be there. He also pointed out that 94 per cent of the land of the national parks in Canada lay in western Canada. This is an interesting point if you couple it with the feeling of alienation that exists in western Canada because this government does not care about the citizens there.

Then you look at this piece of legislation and ask, "Are these people to have the right to administer their affairs in their towns; growing, prosperous towns until a few years ago when the 42-year lease concept was brought into being?" If you take that into consideration, this piece of legislation deliberately epitomizes the attitude of the government.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out this afternoon that with the largest cabinet this country has ever had—with 30 ministers—not one minister is interested enough to come in, take part, observe, and interest himself in the plight of the citizens in our national parks. I see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in the House dutifully reading a labour contract, no doubt not concerning himself with this question although I know he is a man of generous heart. I wish he would attempt to interest himself in this matter, because he has gone down in history as quite a negotiator. Maybe he could negotiate this bill into oblivion. I know that the member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Sulatycky) would agree.

Mr. Mackasey: I am a good defence man.

Mr. Horner: The minister suggests he is a good defence man. I can vouch for that. The people of Banff, Jasper and Waterton need a good defence man today. I urge him to take part. The hon. member for Rocky Mountain isn't a bad forward, either, and this is what he had to say about this legislation:

> Its powers are too wide. The corporation would be in a position to compete with free enterprise in the national parks. Such competition should not be allowed when private enterprise is already in the field.

He went on to say:

> I do not believe such a result will be achieved by this bill unless there are some very significant changes to it.

I agree with him 100 per cent, but I go further than he did and point out the callous attitude this government has had to the whole concept of responsible government. Is this bill spelling out to the people living in these parks that they will have some say in the development of the parks? No, Mr. Speaker, the bill does not say that at all. The bill says: We are going to set up a corporation.

• (9:20 p.m.)

If the government were operating with 10 or 15 ministers who were overburdened with work and wanted to get rid of some responsibility, maybe one could accept the idea that a Crown corporation would release them for other activities. But 30 ministers should be able to carry the load that 20 carried a couple of years ago.

What does a Crown corporation do? I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) when he spoke against Crown corporations, although a few years ago the leader of his party was promoting Crown corporations in western Canada. A Crown corporation removes control one step further from the people. An elected representative has to batter down the doors of a Crown corporation in order to be heard, and that is sometimes difficult; the appropriate minister can say that decisions made by the corporation cannot be changed.

I maintain the concept and the basic principle of this legislation is wrong. What does it say? It says a Crown corporation is going to manage and maintain townsites in the national parks. The government are going to give it a few tidbits. Then it comes along and says that it is going to develop. What about the money that is already invested by private enterprise in the townsites and parks? What chance has it to compete with a new developer who is also going to manage and maintain the existing enterprises in the parks? The existing enterprise in that park is not going to have even the ghost of a chance of competing for business. Mr. Speaker, the glaring crime of it all is that these people will have no say in the governing of the townsite and no say in the operation of their businesses and services to the public.

Now I want to speak about services to the public. In the province of Alberta tourism is the second largest industry, mainly because of the national parks. In the whole North American continent one cannot find such a picturesque, magnificent drive as that linking the national parks of Banff and Jasper—

Mr. Orange: The Alaska highway.

Mr. Horner: It is a terrific tourist attraction but it is a long way from Calgary and Edmonton, the two major centres at which tourists generally arrive. It is logical that we should have a townsite in Banff and in Jasper in order to give service to the tourists. There is no sense in my going into the question of the effect that the 42-year lease has had on these people. We hear of things "turning on" the younger generation—and some of the older generation, too—but let me tell you that the 42-year lease principle has "turned off" the developers in the national parks. Service has become slack. In the past two summers sometimes as many as 1,500 people could not find lodging in Banff and had to travel 60 or 70 miles to Calgary for the night and drive back to the park the next day.

We have a tremendous asset here, a gift of nature. Why do we cripple ourselves, limit ourselves by bringing in such a socialistic document? A Crown corporation to "manage, maintain and develop"! Somebody suggested that it is a communist document. The socialists in the House did not like it, so it must be something worse. I think it is bad, poor legislation. There is no question in my mind that it will do nothing to develop and encourage the citizens in these townsites to develop and to give better service.

Let us be frank about the question. As we progress in our society today and as town sites and cities become larger, more and more people are looking for playgrounds and a place to relax—for some place to get away from the madding crowd. The national parks of Banff, Jasper, Watertown and others throughout this country have provided this outlet. But we must give service. It amazes me how this government, supposed to be modern, hep and "with it" can think that a Crown corporation will be flexible enough to develop every nook and cranny in order to provide such relaxation.

How can what the hon. member for Red Deer called a faceless corporation be in tune or even care to be in tune with the demands of the day in giving pleasing service to the public? I find it beyond comprehension how the government could imagine that Crown corporations sitting high and mighty here in Ottawa, and without competition, could even concern themselves as they should with such a vastly growing business as tourism. Tourism is one of Canada's greatest assets, and Alberta is very fortunate to have the Rocky Mountains, or even part of them, in the province. Alberta is fortunate, too, that Banff, Jasper and Watertown were set aside as national parks in the early days. Could a Crown corporation develop services fast enough to meet the demands of the years ahead? Could it be flexible enough? The parliamentary secretary may say, "Yes, it is going to be a new and different Crown corporation". But where are the new and different people coming from—Mars, the moon?

Crown corporations are made up of people, but people who do not face competition. Without somebody harping at them they are likely to become lax and contented. Occasionally they even become conceited and authoritative. They are not likely to bend to the whims of a poor tourist out from the city for the day. No industry in our whole economy must be as flexible as the tourist industry. No industry, whether it be manufacturing, oil or farming must be as prepared to meet the whims of the individual as the tourist industry. How can we believe that a Crown corporation could be that flexible?

It might be argued that the people living in the townsites of Waterton, Banff and Jasper have some say in the management and control of those towns. The bill does not suggest that. They will come under the authority of this so-called National Parks Leasehold Corporation. We see in this bill epitomized the attitude of the government. We see here the government displaying an irresponsible and authoritarian attitude. It disregards the very principles of democratic, responsible government under which the people of the country in towns, counties and provinces have a right to some say as to the way they shall be governed. This bill does not give the people of the townsites that say; one of the basic principles of our democracy has been ignored.

Unquestionably there is dissatisfaction in these areas. I will not repeat what the hon. member for Rocky Mountain said in this House. He maintained that the people of the area ought to have been consulted and the government would have consulted them if it had not been so callous about their welfare. There will be demonstrations and more destruction. Some people across Canada say that you can only change the government's mind by demonstrating; only then will the government lift up its head and sniff the wind to see what ought to be done to soothe ruffled feathers.

There are indications that all is not well with the citizens of Banff and Jasper townsites. About a month ago there was a town meeting in Banff townsite. The people asked the present minister and the previous minister to go down there. They have been agitated down there since the question of 42-year leases was broached. And what has the government done? Has it put its ear to the ground and paid attention to complaints in those areas? No. It has brought down this legislation which sets up a Crown corporation, puts the parks under the responsibility of the corporation, and says in so many words that elected representatives in this House will not have much say about what goes on in the parks.

Passage of this bill will lead only to further chaos in the country. I warn the government, and I hope it heeds my warning, not to be irresponsible and not do display a callous attitude to principles which have been fought for over long periods of time. The government's callous and irresponsible attitude must lead to more destruction, more demonstration and greater upheaval. Surely we do not want that in this peace-loving, growing country. Considering the provisions of this legislation and that it will affect people living in Waterton, Banff and Jasper, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer:

That this bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House that the subject matter of this bill be first of all put to a referendum among the residents of the townsites of Banff, Jasper and Waterton Lakes.

I sincerely hope the government will accept the amendment because, as the bill stands the residents of the area have no right to any say in their own government. If the amendment were accepted, they would have that right. It is a precious right for which people have fought and died in wars for over 1,000 years. The amendment would give the people the right to choose whether they wish to accept this legislation. The government is not prepared to give them the right of self-government. It is not prepared to say, "We will give you some say in your future development."

The amendment would give them that choice, and I urge all hon. members to support it, particularly the Minister of Labour who was in the House a minute ago. He has gone now, but the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) is here. Some lovely fish are being caught in the national parks of this country. I know the minister firmly believes in the concept of people making their own choice and their own decisions in matters of self-government. The Minister of Labour enunciated that principle in Vancouver when he spoke about dock workers and longshoremen. Surely he must feel that the people of Waterton, Banff and Jasper townsites should have the right of some say in how they are to be governed and how their area is to develop.

The corporation to be set up will be run by a bunch of bureaucrats who will be inflexible and hard to deal with, especially on questions affecting tourism.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has proposed an amendment. The Chair has very serious reservations as to the procedural aspect of the amendment and would appreciate hearing the views of hon. members as to why this type of amendment should be accepted. If no hon. member wishes to speak on the matter, I shall make my ruling.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, at this stage of a bill the type of amendment that can be put forward is limited. We can put forward either what is known as the six months' hoist or a reasoned amendment. As I understand it, a reasoned amendment must be repugnant to the subject matter of the bill; it must be opposed to the bill. I think that the amendment we are considering is so opposed. Second, it must be the type of amendment that could not be made to any individual paragraph of the bill when the bill goes to committee.

I understand that this amendment meets the second requirement. One could not, by amending any individual paragraph of the bill when it is before the committee, accomplish what is proposed in this amendment. The amendment proposes that the bill be not now read a second time but that the House give consideration to referring the subject matter of the bill to a referendum of the people of three specific townsites. I respectfully submit that cannot be done by an individual amendment to any one paragraph or clause of the bill, and that therefore the amendment ought to be allowed.

Mr. Speaker: If there are no further submissions on the interesting point of order which has just been raised, I am in a position to make a ruling. As the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has noted, only very limited types of amendments can, according to our rules, be presented at the second reading stage. It may be that our rules should be changed.

• (9:40 p.m.)

As I look to my left and to my right I see a number of procedural experts who are prepared to accept the suggestion that it is difficult to make an amendment to a motion for second reading of a bill. As has been suggested by the hon. member for Oxford, the six months' hoist is perhaps one of the few possibilities which can be proposed by way of amendment.

Also, as hon. members know, a reasoned amendment can be proposed. As is well known, a reasoned amendment is one which opposes the principle of the bill for one reason or another. My understanding of the interesting amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is that it does not in fact oppose the principle of the bill which is before the House, but rather attaches a condition to the adoption of the motion for second reading. It is perhaps a very difficult distinction to make to decide to what extent, or in what circumstances, an amendment opposes the principle of a bill. Hon. members have many possibilities in the course of debate on second reading of a bill to find reasons which are, in effect, substantially opposed to the principle of a bill and request that in the circumstances the bill should not now be read a second time.

My interpretation of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot is that it attaches a condition to the bill but does not oppose the principle of the bill now before the House. It is not essentially a reasoned amendment. Therefore, I find it very difficult to accept the hon. member's amendment. I hope in the course of this debate hon. members who are opposing second reading of the bill might find an amendment which could be proposed to the Chair that might be procedurally acceptable.

Mr. Horner: We are going to keep trying.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member says, "We are going to keep trying." I can understand that in the sense it should be reasonably easy to find an amendment which would make it possible for an hon. member to invite the House to oppose the principle of a bill.

Mr. Horner: There should not be taxation without representation.

Mr. Speaker: I am in agreement with the general principle that there should not be taxation without representation. That does not make the amendment acceptable from a procedural standpoint. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few brief comments with regard to one or two ideas. Actually, one idea has been promoted by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis)—the idea of an underwater park in the Georgia Strait. I think this is an excellent idea. It is probably the most logical area off Canada's shores for an underwater park. This should be done now before the area is all fouled up with pollution, filled with oil derricks or before there is too much industry on the shore. The Minister of Fisheries wrote a letter to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) promoting this idea. I suggest the minister should send a letter to the Northern Affairs Committee suggesting that the committee discuss this idea. I would like to see the committee study it, possibly tour the area and conduct hearings to ascertain whether there is interest in such an idea.

Snorkeling and other water sports are becoming more and more in vogue. Since most of Canada is not warm enough a great deal of the year to have a park of this kind, I think the Georgia Strait is one of the few areas that could be utilized. I think it should be used for this purpose. I visited Tobago last October. While there I did some snorkeling and looked at the underwater reefs in the area. I found it to be a very enjoyable sport.

Mr. Whelan: You can't do that in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Thomson: No, I can't do that in Saskatchewan. You might wonder why a Saskatchewan farmer would be interested in an idea of this kind. Possibly one of the reasons it appeals to me is that we do not have this type of entertainment close by. Certainly not many people in Saskatchewan can afford or are fortunate enough to visit Tobago, but many of them could visit and enjoy a park off the coast of British Columbia.

I might mention that in addition to the large population of British Columbia there are many people on the United States west coast fairly close or adjacent to this strait. A park of this kind would appeal to and be used by a great many people. It might also be used by a few people from Saskatchewan. Instead of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) going to the British Honduras for a swim, he might swim off the coast of British Columbia and draw attention to the beauties of bathing in the water there.

Mr. Benjamin: How about the bathing beauties?

Mr. Thomson: I am no authority in that field. I do not think a park of this nature would be too expensive. As the minister suggested, in the national sense we already own the land under the water; therefore, it would not be necessary to lay out a great deal of money. Such a park would bring considerable revenue to tourist operators in the area, marinists and anyone who has business or recreation interest in water sports. I suggest the minister should continue promoting his idea. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) and others who are interested should also promote this idea. I favour an examination of the idea by the Northern Affairs Committee. I hope the minister will show a little more interest in the idea.

I also wish to comment on the remarks made by the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange). The Crown now owns a great deal of land in the Northwest Territories and Yukon. Before this area is scarred, spoiled or despoiled, I think some of the land should be set apart. This would not cost very much money now or inconvenience us too greatly. If we wait until someone has a vested interest in the area, they will want to be paid for that interest or they will strenuously object to the area being included in a park of this kind.

I do not intend to say where or how large these parks should be, but I ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and the Northern Affairs Committee to take a good, hard look at this idea to see what we might do to protect the future of northern Canada, whether it be the Arctic, the subArctic or any other part of our north. If this is done now it might save us a lot of trouble later. Others have dealt with many parts of this bill. I just wanted to pursue these two particular lines of thought.

[Mr. Thomson.]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate. I only do so because of the remarks that have just been made by the member of the New Democratic Party. All the ministers of northern affairs in the previous government and all the ministers of northern affairs in this government, save the existing minister, have given their assurance in writing to the people of the Yukon that there will be no national park established in the Yukon territory until the elected representatives of the people on the Yukon Legislative Council ask for a park and delineate the nature, extent and location of the park.

• (9:50 p.m.)

I, together with all Yukoners, resent the idea that any area in the Yukon territory should be set aside in the absence of consultation and decision on the part of the elected representative of the people in the Yukon. I want to make that quite clear. That is how the majority of people in the Yukon feel about it, and the territorial council is on record as supporting such a view. I understood the hon. member who just resumed his seat to suggest that unilateral action might be taken by this government and a standing committee of Parliament. It might be a useful exercise for the committee, on its next visit to the Yukon, to solicit the opinions of the people on the spot rather than endeavour to make a unilateral decision here.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take more than a couple of minutes. I rise because I was among those who went with the committee to the Yukon on its last visit there. I was, to say the least, disappointed at the feelings expressed not by the elected members of the council but by a number of the members of the Board of Trade with whom we met. I felt they did not want a park to be located in any area where there might be the slightest possibility that at some time in the future a mineral deposit of some value might be found.

If one takes that attitude—and I am not saying the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) takes that attitude; I hope he does not—there will never be a park in the Arctic because, of course, there is always a possibility that at some time, somewhere minerals will be found in circumstances where they can be commercially exploited. I would hope we would not do so much consulting that we would never take practical steps to establish a park in the Yukon.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask the hon. member a question before he resumes his seat? I am sure he would agree that the same kind of consultation should take place between the federal government and the Yukon Legislative Council with respect to the establishment of a park as would take place with a provincial legislature.

Mr. Orlikow: Of course, Mr. Speaker. I would advocate that, and support such a course. But I would take the same view in connection with my own province as I have suggested in connection with the Yukon. If there was a group, members of a Board of Trade, of a Chamber of Commerce or of any other organization in Manitoba which said, "Let us not establish a national park because there might be some minerals in the area", my attitude would be: let us consult the government of any province, the Council of the Northwest Territories or the Yukon, but let us also go ahead as quickly as possible, because we need more national parks.

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, on rising to take part in this debate I, too, would like to explain the relation of my constituency with the constituency of Rocky Mountain which contains all the largest national parks. My constituency of Palliser is made up primarily of the old constituency of Bow River which contains the townsites of Lake Louise and Banff.

Having been active to some extent in that old constituency organization, at a non-elective level, I did obtain some knowledge of the problems facing the residents of those two towns. Also, I was fairly closely associated with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), then the hon. member for Bow River. Like my hon. friend from Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) I used to hear a great deal about the difficulties encountered by the residents of Banff and Lake Louise at the hands of the federal executive administering those areas. At that time, of course, or during a large part of that time, the party to which I belong happened to have the responsibility which now falls to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House for such administration.

So, speaking in a non-partisan way, I do not think it can be said that anyone's skirts are completely clean as far as the administration of the national parks is concerned. Nevertheless, I believe that the present government party has carried on a consistent campaign for the past seven years in an effort to deny the people who live in these areas their just rights and leave them without any effective control of their own affairs.

This campaign, which now culminates in the proposal to set up a Crown corporation which will be the crowning glory of those bureaucrats who are impatient to tightly control these areas, began with redistribution. The present legislative assistant to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was very active on the redistribution commission in the province of Alberta. I think he is responsible to a large extent for the fact that the present constituency of Rocky Mountain exists.

The effect of redistribution in this case was to hive off the townsites of Banff, Jasper, Lake Louise and Waterton into one federal constituency, thereby depriving the residents of those areas of three members to represent them here. They are now represented in this chamber by one hon. member and their voice has to this extent been reduced.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRADE—RADIO AND TELEVISION TUBE IMPORTS—THREAT TO CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on December 9 I asked the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) what he was able to do in response to a very urgent request from the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America. This group presented what I thought was a most cogent case to some of our cabinet ministers and some members of the Liberal caucus from the Toronto and Hamilton areas. Since that time, although the minister said he was seeking ways to assist I have received no indication that he has been very successful.

Whether this group will return and attempt to talk to another sector of the cabinet which might be more helpful, I do not know. The documentation is serious. These men point out that employment in the industry at both CGE and Westinghouse is approximately half what it was two years ago. In November of 1967, 476 production workers were employed at CGE's Dufferin tube plant in Toronto. As of October 24 of this year, this figure was down to 340. At Grimsby, 90 production workers were employed in tube manufacture in November, 1967. By last October, that figure had fallen to 45. This is a serious decline in employment among people who are extremely competent and well trained. Many of them have been working for a long time.

The brief also points out very succinctly that while sales of domestically-produced tubes have been declining, sales of imported tubes have been increasing. So that the minister, wearing both his caps of industry and trade and commerce, has, I think, a very serious responsibility in reference to this matter.

It has been suggested by the group that an immediate ban on the importation of tubes be placed on all such that can be made in Canada. They also make what surely is a familiar suggestion—the immediate removal of the 12 per cent sales tax, as well as the 10 per cent excise duty on Canadian manufactured tubes. They also wish to impress on the manufacturers their responsibility to act more in accordance with Canadian interests. This has reference to the many firms who are foreign-owned.

This question is very important in that it indicates one further area of increasing unemployment. So many of our graduates trained and educated at university are unable to find work. We know a number of civil servants are being forcibly made redundant, and we know what has happened to our military servants. We are also hearing that the western grain growers are now going to pass through a certain form of unemployment.

As I say, we have here an additional area of concern. It should, indeed, be an area of anxiety to anyone who believes that a growing rate of unemployment in any country, under any circumstances, is something that should be opposed vigorously and strenuously. Certainly the minister of industry and all ministers of the cabinet should take this stand.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when this question was raised on December 9 I stressed the fact that electronic tubes used in radio and television receivers are being progressively replaced by transistors. In the past 15 years we have seen phenomenal technological developments in the field of electronics, and this is one of them.

Demands for higher reliability and lower cost components led to the development of the transistor. In recent years these devices have found growing application in radio and television receivers. This is the principal cause of the reduction in tube manufacturing which is taking place both in Canada and abroad. This is not a strictly Canadian phenomenon; it is an international phenomenon. The situation even affects Japan.

I might add that the electronic tube market in Canada has been characterized by limited demand for a large number of different tube types. The Canadian tube manufacturing industry, which has been based entirely on the Canadian market since it could not export in numbers, has therefore concentrated on those types of tubes for which the domestic demand permitted economic production.

The many hundreds of tube types for which Canadian demand is too small to permit economic production have always been imported, mainly from the United States and Europe. Japan has been attracted to the Canadian market specifically for radio and television tube types and has therefore been in direct competition with Canadian producers. In view of the lower labour cost advantages accruing to Japan and potential adverse effects on Canadian producers, the Japanese agreed to voluntary restraint on tube exports to Canada. These arrangements are the responsibility of my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and to date we have found no evidence that Japan is failing to comply with these voluntary restraints.

Both in the United States and Canada the new technology of transistors and related devices has been dominated by newly-emerging companies and not by the traditional electronic tube manufacturers. The rapidly expanding employment opportunities in Canada in the new technology compensates for the decline in employment in the tube industry. However, these new opportunities occur in different establishments and locations.

In other words, what is taking place at Canadian Westinghouse and at CGE in Toronto is compensated for, in terms of employment, by what is taking place at, for example, Microsystems in Ottawa.

As a matter of fact, there are probably five times more people newly employed in the new devices business than are being laid off in the tube business. Unfortunately, this is not taking place in the same area. I am sad to say that. Being a connoisseur of communications, my hon. friend will know very well that changes are taking place very rapidly in this field. If a company does not move with the new technology possibly because it is moving in other areas of technology, it is bound to be replaced by some other company which does.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher).

VETERANS AFFAIRS—EFFECT OF CLOSING OF VETERANS LAND ACT OFFICES OUTSIDE BIG CITIES

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, first of all I should like to compliment the ministers involved for being in the House this evening. It is very refreshing to see this attention to our problems on the late show. I hope it will continue. On January 27 I addressed the following question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) as recorded at page 2868 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. It deals with the decision to close full-time offices of the Veterans Land Act administration branch which have been helping veterans in the field outside the big cities. Does closing the full-time VLA office at Drumheller, Alberta and the drastic reduction of services there represent a decision by the minister to reduce the amount of help that the government is giving veterans generally across the country?

I might say that when the question was transferred to this time slot I wrote the minister to express dissatisfaction with this unnecessary and retrograde step relating to Canada's commitment to her veterans. The minister kindly replied to my letter, but with respect I do not feel he met the problem raised by my question. In speaking on this question I am not merely concerned with the veterans of a large portion of my constituency but with the welfare of veterans all across the country, because as I understand it the closure of the VLA office in Drumheller is not an isolated example but merely another example of this government's implementation of what it conceives to be the just society.

What we see happening here is the application of the theories of the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) to the Department of Veterans Affairs—reduced costs by reduced service. Because the veterans who use the facilities of the VLA are what they are, namely, responsible persons who have demonstrated a keen sense of duty, they will probably survive the reduction in service. What is particularly galling to them is that the saving created at their expense is not passed on to the taxpayer but is diverted by the government to other budgets.

It is diverted to the budget of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. According to releases by his department, almost 65 per cent of the grants made to date have been to businesses operating in the province of Quebec. Then there is the example of the Department of Agriculture which has shifted the bulk of its dairy support program to the dairy industry in Quebec. It seems apparent, also, that this so-called economy drive, which is really misnamed when one considers that it has not resulted in any over-all reductions in government spending, is wrongly directed. After all, the VLA was set up to aid farmer veterans, not urbanites. In this situation I would appreciate the minister explaining why the field office network is being weakened instead of the regional or central offices. For example, if there had to be a staff reduction, why was it not carried out at Calgary or Edmonton, or right here in Ottawa rather than in the field where the job has to be done?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member said, he wrote to me with reference to Drumheller and I replied to his letter. However, this evening he enlarged his comments to apply not only to his constituency but to the country as a whole. First of all, perhaps I should state that the director of the Veterans Land Act has been reviewing his organization from year to year, most particularly in the area represented by the hon. member. This is not done solely because of the government's fight against inflation, as suggested by the hon. member, but mostly because of a decline in the work load.

During the year 1968-69 only 16 loans, with an approximate value of $252,000, were made to veterans in the Drumheller field area. The main bulk of the business originates in the northern segment of this field area, a distance of 20 to 25 miles from one of our VLA field officers who is located at Stettler.

The hon. member also suggested that the reductions were confined solely to our field areas. This is not the case. I can assure the House that staff reductions were effected at all levels of the veterans land administration.

This is done as the work load diminishes, which is normal 25 years after the war, and requests for loans under the VLA diminish. In the country as a whole the VLA staff has been reduced this year from 570 to 514, a reduction of 56 positions. This reduction of 56 is broken down to 24 from the field officers and 32 from the office staffs. Out of the 56 positions, 32 became vacant as a result of attrition due to retirement, sickness or death, and 8 were transferred. This leaves a balance of 16. Not one of these 16 people lost his employment. We hope to be able to find positions for all 16. But I believe it is only good management to effect staff reductions and to increase efficiency.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—COMMISSION ADVERTISEMENTS RESPECTING FRAUD

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on January 28 I asked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) whether he had seen and approved the advertisements which have been appearing on behalf of the Unemployment Insurance Commission warning about alleged fraud in the collection of unemployment insurance claims and threatening the supposed defrauders with court action. I was amazed—that is why I put the question for debate at ten o'clock—at the reply which I received from the minister. This is the kind of reply I would have expected had I directed such a question to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) who was born with a silver spoon in his mouth and I believe never really understood how ordinary working people live. However, I was amazed to receive such a reply from the Minister of Labour, who in my opinion is one of the few good ministers in this government. For the minister to have taken the hard line which he took and to have almost suggested that by asking the question I was condoning the defrauding of the fund, amazed me.

I give credit where credit is due, and I would say that the advertisement to which I referred was brought to my attention by a column written by Mr. Dalton Camp which appeared in the Toronto Telegram and in the Montreal Star of Wednesday, January 21, 1970. There is a picture of a judge, or of what is supposed to be a judge—and if ever there were a hanging judge, he is in that picture. Let me summarize the main points of the advertisement as Mr. Camp summarized them:

"When someone knowingly cheats (a case had been made earlier for people who cheated unknowingly) they're stealing money—

[Mr. Dubé.]

"We think that should be enough to make anyone think twice before trying to cheat on their unemployment insurance.

"But if it isn't, we know something that is.

"A day in court."

And so on, and so on, Mr. Speaker, ad nauseam. I hold no brief for people who cheat the fund, but a deliberate campaign has been worked out by the Unemployment Insurance Commission or, more likely, by some hot-shot Liberal hack advertising agency which they hire—of which this ad is just one example—which would make people think that there is a fantastic amount of cheating going on. In another publication of the commission they say as follows:

There are close to one and a half million claims for unemployment insurance in Canada each year. Almost 20 per cent of them have an element of suspected fraud.

That would mean that 300,000 people are deliberately defrauding the commission. Mr. Speaker, there is no evidence of that. The commission has never done any investigation, except in regard to a few small samples. If it were parliamentary to say so, I would say that either the officials of the commission or the advertising agency which probably devised this brilliant campaign deliberately lied and misrepresented the facts when they made that claim. There is no evidence of that.

I am not saying there is no defrauding of the fund. I am not saying that the commission does not have to take adequate steps. But I am saying that this kind of scare campaign is unnecessary, is despicable, and I am amazed that it takes place under the aegis of the kind of minister we have. According to figures submitted by the commission itself, in the fiscal year 1968-69 they were able to recover $3 million in unemployment insurance—not frauds but overpayments, which is something entirely different. To do that, Mr. Speaker, they spent $2½ million. They had 160 to 181 people working to do that. I submit that the commission's own figures show that the advertising campaign is a fraud; that it is built up on misapprehensions, on faulty information; that the returns are very limited and do not warrant the kind of campaign which is being carried on.

I say it is an insult to the people who are unemployed. I would say the vast majority, 98 per cent of those who are not working are not working because there is no work. They would be more than happy to go back to work, and they do go back to work when work is available. The commission ought not to carry on the campaign which it is carrying on, even if it is necessary, in the kind of language and with the kind of spirit in which it seems to be carrying it on.

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), there is nothing in the advertisements which even hints at discouraging people from drawing benefits. Out of a series of four advertisements, the aim of three of them is to explain features of the program and to inform the public as to how and when they should contact the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

To let people know about the pitfalls of fraudulently obtaining benefits it is necessary to dwell on matters which are, to say the least, unpleasant. However, if one considers the consequences which follow when people are found to have obtained benefits illegally, the reason for the warning becomes more apparent. Every year thousands of people are found to have made false declarations to obtain unemployment benefits and the consequences to many of these people are rather sad and severe. They are liable to repay the amounts that were obtained illegally and they are subject to fines and imprisonment.

These added hardships have to be borne at a time when people have already suffered difficult economic conditions. Few people realize the possibility of these consequences. We believe, therefore, that it is important that periodically—and once a year does not appear too often—a warning should go out as to the problem which can be created by fraudulently obtaining unemployment insurance benefits.

We have no knowledge that anyone has been discouraged by the advertisement from applying for benefits to which they are entitled. The volume of claims and the duration of claims would appear to be normal for this time of the year at all the offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. We are convinced, however, that the educational value of the total advertising series was one which was worth doing and one which will prevent people from making the mistake that practices which should not be accepted under any circumstances will be tolerated with regard to the payment of unemployment insurance benefits. It is clear that the advertising campaign was mainly educational, and as such it should help to restore faith in the system for the 98 per cent of the benefits which are drawn honourably and as a matter of right.

I wish to emphasize that the advertisement was in the public interest because it served to inform people of a service to which they are entitled. It helped to protect the unemployment insurance fund in which all employers, employees and the government have an interest as contributors; and it served as timely advice to people who through lack of awareness of the consequences of fraudulently obtaining benefits could perhaps be guilty of doing this. In the final analysis, the campaign should help restore in the mind of the people the value of the program to the hundreds of thousands of people who draw about $400 million in benefits per year. The extent of fraud is not the main concern: better information about the operation of the program and the consequences of fraudulent practices is, in our view, a sound reason for the advertisement campaign.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.24 p.m.

APPENDIX

LETTER RESPECTING MONTREAL MAIL TRANSPORTATION SITUATION

February 17, 1970.

This is a copy of the letter given today by Mr. Kierans to Mr. Raymond Parent, secretary general of the Confederation of National Trade Unions, on the mail transportation situation in Montreal.

February 17, 1970.

Mr. Raymond Parent,
Secretary-General,
Confederation of National Trade Unions,
Montreal, P.Q.

Dear Mr. Parent:

Since the mail transportation situation in Montreal has become intolerable, I wish to state clearly the position of the Post Office and the Government.

Last September, the Government decided to implement fully the policy of inviting tenders for all contracts of mail transportation services exceeding $1,000 per annum. This is required by section 22 of the Post Office Act.

Among the regions affected is Metropolitan Montreal where temporary arrangements have been renewed each year since 1954. Whatever justification may have been offered for such a policy in the past, it has not worked and is not working. The drivers and contractors alike were faced annually with the dreadful insecurity of losing jobs and contracts. Nor has it benefited the people of Montreal who have suffered through no fewer than 5 conflicts in the last three years, of which only the first was legal.

The resulting disruption, violence, and intimidation have hampered enormously the competitive capacity of industry and commerce in Montreal. It has also provided the people of Montreal with the worst service and the greatest frustrations of any city in Canada.

Nor has the Canadian taxpayer benefited, for he has financed the highest cost transportation services of any major city in the country. The waste and inefficiency can be measured by the combined totals of the new contracts which amount to $3,350,000 or about two million less than this year's costs. I am not blaming anyone, neither management, union, or government. I am simply stating the facts.

The situation, obviously, could not continue and my immediate predecessor, Honourable Jean-Pierre Côté, started to implement changes that have now led to the division of Montreal into five sectors. The government decision of last September confirmed that policy.

The new 5 year contracts allow the Post Office more flexibility and provide the drivers with greater job security.

Last year, during the 32 day slowdown, Rod Service Ltd. decided that it could no longer provide the service which the people of Montreal had a right to expect. The members of the union, therefore, lost their employer. Again this year, G. Lapalme Inc., the new contractor and employer, is finding that he cannot provide adequate service. Under these conditions, the contracts can be cancelled and, once again, your members will be without an employer and a contract. Unless the mail service returns to normal immediately, we will have no choice but to revoke the Lapalme contract. The public interest, in particular that of the people of Montreal, would demand such action.

I will not list the incidents of violence, sabotage, and destruction of government property which have occurred during the last two weeks. You are as aware of them as I am. I will simply say that the mail is not being delivered.

If I am forced to cancel the Lapalme contracts, the Post Office will immediately request from Canada Manpower the names of approximately 350 drivers needed to deliver the mails until March 31. If the present employees list their names with Canada Manpower, and if they are permitted by their former union to work, we will give particular attention to those with seniority and experience for this temporary period. If they do not register, the Post Office will take drivers from Manpower's present pool.

A separate crown corporation solely for Montreal drivers is not feasible. Nor is the appointment of a Post Office administrator to supervise the Montreal operation. The Post Office awards some 10,000 contracts across Canada. We rely on the competence and efficiency of our contractors, or we change them. As administrator of public funds, I cannot do otherwise.

The new contracts take effect on April 1. They have been signed and are binding on the government. It remains therefore for you and me to work out three problems. How can we assure the best service for the people of Montreal between now and March 31, secondly, how can we ensure the continued employment of the greatest number of present employees, with priority being given to the 162 men with more than five years service; thirdly, what are the best arrangements that can be made with Manpower to admit the remainder to paid retraining programs.

I will welcome your cooperation in resolving these problems.

Yours sincerely,

Eric Kierans.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, February 18, 1970

The House met at 2 p.m.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a special joint committee to examine and report upon proposals, made public, on a number of subjects related to the constitution of Canada, and that certain honourable Senators have been appointed to act on the said committee.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I should like, Mr. Speaker, to report on the federal-provincial conference which took place here in Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday of this week. If I may have the consent of the House I would propose to table a copy of the communiqué issued at the conclusion of that conference.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister the consent of the House to table the document he has just mentioned?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Trudeau: While there have been a great many meetings at the ministerial and officials level in recent months, the conference provided the first opportunity for some time for the heads of the federal and provincial governments to discuss a number of matters of common concern not relating to the constitutional review. The first item, and the one to which most time was devoted, concerned the economic situation. Under this head we discussed in some detail the problem of inflation, to which I shall return in a moment, as well as a number of more specific problems.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Among these latter, particular attention was devoted to the serious difficulties facing the western grain farmers. Emphasizing the adverse effects of the current difficulties in exporting wheat, the prairie premiers put forward a number of suggestions to which the federal government will give careful consideration in the course of its continuing efforts to devise the most effective means for dealing with this problem. In recent months the government has introduced a number of measures designed to alleviate the difficulties facing the grain farmer, and we may have some further measures to propose in this area before long. However, no one at the conference was under any illusion that there is a simple or obvious solution. All agreed that the position in the west is extremely difficult and that the consequences affect every area of Canada. The decline in the export market for wheat, and the lack of alternatives of adequate economic return, constitute a most serious national problem.

As our second item we discussed the problem of pollution, which is rapidly becoming a threat to human welfare, not only in Canada but indeed throughout the world. While current pollution problems are most acute in highly populated and industrialized areas, the rapid growth in pollution-causing activities of every kind poses a major threat in all parts of the country. There was general agreement that the effective handling of this problem both to clean up the consequences of past neglect and to prevent a progressively more rapid degradation of the environment, will require a major effort and close co-operation on the part of all levels of government as well as the private sector. It was also recognized that important aspects of this problem lie outside national jurisdiction and call for effective action on an international scale. Against this general background there was special urgency attached to problems of water pollution. Although some provinces indicated difficulties with particular aspects of the proposed Canada Water Act, there was general acceptance of the requirements underlying that bill for vigorous federal leadership in this area.

[Translation]

The third agenda item concerned the report of the federal-provincial Tax Structure Committee. This report reviews fiscal trends and projections for all governments in Canada up to the year 1971-72, and analyses a range of problems having to do with the major federal-provincial joint programs in health, welfare and education. The report assembles a good deal of important material relating to both of these questions, and I am very pleased that the Conference agreed that it should be made available to the public. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to table the report in both languages.

According to the report, the revenue-expenditure projections indicate a continuing surplus for the federal government but an increasing deficit at the provincial-municipal level. Much of this deficit problem can be traced to the very rapid rates of increase in the costs of the point programs. However, it is emphasized that there are statistical projections based upon certain assumptions about budget policy.

They should not be interpreted as forecasts of government budgets. Indeed, several provinces have made clear that they intend to make every effort to balance their budgets, or to reduce the deficits projected, in line with the overall objective of containing inflationary pressures.

There was, of course, a strong suggestion that the federal government should transfer fiscal resources to the provinces to help them with their financial problems. But I think it was realistically accepted that the federal government cannot reduce its taxes in favour of the provinces, spend more to meet many worthy needs, and achieve an anti-inflationary budget surplus all at one and the same time. The provinces have responsible administrations and recognize the realities which all government must face.

Nevertheless, conditions do change, and I indicated that when we are successful in getting inflation under control, secure their co-operation in holding down the costs of joint programs, and complete the reform of the income tax, we will be able to look carefully at the problem of adjusting fiscal resources between levels of government. The ministers of finance and provincial treasurers will keep this question under continuing review.

[English]

The outcome of the recent Price Stability Conference organized by the Prices and Incomes Commission was reviewed, and I am happy to say that all participating governments endorsed the voluntary system of price restraints drawn up by that conference and the basic principle designed to limit any increases in prices by private business to something clearly less than their increases in costs. May I make clear at this point that the federal government for its part supports that price restraint scheme as a valuable contribution to the national effort to control inflation, and will be prepared as the program goes forward to do what it can to ensure that it is successful. In addition to the result of the conference with business leaders, there has also been made public the list of "Tentative Proposals" which the Prices and Incomes Commission has put to governments. Broadly speaking, we agree with those suggestions, although I should point out that some of them are of limited application within the federal jurisdiction. While it is of course for the provincial governments individually to declare their own positions on specific aspects of these proposals, and the action they plan to take in relation to them, the consensus of the conference as contained in the communiqué makes clear the very general support which they have received.

I need not enlarge now on our determination to restrain federal expenditure, on which our intentions were put to the House when the estimates were tabled last week. Nor would it be appropriate for me at this time to discuss the government's taxing plans, which will be made known shortly. I should, however, add something about our intentions with regard to goods and services supplied to the public by the government itself or by agencies under its direct control. Some of these activities are essentially commercial in nature—the operations of Air Canada and Polymer Corporation are examples—and for these we propose that they should be subject to the guidelines established for private business. In other words, any price increases by these enterprises during the coming year should meet the criterion that they are clearly less than what would be required to cover unavoidable cost increases.

There is in addition a wide range of federal services, not of a direct commercial nature, for which fees or charges are applied. Here I should explain that we had earlier accepted the principle, and continue to hold to it, that the charges levied for such services should be designed to recover from the users the cost of providing them. In accordance with this principle we had planned to introduce a number of increases, substantial ones in the case of those services for which relatively nominal fees had hitherto been charged, as well as a number of new charges. While we continue to regard this approach as sound, we have concluded that the introduction at this time of such increases and new charges could be interpreted as inflationary behaviour, despite the fact that to make a direct charge on users rather than to have costs recovered out of general revenue might in economic terms be regarded as anti-inflationary. Accordingly we shall forgo the introduction of such new and increased fees at this time, on the understanding that this decision is taken in the context of the general price restraint program to which I have referred and may be subject to review in the light of developments relating to that program.

To make clear the significance of this decision I should explain that we had planned an extensive list of new or increased charges over a wide range of services, from which the expected increase in revenue was estimated at some $45 million for 1970-71. Prominent among these were the air transportation tax, on which the House was informed on Monday of our decision not to proceed at this time and on which anticipated revenue was estimated at $20 million. Another major item was an increase in certain postal rates, from which $17 million had been expected. Lesser but still important items included a variety of fees for inspection of weighing devices, gas and electricity meters and so on at $2.9 million, fees for testing cattle, plants, meat and similar items at about $1.3 million, and national park and historic site fees and land rentals at about $1.5 million.

In summary, therefore, we have decided as part of our response to the general call for restraint to forgo economically justifiable increases in fees and charges on non-commercial services to the public, at a loss of some $45 million in expected revenue, and to subject the commercial operations under our direct control to the guidelines established for private business. These measures, together with the spending restraints already indicated and such tax measures as may soon be made known, will demonstrate, I think, that we take with the utmost seriousness the problem of inflation and the need for restraint. I am confident in the light of the very useful discussion of these matters at the recent conference that the provinces likewise will respond to the situation and fulfil their responsibilities in the same manner.

Finally, the actions of governments, important though they are in relation to this problem, cannot succeed without the active support of the public at large and a willingness on the part of various private sectors of the economy to play their part. It is surely now apparent to all that inflation must be controlled and that the widest participation in this effort will be needed; hence I am confident that the lead established by the senior levels of government at this week's conference will command a broadly based support. Through such a general effort we can hope, without undue delay and with a minimum of dislocation, to bring inflation under control and to move toward an acceleration of soundly based growth and expansion.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have listened with great interest to what the right hon. gentleman has had to say. We thank him, of course, for his courtesy in making available to us the heavy documentation upon which the statement is based.

Turning to some of the matters which the right hon. gentleman raised, as far as agriculture is concerned I need only say that we on this side of the House have been endeavouring to the best of our ability for a long time to provide suggestions to the government as to ways and means of dealing with the situation. The conclusion at which the government seems to have arrived, as indicated by the Prime Minister, is that the position in the west is very difficult and that the consequences affect every area of Canada. This is the essence of what we have been saying for a long time. I am sure that no matter what the provincial premiers from the west may have suggested, their proposals will come within the ambit of those which have been made time and time again on this side of the House in the form of amendments, questions and statements. It is safe to say that no matter what solutions the premiers may have put forward—you name it, and we have already proposed it from this side of the House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —with a lamentable lack of response from the government side. My hope, now, is that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio who speaks for the Wheat Board will be impressed by what the premiers have had to say and will now pay a little more attention to our views on this issue.

As to pollution, I need only say that this issue is before the House at the present time. It is being considered by a committee of the House and in due course the House will again have the opportunity to discuss it. We have made our views known, and at the appropriate time amendments may be moved on behalf of this party.

As to the extremely important problem of inflation, the questions to be dealt with here are of such fundamental importance as to make it essential that we place a moratorium as far as possible on any partisan or political approach. I am sure all of us—and I speak for everyone in our party and, I believe, for all the people of Canada—hope and pray that an effective solution may be found for dealing with the two grim spectres of rising unemployment and rising prices which threaten us today. It is not good enough simply to say that the rise in prices and unemployment is not as sharp now as it has been in the past. I think of the old household saw that you feed a cold and starve a fever. One might apply this to the body politic in Canada which today is suffering from the two very serious problems I have just mentioned. The government is now engaged in a highly dangerous and delicate manoeuvre—it is trying to starve one and feed the other at the same time.

The Prime Minister spoke at a press conference about the totality of all the governing powers of Canada being concentrated at the meetings which were held in the last two days. It seems to me that this hinted at the fact that with these powers gathered together there should be the capacity and ability to deal with these problems.

Just a word of warning here. The governing power, in reality, is the people of Canada. It is in the highly volatile expression of their social habits, their spending attitudes and the state of mind of the 21 million people in Canada, to say nothing of the millions more outside Canada with whom we deal, that there is to be found the real factors which will provide the essential help in the difficulties that we face. Jawboning, no matter how high the level, will not by itself bring down either unemployment or the cost of living.

In any event, the Canadian people are also represented in their totality as consumers and as taxpayers by the members of this House and also by the members of the ten provincial legislatures. I think—I say this in a non-partisan way—we must feel free to challenge and to scrutinize the various proposals that are brought in from time to time, supporting those that are wise and good and rejecting those that are faulty.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Here, as in the recent meeting of industrial leaders of Canada called to deal with the problem of price stability, it would seem that the proposals and suggestions are vague, are conditional, and are couched, in many instances in the most fuzzy generalizations. Those who looked east for wise men to produce decisive and meaningful leadership looked in vain on all these counts.

Then we must consider the impact and the serious consequences which may result in doing damage to the very useful work that is being performed by the Tax Structure Committee. This committee at the current meeting produced figures showing that a very substantial increase in government spending was projected for the next two or three years. This included particularly, as the Prime Minister said, joint programs dealing with education and health and welfare items. We must bear in mind that some of these were initiated and foisted upon provincial governments by Ottawa, and from the viewpoint of equity this surely has to be taken into calculation by the federal government.

When the Prime Minister says no to suggestions by the provincial governments that Ottawa should assist here and should make available additional revenues, is it not likely that he is endangering the usefulness of this committee that is charged with working out arrangements as to priorities, to say nothing of the very abrasive situation which is bound to be created with those provincial governments that are so vitally concerned? When the Prime Minister says no and suggests that the provincial governments must either tax or reduce their own expenditures, he fails to mention that the provinces have not available to them the far wider and more useful tax sources, such as the hidden, indirect taxes which can be exercised only from Ottawa. When the Prime Minister talks to provincial leaders of curbing inflation by cutting down expenditures and/or increasing taxes, and in almost the same breath talks of implementing the proposals contained in the white paper on taxation, some of which are of a very iniquitous nature and certainly contain a very dangerous element of increased taxation and inflation, he is guilty either of colossal ignorance of the effect of these proposals or of consummate hypocrisy—and he can take his choice.

Many other questions may be asked and I am sure will be asked in the future, questions that are essential and must properly be asked in the discharge of our duties in this House and in the country. For example, where does the question of labour come in? The Prime Minister talked of reducing certain user fees, which I believe amount to an infinitesimal fraction of one per cent of spending. He should bear in mind that on the same day the Minister of Transport announced the reorganization of his department. This announcement included the statement by the minister that there would be increased user charges to pay for certain costs incurred in connection with departmental services.

We are also interested in knowing something about the type of sanctions that are being mentioned. Are they sanctions which can be applied in an equitable way? What form will they take? How effective and efficient will they be?

I conclude with one solemn note of warning to the government. The unemployment that is being created by the application of certain types of government policy is of the cruelest and most uncivilized type because it involves to a large extent those who are at the bottom of the economic totem pole. The hard core of the poor and the disadvantaged, the dispossessed people, those who almost permanently inhabit the land of poverty, the suffering, the deprivation and the social breakdown which will accompany this method of dealing with inflation will have repercussions which will be experienced for many years to come.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister's statement demonstrates that the government is playing out to its final conclusion the fiasco of its anti-inflationary policies. Members of this party have warned the government repeatedly that they were confusing symptoms with the disease and that in attempting to deal with inflation on a shotgun basis they were going to create even more problems than the one they were seeking to solve. We have contended repeatedly that it was an over-simplification to suggest that the economic difficulties in this country were due to too much money chasing too few goods. We pointed out repeatedly to the government that this country suffered from a maldistribution of income and from a misallocation of its human, material and financial resources. We have pointed out that a blunt axe approach to the problem would only create unemployment and economic slowdown. Instead, the government has proceeded with its over-all program of fiscal and monetary restraint.

In spite of the warning of the Economic Council of Canada as to what might result, we now find that without having any appreciable effect on the rising cost of living this country is facing a slowdown in the rate of economic growth, is facing increased unemployment, and in western Canada an economic condition which is worse than anything we have seen since the 1930's. It is all right for the Prime Minister to say that he is prepared to put up with 6 per cent unemployment in this farcical fight against inflation, but that is not much consolation for the man who is unemployed. The Prime Minister should get a slogan which should be: "Help fight inflation by losing your job."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: You did it twice.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am glad to see that the Prime Minister at least has been convinced that there are very serious economic conditions in western Canada. I am glad that he did not try to tell the premiers of the provinces that the farmers were well off because some of them were riding on tractors that cost $20,000.

The Prime Minister's statement today indicates, as the government has done in the past, that the entire burden of fighting inflation is to be placed upon the public sector of our economy. It is the governments which are to cut expenditures. It is the governments which are to reduce their services. It is the governments which are to curtail projects. But no word is mentioned about any curtailment of investment in the private sector, in promotion and advertising, in luxury accommodation and in other projects than can be postponed.

The Prime Minister's statement gives us no information as to what this conference decided with respect to trying to stop rising prices. We have been told repeatedly in the last few weeks when we asked questions that this matter would be dealt with at the federal-provincial conference. But it is perfectly apparent from the statement made today that the government does not intend to deal effectively with price increases. We understand that the consumer credit question has been set aside, and that the provinces have agreed to use what persuasion they can to prevent rent increases.

With reference to price increases, we have no indication whether or not there will be sanctions, whether the Prices and Incomes Commission is to have any teeth to prevent price increases. As a matter of fact, the guidelines that were issued by the Prices and Incomes Commission at the Price Stability Conference indicated that industries and corporations were to inform the commission with respect to price increases but not necessarily in advance of the price increases being put into effect. What does that mean? It means that what we are really witnessing is an attempt at profit maintenance. Many of these industries have raised their prices several times in the last few months. Many of these prices had already resulted in exorbitant profiteering. Now some of the industries are saying that they are prepared to hold the line. It is rather like the old lion who has eaten his fill of meat and who says to the young lions, "Let us go on a vegetarian diet". It is perfectly clear that the government has no intention of having the Prices and Incomes Commission review prices publicly so that the public will know who has been pilfering the consumers' pockets; they have no intention of giving the commission the necessary teeth not only to stop price increases but to roll back those price increases that are unjustified.

Finally, may I say that the Prime Minister's statement and the report of the Tax Structure Committee make it perfectly clear that the policies being pursued by this government are rapidly destroying national unity. The Tax Structure Committee has shown that the federal government will have continuing surpluses and that the provinces and the municipalities will have continuing deficits. Yet the Prime Minister says in his statement that the provinces have made it clear that they intend to make every effort to balance their budgets. If they are going to balance their budgets, the only way they can do it is to curtail services and to cut back on necessary projects such as hospitals, schools and old people's homes. Some of the provinces have already indicated their intention of opting out of joint federal-provincial programs, particularly in the fields of health and welfare. Some of them may have no choice. If they have to cut their expenditures, they may not be able to pay their share of the joint programs, and the Prime Minister's statement today offers them no consolation whatsoever.

National unity in this country does not depend only on linguistic equality. National unity also requires equality of opportunity to enjoy basic social welfare, health and educational services. The course which this government is pursuing is going to make it increasingly difficult for the provinces that are less well off to provide these services for their people. It is ironic that if the Prime Minister, who was elected on a one-Canada program, continues his present policy he will go down in history as having contributed more than any other Prime Minister to the disintegration of Confederation.

[Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands).]

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I wish to point out that I deplore not having received a copy in French of the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This might be because of the government's anti-inflation program.

According to the Prime Minister, the conference just ended was a real success. It was with interest that I listened to him on the CBC television network yesterday, giving a lecture on the distribution of tax fields between the federal and the provincial governments, which he concluded by saying that his attitude was indeed logical and that this was a truly efficient anti-inflation policy.

Let us ask ourselves the following question: To what success was the Prime Minister referring?

In reading the two and a half pages of French in the statement handed to us a minute before this sitting began, I note what sort of success the Prime Minister may have had in mind. Here it is:

According to the report, the revenue-expenditure projections indicate a continuing surplus for the federal government, but an increasing deficit at the provincial-municipal level.

In the opinion of the Prime Minister this is success. In any case, if there is a budget surplus at the expense of the provinces and municipalities, it does not matter to him. The essential thing is to achieve some success. This is, therefore, the kind of success that is looked for. But how can this budget surplus be explained? The Prime Minister shows us on the third page of his statement.

But I think it was realistically accepted—

According to the Prime Minister, success is on a par with realistic acceptance.

—it was realistically accepted—

He is referring to the provinces.

—that we cannot reduce our taxes in favour of the provinces, spend more to meet many worthy needs and achieve an anfi-inflationary budget surplus all at one and the same time.

• (2:40 p.m.)

This is the second part of the Prime Minister's argument to explain the success of the conference. He concludes by proving that he is right, that he is the eternal light, the eternal truth and that provinces come to Ottawa only to hear a course in economics given unilaterally, there is no need to say. And he says in conclusion:

> Nevertheless, conditions do change, and I indicated that when we are successful in getting inflation under control, secure the co-operation of the provinces in holding down the costs of joint programs, and complete the reform of the income tax, we will be able to look carefully at the problem of adjusting fiscal resources between levels of government.

In my opinion, that conference may have been a success for the Prime Minister, because he fell for no compromise and he kept the same approach from the beginning to the end, neither yielding nor listening.

However, the conference was surely a source of dissatisfaction and frustration for the provinces. After all, the situation will only deteriorate because the three conditions laid down by the federal government for its co-operation with the provinces are unacceptable in view of the present monetary and economic situation.

When the Prime Minister states that the first condition for that co-operation is to strangle inflation, he knows quite well that these steps are not able to check inflation, and that besides increasing it, they will bring about a serious recession.

Secondly, when he says that he will get the co-operation of the provinces, the Prime Minister should recognize that co-operation must be a two-way proposition, and that the Canadian confederation is only viable to the extent that there is co-operation and a dialogue in which both parties are in earnest.

Thirdly, a review of the tax system is inconceivable unless we first review our monetary system. To talk plain common sense, as the Prime Minister says, he will agree with me that if there was no money there would be no taxation. So, instead of dealing with taxation, bickering for control, why should the Prime Minister and his cabinet not call a responsible federal-provincial conference to discuss a comprehensive monetary reform in Canada, to harness money to the service of the human person, to restore control of money and credit to the Canadian government?

Mr. Speaker, we, in the Ralliement créditiste, insist that the monetary policy is the main reason of the present economical crisis since it directly unbalances the production capabilities and consumption. The anti-inflation measures of the government will have the effect—and the Prime Minister is now quite aware of it even if he finds it very funny—of reducing the buying power of the taxpayers and of increasing unemployment and, consequently, of making richer the richest and poorer the poorest. Here is then the government's just society, here the success the government brags about.

Before completing my remarks, I want to state clearly the position of the Ralliement créditiste. We dissociate ourselves from the policy advocated by the New Democratic Party, to wit, that we should take away from the rich to give to the poor. For our part, we submit that our monetary system should serve the country, and to this aim, the value of our currency should be based on real production, on the real value of our goods, and that our monetary policy should set a constant balance between the production forces and those of consumption, so that production may actually reach its goal, which is consumption. Otherwise, we produce for the sake of production, we only flounder while under the system, and in such a way that the federal government, with its great common sense, will remain omnipotent, in the pay of high financial circles, and the provincial governments will continue to be considered as municipal governments by the federal administration.

Mr. Speaker, all problems are connected and so long as we have not come to grips with the real source of the most serious of them all, that is, the monetary problem, we shall find no solution whatsoever. This is the reason why we state that while we go from the Grits to the Tories and from the Tories to the Grits, the situation remains the same.

TABLING OF PETITION BY 25,000 QUEBEC INDUSTRIAL MILK PRODUCERS

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the applause was for the farmers, not only for the member for Bellechasse.

As member for Bellechasse and member of the Catholic Farmers' Union and the union of industrial milk producers, it is my duty to present the petition of the 25,000 industrial milk producers of Quebec asking for an emergency debate in the House concerning the government's dairy policy. Therefore, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, and in conformity with Standing Order 67 (2), I file the said petition.

Mr. Speaker: I should remind the hon. member that under the provisions of Standing Order 67 he is not allowed to start a debate at this stage. He may only file the petition in question, as he just did in accordance with Standing Orders.

SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH ANIMALS PROTECTION BILL

ASSURANCE OF HUMANE TREATMENT OF LIVE ANIMALS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-189, for the protection and humane treatment of animals used in scientific research.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, this bill is intended to support and emphasize the purposes of Bill C-94, standing in the name of the hon. member for Victoria. Its purpose is to provide legislative machinery to assure humane treatment for live animals used in scientific research for which grants are provided by the government of Canada. It is the intent of this bill to cover all phases of protection for animals used in such research, including general policy, the conditions in which animals are kept while on the premises, and the sources of supply where such animals are purchased.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

1969/70	15. The potential use of capsule pipelining in Canada.	June 1970

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

In addition to these specific research studies, a large amount of research work of a more general nature has been undertaken to provide a background for the more extensive work program now being planned.

2. The foregoing studies were undertaken either by consultants or by staff of the Research Division of the Canadian Transport Commission, under the direction of the Vice-President (Research).

The following is a list of the consultants used in the research program:

Study No. 2

Part of this study was conducted by Deleuw, Cather and Associates.

Study No. 3

This study is being undertaken by the Matson Research Corporation, heading a consortium of Canadian consultants composed of Hedlin, Menzies and Associates Ltd., Swan Wooster Engineering Co. Ltd., and Stikeman, Elliott, Yamaki, Mercier & Robb.

Study No. 6

Parts of the study were contracted to La Société Lalonde, Valois, Lamarre, Valois & Associés.

Study No. 11

This study was contracted to Hedlin, Menzies and Associates Ltd., George G. Sharp, Inc., and Gibson Transportation, Ltd.

YARMOUTH, N.S.—AIR CANADA FACILITIES

Question No. 303—Mr. Comeau:

1. Does the Department of Transport have plans for the removal of Air Canada facilities at Yarmouth, N.S. and, if so, on what date will they be implemented?

2. Will a similar service be provided by some other airline?

3. Have moneys budgeted over the past two years, for the construction of new terminal facilities been cancelled and, if so, what amounts, and for what purpose have they been designated?

4. Has business declined or increased at Yarmouth Airport over the past five years and what statistics prove this?

5. Is the government considering the removal of Air Canada services at other airports and, if so, which ones will be affected?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. The question of transfer of any domestic point currently served by Air Canada to any other carrier was covered by a statement made on August 15, 1969, on Regional Air Carrier Policy. That statement indicated that the Canadian Transport Commission and its Air Transport Committee would determine which routes are suitable for the Regional Carriers. As also pointed out in that statement, the application of the policy by the Canadian Transport Commission will be conducted in consultation with Mainline and Regional Carriers.

3. Moneys were budgeted in 1968-69 in the amount of $200,000 for a new Air Terminal Building at Yarmouth. Construction of the Air Terminal at Yarmouth was delayed until an assessment of the future of Yarmouth could be made by the Canadian Transport Commission.

The $200,000 budgeted in 1968-69 was used to construct an Operations Building at Yarmouth at a cost of $141,000. Additional funds were provided for runway repairs at Yarmouth amounting to $125,000.

4. Statistics indicating the total of enplaned and deplaned passengers at Yarmouth Airport over the past five years is as follows: 1963, 17,000; 1964, 16,700; 1965, 18,800; 1966, 20,700; 1967, 23,400; 1968, 26,900.

5. It will be appreciated that a number of complex problems have to be resolved. Until this is done no announcement can be made regarding the future of any of the points that may be transferred.

RADIO ENGINEERING PRODUCTS, CAMPBELLTON, N.B.

Question No. 656—Mr. Burton:

1. What was the amount of financial assistance given to Radio Engineering Products, Campbellton, New Brunswick, by the Departments of Defence Production, Industry, Regional Economic Expansion and Industry, Trade and Commerce for each year since assistance was first granted?

2. What was the amount of assistance given through the Defence Industry Productivity Program known as DIP for each year since assistance was first granted and in what form and on what basis was assistance given?

3. What does Radio Engineering Products manufacture, where are their products sold and what is the value of sales for each year it has received a federal subsidy?

4. What was the minimum wage paid to its female employees in 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

5. What was the minimum wage paid to its male employees in 1966, 1967, 1968 and 1969?

Questions

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Labour as follows:

1. Department	Year	Amount	Program
Former Dept. of Defence Production	1961	$450,000	Defence Development Sharing*
Former Dept. of Industry	1966	330,868	Defence Development Sharing
Former Dept. of Industry	1967	191,863	Defence Development Sharing
Industry, Trade and Commerce	1968	521,270	Defence Industry Productivity

*Responsibility transferred to former Department of Industry in 1964.

2. Assistance provided through the Defence Industry Productivity Program was $521,270 for the year 1968. The assistance was provided under the terms and conditions of the program to sustain technological capability in Canadian industry by supporting selected defence development programs on terms and conditions approved by the Treasury Board.

3. Radio Engineering Products Ltd. is engaged in the manufacture of multiplex communication equipment designed to permit multi-telephone and teleprinter channels to be carried simultaneously over a single radio path.

The bulk of company sales have been to allied countries and include: Mobile NATO communication centres in Europe; communications for military forces of U.S.A., Sweden, Australia and New Zealand; installation of an early NASA missile tracking system at Cape Kennedy.

The value of sales made by Radio Engineering Products Ltd. for the years during which financial assistance by the Crown has been provided is as follows:

Year	Value of Sales
1961	$11,270,000
1966	2,480,000
1967	3,230,000
1968	16,560,000

4 and 5. We are informed that the same minimum rates apply to both male and female employees: 1966—90 cents per hour, increasing to 98 cents after five months. 1967—$1 per hour, increasing to $1.09 after five months. 1968—$1.08 per hour, increasing to $1.18 after five months. 1969—$1.17 per hour, increasing to $1.27 after five months.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS AND PAYMENTS

Question No. 749—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What has been the total contributions received by the Unemployment Insurance Commission from the Employer-Employee Contributions since the inception of the scheme until December 31, 1968?

[Mr. Burton.]

2. What has been the total payment made from the plan since its inception until December 31, 1968, for those who normally qualify?

3. What has been the total paid out for those who qualified under the special provision for supplementary payments, during the same period from the commencement of the plan until December 31, 1968?

4. What has been the total net payment from the federal government to the plan since the commencement until December 31, 1968?

5. What is the breakdown of the government payments?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour):

1. $5,144,285,426.20.

2. Total regular benefit payments, $5,015,481,848.56.

3. Seasonal benefit, $1,051,785,622.59.

4. $1,027,165,679.18.

5. An amount equal to ⅛ of the employees' and employers' contributions.

FRENCH VERSION OF BILLS—REPLACEMENT OF WORD "BILL"

Question No. 775—Mr. Fortin:

Does the government intend to replace the word "bill" by the expressions "projet de loi" or "proposition de loi" in the French version of bills presented by the government or by Private Members?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In the Standing Orders of the House of Commons the French wording of "bill" is "bill". It would be necessary to change the Standing Orders of the House of Commons in order to adopt the wording "projet de loi".

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND FORESTRY EMPLOYEE DISMISSALS

Question No. 793—Mr. Dumont:

1. How many employees in the Department of Fisheries and Forestry have been dismissed because of the austerity programme?

2. Of this number, how many were bilingual?

3. How many spoke only English?

4. How many spoke only French?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. None. However, 137 employees have been advised that they are surplus and that they have been reported to the Public Service Commission for reassignment. Of this number, four are bilingual, 120 speak English only and 13 speak French only.

2. Not applicable.

3. Not applicable.

4. Not applicable.

BEDFORD BASIN POLLUTION STUDY

Question No. 823—Mr. McCleave:

1. Was a study, carried out within the Department of Fisheries and Forestry concerning pollution in the Bedford Basin, made available to the City of Halifax?

2. Was the study made available to the Government of Nova Scotia or any department thereof?

3. Who carried out the study and who decided on the distribution of it?

4. To whom was the study distributed?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Fisheries Research Board, Marine Ecology Laboratory, Dartmouth, Nova Scotia.

4. The studies were part of a continuing program to describe physical and biological oceanographic changes in Bedford Basin. Two reports were issued, the first being FRB Technical Report No. 120 which was distributed to a rather wide and standard mailing list; the second was distributed to the Regional Director of the Fisheries Service and on request to consultants for the City of Halifax and to the Nova Scotia Water Resources Commission.

DEATH OF CREW MEMBERS, HMCS "BONAVENTURE"

Question No. 824—Mr. McCleave:

1. What was the cause of death of four crew members of HMCS Bonaventure late in 1969?

2. Were the victims cleaning out an aviation fuel tank at the time?

3. Did they have special equipment at hand in the event of accident, and specifically, was any harness and was any gas mask at hand?

4. What was the rank of the senior man at the scene and what orders did he give when the accident began to develop?

5. What instructions are given to personnel with regard to (a) going into such tanks for cleaning operations (b) coping with accidents in which people are apparently overcome by fumes in the tanks?

6. If instructions were given in accordance with Part 5 (b), were they disregarded and, if so, for what reason?

7. (a) Has an inquiry been held into the cause of the fatalities and what were the conclusions and findings (b) what action will follow as a result of such inquiry?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): 1. Asphyxiation resulting from the inhalation of aviation gasoline fumes.

2. Two of the victims had been involved in the cleaning of an aviation gasoline tank. The other two victims had entered the tank in a rescue attempt.

3. Due to the internal configuration of the saddle tank there are no clear passageways where lifelines and harnesses may safely be employed. The standard breathing apparatus normally available during the tank cleaning process was being used by another party in the after tanks where it was considered there was an aviation gasoline fume hazard. As a result there was no special equipment on hand in the saddle tank at the time of the incident.

4. The rank of the senior man at the scene when the first man became affected by the gas fumes was a Master Seaman. When he became aware that one of the two men working in the tank below him was in difficulty he made his way down into the tank and through a series of bays to reach the affected man. With the assistance of the other man who had been working in the tank, he attempted to move the affected man from the immediate area by pulling him through a hole to an adjoining bay and toward an exit ladder. Because of the confined space and the fact that the affected man was nearly unconscious the rescue attempt was ineffective. During the rescue attempt, the Master Seaman had himself become affected by the fumes and realizing that help was required, left the tank to obtain aid.

5. Basic safety regulations for the venting and cleaning of aviation gasoline tanks are prescribed in service regulations. Copies are available in the Air Engineering Office and in the Avgas Party Ready Room aboard the carrier. These are required to be read and understood by personnel dealing with aviation gasoline. These regulations include instructions regarding the testing of the atmosphere prior to entry, the wearing of breathing apparatus until the atmosphere is proven safe, the wearing of protective clothing, procedure to be followed and equipment on hand to cope with the rescue of personnel who get into difficulties in the tank.

6. On this occasion no briefings were given prior to the personnel entering the tanks concerning the toxic effect of aviation gasoline fumes or on procedures for dealing with the rescue of personnel who might be overcome by fumes.

7. (a) Yes, a Service Board Inquiry has been held. It was the opinion of the Board that the personnel in question died on duty and that they were not to blame for their own deaths. Among the Board's recommendations were that all personnel concerned with the aviation fuels be given a special course in the Fleet School as a prerequisite for such employment. The Board considered that more emphasis must be placed upon the training of personnel employed in the handling of aviation gasoline on the dangerous nature of the product with which they are dealing, and the extremely serious consequences which are likely to occur if the regulations are not adhered to; and that in future, gas freeing of high octaine aviation fuel storages be carried out using other available, safer and more effective venting and cleaning procedures; (b) Action is being taken to implement the recommendations of the Board of Inquiry.

OTTAWA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—TAXI CONTRACT

Question No. 849—Mr. Dumont:

1. For how many years has the contract been awarded to Red Line Taxi Company for limousine service at the Ottawa International Airport?

2. What was the amount of this contract?

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. In 1947 Red Line Taxi entered into an agreement with the Department for ground transportation at Uplands Airport. Prior to this they operated by an arrangement with Air Canada (TCA).

The original agreement was superseded by a contract in 1952. In 1964 a new five year contract was negotiated. This contract terminated in December 1968 and was renewed on a year to year basis.

2. 1947-1964 at 10 per cent of the gross revenue. 1964-1968 at 10 per cent of the gross revenue from the limousine service plus 20 cents per occupied taxi departure from the Air Terminal Building. 1969- 5 per cent of the gross revenue from the limousine service plus 15 cents per occupied taxi departure from the Air Terminal Building.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INDIAN AFFAIRS COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT EMPLOYEES

Question No. 864—Mr. Nesbitt:

1. How many community development officers or community development workers were on the staff of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in British Columbia as of November 30, 1969?

2. How many community development officers or community development workers were on the staff of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in British Columbia as of November 30, 1968?

3. Is it the policy of the Department to reduce the number of community development officers or community development workers employed by the Department in British Columbia and, if so, is that for reasons of austerity or if for other reasons, what are they?

4. Has the Department received communications from spokesmen of the Indian people in British Columbia to the effect that there is a need for more community development workers in British Columbia and, if so, from whom have these complaints come and what was the response in each case?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Twelve.

2. Fourteen.

3. No.

4. Yes, from Mr. Simon J. Reece, Chairman, North Coast District Council. The reply stated that there were no cutbacks in community development services in British Columbia although reassignment to different communities based on need did occur. Mr. Reece was assured in the letter that any community's request for the services of a community development worker would be given every consideration.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the postal slowdown in the city of Montreal which has crippled mail service, a concern which is within the administrative responsibility of the government of Canada and which has presently reached crisis proportions.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has given the Chair the required notice under Standing Order 26. I must inform hon. members of the concern and uncertainty which I feel about the motion brought in by the hon. member.

On the other hand, I do not think that I can leave out of consideration the virtual commitment I gave the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and hon. members, when I suggested that before that question could be examined by the House, it would be advisable to wait for the results of talks between the minister and the labour representatives. It seems that those talks were not successful or fruitful as it could have been expected. Under the circumstances, and in view, as I said, of the position which I ventured to take yesterday, when the motion was brought in by the Leader of the Opposition, I think, even with my misgivings and concern about that matter, that I should put the motion to the House.

And having come to this decision, I am asking the House if the hon. member for Peace River has leave to introduce the motion in order that the matter mentioned by him earlier may be discussed.

[English]

Has the hon. member for Peace River leave to move the motion for the purpose of discussing the matter stated by him? Agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The proposed motion shall stand over until 8 p.m. this day.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the member that this study is of a confidential nature, the release of which would be detrimental to the future relationship between the department, the consultant and the industry concerned. In view of this, the minister would ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I call for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

COMPARATIVE CONSTRUCTION COSTS OF CHEMICAL PLANTS

Motion No. 219—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Chemical Construction Corporation on comparative construction costs of chemical plants undertaken for the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that this study is based largely on information which was received in confidence by the consultant from Canadian industry and, moreover, that there is an agreement between the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association and the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce not to disclose this information. In view of this, the minister would ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: I call for a vote.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the feasibility study on marginal dairy farming undertaken for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the study referred to was commissioned as a working document, intended only for internal use. As such, it is considered confidential and not for publication. I wonder if the hon. member would agree to withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Information Canada!

Mr. Skoberg: I will accept that.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

INDIAN SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 226—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant study on Indian social development undertaken for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1968-69, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the study referred to was commissioned as a working document, intended only for internal use. As such, it is considered confidential and not for publication. I wonder if the hon. member would agree to withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Not on this one, Mr. Speaker. I call for a vote.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

ADMINISTRATION OF FRED PROGRAM

Motion No. 234—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report on the administration of the FRED program undertaken for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion in the fiscal year 1967-68, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the past Session.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there is no specific study which relates to this particular contract; the services of Mr. Pearson were retained for general advice on FRED administration problems. I would therefore request that the hon. member withdraw his motion.

An hon. Member: Which Pearson?

Mr. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): If there is no study then I cannot obtain any information, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

INCOMES AND PRICES CONTROLS

Motion No. 265—Mr. Saltsman:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments regarding incomes or prices controls as referred to by the Prime Minister and reported in Hansard on page 1001, November 19, 1969.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, to the date that this notice of motion was received, there had not been any exchange of correspondence between the government of Canada and the provincial governments on the matter of incomes or prices controls.

An hon. Member: Why not?

Mr. Forest: In view of this, I therefore ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Saltsman: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

SHIPMENT OF POTASH TO U.S.

Motion No. 296—Mr. Burton:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and potash companies or their representatives concerning trade and prices of potash shipped from Saskatchewan to the United States.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the departments concerned that the correspondence in question deals largely with the anti-dumping investigation conducted by the United States Tariff Commission. This correspondence contains information on the prices and quantities of potash shipments, that was supplied by the producers, and accepted by the government on a confidential basis. Therefore, it would not be in the public interest to dislcose this correspondence and it is hoped that the member would withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Information Canada!

Mr. Burton: I cannot agree with that, Mr. Speaker, and I would ask that the vote be taken.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

REPORT ON ATTITUDES OF INDIAN PEOPLE

Motion No. 300—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report on attitudes of Indian people based mainly on a visit to the Six Nations Reserve on July 16, 1969, submitted to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development by Berger, Tisdal, Clark and Lesley Ltd., as referred to on page 6 of the quarterly report on public relations activity, June, July, August, 1969 by the said Berger, Tisdall, Clark and Lesley Ltd.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from Skeena is asking for a report which in fact is a 500-word personal letter written by a contact employee to a departmental employee. The writer specifically requested that the confidentiality of the letter be respected. Under the circumstances I would ask that the hon. member withdraw this motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there is a lot more than that behind this particular item. This report was referred to in a quarterly report by a public relations firm which the taxpayer paid for and I think it should be produced.

Mr. Speaker: I assume the hon. member wants it transferred for debate.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): No, I do not want it transferred for debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Mr. Baldwin: You should have a minister of concealment over there.

Mr. Trudeau: We have not named him yet.

EFFECTS ON CANADA OF BRITISH ENTRY INTO ECM

Motion No. 302—Mr. Saltsman:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of the information provided by the Government of Canada to the Government of Great Britain regarding the effects on Canadian interests as a result of the British entry into the Common Market as mentioned by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in Hansard of December 9, 1969 on page 1738.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wishes to inform the hon. member that the government is in a continuing process of communication with the United Kingdom about the possible effects on Canadian trade if the United Kingdom were to become a member of the EEC. In the context of negotiations which have yet to commence, the hon. member will appreciate that it would be contrary to the Canadian interest to make public the information which has been provided in confidence to the British authorities. Accordingly, the minister would ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Agreed, to be pursued in committee when the estimates appear.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

REPORT FOR DEPT. OF FISHERIES AND FORESTRY BY AIC-WINSPEAR DOANE LIMITED

Motion No. 316—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by AIC-Winspear Doane Limited, undertaken for the Department of Fisheries and Forestry as mentioned in answer to Question number 2,452 of the past Session.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the subject matter covered by this motion has been discussed with the hon. member and that he is prepared to withdraw the motion, in view of the fact that the information he requests will be provided in response to motion 317.

Mr. Skoberg: In view of the co-operative manner of this department, Mr. Speaker, I agree.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

REPORT FOR DEPT. OF FISHERIES AND FORESTRY BY INBUCON SERVICES LIMITED

Motion No. 317—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Inbucon Services Limited undertaken for the Department of Fisheries and Forestry as mentioned in answer to Question Number 2,452 of the past Session.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this study project was financed jointly by the governent of Canada and the government of Newfoundland. It contained detailed analyses of vessel and plant costs and of the financial position of firms engaged in the frozen groundfish industry in Newfoundland. This aspect of the report could not be tabled since it includes detailed information on the financial posi ion of individual companies. However, the consultants did prepare a separate, more general report in which references to individual firms and their operations were eliminated. The government is prepared to table this part of the report subject to receiving consent from the government of Newfoundland.

Mr. Skoberg: I agree, until I see the rest of the report.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by Parliamentary Secretary the motion is adopted.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Information Canada!

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining notices of motion stand? The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, there is a misuse and abuse of the rules on the part of the government members seeking to prevent effectively a vote in most cases and even a discussion of the subject matter of these various motions for papers. Already on the Order Paper for debate under the item which comes up on alternate Thursdays there are 50 such notices of motions listed, and to them will be added the ones transferred today. In fact, the first three set down for consideration during the hour available on Thursday were transferred on November 19, almost three months ago to the day; tomorrow it will be three months. I think the misuse of this particular section of the rules which prevents information being given by the government to the public should be looked at. I submit the rules are being abused. Some alternative method must be discovered. Perhaps there ought to be a short debate about the need for providing the information. These matters ought not to be permitted to be swept under the rug in the current fashion.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the hon. member has been raised in the past. Following a brief discussion in the House, it was agreed by representatives of the parties that the whole matter of private members' motions, resolutions and private bills might be considered in due course, and perhaps at an early date, by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I believe there is a move afoot among representatives of the parties to have the matter considered. I assume that the representations which have been made by the hon. member for Skeena will be taken into account.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INFLATION—ACTION TO SEEK CO-OPERATION OF UNIONS—APPLICATION OF SANCTIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the government has completed its meetings with the premiers of the provinces and those who sell products in Canada, does it intend to hold similar meetings with important economic groups, whose actions have an important effect on inflation, so that the government's program for controlling inflation may have the best possible chance of success?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have frequent meetings with important economic groups, to use the hon. member's expression. We have them throughout the year.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I will make my question a little clearer. Does the government take the attitude that any anti-inflation program can be successful without the active co-operation of the organized labour movement?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Do members of the government, and the Prime Minister in particular, plan to have meetings with the leaders of organized labour and make a personal appeal to them for that active co-operation which is vitally important to the success of the government's anti-inflation program?

Mr. Trudeau: On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. We do not take that position. On the contrary, we think that the fight against inflation cannot be won without the active support of all sections of the community, and particularly the working sector of the community known as organized labour. Replying to the second part of the question, I may say that the whole cabinet will be meeting with the two main labour organizations in the country in some weeks to come. They have asked to meet cabinet, to present their views on the economic situation and other matters.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement yesterday by the executive vice-president of the Canadian Labour Congress that the government's proposals are far too vague to be taken seriously, does the Prime Minister consider that waiting for a number of weeks before having a general meeting, which governments have each year with our labour bodies, is satisfactory? Would he also advise the House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps before the hon. member asks a further supplementary question I might suggest to him that the supplementary question he has just addressed to the Prime Minister is argumentative. I recognize that he has a further supplementary to ask and he will be allowed to ask it.

Mr. Hees: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, Your Honour knows I try never to be argumentative. May I direct another supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Was the possible application of sanctions against those who do not comply with the guidelines that were agreed to at the meeting with management a week ago discussed at the meetings that took place during the past two days? If so, is any action planned in this regard by the federal and provincial governments?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would consult the communique which was tabled earlier, he would see what recommendations made by the Prices and Incomes Commission to governments were considered and generally agreed to by the members present at the federal-provincial conference. One of the subjects referred to at the conference was sanctions.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I asked the Prime Minister if the government plans to take any action in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. As a result of the conference held between the Prime Minister and provincial premiers, did the Prime Minister ask provincial governments to join with the federal government in concurrent action in order to give the Prices and Incomes Commission the necessary power to impose sanctions? If so, what was the nature of those sanctions and what reply did the Prime Minister receive from the provincial premiers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there was no indication at any time to my knowledge that the Prices and Incomes Commission should be empowered to impose sanctions. Sanctions, if they come, will come from the governments which represent the people. They will come from either the federal or provincial governments.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister to what sanctions he asked the provincial governments to commit their respective jurisdictions. What response has he received from the provincial premiers in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the members of the commission discussed with the provinces, as they did with the federal government, the kinds of sanctions which could be applied. In looking into our arsenal, we have found that there are lots of sanctions available and we agreed to use whatever sanctions would be needed in cases where they had to be called into play. But as far as the provinces are concerned, I have no knowledge of the promises they might have made to the commission. They did agree that they would use the sanctions which were required in particular cases.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What sanctions has the federal government committed itself to applying in the event that prices rise by a greater amount than costs during the year?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, we do not say in advance what gun we shall shoot at what target until we know what the target is that must be shot at. The Minister of Finance and I have given various examples in the past as to the kinds of sanctions which could be used: the use of the government's procurement policy; the use of the tariff; the use of governmental discretion in allocating funds to industries which are embarked upon research with federal help, and so on. All these sanctions are available to us. We cannot say, in answer to a theoretical smile, what sanctions will be called into play until we know the problem which has to be solved.

INFLATION—EFFECT OF QUEBEC BORROWING IN LONDON AND EUROPE

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

As far as the control of inflation is concerned, does the Prime Minister think that loans being negotiated by Quebec in London and on the European markets will result in Canada in huge amounts of money being put in circulation, as if this money were created by the Canadian banks, thus contributing to higher inflationary pressures?

Mr. Speaker: I feel the hon. member is inviting the Prime Minister to express an opinion. The question as asked is out of order.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Has the Prime Minister offered to the provinces an alternative scheme enabling them to borrow money on the world market, as they are doing now, but at an interest rate lower than the prevailing one which is a serious cause of inflation?

Did the Prime Minister suggest a solution to the provinces about loans?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, because we are creating budget surpluses and not putting ourselves into the position of having to negotiate loans, we have given provinces and municipalities a solution, leaving them an open field when they want to borrow money.

CANADIAN SOVEREIGNTY

RIGHT OF RUSSIAN SHIPS TO USE NORTHWEST PASSAGE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and has to do with observations he made yesterday in connection with the Manhattan to the effect that it is free to go in and through the northern waters of the Arctic archipelago and that if it needs the assistance of the Canadian government that assistance will be freely given. Can the minister say whether Russian ships, no matter whether they are engaged in business of any kind or trade or are warships or ships undertaking obviously peaceful purposes, will be permitted to go through our northern waters without the permission of the government of Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is the most hypothetical question I have ever been asked in my career.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing hypothetical about the dangers to this country if northern Canada is opened in the way it is now being opened.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

SHARED-COST PROGRAMS—ROLE OF PRESIDENT OF TREASURY BOARD IN ASSISTING PROVINCES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister explain to the House whether the provinces requested the services of the President of the Treasury Board to assist them in trimming costs of various shared-cost programs, and whether his job will be that of an adviser or will he carry stronger and more persuasive powers?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there is general agreement between the provinces and federal government that one should do what one can in order to have these programs operate as efficiently as possible. We pay half the cost and they pay half the cost. What the President of the Treasury Board will be doing is consulting with the provinces and looking at methods for controlling costs in these programs, in the same way as there have been consultations, for example, between our Minister of National Health and Welfare and the various provincial ministers of health and welfare.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of Premier Robarts' statement that Ontario might have to consider dropping some shared-cost programs, will the President of the Treasury Board be authorized to give advice on the best way this could be done?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this question is in order.

SUGGESTED REMOVAL OF SALES TAX ON MARGARINE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. A few days ago during questions on Orders of the Day the Minister of Finance indicated that consideration was being given by his department to the request of consumer groups which are urging that the 12 per cent federal sales tax be removed from margarine. Would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs confer with his colleague on this anti-inflationary move?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member is simply suggesting that one minister communicate with another. In this sense, it is a representation and the hon. member must assume it has been noted.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

NON-INTERVENTION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT IN FIELDS OF PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Following the latest federal-provincial conference, does the government still intend to intervene directly in fields within provincial jurisdiction should the provinces fail to adapt their legislation to that of the federal government with regard to the preservation of water, for instance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it would be impossible to intervene within fields out of our jurisdiction since the constitution prohibits it.

TRANSPORT

NORTHWEST PASSAGE—FUEL OIL TO BE CARRIED BY "MANHATTAN" ON PROJECTED SECOND VOYAGE

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I had intended to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, but in view of his prolonged absence from the House I will direct it to the Minister of Transport. In view of the anticipated second journey of the supertanker Manhattan through the Northwest Passage, how many estimated tons of fuel oil will she be required to carry to safely ensure her passage on this long, dangerous, slow-moving and time-consuming voyage?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, after a few days with my sliderule I will let the hon. member know.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the minister's answer, I suggest that he inquire how much it took the last time. I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister require the Manhattan to fly the Canadian flag while travelling through our waters, unlike the last time?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

DRAFTING OF REGULATIONS COVERING INNOCENT PASSAGE THROUGH TERRITORIAL WATERS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to ask the Minister of Transport if he is now engaged in considering the drafting of regulations to cover innocent passage through what are Canadian territorial waters, as Canada is entitled to do, under the international conventions?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I think the question might more properly be directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs as I believe it involves—

Mr. Baldwin: We can't get anywhere with him.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE—FILLING OF VACANT POSITIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the five major appointments at the director level or higher already this year in his department, will the minister please advise whether the recent appointment of Mr. Bernard Ostry as Under-Secretary of State has finally filled all the blanks in his department?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Nowlan: I think the minister was about to rise. I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: I thought I saw a blank look on the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I thought it was a blank question, Mr. Speaker. The answer is no.

Mr. Nowlan: If the minister thinks it is a blank question he may not think the supplementary is so blank. He may think it more blunt. Is there any relationship between the new responsibilities of the Under-Secretary of State within the minister's department and his past part authorship of the brief to set up Information Canada?

Mr. Trudeau: That is a blunt question.

Mr. Nowlan: You look very blank.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUPPLEMENTARY PENSIONS BENEFITS BILL

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as Government House Leader. On February 6, in response to a question of mine, the minister indicated that the supplementary pensions benefits bill would be available for first reading in the week of February 16, and that is this week. In view of the fact that no notice of that bill is yet on the Order Paper and that notice must be given today if it is to be given first reading this week, can the minister inform us if that will be done?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Certain drafting problems have been encountered with regard to the bill. I am afraid there will not be a notice given this week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister now assure us that it will be before the House next week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I hate to create any expectations I could not meet next week.

[Translation]

AIR CANADA

OPPORTUNITY OF PRIVATE INTERESTS TO PURCHASE SHARES

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

In view of the intention of the government to turn Air Canada into a Crown corporation entirely independent from the Canadian National Railways, can the minister tell us whether this gesture means that, in the near future, individuals or private interest groups will be able to purchase Air Canada shares and to control this corporation?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no such intention.

TRANSPORT

SNOWMOBILES—PREPARATION OF SAFETY REGULATIONS

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the tremendous increase in the sale and use of snowmobiles in Canada, and the tremendous increase in accidents that are caused by these machines, is the minister or his department preparing regulations with regard to safety features that could be incorporated in these machines?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. A number of features are being studied at the moment to see whether, under the proposed bill now before the House, we can introduce these safety measures at the manufacturing stage.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DEVELOPMENT OF FARM MANAGEMENT TRAINING PROGRAMS

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. He is not here very often and the Parliamentary Secretary has been carrying on. Possibly he might answer this question. In the light of a recent statement by a Saskatchewan agricultural expert that there could be twice as many acres of Saskatchewan Indian reserves under cultivation as there are at present, has the minister or any member of his department taken steps to speed up the development of farm management training programs for Indians?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been here every day. Today, he is in Quebec city speaking with his counterpart there with reference to national parks in that province. To answer the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker, this is part of the economic upgrading program for the Indian people.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister asked for any guarantees that this type of program will be continued, if and when the new Indian policy he proposes comes into effect?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question is much too general in terms and slightly hypothetical.

Mr. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be answered at this time. It is very important and urgent. What further plans are being made by the government for reduction of the acreage put into wheat this crop year on land that has been under cultivation in former years?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. Honey: I am not prepared to answer that question, Mr. Speaker. I shall have to take it as notice and give a definite answer tomorrow.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

SALE OF GASOLINE BY OCTANE RATING

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to a proposal by the United States federal trade commission that gasoline be sold by octane ratings clearly listed at filling station pumps? If so, is it his intention to consider similar action in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: I do not know how urgent this question may be. I would think it could easily be placed on the Order Paper.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS TO DENMARK CONCERNING CONTROLS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): My question is addressed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that fishing off Greenland by Danish fishermen is resulting in the wholesale destruction of Atlantic salmon spawned in North America, will the minister consider making representations to the Danish government urging that controls be placed on the Danish fleet before Atlantic salmon stocks are completely destroyed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I understand the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has been particularly concerned about this matter and has been making representations in various places. I am sure that if this is a problem he will be doing so.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries, then. Since Norway and Britain have also accused Denmark of sabotaging international fishing conventions drawn up to protect the Atlantic salmon, will the minister take up this matter at the international level and request that a maximum quota be placed on salmon taken off Greenland?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): We have taken up this question at the international level and all but two countries have agreed on abstention, as the hon.

member probably knows. I am not aware that the British and the Norwegian governments have made public protests as yet, but perhaps they may be driven to it—as we may be as well.

POLLUTION

AVAILABILITY TO COMMITTEE OF OPINIONS EXPRESSED AT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising from the discussion on pollution which took place at the federal-provincial conference. Would the Prime Minister advise the House in what manner the government intends to place before the parliamentary committee the various opinions which were expressed at the conference so that the committee might be up to date?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Perhaps I should deal with that inquiry. There is a motion on the Order Paper in the name of my colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The conference having been held, it might be appropriate to arrange, after discussion with the opposition House leaders, that the question be put some time next week or shortly after so that action could be taken.

Mr. Aiken: I was referring particularly to the discussions on pollution and the Canada Water bill. The President of the Privy Council did not refer to this aspect. We are vitally concerned because the committee is considering this very bill, which was the subject of discussion at the conference.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As far as the government is concerned, the minister pledged to meet with the premiers who wanted to have further discussions on this subject, either personally or through his officials, and to consider further proposals for changes or amendments which had been made. He will consider which would be the best way of bringing such amendments before the committee, or before the House, if necessary. As far as the provincial positions are concerned—I have no authority over the committee, of course—the committee might wish to seize itself, if it thinks fit, of copies of the provincial briefs, which have been made public.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

MARITIMES—EFFECT ON SAFETY OF REDUCTION OF RAILWAY MAINTENANCE-OF-WAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): May I direct this question to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker? He may wish to take it as notice. Has the hon. gentleman received communications from the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, division 586, and the United Transportation Union, Local 500, asking that he investigate the effect on the safety factor which could result from cutting the number of maintenance-of-way employees in the maritime area by 50 per cent? If so, will he look into this serious situation?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I do not recall having received these communications, but I will look into it and reply later.

DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION—ASSURANCE RESPECTING STAFF LAY-OFFS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a question for the Minister of Transport relating to his staff and his reorganization plans. Will he give an assurance to the House that, as a result of these changes to be made in the department, there will be no staff reductions, or, at least that he will not take the opportunity to bring about serious lay-offs among the staff of the National Harbours Board, Air Canada and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority? Will he give this definite assurance here and now in view of the apprehension—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked his question.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I think it is anticipated that there will be some personnel changes of a minor nature but I believe I can provide the assurance for which the hon. member is looking.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Can the minister allay the fears of certain employees, such as the employees on the seaway, who believe they will become civil servants and lose some of their collective bargaining rights together with some of their present status as employees of a Crown corporation as a result of the contemplated reorganization?

Mr. Jamieson: I indicated yesterday that the status of the seaway will remain virtually as it is. Consequently, I see no reason why the changes to which the hon. member has alluded should take place.

DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION—POSSIBLE EFFECT ON GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): My question to the Minister of Transport arising out of his plans for reorganization is: will he ensure that the municipalities do not receive smaller federal tax payments as a result of the reoganization when, for example, the National Harbours Board, a Crown corporation, becomes something else?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I would ask the hon. member to be more specific. I cannot give such an assurance at the moment. If he would give me some specific examples, I will try to deal with them.

Mr. McCleave: My question concerns grants in lieu of taxation which might be smaller if a Crown corporation, such as the National Harbours Board, were to become simply part of a government department.

Mr. Speaker: Supplementary? The hon. member for Hamilton West.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

DISCUSSION OF URBANIZATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Was the serious question of growing urbanization discussed at the last federal-provincial meeting together with the prospect of establishing a three-tier—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not supplementary to the one we were considering a moment ago. However, the hon. member has asked it and perhaps the Prime Minister might reply.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): This question was not on the agenda nor does a specific reference to it appear in the communiqué. There was some mention among delegations of this important subject but it was not specifically tackled as an item of business.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF PRESENTATION TO PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with the presentation which was made to him by the McGill University Intertribal Council and the Native Association of Quebec. In order to provide us all with a degree of understanding of the esteem in which he is held by the native people, would he be prepared to table that presentation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It was not a serious presentation, but if the hon. member wants to table it himself I am sure we will see the level of his thinking.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Apropos of that reply, I indicated—and I apologize for it—the level of my thinking by addressing the question in the first place to such an ass.

Mr. Trudeau: Lost your cool?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the language he is using is utterly and completely unparliamentary. It may not be in his understanding, but it is in mine.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, considering what the Prime Minister said a while ago, does he intend to ask the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications to table that document?

[English]

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

REVIEW OF ROLE AND STRUCTURE OF COUNCIL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. On December 3, 1969, in answer to a question I had asked him, the minister informed me he was in the process of reviewing the role and structure of the Consumer Council. May I ask him, now, whether his review is complete and, if so, when we may expect a report?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I hope to announce some appointments very shortly.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

REPORTED ABANDONING BY UNITED STATES OF ARCTIC METEOROLOGICAL SERVICES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and has reference to one I asked a few days ago. Is the minister in a position today to shed further light on the question whether he or the government have received any indication from United States authorities that they will abandon their meteorological services in the Arctic?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into this matter and can report that to date we have not received any official notification from the United States. Like the hon. member, I expect, I have seen news reports to this effect, but there has been no official communication or notification.

HISTORIC SITES

ACQUISITION OF RESIDENCE OF SIR ROBERT BORDEN

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Secretary of State as custodian pro tem of our historic heritage. Can the Secretary of State advise whether anything is being done to acquire the long-time residence of Prime Minister Sir Robert Borden for the people of Canada so as to forestall its imminent destruction by commercial interests?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the hon. member is mistaken about the person responsible for historic sites. If that was the object of his question, responsibility for historic sites belongs to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, not to the Secretary of State.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I referred not to historic sites but asked about our heritage, in the minister's capacity as minister of culture.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

RECONSIDERATION OF ORDER LEVYING CHARGES FOR USE OF FILMS

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. I am sure he listened, as we did, to the Prime Minister's statement on motions about forgoing the imposition of user charges. Is it, therefore, planned that the National Film Board's new fee schedule will be included in this sensible policy decision?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, Mr. Speaker, nothing has happened to change the decision I referred to in my previous answers.

[English]

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the same point. The Secretary of State indicated on February 11 that a decision about the National Film Board had already been made. This was reconfirmed today. I should like to ask the Secretary of State, inasmuch as on February 12 he followed up by writing a letter to me which included the sentence, "Please be assured"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not the time for the hon. member to read his correspondence. He should ask his question.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, if you will allow me to finish the sentence, I think you will realize—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that when asking a question it is not in order to read correspondence. The hon. member should put his question directly.

Mr. Korchinski: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, this is part of my question, which is simply this. The minister says: "I sincerely hope that a solution will be found". On the previous day he stated in the House that a decision had been made. I want to know what is the truth. When is he telling the truth, and when not?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think there will have to be further correspondence between the minister and the hon. member.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order. I do not know whether he writes the truth or speaks the truth—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked a question and I have made a ruling. I suggest to him that the question as asked is not in order. It might perhaps be redrafted in some other way, but I think he will agree with me, on reflection, that the question as asked is not in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. Korchinski: A further supplementary question. How shall I reply to those people who have made inquiries?

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): A supplementary question to the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the reference in the report on National Film Board affairs commissioned earlier by the minister made only passing reference to the question of user charges on films, will the minister undertake to make a more complete study of this question, one satisfactory to the people concerned with the matter?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as I said to hon. members, to all those who asked me questions, and as I wrote to them, I think there is a problem. I personally never despair of finding a solution to a problem when I feel there is a problem; I spend all my time searching for solutions. I believe that is precisely what a minister should do. It is also the only answer I can give to that last question.

AGRICULTURE

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—PROGRAMS TO ASSIST FARMERS

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of his recognition in his statement of the difficult economic situation in western Canada, and in view of the fact that the government must have been aware of this for some time, can the Prime Minister inform the House in a general way of some of the programs the government has in mind to deal with this situation?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that the information he is now seeking should normally be given to the House by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Gleave: A supplementary question. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government's declared objective of selling 1.3 billion bushels of wheat over three years is still the government's objective?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

TRANSPORT

DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION—POSSIBLE EFFECT ON GRANTS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my previous question, which is an important one to the municipalities, to the Minister of Finance. Will the grants in lieu of taxation be reduced for any municipality as the result of the pending reorganization of the Department of Transport?

[Mr. Burton.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I would think not, Mr. Speaker, but I had better look into the details to which my hon. friend refers, and perhaps I could talk to him about the matter.

AGRICULTURE

DISCONTINUANCE OF PREMIUM PAYMENTS ON HOG CARCASSES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture arising from the recent answer given to a question on the Order Paper with regard to the discontinuance of government premiums on quality hog carcasses. Is the minister in a position to indicate to the House when this program will become effective, or when we may expect a formal announcement in this regard?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a definite date at the moment.

Mr. Mazankowski: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the fact that this move represents a considerable saving to the Department of Agriculture, can the minister say whether this amount will be reallocated within the department? Could he also indicate whether this amount will be earmarked for a program for the early retirement of farmers?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member now has the blue book containing the estimates for the coming fiscal year, and he can read that just as well as I can quote it to him.

FINANCE

MEDICARE—REFUND TO CERTAIN PROVINCES OF MONEY COLLECTED THROUGH SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT TAX

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance, and it has to do with the dominion-provincial conference. In view of the fact that the provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan were the only provinces to join medicare on July 1, 1968, would the minister reconsider the answer that he gave yesterday to the other provinces who did not join the medicare plan on that date and refund to those provinces, on a pro rata basis, the money that he collected from the social development tax?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, and I wish that some of the provinces who are receiving the money would make sure that the people who are insured get it.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question. Would the minister advise the House whether the social development tax was imposed for the purpose of paying for medicare?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

COMPLETION OF DIGBY-SAINT JOHN FERRY

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, you will rejoice at the fact that you have not heard this question for about nine months. May I ask the Minister of Public Works whether he can assure the House that the Digby-Saint John ferry project will be completed on the date scheduled?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we were afraid at one time that the ship would be ahead of us. There is now some suggestion that we will be ahead of the ship.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING "HOURGLASS" PROGRAM

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the recent and completely unfair representation made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation "Hourglass" program of the city of Nelson and its Notre Dame University, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he has investigated the many complaints received about this particular production and, if so, whether a report on the investigation is available.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this is the first complaint I have heard against this program, but I take note of the representations of the hon. member and I shall ask the CBC about it.

SPORTS

GRANT TO QUEBEC AMATEUR HOCKEY ASSOCIATION

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but since we have seen very little of him in the House for quite some time, I will put it to his parliamentary secretary.

Has the Minister received complaints from the Quebec Amateur Hockey Association in connection with the attitude of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association towards the 8,000 Quebec teams which are receiving a $9,000 grant compared to $27,000 obtained by the 4,000 teams of Ontario?

Mr. Speaker: I think that this question could be put on the order paper.

[English]

TAXATION

WHITE PAPER ON REFORM—STATEMENT BY SASKATCHEWAN PREMIER

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Will Premier Thatcher's statement that he would have to reconsider being a member of the Liberal party if the white paper on tax reform is proceeded with persuade the minister that fundamental changes, if not complete withdrawal, of this document are now in order?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is argumentative.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION, TABLING OF PAPERS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise the House on what date he hopes to table the budget papers, and has he yet set the precise date for his budget presentation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I hope to table the budget papers next week, but I would not like to be tied down to that. They are presently being prepared, printed and so on. The target date for the budget presentation is March 3, but here again I do not want to be tied down. It might be extended a week or so beyond that date, depending on circumstances.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING STRUCTURE OF ORGANIZATION

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-176, to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Speaker: Before calling on the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), may I suggest that the first motion to be proposed by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) bears on the same clause as does the motion in the name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. I would like the House to consider the possibility of combining both motions for the purpose of debate, but that would require a separate vote to be taken on each motion. I have looked at both motions and it seems to me that it would be rather difficult to isolate the debate on each one of them, so that contributions to the debate on the first motion would be relevant to both motions, and, if required, a vote could be taken separately on each one of them.

In a preliminary way, I might suggest at this time that motion No. 3 on the notice paper in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West may be defective. However, I am not making a ruling now. I hope that in the course of the debate hon. members might take a look at it and give advice to the Chair on the point I want to make. That motion proposes the deletion of clause 5 from the bill as reprinted. It seems to me that the purpose of clause 4 of the bill would be to restrict the activities of the Company of Young Canadians to and within Canada. The effect of deleting clause 5 of the reprinted bill would be to restore a provision in the original act which enabled the company to carry out certain activities at home or abroad. What I am suggesting now is that if the motion standing in the name of the hon. member were accepted by the House, obviously there would be a conflict between clauses 4 and 5, and that of course would be very difficult to countenance. We might at that point have to go back to clause 4, and I am not sure how that could be done. This is a technical difficulty which hon. members might like to consider, and when we get to that motion hon. members might like to argue either for or against the procedural point.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as Your Honour suggested, perhaps we can postpone consideration of the question about motion No. 3, but I would like to indicate that we are quite happy with your ruling that motions Nos. 1 and 2 should be debated together but be voted on separately, if necessary.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will now put the first motion, and eventually when the debate has been concluded the second motion will also be put.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants) moved:

That Bill C-176, an Act to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, be amended by adding in section 4(1) in Clause 1, the words "of whom three shall be elected by volunteer-members and the remainder" after the word "members" in line 16 and deleting the word "who" in line 17.

He said: I think it would simplify things considerably if the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) could simply nod his acceptance, following which I would be quite pleased to sit down. The Secretary of State not having nodded his acceptance but having shaken his head in rejection, I will carry on.

First of all, let me make it clear on behalf of my associates that we maintan our objections to the bill incorporating the Company of Young Canadians. We feel that as a viable organization it has lost its credibility in the country. The kindest thing to do—and we did suggest this before—would be to kill it, and, with proper studies, start something new which would involve the participation of youth. But that has not been the position the government has taken, and so we are forced to consider what our duties and responsibilities are in studying this legislation. I think that it is the duty of Members of Parliament, whether on the government side or in opposition, to try to improve the legislation that comes before them. Although we do object to the continuance of the Company of Young Canadians, none the less we will try to improve the bill and make the organization as viable as possible.

Under the present law, as set forth on the opposite page of the bill to the clause that is now being considered and my suggested amendment to that clause, hon. members will find that 15 members constitute the Council of the Company of Young Canadians, of whom ten are elected by volunteer members and the other five appointed by the governor in council. What the government proposes to do in the bill that is now before us is to appoint seven or nine members by governor in council and none by volunteer members. I suggest that this is a pretty abrupt change and that government control could have been exercised equally effectively by the governor in council appointing the majority of members of the council but leaving some to be selected by volunteer members. I think that the cure is an over-reaction to the problems that were discovered earlier in this session when the Standing Committee on Broadcasting dealt with the affairs of the Company of Young Canadians. It is to bring the thing into proper focus that I present the amendment which has the support of my colleagues and which, I understand, also has the support of my friends to the left. If my amendment does not pass, I will support with equal ardor their amendment.

Both amendments make substantially the same point, that there is room at the top in the Company of Young Canadians for appointees of volunteer members to have their say in shaping the policies. I think it is important that there be some appointees by volunteer members. These appointees could be from the volunteer members themselves or simply people who they think should be on the board of directors. In this way, at least there would be some say in the management of the affairs of the Company of Young Canadians by people acceptable to the volunteers, who really are the guts of the Company of Young Canadians. Without cheerful and willing volunteers, the Company of Young Canadians is ephemeral and only a dream. I am afraid the desire of the goverment not to have a participatory type of operation at the highest level in the Company of Young Canadians will drive away any support, or at least much of the support, young people would give to the Company of Young Canadians.

I wish I could peel off about 25 or 30 years and be in the position of a volunteer member. I believe I would look at the situation with some suspicion that youth was being condescended to and that father government knows best by simply choosing all the members who run the affairs of the Company of Young Canadians. There is that danger. Certainly, my amendment and the other amendment overcome that objection. It is true the minister could appoint former volunteer members to the board. I presume at some time when taking part in this debate he will announce that this is exactly his intention. But it is not the same thing.

Former volunteer members may run the risk of being called sort of "Uncle Toms" in the Company of Young Canadians set-up. In any event, they would not be as acceptable as people who were chosen in a proper election by the volunteer members who make up the backbone of the operations of the Company of Young Canadians. When this matter was before the broadcasting committee the strongest point made against selections by volunteer members was something called conflict of interest. Conflict of interest carries an ominous sound. I believe there are about six points which can be made to completely demolish this argument.

In the first place, the conflict of interest idea never really bothered anyone when the original measure was passed because, as I noted earlier, 10 of the 15 were to be selected by the volunteer members. Secondly, we had the interesting exercise in respect of the Telesat bill which, interestingly enough, went before the same committee. People from among the private carriers in the telecommunications industry form part of the board of Telesat Canada. I cannot think of any greater conflict of interest anywhere than in Telesat, yet this did not cause anybody that much concern. Certainly, it did not concern the government.

The third argument to demolish this nonsense about conflict of interest is that the majority of the members on the board would be government appointees. It would be almost impossible to believe that one person appointed by volunteer members could somehow smuggle in something which, although definitely to his own advantage, would be of disadvantage to the Company of Young Canadians. I just cannot conceive of that taking place at all. The fourth point to demolish the argument about conflict of interest has perhaps some validity to those interested in the conflict of interest idea. I refer to the danger that a volunteer member would not see the whole forest for his own trees; that is, he would be so busy promoting something he wanted to see done that he would not be truly representing the interests of the whole group of volunteer members. I suppose this is a possibility whenever any group of men and women meet together to make decisions. Yet such a person obviously would find himself operating on his own without support from those around him. In any event, I think the volunteer members could settle his hash by an election at a subsequent time.

The fifth point in respect of this conflict of interest theory is that the volunteer members could choose non-volunteer members. Perhaps they would choose someone who had graduated from the ranks of volunteer members. But they would not be limited by my amendment to choosing from among the volunteers. The sixth argument against this so-called conflict of interest theory, I think, is perhaps as germane as any. I draw a parallel to the directors of corporations because shareholders become directors; in fact, they are required to hold shares before they can become directors. I suppose in that sense one could say there is a certain conflict of interest and that their decisions could affect their own personal fortunes. Yet, this is a very acceptable mode of doing business. No one questions this at all. To continue the parallel, I do not see any reason why, if volunteer members should become members of the board of the Company of Young Canadians, their personal interest and desire to take part in the activities of the Company of Young Canadians should disqualify them.

It is important that there be more objective control of the Company of Young Canadians than there was in the past. I do not intend to go over the history. It is well known, and if I were to do so it would involve a reference to some persons who have been allowed to retreat from the Company of Young Canadians. It was pretty obvious from our studies and discussions that one weakness was the failure to properly research the projects undertaken by the Company of Young Canadians. Volunteer members would rush in to try to correct a situation which probably was not capable of correction. They would leave the community they were trying to serve in a complete state of frustration and would find themselves completely frustrated. Some of these young men and women actually required psychiatric treatment after their service in the Company of Young Canadians. I think this was simply due to the fact that they thought some unpleasant situation, which may have been incapable of correction, required correction or a cure. The result was that they immersed themselves in a frustrating situation and became frustrated themselves.

[Mr. McCleave.]

I can buy the principle of government direction to the point that the overriding authority is there if the government appointees wish to exercise it. But I would hope that if it came down to a real tug-of-war between authority and responsibility in respect of whether some silly project should be approved, common sense and the majority would carry the day.

• (4:10 p.m.)

But I cannot see asking young people to be involved in the donkey work, which again is the guts of the work of the Company of Young Canadians, and not giving them the feeling they have a say in the operations and direction of the Company. It is pretty obvious that the type of youth attracted to the Company of Young Canadians wants the chance to tilt at the establishment, to provide voices for those in need. Their argument is put rather well in a brief submitted to the broadcasting committee on February 3 by the Great Slave Lake Project of the Company of Young Canadians, operating out of Yellowknife. Page 2 of that brief reads in part:

> What we are saying is that you cannot seek answers to the problems of groups disenfranchised by a particular system from within that system.

I do not accept that point of view, Mr. Speaker, because later on in the same brief they make the point that many people are disenfranchised because their Members of Parliament are not totally representative of them. But nonetheless, Sir, there is some validity in what they say, and it is useful to have shrill voices of protest to remind us of the places in which we must, as a Parliament, take more action to help those who now live in a permanent shadow-world of despair.

In brief then, Mr. Speaker, I submit that we don't knock over, we don't put the whole thing out of kilter by giving young people some voice in the operations of the Company of Young Canadians. I suggest, Sir, that the over-reaction of government, turning the Company of Young Canadians into a company of bureaucratically run Canadians, is simply too drastic a cure for the problems we discovered when we dealt with the Company of Young Canadians before. I say to the minister that if his desire is to revive and turn the Company of Young Canadians into the useful force that we all hoped it would be when the legislation was originally passed with the blessings of everybody in this House, this approach now will alienate youth and will stultify the desire of youth to provide useful community service.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, in speaking in favour of the two amending motions which we are discussing at the same time today I would first like to say that I am struck, perhaps even perplexed, by what the minister said in his speech on January 28 on second reading stage, and the contradiction I find between his enlightened, philosophical exposition at that time and what we find in clause 4 of the bill before us. I read from Hansard the minister's words printed on page 2941:

> Our youth are active participants in our society, and although we wish to encourage their participation they are in many ways independent enough, aloof enough, to undertake a critical analysis that is impossible for our generation. I do not wish to set up youth as an independent alter ego screaming in the darkness. Rather, I wish to argue for a legitimate voice for youth in our structures just as I would argue, and have argued, for a legitimate voice for all people in our society.
> Youth in particular have a point of view; youth in particular have an analysis. The fact is that what we do today determines the society in which they must live tomorrow. The mistakes we make today, they must undo tomorrow. Surely, this is reason enough to grant them full and equal participation in our society. The worst possible thing that could happen, in my opinion, would be a return to the dull fifties, the period of navel contemplations by youth.

I would like to emphasize the words of the minister which I read earlier, Mr. Speaker:

> Rather, I wish to argue for a legitimate voice for youth in our structures—

Now, I find in reading the clause we are discussing, clause 4 in the bill, that:

> There shall be a Council of the Company consisting of not less than seven and not more than nine members, who shall be appointed by the Governor in Council—

That is a very interesting juxtaposition of two viewpoints. Anyone can see at a glance that if there is no contradiction between the minister's views and what we find in the bill, then we have before us at the very least a dramatic excursion, and this causes me to wonder whether the minister really believes his own words. If he does, then he must have been subjected to some extreme pressures which caused him to support this particular clause.

How does he say, "I wish to argue for a legitimate voice for youth in our structures" on the one hand, and then go to the length he has in denying that very voice in the councils of an organization designed to attract youth to help overcome some of society's ills? It seems incredible to me and to my party that, in the age of alienation and struggle for participation, the minister would consider such a reactionary move. I believe he should reject it out of hand.

This is an era in which there exists a great push towards shared decision making. We have emerged from the Apollonian era of apathy and acceptance into one which seeks to extend democracy far beyond the simple one man-one vote concept, and perhaps into a new age where the governed and those governing them are continuously in dialogue.

I think a glance at our daily newspapers will confirm to us the fact that the students, the labour unions, the Indians, the blacks, the tenants, the poor, and the anti-pollution groups are all hammering on the doors of whatever establishment is at the moment constraining them, depriving them and frustrating them. They are knocking on these doors because above all else they want to be able to participate in those decisions—the rules of the game, if you like—that are likely to affect their lives, and they want to do it more than once every four years. In fact, they are demanding that this voice will not diminish. I do not think there will be a return to a former period of navel contemplation, to use the minister's words. On the contrary, society must adjust to this hunger for a voice or I believe the only alternative is for society to arm itself for some violent reactions. I realize the minister knows all of these things and probably agrees with me on most of them. That is why I find it impossible to understand the reason for returning to a totally appointed council concept, as if this were going to be some magic solution to all of the problems associated with the CYC.

Let us review CYC history for a moment. First of all, we had two and a half years of the CYC with a completely appointed council. Included on that council, I might add, were some of the men who are today very important in government circles behind the scenes. The CYC was constantly in hot water then because of the failure of these men, and of others, to do the job adequately. Then, after these two and a half years, we had three or four months last fall of an elected council. Ten of the 15 members were to be elected by or from the volunteers, and five were appointed. But the same story prevailed. There was lots of controversy and the CYC was in for more than its share of hot water. Then, just before Christmas we heard the powerful voice of Mr. Saulnier of Montreal, and a tremor was felt throughout the land.

This tremor quickly produced a parliamentary committee to consider the problem further and make certain recommendations. Following the committee report, we had imposed upon the CYC a one man trusteeship under which all facets of the CYC were frozen on the spot, projects were cancelled and much work ground to a halt. Today, we are considering this enlightened document, Bill C-176, which I believe is disloyal to almost everything the Committee report and the CYC orginally stood for. Now, some four years and $7 million later we have completed the circle and are back to the appointed council. I oppose this idea in the strongest possible terms.

I realize fully, Mr. Speaker, that my motion and the previous one will be regarded by some of the flaming revolutionaries as mere tokenism. They may well say that unless they can have a majority on the council, they do not want to play. These amendments also may be regarded as mere tinkering with an organization so totally defanged as to be meaningless in terms of the job to be done. Be that as it may, I genuinely believe that the voice of the "doers" should be heard strongly on the council, not just that of the "planners."

An amendment calling for three of seven or eight and four of nine to be elected by volunteers would achieve this kind of voice and give those close to the projects a pipeline to those council members further removed. That kind of liaison would be beneficial to everyone concerned. It would not be a majority voice so the criticism of project backscratching could not prevail. It would not be a case of "you back my project and I will back yours". This whole problem and the criticism levelled previously could be avoided.

Another criticism raised to volunteers electing council members is that it puts the executive director in an impossible position. As part of management he has, so to speak, to work with people who may be concurrently his superiors and his subordinates. I do not believe this is a strong argument, because if the council operates effectively and within the rule that the council is supposed to address itself to, that is one of policy and legislation, it would not interfere with the executive or administrative function. I think as long as the executive and legislative roles are completely isolated from one another, this management criticism could well be avoided. I believe the council could set its policy and the administrative director could administer the same. I do not believe the council should be concerning itself with administration; neither do I believe that the executive director should be concerning himself with policy.

I urge the House and the minister to accept this amendment. I think it is in keeping with the minister's own views of participation and will indicate to those volunteers who do remain that this firsthand "in the field" experience will be readily transferred to the body charged with framing the policy under which the volunteers must function and work.

Before I close, I think I should protest the fact that neither during the committee hearings of last fall, nor those of last month at which this bill was considered, did we hear from the volunteers. They did not appear before us in spite of repeated requests from them. I tried, to no avail, to have them before us again this month and I think if they had expressed, some of their concerns and fears for the new order of things, their views might have been exposed and discussed.

I also wanted to learn a great deal more personally about the activities of Mr. Mendelsohn, the comptroller, and the executive director during the time they remained firmly in the saddle. Since their tenure is to end on March 31, I wanted to know how many projects were cancelled; how were volunteers replaced, if they were replaced; what criteria were used in shaping those decisions. These were things that concerned the volunteers in the field, but we were denied the information in committee so hon. members are again being called upon to render a decision on a complex and emotional subject without the complete story. I think also it would have been useful to hear how the people served in the various areas felt about the CYC. I think that was an oversight; we did not have a chance to explore that side of it. Most of our time was taken up by a continuous parade of high level administrators and seldom did the committee get down to "where it's at".

Over the last two months we have had little chance to look at Mr. Mendelsohn's reign and to look at the function of local projects from the top down, which is a reversal from the previous method of operation. Doubtless the comptroller was merely fulfilling his mandate, which was to freeze everything in sight. I would not suggest that there was no reason for this. Members of our party have said before that we felt there should be financial responsibility and accountability. Certainly, there have been severe restrictions placed on some of the remaining projects.

Telephone and travel costs were restricted. This does not mean much in an urban centre but in an area such as the north coast it is essential to be able to contact people by telephone or travel. The Vancouver office, serving three projects, was limited to $25 per month for office costs. They could not even run their duplicator, which could have been a good thing for some projects. However, I do not think we experienced irresponsibility in the Vancouver project. In spite of people resigning and leaving the various projects, no vacancies have been filled; therefore some projects are necessarily understaffed. Efficiency is great. Like planning, like preparation and like motherhood, everybody approves of it. But what is the good of streamlining procedures and inviting budget control if, in the process, you choke off active work at the community level? I realize it will not persist forever but in a situation like this do we not want to run the risk of being left with a streamlined top-level management team in a non-functioning series of field projects.

To close, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if this bill is passed unamended we will have a strictly conventional organization with the standard, staff line arrangement. There will be nothing to distinguish it from other Crown corporations, in spite of the CYC's unique role and the job for which it had been established. It is my opinion that the reason it was established was to respond positively to the failure of conventional organizations in other areas of our society. It seems, however, that we are creating another very conventional and inflexible organization and if such structures could not meet the needs of society four years ago, there is little possibility they can now.

I hope the minister will consider the words of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and myself and re-examine this particular clause, because we put forward our views with sincerity. Perhaps we do not have the high level of indignation that would make for an emotional speech but we have thought about it a good deal, as I am sure the minister has, and I would like him to consider it.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member sits down, will he permit a question? I have listened to him and looked at the evidence taken before the committee with regard to this whole question. Having listened to the hon. member, examined remarks made before the committee and looked at his amendment, I am not certain whether he is in favour of a majority of the council being volunteer members or appointees. I believe the minutes of the committee suggest that he wants the majority of the council to be volunteer members; yet his amendment really suggests that three council members out of seven or eight ought to be volunteers, which is somewhat less than a majority. It seems to me that the hon. member, in his amendment, takes a position slightly different from the one he adopted in committee. Perhaps he could explain this discrepancy before he sits down.

An hon. Member: That is a good question.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Crowfoot for his question. The amendment speaks for itself. I am not aware of any discrepancy in my position; nor did the hon. member bring to my attention any part of the committee minutes which suggest that I may have changed my mind.

Mr. Horner: But it appears that the hon. member has changed his mind.

Mr. Rose: I will say that the committee did not recommend a completely appointed council. It recommended that the minister should look at the structure of the council, and I think the minister did. Nowhere in the committee report is it indicated that the committee is in favour of a completely appointed council.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, nothing would please me more than to agree with the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). Unfortunately, I do not share their views and I would like to give briefly the reasons why the bill before the House was introduced in its present form.

First, the argument of the member for Halifax-East Hants has surprised me somewhat. It could be summarized as follows: the Company of Young Canadians is a very sick child; it therefore should be killed. It is an awkward solution in the treatment of a sick child. But what followed is even more astonishing as the member stated implicitely: "If we don't kill it, let's see to it that it remains alive but not well."

I confess again that this kind of reasoning is beyond me. The hon. member concludes his remarks by accusing us of over reaction, that is to say that we have reacted too quickly to the misfortunes which befell the Company of Young Canadians, misfortunes which, besides, would justify in his view that it be killed.

He then continued by disproving arguments already put forward before the parliamentary committee. I would like here to simply repeat in its most elementary form, in case the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants blurred it a little, the line of thought behind the amendments moved in connection with this legislation and which are under consideration at the moment.

We said at the committee—and I should like to repeat it this afternoon—that the volunteers, should they be appointed or elected to the Council of the Company, would be placed in a situation that would inevitably create a conflict of interests for them on two levels.

When the member for Halifax-East Hants says that at the time when the original bill setting up the Company of Young Canadians was being studied no one objected to the appointment and even the election of volunteers to the council, he speaks the truth.

There are many things, Mr. Speaker, to which no one objected at that time. The member for Halifax-East Hants himself recognized, at least implicitly, that it might have been better to object to it at the start, when the original bill was introduced in the House; this might have spared the Company of Young Canadians unpleasant adventures with which the parliamentary committee became acquainted before the Christmas recess.

As I was saying, the election or the presence of volunteers on the Council of the Company of Young Canadians creates a conflict of interests on two levels: first of all, on the personal level, because they are called upon to participate in decisions that affect them personally and determine their fate, that determine the allowances paid to them, for instance, and even determine the policy that will guide the authority that governs them, that is the executive director of the Company.

There is also a collective conflict of interests, so to speak, because, as members of the executive or the council, they are called upon to decide upon the various CYC projects, including those in which they will participate themselves.

They are called upon to reach decisions, for instance, on the allotment of funds to the various projects, those in which they are participating, as well as those to which the other volunteers devote themselves. Obviously, they have a hidden interest to promote the apportionment of greater funds to the projects on which they are working. I am not saying they will all do that but I say that we are placing them where they will be tempted to prefer their personal interest or the collective interest of their small project to the general interest of the company, to the superior interests of the organization as a whole.

Those are not myths, Mr. Speaker, those are not speculations, but facts. At the time volunteers were a part of the company's council, we witnessed stand-up fights as well as schemes whereby individual interests instead of the superior interests of the company prevailed in the end. That is why upon learning that, the parliamentary committee recommended to change the method of appointing the council of the company.

When the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants says he is not much impressed by the objection concerning the executive director, he still does not convince me, for the executive director is also placed in an impossible position if volunteers are appointed to the council. I wonder what could impress the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. In such a case, the executive director is being placed in the position of having the same people as superiors and as subordinates.

[English]

Mr. McCleave: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's argument at this time is directed to something my hon. friend said and not to what I said. I think the record ought to be put straight in this regard.

• (4:40 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I apologize and I want to correct my mistake right away. In fact, the argument put forth by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose).

In order to end the matter, let me say again that if we are to have volunteers in the council, the executive director will have the same people acting as his superiors on the one hand and as his subordinates on the other. The people defining the policy under which he operates will be the very same to whom he will have to apply it. This would create a very difficult situation.

There are, moreover, other ways of ensuring the direct participation of the young. Indeed, under clause 16(2), the volunteers can set up an advisory committee and I daresay that in western Canada and in Quebec, volunteers are already setting up grievance committees to deal on a formal basis with the management of the Company.

Though the proposed amendments suggest that there should be three or four volunteers on the Council, they will hardly make any difference. In order to reach the objective set up by the two hon. members we would need more than a symbolic number barely representative of minority. We would have to revert to the old system which, unfortunately, has proved disastrous.

Besides, the committee has already removed from the government the right to choose the president and the vice-president. This means that the young people themselves will appoint other young people to these two posts.

I now answer the objections of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. He said that I was contradicting myself by saying that I wanted, willy-nilly, the Company of Young Canadians to survive. In fact, I said so on first reading because I sincerely assumed that young people had a part to play in our society.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley West maintains that under the new legislation, young people will not be able to play this part because no volunteers will be appointed to the Council. I hope that he does not think, because the government is not going to appoint volunteers, that it will appoint old people. The government will appoint young people. In the speech I made on the motion for second reading of the bill, I said that in September last we had appointed to the Council five members less than 30 years of age on the average and that we were determined to do the same with the new legislation. Would it be the contention of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West that as soon as a young man or a young lady is appointed to the Council by the government, he or she will stop being young? That would seem to me an argument rather difficult to support.

It would have to be assumed then that when the government appoints someone as a CBC director for instance, that individual stops being a free citizen on account of his appointment to the CBC Board of Directors.

Finally, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West maintained that by implementing the proposed amendments, we would alienate the young people, we would keep them away from the Company of Young Canadians. I can alleviate his fears in that respect because something rather strange but at the same time comforting has happened—rather unexpected in any event. In fact, ever since these amendments have been made public, through the press and all the mass media, I am advised that applications to the Company of Young Canadians have come in greater number than ever and that they are even more interesting in terms of years of schooling or equivalent experience of the new applicants.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Speaker. I just wanted to express once more the underlying concept of these amendments. Like the hon. member of Fraser Valley West, I did not want to make an emotional speech.

I think that we have to correct the mistakes which we all made when the bill was introduced for the first time. In my opinion, there is nothing shameful or criminal in rectifying the mistakes which we have made, even though we are the representatives of the people.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see several members rising. I am prepared to recognize the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte), but I understand the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) would like to put a question.

Mr. Nowlan: I had not intended to make a speech at this stage. I was very interested in the minister's concise summary of the government's position on the bill. My question is this. I would like to know how the minister reconciles the position about conflict of interest and no volunteer members directly on council because, as he said, of a personal or collective conflict? I can understand some of that reasoning. How does the minister reconcile that reasoning with the whole movement of youth today, especially on the campuses of the country where you have in effect the same type of thing? Does his reasoning also apply to the direct involvement of the campus youth in trying to get representation on the senates or boards of governors of universities? Obviously, they are in a conflict of interest position.

My second question is separate and apart. Am I to understand from the minister's remarks that even though he has the discretion to appoint volunteer or ex-volunteer members to the board or council that, because of his reasoning on the conflict of interest question, while there may be young people appointed to the council there will not be any volunteer members appointed to the council?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: As for the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a great difference between an undertaking like the Company of Young Canadians, that is, a company engaged in pioneer social work among underprivileged people, and the pursuit of studies on a university campus.

If this distinction is not quite clear to the hon. member, I am sorry, because I cannot dwell on that point.

For me, this distinction is quite clear, and I must say that I am not at all opposed to student representation on university senates, in spite of the fact that the students themselves are beginning to find rather relative the influence they can exert from this minority representation.

In reply to the second part of the question of the hon. member, I wish to tell him that it is quite out of the question for the government to refuse to appoint ex-volunteers to the Council. On the contrary, we would be most happy to appoint people with experience in the Company of Young Canadians and who would put their wisdom and the fruit of their experience at the service of the Company. But for the reasons that I tried to explain and in which I firmly believe, I contend that those who are now volunteers in the Company should not be appointed to the executive Council.

[English]

Mr. Rose: I rise on a question of privilege, to be followed by a question to the minister. I had difficulty following the minister in the translation, which is my fault, not his. I believe he stated that I either said or implied that young men and women appointed rather than elected to the council would somehow cease to be young men and women. If I heard the minister correctly, I feel this is kind of a strawman argument. I do not believe I implied that at all. Perhaps we can both look at each other's speech tomorrow.

My question with respect to the conflict of interest is, how does the minister justify his position that three members, who may or may not be volunteers but elected by the volunteers, can have a great conflict of interest with perhaps 30 or 40, or hopefully more than that, projects across Canada?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Pelletier: My answer will be very simple, Mr. Speaker. It is experience that tells me that. Even in meetings of the previous council, where there was only a minority of volunteers, it was enough sometimes—and I do not think I am mistaken in stating this—to disrupt the whole meeting and to make the work of the council totally unproductive. I do not think it is a bogus argument. I regret if my interpretation of the hon. member's words went a little bit too far, but when he said that the fact the government was appointing the members of the council would, in a certain way, be a departure from the principle of participation of the young people, I thought he was suggesting that they ceased to be young people from the moment they were appointed. I say that the directors we will appoint will be young people who will be participating as such. That is what I mean.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on a few aspects of the amendment to the Company of Young Canadians Act.

Earlier, I was listening to the minister who was trying to justify some mistakes. Of course, it is difficult to correct a situation when all solutions are eliminated in advance. In fact, the government discarded one of the most logical solutions regarding the Company of Young Canadians: its abolition which should have been seriously considered. When an agency ends up in a failure, its dissolution is one of the solutions to be considered.

But since this magnificent idea came from a former prime minister and was maintained by his spiritual son, they do not want to publicly lose face. That is the real reason why they refuse to consider seriously the possibility of simply abolishing that Company.

An alternative would be to alter it completely and entrust its administration to provincial authorities.

The basic mistake has been to establish an organization of young people who were directly under provincial responsibility. This is so true that if an attempt is made to determine where more difficulties arose it is found to be in Quebec, simply because right from the start, the Company did not impress Quebecers in the least.

So, it was easy to create cells within the Company, with the unfortunate results we heard about in committee.

Mr. Speaker, that is the real problem, and every time that the solutions sought fail to go to the heart of the matter, there is no real change. Such is the case with sections 3 and 4 that are to be amended in order to change the number of directors and to provide a different procedure of their appointment. That will not change anything, because this is a federal agency, composed of young people, who have to deal with problems that are primarily the concern of provincial authorities. However, at numerous federal-provincial conferences, the provinces, Quebec in particular, expressly asked the federal government to give them the means to carry out their responsibilities. And since they lack the means to look after their needs, they are simply told to shift for themselves in the tax jungle in order to solve their problems. And then, the government introduces legislation itself and does not mind its own business.

Knowing the fantastic amounts of money spent by the Company of Young Canadians, we have a right to ask questions. This is why I say that the Company should have been completely overhauled instead of being superficially reformed, simply because such drastic changes would have made possible in the first place a better total decentralization. All the provinces should agree on that, because I feel that such an organization will never be effective in Quebec. We have now the best proof of this in what has happened.

On the other hand, there already exist youth organizations. They must rely on volunteers alone. They receive no subsidy and in spite of that, they do a tremendous job. If the money allowed to the Company of Young Canadians was paid under the form of grants to the existing agencies, which would then be able to perform the duties the CYC was entrusted with, it would be marvellous. Why create agencies there is no need for? Why should we not abolish what was a failure? There are agencies which would be able to do this work and on which we could rely entirely.

That is the reason why I wanted to point out that every time something is done that encroaches upon exclusively provincial fields of jurisdiction, conflicts arise which very often lead to unfortunate situations such as the one we witnessed.

If the government kept strictly to its own business, it would pay the provinces the compensations they need to carry out theirs. The provinces are closest to the individual and are responsible not only for his welfare and his health but more specifically for his education. And everyone knows that control of education is the apple of Quebec's eye. Therefore, an agency controlled from outside the province, out of step with the true spirit of Quebec can only lead to anarchy and the other perturbations we have witnessed.

That is why in my opinion the Company, which has demonstrated its uselessness, not to say its stupidity, should have been either abolished or thoroughly transformed in order to come, as would have been normal, under control of the relevant provincial governments. Unless this is done, expenses will continue to be incurred for an agency that has practically no effectiveness at all, and once again, Canadian taxpayers will have to foot the bill.

[English]

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a long speech, nor do I intend to recall in any detail the debate which took place when this bill was discussed earlier.

I was a member of the committee which dealt with the problems of the Company of Young Canadians, and it is no secret that I was extremely critical of the way in which the Company of Young Canadians had functioned. I still believe that most of the criticisms made of the Company of Young Canadians, and the way in which it had operated almost from the day it was set up were valid criticisms. Nevertheless, it was the government which set up this organization; it was the government which appointed the board responsible for administering it. The government was warned of what was going on, yet it ignored all the warnings and reports which it received until the City of Montreal experienced riots and disorders and until the chairman of the executive council, Mr. Saulnier, made extremely serious charges against the company and the way in which it was being operated. The government then belatedly awoke to the problems facing them, and they over-reacted, as they over-reacted again today.

Let me briefly recapitulate some of the things we learned while the committee held hearings into the problems facing the Company of Young Canadians. The Company of Young Canadians was established under a former Liberal government headed by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson. It had the unanimous support of this House. I was a member of the House at the time, and all members thought that the idea was a good one.

Company of Young Canadians Act

The government then made the proposal—and this proposal was adopted—that the Company of Young Canadians be given virtually unlimited authority to do anything. Its actions would be unchecked by the government or the board of directors of the company. It was the government that made this proposal, as it was the government that also put forward the concept of, as it was then called, participatory democracy.

The government appointed to the board of the company a group of people about whom it knew nothing. On the board almost to the end were at least two people who were very close to the government. Mr. Marc Lalonde, who was then, and still is, one of the principal advisers to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), was on the board from the beginning and almost till the end; and so was Mr. R. J. Phillips, who was then, and is now, in the Privy Council office.

Within months of the establishment of the Company of Young Canadians, reports started to come in of extravagance, of lack of any direction, of seriously thought out objectives and programs, and so on. So much was this the case that one of the maritime members of the board resigned. He wrote a letter to the Prime Minister outlining in detail what had gone wrong and why he was resigning his position on the board.

What action did the government take? It took none. We do not know whether the government received any report from Mr. Lalonde or Mr. Phillips because the inquiries that the committee was conducting were cut off. The majority Liberal members of the committee voted not to call Mr. Lalonde, and as a result we were unable to question him about what had occurred. The government should have known what was happening. Yet, it did nothing. It just let the matter drift.

During this period the Company had two or three acting directors, and all of them encountered difficulties. Again the government did nothing. It was not until Mr. Saulnier made his charges that members of the Company of Young Canadians, volunteers in Montreal and probably other cities in Quebec, were guilty of the most serious acts and crimes, such as inciting to violence, revolution and so on, that the government agreed to hold an inquiry, as a result of which changes were made. Therefore, I suggest that it is the government that is responsible for the difficulties encountered by the Company of Young Canadians, and the government is still responsible.

Having finally awakened to the fact that the Company of Young Canadians was not operating in the way it should, the government, as this government so frequently does, over-reacted. Many members pointed out the complete stupidity of having on the board, as was the case at the end, a majority of directors who had been elected by volunteers. Ten out of 15 members were elected and, speaking from memory, five or six of these ten had been elected from among the volunteers who were still working for the company. One or two were ex-volunteers. I was one of the members who realized—as in fact all members of the committee realized—that this was an impossible situation and that there was a conflict of interest.

What was the government's answer to this situation? As usual, it over-reacted. Instead of having the majority of the members of the board elected either by volunteers or from among the volunteers, the government said there would be no volunteers on the board. Anyone who reads the record of the committee proceedings will appreciate that I was a very stern critic of what I thought were the sins of omission and commission of the company and its operations, but surely in the year 1970 there is some room on the board for representation of people who are working for the company.

This is why, despite my reservations about the way the company operated in the past, I see no difficulty in supporting and voting for the amendments which will be proposed. Let there be some volunteers on the board. It would be stupid to let volunteers constitute the majority on the board, but there should be some volunteers on the board so that the Company of Young Canadians and the government know what the volunteers are thinking and what they want.

If the minister is worried about a conflict of interest here, then there is a relatively simple provision that can be written into the bill, namely that no volunteer who is a member of the board should have the right to vote on any project in which he is involved. In other words, he should not vote where a conflict of interest might arise. It seems to me that that would be a very simple answer. The minister is not prepared to do this, and it does not surprise me. If there is one thing that characterizes this government, it is the government's attitude that the people of Canada should do what they say, not what the people think.

The minister has spoken today against the idea of having volunteers on the board. Some months ago he made a speech to the Association of Canadian Universities. I am sorry that I have been unable to find a copy or a summary of his speech, which did appear in the newspapers, as I wanted to put it on the record. It was an interesting speech in light of the attitude of the minister today. It was one of the toughest, sternest criticisms of our universities and the way they are administered that I have read in recent years. Although I cannot quote it word for word, I am sure I can fairly summarize what the minister said.

What did the minister say in his lecture—which is what it was—to the Association of Canadian Universities? He lectured the administrators of our universities very sternly because they had not faced up to their responsibilities in the 1960's and 1970's. They had not realized that times had changed. They had not realized that students at university could no longer be treated as children. They had not realized that students at university could no longer be given orders which must be followed. The minister told the administrators of our universities in no uncertain terms that in these days students at university had to be considered as people. They had to be consulted and given some authority. They should be given representation on the board of governors of a university. They should be given representation on the senates of universities, and I suppose I should also include representation on the faculty committees of universities. That was essentially what the minister said.

I am old-fashioned about our universities. I think the whole idea of student power went much too far. The minister was a great deal more radical in his speech to the Association of Canadian Universities than I have ever been. The minister was not responsible for Canadian universities and so he was prepared to be radical and revolutionary and to lecture the administrators of Canadian universities about their sins, about being stodgy and staid and not accepting the responsibilities of the 1970's.

What do we find today when we have an agency which is the responsibility of the minister? He has forgotten all those fine phrases which he uttered before the Association of Canadian Universities. He said some authority and responsibility should be given to the students at Canadian universities. Now, we have an agency for which the minister is responsible and for which the minister will have to account to the public. He will have to account to Mr. Saulnier who may have some influence on votes in Montreal. That being the case, all the ideals and principles about participatory democracy and the rights of young people to have a say in decisions concerning their own affairs fly out the window. What we get from the minister is the same old view that the volunteers are employees, that they should know their place, that they should be under the control of the director, the administrator, the government, and the minister, and that there is no room for representatives of the volunteers on the council of the Company of Young Canadians.

I say that the views which the minister expressed today are diametrically opposed, in principle as well as in execution, to the views he expressed in his speech to the Association of Canadian Universities. That the minister is not consistent does not surprise me at all because he and this government, so far as I am concerned, have demonstrated over and over again that what they want this Parliament to do and what they want everyone to do is exactly what they say. So I do not expect the minister—who has not listened to my speech, but that does not surprise me either—to pay attention to the speeches made on this side of the House on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) or the amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). I think that both are good amendments and warrant the support of the House.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to say a few words on this bill because I feel a real obligation to try at least once more to see whether we could not get the minister to see what he is doing to our young people who have shown their concern and who have demonstrated their abilities through the Company of Young Canadians. The activities of the company all across the country have not been of equal calibre. Admittedly the execution of some of the projects was poor, but on the other hand, in British Columbia for instance—and here I am speaking about something that I know—the young people have used their initiative and have made a real impact on the communities in which they have been doing social pioneering work.

My objection to this bill is that it is trying to keep back the social thinking and development of the young people. Young people today are not going to be kept back. They want the right to express themselves and they want the right to participate in the decisions that affect their lives. When they are stultified, they use less desirable ways of expressing themselves in both words and actions. In my opinion, it is essential that we adopt these amendments which aim at having at least part of the council elected by volunteer members. If this is not allowed, the young people will not be able to demonstrate their initiative, proof of which we have already had in our province.

I do not need to go into detail about the projects that have been undertaken there except to say that the members of the CYC have shown a great capacity for resourcefulness in the low rent housing projects, which has surprised the Vancouver people. They have gone in when they were requested and they have assisted people in the housing projects to take control of their own lives in a way which nobody believed possible. One of the most successful projects that they have undertaken has been work among people who have come out of penitentiaries, people who have been involved with drugs and other young criminals. The fact that the CYC volunteers have given their assistance and leadership has helped the people in the community to regain their self-respect, to get back on the track and to become self-supporting again. The same thing has happened where they have worked among the Indians on the north coast.

If the Company of Young Canadians is made into a housebroken, tame organ of this government, we will lose these young people. They will not be interested in doing everything that they are told to do by Ottawa. If you know anything at all about provinces on both our coasts, you also know that the people there do not want things to be run for them and every detail of their lives worked out here in Ottawa. For one reason it takes far too long for directives to get out there, and for another the people in Ottawa do not see things the way people do in different parts of the country.

We are living at a time when everybody tells the young people that what they must learn to do is to take part in the decisions affecting their lives. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was elected partly on his personality and partly on the slogan "participatory democracy". There is no section of the community that is more determined than the young people are to participate in the decisions affecting their lives. If one tries to dam them up behind the old walls and tries to tell them to do exactly what they are told to do, they will stop being people of initiative and resourcefulness. They will become tame, youthful Uncle Toms; broken in spirit and following along just to keep their jobs. They will be tame cats instead of tomcats. It should be the opposite.

As my colleague said a little earlier, what the government has done is to panic. They made a mistake in not giving proper direction in the first place. The CYC did not receive guidelines or directions in any shape or form. As a result, things went wild and got out of control because certain elements in the company tried to achieve goals which the company was never intended to achieve. In my part of the country, the CYC people were able to hang on to things and keep on with constructive projects, probably because we do not have as big a centre as either Toronto or Montreal.

If you want to keep the faith of the young people and to make the best of their abilities to do social pioneering work where it is most necessary, you have to go along with amendments of the kind we are proposing. These amendments are very necessary. I am referring to the amendment of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) and of my colleague, the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose). I know that the minister is one of these people who takes pride in making up his mind very early in his life and then saying "no matter what happens in the way of change, here I stand and I will not look at the matter again for fear I might be tempted to change my mind". I wish that the minister did not do that because we are living in a very fast-moving age. I, myself, grew up surrounded by many people who thought it was wonderful to hang on to old ideas because their father, their grandfather and their great-grandfather did the same. But nowadays, people know that this is not the way to do things.

I think the minister would be very capable of taking another look at this if only he could get away from the feeling that he has made up his mind and cannot change it. They say that women's minds are purer than men's because they change them more often. I would not mind the minister developing that quality a little in respect of this bill. I should like him to change the bill so that it is more sensible, whether purer or not. If he does not do this he will lose the fire, energy and drive of the young people in this country who would otherwise take part in the Company of Young Canadians. For this reason, I support both the amendments before us which recommend that the volunteer members be allowed to elect three of the members of council if the council does not consist of more than eight members or four if it consists of nine members.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion before the House is motion No. 1 in name of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The question now is on motion No. 2 in the name of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose).

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West) moved:

That Bill C-176, An Act to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, be amended by deleting in section 4(1) in clause 1, all the words in lines 17 and 18 and substituting the following words:

"of whom three shall be elected by volunteer-members if the Council consists of seven or eight, but of whom four shall be elected by volunteer-members if the Council consists of nine members, the remainder to be appointed by the Governor in Council for such terms not exceeding".

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the Motion?

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 11 of Standing Order 75 the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West) moved:

That Bill C-176, to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, be amended by deleting clause 5 therefrom.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Prior to hearing debate on this motion I might clarify an area about which there has been some confusion. The clause 5 referred to has reference to clause 5 of the original bill. I understand hon. members have before them the bill as reported from the committee. In that case it refers to clause 4 of the reported bill. I hope with that clarification we can proceed.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I will try not to speak at great length on this particular amendment—not more than 35 minutes or so—because my colleagues to the right and across the room are very anxious to have the vote on this particular bill before six o'clock.

In moving this amendment I should like to say that in proposing the deletion of clause 5 in the original bill, C-176, and now I believe clause 4, I am in essence attempting to continue the concept of the Company being permitted to work in countries other than Canada provided a policy decision is made at some future time to have the Company do this. As every member knows the Company, at least up until this point, has not seen fit to work abroad. By restoring this clause to its form in the original legislation, we would be permitting the Company of Young Canadians to move into the overseas field at some future date. So, really what I am suggesting is not particularly startling. I believe one of the most attractive aspects of the original Company of Young Canadians legislation was the possibility of members of the Company serving their country, not only at home but abroad, as volunteers working in some of the have-not nations of the world.

Certainly, one needs little imagination to realize that two-thirds of the world's people are in a shocking state of development. Certain developed countries do very little about this and the gap grows wider as the years go by. I believe some hon. members have read Robert Theobald's book, "The Rich and the Poor" in which this problem has been examined in great detail. People are becoming hungrier in the world. Illiteracy is growing. People are living longer because we have lowered the death rate. People are becoming more numerous because we have not lessened the birth rate, resulting in more and more marginal land being farmed and lower yields. It does not take any great genius to understand that with the use of that window on the world, television, becoming more widespread, hungry people will not forever stand looking in that window at we fat and sassy North Americans with our sleek autos and healthy children while starvation, disease and ignorance form so much a part of their own lives. They will want a piece of the action too, and in my opinion they will take it by force if there is no other alternative.

I should like to read from a speech by Mr. Romeo Maione given recently in Vancouver. This speech was prompted by the Pearson report entitled "Partners in Development". In this speech he states:

> It is becoming clear with each passing day that the challenge that faces the rich countries is to use their affluency to win the war against poverty. Yet when we face the immensity of this war, there is a tendency towards despair and away from life. The magnitude of the problem tends to develop a paralysis of the will.

He goes on to say:

> Yet hope can only grow in the measure that we face facts. Let me list a few facts. Population in the world will double in the next twenty to twenty-five years. Urban city population in many regions of Latin America will double in the next fifteen to twenty years. Rural stagnation stimulates a flow of migrants from the land and urban death rates are often lower than those in the countryside while fertility remains high. If present trends continue, the largest city in India would have over 35 million inhabitants by the year 2000. Even if fertility should be considerably reduced in coming decades, the less developed world will double before the end of this century.
> Of one hundred children entering primary school in developing countries, no more than thirty finish. Indeed in most African and Latin American countries, more than 50 per cent of primary school pupils do not return to school after the second grade.
> One could go on increasing the shadows to obliterate the sun and so return to our affluent caves armed in quiet desperation.

[Mr. Rose.]

The next paragraph is entitled "Hope Unlimited":

> This fate is not shared by the authors of the Pearson Report. They outline a whole series of actions that will move the rich countries into the heart of the war against poverty. These lines of action are part of an over-all war based on the valid experience of the 60's. Sketched in and through these lines of action are the abundant hopes of the poor countries. I was asked once "how can you find hope in all that misery?" We must learn to look at poverty through the eyes of the poor. You must feel the spirit of hope that overwhelms the illiterate peasant as he moves away from the fatalism of his rural village.
>
> When his son even though, he leaves after the second grade, comes home and writes the family name on paper for the first time, the parents are the "victims of hope"—a whole new world develops before them. The rich countries for their own proper development must not only make contact with this hope but above all must develop a spirit of solidarity and communion to find a "raison d'être" for our affluency.

It is in this kind of setting that I feel the CYC could perform a useful role abroad. Admittedly, there are many serious problems in Canada. We have poverty here. We have examples of poor education. We have examples of a highly intense birthrate, and at the same time a dwindling death rate. Admittedly some of the past CYC volunteers would have made poor ambassadors for Canada to send abroad. This part of it though has been discussed in great detail previously. Admittedly too, at least one confidential report received by the company on probable activities abroad was written in inflammatory language, and suggested all kinds of interesting and almost frightening things. But I remind the House, those of us who are familiar with that report, especially the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault), realize that this document was for consideration only and never was the policy of the CYC, nor of the government of Canada as far as I have been able to learn.

But, sir, we Canadians have a real opportunity to do something useful in this area. Many developing countries speak either the French or the English language, and I think Canada finds itself in a unique position to provide a great deal more of this aid. We have trained people eager to help. Finally, we are not yet spending nearly enough to make any real dent in the problem of poverty in the developing countries.

In today's Globe and Mail there is a letter dealing with how we could order our priorities and do much in the foreign aid field. This letter is by Escott Reid, former principal of Glendon College, and in it he says:

> Canada can do relatively little to assist in preventing war by maintaining armed forces. That game has become too expensive. If Canada were to double its present defence expenditures of 1.8 billion Canadian dollars a year, this would increase the total expenditures of the NATO countries by one and a half per cent. But if Canada were to increase its net expenditures on foreign aid to poor countries by 1.8 billion Canadian dollars a year, this would increase the total net expenditures of the wealthy white countries on foreign aid to poor countries by 33 per cent.
> Such an increase could not, of course, take place in one move. It might be reasonable to assume that if Canada were to decide to increase its foreign aid by this order of magnitude, say to 2 per cent of its GNP, the increase would be spread over six years.
> My hope is that Canada will decide so to increase its foreign aid. The annual rate of increase might be such that if our GNP should go up by an average of 7 per cent a year ... we would be in the fiscal year 1975-76 be spending about $2.4 billion (up from the present $300 million) on foreign aid. If our expenditures on defence were held at $1.8 billion a year the total expenditures of Canada on defence and foreign aid in the year 1975-76 would be $4.2 billion—about 3½ per cent of the GNP.
> Three and one half per cent of the GNP for defence and foreign aid is less than what Australia, Britain, France, Germany, the Netherlands, or Norway spent on defence and foreign aid in 1967 and all these countries have lower per capita GNPs than Canada.

This puts some perspective into our position, and shows how we in Canada, through perhaps the CYC volunteers and other techniques, could increase our aid, our responsibility to these developing countries. I would hope the minister would see fit to continue the work-abroad principle that exists within the original CYC bill. I believe he can do so without being any more disloyal to the broadcasting committee report than he was when calling for an appointed council, despite the fact that this was not part of the committees recommendations.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): One word only, Mr. Speaker, to say that we cannot accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member. I could give several reasons to justify this refusal, but one will be more than enough.

We have overseas an organization of young people precisely to try and meet these very real needs of which the hon. member has spoken movingly and which provides young Canadians with the opportunity to work in under-developed countries.

This is a well known agency called Canadian University Service Overseas and it performs excellent work. We do not see why we should have overlapping by steering in that direction the activities of the Company of Young Canadians. Work sharing is an excellent principle for social action as well as for industry.

• (5:40 p.m.)

This is why we object to the amendment. I could put forward other objections, but this one seems quite sufficient to me. I like the hon. member's aims, but it seems to me that it is possible to attain them more effectively through an institution which has already an experience of several years abroad, which has done Canada proud and whose effectiveness is acknowledged. Therefore it would not be well advised to have in the same field two separate and overlapping institutions.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I too will be very brief, even more brief than the minister. I am happy to find myself on this occasion agreeing completely with what the minister said.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nowlan: I know the minister has many other reasons he could enunciate and define, and there are many other reasons I could give why we could not support this amendment. Many of the objectives of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) are idealistic, and he hopes to resolve the problems of the developing countries by some agency, any agency, and in this case the Company of Young Canadians. But it comes down to this, Mr. Speaker, if I may be short and to the point. In view of the experience we have had with the Company of Young Canadians, and in view of Mr. Pearson's original concept of the Company of Young Canadians, although even in the gestation period he decided that we should try the Company at home first before we exported it, I do not think it should engage in activities abroad.

I appreciate that this legislation is only a chapter in the history of the Company of Young Canadians, and that the question of the company will back before this Parliament or certainly it will appear before another Parliament. There have been problems with the Company of Young Canadians, and I believe we should make sure that it works at home before we start to export it abroad. In view of the experience with the Company's handling of some of our problems at home, I believe that the hon. member's objectives of seeking to resolve problems such as poverty and disease abroad through the activities of the Company would not be met. In fact, there would be an adverse result. Until we get the Company to fulfil its objectives properly at home, we should not export it abroad. For that reason, the members of this party cannot support the amendment.

We believe this debate should come to a close so that the government may go on to discharge its responsibility of trying to work with this new agency, which is so far from the original concept of the Company that it is an entirely different vehicle. We have expressed our opinion on that, and we do not think we should take any more time to have the opinions of members canvassed upon it. Let the government and the Company get on with their work. Perhaps the Company will fulfil the expectations of the minister by contributing to the solution of problems at the community level in the way that Mr. Pearson intended. But, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Pearson certainly did not want or envisage the creature that we are creating today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Call in the members.

And the members having been called in:

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House will now proceed to the deferred division on motion No. 1 in relation to Bill C-176, an act to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) moved:

That Bill C-176, an Act to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, be amended by adding in section 4(1) in clause 1, the words "of whom three shall be elected by volunteer-members and the remainder" after the word "members" in line 16 and deleting the word "who" in line 17.

• (6:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State) moved that Bill C-176, to amend the Company of Young Canadians Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Pelletier moved that Bill C-176 be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock when the House will consider a motion to be moved by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) pursuant to Standing Order 26.

It being 14 minutes after six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

POST OFFICE

MONTREAL POSTAL DISPUTE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Pursuant to Standing Order 26, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), seconded by the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade), moves:

That this House do now adjourn.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I will start off by saying how sorry we are that members of the press gallery, interpreters and all personnel who normally should have a free evening tonight must be here in the House so that we may deal with a matter of major importance.

Tonight's debate could certainly have been avoided if the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) had performed his duties more adequately. As the post office conflict is constantly worsening and the Postmaster General arrogantly denies the House information as to the present situation in Montreal, we had no alternative but to demand this debate.

I know the Postmaster General would have preferred that there be no debate. We would have preferred to get other information which would have enabled us to understand that within the Post Office Department there was one man whose capabilities were equal to his responsibilities. Unfortunately, the recent events have shown in an undeniable way that we, members of Parliament, who speak on behalf of the people, have not been able to get from the minister any information of such a nature that would allow us to inform the public and which would enable us to make suggestions in order to settle this dispute.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that facing us there is a shadow government, because as soon as an important issue is before the House, the ministers disappear in a mysterious fashion.

Montreal Postal Strike

Recently, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and these last few weeks, the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) were not to be found here when matters under their jurisdiction come before the House.

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, the minister is in Montreal to try to solve the problems.

Mr. Valade: We should have preferred, Mr. Speaker, that—

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, it is in Montreal that he can solve problems, not by staying here to answer the often stupid questions put by some members.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to answer back the hon. for Beauharnois (Mr. Laniel) who has just made a stupid remark but I am not here to waste my time taking up such stupid and foolish comments.

The Postmaster General has been beating about the bush for 15 days while he is deep in an explosive situation. He has often refused to give explanations to the House and to supply information. Sometimes the minister was in the building but was not present in the House of Commons. He thus avoided to answer for his administration.

Once again Canada is going through a major crisis in an essential sector of our economy, namely the postal service. For the second time, in so many years, and under the direction of the same minister, the postal service is about to become a national issue, while the minister looks on unperturbed, and even secretly pleased.

Furthermore, as the minister has obstinately—not to say stupidly—refused to reply to hon. members' questions, during the oral question period, in order to inform the House about the conflict, he behaved in an irresponsible manner. In view of his duties, he should act differently. Such an attitude shows that the Postmaster General has lost all sense of the participatory democracy which was championed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Liberal party at the last federal election. Most of all, the minister has shown that he is incapable of coming to terms with the employees of his department.

It is obvious, as time goes by, that the taxpayers and the postal workers have lost the confidence they had shown in the minister. It is also becoming more and more obvious that the minister has no other alternative, in the present situation, but to resign.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, the government members who usually keep very silent when it comes to—

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Saint-Henri): You will find it is the other way around in due time.

Mr. Valade: Has the hon. member some remarks to make? If he wants to take part in the debate, I wish to remind the hon. member for LaSalle or Saint-Henri that he has every opportunity to do so, because it is a very important matter. Being a member for Montreal area riding, which is particularly affected by the postal strike going on at the moment, he should have been the first to ask his government—

Mr. Lessard: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for LaSalle on a point of order.

Mr. Valade: —to take appropriate steps to settle this dispute.

Mr. H.-Pit Lessard (LaSalle): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. member for Sainte-Marie (Mr. Valade) to indicate by the name of his constituency the hon. member who made a remark. The hon. member to whom he was referring is not the hon. member for LaSalle. I would like him to make the correction.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, it does not matter very much. I must say that the hon. member who rose is not the one I meant; I had in mind an hon. member who has been sitting here for over 12 years, yet nobody seems to know which constituency he represents, because of his stolid silence, his carelessness and the incapacity he has demonstrated since he came to the house.

Mr. Speaker, we are here to discuss an important problem and try to find a solution. If the Postmaster General would condescend to call to order that bunch of unruly members, I believe that the debate would prove more constructive than the one in which some are trying to involve me.

[Mr. Valade.]

We are now faced with a crucial problem, otherwise this debate would not be taking place this evening. This is a serious problem to the extent that if in the near future, the entire postal system is disrupted on account of the slowdown or the work-to-rule now carried on in Montreal, we might be confronted with a national dispute.

Basically, it is not a simple problem, but the minister does not seem to understand anything. It is a conflict in which 450 union members are threatened to lose their job in a couple of months, but this does not seem to concern the Liberal members from Montreal.

In fact, the employees are only asking that the government take measures to ensure that the tenderers or sub-contractors, whatever they are called, recognize the only bargaining unit which represents them. Since only one contractor provided the postal service in Montreal and the area until now, the minister, in his doubtful wisdom, decided to distribute the postal service among five or six separate contracts.

The employees are threatened because their bargaining unit will not be recognized by the contractors. If this happens, they will no longer have any job security.

Those people are also threatened with losing their seniority. Some employees have held their jobs for over 20 years but with a single stroke of the pen the minister recently threatened their security.

Have we reached the point in this society the Prime Minister calls just, where people are no longer entitled to survival? All those employees ask is for the Postmaster General to assure them that they will not be laid off in a month.

Mr. Speaker, I fail to see why the minister did not take a clearer stand in that conflict. He could have benefitted from past experience. We remember the strike that broke out when the mail was delivered by Rod Service Ltd, which also knew of the experience of the former contractor, a certain Sénécal whose contract was transferred merely by verbal agreement between the minister and the G. Lapalme Inc. to a new contractor who was forced to respect those contracts, that bargaining unit.

Thanks to that bargaining unit, for which they paid dearly through four years of work and efforts, the employees managed to obtain decent salaries, normal fringe benefits and finally, security of employment, as long as they could work.

Mr. Speaker, the minister has done nothing. He merely said: I am not an employer; I cannot intervene in the conflict since, as minister, it does not behove me to deal with the employees. To my mind, the minister is merely bringing out the hypocrisy inherent in this supposedly just society.

Mr. Speaker, the minister could intervene and he still can do it if he wants, since in the contracts he grants, he himself determines the working conditions such as the minimum wages paid to the people working for the new contractors. And, when the minister is forced to protect the employees and union members by setting up a bargaining unit, he refuses to commit himself and he tries, by devious means, to beg off and to shun his responsibilities.

If the minister needs additional arguments we might be able to oblige him. When he says that he cannot provide a bargaining unit for many employers, I think that he could refer to the Canadian Labour Code. The minister does not know it because he has never been close to the workers but has always represented higher interests. I am not blaming him for it, it is his privilege. But in the House it is his responsiblity, as a minister, to deal with workers and union members. The minister should know about the mechanisms capable of preventing such conflicts.

The minister could resort to the Canadian Labour Code, which permits but one bargaining unit among a group of employers. Besides, this is done in the Montreal area, in the province of Quebec. In fact, there are bargaining units on building sites and the members of all the trade associations have to go from one place to another and belong to a single bargaining unit. And those units have to deal with numerous contractors.

Mr. Speaker, the minister is too ready to find an excuse for his inaction. He could intervene but he refuses to do so and that is why the union members accuse him of wanting to destroy the bargaining unit. I do not accuse him myself, but I wonder whether his refusal to reply is not an indication of the truthfulness of their allegation.

It is up to the minister to state clearly his position in this regard. Why does he refuse to relieve the workers from their anxiety as to their future employment? They want to know if they will be unemployed tomorrow and if, like thousands of others, they will have to swell the already great number of unemployed in Canada, especially in Montreal and in the other areas of Quebec.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, if the Postmaster General was really serious and sincere, he would have asked immediately his colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to act as a mediator in this conflict. Apparently, in view of the questions that we put to him recently, he would be ready to do it. The member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) asked recently the following question in the House: Is the minister ready to offer his services as a negotiator in this conflict? The minister replied then that he was ready to do so. Then, as a supplementary question I asked the minister if his services had been required. The Minister of Labour did not answer because we know as well as the ministers that the Postmaster General has not yet asked his colleague the Minister of Labour to intervene.

Why this silence, this indifference and this arrogance towards the working class? The workers are only asking for one thing: justice, the right to work and security of employment.

There are mechanisms which could be used. When I look at what is going on here, I wonder what is being done by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand)—and I regret that he is not in his seat—and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), two men who, in days gone by, in the labour world, used to write—before they were elected to the house—that they were the great defenders of the working class, of the downtrodden, of the proletariat and of what you will. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, a former president of the C.N.T.U., should make a statement about this conflict and demand that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) come and solve it because he knows the mechanisms of negotiation well. He could certainly be a good adviser to the Postmaster General. In fact, those men who, in the past, achieved a reputation as great defenders of the workers are mute as fish. They do not say much.

We are confronted here with a serious conflict requiring immediate measures. We want and have to know what is the position of the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications and what he suggests to settle this dispute.

The minister has left us wondering whether the strike was illegal or not. It may be. He never gave us any information in this respect.

If the minister is aware of what he is saying, he will come and prove it to us but until then, may I tell him that under the contract binding the employees, 20 of them can stay away on union business without infringing their labour contract.

Mr. Speaker, we all deplore the vandalistic acts and the breaches of property which may have happened during this troubled period. Sometimes, we do understand the workers; we do not excuse them nor do we encourage them; we simply ask them to keep a cool head in spite of the minister's indifference. Still, Mr. Speaker, this conflict is a cause of friction, of anxiety and concern for those who only ask to make a decent living. The Postmaster General denies them this right, this inalienable right, the right to work which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) even wanted to entrench in the preamble of a new constitution.

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, since my time is running out. Before resuming my seat, however, I want to be clear and practical. To get down to brass tacks, because we have to, I believe we still have a choice of six solutions.

First of all, the government could assume temporarily the responsibility for distributing the mail.

Secondly, the government could review the contracts now being negotiated so that the future employers will recognize the bargaining unit.

Thirdly, it could assure present workers that they will not lose their job at the end of March.

Fourthly, it could avoid unnecessary threats and provocations in official statements.

Fifthly, the minister could show a greater sense of justice and defend the right to work for everybody, as proclaimed by the Prime Minister when he talks about the establishment of a just society.

Sixthly, the minister should ask immediately his colleague, the Minister of Labour, to intervene in this conflict. In my opinion, the best solution is that the Postmaster General should simply resign, to every body's satisfaction.

[English]

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief. I shall begin my comments with a couple of observations about the factual situation before I become involved in some areas of controversy. As I see it, the following are the facts.

There are now 459 drivers in the city of Montreal, employees of G. Lapalme Inc. and members of the CNTU, who are about to lose their jobs. In some cases these men have worked for up to 20 years in this employment. But as of March 31 they will be on the street.

How did this come about? It happened that the postal department decided for some reason, perhaps a good one, to split the region of Montreal into five new sectors in terms of the particular service these drivers were performing. As a result, instead of there being one contract for the work being done, tenders were sent out for five. It so happened that the firm for which these men worked did not submit a tender. The result, of course, is that there is no way these men can keep their jobs and 459 men, plus their wives and children, will suffer. I believe this fact should be kept very closely in mind.

The second fact is that the destruction of a trade union local is taking place. When we consider what the trade union movement has meant to the workers in this country and what it will mean to the future on our workers, we appreciate the significance of this fact. Perhaps the number is small in respect of the workers directly involved: it is only one trade union local; it is not a national trade union that is being squashed. However, in terms of the potential national consequences, I believe the significance of these facts transcends in importance the attitude of this government toward the working people.

It seems to me there are some very important questions which need to be answered by the minister. Why did not the postal authorities, for example, ensure that the jobs of these workers—these people who have worked for up to 20 years and who have been workers in good standing—would be preserved even if a particular employer changed? Job preservation could have been made a condition of the calling of tenders; some effort could have been made to ensure it. But no report I have read has suggested, nor has any person to whom I have spoken about this matter, that any effort was made by the postal authorities to have these workers transferred to other firms if other firms were to end up doing the job.

Similarly, as was suggested by the hon. member who preceded me, why was an effort not made to ensure that the CNTU would still be recognized as the bargaining agent for these workers? This again, as has been indicated, could have been done by making the CNTU, or one union local if you like, the bargaining agent for a number of firms. No precedent would have been set by this kind of action.

If it had been concerned about this question, the Post Office Department could have preserved the jobs of the workers involved for their well-being and that of their families. It could also have preserved an institution which is very important to these workers—the trade union local with which they had been associated. It seems to me that the opposite kinds of considerations have taken place, and it is hard to escape the conclusion that for whatever reason a deliberate attempt has been made to smash a trade union local. I think the minister has to answer for this action.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Quite beyond the particular question, it seems to me that this situation does suggest something about the government's attitude toward workers. How do they feel about the working people in this country, particularly about the people they employ themselves? A short while ago I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in this House whether he was considering taking action in terms of law which would make it mandatory for an employer to give substantial notice to an employee before releasing him from his work.

As is frequently the case, the Prime Minister said this was a provincial matter. For once the Prime Minister is absolutely right. Most areas of labour legislation are within provincial domain. However, there is one very important area which is not within the provincial domain; that is the area of federal employees. It seems to me the Prime Minister could have indicated at that time—as could the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) and other ministers of the Crown—in the administration of the government and its departments a humane and progressive attitude toward the working people of this country. The government has the constitutional authority to do that.

The federal government is in a position to be a pacesetter in terms of labour legislation and attitudes towards labour in this country. Instead, what do we get? There are some exceptions, but the general pattern of this government—and I must say it seems to be the general pattern of this minister—is to put all the emphasis on technocratic market efficiency at the expense, very often, of working people in this country.

Again with particular reference to this minister, he is a man whose writings some time ago I admired because they suggested that at least here was one cabinet minister who knew something about modern social theory, who knew something about the non-technocratic aspects of existence and who seemed, as my colleague suggests, to talk a good fight—at least prior to the leadership convention of the Liberal Party. Had I been a delegate at that convention I suspect I would have voted for the minister. However, I must say that his performance in office, to understate the case by about 100 per cent, has not entirely measured up to my expectations because he, of all ministers, has seemed to revel in a complete preoccupation with market efficiency. I suspect that somewhere at the heart of this dispute we will find this was the big question.

We will get this argument from the minister: We had to change our pocedures in Montreal. We had to change the employer that was doing the trucking because this would have resulted in a more efficient postal service. But I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that every serious, empirical study done in the United States and in Western Europe in the last ten years suggests that this kind of approach reaches the kind of conclusion we have here. It does not reach the conclusion that we have a more efficient enterprise, more productive and more contented workers. In fact we get just the opposite—discontent, inefficiency and wildcat strikes.

Every study in fact indicates—there have been a number in the past few years—that where working people are given serious consideration, where they are taken into the power structure in running enterprises, we get two very important by-products. We get greater, not less, efficiency by taking the worker more seriously. By treating him more as a human being we increase productivity. We also do this by giving him more power. All the evidence points to this fact.

The second and more important result so far as I am concerned is that you get happier workers, more contented human beings. I suggest to the minister that if he is really interested in efficiency he will begin to take the worker more seriously as a human being. Quite beyond that, I would like him to suggest to his colleagues in the cabinet, and particularly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), that the federal government begin to make basic changes in its management attitudes and in legislation as it affects federal employees. There is no better place to start this kind of activity than in the postal service of this country, and no better time to adopt a change in attitude than during this current crisis in Montreal.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, again we are faced with a Post Office problem. It is a pity, in a world where communications are increasingly important, that the department concerned is continually having this problem which, in fact, has never been thoroughly dealt with.

The department's policy is greatly to blame for the situation. All the solutions brought forward by the present Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) have been superficial and short-term ones. The department is incapable of preparing a long-term policy. There is no dialogue, no regular contact with employees, no true spirit of conciliation and consultation. The minister's attitudes are always those of a dictator, designed to enforce his decisions. Such an attitude is ridiculous, when we remember the minister's assertion that increased postal rates would bring about an improved postal service. There is the record of this administration. It costs us more to get less service.

The minister pleads his case by saying that the conflict is illegal. Having said that, he stays put, he does not do anything, he does not try to meet—except at the very last minute—the union leaders.

Therefore, it is not surprising to find that the whole thing is a failure and that the dispute may reach the national level.

In the report issued by the firm of Kates, Peat and Marwich, the judgments were harsh. The minister remembers that. Indeed, as far as the public needs are concerned, as well as postal rates, manpower management, labour relations, working conditions, equipment, executive training, the report of this firm was particularly severe.

Unfortunately, this department has always developed a short-term policy. The Postmaster General, believe it or not, is the eighth minister in office since 1962. Thus, it is not surprising to note that, from one minister to the next, the policy is always a superficial and short-term one.

The least that we can ask from the Postmaster General is to prove that the recent rate increases are justified, due to the present situation. People are tired to bear the cost of strikes, even though they have no choice.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

When the communication phenomenon as a whole is affected, the situation goes much beyond the innocuous economic and administrative purpose.

We know that the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications has always been known for his letters. As this is precisely the question under discussion tonight I should like to refer you to the official report of the House for February 17, 1970. It contains a famous letter which will make him go down in history for his spirit of conciliation and dialogue. In fact, the minister in this letter describes his approach, that is that he has none.

This letter is dated February 17, 1970 and is addressed to Mr. Raymond Parent, Secretary-General of the Confederation of National Trade Unions. It reads as follows, and I quote:

> Dear Mr. Parent:
> Since the mail transportation situation in Montreal has become intolerable, I wish to state clearly the position of the Post Office Department and the Government.

Mr. Speaker, when the minister wrote those words, the dispute had already lasted for over 16 days, but that is not important. The minister finally made up his mind to speak, and you will note the conciliatory tone he uses, his ability in collective bargaining with regard to labour problems.

I quote further:

> The resulting disruption, violence and intimidation have hampered enormously the competitive capacity of industry and commerce in Montreal.

Later on we find the following, and I quote:

> I will not list the incidents of violence, sabotage, and destruction of government property which have occurred during the last two weeks. You are as aware of them as I am. I will simply say that the mail is not being delivered.

Mr. Speaker, it will thus have taken 16 days for the minister to discover that the mail is not delivered, that violence occurs, and so on.

If you are looking for some indication of the employer's offer in the letter, you will not find any. Supposing that the employer, as such, recognizes that it is not the responsibility of the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications to settle the dispute, but of the contractor, one could wonder about the position taken by the Post Office and Communications Departments concerning the conflict.

The minister concluded his letter by stating three solutions, but nothing further was done. His first solution was as follows and I quote:

> How can we assure the best service for the people of Montreal between now and March 31?

This first basic question asked by the minister in his letter is once again a short-term policy. He finds it essential to know how the mail will be delivered until March 31. He is not worried about giving an efficient postal service, but about what will happen between now and March 31.

However, the employees wish to know what will happen not only between now and March 31, but also after that date.

Here is the second question of the minister:

> Secondly, how can we ensure the continued employment of the greatest number of present employees, with priority being given to the 162 men with more than five years service; thirdly, what are the best arrangements that can be made with Manpower to admit the remainder to paid retraining programs.

I eliminate the third one because the list of those who would like to benefit from the retraining programs is already very long. Let us examine the second question.

When I first read it, it seemed to have some merit. The means of ensuring job security at least to the 162 employees who had five years experience or more appeared to be worth considering. So I dug up the files and discovered something which I should like to bring to the minister's attention—a CNTU press release dated February 5, 1969. Obviously, the release was given to the newspapers and the minister and all members must have received a copy. I think it would be worthwhile to read it tonight, during this emergency debate. When I read it, I realized that I was right when I claimed that it was a short-term policy and that the second proposition of the government was unacceptable. The press release deals with the conflict with Rod Service Ltd. and reads as follows:

> After that, the Post Office Department informed the union leaders that it would provide these services on its own, but it also called for tenders from three contractors, including Rod Service Ltd., in order to let out new contracts for these services.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if we make a comparison, we find this is what is happening now in the dispute relating to Lapalme Inc.

The communique continues:

> One thing is certain: the net result of all these operations is that 111 dismissals have been announced yesterday by the company to the union, 38 of which concerned the special delivery service and 12 the mobile delivery.

During the dispute which took place in Montreal in August 1968, 111 dismissals were announced to the union. The union was caught off guard. They were ready for it in a way but not to the extent of fighting against a minister who disregards consultations and negotiations. You will remember the famous crisis of August 1968.

These same workers were then threatened to lose their jobs. They come up this year against the same problem. The quotation continues:

> So, the wheel is beginning to turn:
> —says the CNTU. And it was right because it had anticipated that the same release could be used again this year.

• (8:50 p.m.)

On February 5th, the CNTU stated, and I quote:

> —111 employees lose their jobs, tomorrow others will also lose them. When will the 420 members of the union be out on the street?

That is the question the CNTU asked on February 5th in its press release; today we are up against the problem of knowing what to do with those employees.

Mr. Speaker, I should not overstay my leave but it seems to me that today's problem could have been foreseen. In spite of my limited experience in that field, it seems to me that if the Postmaster General had been more conciliating, had he worked harder at negotiations, if he had taken the trouble of going out to the parties instead of convening them to his office, had he gone out to meet the employees or at least the union leaders in short, had he taken into account the representations made in 1969, he might perhaps understand the drama now taking place in Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, it may be that government members will accuse us of wanting to play politics with this question, but by putting ourselves in the shoes of those employees who are threatened with being laid off, it is obvious to us that the department has a short-term policy with regard to personnel management, personnel planning, and that the conflict could have been avoided.

That does not necessarily mean that the minister is solely to blame, but the fact remains that if the minister is honest, he will have to admit his failings, because he is mainly responsible for those lay-offs.

I suggest this conflict will increase more and more in scope in spite of the extraordinary measures the minister may take, especially if they are dictatorial measures, that do not rely on the co-operation of union leaders, on negotiation and consultation, and next year, we will have to cope with a new problem, even if the minister says it will not be next year, but five years from now.

It seems to me the communications field is of such importance that we should act seriously and try to prevent situations such as this one.

That we have known eight Postmasters General since 1962 seems to me significant enough. That is an indication that there is no long-term policy in that department, but a short-sighted one which may serve the ministers' interests while they hold office but surely does not serve the people's interests. Therefore, I invite the government members—without any political ambition but on the contrary very sincerely—to read the Kates, Peat and Marwick report and they will see that my criticisms are but a repetition of that report.

Before concluding, I should like to point out that the most serious thing I have against the minister is that he has been saying for several days that the Department of Labour and the Department of Manpower and Immigration are ready to intervene and that besides, they have already taken steps.

When the Postmaster General has the floor, I should like him to clearly state the position of the government and the steps he intends to take to settle this conflict because dictatorial measures are out of the question. It would be desirable to know what bargaining measures he intends to use to settle the conflict in Montreal, not only for this year but also for the coming years, while providing the employees with job security.

I should like the minister to tell us what progress he has made in his discussions with his colleagues in the cabinet so that his department can show that it does serve the people and that it is not simply dedicated to ensure the good name of the minister.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I hope that if the Postmaster General and Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) speaks, he will not close the debate.

Mr. Kierans: No, not at all.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Kierans: Hon. members will have the opportunity to be heard.

[Mr. Fortin.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I should like to make one or two things clear at the outset. Some hon. members opposite have called for the intervention of my colleagues the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen). I simply say to hon. members that if they are seeking to divide the government, this is a government decision. This decision has been taken by all members of the government, and all members of the government are solidly behind it. I, myself, have suggested on various occasions to the secretary general of the CNTU that he contact my colleagues.

We are unanimous on another point. I refer again to the ministers who have been mentioned, the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. They are completely unanimous on this point: We will begin to talk when the violence stops.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kierans: One hon. member has spoken of the destruction of a union. We are speaking of the annual destruction of mail service to 2.5 million people for no other purpose than to bludgeon and blackmail the government of Canada, through its contracts, into prices and tariffs that are beyond all reason. This has gone in since 1954, and it is not going on any longer. The Minister of Labour, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, as well as all members of the government, are determined on this. We are not destroying any union. The union is destroying itself.

The union is now in a position of having led its members in such a way that they can no longer find an employer. Last year Rod Services said it could no longer deal with the union and carry on the service; it asked to be relieved. The present activities and violence of the union and its influence on its members are driving its present employer into a position where he will either ask to be relieved of his contract or go bankrupt. So once again these men will be without an employer. And what does the union suggest to me, as minister? They suggest, as they suggested last March: You create for us a new employer, a Crown corporation. It could take us all in, whether you need us all or not. There are 455 of us now; last March there were 397.

[Translation]

—at that time the real problem was precisely surplus employees and a cost of production which was over a third greater than in any other city in Canada.

[English]

I told them we are not going to create a Crown corporation for one city. If we create one for Montreal, why should we not create one for Toronto, Rimouski, Sept Iles, Vancouver, Rainy River—

An hon. Member: Or Winnipeg.

Mr. Kierans: —or Winnipeg.

Mr. Asselin: What about the CSN; what do they say?

Mr. Kierans: The CSN is not interested in this. The CSN is interested in the CSN.

This union says, "Administer and regulate the affairs of this company." I say this is not our business. We hand out 10,000 contracts and we expect the people to whom we have given the contracts in open competition to do a job for us. If they do not, we change them.

Mr. Valade: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Kierans: At the end of my remarks, if the hon. member does not mind. Now the union comes to me and says, "Find us another employer. You found us Lapalme last year. Get us another contractor." I say it is too late. We have already handed out contracts. We have signed the contracts and we will honour them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kierans: The latest proposal is—I say this for those who are skilled in union affairs—that I should tell the five successful contractors, "You will all join the CSN or your contracts will be annulled." What kind of bargaining is that?

An hon. Member: You should have done it originally.

Mr. Kierans: Wait a minute. That was their problem. They were asleep for five months and woke up only when there was a strike. I asked them, "Why should I tell these five contractors anything?"

An hon. Member: Is that how the opposition would choose a union?

Mr. Kierans: One of the contractors already has a union, that union being the Teamsters. What will we tell the contractor who presently is dealing with the Teamsters? Will we tell him that unless he changes to the CSN, the contract will be null and void? Justify that to the Teamsters!

[Translation]

The guys from the CNTU do not need me any more. They are men and not children.

[English]

When the new contracts start on April 1, that is their problem. They can go out, as the Teamsters can, and bargain with the new contractors. They may be recognized or they may not. But they will not be under pressure from the government of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Valade: That's an easy way out.

Mr. Kierans: I assume the hon. member has a better solution. We have never heard it. It is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker—indeed, some speakers this evening have admitted it—that they have very little knowledge of what is going on in Montreal. I wish to give a brief resumé of the facts. There have been five breakdowns of service in the last year. Only the first of these was legal. Last year's illegal disruption, slow-down, violence, chain gangs, goons and threats lasted 32 days. We have had 2½ weeks of disruption so far this year. There were others previous to that; it has worked in the past. What has now happened is that the costs in Montreal are 25 per cent higher than in other comparable cities. Montreal has been held by the throat by a temporary arrangement each year. It is to be expected that sooner or later the government or the people of Montreal will crack. However, this year the government is not going to crack; and if the people of Montreal understand the situation, they are not going to crack either.

Mr. Asselin: They are going to suffer.

Mr. Kierans: What is responsible for the suffering? The hourly rates. Should we submit to the blackmail, as a Conservative government would?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kierans: The total cost in Montreal last year—

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. Kierans: The Conservative government gave them everything they wanted.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hon. member for Sainte-Marie on a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Valade: I will make my point of order in English because I do not want any ambiguity. I ask the minister, in view of his statements about violence and threats—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

Mr. Valade: That is my point of order.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member asked the minister whether he could ask him a question and he is rising on a point of order.

I would like to know whether he is rising on a point of order or whether he wants to direct a question to the minister.

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker I rise on a point of order because in the course of his speech the minister mentioned threats and violence. He seems to be accusing all the employees involved in the strike. I feel he should be specific.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Kierans: I accept the hon. member's point. A small group of individuals—a gang—within the union is responsible for these things and leads everybody. The leader of the group called the Post Office the pork barrel of politics.

I asked him to be more explicit in his comments and his criticisms. If there is something in the garbage can, let him raise the cover.

That individual has even said that last year, between 7,000 and 8,000 parcels had been stolen during the Christmas season, and that he himself had engaged in this practice, as it was the common thing to do. Those are the undesirable ones!

[English]

For 14 years, Mr. Speaker, contracts have been given in Montreal without public tender. As I said in my letter to Mr. Parent, I am not blaming anyone—the management, the union or the government. I am simply stating the facts. I want to point out that the opposition must also share the blame. One newspaper article states that the mail situation in Montreal is a jungle. During the six years of Conservative government a tender was never asked for; they gave in on every occasion.

Mr. Valade: You did it for 25 years before that.

Mr. Kierans: Last year after Rod Services was no longer able to continue, they lost their employer.

Mr. Sulatycky: You realize they never had a strike either.

Mr. Kierans: You can buy your way out of anything, can't you? At that time I offered to make clear exactly how far I was willing to go. I offered to take into the department those drivers that we needed and to run the service in Montreal ourselves. I went further than that; I said that those employees whom we could not take into the department—because we did not need all 397 of them—would be offered part-time work until such time as we were able to hire them full time. If there were some left, we offered them the possibility—

[Translation]

Mr. Kierans: —the possibility of retraining themselves so as to be able to fill other positions. This rather generous offer has been refused.

[English]

Why was it refused? It was refused for two reasons. The first reason was if they came into the department I could not recognize the CSN because we have our own unions in the public service. The second reason was that if we did take them, we could not give them recognition of their seniority. This was not because we would or would not have wanted to do that. I have no opinion on that matter; it is a union problem. What is quite clear is that the CSN is not interested in their members, but in themselves.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kierans: Last year they lost their employer and this year they are again losing their employer.

Mr. Valade: That is a misrepresentation of facts.

Mr. Kierans: He took a deliberate choice. He wanted no part of this. He took that choice despite the urging of the Post Office.

He decided not to submit any bids. In effect he said, "I cannot manage my own affairs; I cannot hire my people; I cannot fire them; I cannot appoint supervisors or run my own business." This is why he did not submit a tender. Due to the fact he did not bid, this group again lost its employer.

What this strike is all about is this: Can another employer be found that will permit them to operate, recognize their status and give a legal existence to something that has in fact disappeared twice within less than a year?

[Translation]

I want to quote a letter from Mr. Cormier, Montreal postmaster, to Mr. Lapalme, dated September 25th, in which he prompted G. Lapalme Inc. to send in a tender. Here is an extract:

Your experience in local trucking and your knowledge of postal operations put you, naturally, in an excellent position to bid. We shall expect your tenders with pleasure.

And here is some extracts from the letter sent by Mr. Breton to the Canadian Union of Postal Workers:

Now, under the Post Office Act,—

I am required under the act to publish the advertisements for tenders.

Now, under the Post Office Act, it is understood that public tenders will be asked.

Mr. Breton was then writing, as I said, to his own union.

We are convinced that with your experience and this year's result, we shall be in a position to tender, to get this contract and to obtain security for about 5 years.

Mind you, mention is made of "security for about 5 years" instead of insecurity or security provided by contract for one year only.

And here is what Mr. Breton says further on in his letter:

We therefore expect your co-operation to complete this year and help us prepare that tender.

But nothing was done. After all, it is up to me—

The union took no action. They were advised at the end of September. The union ignored the fact that the government of Canada was announcing public tenders. Why did they not ask us until the end of January when they blew it and decided to revert to their old tactics of violence against the people of Montreal? Why did they not ask to see me? Why did they not speak up on behalf of their men? Why did they not ask me to include in the contract a clause protecting their men? Mr. Speaker, they are not interested in protecting their men; they are interested in protecting themselves. We ourselves included—not at the instigation of the union—such clauses as "tenderers must undertake to pay wage rates not less than prevailing rates." We have paid more attention to the welfare of their men than they have themselves.

In January the new contracts were awarded, representing five times the security of the old ones and stipulating that employees shall be paid daily wage rates—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired. He may not continue without the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Agreed. The Postmaster General and Minister of Communications.

[English]

Mr. Kierans: This company's contract expires on March 31. These 455 employees will therefore be out of work. They will no longer have a union; they will no longer have a contract. They have never been Post Office employees, nor have the other 40,000 or 50,000 people who work for other contractors across the country. The principle suggested tonight, that the government should guarantee all 455 jobs whether they need them or not because their company has ceased to exist, could be extended to include the case of workers in any textile or other factory which went bankrupt. It might be said that we should guarantee employment to all who lose their jobs. We cannot guarantee employment. We can make suggestions and ask people to take certain steps. We shall do all we can to help them. But first of all they must help themselves.

I have a better breakdown of the seniority of these employees than the union does. We asked them for this information but they refused to give it, or did not bother to reply. We cannot urge contractors to take on new employees until the new employees are permitted to seek work; until they are permitted to register with Canada Manpower and permitted to approach the new contractors. This they cannot do. One of the new contractors can show you any day the goons of the union who are watching to see which of the members of the union goes into his plant.

I was invited to one meeting of the executive. I went to it, as did the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, and the Minister of Labour. I received the telegram inviting me to another meeting of the executive on the morning of the day on which the meeting was convened. I could not go because I was appearing that day before the Senate Committee on Mass Media, and the Minister of Labour was in Vancouver. The next meeting took place at my instigation. We went over all the points and had a very useful talk and a very hard one.

[Translation]

I am ready to meet with Mr. Parent and Mr. Beaudoin.

An hon. Member: The Minister of Labour also?

Mr. Kierans: Surely! But I would prefer meeting with the union members themselves and having a frank talk with them.

I was told, two or three weeks ago, that I would be invited to a general union meeting. But I heard no more about it.

[English]

You want the details? You talk about the destruction of a union! Do you want me to talk about the destruction of government property? What do you want the government of Canada to do when 568 mail boxes out of 1,800 have been damaged, blocked, cemented? Are we supposed to say to these people, "You are right. Your methods have forced us to recognize the logic of your arguments"?

Mr. Valade: Of course not. We never said that.

Mr. Kierans: You can see the damage all over Montreal. Where will it end?

Mr. Valade: You are the minister.

Mr. Asselin: Arbitrate.

Mr. Kierans: What is there to arbitrate when people block your trucks and destroy your mail boxes? Who wants to arbitrate with people like that? We shall come to that after they stop these practices—and not before.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kierans: The situation in Montreal is that 700,000 items of mail have been delayed. Now these people are beginning to damage the relay boxes. I could read two pages of incidents. In short, the unions have worked themselves into a position in the last five years where the people of Montreal and the taxpayers of Canada are calling a halt.

In the last five years the cost of operation in Toronto has risen by 33 per cent. In the last five years the cost of operation in Montreal has gone up by 73 per cent. And still they are not satisfied. I have said that unless the violence and the slow-down ceases, I shall have no choice but to revoke the Lapalme contract.

I will say more: It is much more likely that by that time, if the present situation continues, the employees themselves will have driven their employer into bankruptcy. He is not delivering the mail, and in accordance with many of his contracts he is getting paid for what he delivers. Nevertheless, he is paying the employees at full-time rates even though they deliver 20 per cent of a load instead of 100 per cent. In effect, we the people of Canada are financing this slow-down. It is the taxpayer of Canada who is financing what is going on in Montreal.

[Translation]

The Montreal taxpayer is fed up also.

[English]

If the Lapalme contract is to be revoked, or if the company should have any reason to give up this contract, the members of the union are back where they were when Rod Services decided to go out of business. They will have no contract because they will have no employer. They will have no union because they will have no employer. This time we are not looking for a guardian angel to take them into the fold because we have the people to handle the mail transportation services in Montreal. The sooner the CSN understand that, the better it will be for them and for the people of Montreal.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I have explained to Mr. Parent that if I am forced to revoke the contract we will hire 350 chauffeurs. That is all we need, not 455. We will give priority to those who have long service. I can break down the service for the House. According to the newspapers, some of this service goes up to 20 years. In fact it goes further than that, because 30 of the present drivers for Lapalme have worked for between 15 and 43 years. Three of them have worked 14 years, four have worked 13 years, nine have worked 12 years, 13 have worked 11 years and 27 have worked 10 years. Another 76 have worked between five and ten years. That represents 162 men with ten years of service.

[Translation]

No, no goons are involved in this case and I agree with you on that.

[English]

Thirty of these employees have worked for four years, 48 for three years, 80 for two years and—this is the heart of the matter—135 have come in within the last year.

An hon. Member: Troublemakers.

Mr. Kierans: I do not say that they are troublemakers, but I do say that the people who came in within the last year knew that it was a temporary arrangement. They knew the conditions which had been prevailing. I do not think that I have a particular responsibility to them, any more than I have a responsibility to make sure that the Teamsters are thrown out of one contract and the CSN pushed in.
